

Revised Program Legislative (RPL) Process Overview

The Constitution outlines the duties and responsibilities of the three branches of Government. The Governor, as head of the Executive branch, is responsible for submitting a budget, but the power of appropriation is reserved for the Legislative branch. The Legislature cannot delegate this power to the Executive branch nor to any Legislative committee. To do so would violate the separation of powers doctrine and be an unconstitutional delegation of authority. This means that the Executive branch can only spend what was approved by the full Legislature during the budget process.

Since the Legislature is only in session for part of the year, the intent of the RPL Process, codified in the late 1970s, was to provide a constitutional method to accept additional funds for items already approved in the budget from non-state sources that became available after the session concluded.

There are two steps necessary to accept RPLs:

1. The current fiscal year budget must include language specifying which funds can be accepted; and
2. The governor must follow the process outlined in AS 37.07.080 (h) to submit the RPL to the Legislative Budget and Audit committee for review.

If the additional funds are for an existing budget item, the RPL language was included in the budget, and the statutory process is followed, the Legislative Budget and Audit committee can offer a recommendation on the RPL, but it is non-binding, and the Governor can accept the funds after a 45 day waiting period.
