ANALYSIS: (Attach a separate page if necessary)

This bill repeals the statutory prohibitions on the State of Alaska for prosecuting and punishing a criminal act that has been prosecuted by the federal government or another jurisdiction. This statute recently prevented the State of Alaska from prosecuting a cruise ship company that was illegally dumping water containing oil and hazardous waste in Alaska waters, because the federal government had already prosecuted the company for the same acts under federal law. This conduct should have been addressed in a separate state prosecution, so that injury to the state could be compensated by fines or restitution. This bill would allow the State of Alaska to prosecute an offender if a similar situation should arise again.

Passage of this legislation is expected to result in only a handful of new cases per year. Although they may be highly visible cases, their numbers are not anticipated to be sufficient to cause a fiscal impact on the Department of Law.
