Voter Information Privacy

Timothy Lash, Legislative Analyst

You asked for a comparison of the privacy of voter information in Alaska and other states.

In general, all 50 states and the District of Columbia allow some sort of access to voter records. However, many states have taken steps to restrict access to voter information or otherwise shield voter records—or at least the records of some voters—from public view. All states permit access to voter information by political parties and candidates for elected office. Other than those requests, some states restrict, to varying degrees, which other entities or individuals may obtain voter information. In comparison to other states, Alaska is less protective of voter information than many others, doing little to restrict access to, or otherwise shield, the personal information of registered voters in the state.¹ Below, we identify areas of comparison between Alaska and other states.

Restricting Public Access to Voter Records

Many states have enacted various measures that restrict access to voter information to narrow audiences and/or for narrow purposes. For example, California restricts the release of voter information to election-related, political, scholarly, journalistic, or governmental purposes and expressly prohibits “any personal, private, or commercial purpose.”² Similarly, Virginia limits access to certain individuals for certain purposes and charges $5,000 for that privilege.³ According to the National Conference of State Legislatures (NCSL), “Eleven states do not allow members of the public to access voter data. Several other states restrict access to state residents (11), other registered voters (7), non-profit organizations (6), and those doing research (9).”⁴

According to our review, Alaska does not provide similar safeguards. Regardless of who may be asking, the state’s voter records are relatively accessible to other individuals or entities who seek it. Upon receipt of a request form and a $20 fee—an amount 250 times less than Virginia’s fee—the Alaska Division of Elections will provide an electronic or hard copy of the Voter

¹ As of March 2017, seven states have enacted automatic voter registration—Alaska, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Oregon, Vermont, and West Virginia—along with the District of Columbia. Among these, California is especially protective of voter information. While other states have linked automatic voter registration to an application for, or renewal of, a driver’s license, automatic voter registration in Alaska is tied to the permanent fund dividend (PFD) application. For an overview of automatic voter registration by the National Conference of State Legislatures (NCSL), see “Automatic Voter Registration,” March 3, 2017, <http://www.ncsl.org/research/elections-and-campaigns/automatic-voter-registration.aspx>.

² California Elections Code, Sec. 2194, http://leginfo.legislature.ca.gov/faces/codes_displaySection.xhtml?lawCode=ELEC§ionNum=2194. Also, California Assembly Bill No. 1461, a 2015 law establishing automatic voter registration and “procedures to safeguard the confidentiality of information,” as well as prohibiting the digital display of voter records, is accessible at https://leginfo.legislature.ca.gov/faces/billNavClient.xhtml?bill_id=201520160AB1461. California’s voter information policies are favorably compared to other states in other reports, e.g. “Publishing voter registration data must balance privacy with transparency,” Sunlight Foundation, June 12, 2016, <https://sunlightfoundation.com/2016/06/16/publishing-voter-registration-data-must-balance-privacy-with-transparency/>.

³ Alongside Virginia, “Several states charge $5,000 and Wisconsin charges $12,500. Alabama and Arizona got creative with setting their fees by charging one cent per voter, resulting in a cost of upwards of $30,000.” “It’s a Presidential Election Year: Do You Know Where Your Voter Records Are?” National Conference of State Legislatures, February 2016, <http://www.ncsl.org/research/elections-and-campaigns/the-canvass-february-2016.aspx>.

⁴ NCSL, “It’s a Presidential Election Year: Do You Know Where Your Voter Records Are?” <http://www.ncsl.org/research/elections-and-campaigns/the-canvass-february-2016.aspx>.

List, a file disclosing the full name, 10-year voting history, district, precinct, party affiliation, sex, residential address (if not maintained as confidential as discussed below), and mailing address of every individual registered to vote in the state.⁵ Evidently, the state makes it both convenient and affordable to obtain those records.⁶

Providing Confidentiality for Certain Voter Records

Beyond restricting access to voter records, many states have taken special steps to shield voter information, in whole or in part, for certain registered voters who may not want to be identified, located, or subjected to threats, stalking, or violence through the disclosure of their personal information in state voter records. A number of states provide privacy protections for certain residents, or certain types of residents, through opt-in address confidentiality programs and other measures. These protections usually cover, but are not necessarily limited to, voter records.

For example, with regard to domestic violence, overall, the National Network to End Domestic Violence (NNEDV) notes that some survivors of domestic violence may choose not to vote at all, rather than risk the disclosure of one's full name, location, and other information through voter records. At the same time, other survivors may not be aware that, in states without sufficient privacy protection, "their personal information may be obtainable by the public, accessible online, or available for purchase."⁷ Because Alaska provides relatively little protection or confidentiality, a resident who does not want to risk public disclosure of their identity, location, and other data may have good reason to abstain from voting. Or, if the resident is not aware of the ease of access to Alaska's voter records, the resident may vote or may become registered to vote—either automatically through applying for the PFD, or otherwise—without realizing that their information may be accessed for $20.

According to the NNEDV's Safety Net Project, 39 states have established Address Confidentiality Programs (ACPs) that allow survivors of domestic violence (DV) and other crimes to keep their current address confidential in public and official processes and records. Of the 39 states with ACPs, 29 states specifically prevent the sharing of their participant's voter records to keep the addresses of DV survivors from being sold and accessible in voter lists. Alaska is in the minority of states, neither having an ACP, nor providing specific protection for the voter records of DV survivors or any others, according to our review.

Apparently, Alaska's only noteworthy measure to safeguard the personal information of a registered voter is that, when a resident registers to vote, the Alaska Division of Elections allows the resident to opt out of disclosing a residential address by substituting a mailing address. While valuable to some individuals, this option falls well short of the protections afforded to residents of other states. Because a mailing address and other personal information are readily available to members of the public through the release of voter records, in effect, Alaska's handling of voter information does not allow any registered voters to keep their personal information (with the exception of a residential address) private.

⁶ For a brief look across state legislatures, see the NCSL's "It's a Presidential Election Year: Do You Know Where Your Voter Records Are?" at <http://www.ncsl.org/research/elections-and-campaigns/the-canvass-february-2016.aspx>. See also the 50-state review, "Voter List Information," U.S. Elections Project, <http://voterlist.electproject.org/states/>. However, please note that not all restrictions to voter information access appear in those sources, or in any other sources of which we are aware.

⁷ "Voter Registration and Privacy," Safety Net Project, National Network to End Domestic Violence (NNEDV), 2016, <https://www.techsafety.org/voter-registration-privacy/>. As the NNEDV's report goes on to say: "Many people do not realize that their voter registration record may be publicly available online and that it may include identifying information. Voters should also be given more options to maintain their privacy when registering to vote. These options should either be created or enhanced so they are easily accessible and available to eligible voters. Currently, survivors who have high privacy risks have few options and may consider choosing not to register to vote to keep their address from becoming publicly available. Lack of privacy is an extremely unfortunate reason for someone to not be able to vote and something that should be addressed so that all citizens can exercise their constitutional right and engage in the political process. If your state currently does not offer any type of privacy options for individuals, it's important to explore these options."

Additional Examples of Privacy Protections in Other States

Below, we provide additional examples from states that have passed laws to further protect state records and/or voter records.

- Maryland provides the benefits of the Maryland Safe at Home Address Confidentiality Program (ACP) to victims of human trafficking, as well as to DV survivors. Among other privacy protections, Maryland's ACP requires the local board of elections to use a participant's actual address for voter registration and other election-related purposes, yet the program prohibits the board from making the participant's actual address, as held in voter records, available for public inspection or copying (with limited exceptions for law enforcement or court orders).⁸
- Utah allows a registered voter to request that the voter's personal information be kept private, if disclosure may either put the voter or a member of the voter's household's life or safety at risk, or put the voter or a member of the voter's household at risk of being stalked or harassed.⁹
- Alabama omits the residential and mailing address of certain registered voters from the state's voter records for victims of DV, custodians of minor victims of DV, and those protected by a DV order.¹⁰
- Louisiana prohibits the disclosure of voter information for anyone participating in the Louisiana Address Confidentiality Program, as well as for law enforcement officers engaged in hazardous activities to the extent that it is necessary for their names and addresses to be kept private.¹¹
- Florida extends the public records exemption to the names, addresses, and telephone numbers of victims of stalking, in the same manner by which the state protects residents who participate in the State of Florida Address Confidentiality Program (ACP) for Victims of Domestic Violence, exempting the personal information of those residents from public disclosure.¹²
- Texas specifically restricts the residential address of any judge in the state.¹³

Finally, and especially notably, California—a state that is highly regarded for the lengths to which it goes to restrict access to voter records and to safeguard the personal information of residents in general—provides confidentiality to the following registered voters under law:

- A victim of domestic violence, sexual assault, or stalking;
- A reproductive health care service provider, employee, volunteer, or patient;
- A public safety officer; or

⁸ Maryland SB 818, 2014.

⁹ Utah SB 36, 2014, <http://le.utah.gov/~2014/bills/static/SB0036.html>.

¹⁰ Alabama SB 280, 2014.

¹¹ Louisiana HB 383, 2014.

¹³ NCSL, "It's a Presidential Election Year: Do You Know Where Your Voter Records Are?" <http://www.ncsl.org/research/elections-and-campaigns/the-canvass-february-2016.aspx>.

- A person with a life-threatening circumstance.¹⁴

While the above examples are not exhaustive, they represent the range of privacy protections available to registered voters in various states. Alaska, in comparison, provides minimal, if any, protection. For example, Alaska's handling of voter records does not appear to address the needs of DV survivors or other residents whose personal information is widely accessible, with few restrictions or other protections, at this time.

We include, in Attachment A, the NNEDV's "Address Confidentiality Laws by State," which lists confidentiality programs and establishing legislation in the 39 states that have passed those laws.¹⁵

We hope this is helpful. If you have questions or need additional information, please let us know.
