Summer tourist traffic substantially increases the volume of interstate passengers moving between Alaskan points both in the Southeast Alaska system of Alaska Airlines and over the system of Wien Consolidated Airlines. The air tours offered by tour operators and the airlines bring a substantial influx of visitors to the State. The through-intrastate movement of these tourists, however, is generally limited to only the very few points covered in the tours.

It is also true that the summer movement of purely intrastate passengers increases very substantially. It can be seen, for example, in Exhibit ATC-105 that the Third Quarter Air Taxi passenger movement is more than twice that of the Second and Fourth Quarters, and more than three times that of the First Quarter. O & D information submitted by the carriers (to the extent that it can be so broken down) also indicates a much larger intrastate movement in the summer.

Thus the ratio of intrastate to interstate passenger traffic in the summer would probably be not less than 70 percent for the route systems discussed above.

ALL INTRA-ALASKA ROUTES REGULATED BY THE CAB REFLECT A MAJOR CAB-ATC JURISDICTIONAL OVERLAP

In most respects, the responsibilities and objectives of the Alaska Transportation Commission in intrastate air commerce matters are similar to those of the CAB in interstate air commerce matters.

Due to the long-standing and intimate involvement of the CAB in Alaska's air commerce, it would be impossible to draw a fine line between the jurisdiction of the CAB and the jurisdiction of this Commission. This ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION itself epitomizes the jurisdictional overlap in integration of federal and state regulatory practices and policies.

Excluding the Seattle/Portland gateway services, virtually all point to point service and routes being considered in this proceeding are intrastate in nature. With respect to much of this service, interstate commerce is incidental or insignificant compared with intrastate service requirements. It is estimated that carriers regulated primarily by the CAB provide in excess of 95 percent of the scheduled intrastate air service within Alaska. This appears to be a most unusual situation, as well as one of questionable validity, if the CAB jurisdiction is exercised unilaterally.

It follows that in Alaska where air transportation is one of the most important transportation modes and a basic necessity to the entire economy of the State, it is essential that the State exercise major, if not primary, regulatory jurisdiction.

EXCLUSIVE CAB REGULATION OF SPECIFIC INTRASTATE AIR ROUTES AND CARRIERS HAS PROVEN TO BE NON-RESPONSIVE TO THE NEEDS OF LARGE SEGMENTS OF THE STATE

The matter of the exercise of so broad a jurisdiction by the CAB over intrastate routes is not in and of itself the major problem. What is unfortunate, however, is the unresponsiveness of this arrangement to the needs and complaints of the people who are presumably being served. It appears that the remoteness of the CAB from the area of operations of its regulated carriers substantially influences the objectives of the CAB in its regulatory policy as applied to intra-Alaskan services. This remoteness tends to insulate the CAB from operational and service matters (other than those which may be called to its attention by the carriers), the result being that the Board primarily concerns itself about only those problems, such as subsidy payments, which are its direct and exclusive responsibility. It appears that with respect to Alaskan carriers the overriding objective of the CAB is, and has for some time been, the elimination of subsidies with all possible dispatch.

There is little doubt that this primary objective is being achieved. However, it is also quite apparent to anyone familiar with Alaskan air transportation services that this primary objective is being achieved at great sacrifice in public service.

The CAB cannot be totally unaware of the vast deterioration in intra-Alaska air service over the past three or four years. But, it seems certain that the Board does not fully recognize or appreciate the magnitude and implications of these conditions.

THE DOMINANT OBJECTIVE IN THIS PROCEEDING -- REASONABLE ADEQUACY AND PERFORMANCE OF CARRIER SERVICE; THE APPROACH TO ACHIEVING THAT OBJECTIVE -- JOINT INVESTIGATION AND REGULATION

The instigation of the ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION is unquestionably an important and commendable undertaking by the CAB. However, the issues which have been delineated by the Board reflect a continuing and virtually exclusive preoccupation with the subsidy issue and a most unfortunate lack of appreciation for the standards and adequacy of service.

It is the position of this Commission, however, that the adequacy and standards of service dominate as issues and the Board should and must consider them in this proceeding. Assuming the accuracy of this contention, it becomes at once apparent that there are major deficiencies in the procedures adopted by the CAB in this Service Investigation.

We call the Board's attention to the provisions of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 USC 1324), titled Cooperation With State Aeronautical Agencies:

> "(b) The Board is empowered to confer with or to hold joint hearings with any State aeronautical agency, or other State agency, in connection with any matter arising under this chapter within its jurisdiction, and to avail itself of the cooperation, services, records, and facilities of such State agencies as fully as may be practicable in the administration and the enforcement of this chapter."

We cannot conceive of a more appropriate occasion for the Board to have implemented the above quoted statute than the instant proceeding. The fact that it did not do so strongly suggests that the Board considered this Service Investigation to be little more than a fairly routine route proceeding. And, perhaps having little more to go on than the carriers' side of the story, the Board could justify that conclusion. However, even if it were routine, the fact that so great a proportion of the routes under investigation are primarily intrastate in nature, should have been sufficient for the Board to have proposed a joint board proceeding. It is elementary that the role of this Commission as simply a party in this proceeding effectively precludes participation by the State in the decisions affecting nearly all scheduled service in intrastate air commerce.

The Commission recognizes that the CAB has not specifically made an issue of the bush route services to those communities listed in Appendix C, but not shown in Appendices A and B, of CAB Order 69-3-68. Nor has the CAB determined to take up the issue of the relative jurisdiction of the CAB and this Commission. However, these issues are necessarily an integral part of this proceeding and, as previously stated, the issue of adequacy and standards of service over the bush route segments of the CAB carriers' authority is one of the dominant issues to be considered. It can be seen that these issues are interrelated. The exclusive regulatory jurisdiction heretofore exercised by the CAB over the Alaska routes has not resulted in reasonably satisfactory or adequate service to most of the communities in the State.

Additionally, the broad assumption of regulatory jurisdiction on an exclusive basis by the CAB seriously subverts effective local regulation. It encourages CAB regulated carriers to avoid state regulation and to look only to the CAB for route changes, tariff changes, etc. (See, for example, Exhibit ATC 104). The State seldom receives timely notice of such requests.

HEARING PROCEDURES ADOPTED BY THE CAB IN THIS INVESTIGATION PRECLUDE AN ADEQUATE EVIDENTIARY RECORD ON DOMINANT ISSUES --- ATC PUBLIC HEARINGS MAY PARTIALLY REMEDY THIS PROBLEM

In a proceeding such as this ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION, where historical carrier performance is a matter of major significance, it is imperative that the consumer public be liberally afforded an opportunity to speak its piece.

Unfortunately, the restriction to a formal hearing process sans less formal public participation effectively thwarts this objective. It is well known that a good cross section of public opinion cannot be obtained in a matter of this sort without holding public, forum-type hearings.

To partially remedy the public participation problem, this Commission belatedly requested and was granted (with concurrence of all other parties) an extension of time in which to conduct open public hearings on its own and outside the CAB record.

During the latter part of February and early March, 1969, the ATC held open, public, forum-type hearings throughout the State and made numerous personal contacts with people throughout the State for the purpose of determining (1) the major concerns and views of the community in regard to air transportation and (2) the manner in which the people of this State may be better served in air commerce.

Hearings were held at the following places: Barrow, Kotzebue, Nome, Unalakleet, Andreafski (St. Mary's), Bethel, Dillingham, King Salmon, Kodiak, Kenai, Cordova, Valdez, Tok, Fort Yukon, Haines, Sitka, Juneau, Petersburg, Wrangell, and Ketchikan. Each of these hearings was conducted by one or more of the three Commissioners. The time, place and nature of these hearings was noticed in advance by public media and individual correspondence although notice was necessarily very short. There were in attendance from a handful to forty or more people at each hearing. Anyone who desired to speak was permitted to do so. All testimony was recorded and most of these recordings were subsequently reviewed by the Commissioners. Portions thereof were transcribed for further, more detailed review.

People attending these hearings were encouraged to submit their views in writing and a fair representation did so.

Based upon these hearings, letters and numerous other contacts with people throughout the State, the Commission has determined that there are major and inexcusable deficiencies in the service provided by those CAB carriers serving intra-Alaska routes. This is poignantly clear in the so-called bush route areas. Such matters as extreme delays in mail and freight deliveries; inexcusable schedule delays or cancellations; inability to have claims and refunds settled within several months of filing; frequent and unannounced schedule changes; untrained personnel; discriminatory rates and improper charges; commonplace misinformation on flight arrivals and departures; frequent frustration in attempting to make interline connections; substantial failure to meet published departure and arrival times; inability of local people to obtain space on flights to and from tourist centers because all seats booked solid for several days at a time by tour passengers; the frequent unavailability of scheduled flights theoretically being performed by subcontractors, etc., were common complaints throughout the State. Most of these problems are presented in varying forms in Exhibit 300 series statements.

THE ALASKA TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION RECOMMENDS THAT THE ALASKA HEARINGS TO BE CONDUCTED BY THE CAB EXAMINER BE BROADENED IN SCOPE TO INCLUDE A PUBLIC EXPRESSION MISSION

It is the conviction of this Commission that the service conditions previously enumerated do predominate in most areas of the State. However, we do not presume complete agreement by the carriers involved.

Therefore, the ATC strongly urges that the forthcoming hearings to be held by the CAB in Alaska should likewise be of a nature that would allow general public participation and oral testimony.

CARRIER MERGERS AND CONSOLIDATIONS APPEAR TO HAVE LED TO MAJOR DETERIORATION OF INTRASTATE SERVICE THROUGHOUT THE STATE

Within the last three years there have been several mergers and purchases of CAB certificated carriers serving Alaska. In very brief summary, these mergers and consolidations were:

1. Wien Airlines and Northern Consolidated Airlines to form Wien Consolidated Airlines, Inc., April, 1968.

2. Western Airlines purchased Pacific Northern Airlines, July, 1967.

3. Alaska Airlines with Cordova Airlines, and with Alaska Coastal Ellis Airlines, surviving as Alaska Airlines, Inc., February and March, 1968.

There appears to be a direct correlation between the merger of the larger CAB carriers serving Alaska and the deterioration in air service to outlying communities and areas.

Western Airlines, for example, has been systematically ridding itself of what might be properly termed "local service obligations." It has suspended its service to King Salmon, Cordova, and Yakutat. It seeks to rid itself of its route between Anchorage, Kenai, Homer and Kodiak. In essence, it appears that Western's real objective in absorbing Pacific Northern Airlines was to acquire only the high-traffic-density, Seattle/Portland gateway routes to Alaska, and to succeed to the favored position of PNA in its application for Anchorage-Hawaii authority as consolidated in the Trans-Pacific Route Investigation.

Having accomplished these objectives, Western Airlines now shows no interest in the air service needs of the remainder of those communities previously served by PNA.

Alaska Airlines, in its two mergers, has gained access to the Anchorage-Juneau-Sitka-Seattle-Portland market. Ketchikan has not yet been added to this service route by the CAB, but the result of this omission has been the creation of some abnormal and unsatisfactory scheduling and service conditions in the Ketchikan, Juneau, Sitka feeder service from other Southeastern Alaska communities.

In essence, what the CAB has done in Southeast Alaska over the last five years is to substitute in substantial part Alaska Airlines and Wien Consolidated Airlines for Pan American World Airways in the interstate service to Southeast Alaska. This substitution has never met the approval of the people of this area.

Alaska Airlines inherited by its merger a multiplicity of intra-Southeast Alaska routes. Many of the services previously provided by Alaska Coastal Ellis Airlines have been discontinued by Alaska Airlines entirely. A large number of the remaining point to point routes which Alaska purportedly continues to serve are in fact served by air taxi operators under subcontract with Alaska Airlines (Exhibit ATC-103).

It was anticipated that the merger of Wien Airlines and Northern Consolidated Airlines would provide a materially strengthened carrier which would result in a better service to the public than either carrier was capable of providing individually.

Unfortunately, the emerged carrier, while providing more sophisticated equipment and service to the large competitive markets, has retracted its service to the outlying communities. In markets where Wien Consolidated is not competing with another carrier, its service and performance have deteriorated markedly.

Between 1957 (the first year Northern Consolidated subcontracted out part of its route) and November 1, 1967, Northern Consolidated and Wien Alaska subcontracted a total of 34 points on their routes. Since May 1, 1969, Wien Consolidated has subcontracted thirty additional points (Exhibit ATC-103).

The inverse relationship between mergers and deteriorating service to outlying communities appears to be a very real one. Apparently when a carrier reaches substantial size, gains access to major markets, and places into operation sophisticated jet equipment, it loses its interest and perhaps capability to provide adequate service over marginal routes.

Unfortunately, the bush-level scheduled carriers, which develop from these circumstances, do not inherit any of the better traffic markets because those markets are already occupied by the large carriers.

CAB CARRIER SUBCONTRACTS ARE UNLAWFUL AND CONTRARY TO PUBLIC INTEREST

Wien and Alaska have submitted into the record copies of their agreements with air taxis under which the latter provide local scheduled service. Exhibit ATC-103 graphically portrays the networks of such service routes. In each case, the subcontractor is a State-certificated air taxi operator. However, only two of the fifteen subcontractors are certificated by the State as scheduled carriers. And, even in those instances where the subcontractor is certificated to provide scheduled service, many of the points listed in his State route authority are different from those he serves under subcontract.

Further investigation also reveals that the subcontractor generally serves the contract points both as a scheduled carrier and as an air taxi operator. In many instances, the volume of traffic carried as an air taxi to such points substantially exceeds the volume carried as the subcontractor. It may be that in many such cases the traffic which the subcontractor is carrying under the contract is limited to multiple coupon, involving travel over more than one service leg.

Air taxi operators are required by State law to charge only those rates which they have filed with this Commission. It is immaterial whether the service is being provided on a trip by trip basis or under a long-term contract.

Thus, for such an operator to comply with the laws of the State of Alaska as to the charges which he may make, he cannot charge the rates and the tariffs of the CAB contracting carrier, unless such rates happen to coincide with those of the air taxi operator which are on file.

Under some of the contracts the operator is paid a flat hourly rate by the mainline carrier irrespective of the number of passengers, volume of freight, etc. The mainline carrier then collects its tariff rates from the sub's passengers and shippers.

Other subcontractors apparently collect and keep as their compensation the published CAB tariff rates of the mainline carrier.

The air taxi operator's tariff normally reflects hourly rates. The cost per passenger would depend on the number of passengers travelling between two given points on the same flight. Thus it would appear that there is only one point in the passenger-time relationship at which the air taxi rate per passenger could be the same as the passenger rate of the scheduled CAB carrier.

This subcontract approach is even further clandestine in that the CAB carrier, rather than this Commission, makes the determination as to which, if any, local Alaska certificated carriers will become scheduled carriers and will be allowed to carry mail for compensation. This leads to an unhealthy control by a major airline of the independent operations of locally-certificated carriers. It also leads to a reduction in competition and service through a mutual arrangement not to compete. Although the CAB regulated carrier remains ultimately responsible for the actions and performance of the subcontractor, they in fact exercise no supervision over the sub, do not know what the sub is doing or not doing, and apparently couldn't care less. With many of the subcontractors, the only scheduled service provided occurs on mail flights (if there is room) and mail is delivered sporadically.

One further point should be made before leaving the matter of subcontracts. There is no assurance that a contract will not be terminated on short notice; or that it will be renewed upon expiration; or that it will not be given to a different local operator; or that the CAB carrier itself will not terminate the contract and initiate the service itself. Thus, the State-certificated operator builds his operation and his capability with no assurance that he may continue to provide that service for any length of time.

The CAB carrier is neither qualified nor authorized to designate local carriers upon which it will bestow operating privileges within this State.

There have been numerous complaints to the effect that some subcontractors of CAB carriers are providing poor, sporadic, inadequate and unsatisfactory service to the people they supposedly serve. These conditions add emphasis to the impropriety of the route subcontracts.

IT APPEARS THAT THE AIR TAXI OPERATORS, PARTICULARLY IN SOUTHEAST ALASKA, NOW PROVIDE THE ONLY DEPENDABLE BUSH ROUTE SERVICE

The Commission has requested confidential O & D information of Southeast Alaska air taxi operators for the months of August and October, 1969. The response to this request was sufficient to indicate that the air taxi operators are now carrying a very substantial percentage of the passenger traffic between communities presumably being served by Alaska Airlines.

The response to the Commission's request represents about one-third of the total volume of passenger movement by air taxi operators. The information submitted shows a weighted average of approximately 60 percent of the passenger load carried by the responding air taxi operators in the Third Quarter of 1969 as passengers moving between points on Alaska Airlines' scheduled route. It is believed that this average may be somewhat high as a reflection of the total Southeast Alaska air taxi movement. However, even if the percentage was reduced to 44 percent (the lowest of the reporting operators) it would mean that in the Third Quarter of 1969 air taxi operators in Southeast Alaska transported approximately 26,000 passengers between points listed on Alaska Airlines' scheduled route. This matter is well highlighted by the fact that Alaska Airlines in its informational response (IR-AS-1) shows the number of O & D coupon passengers carried by it between Juneau and Hoonah in the month of August, 1969, as 184. However, one air taxi operator alone shows a total of 840 passengers transported between Juneau and Hoonah during the same month.

It is the Commission's belief that these circumstances vividly reflect a virtually-complete abandonment by Alaska Airlines of its responsibilities under its CAB certificate to provide a dependable scheduled service to these outlying communities. In essence, the people of Southeast Alaska must look to the air taxi operator if they are going to receive a modicum of dependable service between the communities of Southeast Alaska.

The extent to which the results of the Commission's survey in Southeastern Alaska can be translated to other areas of the State is not known. However, the Commission has received considerable indication that the ratios may be similar in the Northwest, Southwest, and Interior areas as shown in Exhibit ATC 105.

UNILATERAL DECISION BY THE CAB WOULD BE IMPROPER IN THIS PROCEEDING

As procedural matters now stand, the decision in this Service Investigation is to be made unilaterally by the CAB.

This approach places the Alaska Transportation Commission in a rather unique position (since it is the regulatory body on the State level). As pointed out earlier in the text of this Paper, the regulatory jurisdiction of the State is at least as substantial as that of the CAB.

Therefore, what the Commission is apparently being asked to do is decide for itself the issues in this proceeding without benefit of the evidentiary record and briefs and thereupon make its recommendations to the CAB as would any other party.

Such an approach, even if it were practical, would serve little purpose. It is essential that the jurisdictional questions be squarely faced and the utmost in cooperative effort be pursued by both the CAB and the ATC. This Commission currently has in its files a substantial number of applications for intrastate scheduled authority. The Commission has deferred consideration of all such applications (upon which hearings have not been held in the past six months) pending the outcome of this ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION. Even where hearings had been held previous to this policy decision, the granting of authority where warranted by the public convenience and necessity has been limited to a one-year period.

It is intended by the Commission to systematically review the scheduled service requirements of limited geographical areas in a series of State area service investigations and to provide for the certificated service so badly needed in many areas of the State.

It would be a complete frustration of regulatory responsibility if the CAB and the ATC failed to integrate their efforts in these matters which so vitally affect the public interest.

This letter was sent to applicant air carriers representing 13 docketed applications for intrastate scheduled carrier authority.

SUBJECT: Your Application for Scheduled Carrier Authority -- Docket No. _____.

Dear Mr.

The purpose of this letter is to inform you as to the status of your subject Docketed Application for Scheduled Air Carrier authority.

As you may already know the Commission is a party in the ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION of the Civil Aeronautics Board, Docket No. 20826. Upon a close investigation, we believe that the issues in the CAB proceeding touch upon all existing or proposed scheduled service between all points within the State. We have, therefore, taken the position that neither the CAB nor this Commission should act wholly unilaterally in developing an adequate, efficient, feasible and statewide intrastate network of scheduled service.

In keeping with this policy the Commission has for the last several months deferred final consideration of all new applications for scheduled service not previously acted upon unless such deferral would create a serious public hardship in a particular case or the application may otherwise be non-controversial. We intend to continue this policy of deferral over the next few months, at least until the direction the ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION is going to take has been demonstrated.

It is the contention of this Commission that much of the intrastate service such as that for which you have applied is and should be regulated by the State. At the same time, the Commission recognizes that a proliferation of numerous intrastate scheduled carriers could significantly affect the operations of the carriers heretofore regulated exclusively by the CAB. We believe the public interest demands that the regulatory efforts of the Federal and State governments be substantially coordinated to avoid duplication of effort, conflicting decisions and objectives, adverse effects on the carriers and the public, etc.

This Commission has therefore placed itself in a posture whereby such coordination and joint effort can be accomplished. We are assuming, of course, that the CAB is similarly interested in such cooperation and coordination.

At such time as these applications for scheduled service are again considered (hopefully within the next few months) we propose to initiate local area service investigations for the purpose of developing an adequate, viable, feasible network of local carriers. This program will be preceded by a rule-making proceeding for the purpose of adopting guideline regulations and to give the industry and public an opportunity to be heard on the procedure, problems and objectives.

We appreciate your continued patience and understanding in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

George Benesch

An examination by the staff of the Alaska Transportation Commission as of May 4, 1970, shows that the matters set forth below are pending before the Commission.

There follows hereinafter an analysis of these pending matters. The analysis attempts to group the matters so as to reflect the type of issues and problems involved. It further attempts to explain the general nature of each group and seeks to explain the responsibility of the Commission in deciding these matters so that reasonable time factors can be applied to the determination of each group of matters.

1. Contested Matters: This class of cases involves applications for permanent authority to operate air taxi, scheduled carrier, and contract carrier in air commerce; applications for temporary and emergency temporary authority for operation as an air taxi, scheduled carrier, and contract carrier in air commerce; applications for permanent and temporary authority for what are known as common carriers - freight, common carriers - passenger, and contract carrier - freight, in motor carrier commerce. Other classes of cases involve authority to operate air cushion vehicles and water carrier (ferry) vessels. Each of these cases has been protested by one or more individuals or companys and each application will require public hearing estimated to average from 4 to 5 days.

   Contested cases requiring hearing 87

2. Uncontested Matters: This class of cases involves matters in which there have been no formal protests but in which either an informal or formal hearing will be required by the Commission in order to determine whether it is in the public interest to authorize either air, surface, air cushion, or water (ferry) carriage. This class of cases also includes those matters in which formal oral argument is required by the Commission on either or both contested cases (which have been heard) or uncontested cases.

   Hearings on uncontested cases or cases which require argument and Commission decision 66

3. Other Matters: This class of cases involves matters which require Commission study and perhaps additional hearings (not included above). These cases involve such matters as complaints alleging violations of the transportation law, requests for interpretations of the law, review of policy determinations made by prior Commissions, review of the operation and practices of operating carriers in which the public interest is involved.

Cases involving so-called Other Matters 13

4. Pending Decisions: This class of cases involves matters that have been heard by the Commission and cases which have not required a public hearing but which require the study, examination and exercise of judgment and discretion of the Commission. In all cases formally or informally heard by the Commission under the present law it is necessary for each Commissioner to fully study and analyse the record and all exhibits presented before entering into conference for decision.

5. Special Matters:

(a) The Commission during the past several months has held over 20 hearings throughout the state in connection with the Civil Aeronautics Board's Alaska Service Investigation (Air Route Investigation). These hearings have averaged from 2 to 4 days per hearing (including travel time). Upcoming are six hearings within Alaska and at least two hearings in Washington, D.C. (Please see explanation of the nature and scope of these hearings, supra). These hearings are policy making in nature and hearing officers would not be able to attend to these matters nor exercise the discretion and judgment required.

Estimated time for CAB hearings 30 days
Estimated time for briefing and argument 30 days

(b) The transportation industry of Alaska has changed dramatically during the last few years. The industry is no longer a 'small-time' matter. Regulations of the Transporation Commission as they now exist were based on a much smaller and less complicated industry. The regulations have proven to be grossly inadequate and incomplete to meet the needs of our modern and growing industry. This fact is widely known throughout the industry particularly among attorneys practicing within this field. The regulations must be completely revised. Revision of regulations of the transportation industry is a vast and major task. There is no provision under the law for this task to be accomplished by other than the Commission itself. The revision necessary of regulations governing air, motor carrier (freight and passenger), air cushion vehicles and water (ferry) carriers will require extensive research and study and may take as long as one year. This work must be performed by the Commission because these regulations involve many involved issues of policy, practice and procedure. Work on this revision of regulations which is very immediately necessary will require time that is now devoted to the hearing of cases.

Estimated time for revision of regulations 1 year

(c) In addition to revision of the transportation regulations there is an urgent need for a reclassification of carriers within each of the groups, i.e., air, surface, air cushion and water. The Commission now has planned at least three reclassification hearings. These hearings will involve the taking of testimony from all interested members of the industry, and the public.

Estimated time for reclassification hearings 30 days

STATE OF ALASKA

KEITH H. MILLER, GOVERNOR

DEPARTMENT OF LAW

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

POUCH K, STATE CAPITOL—JUNEAU 99801

May 27, 1970

The Honorable Gene Guess
Alaska State Representative
Alaska State Legislature
Juneau, Alaska

Re: Senate Bill 588

Dear Mr. Guess:

In accordance with your request we have reviewed Senate Bill 588 in order to determine its constitutionality. In the opinion of this office there is good reason to believe that SB 588 is inconsistent with one or more of the following sections of Article X of Alaska's Constitution:

> Section 1. PURPOSE OF CONSTRUCTION. The purpose of this article is to provide for maximum local self government with a minimum of local government units, and to prevent duplication of tax levying jurisdiction.
>
> Section 3. BOROUGHS. . . . The standards [for boroughs] shall include population, geo raphy, economy, transportation, and other factors. Each borough shall embrace an area and population with common interest to the maximum degree possible.
>
> . . .
>
> Section 7. CITIES. . . . shall be a part of the borough in which they are located.
>
> Section 9. CHARTERS. . . . All charters, or parts or amendments of charters, shall be submitted to the qualified voters of the borough or city, and shall become effective if approved by a majority of those who vote on a specific question.

As noted above, Sec. 3 of Article IX requires establishment of boroughs according to standards which, while set by law, must include those of population, geography, economics, and transportation. From this requirement and others the Constitution obviously requires that the borough be established with a view towards cohesive functioning.

The idea of cohesiveness as the object desired is also reflected in the above quoted portions of Sec. 7 and Sec. 1 of Article X.

In this regard it is also important to note the following pertinent statements by members of Alaska's Constitutional Convention:

> The powers of boroughs shall be provided by law, and we felt that in order to have good local government in Alaska, the whole state should be divided - we would not want to have loose sections here and there, and that in setting up this program the boundaries should be laid out. Alaska Constitutional Convention 2612.
> We had thought that the boundaries should be flexible, of course, and should be set up so that we would not want too small a unit, because that is a problem that has been one of the great problems in the state, the very small units, and they get beyond, or they must be combined or extended. Id. at 2621.
>
> It was pointed out here that these boroughs would embrace the economic and other factors as much as would be compatible with the borough, and it was the intent of the Committee that these boroughs would be as large as could possibly be made and embrace all of these things. Id. at 2638.
> [W]e visualize the possibilities that as the borough becomes a more definite unit of government over the years, which we hope it will, the scope better defined, that all the functions > that can best be carried out on the unified basis be transferred over to the borough. Id. at 2654.

> I would like to point out here that if that would be the case in our situation, where a city would grow to where its boundaries would be the same as the borough boundary, it would be a matter very simple to either disorganize the city or the borough so you would, under one government instead of having the situation that you would have in some cities in the states where they have grown to take over the whole county. Id. at 2657.

It should also be noted that the effect of Senate Bill 588 would be to make the area excluded from the unified municipality part of the unorganized borough since it would not be subject to any of the ordinances or other decisions of the governing body of the unified municipality. In other words, the result would appear to be a doughnut shaped borough, a concept which does not appear to be authorized by Sec. 7 of Article X.

Finally, there is the problem created by the provisions of Article X, Section 9, which provides

> "The qualified voters of any borough of the first class or city of the first class may adopt, amend, or repeal a home rule charter in a manner provided by law. . . . All charters, or parts or amendments of charters, shall be submitted to the qualified voters of the borough or city, and shall become effective if approved by a majority of those who vote on the specific question."

sentence of this constitutional section, 2/ the provisions of Senate Bill 588 would probably violate the section's last sentence in that one could reasonably conclude that the unification charter would be amended without submission to the qualified voters of the borough whenever a city were to exclude itself under authority of the bill's language.

MEMORANDUM

TO: Senator Lewis

FROM: Greg Machyowsky, Legislative Counsel

SUBJECT: Enclosed bills relating to exclusion of a home rule city from unified local government

Either of the two bills enclosed would permit a home rule city to withdraw from a unified government, notwithstanding that a majority of voters in the cities taken together have approved city and borough unification. The shorter bill is a duplicate of a draft prepared at the request of members of the House.

The other bill is for the same purpose, with some suggested revisions to spell out legal implications in more detail and more closely tailor the provisions to the Douglas situation; for example, the 60 per cent vote requirement of subsection (f) is raised to 70 per cent, which was the percentage by which Douglas voted against unification in the recent charter election in the Greater Juneau Borough. Also, subsection (i) alters the approach on filling the seat of a unified governing body member who is a resident of the city excluding itself from the unified government. (I have suggested that some technical revisions be made in the House draft if it is decided to introduce the bill.)

Exclusion of the city under either bill would have to take place before the city is dissolved under terms of the charter for unified government approved by the voters.

While possible arguments could be made on the constitutionality of the bills under the state constitution, in my judgment either bill would meet constitutional requirements.

Greg Machyowsky

Mr. Jackson, Chairman, and Members of the Judiciary Committee:

After hearing all the arguments pro and con on this issue I hope you will be able to sort out fact from fiction.

~~Yesterday~~ the other day, Mr. McLean stated that the community of Douglas was not facing up to its responsibilities in area-wide functions. This is not so. We have participated in and are paying our full share in all area-wide functions - schools, hospital, assessing and collecting of taxes, administrative costs and all the rest that we are obligated to. To infer otherwise is doing an injustice to every taxpayer of Douglas. To assume we would not pay our obligations in the future is also an injustice. Our every intention is to participate fully with whatever functions are deemed area-wide.

All that is being sought here is a small measure of local government - to have a say in the day to day operation of the city, to maintain our streets and utilities (water and sewer) and have a place to be able to take our problems and be heard.

The farther we lean toward a totalitarian government, the less responsive it is to the needs of the people and the less participation people will take in their local affairs.

I urge favorable passage of Senate Bill 588 and this committees favorable report to the full House of Representatives.

Thank you.

Mr. Chairman & Members: I am a Douglas Res. since 1933 my wife since 1911

I know too that this session is t longest in history. And I am sure you want to go home rather than have to sit here and listen to people making erroneous statements and tell you their personal record that they have practiced law and been in the Legislature, etc. The second witness, for the opposition another lawyer for the Borough asking that this bill #588 be kept in committee. He, too, is my lawyer, because Douglas is in the Borough. Why should he discriminate against Douglas, it's Douglas' tax dollar that helps pay his salary. He states the bill is unconstitutional, well, there are also lawyers in the Senate that didn't think so. Thirdly, another lawyer telling you that the charter was modified and all the teeth pulled out, it was modified all to the tune of putting Juneau in the middle of District 2 which is Douglas and also giving Juneau one more assemblyman. So one tooth was put back in.(Wisdom) And of course that's only his story. Douglas checked and found that the Dentist overlooked a few. We still have a few copies of what was overlooked. ~~Dropping back to Mr. McLeans testimony, saying that Douglas was not paying to support the airport.~~ On his trip to Anchorage he made the ~~statement there was another airport ready to go in on the Douglas side that would be in District 2 (Douglas)~~ Who would get the ~~profit after this airport is in operation.~~

The Douglas people are giving a lot of help to Juneau. Just a few years ago the Capital move was on the ballot and Douglas put one mill tax levy on all real property on a voluntary basis, everyone paid it. Douglas didn't want our sister city to fade away.

There has been talk of court action, this we want to avoid. It is too costly and we have had to listen to the same lawyer for advice. Here is a clipping out of the local paper. One other item that was mentioned was that Douglas had no housing plan. True, still when the Highway Department needed space in the spring of what year, Douglas gave up their ball park and had the Department moved in before the end of that year. With hard work and planning Douglas has

Douglas Residents Seeking Way Out

More than 100 Douglas residents appeared at a city council meeting Monday evening to learn what legal avenues they might pursue in opposing the unification of all governments in the Greater Juneau area.

"No action will be taken by the city council until after the absentee ballots are counted today and the unification election results are certified by the official canvass," Douglas Mayor Robert Savikko said today.

Douglas City Attorney Joe Henri said he told the group "I couldn't see any possibility for a successful court action."

Henri, who is also the city attorney for Juneau, said he told the council they would have to retain another lawyer to prosecute any legal efforts to overthrow last week's election approving unification.

The attorney said that in answer to questions he told the gathering there are two avenues they can follow in seeking to secede from the unified government after July 1.

The city can proceed either under the annexation and exclusion laws of the state, or by an appeal to the Local Boundary Commission, asking to be excluded, he said.

Under state law, an area wishing to be excluded from a municipality follows procedures similar to those for annexation, with a majority vote being required to bring about exclusion.

The courts apparently would have to resolve any conflict between laws allowing unification and those allowing exclusion.

Henry said he is also researching a question of possible "gerrymandering" of election districts on Douglas Island.

The question arose because West Juneau, which separates Douglas and North Douglas, is part of the city of Juneau.

Absentee Ballots To Be Counted Today

Final outcome of last week's election on the revised charter for a unified municipal government will be known late today when the Greater Juneau Borough Assembly is expected to certify the ballot count.

The assembly is due to meet at noon today when it will instruct Borough Clerk Edward S. Hildebrand to count the absentee ballots.

Of 165 absentee ballots sent out for the election, approximately 65 went to voters in the rural area, in which unification carried by the slim margin of 41 votes. In the combined Juneau-Douglas area, the vote was definitely in favor and would not be affected by absentee returns.

Hildebrand said he would begin the absentee count as soon as the assembly adjourned its noon session. The assembly is expected to reconvene at 5 p.m. to certify both last week's ballot returns at the polls and today's absentee ballot count.

now 2 ball diamonds, track, tennis court coming recreation shelters. There is no fence to keep Juneau out.

Maybe it would be quicker and more clear to call a 30 minute recess and take a tour bus and see for yourself, although it's not in the city budget, but I'll pass the hat around and take care of the bill. Douglas had to do it when the town and school burned down in February, 1936. Aid came in from many small communities so we could finish the school term. (None from Juneau) Again by Sept. of the same year a new school was ready and also on a solid foundation. Not like the one at Auke bay on a floating one, but that's big government.

One other item I failed to mention was that the Borough hiled a salesman to the tune of $12,000.00 to fight Douglas and area wide. That too was partly Douglas money. Again I must say if this was so good why did they have to spend so much money for propaganda? It wasn't sold to the people, they were just worn down.

I myself can see that Juneau has problems but who hasn't. Again I would like to say that Juneau has been very fortunate to receive all the money (in wills) for indoor swimming pools, valuable land willed for cemetary purposes, then traded it for a few loads of blacktop. The money the Juneau Douglas School Board received from Douglas ($32,000.00) after school consolidation certainly helped to pay off their old high school which was mortgaged since 1914, this was in 1955, XXXXXXX XXXXXX on the new unified government, or Other Corrective action other than secession with this ~~subsidiary~~ result.

I propose that the House take no action on a bill 588 allowing secession at this time.

In this event, I believe most objections would be over-come, with the least people un-happy - and this area could go forward with-out inter-city bitterness and passions.

If the House passage declines of the bill, some ~~percent~~ of approximately 400 voters of Douglas may be not entirely sati fied . But the Community will have the knowledge that it fought the battle and in effect won the battle. The Legislature will have solved a problem. Juneau and area with Unification can continue, onward in the march of progress, hopefully to the betterment of our citizens.

who share my views in this matter today

I am here today to testify against action by the House of Representatives to pass legislation similar to a bill passed by the Alaska Senate, allowing Douglas to secede from the Unified government of the City and Borough of Juneau.

I am against the possible action because I can forsee more problems being made for our area and for a long period of time, than if such legislation were not passed.

Douglas was wronged in two instances. The Legislature passed a bill several years ago which resulted in the City of Douglas having been discriminated against, and in which they could vote 100 % against unification and still have it forced upon them. Later the Charter Commission did not give Douglas a full 1 seat on the new representative unified government. I firmly believe/ it is these two wrongs which are the direct cause/ of the defeat of the unification Charter at Douglas proper, and why the Legislature is being asked now to correct the situation by further legislation. In my own case I felt very strongly and financially supported and voted against acceptance of the first Charter presented, partly on the basis of corrections needed, but mainly because of my ~~extreme~~ anger at being dis-enfranchised by my vote in the event Juneaus vote overwhelmed us. By the presentation of the second Charter to the voters, ~~some~~ corrections were made, Douglas was given the chance during Charter hearings to be heard on other desirable changes.

I had taken another look at the area-wide picture and the advantages, and had analysed my own feelings, concluding that I was mainly objecting to the principles of the election - more so at least , th an the principles of unification. SO I voted for Unification and the Charter, ~~on the second time around.~~ In Douglas several years ago we elected to consolidate our School systems into the Juneau Douglas School system . It was a bitter battle and disruptive to the community for quite a few years. I was against unification of our schools. With the passing of years, the graduation of my children and the serving of five years on the School Board, I realize that , altho bitter at the time, the unified School system turned out to be the best for our children It is a closed issue now and Douglas would'nt think of turning back, I'm sure.

I believe that the injustices I mentioned can be remedied, under the existing system, with the help of this judcial committee.

The proponents of a bill to permit secession are my friends and neighbors ~~and patrons.~~ My sympathy goes with them ~~and my heart is surely with them in this matter of injustice.~~ They have worked hard and deligently and ~~with persistence,~~ as I believe, they have won. At this Point The measure has passed the senate. I feel that the House too will feel obligated to correct these injustices towards a proud independent and very old Alaskan comminity. How-ever I also feel that the House of Representatives could , or this Judiciary Committee, could, take action other than passage of secession legislation, to correct the wrongs, ~~and enable our area~~ to continue on with Unification, the progress of the Community, the building of a greater Capital of Alaska, the building of swimming pools and other ~~community benefits for the benefit~~ of all. The proponents will have won and proved that through due legislative action, wrongs can be righted. The Legislature will have playdd a important part in justice to citizens and state and community. And we can still have unification of this area.

I propose that this Judicial body, or other body of the Legislature, direct the new City and Borough of Juneau, that a first order of business on July 1, be to ammend their charter, enabling Douglas to have 1 full Representative, guarantee d

Julie Isaac

Mr. Chairman, Mrs. Banfield and Gentlemen:

I believe we've met twice before on other legislation, but for the record, I am Julie Isaac, 410 "D" Street, Douglas, where I've been a resident with my husband and two teen-age youngsters for the past 19 years.

In appearing before you today on SB 588, I speak to you as a resident and concerned citizen about the honesty and integrity of what we call the "democratic process." It has been only during the past year that I've been able to participate actively in our City Government----from the sidelines under the portion headed "audience participation"--having failed to win a council seat in the last election. And I dare say since last October, I've had a better attendance record than many of our councilmen. (Now with this disclosure, Mayor McLean will probably be having some second thoughts about unified government, or maybe he will recommend doing away with audience participation altogether.)

When I heard the Juneau Mayor yesterday attacking SB 588, the far-reaching effect it would have on the entire area, particularly what he said was misuse of the word "unification" rather than ratification, and the inference that we would be excluding ourselves from certain types of area-wide services, such as the hospital and airport, I think he was going a bit too far. Douglas has always paid its way and will continue to do so. Further, he misinterpreted the number of votes he received in Douglas as an endorsement of unification---and the same true out the road in the high vote for Jenny Kline. What did he expect us to do, support the Douglas candidate who ran against him! Insert Yesterday's hearing was the first I've attended in regard to this bill, but I understand the charge has been made that Douglas is merely a bedroom city and offers little or no co-operation with Juneau or the entire area. To generalize in this manner, I feel is erroneous. I think there is excellent co-operation between Juneau and Douglas, and Douglas has contributed more than its share of leadership capability in many undertakings that have benefitted the entire area....

For example when there was a need for additional state office space, Douglas gave up its ball park (for a nominal sum) for the Highways Building. When the Mt. Jumbo School became vacant in 1966, Douglas leased it to the University of Alaska, as a support facility for the Institute of Marine Science----for a Dollar year, [redacted] sacrificing a much needed gym for our Douglas teen-agers. I might add that during this time there has been no exterior maintenance to the buildings or grounds----and so far as Douglas profiting from this operation, I wish someone would point it out to me.

Participation in civic and service projects that benefit the area, I cite the leadership that has come from Douglas in such organizations as the Hospital Guild, the Exchange Student program, Savings Bonds Program and the Douglas Island Woman's Club, which is sponsoring the Planned Parenthood of Juneau and Douglas and just now getting organized.

As a matter of fact, we've taken the lead in many community improvements. We were first to get the dial telephone system. Our water is fluoridated. We were first to get the new vapor lights and I could go on. Oh yes, our Woman's Club was the first in the area to have set aside a children's park, which we equipped. We [redacted] also issued the first service directory to welcome newcomers as they moved into the community. It is not as imposing a document as the City Charter and there is no particular pride of authorship since it is filled with printer's errors, but it does give you a bird's eye view of what our town has to offer and I would like for you to have a copy.

Getting back to the integrity and honesty in government, it may seem irrelevant to mention this here, but I have a point to make. I want to thank each of you for your support of House Bill 610, which would give the University non-professional employees equity with State employees---it passed the House without a dissenting vote.

Yesterday morning, in trying to find out from the two different chairmen whose committees will be handling the bill in the Senate---HEW (Lowell Thomas)

State Affairs (Engstrom), I was told by Senator Thomas that he was very cool toward the bill after having talked to Dr. Wood, and he doubted that his committee would be able to get together before adjournment.

When I suggested maybe there was conflict of interest on his part (he has made some pictures for the University) told him I thought he should go ahead and make the effort anyway, he appeared to become irritated and said: "Mrs. Isaac, I am very sorry for you and have nothing but sympathy for you, but you have been deceived by your friends in the House----they knew at the time of passage of this bill it would never get through the Senate at this late date. They just wanted to get if off their back." When I continued to press for calling his committee and offered to help get them together, he finally told me that they would hear my testimony Tuesday morning---five days after receiving the bill.----probably after adjournment. (add: now set for tomorrow.)

Now if the Senator thinks I have been deceived by the House, I wonder if the same charge might not be made against the Senate for having passed this bill out at so late a date.

All of us know there has been deceipt---it first started when we were asked to elect a charter commission---ohm no, we were not voting for unification---we were merely electing a charter commission to conduct a study. Two years, we are told, when we were voting to accept or reject the charter---you are voting to ratify the charter---you voted for unification at the time you elected the charter commission!

Millie, and gentlemen, I beg of you---there has been enough deception already do not deceive us further---if you are not meeting with us in good faith, with an open mind and a willingness to help right a wrong, then pray tell us and let us be about our business.

If there are portions of the bill that are unworkable or detrimental to the government outside of Douglas, please amend it---you have three attorneys on this committee, plus Mr. Peterson and the Attorney General---fix it--make it acceptable to both of us. But I ask you once more to please honor our vote and renew our faith in the democratic process. Thank you

June 1, 1970

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Judiciary Committee:

My name is Bill Boehl. I'm a former councilman and Mayor of Douglas.

We have heard arguments for and against unification, but we have heard very little about the unification law itself. It has not been tested in the courts of Alaska, nor have I heard of an Attorney General's formal opinion, attesting to the constitutionality of the original act. If there is one, it has never been tested in court.

This, in itself, poses grave legal problems ahead. I do not know if any action will be taken through the courts at the present time, but this does not preclude some other area or individuals of the State similarly involved in the future from attempting to resolve this question. If it were held unconstitutional a year or so after unification took place, this would pose serious problems indeed.

It seems to me there should be an attempt to get a ruling on the question from our Supreme Court before allowing what, in my opinion, is an illegal annexation. Courts have traditionally held that proper methods of annexation are valid, and this method was open to the area prior to the passage of the Unification Act.

We are a new State and new in government, but in the older 48 states there has been no great rush to dissolve smaller cities by the overwhelming vote of a larger city unless there was mutual agreement and proper annexation.

I would urge you to give SENATE BILL 588 a DO PASS and report it to the House for action.

Barry Jackson

Juneau, Alaska

Dear Mr. Jackson:

Governor Miller's scheme for using State funds to build the TAPS road can best be described as "Socialism for the rich." The Governor would never consider allocating so much money to loans for sewer, water, housing or education for low or middle income people.

Politicians frequently brush aside projects aimed at helping non-rich people or minority groups by saying "This is the responsibility of private enterprise". When a wealthy private enterprise gets in a jam, however, the Governor can hardly wait to bail it out with State money.

In actual fact, very few Alaskans will truly benefit from rapid construction of the TAPS road, and we all may suffer terrifically from it (for example, if the pipeline permit is not granted, or if the access road is not built along the pipeline's eventual route.)

The State's responsibility is to its citizens -- ALL of us, not just the oil and construction men. I say, let private enterprise build its own blankety-blank road!

It is up to Legislators of true stature to resist pressure from powerful oil and construction interests in favor of the long-range interests of all Alaskan citizens.

Sincerely,

Constance K. Smith

THE ALASKA MERIT SYSTEM

(Review Draft)

Thomas C. Woodruff
Institute of Social, Economic, and Government Research University of Alaska
College, Alaska 99701

Alaska's State Personnel Act calls for "a system of personnel administration based upon the merit principle and adapted to the requirements of the state to the end that persons best qualified to perform the functions of the state will be employed, and that an effective career service will be encouraged, developed, and maintained." (A.S. 39.25) Alaska's merit system is eight years old and presently employs about 4,200 persons. This article traces the development of the merit principle in public employment and examines some difficulties involved in institutionalizing that principle. Against this background, Alaska's merit system and some of the difficulties it currently faces are described and analyzed.

The effectiveness of any merit system is determined by sufficient pay scales, maximum utilization of the labor market, enlightened application of the merit principle, and adequate financing and staffing of the personnel function itself.

1. Sufficient pay scales: If wages are not high enough to attract and hold high quality personnel, the state incurs long term inefficiencies and fails to develop an effective career service.
2. Enlightened application of the merit principle: Hiring for merit, and merit only, is no simple task. Routines and procedures are designed so that personnel actions are taken for reasons of merit only, but they are never perfect. Faithfully following a routine supposedly based upon the merit principle does not necessarily produce a merit system.
3. Utilizing the existing labor market: Alaska has a peculiar labor market and a substantial unemployment problem. The state's merit system should be aimed at recruiting every individual interested in competing for a state job and who would be able to successfully assume the responsibilities of that job. Competitive examination among such recruits should set actual employment standards.

Utilizing the Alaskan labor market is especially difficult; screening procedures imported from the continguous 48 states can easily discriminate against some people because of their cultural background, rather than their potential usefulness as state employees.

4. Staffing and financing the personnel function: If the state's personnel agency is not adequately staffed and financed, the difficult judgements which the professionals in that agency must make will tend to become arbitrary because of the necessity of keeping up with the work load imposed by other state agencies.

These four criteria will serve as reference points in describing and analyzing Alaska's system. First, however, is a review of the development of the merit principle.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE MERIT PRINCIPLE

The merit principle is a concept of public employment which has evolved throughout the 180 years since the American Revolution. It is now widely recognized that efficient democratic government requires a politically neutral force of capable employees to carry on the public's business. But since a public job is a source of income and of a certain amount of power, control of government employment has always been a valuable political asset.

In colonial days the royal governor made most public appointments. The public service of that time supported an aristocratic class of civil servants who were responsible to the royal governor and who often served inefficiently and indefinitely. The Revolution was, in part, a reaction against this civil service.

During the nation's first forty years, a democratic aristocracy ruled the country. The rich and educated controlled the political system and the federal civil service consisted of wealthy appointees. Suffrage and education were far from universal. Though government generally was not corrupt, neither was it broadly representative of the majority of the people.

THE RISE OF THE COMMON MAN AND OF THE SPOILS SYSTEM

Andrew Jackson, elected in 1828, was the first president who had not been born to a wealthy family. Historians generally agree that his election signaled the rise of the common man. His administration also marked the formalization of the spoils system in the federal government.

When Jackson took office in 1829, he reformed the civil service by removing all the "unfaithful or incompetent officers" who, he felt had acquired the habit of looking with indifference upon the public interest and who considered their offices "a species of property" and "a means of promoting individual interests." "To the victors belong the spoils" originally meant that common men could aspire to the jobs that formerly went only to the privileged.

The philosophy that government jobs should go to the most qualified applicants seemed an excuse for hiring only the educated and, thus, only the rich. In his first annual message, Jackson said:

> The duties of all public officers are, or at least admit of being made, so plain and simple that men of intelligence may readily qualify themselves for their performance; and I cannot believe that more is lost by the long continuance of men in office than is generally to be gained by their experience.

Politics takes time and money and if political victory could not be made profitable, only the rich could afford to take part in running the democracy.

Jackson formalized the spoils system as a way to make democracy pay for itself. While anti-Jacksonians criticized this as open debasement of public employment, they did not hesitate to use the spoils system when the opportunity arose.

By the end of the Civil War, government at all levels suffered from inefficiency and corruption. Control of government employment enabled individuals to build political machines by trading jobs for money and support. Politicians could finance their political campaigns by systematically taxing public employees for "contributions." An employee's rate of pay often represented his value to the machine rather than the services he performed for the community. It was not unusual for persons having quite similar responsibilities to be paid radically different salaries. Spoils appointees worked for the interests of political allies, friends, and themselves. Since they had somehow paid for their jobs and would lose them for only political reasons, they had little motivation to perform efficiently.

Theodore Roosevelt, one of the first civil service commissioners, once described the spoils system in a magazine article:

> No republic can permanently endure when its politics are corrupt and base; and the spoils system, the application to political life of the degrading doctrine that to the victor belong the spoils, produces corruption and degradation. The man who is in politics for the offices might just as well be in politics for the money he can get for his vote, so far as the general good is concerned...The spoils-monger and the spoils-seeker invariably breed the bribe-taker and the bribe-giver, the embezzler of public funds and the corrupter of voters.

There is another side to the story of the political machines. Before the advent of government welfare program, political machines provided welfare (in the form of jobs and favors) and political identity to the disadvantaged of the cities. For immigrants especially, the machines provided a measure of political and economic security in an otherwise impersonal and bewildering society.

THE REFORM MOVEMENT AND THE PENDLETON ACT

Even before the Civil War, public rumblings about spoils and corruption were heard. But political machines were strong organizations designed to fit existing political institutions. Well-intentioned criticism alone was not enough to dislodge those in power. One organization and one event finally polarized public demand for civil service reform.

The organization was the National Civil Service Reform League, founded by William Curtis in 1881, a union of local civil service reform groups which had been gaining support since the 1860's. Members were well-to-do and educated citizens characterized by professional politicians as "do-gooders" and "intellectuals."

The event was the assassination in 1881, of President James A. Garfield by Charles J. Guiteau, a disappointed office seeker. Garfield's death caused public outrage; the Reform League organized it. In January, 1883, large bipartisan majorities in both houses of Congress passed the Civil Service Act (also known as the Pendleton Act.) The Pendleton Act was based on the British Civil Service. Still on the books, it has served as the model for many state, county, and municipal systems.

The Pendleton Act:

1. Placed the administration of the civil service in the hands of an independent bipartisan commission.
2. Required selection of employees in certain departments by competitive examination.
3. Forbade political solicitation of funds from public employees.

Although the Pendleton Act only affected about 10 per cent of federal employees when it was first passed, it included provisions allowing for expansion of its coverage by executive order. By the turn of the century, the Pendleton Act covered about 40 per cent of federal jobs, and the Rampack Act of 1940 extended the federal merit system to its present status.

By 1967 thirty-four states had followed the federal government and established their own merit systems. A federal law of 1939, requiring that state employees paid with federal funds to administer the Social Security Act be employed under a merit system, greatly hastened the spread of the merit principle in state governments. The National Municipal League, organized in 1894, promoted merit systems in city governments. The Public Personnel Association, an international association of government agencies and officials, was founded in 1906 to advance enlightened public personnel practices.

ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCIES

Since the turn of the century, public interest in increasing the economy and efficiency of all levels of government has accompanied the drive for civil service reform. In 1917, the state of Illinois commissioned a comprehensive study of their state government which then included more than a hundred agencies and departments. After the study the government structure was completely reorganized. Other states undertook similar studies.

The most important studies of organizational problems in the federal government were undertaken by the two Hoover Commissions (named after President Hoover, their chairman) which reported in 1949 and 1955. Several "Little Hoover Commissions" have since made studies of state governments. Such commissions generally recommend:

1. Increased executive power for governors as executive leaders;

2. Coordination of terms of office of elected administrative officials;

3. Grouping of related functions into a reduced number of departments;

4. Fixing of definite lines of authorized responsibility;

5. Abolition of many independent boards and commissions as administrative agencies.

Personnel administration has changed with this interest in economy and efficiency. The tasks that governments undertake are becoming more and more complicated. Large cities, the states, and the federal government provide public services requiring specialized skills. For these reasons the business of public personnel administration has become much more than simply spoils prevention. In order for government to perform efficiently, it must attract and hold high quality personnel. If Andrew Jackson's belief that any intelligent man could carry on the business of government was true in his day, it is not so today.

THE MERIT PRINCIPLE IN PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT

The civil service reform movement of the nineteenth century produced a concept of public employment called the merit principle. Personnel systems based on the merit principle usually include certain characteristics intended to protect public employment from undue political influence while attracting and holding qualified employees:

1. Competitive appointment and promotion. A government job should go to the applicant who is best qualified to render the services for which he is to be paid. Employees in merit systems generally receive regular performance evaluations from their supervisors. These evaluations can be used to determine salary increases and as evidence of qualification for promotion.

2. Equal pay for equal work and non-equal pay for non-equal work. An employee should be paid for the difficulty encountered and the responsibility assumed in performing his job.

3. Political noninterference in public employment. Merit systems are designed to hire for reasons of merit, not politics. They also include regulations designed to prevent politicians and political parties from soliciting contributions from government employees. Specifically, supervisors are usually not allowed to solicit or accept political contributions of funds or effort from the employees under them.

4. An independent civil service board or commission. Merit systems are usually under the administration of a bipartisan board or commission. The board or commission is responsible for overseeing the impartial operation of the merit system.

5. Separation of the authority to screen and evaluate applicants from the authority to appoint employees. Under merit systems, government agencies appoint their own employees. A separate personnel agency, however, supervises competition among applicants and gives the appointing authority its choice from the best applicants (usually three). This separation of authority exists so that the personnel agency can impose protective checks upon the hiring authority and at the same time provide recruiting and screening services which individual agencies would have difficulty providing for themselves.

INHERENT DIFFICULTIES IN MERIT SYSTEM IMPLEMENTATION

The merit principle is an abstraction which merit systems of personnel administration are designed to implement. There are certain inherent difficulties in designing a merit system.

1. The impossibility of perfectly measuring difficulty and responsibility. The merit principle requires that employees be paid according to the difficulty and responsibility of their duties. Merit systems meet this requirement by assigning each job to a level in the government pay plan. (Presumably, the pay plan itself is set at a level to make the government able to compete in the labor market.) Pay decisions are only as equitable as the measurement of difficulty and responsibility is objective and accurate. An accoutant obviously has a more difficult and responsible job than a bookeeper who works for him. But does he have a more difficult and responsible job than an interviewer in an employment office?

2. The impossibility of perfectly measuring the merit of competing applicants. Motivation, cooperativeness, intelligence, aptitude, knowledge, experience, and formal education are qualities which indicate the relative merit of an employee. Measuring and quantifying all of these characteristics in an objective manner is difficult if not impossible. However, a system which relies too heavily on those factors that are relatively easy to measure, such as experience and formal education, tends to become based upon seniority rather than merit.

3. The possible interference between a merit system and efficient government administration. One assumption of a merit system is that some administrators will abuse their hiring authority if they are not adequately controlled by external checks. However, these external checks can interfere with conscientious administrators attempting to run efficient agencies. A merit system should be designed to allow administrators to function efficiently without giving them such free rein that they can easily abuse their trust out of motives of self-interest, expediency, or simple carelessness.

THE ALASKAN SYSTEM

The State Personnel Act vests the Personnel Board and the director of the Division of Personnel with responsibility for establishing and operating the Alaska Merit System.

Composed of three members who serve non-concurrent six-year terms, the Personnel Board is appointed by the governor with the legislature's confirmation. Only two members of the board may be of the same political party. A vacancy in an unexpired term is filled by the governor with the consent of the legislature for the remainder of the term. "A member of the board holds office at the pleasure of the governor notwithstanding the member's term." (A.S. 39.25.060)

The Personnel Board approves or rejects amendments to the personnel rules and hears appeals by employees in the classified service. The board has "the power to administer oaths, subpoena witnesses, and compel the production of books and papers pertinent to a hearing authorized by this chapter." (A.S. 39.25.070)

Division of Personnel is within the Department of Administration and the commissioner of administration appoints the personnel director after competitive examination. The director of personnel and his staff administer the Alaska merit system. The director's responsibilities include:

1. Preparing Personnel Rules "not inconsistent with this chapter, which are required to implement this chapter" (A.S. 39.25.050);
2. Administering the State Personnel Act and the Personnel Rules;
3. Establishing and maintaining a roster of employees;
4. Serving as secretary for the Personnel Board;
5. Ecouraging and exercising leadership in the development of effective personnel administration, employee effectiveness, and morale.

The State of Alaska employs three categories of personnel: the exempt, the partially exempt, and the classified service. Exempt positions, which are exempt from the personnel statutes and rules, include elected officials and policy-making appointed personnel. Also exempt are employees of the University of Alaska, certified teachers in the state school system, employees of the state legislature, and employees on the state ferry system who are covered by collective bargaining agreements. The pay for exempt positions is set by statute or by an agency outside the Division of Personnel.

Partially exempt service includes positions involving principal responsibility for the determination and carrying out of policy or responsibilities and duties of a type not susceptible to the ordinary recruiting and examining procedures. Examples are deputy commissioners and division heads. "Persons holding positions in the partially exempt services are not required to take examinations, qualify, or earn a place on a register, nor are they eligible for a hearing by the personnel board in the case of dismissal, demotion, or suspension." (A.S. 39.25.120) Pay for the partially exempt service is set by the Division of Personnel.

Positions in the classified service are those completely governed by the Personnel Rules and, thus, subject to the requirements and protection of the merit system. These positions are filled by competitive examination. The merit system endeavors to protect persons in these positions from political influences so that they can render efficient and impartial service.

Many agencies of the state government employ an agency personnel officer. This official is under the authority of the agency in which he works rather than the Division of Personnel. Agency personnel officers represent on-line government agencies in dealings with the central personnel office.

As the personnel agent for the state government and as protector of the merit principle, the Division of Personnel's primary activities are: (1) classification and pay, (2) recruitment and examination, (3) certification, and (4) benefits (retirement and Insurance). The division does not hire for the state; each agency hires its own employees. The Alaska merit system separates the hiring authority from the authority that assigns jobs to pay grades and evaluates applicants. The division's primary personnel function is to furnish a choice of the best applicants for a given position and then allow the appointing authority to make the final hiring decision.

THE ACTIVITIES OF THE DIVISION OF PERSONNEL

Classification and Pay

State government functions involve diverse duties and responsibilities. Related tasks are grouped so that one person can be employed to perform them. A set of related duties to be performed by one employee is called a position. About 5,000 budgeted positions presently exist in the state government. The Division of Personnel groups positions that are substantially the same in duties and responsibilities into job classes and prepares written job specifications for each job class. Job specifications for a class include a description of typical duties and responsibilities and the training and experience required for positions in that class. The experience and education required for an applicant to compete for employment in a job class are called minimum qualifications.

In many instances groups of positions involve the same type of work but in substantially different degrees of difficulty and responsibility. These positions are organized into job classes and job classes are arranged into a job class series -- a hierarchy of jobs which perform different parts of the same operation. An example of a job class series is the Accountant Series. There are five levels of accountant jobs in the state government. Presumably, a career employee could progress through such a series.

Having assigned positions to job classes, the division attempts to assign each job class to the appropriate pay grade. The state pays according to four monthly salary schedules of 28 pay grades with step increases within each grade for meritorious service. The schedules are supposedly designed to compensate for the differing cost of living in various parts of the state. The legislature determines the level of each of the schedules.

Since 1962, the Bureau of Labor Statistics has published regular estimates of the cost of living in four major Alaskan cities. These cost of living indexes are determined by a program of price surveys covering a wide range of typical consumer purchases. They are expressed as percentages of the cost of living in Seattle, Washington.

Table 1 compares the latest BLS cost of living estimates for these four cities with the state's pay rate in the four. For purposes of comparison, Juneau is the base; the pay and cost of living in the other three towns are expressed as percentages of the Juneau rates. The table shows that, while it costs five per cent less to live in Anchorage than in Juneau, employees in Anchorage are paid one per cent more than employees in Juneau. While it costs seven per cent less to live in Ketchikan than in Juneau, Ketchikan based state employees receive the same pay as Juneau based employees. And while it costs four per cent more to live in Fairbanks than in Juneau, Fairbanks employees are paid seven per cent more.

Since the state has a policy of compensating employees according to the cost of living in different parts of the state, it would seem reasonable for the legislature to implement this policy according to the available cost of living data.

Recruitment and Examination

Recruitment is simply a program of advertisement to inform prospective applicants about positions in the classified service that are open to competition. The Division of Personnel issues a recruitment bulletin similar to a job specification except that it also includes pay and examination information. These recruitment bulletins are sent to all departments of state government, to newspapers, to radio stations, to members of the legislature, to postmasters throughout Alaska, and to other persons or agencies who might pass information to prospective applicants. In addition, hiring authorities sometimes recruit directly, especially for professional positions. Agencies sometimes recruit in the contiguous 48 states for personnel with specialized training and experience in short supply in Alaska.

The state administers two kinds of examinations, continuous examinations and specific examinations. Continuous examinations are given for job classes for which there are large numbers of positions. Positions in these classes could reasonably be expected to open at any time. Examinations are periodically announced and continuously publicized without a designated closing date for the receipt of applications.

Specific examinations are set up to fill one or more specific positions. Public notice is given at least thirty days before the designated closing date for the receipt of applications.

An applicant must file a separate application for each job class for which he wishes to compete. The Division of Personnel determines, by appraising an application, whether the applicant meets the minimum qualifications. The division may require reasonable substantiation of claims of fact made on the application. Applicants who so qualify are admitted to examination. The purpose of minimum experience and formal education qualifications should be to prevent obviously unqualified persons from taking the examination. Actual employment standards are, ideally, set by the examination process itself which is supposed to be a complete assessment of an applicants suitability for the job he seeks.

Examination may consist of any combination of written, oral, physical, or performance tests which the Director of Personnel deems appropriate for evaluating applicants. Some job classes require only an examination and grading of the written application. Each examination process is scored on a basis determined by the Division of Personnel. Persons who receive a passing score earn a place on the eligible register.

The eligible register for a job class is a list of persons who have passed the examination for that job class. Applicants are ranked on the register according to their total score in the examination with all residents of Alaska ranked in order of score ahead of non-residents.

The policy of hiring Alaskans ahead of non-Alaskans is, strictly speaking, a compromise of the merit principle since a person's legal residence is not a factor in his merit as a potential employee. Veterans also receive preference in state employment; five points are added to a veteran's examination score (disabled veterans receive ten points.) Veterans preference has been a traditional feature of American public employment based upon recognition of society's debt to these individuals.

A certification is a list of the three applicants at the top of the register who have indicated their availability to fill the position under consideration. This availability is determined by a telegraphed or written inquiry. The Division of Personnel supplies a certification to the hiring authority from which that agency hires its choice.

The final screening after certification is done by the hiring authority on the theory that no system of examination is perfect and that the hiring authority should be able to make the final choice on whatever merit criteria he considers appropriate.

Although the system provides no specific procedure to assure appointing authorities make decisions for merit reasons, the Personnel Rules do require that all personnel actions be based on merit criteria.

> No action affecting the employment status of any employee in the classified service, including appointment, promotion, demotion, suspension, or removal may be taken or withheld for racial, political, national origin, religious, or other non-merit reasons. (Rule 13 06.0)

Compliance with this rule is based upon trust of administrators. It is difficult to imagine procedures which would enforce the rule without making it nearly impossible for administrators to function efficiently. However, the director of personnel does have blanket authority to enforce the rules:

> The Director may take any necessary action such as terminating or correcting the status of an employee, or bringing the employee's salary into conformance with the classification and pay plan to enforce these rules and/or to correct any appointment which is not in accordance with the law or these rules. (Rule 14 08.0)

This authority would allow the director to intervene in cases where he determined an agency was hiring for non-merit reasons.

THE OPEN REGISTER

Some blue collar jobs are filled from an open register. The open register is a list without rank of all applicants meeting the minimum qualifications. These are job classes for which it would be impractical to rank qualified applicants. For example, there are varying degrees of skill among truck drivers, but it is difficult to imagine how the division could accurately and economically measure this skill in an examination. The appointing authority may choose anyone on the list except when there are three or more Alaskans on the register; one of them must be appointed. The open register is a compromise of the merit principle which the state allows because of the difficulty of determining reasonable and economical ways for applicants to compete. An open register is already "fixed" for the hiring authority who wants to get someone a job as long as that individual meets the minimum qualifications for the class.

It has been suggested the state affirm its commitment to merit employment by abolishing the open register. Proponents of this view say that although it may be impractical to establish examinations for these positions, certification by lot might be more equitable than the present procedure because it would give anonymous applicants some chance of being considered ahead of persons who happen to know the appointing authority. Another approach would be to rank individuals on such registers according to the date of their original certification.

ALTERNATIVE METHODS OF FILLING POSITIONS

If, because of lack of qualified applicants, it is impossible to provide certification of three names, either the position goes unfilled or the merit principle is compromised in one of three ways:

1. Provisional hire. With authorization from the Director of Personnal a hiring authority may appoint someone whom it considers is qualified pending a complete certification and appointment from a register. Without prior approval from the Director of Personnel, the provisional appointment terminates at the end of the regular probationary period set for the position in question. (The probationary period, which each employee in the classified service must serve, is explained below.)

2. Subfilling is filling a position from the eligible register of a lower class in the same series or from a related class which the Director of Personnel deems appropriate. The Rules state that an employee subfilling in a position of a higher pay level than that of his own class "shall perform the duties of a lower classification." It is difficult to understand how an employee could be hired to assume the responsibilities of a position and yet, somehow, perform the duties of a lower classification. If an employee successfully fills a position which is classified higher than he is being paid, his right to the pay based on responsibility is being denied.

3. The director may make up a complete certification by argumenting from eligible lists of other job classes which he deems appropriate. If these other eligible lists are really appropriate, the position was too narrowly classified. The system should classify so that the maximum number of really qualified individuals will be admitted to compete for each position.

PROBATION

"The probationary period in the classified service shall be regarded as an integral part of the examination process and shall be utilized for closely observing the employee's work, for securing the most effective adjustment of the employee to his position, and for rejecting any employee whose performance does not meet the required standards." (Rules 6 01.0)

The probationary period is one year of continuous service (six months for jobs in pay range 2 through 13). During this time the employee may be discharged without the right of appeal unless dismissal is for racial, religious, or political reasons. If the employee's performance is satisfactory, his appointment becomes permanent after probation.

DISCIPLINE AND TERMINATION

The following actions cause an employee to cease continuous active employment in his position.

1. Retirement. State retirement age is 65. With permission of the commissioner of administration, employees may continue employment beyond that age. The commissioner may grant this permission if he finds the employee capable of rendering satisfactory service.
2. Resignation. With two weeks written notice, an employee may resign from his position in good standing.
3. Suspension. An employee may be suspended without pay for delinquency or misconduct. Such action requires that the employee be given a written explanation.
4. Layoff. Layoff is the termination of employment for reasons which do not reflect discredit upon the employee's performance of his duties. Seasonality of work, or lack of funds are reasons for layoff.

5. Demotion. An employee may be demoted with just cause. He must be given the reasons in writing.

6. Dismissal. A permanent employee may be dismissed with just cause. He must be given reasons in writing for dismissal. The appointing authority is required to give no formal advance notice of dismissal. Those who think that the Rules should provide for such notice point out that an unforeseen interruption in income can provide particular hardship for employees with family obligations. Since dismissal is primarily intended as a means of removing unsatisfactory personnel rather than as a means of punishment, critics contend that two weeks written notice would be appropriate.

GRIEVANCES

The Personnel Rules specify two grievance procedures, one for general grievances and one for cases involving dismissal, demotion, or suspension for over thirty days. Both of these procedures provide employees a means of protecting their rights as employees; neither is intended as a way for employees to influence agency policy not primarily related to employment.

The general grievance procedure affords an employee an opportunity to air dissatisfaction with working conditions, other employees, or the actions of supervisors. This procedure is designed to facilitate informal resolutions.

An employee with a grievance first presents it in writing to his supervisor. If not satisfied, the employee may than consult the next intermediate supervisor or the department personnel officer. If the employee is not satisfied at this level, he may submit his complaint to the head of his department or agency. If a decision to the employee's satisfaction is not forthcoming within fifteen days, he may request a hearing from the Commissioner of Administration.

The Commissioner of Administration establishes a grievance committee of three members - one appointed by the Commissioner of Administration or his representativeone by the organization or association of the employee's choice (such as the Alaska State Employee's Association), and one mutually agreeable third party. This committee conducts its hearing as near as practical to the city where the grievance occurred. The employee and his representative receive reasonable time to prepare a case. Hearings are informal; their purpose is merely to ascertain facts. The committee reports its findings to all parties involved. These findings carry only advisory weight.

The agency or the individual against whom the grievance was filed may appeal the committee's recommendations to the Personnel Board which reviews the case and modifies, affirms, or sets aside the findings. They may even reopen hearings.

Those who criticise this general grievance procedure contend that a grievance committee whose findings are only advisory is inadequate. They maintain that the Rules should grant the authority to make and enforce decisions to this carefully selected neutral committee. The question is whether such a committee, given access to the facts, is more likely to judge fairly than is the authority against whom the grievance was filed.

The other grievance procedure is for cases of dismissal, demotion, or suspension for over 30 days. An employee submits an appeal in writing to his division head and to the director of personnel. If the employee is not satisfied by his division head, he may appeal to his appointing authority, and, finally, to the Personnel Board.

The Personnel Board considers the appeal and conducts hearings if the employee requests. The employee may have an attorney. If the board finds that the action in question was taken for any political, racial, or religious reason, or was in violation of the provisions of the Personnel Act or Rules, the employee is reinstated to his position without loss of pay or leave benefit of the period of his dismissal, demotion or suspension.

Although the rights of applicants for state employment are specified in the Personnel Rules, there is no grievance procedure for applicants who feel that their rights have been violated. The lack of such a procedure is severly criticised by those who maintain that a person's rights may be worth little when he has no reasonable way to enforce them.

PENALTIES FOR VIOLATION OF THE STATE PERSONNEL ACT AND RULES

Violation of the Personnel Act or the Rules is a misdemeanor. The Statutes specify that anyone who is convicted of a violation "immediately forfeits his office or position." (39.25.2.0) That the penalty section of the Personnel Rules is not enforced is common knowledge. An individual considering misusing his power as a supervisory employee of the state has to consider only the risk of having his decision reversed, not the risk of prosecution.

Indictements for criminal offences are initiated by the office of the Attorney General, appointee of the governor, and no law required the Attorney General to take this action. Those who think that unenforced laws are weak laws suggest that there is at least one solution to this problem:

The Legislature could empower and instruct the Personnel Board to initiate criminal proceedings every time they find that the Personnel Act or Rules have been seriously and purposely violated. Giving the Personnel Board such power does not interfere with the administrative efficiency of the government for it involves no additional administrative restrictions or procedures. It only threatens the supervisor who does not have a valid reason for suspending, demoting, or dismissing an employee. If an employee appeals and wins, he receives back pay, but if he looses, he receives nothing for the time it has taken him to appeal. Therefore, an employee is unlikely to appeal unless he believes he has been wronged and he can prove it.

OUTLINES OF AUTHORITY FOR THE ALASKAN SYSTEM

The State Personnel Act delegates specification of the details of the Alaska Merit System to the Personnel Rules. The procedure for making a change in or addition to the Personnel Rules is:

1. The Personnel Director prepares the recommended change and presents it to the Commissioner of Administration.
2. The Commissioner of Administration, if he approves, submits the proposed change to the Personnel Board.
3. The Personnel Board accepts or rejects the change.

This provision is a recognition that the legislature could not foresee all the detailed needs of the merit system and the professional who administers the system is best able to understand these needs as they become apparent.

There has been severe criticism of the present allotment of authority for the Alaska Merit System. Those who make this criticism maintain that the present system is weak because it delegates excessive power over state personnel functions to the governor and his appointees, and this power is not essential to appropriately strong executive management of the state government. These critics would remove the Division of Personnel from the Department of Administration and place it under the authority of an independent Personnel Board.

Statements of the argument for an independent Personnel Board usually include the following:

1. The personnel director is presently selected by and reports to the commissioner of administration. During his year of probationary employment, the director can be removed by the commissioner without recourse to a hearing before the Personnel Board. Critics of the present system maintain that the merit system's effectiveness depends upon a personnel director who is willing to dissent from the administration whenever he thinks it is in the state's interest. The Personnel Act and Rules vest the personnel director with considerable power but do not require that he take the initiative to use that power. An administration hostile or merely indifferent to a strong merit system could prevent the personnel directorship from being filled by an individual willing to take such initiative. These critics would delegate the appointing authority for the director to the Personnel Board. This, they say, would not make it impossible for an administration to remove an inefficient personnel director, but the administration would have to make its case for removal before the Personnel Board.

2. The commissioner of administration can now block any change in the Personnel Rules by simply failing to submit proposed changes to the Personnel Board. The system's effectiveness requires that these rules be modified whenever the need for modification becomes apparent.

Proponents of the independent Personnel Board would vest the board with exclusive power for determining changes in the Rules. Proposals for changes would be accepted from the personnel director or the administration, and the board would consider the advice of all interested parties in reaching decisions.

3. The administration presently submits the Personnel Division's budget request to the legislature. A hostile or indifferent administration can significantly weaken the whole system by underfinancing it. Critics of the system would have the personnel director submit and justify his own budget requests through the Personnel Board.

4. The governor can now remove members of the Personnel Board at his pleasure. Critics contend this gives the executive inappropriate power and that removal of a board member should require legislative consent.

The major objection to the argument for the independent Personnel Board is that the governor, as the elected chief executive, should be entrusted with control of all the state government's functions.

In answering this objection, proponents of the independent Personnel Board reply that governors are politicians - men trying to control the course of events - and that it is naive to expect them to fight disinterestedly for a strong merit system, when such a merit system would work against their priorities as politicians and as administrators. The proponents of the independent board say that it makes more sense to give a bipartisan group the ultimate authority over matters of public employment. They contend that there is no reason to assume that such an independent board or their Personnel Director would be hostile to the administrative needs of the government.

FINANCING ALASKA'S PERSONAL SERVICES

Efforts to determine what it should cost to sufficiently finance the Division of Personnel are hampered by a lack of meaningful ways to make comparisons with other state systems. In order to make useful comparison, it would first be necessary to determine which other systems were adequately performing their function. To seek the average cost of all state systems would imply that the average state was adequately financed and that those above average were overfinanced. Even if it were possible to determine which states were adequately financed, some way would have to be devised to objectively allow for the higher costs in Alaska. If such allowances could be meaningfully computed, comparison could be made only with systems whose central personnel agencies performed the same parts of the personnel function as does Alaska's and whose labor market offers the same challenges. Indication of the inadequacy of Personnel Division financing comes from those who administer the system and those whom it serves.

Many critics indicate that the Alaska Personnel Division has never been able to assure compliance with the merit principle or provide satisfactory personnel services to the state government because it has never been sufficiently staffed and financed. The present Personnel Director has said that about twice the present budget and staff is required to perform the services delegated. The president of the Alaska State Employees Association estimates that "triple the present budget and staff would be required to administer the system and effectively control it. Currently, the division is merely a housekeeping organization with the capabilities of barely holding things together." Various state officials and employees have indicated that dealing with the Division of Personnel is nearly impossible because of administrative delays caused by underfinancing.

A personnel service which is not prompt results in inefficiencies that cannot be measured but which are, nevertheless, real. The most desireable and motivated job seekers tend to find suitable employment quickly because they job hunt aggressively. The state undoubtedly looses some of its best prospects because of dealys in the recruiting, examination, and certification process. The more quickly these processes can be completed, the more often the state will be able to beat the competition to the best people.

When agencies of the state government need personnel action taken, they suffer inefficiencies until that need is fulfilled. Such inefficiencies cost even though the costs are not enumerated on financial reports.

The inherently difficult process of measuring duties and responsibilities in order to classify positions requires careful consideration and frequent review. A Personnel Division operating with about half the needed staff and budget does not have the resources to do an adequate classification job. Because the specific duties assumed by individuals within agencies change over time, the classification of a position should be regularly reviewed. At least, review of a positions classification should be made whenever the individual filling it and his supervisor think it has changed substantially. Without such review of past decisions, the pay that employees receive tends to loose its relationship to the duties and responsibilities assumed. Several sources indicate that this deterioration of classification has taken place in many parts of the state government.

The definition and measurement of merit in applicants for employment is difficult at best. But these measurements are important to the welfare of the government and the state. Alaska has a limited labor market and a serious unemployment problem. Any screening process that eliminates people who could be useful employees tends to aggrevate the unemployment problem and limit the supply of talent available to the state government. Making examinations less and less arbitrary takes time and costs money. An underfinanced Personnel Division cannot be expected to devote sufficient resources to an ongoing program of examination improvement that the particular social and economic characteristics of the Alaskan Labor market makes especially desireable.

A COMPARISON OF ALASKA AND FEDERAL PAY

The existence of more than two federal civilian jobs for every state job in Alaska makes a comparison of state and federal pay an appropriate indicator of the state's competitive position in the labor market.

The federal government pays its Alaskan employees according to the Federal General Service (G.S.) schedule and compensates for the cost of living in Alaska with a 25 per cent cost of living allowance. This 25 per cent is exempt from federal income tax.

Table 2 compares the Alaska state and G.S. monthly salary schedules after federal income tax has been computed and subtracted. This computation of the federal income tax is necessary for meaningful comparison in order to show the real effect of the tax-exempt cost of living allowance. To deny the validity of an after tax comparison is to imply that potential employees are not primarily interested in how much they take home.

The alignment is of pay grades for the same general levels of responsibility. No such alignment would perfectly apply to all jobs. The one shown was determined after consultation with the classification and pay chief of the Division of Personnel and with the executive secretary of the Alaska State Employees Association. This comparison indicates state pay is nowhere near competitive with federal pay at any level.

Table 3 shows the percentage increase that would be needed in gross pay in Alaska's pay grades 5 through 25 to make them about equal to the corresponding federal pay grades after federal income tax were subtracted from both. The calculations assume a federal pay raise of 5 per cent.

Information about the actual raise for federal employees in 1969 was not available at the time of the study. The percentages were computed for the pay schedule used in Southeastern Alaska and are presented as a further indication of the state's competitive position.

Since turnover data has not been gathered regularly, it is impossible to know how many employees leave the state government as soon as they find an opening with the federal government. But this comparison makes understandable the contention that Alaska's Classified Service is a training ground for federal employees.

The comparison is presented as an indication of the state's competitive position in the labor market, not as an indication of what state employees "deserve" for their services. If the state cannot afford to compete, taxpayers will incur the subsequent costs in high turnover and in loss of potential talent. The state is not immune to the economic realities of the labor market; politics assuming such immunity are shortsighted.

MINIMUM QUALIFICATIONS

The essential function of minimum qualifications in the recruiting, examining, certifying, and hiring process should be to eliminate obviously unqualified persons. Presumably persons who read the recruitment bulletin and see that they do not meet the minimums do not apply. On the other hand, meeting the minimums is no assurance that an applicant will be hired, only that he will have the opportunity to compete. Minimum qualifications, therefore, save the Division of Personnel the expense of examining obviously unqualified personnel.

This definition of the role of minimum education and experience requirements is, however, not in full agreement with the current policy of the Division of Personnel. The Division appears to use minimum qualifications as a means of setting high standards. The possible consequences of attempting to set high standards of employment with high minimum qualifications should be carefully considered.

There are many characteristics which the Division of Personnel attempts to quantify when evaluating the merit of an applicant. The most readily quantifiable characteristics of a potential employee -- his formal education and years of experience -- are those stated in the minimum qualifications. Motivation and aptitude might be considered the most important traits in employees because individuals with these characteristics take the initiative to remedy their own shortcomings. Unfortunately, these characteristics are least suseptible to measurement.

A personnel officer can appraise many clues, such as school records, test results, and the recommendations of former employers, but none of them are absolute measures of motivation and aptitude.

The tendency to depend on high minimum qualifications, as measurable characteristics, to take precedence in the screening procedure over the less measureable but no less important characteristics can actually have effects opposite those desired.

The supply of potential employees in the labor market at any time is beyond the control of the Personnel Division. The division can only try to recruit the best available talent. Supply and demand tend to apply certain prices to certain kinds and amounts of experience and education. Persons whose comparatively strong experience and education characteristics actually reflect their merit as employees will usually find employment in positions of correspondingly high pay either in government or in private enterprise. On the other hand, persons with comparatively strong education and experience requirements who are available to compete for employment at relatively low pay will tend to be deficient in the less measurable but often more important characteristics. This is how high minimum qualifications can tend to cause low overall employment standards. This is also why high minimum qualifications in job series tend to protect mediocre civil servants. Ambitious and capable employees are generally drawn to career opportunities where it is possible to progress quickly.

Since lowering the mininum qualifications actually should involve no more than allowing more persons to be examined, the result might be more accurate certification after all characteristics indicative of merit have been measured as accurately and fairly as possible. On the other hand, if the minimum requirements for a job are unnecessarily high, desirable individuals may read the recruitment bulletin and not apply even though they might have been among the best applicants when all characteristics were considered.

The contention that minimum qualifications express precisely the minimum amounts of education and experience necessary for a person to function satisfactorily in a position can lead to invalid conclusions. Strictly applied, this contention implies that, for a job whose minimum qualifications include two years of experience of a certain kind, an applicant with one year and ten months would be unable to function satisfactorily in that position though he might somehow acquire the necessary ability as soon as he had completed the two years.

A merit system could operate with no minimum qualifications at all. The difficulty would be that the personnel agency might find itself swamped with applications from clearly unqualified personnel. One solution is to have recruitment bulletins specify "desired characteristics" rather than minimum qualifications. If none of the applicants possess all of the desired characteristics but some are determined and able to function satisfactorily in the job, the best three available would be certified. In this way, the system would certify the best available talent from the labor market. If the Division of Personnel were adequately financed so it could review and strengthen the examination process, desireable characteristics approach could be developed. The state would hire the best talent available from the existing labor market as determined by the fairest possible examination without accidentially excluding potentially valuable employees.

The Personnel Division's responsibility in determining the minimum qualifications for each job class makes it possible for that agency to expand or limit the portion of the labor market able to compete for any position. The ideal policy would admit the greatest possible number of potentially useful candidates to competition.

Alaska's Personnel Division maintains minimum qualifications in certain job classes which further aggravate the state's already unfavorable competitive relationship with the federal government. Often cited as examples are the accountant and statistition series. Alaskan minimum qualifications are written so accountants and statisticians must wait two years at each level in these series before they are eligible to compete for promotion. In the parallel federal series, employees are eligible to compete for promotion after only one year.

Ideally, the division would always design or adjust minimum qualifications to be slightly less rigorous than the federal government in classes where the two are likely to compete for the same part of the labor market. This is not because the federal government designs better minimum qualifications (any such decision is somewhat arbitrary) but because the state can always afford to be flexible enough to give itself a slightly wider choice from the existing labor supply. Minimum qualifications only admit applicants to examination; those who perform best on the whole examination still are the ones certified. When specified amounts of education and experience will admit an individual to compete for higher wages or faster promotion in the federal service than in the state service, the state is certain to loose many desireable applicants.

Again, since there has been no regularly gathered turnover data, it is impossible to know the cost in turnover of comparatively high mininum qualifications and low pay. But every time a satisfactory employee leaves for a more desireable job, the state assumes the expense of recruiting, examining, certifying, and hiring a replacement, the loss of the old employee's experience on the job, and the disruption of the organization while a new employee is found and trained. These costs may be impossible to calculate exactly, but personnel policy which does not attract and hold good employees clearly detracts from long-range government efficiency.

Recruitment 3 years ago found it cost at least $1,600 to obtain a new employee.

THE COLLECTION OF TURNOVER DATA AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF A MANAGEMENT INFORMATION SYSTEM

Until this year, the Division of Personnel has not regularly collected turnover data. The division now routinely records turnover job class. Figure 1 suggests the type of data that the personnel director and his staff would find particularly helpful in dealing with turnover. The data collected on this form would be systematically stored on computer tape and would enable the director to pinpoint and analyze particular competitive problems.

The personnel director has indicated that he expects the capabilities of digital computers to contribute significantly to improving the speed and efficiency of the service which his agency provides to the state. Every effort should be made to utilize the state government's computer facilities to aid the personnel function.

If a bank of historical information about the state's personnel needs could be developed from which regular reports could be compiled, all agencies involved in education and manpower training in Alaska would be able to make decisions and give advice to clients based upon specific knowledge of at least one important part of the labor market. Such regularly collected and disseminated information could form the basis for later developing a comprehensive labor market information system which would be a useful tool in many facets of the endeavor to deal with unemployment.

To Terminating State Employees:

The information requested here is for the use of the Division of Personnel and is not to be reviewed by your immediate superiors. Please check all appropriate items.

1. I am leaving Alaska State Employment to take a higher paying position.

2. I am leaving Alaska State Employment to take a position with better opportunities for professional advancement.

3. I am leaving Alaska State Employment to go to school.

4. I am leaving Alaska State Employment because my spouse has been transfered to another location.

5. I have taken another job in Alaska State Government.

6. I have taken a job with the Federal Government.

7. I will continue to reside in my present location.

8. I am moving to another location in Alaska.

9. I am moving outside Alaska.

10. Dissatisfaction with my supervisor(s) or with the organization of my department is a factor in my termination.

The Division of Personnel is interested in knowing why any employee has decided to leave his position. Please use the space provided below (and additional sheets if necessary) to clarify any of the statements you have checked above and to tell us anything else you would like us to know about the circumstances of your decision to terminate.

Thank you.

Personnel should not ask for this information where a person resigned, although it was not always given. There is a place for it on the resignation letter of the PA.

These recommendations are all good.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

The purpose of the State Personnel Act is to establish a system of personnel administration based upon the merit principle and adapted to the requirements of the state to the end that persons best qualified to perform the functions of the state will be employed, and that an effective career service will be encouraged, developed, and maintained. With general information about merit employment at hand, it has been possible to describe the Alaska Merit System and to raise pertinent issues concerning its effectiveness.

Underfinancing is impeding development of an effective career service in two ways. First, comparative study indicates that the state does not pay well enough to attract and hold a motivated and capable force of employees. In determining pay, legislators should consider that their decision will directly influence the quality of the classified service in coming years. The state will generally receive what it pays for in the labor market; turnover also will reflect the adequacy of state pay.

Second, adequate financing and staffing is needed to enable the Division of Personnel to contribute to the improved efficiency of the whole state government by meeting the state's personnel needs more promptly. Furthermore, improved staffing would enable the state to strengthen screening procedures and thereby take better advantage of the labor market.

Two possible reforms dealing with the rights of applicants have been discussed. The open register is not in keeping with the merit principle; ways to abolish it without incurring significant administrative costs have been suggested. The lack of a procedure for applicants to seek redress of violations of their rights to impartial consideration for employment may allow significant abuse. The institution of some applicant grievance procedure would deter such abuse.

Providing for written notice to employees before dismissal, making grievance committee recommendations binding, and granting the personnel board authority and responsibilty for penalizing violations of the Personnel Act and Rules are ways to strengthen the system's protection of individual rights. Administrators may violate employee rights out of self-interest, expediency, or indifference. Even simple personality conflicts may tempt persons with authority to abuse it. A strongly enforced merit principle tends to deter arbitrary actions. The Alaska Merit System will more effectively attract and hold desireable employees if the state becomes known as an employer which hires and promotes for reasons of merit alone and which provides adequate system of safeguards.

The institution of an independent Personnel Board may be an effective way to assure a strong merit system in Alaska. This approach would clearly define and allocate authority and responsibility for the personnel function; it might produce a better combination of executive authority and protective control than presently exists. In many ways, an independent Personnel Board makes sense; its appropriateness for Alaska warrants further study. Such research should draw upon the experience of states having independent Civil Service Commissions. In addition, the judgement of administrators (who would have to live with changes that might be made) should be solicited in order to better foresee the implications of such changes.

It is recommended that the Personnel Division reconsider the function of minimum qualifications in the screening process. Minimum qualifications in the screening process. Minimum qualifications should be statements of the absolute minimum of training and experience which, combined with adequate motivation and aptitude, would enable an applicant to become a satisfactory employee. The policy of attempting to set employment standards by specifying high minimum qualifications is self-defeating. Specifying "desirable characteristics" in places of minimum qualifications in some or all job classes may be an appropriate way to take better advantage of the Alaskan labor market.

Finally, the desireability of collecting regular comprehensive turnover and employment data has been pointed out. Such data would be a useful management tool for the Division of Personnel and would also provide information of use to other government agencies.

A considerable time lag will separate financial and institutional improvements in the Alaska Merit System from the benefits which these improvements will bring. Since Alaska's government is young and relatively small, the state has an opportunity to profit from its own experience and the experience of older states. However, growth will make bureaucratic improvement more difficult. Thus, Alaska should move now to develop career service fully capable of meeting the demands which will accompany the state's growth.

THE ALASKA STATE EMPLOYEES ASSOCIATION

The Alaska State Employees Association was chartered by the state as a non-profit corporation in 1959. Presently the association has about 2,100 members contributing $2 each per month in dues. The ASEA employs a full time executive secretary and a clerical secretary. The organization sees its major functions as:

1. To lobby in the legislature for better pay and improved retirement programs. The ASEA considers the pay bills of 1965 and 1967 and the Retirement and Health Insurance bills of 1968 significant legislative victories.

2. To lobby in the Department of Administration for rules changes which they consider appropriate. Presently the ASEA is attempting to obtain what they consider an adequate policy for overtime compensation.

3. To disseminate information of interest to state employees, especially through their monthly newspaper, the State Employee Reporter.

4. To serve as employee consul in the systems two grievance procedures.

Since public employees traditionally have not had recourse to strike and since the ASEA does not officially represent state employees in collective bargaining (the legislature determines pay), the association depends upon straightforward lobbying backed by a potential ability to influence a significant number of votes to achieve its goals.

Although only twenty-one hundred state employees pay dues, all employees receive the association's newspaper and most of them vote in state elections. In addition, the votes of husbands and wives contribute to their potential influence in elections. Furthermore, any state employee, if sufficiently motivated, might well influence the votes of his friends. In a small state where elections are often close, the existence of such unity behind one set of interests might be a decisive factor.

The ASEA attempts to influence legislators and the administration by convincing them that this potential unity is a reality -- that the association will make employees aware of who represents their interests and that state employees will act accordingly.

PETITION

We, the undersigned employees of the State of Alaska, and residents of the Fairbanks North Star Borough, petition the Legislature and the Governor of the State of Alaska to enact in this session of the Legislature HOUSE BILL 174, with its equivalent SENATE BILL 132, relating to State employees' salaries and providing for an effective date; and HOUSE BILL 106, eltitled "An act Amending the State Personnel Act; and creating the Alaska Civil Service Commission".

The desirability of having an independent merit system not influenced by political motivations or by changes in administration, but devoted solely to the creation of a fair, impartial and efficient working staff for our State is only too well established. Such a system, together with fair compensation for services rendered, constitutes the only way to attract and keep in State employment qualified career personnel. Failure to act on these bills will perpetuate a system which has received much well-earned criticism and has cost this State and its people the high cost of constant turnover of personnel, continuous recruitment, and the concomitant training, with reduced efficiency and production.

We therefore urge our representatives, senators, and Governor to enact these bills promptly by such majority of votes as to demonstrate to the people of Alaska their desire for the quality of government and administration this great State of Alaska deserves.

Such a system, together with fair compensation for services rendered, constitutes the only way to attract and keep in State employment qualified career personnel. Failure to act on these bills will perpetuate a system which has received much well-earned criticism and has cost this State and its people the high cost of constant turnover of personnel, continuous recruitment, and the concomitant training, with reduced efficiency and production.

We therefore urge our representatived, senators, and Governor to enact these bills promptly by such majority of votes as to demonstrate to the people of Alaska their desire for the quality of government and administration this great State of Alaska deserves.

We, the undersigned employees of the State of Alaska, and residents of the Fairbanks North Star Borough, petition the Legislature and the Governor of the State of Alaska to enact in this session of the Legislature HOUSE BILL 174, with its equivalent SENATE BILL 132, relating to State employees' salaries and providing for an effective date; and HOUSE BILL 106, eltitled "An act Amending the State Personnel Act; and creating the Alaska Civil Service Commission".

The desirability of having an independent merit system not influenced by political motivations or by changes in administration, but devoted solely to the creation of a fair, impartial and efficient working staff for our State is only too well established. Such a system, together with fair compensation for services rendered, constitutes the only way to attract and keep in State employment qualified career personnel. Failure to act on these bills will perpetuate a system which has received much well-earned criticism and has cost this State and its people the high cost of constant turnover of personnel, continuous recruitment, and the concomitant training, with reduced efficiency and production.

We therefore urge our representatives, senators, and Governor to enact these bills promptly by such majority of votes as to demonstrate to the people of Alaska their desire for the quality of government and administration this great State of Alaska deserves.

Gentlemen:

During April 1969, testimony was presented to the Commerce Committee by Fairbanks representative, A. J. Movius. The position of the City was, at that time, and is, that the benefits to be gained in protecting the public's interest are outweighed by the burden imposed on the rate payers who will pay for the regulation.

The City of Fairbanks Public Utilities Board and Fairbanks City Council have previously gone on record as being opposed to regulation that will interfere with the regulation of local utilities on a local basis. An arbitration provision is the only forseeable genuine benefit that could accrue to the rate payer.

If a bill is to be passed, and if this is to do any good, it must contain a provision to solve the service area problems existing between contiguous utility organizations. If the legislature sincerely intends to protect the public by passage of a bill to strengthen the Public Service Commission, definite guide lines for settling border disputes will be contained in the legislation.

Finally, one practical point - it is apparent to everyone that the Public Service Commission has been overwhelmed by the RCA certificate situation and this should point out that if the Commission is to be effective in protecting the rate payer, it must first get organized.

Very truly yours,

Ray Kohler

CITY OF KETCHIKAN

KETCHIKAN PUBLIC UTILITIES

Senate Bills Nos. 54 and 128 and House Bill No. 188 have been introduced in the State Legislature. If passed, these bills would put control of municipal utilities under an appointed State Public Service Commission.

The City of Ketchikan Public Utilities have been regulated by the City Council for approximately 34 years and have provided its consumers a reasonable level of service at the lowest rates in Alaska, and at rates below the national average for residential service.

Control by a State Public Service Commission, in addition to violating the charter provisions of home rule cities, would constitute an unnecessary interference in the management of city affairs, and could, by creating additional operating expense in the operation of its utilities, result in higher rates for service to be paid by the consumer.

Wednesday, March 5, 1969, at 7:00 P.M., a hearing will be held by the Senate Commerce Committee on Senate Bill No. 128. If you feel this type of legislation would be against your best interests we would strongly urge that you send a letter or telegram expressing your opposition to Senator Paul Haggland, Chairman, Senate Commerce Committee, State Capitol Building, Juneau, Alaska.

KETCHIKAN, ALASKA, 3 MARCH, 1969
DEAR SENATOR HAGGLAND
IF I WERE A MEMBER OF THE LEGISLATURE, I WOULD VOTE "NO" ON EITHER OR BOTH OF THE ABOVE MENTIONED BILLS. IT IS MY PERSONAL OPINION THAT THE ALASKA PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION ALREADY HAS TOO MUCH REGULATORY POWER OVER INDUSTRIES ABOUT WHICH THE INDIVIDUAL MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION HAVE VERY LIMITED KNOWLEDGE.
RESPECTFULLY

STATE OF ALASKA
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR

February 7, 1969

The Honorable Jay S. Hammond
Chairman, Senate Rules Committee
Alaska State Legislature
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Dear Mr. Chairman:

Pursuant to State law and the Uniform Rules of the Legislature, I am transmitting herewith a bill entitled "An Act relating to the regulation of public utilities, defining the composition, powers and duties of the Public Service Commission; and providing for an effective date."

The attached bill would effect a number of important changes in the existing Public Service Commission Act.

It will substantially strengthen the regulatory authority of the Commission in certain respects. It will broaden the Commission's base of jurisdiction; it provides a reasonable and workable means of engendering compliance and enforcement; and it gives the Commission the ability to effectively regulate within its sphere of jurisdiction.

The bill does not repeal and re-enact the entire existing PSC Act. The first several sections of Chapter 42.05 are retained or simply revised. This has the effect of leaving the composition of the Commission as it is. Revisions are included, however, which would provide means for removing a commissioner from office: either by the same procedure in which he is appointed or for cause. These removal methods are designed to provide continuity of policy of the Commission. At the same time it affords an essential ability for change in event of incompetence, etc.

Due to the rapidly increasing workload of the commissioners and the need to retain well qualified and competent men on the Commission, the bill proposes an annual salary of $5,000.

The bill does repeal and re-enact all sections beyond AS 42.05.060 of the current chapter. In many instances, however, the new provisions are the same or similar to the present ones. Re-enactment of this large block of sections was employed primarily to provide continuity and uniformity and avoid the confusion of large scale amendments, additions and deletions.

Why not amend existing service? (amend?)

The other areas of important change which this bill would affect can be summarized as follows:

Sections 42.05.141 - 171 clarify the regulatory authority of the Commission. It is divided into general and administrative authority. The latter specifies that the Commission is to provide by regulation, for its own rules of practice and procedure in its adjudicatory proceedings. The procedures of the APA (AS 44.62) were never designed, intended nor are they appropriate to the usual utility regulatory agency investigation and hearing. The authority given to the PSC to prescribe its own procedural rules is similar to such authority granted the Alaska Transportation Commission in 1966 (139 SLA 1966).

The new statutes make it clear that the Commission may employ its own hearing officers. They also clarify the Commission's authority to hear a case itself without using a hearing officer. This authority has been implied in the past but the conflicting hearing processes provided for by the APA and the current PSC statutes rendered the implication at least questionable. The new provisions also expressly state that a commissioner may act as hearing officer.

The proposed bill expands the authority of the Commission in respect to certification of utilities. It prescribes (PROSCRIBES) unauthorized discontinuance or abandonment of certificated service and gives the Commission the power to modify, suspend, or revoke a certificate under certain conditions.

The new provisions concerning utility service have been strengthened in the requirement that service be reasonable, safe, adequate and sufficient.

In the area of rate regulation, the new bill makes it clear that the Commission may make, fix, alter and amend rates. It also expressly provides for suspension of rate changes for a maximum period of seven months. The seven-month period corresponds to the rather standard statutory suspension period for Commission regulating motor carriers, etc., but is less than the ten-month period commonly provided in regulation of electric, telephone, etc., utilities.

The Commission is also given the authoritv to apportion joint rates where the participating utilities cannot agree on apportionment or an apportionment is prejudicial to one of them.

The bill provides for reparations where the Commission finds that a utility has charged unreasonable, excessive or discriminatory rates.

In valuation of utility property for rate making purposes, the Commission is required to determine fair value primarily as a function of original cost less accrued depreciation. This, in effect, codifies the approach taken by the Commission in actual practice.

For the sake of uniformity and usefulness of information, the Commission is given the authority to prescribe the accounting systems to be used.

Article 8 of the bill provides both criminal and civil penalties for violation. Adequate penalty provisions are essential to regulation. They are designed and normally act as a compliance tool; and compliance rather than levy of fines or penalities is the objective.

The general provisions of the bill include assessment of regulatory fees, a public records section and a section to the effect that the 1968 amendment to Section AS 42.05.640(2) did not abrogate any rights vested in a public utility prior to its enactment. It is also called to your attention that the 1968 amendment is repealed. The provision therein which defined public utility in terms of $25,000 minimum gross annual revenue was completely unworkable — Query and raised numerous corolary questions concerning Commission jurisdiction. — NAMELY?

The definition of public utility is broadened and like its predecessor confines itself to definition. Exemptions are incorporated in a separate section.

Municipally owned and operated utilities are exempted from regulation only in certain respects. These are specified in subsections AS 42.05.631(b)-(d). In brief, a municipal utility would be exempt from rate regulation for services provided within the city boundaries. Services which it provides outside the municipal boundaries would not be exempt. Municipal utilities would also be exempt en toto from Sections AS 42.05.491 - 511 concerning financial and management regulation, and from Section AS 42.05.641 concerning regulatory fees.

The only other exemption from regulation is the person who furnishes water, gas or petroleum products by tank, wagon, etc. However, this exemption is limited where such supplier is providing the service to a public utility in which he has an affiliated interest.

Sincerely yours,

Keith H. Miller

PHYSICAL DEPRECIATION

"Physical depreciation" of property is the result of deterioration due to age and wear. It results from use, decay and the action of the elements. "Physical depreciation" is a constant factor, and it begins as soon as the structure is exposed to the action of the elements or is put into use. Central R. Co. of New Jersey v. Martin, D.C.N.J., 30 F.Supp. 41, 60.

"Physical depreciation" is reduction in value of structure due to actual wear and tear or physical deterioration. Property consisting of paper mill, bag factory, storehouses, yard equipment, etc., used by going concern, should be assessed for taxation at valuation fixed by reconstruction cost less depreciation, in absence of market value or evidence thereof. People ex rel. Union Bag & Paper Corporation v. Fitzgerald, 2 N.Y.S.2d 290, 295, 166 Misc. 237.

PHYSICAL DETERIORATION

Company formed by merger of title companies was not entitled to deduction from income for "obsolescence" in amount of alleged decrease in value of title insurance plant which company failed to keep up to date after the merger, since loss of usefulness was not because of changing economic conditions or circumstances over which company lacked control, but was result rather of "physical deterioration." Revenue Act 1928, § 23(k), 26 U.S.C.A. (I.R.C. 1939) § 23. United States v. Real Estate-Land Title & Trust Co., C.C.A.Pa., 102 F.2d 582, 586.

PHYSICAL DIAGNOSIS

Faulty diagnosis of itself and apart from treatment does not give rise to action for malpractice, since diagnosis may rightly be changed from time to time. "Diagnosis" is defined as the art or act of recognizing the presence of disease from its symptoms, and deciding as to its character, also the decision reached, for determination of type or condition through case or specimen study or conclusion arrived at through critical perception or scrutiny. A "clinical diagnosis" is one made from a study of the symptoms only, and a "physical diagnosis" is one made by means of physical measure, such as palpation and inspection. "Malpractice" is the treatment of a case by surgeon or physician in a manner contrary to accepted rules and with injurious results to the patient; and hence any professional misconduct or any unreasonable lack of skill or fidelity in the performance of professional duties or of mistreatment of a disease or injury through ignorance and carelessness. Williams v. Lucas, 1 N.W.2d 121, 124, 140 Neb. 656.

CALIFORNIA

In proceeding involving transfer and recapitalization of public utility properties it is not necessary that commission determine present value of lands involved. Santa Cruz County Util., In re (1928) 31 CRC 32.

Income theory as measure of value is unstable. San Francisco, In re (1929) 33 CRC 202.

Actual application of income theory is by means of a purely mathematical formula which determines the answer without the exercise of judgment. San Francisco, In re (1929) 33 CRC 202.

Just compensation cannot be found on basis of income earned from property, investments in which a utility estimates it might make in the future. It is commission's duty to fix just compensation on basis of property owned and to be taken on the day of taking. San Francisco, In re (1929) 33 CRC 202.

5. —— PROPERTY INCLUDED IN VALUATION

Unused property.—In making valuation of water utility property for rate-fixing purposes, water owned by utility entirely separated from its water system and not used or useful in service of water to its consumers, will not be included as property on the value of which a return is allowed. Watsonville Water & Light Co., In re (1919) 17 CRC 126.

Intercorporate relationship.—Worth of subsidiary electric railway to parent railroad as collector and distributor of parent company's passenger and freight traffic is factor to be considered in determining reasonable rate of return to be allowed subsidiary. Chamber of Commerce v Pacific Elec. R. Co. (1928) 31 CRC 454.

Nonoperative property.—Cost of diversion dam rendered nonoperative and no longer necessary in rendering service should be excluded from operative capital. Monterey County Waterworks, In re (1928) 31 CRC 852.

Lands.—When market value of land is found there is nothing to be added to further indicate value of land except it be that intangible value which attaches to composite property in use. San Francisco, In re (1929) 33 CRC 202.

Nonutility Property.—Water company rendering private service and utility service which contends that private properties acquired from predecessor have never been dedicated to public use has no legal right to have such properties fully valued for utility-rate fixing purposes merely because utility arm of company may be accorded by the other a revocable permissive right to use that part of the property considered private. This does not mean that were the utility to show that it has a definite legal right to the use of private property for utility purposes it would not be entitled to have a fair value accorded to such a right. Thomas v Monterey County Water Works (1937) 40 CRC 683.

6. —— COST AND INVESTMENT

Reproduction cost based upon estimate of what price of material and labor will be two years hence is speculative and of very little assistance in determining rate base. Watsonville Water & Light Co., In re (1919) 17 CRC 126.

Historical cost and present value.—Where applicant claims that rates should be established on estimated present value of property and not on historical cost new, consideration must be given the fact that it is electric utility serving under regulation in territory free from general competition and has other and different obligations imposed upon it than those to which nonpublic utility is subjected, for it may be required to meet the demands of territory whether costs are high or low and develop plants when necessary to provide for needs of public during periods of high prices as well as of low prices, and amount invested in public utility properties, if known, or if not known, the historical cost of property, should be regarded as principal element in arriving at rate base and applicant is therefore entitled to fair return upon its reasonable historical cost rather than upon "present value." Southern Sierras Power Co. & Holton Power Co., In re (1920) 18 CRC 818.

Allowance for historical investment should not be blindly followed in case utility has unreasonably delayed in its obligation to public by failing to develop plants at time when they should have been developed and later constructing them under conditions of high cost of money and material, in such case, fairness to consumers must dictate lesser compensation to utility. Southern Sierras Power Co. & Holton Power Co., In re (1920) 18 CRC 818.

Allowance for development cost.—Commission refuses to allow as development costs, either in capital or to be amortized at this time, early losses incurred by utility prior to its purchase by present owners, as former owners would not benefit thereby and it would be equivalent to requiring consumers now to pay power bills which should have been paid at the time, were they reasonable. Southern Sierras Power Co. & Holton Power Co., In re (1920) 18 CRC 818.

Actual cost cannot be sole measure of value, admitting that expenditures for special equipment, labor and management is the best measure of value since substitution partakes of the element of speculation, yet abnormally high or abnormally low costs or costs incurred during a time long since past or for things no longer efficient cannot be the true measure of actual present-day worth of the properties for which just compensation must be fixed. Redding, In re (1921) 19 CRC 267.

The best evidence of development costs consists of showing what the costs actually amounted to during a reasonable development period and should be applied in all cases where it is possible to determine the nature and extent of actual losses, if any, during such development period. Redding, In re (1921) 19 CRC 267, 293.

Investment in advance of present needs.—In rate proceeding cost of canal enlarged beyond present needs may be appraised upon the basis of the cost of that portion of canal reasonably necessary for service to present consumers. Foothill Ditch Co., In re (1928) 32 CRC 44.

Work in progress.—Construction work in progress as of date of valuation should be included in reproduction cost new and reflected thereby in the figure of just compensation. San Francisco, In re (1929) 33 CRC 202.

Preliminary organization.—Within reasonable bounds preliminary organization expense is proper item to be included in reproduction cost new. San Francisco, In re (1929) 33 CRC 202.

Cost of acquisition of land disallowed in determination of just compensation where such amount as may be claimed is amply covered by liberal allowance for organization expense and other general overheads. San Francisco, In re (1929) 33 CRC 202.

7. —— —— CONSUMERS' ADVANCES

Consumers' advances in aid of construction being available to utility without payment of interest will be treated as proper deduction in determining rate base. Southern Calif. Gas Co., In re (1928) 32 CRC 379.

8. —— AMOUNT AND VALUE OF SECURITIES

It is not the practice to use as rate base the amount of securities outstanding, nor figures carried in fixed capital accounts in a utility's books unless, in the commission's opinion, such figures, at time of rate fixing, represent rea-sion, 203 A.2d 515, 204 Pa.Super. 102, 1964.

52. —— Findings of commission, hearing and determination

Public Utility Commission was presumed to have considered effect of suspension of tariff supplement in fixing final gas rates, and was not required to make a specific monetary allowance for a calculated loss allegedly due to suspension. City of Pittsburgh v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 222 A.2d 395, 208 Pa.Super. 260, 1966.

Where Public Utility Commission had sufficient evidence before it in approving rate increase for steam heating company, even though defective in certain respects, to reach conclusion that proposed rates were just and reasonable and that fair value of utility's property would support proposed increase in rates, no specific finding of fair value or fair rate of return was necessary. Penn Sheraton Hotel v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 184 A.2d 324, 198 Pa.Super. 618, 1962.

54. —— Presumption and burden of proof

Shippers who attacked intrastate freight rate had burden of proof in showing that rates were unreasonable. Deitch Co. v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 203 A.2d 515, 204 Pa.Super. 102, 1964.

Burden is upon utility company seeking rate increase to establish all basic facts necessary for consideration by the Public Utility Commission. Sayre Land Co. v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 175 A.2d 307, 195 Pa.Super. 417, 1961, affirmed 185 A.2d 325, 409 Pa. 556.

62. Review

Where complainants in rate proceeding did not raise any question concerning original cost of gas utility's property before Public Utility Commission or in their appeal petitions, they ordinarily could not raise such question on appeal. City of Pittsburgh v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 222 A.2d 395, 208 Pa.Super. 260, 1966.

§ 1151. Valuation of property of a public utility

The commission may, after reasonable notice and hearing, ascertain and fix the fair value of the whole or any part of the property of any public utility, in so far as the same is material to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the commission, and may make revaluations from time to time and ascertain the fair value of all new construction, extensions, and additions to the property of any public utility. When any public utility furnishes more than one of the different types of utility service enumerated in paragraph seventeen of section two of this act,[1] the commission shall segregate the property used and useful in furnishing each type of such service, and shall not consider the property of such public utility as a unit in determining the value of the property of such public utility for the purpose of fixing rates. In fixing any rate of a public utility engaged exclusively in common carriage by motor vehicles, the commission may, in lieu of other standards established by law, fix the fair return by relating the fair and reasonable operating expenses, depreciation, taxes and other costs of furnishing service to carrier operating revenues. As amended 1963, Aug. 1, P.L. 449, § 1; 1965, Dec. 22, P.L. 1165, § 1, effective in 90 days.

Section 2 of act 1965, Dec. 22, P.L. 1165, provided that the act should take effect in ninety days.

Section 2 of the act of 1963 provided that the act should take effect in ninety days.

3. Valuation—In general

Public Utility Commission acted within its power in rate proceeding in refusing to reduce gas utility's trended original cost measures of value to extent of investment tax credit as too speculative. City of Pittsburgh v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 222 A.2d 395, 208 Pa.Super. 260, 1966.

Public Utility Commission's treatment in rate proceeding of investment tax credit as a reduction in cost of gas utility's property and deduction of unamortized portion thereof from original and trended cost measures on value was not an abuse of discretion. Id.

In determining fair value of physical plant of steam heating company, one measure of value, against which depreciation is accrued, is original cost of construction, that is, cost when first devoted to public service, which does not include future costs of removal. Penn Sheraton Hotel v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 184 A.2d 324, 198 Pa.Super. 618, 1962.

Negative salvage actually incurred by steam heating company, either upon actual retirement of property without replacement or upon replacement of item of property, is entitled to consideration in rate proceeding. Id.

6. —— Fair value, valuation

The Public Utility Commission is not bound to any specific formula to determine fair value, but it cannot take only one factor as the formula; it need not give equal weight to all measures of fair value, but neither can it weigh fair value only by one consideration. Scranton Steam Heat Co. v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 167 A.2d 693, 194 Pa.Super. 143, 1961, modified on other grounds, 176 A.2d 86, 405 Pa. 397.

24. Reproduction cost—In general

Reproduction cost of utility's facilities is factor which must be considered and weighed by public utility commission in arriving at fair value for rate-making purposes, and only reason for according little or no weight to such cost is when facilities have become so obsolete as to make highly improbable and unlikely the facilities' reproduction. Scranton Steam Heat Co. v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 176 A.2d 86, 405 Pa. 397, 1962.

The Public Utility Commission should have considered original cost of construction and cost of reproduction and

Honorable Barry Jackson,

House Judiciary Committee,
House of Representatives,
Juneau, Alaska

Dear Barry:

A constituent of mine, Mr. John Mlaker, recommends an express provision in proposed PSC legislation to curb discriminatory rate practices.

I am taking the liberty of enclosing Mr. Mlaker's letter to me of March 7, and his suggested statutory language, for consideration by your committee.

Sincerely,

Mr. Joe Josephson
Alaska State Legislature
Pouch V
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Dear Joe:

Several Public Service Commission bills have been or perhaps will be introduced in both Alaska Legislative Houses. It appears that one of these bills in original or amended form will pass during this session.

In the past several years many of Alaska's public utilities have been guilty of a variety of discriminatory rate practices involving kick-backs, "special rates", give-aways, differential subsidies, etc. The practices take many forms but collectively they amount to taking a little bit extra from the vast majority of consumers in order to subsidize and attract potential new customers.

Attached is a section lifted from the Public Service Commission portion of the North Carolina Code. If this language is contained in any new Alaskan P.S.C. Bill, then the situations I have outlined could be prevented in the future. The North Carolina Code has been widely cited for its forthrightness and for its defense of the public interest. It could well be adopted in Alaska.

Those of us in Anchorage who have struggled with this situation for many months are very hopeful that you will work toward making these provisions a part of a new P.S.C. Bill.

Respectfully yours,

John Mlakar

NORTH CAROLINA CODE

Sec. 62-140

(a) No public utility shall, as to rates or services, make or grant any unreasonable preference or advantage to any person or subject any person to any unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage. No public utility shall establish or maintain any unreasonable difference as to rates or services either as between localities or as between classes of service. The Commission may determine any questions of fact arising under this section.

(b) The Commission shall make reasonable and just rules and regulations.

(1) To prevent discrimination in the rates or services of public utilities.

(2) To prevent the giving, paying or receiving of any rebate or bonus, directly or indirectly, or misleading or deceiving the public in any manner as to rates charged for the services of public utilities.

(c) No public utility shall offer or pay any compensation or consideration or furnish any equipment to secure the installation or adoption of the use of such utility service except upon filing of a schedule of such compensation or consideration or equipment to be furnished and approval thereof by the Commission, and offering such compensation, consideration or equipment to all persons within the same classification using or applying for such public utility service; provided, in considering the reasonableness of any such schedule filed by a public utility the Commission shall consider, among other things, evidence of consideration or compensation paid by any competitor, regulated or non-regulated, of the public utility to secure the installation or adoption of the use of such competitors service.

Sec. 42.05.171(b). FINAL ORDERS OF THE COMMISSION. No final order of the commission compelling affirmative action, denying a right or privilege, or granting a right or privilege over protest of an interested party may be entered by the commission without giving opportunity to be heard, including, if requested by the public utility or any interested party, a public oral hearing.

Sec. 42.05.171(c). DECISIONS. The commission shall make reports in writing on all proceedings under this chapter in which hearings are held. Each report shall state the commission's findings, the basis for the findings, and conclusions together with its decision and order. All reports shall be entered of record and copies shall be furnished to all the parties to the proceedings.

Sec. 42.05.431(c). AUDIT OF ACCOUNTS. An audit made by a certified public accountant, or by a person approved by the commission, shall be accepted by the commission as prima facie correct. (§ 17 ch 199 SLA 1959)

Excerpts from U. S. Supreme Court Statements on Rate Making Value, 1909–1942

Willcox v Consolidated Gas Co. 212 US 19:

There must be a fair return upon the reasonable value of the property at the time it is being used for the public. . . . And we concur with the court below in holding that the value of the property is to be determined as of the time when the inquiry is made regarding the rates. If the property, which legally enters into the consideration of the question of rates, has increased in value since it was acquired, the company is entitled to the benefit of such increase.

Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 US 352, 33 S Ct 729:

The making of a just return for the use of the property involves the recognition of its fair value if it be more than its cost. The property is held in private ownership and it is that property, and not the original cost of it, of which the owner may not be deprived without due process of law.

Denver v Denver Union Water Co. 246 US 178, PUR1918C 640:

What we have said establishes the propriety of estimating complainant's property on the basis of present market values as to land, and reproduction cost, less depreciation, as to structures.

Bluefield Water Works & Improv. Co. v West Virginia Pub. Service Commission, 262 US 679, PUR1923D 11:

The record clearly shows that the commission in arriving at its final figure did not accord proper, if any, weight to the greatly enhanced costs of construction in 1920 over those prevailing about 1915 and before the war, as established by uncontradicted evidence; and the company's detailed estimated cost of reproduction new, less depreciation, at 1920 prices, appears to have been wholly disregarded. This was erroneous.

Missouri ex rel. Southwestern Bell Teleph. Co. v Missouri Pub. Service Commission, 262 US 276, PUR1923C 193:

It is impossible to ascertain what will amount to a fair return upon properties devoted to public service without giving consideration to the cost of labor, supplies, etc., at the time the investigation is made. An honest and intelligent forecast of probable future values made upon a view of all the relevant circumstances is essential. If the highly important element of present costs is wholly disregarded such a forecast becomes impossible. Estimates for tomorrow ignore prices of today.

McCardle v Indianapolis Water Co. 272 US 400, PUR1927A 15:

But in determining present value, consideration must be given to prices and wages prevailing at the time of the investigation; and, in the light of all the circumstances, there must be an honest and intelligent forecast as to probable price and wage levels during a reasonable period in the immediate future. In every confiscation case, the future as well as the present must be regarded. It must be determined whether the rates complained of are yielding and will yield, over and above the amounts required to pay taxes and proper operating charges, a sum sufficient to constitute just compensation for the use of the property employed to furnish the service; that is, a reasonable rate of return on the value of the property at the time of the investigation and for a reasonable time in the immediate future.

St. Louis & O'Fallon R. Co. v United States, 279 US 461, PUR1929C 161:

The question on which the [Interstate Commerce] Commission divided is this: When seeking to ascertain the value of railroad property for recapture purposes, must it give consideration to current, or reproduction, costs? The weight to be accorded thereto is not the matter before us. No doubt there are some, perhaps many, railroads the ultimate value of which should be placed far below the sum necessary for reproduction. But Congress has directed that values shall be fixed upon a consideration of present costs along with all other pertinent facts; and this mandate must be obeyed.

United R. & Electric Co. v West, 280 US 234, PUR1930A 225:

The allowance for annual depreciation made by the commission was based upon cost. The court of appeals held that this was erroneous and that it should have been based upon present value. The court's view of the matter was plainly right. OVERRULED BY HOPE CASE 1944.

Los Angeles Gas & E. Co. v California R. Commission, 289 US 287, PUR1933C 229:

We approach the decision of the particular questions thus presented in the light of the general principles this court has frequently declared. We have emphasized the distinctive function of the court. We do not sit as a board of revision, but to enforce constitutional rights. . . . The legislative discretion implied in the rate-making power necessarily extends to the entire legislative process, embracing the method used in reaching the legislative determination as well as that determination itself. We are not concerned with either, so long as constitutional limitations are not transgressed. When the legislative method is disclosed, it may have a definite bearing upon the validity of the result reached, but the judicial function does not go beyond the decision of the constitutional question. That question is whether the rates as fixed are confiscatory.

West v Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. 295 US 662, 8 PUR NS 433:

When the property itself is taken by the exertion of the power of eminent domain, just compensation is its value at the time of the taking. So, where by legislation prescribing rates or charges the use of the property is taken, just compensation assured by these constitutional provisions is a reasonable rate of return upon that value. To an extent value must be a matter of sound judgment, involving fact data. To substitute for such factors as historical cost and cost of reproduction, a "translator" of dollar value obtained by the use of price trend indices, serves only to confuse the problem and to increase its difficulty, and may well lead to results anything but accurate and fair. . . .

We agree, therefore, with the view of the district court, that the method was inapt and improper, is not calculated to obtain a fair or accurate result, and should not be employed in the valuation of utility plants for rate-making purposes.

Federal Power Commission v Natural Gas Pipeline Co. of America, 315 US 575, 42 PUR NS 129:

The Constitution does not bind rate-making bodies to the service of any single formula or combination of formulas. Agencies to whom this legislative power has been delegated are free, within the ambit of their statutory authority, to make the pragmatic adjustments which may be called for by particular circumstances. Once a fair hearing has been given, proper findings made, and other statutory requirements satisfied, the courts cannot intervene in the absence of a clear showing that the limits of due process have been overstepped. If the commission's order, as applied to the facts before it and viewed in its entirety, produces no arbitrary result, our inquiry is at an end.

raised whether the conventional case-by-case approach of conventional utility rate making based on production cost was a practical or equitable approach. He criticized the "end use" theory of the majority opinion (which stressed results rather than formula used to attain it) as a form of reasoning based on the end justifying the means. He said that the prudent investment theory of the rate-making approach in the majority opinion, while meritorious in usual utility rate cases, "has no rational application when there is no such relationship between investment and capacity to serve." He viewed gas as a commodity, similar to coal, a wasting asset available at a market price. Many of the difficulties foreseen by Justice Jackson in attempting to apply utility rate case methods to gas production proved prophetic in the subsequent experience of the Federal Power Commission, as witnessed in the Phillips Petroleum Company decision, post p. 562.

Present Status of Fair Value Rule

Some economic authorities looked upon the Hope decision as signalling the end of the "fair return on fair value rule" followed since Smyth v Ames. Thus, Professor James Bonbright said, in 1948, that the rule had ceased to be the "law of the land," although conceding that it might still be followed by those states wishing to do so (38 American Economic Review, Supplement 455).

Nearly a decade later, Joslin and Miller were noting that the "weary old formula" was still "the dominant concept in rate regulation" ("Public Utility Rate Regulation: A Reexamination," G. Stanley Joslin and Arthur S. Miller (1957) 43 Virginia Law Review 1027, 1049).

Two decades later, the death knell forecasts for the "fair return on fair value" rule still seemed very much premature, notwithstanding attempts of several commissions to follow a "revenue requirements" approach rather than a direct return on a physical rate base. See "Utility Regulatory Climate in Florida," Lewis W. Petteway, 54 Public Utilities Fortnightly 563 (October 28, 1954).

Cost of capital and comparable earnings techniques as means for determining rate of return on equity have been discussed by several leading economists in the field: "Principles of Public Utility Rates" (Chapter XV) by James C. Bonbright (1961) Columbia University Press; "Economics of Regulation" (Chapter IX) Charles F. Phillips, Jr. (1965), Irwin Press, Homewood, Illinois; "Public Utility Economics"

(Chapter IX) by Paul J. Garfield and Wallace F. Lovejoy (1964) Prentice-Hall, Inc. According to Harold Leventhal (since made judge of the U. S. circuit court of appeals, District of Columbia) "The role of rate of return was elevated from that of a featured player to that of star." Quoted in "Vitality of the Comparable Earnings Standard for Regulation of Utilities in a Growth Economy" 75 Yale Law Journal 989, 990 (1965).

As of mid-1967, thirty-four state commissions followed either the original cost formula or the closely allied net investment or so-called "Prudent investment" method of determining rate valuation. These include Alabama, Alaska, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wyoming.

Sixteen states, including several of the largest, still make use of valuation factors; such as, reproduction cost, "current replacement," and other concepts associated with present fair value. But some of these combine the present fair value determination with original cost, getting a compromise or judgment figure for the rate base. In fact, only in Ohio is reproduction cost a sole consideration. Other states in this category include: Arizona, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Minnesota (jurisdiction limited), Missouri (which also uses original cost as an alternative check), Montana, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, and Texas (regulation by municipalities). In New York, two different statutes require different treatment of telephone and transit utilities (present fair value) as compared with gas and electric utilities (original cost). In Iowa, a recently created regulatory commission had not yet become committed, although previously "present fair value" was used by court decree.

RATE OF RETURN CONSIDERATIONS GENERALLY

In the recent proceeding on an increased wholesale rate of Pan Handle Eastern Pipe Line Company:

> The commission said that many variables should be taken into account in setting the proper rate of return, and that its responsibility to fix just and reasonable rates could not be fulfilled so far as rate of return is concerned simply by applying ready-made formulae. It pointed out that no two pipelines are alike in their operations, and capital structure, but these things have a bearing on the rate of return that should be allowed. Similarly, it said return allowance is influenced by an assessment of general financial business and economic conditions, and an appraisal of the relative risks with which investors view the pipeline industry. Finally, the financial needs of the company and its investors must be weighed in the light of the commission's responsibility under the Natural Gas Act to assure consumers a continuing supply of gas at the lowest reasonable rates. Consequently, the commission rejected the idea that a return allowance can be fixed simply by an arithmetical calculation. It said that it is nevertheless helpful to consider separately debt, preferred stock, and common equity, prior to consideration of the overall return.

Even today, however, the so-called "fair-value" rule of rate making has not yet suffered its oft-anticipated complete demise. Indeed, in several jurisdictions it has been restored to some measure of its earlier vigor by the action of a commission, a court, or a legislature. But one would be naive in assuming that the partial restoration has been based on any conversion of influential political interests to a reproduction-cost or present-value theory of rate making as distinct from an actual-cost theory. Almost certainly, the revival of the fair-value doctrine has been based on another consideration: namely, on the failure of the actual-cost standard, in its traditional version, to make any direct allowance for the serious, continuing price inflation. Rightly or wrongly, many fair-minded people have regarded this failure as grossly unfair to public utility stockholders, on the ground that it measures the stockholder investment in terms of dollars that have lost their former significance.

Adoption of a fair-value measure of the rate base has been seen as the most expedient way by which to make amends for this failure. For this purpose "fair value" is not identified with a reproduction-cost rate base, since such a rate base would often confer upon the common stockholders enhancements in the dollar values of their equity securities far in excess of any increases in general price levels or in current "costs of living." But in line with traditions followed at times (though rejected at other times) by the Supreme Court, "fair value" has been interpreted to mean a rate base which, while derived in large measure from actual costs, gives some "equitable consideration" to estimates of depreciated replacement cost. And in this way, what goes under the name of the "fair-value" rule can really be turned into a liberalized version of the actual-cost rule, the liberalization taking the form of some equitable upward adjustment in the rate base as an offset to price inflation.

RATE CASES RELATED TO FAIR VALUE

ILLINOIS Re Northern Ill. Water Corp. (1959) 26 PUR 3d 497

The commission, in arriving at a fair value rate base, must use reasonable judgment in determining the weight to be given reproduction cost, original cost, depreciation, book cost, work in progress, materials and supplies and cash working capital.

Re General Telephone Co. of Illinois (1959) 29 PUR 3d 369

Fair value is not original cost depreciated, nor is it reproduction cost depreciated, nor is it a matter of formulas, but it is rather a matter of reasonable judgment based upon the consideration of all relevant facts.

DELAWARE Re Wilmington Suburban Water Corp. (1962) 47 PUR 3d 175

In determining a fair value rate base, the commission must give weight to original cost depreciated and reproduction cost depreciated.

MONTANA Re Little Chicago Water Co. (1962) 46 PUR 3d 300

In fixing a fair value rate base, the commission should consider reproduction new less depreciation, assessment values, original cost, prudent investment, and certain public records.

NEW MEXICO Re Moyston (Hobbs Gas Co.) (1963) 48 PUR 3d 459

A fair value rate base for a gas utility was computed on the basis of the average of original cost and reproduction cost.

OHIO Re Cleveland Electric Illum. Co. (1963) 47 PUR 3d 44

A fair rate of return is a figure which must be determined under Ohio law on the reproduction cost new less depreciation rate base.

TEXAS Re Houston Nat. Gas Corp. (1963) 52 PUR 3d 244

The commission, in fixing rates, must determine a reasonable balance between original cost less book depreciation and replacement cost new less an adjustment for present age and condition, and in doing so it must use its own judgment and discretion.

PENNSYLVANIA Re Penn. Pub. Utility Commission v. Columbia Gas of Penn., Inc. (1965) 60 PUR 3d 385

Trended original cost figures were accepted for rate base purposes where a comparison of the 5-year average trended original cost study with actual construction experience of 10.1 per cent of the total footage of mains pointed up the reasonableness of the 5-year estimates.

ILLINOIS Commerce Commission v. Peoples Gas, Light & Coke Co. (1953) 99 PUR NS 361

The Commission, in determining present fair value for rate making, is required to consider current economic conditions, price levels, reproduction cost, and original cost as well as the cost of improvements and the probable earning capacity of the property under prescribed rates.

NORTH CAROLINA Re Piedmont Nat. Gas Co. (1961) 40 PUR 3d 62

Upon evidence of average net original cost of a gas company's properties of $17 million, net property value at the end of the period of $19,600,000, and trended original cost of $31,500,000, and considering that no evidence of reconstruction new cost or present-day values by visual appraisal was offered, the commission fixed a fair value rate base of $20,300,000.

Re Nantahala Power & Light Co. (1963) 51 PUR 3d 96

The commission, in establishing a fair value rate base, considered all the evidence offered relating thereto, including, but not limited to, trended cost, reproduction cost new, original cost, average net investment, allocated cost, actual investment, normal depreciated value, and accelerated depreciation value.

ALABAMA Re Southern Bell Teleph. & Telegr. Co. (1963) 47 PUR 3d 77

A reasonable value rate base was determined for a telephone company by giving one-third weight to original cost depreciated, one-third weight to reproduction cost depreciated, and one-third weight to invested capital.

INDIANA Re Indiana Bell Teleph. Co. (1950) 85 PUR NS 129

The commission, indetermining the fair value of utility property, must give consideration to all bases of valuation which may be presented and to the reasonable cost of bringing the property to its present state of efficiency.

MISSOURI Missouri ex rel. Dyer v. Missouri P.S.C. (1960) 37 PUR 3d 507

The commission did not act arbitrarily or unreasonably in fixing a rate base calculated upon the fair value of utility properties (an amount between net original cost and net reproduction cost).

Public Utilities FORTNIGHTLY

Regulators Have Problems

A plethora of controversial issues continues to confront public utilities: safety and reliability, promotional practices, profit incentives, rate base and rate of return, a high money market. These, of course, are merely illustrative, not a comprehensive list. If the utilities are concerned, so too are their regulators. A leading state commissioner here gives his views on these and other problems with which both management and regulation must deal.

By The Honorable JAMES W. KARBER
PRESIDENT, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF REGULATORY UTILITY COMMISSIONERS

REGULATION of rates of utilities of all kinds—gas, electric, telephone, water, sewer, and transportation—has long been a matter of major concern both to the utilities affected and their customers, and to the general public. While there are many who quarrel with specific regulatory actions, I think it is safe to say that there are few who believe the utilities, their customers, and the public would be better off without regulation of any kind.

Any regulatory agency, be it federal or state, must at all times keep in mind that it has a responsibility not only to the general public and to the customers of utilities, but — because of these — to the utilities as well. If utilities are required by regulatory agencies to maintain rates that are not fully compensatory or that do not provide a fair rate of return, in my opinion, the agency or commission is doing the general public and the utility customers a disservice as great, in fact, as it would if it permitted the utility to maintain rates that provided a higher rate of return than could reasonably be justified.

IN other words, a regulatory agency must maintain a balance. The ideal rate should be one that would deliver the best possible gas, electricity, telephone, water, sewer, or transportation services to the general public at the lowest possible cost and still yield a rate of return to the utility high enough to enable the utility to obtain additional capital at reasonable costs. For this is mandatory if the utility is to provide modern equipment, improve its methods of production, and provide its investors with a reasonable return on their investment. When the commission permits an adequate return, it provides to the utility the wherewithal for research and development and for capital expenditures. The utility, in turn, obtains the means of achieving more efficient and less costly production with the end result that it will provide the most efficient service at the lowest rate to its customers.

Much of any commission's work is done continuously through intimate knowledge and surveillance of the utilities it regulates with informal action through negotiation much more frequently than formal action through rate cases. But the same ground rules apply and these are most easily stated in terms of the formal rate case.

Rate Determination

How should regulatory agencies proceed to determine what rates are the best for the utilities, their customers, and the general public? It would be ideal if all of the agencies, state and federal, could follow the same guidelines in any rate case and have the same rules and regulations. Although during the passing of years there has been an increasing uniformity in the treatment of utility rates among regulatory agencies, there still, of course, is not complete uniformity.

However, in considering the propriety of earnings levels, the first requisite, I believe, is that the various regulatory agencies give appropriate consideration to the effects of past and currently renewing inflation either in the rate base or rate of return. In Illinois, for example, we are required to do so by developing a fair value rate base. This involves many questions like the following:

What is the original cost of the property?

What is the original cost depreciated?

What is the reproduction cost new and depreciated and how was it determined? What is the per cent condition that should be applied?

What is the weight that should be given to original cost depreciated and to reproduction cost new depreciated in determining fair value?

What consideration should be given to property under construction but not put into the working plant accounts on the books of the company?

What consideration should be given to property used and useful in the operations of the company and to contributions in aid of construction?

All of these factors enter into the determination of the fair value on which a rate of return must be based.

Fixing the Rate Base

Original cost of the property of any utility that keeps its books in accordance with the accounting rules and regulations of a commission should be easily determined as should be the depreciation accrued thereon. Reproduction cost new, however, cannot be determined with absolute finality. The method of trending prices has often been used to determine reproduction cost new. This is a theoretical method that employs appropriate tables. A more accurate but expensive and time-consuming method, the "unit cost" method, prices an inventory of plant units of the various types at current costs.

Both methods, however, run into difficulty when it comes to determining the reproduction cost new of property that is no longer manufactured. There is, of course, really no point in determining the reproduction cost new of property that cannot be replaced. Consequently, under these circumstances it seems proper either to determine the present-day cost of some given equipment that would be an adequate replacement, or to accept a trended value of the original cost.

Determination of the useful condition of the various plant units is also a difficult problem. This is a question of judging the degree of obsolescence of any given property; i.e., its per cent operating condition. In my opinion, the per cent condition can be adequately determined only through the physical inspection of the property by qualified engineers.

It is also necessary in any computation of either original cost or reproduction cost new of a utility's property to separate the property that is used and useful in the operations of the company from property that is not useful or that has no use in the immediate future.

Having determined the basic factors that comprise fair value, it is necessary for the regulatory agency to decide the weights to be given to

The Honorable James W. Karber is chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission. Chairman Karber is a graduate of the University of Illinois, AB ('34) and LLB ('36). He was appointed to the commission in 1961 and in that same year moved up to the position of chairman. He is also currently serving as the president of the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners.

original cost depreciated and reproduction cost new depreciated. No fixed formula has been found that can be applied for such a weighting. It thus becomes a judgment factor for any commission to consider the relative age of the property, the per cent increase to original cost of reproduction cost new, the per cent condition of the property, the degree of obsolescence, the condition of the economy, and the probable future trend of costs of materials and labor. There are no set percentages that can be assigned in the weighting of original cost depreciated and reproduction cost new depreciated. Rather, this must be determined on its own merits in each particular proceeding.

Fair value of the plant accounts, of course, does not comprise the entire rate base. To determine the full rate base there must be added to fair value, working capital, including a sufficient amount of cash to meet the needs of the utility (after considering the cash made available through unpaid taxes), materials and supplies, property under construction (to the extent that "interest during construction" is short of a full return), and contributions in aid of construction. Although there has been much discussion pro and con, I think there should be deducted from the base all contributions in aid of construction made by other than the utility or its stockholders that the utility is not obligated to refund.

Considering Expenses

In any rate proceedings, after determining a rate base, it is necessary to determine the per cent of return a given utility is earning on its rate base under the rates in effect at the time of any proposed change in rates. For this purpose a determination must be made of the current income and expenses resulting from the so-called "above the line" operations of the utility. An analysis of income for any given so-called "test year" presents no great problem, for it is relatively simple to determine the income derived from property devoted to utility operation and to eliminate nonoperating income.

In considering allowable expenses, however, questions arise as to the proper treatment of the deferred federal income taxes resulting from accelerated depreciation; that is, whether the "flow through" method or the "normalization" method should be used. Also, the unamortized portion of the investment credit is of concern, and so is the question of charitable contributions — should they be allowed as deductions?

The Federal Power Commission and the state commissions themselves have differed in the handling of taxes. At the present time, the Federal Power Commission seems to have adopted the so-called "flow through" method. In the state of Illinois, however, we have considered it reasonable to normalize these tax items and to allow reasonable contributions to charity, but we deduct from the rate base the unamortized investment credit.

Rates are made for the future and, accordingly, operating expenses, in my opinion, must be adjusted to reflect as much as possible all known changes that have occurred during any so-called test year. They must also be adjusted for any changes that it is known will occur in the immediate future, such as wages or tax increases, changes in expense from putting new equipment into operation, and changes in the cost of fuel or materials used for maintenance. In some instances, we have adjusted for increases both in operating revenues because of a natural increasing trend in the sale of the utility's product and in expenses because of a period of inflation. These latter two decisions, however, are made only after deep study and serious consideration.

In some instances, utilities have prepared their operating expenses on the basis of forecasts; e.g., an "estimated year." In allowing for an increase in revenue or an increase in expenses because of natural growth, we have in a way used an estimated year. However, the adjustment of actual past operating results for known changes is quite different from forecasting future results. I believe a regulatory agency is not justified in adjusting either operating income or operating expenses, except for known changes that have occurred or that it is known, with a degree of certainty, will occur.

Needless to say, operating revenues of a utility should be adjusted to annualize all rate changes that have occurred during the test year or that are known will occur thereafter. Wage and tax changes which have occurred during the year or are known to be impending are other items which it is appropriate to annualize.

Rate of Return

THUS far, fair value, a rate base, and an adjusted income account of a utility for a test year have been determined and we must now apply a rate of return. The current rate of return of a utility is simply a matter of division. How then does a regulatory agency determine the reasonableness of such a rate of return? How does it evaluate the present-day cost of capital, the capital structure of the utility, the impact of the rate of return of companies in other fields, and the rate of return necessary to permit the utility to compete for capital successfully with other industries?

In order to conclude what rate of return a given utility should be allowed to earn, regulators of utilities must constantly reappraise their policies in view of currently changing economic conditions. What might have been a reasonable and fair rate of return yesterday obviously may not be a fair rate of return today. Nor is a rate of return susceptible to precise determination. The Supreme Court of the United States said in the Bluefield case, "A public utility is entitled to such rates as will permit it to earn a return on the value of the property which it employs for the convenience of the public equal to that generally being made at the same time in the same general parts of the country on investments in other business undertakings which are attended by corresponding risks and uncertainties . . ."[1] It is no mean problem, however, to determine just what businesses do have corresponding risks and uncertainties.

The actual capitalization of the utility is a factor in determining a rate of return. I can find no ideal capitalization ratios. Reasonable capitalization figures may well vary with the industry and company under review and there is no set combination of debt, preferred stock, and common equity which is universally appropriate. In a number of instances, in attempting to justify a rate of return, utilities have used a so-called ideal capitalization rather than their current capitalization. I do not think, however, that a utility is entitled in determining a rate of return to do other than use its capitalization as it exists or as it may be in the foreseeable future.

Cost of Money

THE cost of capital is an important factor in determining a rate of return and it is important that this phase be carefully developed. But the regulator's problem goes much further. In addition to determining the cost of capital, he must Appraise the rate of return earned by comparable industries, with due regard for differences in risk.

Make a judgment as to what rate of return is required to bring the most service to utility users at the lowest rates.

Make allowance for a reasonable profit above the confiscatory level in the rate of return.

Keep at least one eye fixed on the competitive sources of energy, gas, and communications.

Above all, the rate of return must be sufficient to permit the utility to earn the money it needs to continue to research and provide new and better technologies with a resultant decrease in the costs of operation and a greater service to the utility's users — sufficient, in short, to stimulate management through profit incentives for better performance to the consumer benefit.

The Rate Case

IT is the duty of the utility in any rate proceeding to present competent and qualified witnesses and complete and thorough testimony and evidence. The burden of proof is upon the utility and no utility should appear before a regulatory agency in a rate proceeding without first having prepared all of its exhibits as to original cost and reproduction cost (both gross and depreciated), income and expense, rate of return, and all of the other factors that go into the making of a rate case.

On the other hand, it is the duty of the commission to provide a full and fair hearing; to require any interveners in the case to supply full and complete evidence to sustain their positions; and to provide a staff that is experienced, capable, and competent so that it may properly analyze all of the testimony and evidence submitted in the case and in turn introduce competent witnesses, testimony, and evidence upon all of which the commission may base its decision.

Commissioners cannot be expected to have the time or, in some instances, the specialized knowledge to analyze thoroughly all of the important problems that arise in a rate case. That is why it is so important that every commission have at its disposal personnel that can supply the expertise necessary to supply the commission with facts and accurate data upon which it may base its conclusions.

Beyond the immediate case, commission regulation must be capable of formulating policies and plans which are applicable to present as well as future situations. There must be a constant review of all relevant factors and an overall policy for all utilities, with allowance for particular situations. Regulatory agencies must gear their thinking to the present space age and give up what now may be nonapplicable traditional thinking. The utility must have a rate of return that reflects the present buying power of money; that will permit financially sound and economic operations; that will stimulate management to maintain operational efficiency and introduce new and improved service; and that will give the most adequate and satisfactory service at the most reasonable rates—the primary goal of all regulatory agencies.

It should be remembered, however, that regulatory commissions cannot fix rates so as to guarantee a specific rate of return. Their function is to fix rates which will permit the utility to earn a reasonable rate of return by its own efforts under the economic conditions existing at the time the rates are set.

Promotional Practices and Allowances

ALTHOUGH the establishment of fair and reasonable rates and the issues that arise in connection therewith are major regulatory problems, there are other problems that contribute to the regulator's headache and for which solutions must be found. One of these is the use of promotional practices and allowances.

Until recently, cases concerning the legality and propriety of promotional practices and allowances usually involved complaints of the oil industry against local gas distributors and dealt with limited and specific promotional practices. Now, increasing competition between electric and gas companies has caused the issue to spread to many states throughout the country and to the federal government.

I believe that the Illinois Commerce Commission was the first to begin a general investigation of promotional practices. That investigation is continuing and we hope we can issue a final order before the end of this year. Now, general investigations are being made by other states and by agencies of the federal government.

PROMOTIONAL practices themselves are a matter of definition and the first problem of any regulatory agency is to define and determine just what it considers promotional practices to be. I would define promotional practices to include, but not necessarily to be limited to

1. Any payment by a public utility, its subsidiaries, or its agent (in cash, merchandise, or labor) donation, gift, subsidy, conveyance, transfer, or other consideration to any person, corporation, association, or group for the purpose or evident design of inducing the recipient to

a) Purchase or use the utility's service or to use additional service;
b) Purchase or install equipment, facilities, or appliances designed to use such utility service;
c) Specify the purchase or installation of equipment, facilities, or appliances designed to use such utility service.

2. Free (or less than cost) installation, operation, or maintenance of equipment, facilities, or appliances.
3. Free or less than cost service.
4. Free or less than cost nonutility professional service.
5. Payment of cash or other consideration to architects, builders, subdividers, developers, or others in the same category for work done on property not owned by the utility for the purpose of inducing the recipient to purchase or use the utility service or to use additional service.
6. Financing equipment, facilities, or appliances at less than cost.
7. Guaranties as to the maximum level of bills.
8. Financing assistance—the extension of credit, making of a loan or an investment, directly or indirectly to any person or corporation by any means whatsoever for the purpose or evident design of inducing said person or corporation to select or use the service (or additional service) of such public utility or to select or purchase equipment, facilities, or appliances designed to use such utility service, including, without limitation, loans, advances, guaranties, investments, leases, sale, and repurchase or sale and leaseback agreements, sales on open account, and conditional or instalment sales contracts.
9. Special discounts.
10. Trade-in allowances at greater than value.
11. Discounts or allowances for the purchase or service of air-conditioning or heating equipment, stoves, refrigerators, washing machines, dryers, or other appliances.
12. Installation of free wiring or piping.
13. Advertising or contributing to advertising on account of a customer or a potential user of the utility's service.
14. Replacement allowances for equipment, facilities, or appliances.
15. Free certificates or premiums offered for or with the purchase of equipment, facilities, or appliances.
16. Sales bonuses and allowances to dealers for the sale of equipment, facilities, or appliances.
17. Free heat correction programs.
18. Special rates for the installation of equipment facilities or appliances.

THERE are those who believe that promotional practices should be entirely a matter for control by the utilities themselves and I would agree that ideally this would occur. But the fact of the matter is that too frequently competing utilities have tried to outrival each other in promotional offers to the detriment of those users who are not in position to share the favors. Under these circumstances, it is the duty of the regulator to see that promotional practices are beneficial both to the utility and the customer, are uniformly applied, and comply with federal and state laws.

During the early course of the investigation in Illinois, the commission concluded that certain promotional practices and allowances should be prohibited. Consequently, on July 12, 1967, the commission issued an interim order [2] prohibiting electric and gas utilities from

1. Making any loans, guarantee of loans or grants to any corporation, group, or individual for building construction; or engaging, in any way, in the investment in or financing of any nonutility property;
2. Making any promotional allowance to any corporation, group, or individual for any promotional, advertising, or publicity purpose of any of said corporation, group, or individual;
3. Making any payment, or extending any other consideration, to architects, engineers, builders, subdividers, or others for work done on property not owned by said electric or gas utility and/or its subsidiary or affiliated companies;
4. Purchasing or acquiring for the purpose of leasing or renting to others, or making loans to others for the purchase of, any electric or gas equipment, appliances, or facilities, the cost of which exceeds $1,000 for each specific location without first having obtained the approval of this commission.

[2] Re Promotional Practices of Electric and Gas Utilities (Ill 1967) 69 PUR3d 317.

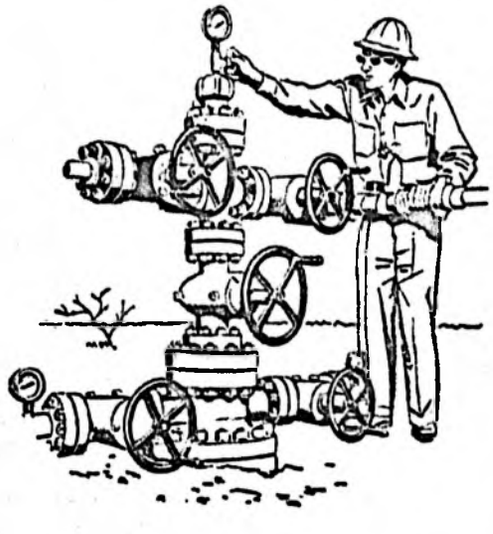
The commission also ordered that promotional practices and allowances should be available on a uniform basis and should not be unlawfully discriminatory.

THE final decision and order of the Illinois commission in any individual case will be determined by the answers to the following questions:

1. Are the promotional practices and allowances economically feasible?
2. Are they to the best interest of the utility, its customers, and the public?
3. Are they uniformly granted?
4. Do they violate any federal or state anti-trust laws?
5. Are they unlawfully discriminatory?

The Issue of Safety

BECAUSE of the current emphasis placed on pipeline safety by the Congress of the United States, safety has been pushed to the forefront in Illinois, as well as other states as an important regulatory problem. Last February 27th, I testified before a House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with respect to the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners' position on pending gas safety legislation. Under SB 1166, the Department of Transportation will be given authority to establish minimum safety standards for the construction, operation, and maintenance of all gas systems in the United States. The Senate bill, as passed by that body, will permit the states to continue supervision of pipeline safety, provided the state agencies will enter into an agreement with the Department of Transportation to carry out the minimum safety requirements of the federal law. Final control, however, will rest with the Department of Transportation.



If you were to listen to the proponents of the federal safety bills you might draw the conclusion that regulation of safety was something new. This is not the case, however, because when many of the public utility laws across the land were first passed, such laws provided for general supervision of safety. In our own case, the Illinois Commerce Commission or its predecessors have had jurisdiction of safety since at least 1914. The Illinois commission has carried out its responsibility of assuring public safety in a number of ways. First, before a public utility can expand its service into a new area, the utility must obtain a certificate of public convenience and necessity from the commission. A part of the evidence deemed necessary in such certificate cases is the construction, operation, and maintenance specifications for the mains. Secondly, the commission's investigation of accidents, review of accident reports, inspection of pipelines, investigation of complaints, analyses of depreciation, and analyses of per cent of new physical condition during rate proceedings, keeps the commission and its staff advised as to the degree of maintenance and safety of the gas utility system operating in Illinois.

THIRDLY, the commission used the ASA (now referred to as USASI) B31.8 Code for Pressure Piping as its guide in construction and safety matters long before the commission officially adopted a mandatory version of this code as our General Order 192. We adopted General Order 192 last year to indicate to Congress that Illinois was supervising safety.

In carrying out our supervision of safety, only once in the last ten years have we found it necessary to suggest to a utility that a certain line was dangerous and should be removed from service. On a few occasions the staff has found that a degree of inspection on construction jobs to be too lax and the systems were not being installed in as good a condition as they could have been. But, these things are all history.

With respect to the future, the commission's action will be determined by what Congress decides with respect to safety legislation. If the vote by the Senate is an indication of what may happen, we will have some form of federal regulation.

ing price levels and is unrealistic and erroneous. Current cost accruals do not represent amounts expended for the rendition of service and should not be included in rates. Such depreciation would necessitate conjectural variations in the annual accrual. It would compel an involuntary contribution of capital by the ratepayers and require them to pay a return on capital contributed by them, resulting in an unwarranted profit to the utility. Ratepayers would sustain alone the impact of inflation.

In any event, said the commission, current cost depreciation is based upon a fiction since property taken out of service is not replaced in kind but by other and different property (34 PUR3d 257).

On appeal of this decision to the Kansas supreme court, the commission argued that the depreciation expense allowance is not intended to provide a surplus for replacing the original assets upon their retirement. The company argued that it sought only to recover through depreciation the value of its plant as it is consumed in the furnishing of service, in order that the integrity of the plant may be preserved. It said it could not do this by basing depreciation expense on plant investment made at preinflation price levels.

The purpose of annual depreciation, said the court, is to return to the investors the amount of their investment in the original plant. It is not intended to return the cost of reproducing a new plant when the old one is worn out. If the construction of a new plant requires additional capital, a fair rate of return will be allowed on the additional cost (51 PUR3d 113).

Present Customers Not to Be Burdened for Future Costs

The Wyoming commission allowed depreciation expense based on original cost of plant and denied any additional allowance to reflect current price levels. The company contended that when the original investment is returned through depreciation charges measured in current dollars, the stockholders are not recovering the full amount thereof. It asked for an additional allowance, to be set up as a capital reserve, prorated between debt and equity capital. It claimed a return on the portion allocated to common equity.

Any such additional allowance, said the commission, quoting from a Michigan commission decision (22 PUR3d 369), would involve an involuntary contribution of capital by the customers. Present customers who pay the legitimate costs of present service cannot be expected to pay additional sums which may be needed to provide plant to serve future customers. This is the responsibility of the investors. Moreover, the commission declared, to allow the company to create the proposed capital reserve and earn a return on it would require the customers to pay a return on capital contributed by them (23 PUR3d 68).

The Hawaii commission refused to authorize earnings at such a level as to accrue a depreciation fund to meet an anticipated higher equipment replacement cost than the actual cost of the equipment. Only the return of actual dollars in existing equipment is allowed. To grant an additional allowance, said the commission, would call for higher rates today for a future service and, in effect, would seek a return on capital paid in through these very rates in the future. Even if such a present-day extra burden in expenses were justified, the commission pointed out, it would be limited to the present worth of the future incremental higher replacement cost (40 PUR3d 140).

The District of Columbia commission observed that original cost is the conventional depreciation base approved by the weight of authority. Depreciation in theory, it pointed out, is unrelated to replacement because depreciation occurs whether or not the property is replaced. It would be unfair to the company to deny any depreciation expense simply because the company did not propose to replace the depreciating property. If a replacement cost basis were used and prices were rising, consumers would become involuntary investors though with no right to a return on their investment. What is even worse, they would thereafter be required to provide a fair return and depreciation allowance on capital which they themselves had contributed. Original cost, the commission held, is just and equitable for both investors and consumers (38 PUR3d 19).

The Virginia commission indicated that depreciation expense should be based on original cost and not on reproduction cost, because it would be unjust to make present consumers pay for new plant to be consumed by a future generation of consumers (19 PUR3d 1).

Rate of Return Provides for Inflation

A company before the Alaska commission argued for depreciation expense based on fair value. The commission found that this would be inequitable. Fair value, it explained, may be more or less than original cost. If fair value is set at less than cost, the investor is penalized by depreciation expense based on that value because he would not recover his cost. This would amount to confiscation. On the other hand, if fair value is set at more than cost and depreciation is based on that figure, the investor would recover more than his cost under the guise of depreciation expense, with a consequent understatement of the rate of return. The commission indicated that the rate of return is the proper place to make adjustments for inflation or attrition if any are required (62 PUR3d 113).

Cost Basis Recognized but Extra Accrual Suggested

The cost of an asset of a public utility is a prepaid operating expense to be apportioned as depreciation over the years of its life by some more or less systematic procedure, the Ohio supreme court declared. It is cost, not a higher or lower value, that is to be so apportioned whether value for rate-making purposes is determined on a reproduction cost new basis or otherwise. Thus, the court saw no occasion for any "hypothetical depreciation" allowance, as suggested by the company here concerned.

The court recognized, on the other hand, that where costs have risen, the depreciation charged on a cost basis will not be sufficient to replace an asset when it is used up. Theoretically, such depreciation should at that time have provided an amount sufficient to replace the used-up asset. The court indicated that where reproduction cost new less depreciation is higher than the book depreciated cost of an asset, some amount for annual depreciation probably should be allowed in addition to the annual depreciation expense. Probably for this reason, it was noted, an Ohio statute provides for "making reservations from the income for surplus, depreciation, and contingencies." In the instant case, however, it appeared that dividend requirements on the company's common stock were only 5 per cent while 7 per cent was allowed on the common equity. It was intimated that the extra 2 per cent might provide for any additional depreciation requirement (45 PUR3d 1).

Right to Restoration of Capital Recognized

The Iowa supreme court said the allowance for depreciation expense should be based on present value rather than original cost. Logic, the court pointed out, requires that the valuation for depreciation be consistent with the rate base, which was fair value in this case. It would do the utility company no good to set rates on a fair present value base if that base is then to be ignored and its value annually eroded away by the denial of an adequate depreciation expense allowance. The company's right properly considered, the court declared, should be the right to restoration of its invested capital (20 PUR3d 159). The court followed this decision in a 1964 case in which it indicated that it would be inequitable to refuse to permit a company to recover fair value over the remaining service life of its property (54 PUR3d 464).

CITY OF NOME STATEMENT IN OPPOSITION TO THE PASSAGE OF ANY PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION LEGISLATION THAT WOULD REGULATE OUR PUBLIC UTILITY SYSTEM.

Senate Commerce Committee
Mr. Chairman, Legislators:

We do not feel that there is any need for any legislation to regulate our utilities for the following reasons:

1. We are from a remote area where communication is difficult and expensive.

2. We do not have any utility problems that we cannot resolve on our own. Our utilities are protected by city ordinance against competition from within the city or outside of our city.

In 1954 the City of Nome purchased a privately owned power system paying two prices for it. At that time power was sold at a consumer cost of 15¢ per KWH down to 10¢ per KWH. Since that time we have built a new system, increased the voltage, increased load capacity capability, consequently resulting in improved service. Consumption has steadily increased, costs have steadily increased. Yet our rate has decreased to 10¢ and 7¢ per KWH over this 15-year period.

Democracy works best where we have strong local home rule governments, be it a village, a city, a county, or a borough.

The Public Service Commission legislation infringes on our local home rule government prerogatives and responsibilities. This would weaken local government.

In areas where problems do exist that cannot be resolved between factions, i.e. Chugach Electric and the City of Anchorage, we suggest legislation be prepared and enacted to resolve the problem, that specific problem.

While we are doing well with our utility we absolutely cannot afford the luxury of additional costs that we would obviously be confronted with as a result of Public Service Commission regulation. We have been told that PSC regulation will not cost us any money. Maybe it will not -- initially. But once PSC gets us in their grasp it is inevitable that costs will arise. You cannot prove otherwise. We have had ample experience with state government administering our affairs by remote control. When we need help we'll let you know about it. In the meantime we are doing fine with our utility.

HB186

CITY OF KETCHIKAN STATEMENT IN OPPOSITION TO THE PASSAGE OF SENATE BILL NUMBER 128

SENATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Submitted by Elmer B. Titus, Utilities Manager, on behalf of the City of Ketchikan, March 5, 1969

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee:

For the record, I am Elmer Titus, Manager of Ketchikan Public Utilities, City of Ketchikan, Alaska, representing the views of the City Council and the Advisory Board for Ketchikan Public Utilities.

The City of Ketchikan is opposed to the passage of Senate Bill 128, an act granting the Alaska Public Service Commission regulatory authority and jurisdiction over municipally-owned utilities.

Historically, public service commissions were created to provide for the regulation of utilities to protect the interest of the consumer-public from gouging and poor service from private utilities. The need for this type of protection for the public against privately-owned utilities is still apparent; however, since the consumer-public served by municipally-owned utilities is adequately protected by the regulation and control of locally elected government bodies, the need for such further regulation has not been demonstrated. Such regulation by the State of Alaska as proposed in SB 128, would, in our opinion, constitute an unnecessary interference in the management of cities affairs and create great additional expense in the operation of its utilities which could only result in higher rates for service to be paid by the consumer.

Article 10 of the State Constitution, Section 1, entitled "Purpose and Construction", was designed to allow local charter cities the maximum local control. Section Number 1 reads as follows:

> "The purpose of this article is to provide for maximum local self government with a minimum of local government units, and to prevent duplication of tax levying jurisdictions. A liberal construction shall be given to the powers of local government units."

The City Council of Ketchikan has been able to regulate and operate the municipally-owned utilities for a period of approximately 34 years and to provide to its people a good level of service at the lowest rates in Alaska, and at rates below the national average for residential electrical services. No private utility presently under the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission in Alaska can match this performance.

It would appear that the present duties now imposed on the commissioners will require as much time as the commissioners could reasonably be expected to give to their duties in view of the fact that the members will be paid $5,000 plus per diem and travel expenses. If the commission is further burdened with the duties set forth in S.B. 128 and are required to regulate power and light, telephone, telegraph, gas, oil, water and sewer throughout the state, such members will have to be placed on a full-time salary basis.

The proposed bill makes no provision for resolving conflicts which may occur between commission orders on the form of accounts and other records with requirements of federal agencies where licensing by such federal agency for hydro-electric projects carry with it certain record keeping and reporting requirements.

To regulate all the public utilities in Alaska, both private and municipally-owned, as required by this bill would be very costly. Thousands of dollars in additional expense would have to be borne by the consumers and tax payers of the State. In the absence of need for such regulation, particularly in the case of municipally-owned utilities, such expense cannot be justified at a time when the cities require every available dollar for their development and growth. Certainly the utilities of the City of Ketchikan cannot afford any additional expense to which it may be subjected if this bill is passed. In fact, with increased labor and material costs it has been a most difficult task in recent years to maintain a reasonable standard of service and carry debt service requirements without a general rate increase. Any additional expense brought about by regulation of its utilities by the State could very well require the City of Ketchikan to increase its rates for this purpose.

In order to operate, the bill requires all public utilities to obtain a certificate of public convenience and necessity. It is almost unthinkable that after 34 years of ownership and operation of the power and light, telephone and water utilities by the City of Ketchikan that its continued operation of these utilities would become dependent upon a certificate of convenience and necessity to be issued at the pleasure of an appointed commission. This right of franchise, which in effect this provides for, is in conflict with the City's Charter adopted under the Constitution and laws of the State of Alaska. The operation of the city-owned utilities is provided for in this Charter and, in fact, any sale of its utilities can be made only upon the affirmative vote of the majority of the qualified voters of the City.

Relating to rates and changes in rates, the Bill is in conflict with the Charter of the City of Ketchikan, wherein the power to fix rates and charges for public utility services is vested in the Council. Such Charter provision also prescribes the procedure. private utilities?

In conclusion it would appear that any act passed by the Legislature which would impose regulation by the Alaska Public Service Commission on municipally-owned utilities of charter cities would raise very serious legal questions. More important than the legal aspect is the fact that the need for regulating municipally-owned utilities does not exist, such regulation would be an expensive undertaking for both the State and the cities, and in the end would serve no useful purpose because municipal utilities are already regulated by city councils who are probably more conscientious and responsive to the requirements of its utility customers than any state commission.

We feel this bill is a continuing effort to legislate for a problem that has existed elsewhere that can and should be resolved by local communities.

I wish to express the appreciation of the City Council and the Ketchikan Public Utilities Advisory Board for the opportunity to be represented before the Committee, and to those appreciations I wish to add my own personal thanks for the Committee's courtesy.

Elmer B. Titus, Manager
Ketchikan Public Utilities

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS OF CSHB 202

The original HB 202 is identical to SB 128 (introduced by request of the governor), except for the exemption section (proposed AS 42.05.691). In the preparation of its committee substitute, the House Judiciary Committee considered the comments and suggestions numerous individuals presented at hearings and meetings held on the PSC bills, particularly the detailed written analyses of Don Hall, executive director of the Alaska Public Service Commission, and Karl Walter, Anchorage City Attorney. (It should also be noted that HB 188 and SB 54 are identical to each other. SB 54 is based on, and is very similar to, 1965 CSHB 138, as is 1967 HB 164.)

AS 42.05.010. This section implements the recommendation of Don Hall consistent with the practice in many other states where the state name precedes the commission name.

AS 42.05.020. This section is amended in the original bill to provide that the governor shall designate the chairman of the commission. The committee substitute amends the original bill by specifying that his term is four years rather than two years. The reason for this change is that two years seems like too short a term and by lengthening it the chairman is less subject to the pressures of politics.

AS 42.05.030. This section of the original bill is primarily concerned with providing for vacancies in the office of commissioner and specifies that they shall be filled by appointment by the governor and confirmed by the legislature. The committee substitute deletes some unnecessary language regarding the confirmation by the legislature (but confirmation will still be required).

AS 42.05.035. This section provides two methods of removal of commissioners. One is with the consent of a majority of the legislature and the other is for cause, such as incompetence or misconduct. The committee substitute does not change the original bill in this regard.

AS 42.05.040 is not amended by either the original HB 202 or the committee substitute. It ~~provides for a~~ states the professional qualifications required of commissioners.

AS 42.05.071. This section begins the entirely revised portion of the PSC chapter. The old sections 70 - 650 are repealed. Section 71 provides that two members of the commission constitute a quorum. Present law is silent on this point.

AS 42.05.081. This section requires the commissioner and, under the committee substitute, the executive director to take the oath of office required of principle officers of the state. The language in the original bill said each commissioner and "each person appointed to a civil executive office", which language is not appropriate to Alaska law.

AS 42.05.091 provides for compensation of the members. It gives them per diem and travel expenses and an annual salary of $6,000 (it was $5,000 in the original bill). The chairman of the commission however, is to serve fulltime and is entitled to the salary of a superior court judge.

AS 42.05.101. This section simply provides for a principal office and branch offices and requires the commission to have an official seal. The committee substitute does not change this section. ST RC 02

AS 42.05.111. This section specifies that the attorney general is legal counsel for the commission. The section is not amended by the committee substitute.

AS 42.05.121. This provides that the commission may employ an executive director, requires him to be an experienced administrator and the committee substitute adds the provision that he may be one of the commission members. The committee substitute deletes the authority to hire hearing officers. It also deletes some unnecessary language regarding appointment of personnel. Both the original bill and the substitute provide for contracting for the services of consultants. The following language should be added after the period on line 5 page 4 of CSHB 202: "The salary of the executive director may not exceed that of a superior court judge." this would prevent him from being paid the full salary for both the director

AS 42.05.131 is a section added by the committee substitute in order to protect against conflicts of interests of commissioners and employees. This provision is a slightly broadened version of [illegible] sec. 45 in HB 188.

AS 42.05.141 specifies the general powers and duties of the commission. The committee substitute makes some minor language changes in this section. One change is the deletion of the word "supervise" so that the commission will regulate utilities but not supervise them. (This section is a combination of AS 42.10.070 and California Public Utilities Code, sec. 701.)

AS 42.05.151 gives the commission authority to adopt regulations, requires the adoption of certain types of procedural regulations, and gives the commission and employees certain administrative authority. The committee substitute expands slightly upon the type of regulations the commission is required to promulgate, specifically mentioning the handling of procedural motions by a single commissioner. The committee substitute also allows for representation by out-of-state attorneys in accordance with Civil Rule 81. The committee substitute further provides for each commissioner acting alone to issue orders on procedural motions; this should expedite much of the commission's proceedings. ~~(the original version is a combination of AS 42.10.070 and California Public Utilities Code, sec. 701)~~ (Part of this section is based on AS 42.07.150(b).)

AS 42.05.161. This section specifies that the Administrative Procedure Act applies to regulations adopted by the commission but does not apply to adjudicatory proceedings of the commission. It is felt that the provisions of the APA regarding accusations, ~~and~~ statements of issues and hearing officers are not appropriate to proceedings of the PSC, such as rate hearings, ~~etc.~~ The committee substitute deletes some of the original bill's exceptions for the types of regulations required to be filed under the APA. (The deleted portion of (b) was based on the federal APA – 5 USC, § 553.)

AS 42.05.171. This deals with investigations and hearings. The committee substitute makes a distinction between formal investigations and hearings and informal ones, requiring that for formal proceedings two or more commissioners must be present. It also requires a commissioner to hear or read the record before participating ~~or~~ in making a decision of the commission. (The original section was adapted from the Calif. Public Utility Code, sec. 310. of Pa. Stat., Title 66, sec. 458.) The committee substitute deletes a section (derived from Pa. Stat., Title 66, sec. 458) which is AS 42.05.181 in the original bill, dealing with hearing officers and agents. The intent is to do away with the position of hearing officer and require hearings to be held by the commissioners themselves. ~~(Part of this section is based on AS 42.07.150(b).)~~

AS 42.05.181. This requires, providing an opportunity to be heard before a final order of the commission may issue.

AS 42.05.191. This requires the commission to make reports on all proceedings held under this chapter.

AS 42.05.201 requires reports, orders, etc., to be in writing and requires that they be published and be given proper distribution.

AS 42.05.211 simply requires the publication of annual reports by the commission. (IT is the same as AS 42.07.140.)

AS 42.05.221 requires a public utility to get a certificate of convenience and nedessity before operating as a utility. It also provides for the commission to eliminate the duplication of facilities. The committee substitute adds a subsection which grants grandfather rights to public utilities not presently required to have a certificate of convenience and necessity. ST RC.03 Subsection (c) should be amended by adding the following language after the period in line 16 on page 8 of CSHB 202: "Such a certificate is subject to modification where there are areas of conflict with other utilities."

(Subsection (a) is similar to present AS 42.05.193, and subsection (b) was taken from proposed AS 42.05.245 in 1967HB 164.)

Jo
Re

AS 42.05.231. This section provides for the filing of applications in the form and with the information required by the commission. The committee substitute deletes the requirement that the application be "verified", believing that this is unnecessary.

AS 42.05.241. This section requires that the utility be able to provide the utility services applied for and allows the commission to specify conditions for the issuance of a certificate. (It is adapted from proposed AS 42.05.265 in 1967 HB 164.)

AS 42.05.251. This section, which is added by the committee substitute, provides that public utilities have the right to use public streets, etc., upon the payment of a reasonable fee and upon reasonable conditions which the city or borough requires. Disputes as to reasonableness are to be decided by the commission.

AS 42.05.261. This section allows for the discontinuance of a service only when the commission finds that the continued service is no longer required by public convenience and necessity. It also allows the commission to require the reinstatement of service previously discontinued, again if the public convenience and necessity require it.

AS 42.05.271. This section sets out the basis for ~~a~~ the commission's ordering the modification, suspension, or revocation of a certificate. The committee substitute adds a requirement that failure to comply with the provisions of the chapter or failure to comply with conditions of the certificate must be a wilful failure.

AS 42.05.281 prohibits the transfer of a certificate ~~but not~~ without prior approval of the commission.

AS 42.05.291. This section requires public utilities to furnish and maintain adequate, efficient, safe and reasonable service and facilities, and allows the commission to set standards for this. The committee substitute adds the requirement that the commission's standards shall conform to standard practices of the industry. Under this section, the commission also has the authority to require certain services or facilities or certain repairs, extensions, etc., which are reasonably necessary for the public.

AS 42.05.301 prohibits discrimination in service but allows the establishment of reasonable classifications of service. (This was adapted from Pa. Stat., Title 66, sec. 1172. Cf. present AS 42.05.460.)

AS 42.05.311 requires a public utility having certain distribution or transmission facilities such as conduits, poles, pipelines, etc., to allow the joint use and interconnection of these facilities upon being paid a reasonable compensation, when the public necessity and convenience requires. This section also requires that the tariff of a public utility include rules setting out the terms by which its customers may hook up with certain facilities. The committee substitute deletes, as being unnecessary to state, the provision in the original bill that dealt with the contents of these rules, with regard to the customers aiding in construction of certain facilities. (This section is a revised version of present AS 42.05.360.)

AS 42.05.321 provides for the commission's resolution of conflicts when there is a failure to agree upon joint use or interconnection. (This section is a revised version of present AS 42.05.370.)

AS 42.05.331 gives the commission authority to set standards for the measurement of utility services. SLA 03 (Presently AS 42.05.410.)

AS 42.05.341 requires the commission to provide for periodotic testing and certification of meter standards. (Presently AS 42.05.420.)

AS 42.05.351 requires the commission to provide for the examination and testing of measuring appliances used by a utility's customer. The committee substitute changes this section by making it identical to chapter 4, SLA 1969, (amending present AS 42.05.430) which will be repealed if the Public Service Commission bill passes.

AS 42.05.361 requires each public utility to file its complete tariff with the commission and requires that these tariffs be kept available for public inspection. (Cf. present AS 42.05.470.) The committee substitute changes this latter requirement so that the tariffs need be kept only at the principle office in each community served. The committee substitute also classifies special arrangement contracts which affect rates and charges as special tariffs. This classification is a suggestion of Karl Walter, as is the slightly expanded basis for the commission's rejection of the filing of a ~~the~~ tariff (in (c) of this section).

AS 42.05.371 prohibits deviation from a filed tariff. (Cf. present AS42.05.510.)

AS 42.05.381 requires rates to be just and reasonable. (Cf. present AS42.05.190.) The committee substitute adds a subsection which specifies that a municipality is entitled to a fair and reasonable rate of return in establishing the rates of a municipally owned and operated utility. In order to put municipal utilities on a par with other utilities, a municipality may include a reasonable street permit fee in determining the utility revenue requirements. (This new provision is also a suggestion of Karl Walter.)

AS 42.05.391 prohibits discrimination in rates. However, it provides that the rate charged by a municipality for a utility service furnished beyond the corporate limits is not necessarily unjustly discriminatory solely because it is ~~might be~~ different from the rate charged for service within the corporate ~~for~~ limits. The committee substitute deletes the provision amplifying sp. on the discrimination prohibition, the feeling being that the point was adequately covered by subsection (a). The substitute also adds a provision prohibiting other types of discrimination, such as by the payment of ~~rebates~~ or bonuses or by furnishing special facilities or services. The furnishing of equipment must conform to a tariff approved by the commission. (Cf. present AS 42.05.190; Calif. Public Utility Code, sec. 461; Pa. Stat., Title 66, sec. 1141.)

AS 42.05.401. This gives the commission authority to settle disputes as to the apportionment of joint rates. The committee substitute deletes the provision which allows the commission to employ consultants and require utilities to pay the fees and expenses of consultants, believing that this authority is already covered in other sections of the bill.

AS 42.05.411 requires commission approval for filing of new tariffs and changes in old ones. (Cf. present AS 42.05.490.)

AS 42.05.421 allows for commission investigation of a tariff change. (Cf. ~~present AS 42.05.490.~~ 46 USC § 845 and proposed AS 42.05.345 in 1967 HB 164.) The committee substitute changes the seven-month period for which the commission may suspend the operation of a tariff change to five months. ~~The~~ commission may require a utility to place in escrow all amounts received by reason of an increased rate. The committee substitute deletes the provision that required the utility to pay interest on amounts collected which have been found to be unreasonable or unlawful and which are required to be returned to the consumer.

AS 42.05.431. This section simply gives the commission power to determine just and reasonable rates, classifications, regulation, practices, etc. (Cf. present AS 42.05.520.) The committee substitute adds a provision allowing the municipalities to covenant with bond holders with regard to rates of municipally owned utilities. This additional provision was picked up from sec. 335 of HB 188. ~~(which bill is identical to SB 54).~~

The committee substitute deletes two sections in the original House Bill 202 which provided for reparations and the recovery of reparation payments. (They were taken from Calif. Public Utility Code, secs. 734 and 735.)

AS 42.05.441 provides for the commission's ~~determination of the~~ valuation of property of ~~the~~ a public utility. The original bill required the commission to be guided primarily by the elements of original cost, less accrued depreciation. The committee substitute changes this by requiring the commission to be guided primarily by the average of original cost, less accrued depreciation, and reproduction cost, less physical deprication. (There is a typographical error on page 19, line 19 of the committee substitute; there should be a comma after the word depreciation in that line.)

AS 42.05.451. The original bill required public utilities to use an accounting system prescribed by the commission and the committee substitute allows the utility to use a generally recognized system of public utility accounting; if the utility does not do this then the commission will prescribe for the accounting system. (Cf. present AS 42.05.290 & 310.) This section also requires each utility to submit an annual report to the commission. The original bill required this to be done within 75 days after the close of the utility's annual accounting period; the committee substitute changes this to 90 days and allows additional time to be granted upon a showing of good cause. (The committee substitute provision regarding the accounting system was picked up from HB 188, sec. 435.)

AS 42.05.461. This section allows the commission to require a utility to maintain a continuing inventory of all units of tangible property, showing the current location of the property, the original cost of the property, etc.

AS 42.05.471 requires utilities to keep depreciation accounts. The commission is to determine and allow depreciation expense in fixing rates, etc. (cf. present AS 42.05.340.) The committee substitute adds a provision which allows a new utility to amortize operating losses, if any, which it has incurred in developing its market and system.

AS 42.05.481 requires utilities to keep accounts of subsidiaries separate and prohibits consideration of the property, expense and revenue of a subsidiary in the determination of rates and charges. (cf. present AS 42.05.300.)

AS 42.05.491 simply requires that records and accounts be kept in ~~this state~~ Alaska. (cf. Pa. Stat., Title 66, sec. 1214.)

AS 42.05.501 gives the commission access at all reasonable times to the books of a utility and, in the committee substitute, the affiliated interests of a utility. (cf. present AS 42.05.540.)

AS 42.05.511 gives the commission authority to investigate management of a public utility to determine whether unreasonable practices are found to exist which adversely affect the cost or quality of service of the public utility. SR RUCS

AS 42.05.521 gives the commission authority to direct a utility to cease paying dividends on its common stock when the capital of the utility is impaired, or, under the committee substitute, when it might become impaired by a continuation of current practices. (This new language was suggested by Karl Walter. Cf. proposed AS 42.05.535 in 1967 HB 164.)

AS 42.05.531 requires surplus and profits to be distributed in accordance with bylaws and governing ordinances. (Cf. present AS 42.05.200.) The committee substitute deletes the reference to operating margins, the committee believing that to be an inappropriate term here. The substitute also deletes two sentences allowing the commission to govern the distribution of surplus and profits through regulation. This deletion implements a suggestion of Karl Walter, and it is believed that once the utility has made a profit the distribution of that profit is not a proper concern of the commission.

AS 42.05.541 simply gives regulations and orders adopted under this chapter the effect of law.

AS 42.05.551 allows for judicial review in accordance with the specified sections of the Administrative Procedure Act and provides for superior-court enforcement of this chapter. (Cf. proposed AS 42.05.555 in 1967 HB 164.)

AS 42.05.561 makes violation of a provision of this chapter or a regulation or order issued under it a misdemeanor. The committee substitute simply cleans up the language of the section deleting unnecessary words.

AS 42.05.571 - 591 establish a system of civil penalties for violations of this chapter or orders or regulations issued under it. These sections are adopted primarily from the California Public Utility Code.

Sections 5312 - 5317, with some modifications reflecting Washington Public Utility Code, section 80.04.405. They allow the commission to impose a ~~simple~~ civil penalty as a means of enforcement. The committee substitute makes these provisions applicable only to a public utility and not to individuals.

AS 42.05.601 requires the attorney general to bring actions to recover penalties for imposed fines under this chapter and specifies that they shall be paid to the commission and deposited by it in the general fund.

AS 42.05.611 provides that penalties imposed under this chapter are cumulative. The committee substitute clarifies this language and specifies that a criminal prosecution is not a bar to an action of a recovery of a civil penalty.

AS 42.05.621 allows for the joining of actions ~~of~~ for recovery ~~from a~~ of penalty ~~and~~ joining of applications for enforcement of commission orders and joining of appeals from orders of the commission. (Cf. proposed AS 42.05.575 in 1967 HB 164.)

AS 42.05.631 gives public utilities the power of eminent domain for public utility purposes. (Taken from proposed AS 42.05.585 in 1967 HB 164.)

AS 42.05.641. Subsection (a) of this section in the original bill was a carry over from existing section 620. The committee substitute deletes that subsection in the belief that it is no longer necessary to provide for pre-1959 grants or franchises. The language that remains in the committee substitute provides that orders, decisions, etc., of the commission prevail over charters, franchises, ordinances, etc., of a local government when there is a conflict. (Cf. proposed AS 42.05.587 in 1967 HB 164.)

AS 42.05.651. This section simply provides for the allocation among the parties, including the commission, of the cost of a ~~public~~ hearing. This allocation itself is subject to a hearing at the request of any party. (Cf. present AS 42.05.610.)

AS 42.05.661. In the original bill this section required the payment of regulatory fees by all utilities. The committee substitute deletes the provision for regulatory fees, and retains only the provision for the submission of an application fee which will be paid to the commission and deposited into the general fund.

AS 42.05.671. To make the intent of this section clearer the committee substitute picks up a provision from existing section 180 of the PSC chapter providing that information in the possession of the commission is public. The language, from the original bill (which was taken from AS 02.05.240), then provides for a person making a written objection to public disclosure of certain information.

AS 42.05.681. This section, which is unchanged in the committee substitute, protects the certificates already issued to public utilities grossing less than $25,000, which utilities were exempted from regulation by section 2, chapter 188 SLA 1968.

AS 42.05.691 is designed to fit the general plan of greater jurisdiction and authority of the commission. By allowing classification of utilities the commission can provide regulatory requirements that will fit the circumstances of utility variations.

AS 42.05.701. In this section the definition of "public utility" includes municipally owned utilities and, to a limited extent in the committee substitute, pipelines carrying products for sale or resale to a fully regulated public utility. (This latter language was proposed by Paul Robison.) Both the original bill and the committee substitute contain definitions of "public" and "affiliated interests", which terms are not defined in existing law. The definition of "affiliated interests" is taken from Washington Statute 80.16.010. Upon the recommendation of Don Hall the committee substitute also includes a definition of the word "tariff". In the definition of "public utility" the reference to steam in sub-paragraph (2)(C) to "steam" refers to steam heat, as it does in (2)(E). (The present definition section is AS 42.05.640.)

AS 42.05.711. In its comparable section, SB 128 provided for the exemption of municipally owned and operated utilities from the provisions regarding the regulation of rates, financial management regulations, and the requirement of a regulatory fees. (Cf. present AS 42.05.645 and Pa. Stat., Title 66, sec. 1141.) The original HB 202 deleted the exemption regarding rates. The committee substitute deletes the regulatory-fee exemption because the provision for regulatory fees itself has been deleted. The committee substitute also deletes the exemption from the financial ~~advantage~~ management regulations since it is considered appropriate that a municipally owned and operated utilities ~~is to~~ be subject to PSC jurisdiction in this regard. ¶ Section 7 of the committee substitute (which was section ~~five~~ 5 of the original HB 202) provides for the continuation of ~~the~~ presently pending proceedings and for the continuation of current certificates, orders, etc. The committee substitute adds a sentence continuing the existing rates, charges, etc., of municipally owned and operated utilities unless otherwise ordered by the commission under this act.

Sections 8 and 9 of the committee substitute have no counterpart in the original bill. They provide that the limitations in Title 29, relating to the granting of franchises and regulation of public utilities, apply to home rule boroughs and cities, respectively. ¶ Section 10 of the committee substitute limits the jurisdiction of cities over public utilities regulated under AS 42.05, the Public Service Commission Act. It also makes clear that utilities have the right to use the streets upon the payment of a reasonable permit fee and on reasonable terms and with reasonable exceptions the city council requires. These provisions with regard to cities also apply to boroughs, under AS 07.

Sections 11 and 12 of the committee substitute make existing language consistent with the limitations established in section 10.

Section 13 of the committee substitute sets July 1, 1969 as the effective date of the act. The original bill contained an immediate effective date clause.

Sectional Analysis of SB 128 and HB 202 ~~(Insofar as the House Bill corresponds with the Senate Bill)~~ By George Bernard Assist. Attorney General

The following brief sectional analysis of SB 128 covers primarily those sections which make substantial changes in the existing law or language. This bill was drafted on the premise that

(1) the public interest requires that the commission's jurisdiction should encompass all public utilities whether publicly owned or otherwise, and whether large or small;

(2) regulation should be directed to the benefit of the public; ~~and~~ the creation of utility monopolies and other benefits accruing to the utilities are the results of good regulation, but not the purpose;

(3) good regulation in the public interest can only be accomplished where the regulatory body has ~~the~~ SUFFICIENT jurisdiction and authority to do whatever is necessary to accomplish it;

(4) special exemptions from the commission's jurisdiction create regulatory problems which go far beyond the usual intended objective of the exemption and substantially disrupt the regulatory processes; more orderly, uniform and fair regulation will result if the question of ~~regulatory need~~ the extent of regulation is left to the discretion of the commission;

(5) the commissioners appointed to the commission will be competent in that capacity;

(6) the commissioners will exercise good judgment in regulating; and

(7) the commission will have an adequate and competent staff.

By Phil ~~The Attorney~~ General office,

In drafting this bill, the changes in existing law and the additions were researched against the laws of other states, primarily California and Pennsylvania. In two instances, federal laws were reviewed for appropriate language. In no case was a statute of another state used without analysis as to its effect and application

Reference was also made to HB 164 which was introduced in the Alaska legislature in 1967.

The Alaska Public Service Commission members and executive director were consulted on most of the proposed changes and their suggestions were incorporated to the extent deemed appropriate.

The draftsman of the has considerable background in utility operations and regulation having been employed in Alaska as a professional electrical engineer in electric power development for 11 years, a licensed electrical contractor in Alaska for several years and as an Assistant Attorney General for 3 1/2 years in work with both federal and state regulatory agencies.

* Sec. 42.05.035. REMOVAL OF COMMISSIONERS.

The present law (AS 42.05.030) and the amended sec. 30 included in this bill both provide for tenure of six years for commission appointees. The commissioners do not serve at the pleasure of the governor. Since the commission acts in a quasi judicial capacity this tenure provides an essential freedom from possible sudden and sweeping changes in commission make-up and policies.

At the same time it is necessary to provide means of removal which will assure that commission members are capable of doing and actually do their assigned jobs.

Sec. 35 provides two means of removal; one is removal for cause; the second is removal in a manner similar to that in which installed. The first means is fairly standard in most state PSC Acts where tenure is provided. The second is not generally found in other states. It is included here for the purpose of assuring that the commission will be accountable to some degree for its policies. This bill grants the commission a very broad sweep of authority and jurisdiction. Theoretically the commission could adopt a particular policy which would be unreasonably burdensome to a segment of the industry or a segment of the public but which nevertheless would not be reversible in court or constitute a technical "cause" for removal.

Admittedly this second removal method can be subject to political abuse but only in the case where an administration and a majority of the legislature act in consort. Some additional safety factor could be provided if the simple majority of the legislature was changed to a 2/3 majority.

* Sec. 42.05.071. QUORUM.

The present PSC law is silent as to the number of commissioners necessary to constitute a quorum.

* Sec. 42.05.091. COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF COMMISSION.

There is little doubt that the public would be better served by a full-time commission. But this is not to say that a part-time commission cannot do an adequate job at the present time if it is composed of competent and concientious members. Furthermore, the workload of the commission is not so substantial at present as to require a full-time commission. However the commissioners should be paid for their time. This is not presently the case. An annual salary of $5,000 as provided in this bill is the very minimum which should be considered.

* Sec. 42.05.121. EMPLOYMENT AND COMPENSATION OF COMMISSION PERSONNEL.

The commission presently employs an executive director who is not a member of the commission itself. This feature is carried over into this bill.

The separation between the functions of the commissioners and the functions of the commission's staff is an important one. Without such separation the staff is substantially precluded from representing the public interest in a proceeding before the commission. Fundamentally this is a separation of the decisional process from the investigation and prosecution process.

In formal proceedings before public service commissions of other states and before federal regulatory commissions such as the F.T.C. and the F.M.C. the commission staff acts substantially in the capacity of an independent party, developing and putting on its own case before the commission. It occasionally happens that the staff will even appeal a decision of the commission. Such participation by the staff is subject to the same rules of procedure as are all other parties including the matter of ex-parte communications with the commission. The courts have been quick to strike down commission decisions where it has been shown that substantive ex-parte communications have occurred between the commission and its staff.

This section also gives the commission the authority to employ its own hearing officers. Tne existing statute, AS 42.05.160, does likewise; however since the commissions adjudicatory procedures are presently prescribed by the A.P.A. (See AS 42.05.150) and since the A.P.A. requires hearing officers to be appointed by the governor, there is serious question whether the commission does, in fact, have such authority.

Sec. 42.05.161(a) of this bill removes the commission's adjudicatory procedures from the A.P.A. except those sections pertaining to judicial review.

* Sec. 42.05.121(b).

This section makes it clear that the commission may employ consultants etc. Such authority is essential. The commission cannot reasonably hire a staff of full-time employees that will have all of the expertise necessary for a complex rate case, etc. The use of consulting firms which specialize in such matters is a vital necessity.

* Sec. 42.05.131. ANNUAL REPORT.

This section is adopted from AS 42.07.140 and replaces AS 42.-05.140.

* Sec. 42.05.151. GENERAL POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION.

This section is designed to establish in one place the general regulatory powers and duties of the commission and to set them out in clear, concise language. Under the present chapter AS 42.05 some of these powers are merely inferential and others are found scattered through the provisions relating to regulation of rates, services, etc.

This section was put together in part from the California Public Utilities Code, sec. 701, and in part from AS 42.10.070. In both instances the referred statutes were modified to fit the needs of this bill.

* Sec. 42.05.151. ADMINISTRATIVE AUTHORITY OF COMMISSION.

This section covers the commissions authority in procedural and administrative functions. Again, it has no specific counterpart in the present P.S.C. law.

It has been adopted in part from AS 42.07.150(b). The last sentence of subsec. (b) of this section 42.05.151 provides that "technical rules of evidence need not apply to investigations, hearings. . . ." This relaxed evidentiary provision is the guideline of nearly all state public service commissions as well as federal regulatory agencies.

The present law requires the commission to comply with the adjudicatory procedures provided in the A.P.A. However, as now constituted these procedures are neither appropriate nor adaptable to the procedures which should be followed by a utility regulatory agency. It is the common practice to give the agency the authority to prescribe its own procedural rules. The problem was recognized and its solution was provided with respect to the Alaska Transportation Commission when that commission was established in 1966.

* Sec. 42.05.161. APPLICATION OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT.

Subsection (a) removes the commission's adjudicatory procedures from the coverage of the A.P.A. except for judicial review.

* Sec. 42.05.171. INVESTIGATIONS AND HEARINGS -- ACTIONS DEEMED THOSE OF THE COMMISSION.

No section similar to this one is found in the current PSC law. It is adapted from the California Public Utility Code, sec. 310. Similar provisions are also found in several other state utility codes (e.g. Penna. Statutes, Title 66 Sec. 458). Under the present workload it is anticipated that the commission itself will be able to hear most of the cases. The commission should have the authority to do so without also requiring the services of a hearing officer. In other words a commissioner should be able to act in the capacity of a hearing officer (See proposed section 42.05.181(c)).

At the same time it is not realistic to conclude that the full commission shall be able to hear all cases. Therefore to cover as many eventualities as possible it is provided that any one or more of the commissioner may hear a case.

The idea of requiring at least two commissioners to be present when the commission hears a case was rejected as unnecessary since a majority confirmation is required of any decision or opinion. Such a requirement would also preclude concurrent hearings by the commission on different cases and would cause considerable delay or disruption or necessitate starting over again if one of the commissioners had to withdraw from a hearing for any reason.

* Sec. 42.05.181. HEARING OFFICERS AND AGENTS.

This section has no counterpart in our existing PSC law. Subsec. (a) is a substantially modified version of the Pennsylvania Code, Title 66, sec. 458.

One main objective of this section is to give the commission the authority to hear a proceeding without the need for a separate hearing officer. At the same time it provides guidelines and authority for using hearing officers when desired.

Although this bill does not necessarily ~~complete~~ contemplate the need to regularly use hearing offices at this time, it will probably be necessary within the near future. Occassion may also arise at present when the use of a hearing office would be highly beneficial. Therefore this bill gives the commission to the authority to employ hearing officers and delineates the authority of such employees.

* Sec. 42.05.191. CERTIFICATE REQUIRED.

Subsection (a) of this section is similar to AS 42.05.193 of the current PSC law which is here modified to reflect suggestions of the commission.

Subsection (b) is taken from proposed sec. 42.05.245 of House Bill No. 164 (1967).

The language in subsec. (c) was settled upon in discussions with the executive director of the commission. It is considered advisable to permit the commission to exercise considerable discretion in attempting to resolve the overlapping service area problems. Therefore the language does not attempt to pin down any specific remedy. It is sufficiently broad to even allow the commission to act as an arbitrator or order arbitration if that appears to be the best approach.

The question of grandfather rights was considered. However no such provision was included. Constitutional due process of law requires the commission to recognize and provide for the rights of prior operating utilities and any provision requiring such certification will only tend to compound the service area delineation problems where overlapping facilities are found.

* Sec. 42.05.211 CONDITIONS OF ISSUANCE.

This section is adapted from House Bill No. 164, sec. 265 (1967) and modified.

* Sec. 42.05.221. DISCONTINUANCE OR ABANDONMENT ---

The present PSC law does not proscribe abandonment or discontinuance of service by a utility.

This proposed section restricts abandonment or discontinuance unless approved by the commission after public hearing.

* Sec. 42.05.231. MODIFICATION, SUSPENSION OR REVOCATION OF CERTIFICATES.

The commission can presently issue certificates but can do nothing about them thereafter. The authority provided in this section is necessary to resolve problems of overlapping service areas, as an enforcement tool, and to assure adequate and reasonable service.

* Sec. 42.05.251. STANDARDS OF SERVICE AND FACILITIES.

This section brings together in revised form the service standards currently prescribed in AS 42.05.190 and 460. Subsecs. (a) and (b) of this section reflect similar provisions of Pennsylvania statutes, Title 66, sec. 1171. Subsecs. (c) and (d) are modified versions of AS 42.-05.460.

* Sec. 42.05.261. DISCRIMINATION IN SERVICE.

This section separates the discrimination provisions relating to service, from "standards". It is adapted from Pennsylvania statutes Title 66, sec. 1172.

A service discrimination proscription is currently found in AS 42.05.460.

* Sec. 42.05.271. JOINT USE AND INTERCONNECTION OF FACILITIES.

This section is a modified version of AS 42.05.360. The revisions are those suggested by the commission.

* Sec. 42.05.281. FAILURE TO AGREE UPON JOINT USE OR INTERCONNECTION.

This section is a revised form of AS 42.05.370.

* Sec. 42.05.291. STANDARDS FOR MEASUREMENT.

Currently AS 42.05.410.

* Sec. 42.05.301. TESTING OF METER STANDARDS.

Currently AS 42.05.420.

* Sec. 42.05.311. TESTING OF APPLICANCES.

Currently AS 42.05.430. One change should be made in this section as written. The third sentence, providing for use of testing appliance by the consumer, is improper. The revision recommended by Don Hall in his comments of March 4, 1969 would be appropriate.

* Sec. 42.05.321. TARIFFS, FILING AND INSPECTION.

The provisions of subsec. (a) of this section are found to some extent in AS 42.05.470.

Subsecs. (b) and (c) are new and self-explanatory.

* Sec. 42.05.331. ADHERENCE TO TARIFFS.

This section is similar in its provisions to AS 42.05.510.

* Sec. 42.05.341. RATES TO BE JUST AND REASONABLE.

The provisions of this section are pulled out of AS 42.05.190 and modified.

* Sec. 42.05.351. DISCRIMINATION IN RATES.

Subsec. (a) is a revised version of provisions found in AS 42.05.-190.

Subsec. (b) is similar to the provisions of California Public Utility Code, sec. 461.

Subsec. (c) is a revision of Pennsylvania Statute, Title 66, sec. 1141.

* Sec. 42.05.361. APPORTIONMENT OF JOINT RATES.

No similar provision is contained in the present PSC law. Its principal application would arise in connection with telephone toll separation charges.

* Sec. 42.05.371. Tariff Changes.

Basically subsection (a) of this section is contained in AS 42.05.491.

Subsections (b) and (c) are new and self explanatory.

* Sec. 42.05.381. Suspension of Tariff Filing or Contract.

The Commission does not presently have suspension authority.

Subsections (a) and (b) are similar to provisions found in 46 U.S.C. 845. The remaining subsections are modified versions of section 345 in H.B. 164 (1967).

* Sec. 42.05.391. Power of Commission to Fix Rates.

Provisions of this section are presently found in AS 42.05.520.

* Sec. 42.05.401 and 411. Concerning Reparations.

These two sections are taken from California Public Utilities Code, Secs. 734 and 735.

* Sec. 42.05.421. Valuation of Property of a Public Utility.

Although taken from AS 42.05.250, the provisions in this proposed section bear little resemblance to its predecessor. The Executive Director of the P.S.C. suggested much of the language employed here.

Subsection (b) relating to "fair value" codifies the rate-base policy adopted by the Commission in recent rate proceedings. The RCND (Reconstruction cost new depreciated) philosophy was specifically rejected as being inappropriate to Alaska at this time. The State's current law permits the Commission to consider RCND.

* Sec. 42.05.431. System of Accounts and Reports.

The principal changes from existing law (AS 42.05.290 and 310) are (a) the requirement that a utility adopt a system of accounting prescribed by the Commission instead of "a generally recognized system; and (b) the requirement that a utility keep its accounts on a calendar year basis.

Both of these changes were suggested by the Commission.

The uniformity which would result will materially assist the Commission in evaluating and analyzing utility operations and drawing comparisons with the norm of other similar utilities. These provisions are standard in most states.

* Sec. 441. Continuing Property Records.

This section has no counterpart in current Alaska law. Its objectives are similar to those of requiring uniform accounting and reporting.

The ability to make continuing evaluations, analyses and comparisons is of significant assistance to the Commission in determining the reasonableness of rates.

* Sec. 42.05.451. Depreciation Rates and Accounts.

Subpart (a) of this section is a modified version of AS 42.05.340.

Subpart (b) is new and its need is fairly obvious.

* Sec. 42.05.461. Subsidiary Business Accounts.

The counterpart of this section in existing law is AS 42.05.300. Changes are minor.

* Sec. 42.05.471. REcords and Accounts to Be Kept in State.

This section is new and necessary. The Commission ran into a problem in this regard in the A.J. case. The language is similar in part to that of Pennsylvania Statutes, Title 66, Sec. 1214. The Alaska Public Service Commission recommended the alternative provided in the last sentence of the section.

* Sec. 42.05.481. Inspection of Books and Records by Commission.

Inspection is currently provided for in AS 42.05.540. Although substantial revisions have been made in the language, there is little change of a substantive nature.

* Sec. 42.05.491. Unreasonable Management Practices.

Considerable change is provided in this section over the current provisions of AS 42.05.530. These changes are designed to clarify and beef up the Commission's authority in this area.

* Sec. 42.05.501. Impaired Capital.

The language in this section is taken from Sec. 535 of H.B. 164 (1967).

* Sec. 42.05.511. Distribution of Surplus,Profits and Operating Margins.

This section is a modified version of AS 42.05.200.

* Sec. 42.05.521. Effect of Rules, Regulations and Orders.

The language of this section was taken from H.B. 164, Sec. 545 (1967). It revises the current statute AS 42.05.230.

* Sec. 42.05.531. Review and Enforcement.

This section is adopted from H.B. 164, Sec. 555 (1967). There is no such provision in Alaska's current P.S.C. law.

* Secs. 42.05.541, 561, 571, 581 and 591. Concerning Penalties.

These sections are new to Alaska's law. They are adopted primarily from the California Public Utility Code, Sections 5312 - 5317 with some modifications reflecting Washington Public Utility Code, Sec. 80.04.405.

Under present law the P.S.C. has no means of enforcement other than to seek injunctive relief from the Court. This limitation is a unique situation in utility regulatory codes. The normal situation in most states is that injunctive relief is turned to as a last resort.

These sections provide both criminal and civil penalties Criminal penalties are fairly standard but more and more states are adopting alternative civil penalties as well as a better enforcement tool. Criminal penalties are difficult to secure, are not particularly desirable and are normally resorted to only in cases of very flagrant and continuing violations. As a result they are not especially useful in securing compliance.

Civil penalties work quite well as a means of obtaining compliance with the regulations and orders of the Commission. They work so well, in fact, that it is seldom necessary to recover them.

Section 571 gives the Commission the discretionary authority to determine whether a civil penalty should be levied and the extent (within maximum limits) if it is to be levied. It also provides authority to mitigate such a penalty if circumstances warrant.

* Sec. 42.05.601. Joinder of Actions.

This section is adopted from H.B. 164, Sec. 575 (1967).

* Sec. 42.05.611. Eminent Domain.

This section is new and is adopted from H.B. 164, Sec. 585 (1967).

* Sec. 42.05.621. Regulation by Municipality.

Subsection (a) of this section is taken from current law AS 42.05.620.

Subsection (b) is a substantially modified version of Sec. 587, H.B. 164 (1967).

* Sec. 42.05.631. Expenses of Investigation and Hearing.

With only minor changes, the provisions of this section are currently found in AS 42.05.610.

* Sec. 42.05.641. Regulatory Fees.

This is a new provision and is fairly standard in other state public utility codes. Its objective is to have the regulated industry pay at least a part of the cost of regulation.

In motor freight carrier regulation by the Alaska Transportation Commission, such regulatory fees are provided for in the form of weight fees (AS 42.10.240) and application fees (AS 42.10.160)

* Sec. 42.05.651. Public Disclosure of Information.

This section is taken from AS 02.05.240 of Alaska's Air Commerce Act.

See AS 09.25.110 - 120 provide in essence that all public records are open to public inspection, etc. "unless specifically provided otherwise. Thus, the need here is not to provide that Commission records are open to public inspection, but merely to provide for those few circumstances under which they should not be available for public review.

* Sec. 42.05.661. Validity of Certain Certificates.

This section was considered necessary to protect the certificates, aready issued, of public utilities grossing less than $25,000, which utilities were exempted from regulation by Sec. 2, Ch. 188, SLA 1968.

* Sec. 42.05.671. Utility Classes.

This section is designed to fit the general plan of greater jurisdiction and authority of the Commission. It is easily recognized that all utilities should not be regulated to the same degree. Therefore,through the mediums of classifications and broad discretionary authority, the Commission can easily provide regulatory requirements that will fit the circumstances of utility variations, without encountering the disruption of statutory exemptions.

* Sec. 42.05.681. Definitions.

The general approach taken in the current statute, AS 42.05.640, was adopted here.

The definition of Public Utility confines itself to the extent possible with the matter of defining the term and leaves "exemptions" to a section of that title. The definition is quite comprehensive. However, it is noted that the furnishing of heat was inadvertently left out. This would appear to be easily corrected by inserting a comma and the word "heat" in subsection (1)(c) between the words "water" and "or" to read "furnishing water, heat, or sewer. . . ."

Two new definitions have been added and some of the existing definitions are modified to a limited extent.

The definition of "public" includes "public utility." This definition, when applied to the definition of public utility, assures the coverage by the Act of those utilities who may have a public utility as their only customer. An example would be A. J. Industries at Juneau who wholesales all of its electric power and energy to Alaska Electric Light & Power Co.

The definition of "affiliated interest" is taken from Washington Statute 80.16.010. Its principal applications are found in proposed sections 42.05.491 and 691(a).

* Sec. 42.05.691. Exemptions.

Exemptions have been restricted to a very minimum in keeping with the overall plan of the bill.

Subsection (a) exempts supplies by truck, etc. as currently provided in AS 42.05.645. However, when the operator has an "affiliated interest" in a "public utility" which he is serving, this exemption does not apply.

All other exemptions relate to municipally owned and operated utilities. These municipal exemptions are not necessarily desireable from the regulatory viewpoint, but represent an effort to permit local governments as much freedom from state regulation as possible without disrupting the overall regulatory program.

This section in H.B. 202 differs from the Governor's bill, S.B. 128 in that S.B. 128 exempts municipal utilities from rate regulation within municipal boundaries. The question has been raised whether regulation of municipal utility rates outside the municipality only, can be accomplished. A similar provision is contained in Pennsylvania Statutes, Title 66, Section 1141. Time did not permit a thorough research of the degree of success the Pennsylvania Commission has had in its application. The annotations to the statute, however, indicate that such regulatory authority has been exercised by that Commission.

As stated earlier, the statutory exemptions tend to substantially compound regulatory problems. An excellent example of this is the exemption enacted in 1968 for utilities grossing less than $25,000. It immediately placed in question the legal status of certificates already issued to such utilities. Even more importantly, the exemption placed in question the Commission's jurisdiction to certificate any prospective utility because such utility, irrespective of size, would not have earned $25,000 prior to actual operation. A third area of serious conflict was also raised, in that, anyone could provide unregulated utility service in any area already certificated and being served by an existing utility.

Another well known example of the regulatory problems created by exemptions is the duplication of facilities by municipal utilities and certificated utilities, particularly in the Anchorage area.

I have reviewed very hurriedly Committee Substitute for HB 202. Three of the revisions would have very substantial effects on the Act, & raise significant questions of desireability they are amended sections

I will comment on these & other revisions as soon as possible. If it is desireable I will be pleased to appear before the committee to discuss these matters as well as the bills.

I feel that most of the changes in the committee substitute are an improvement & make it a better bill.

THE PRECEDING PAGES WERE TREATED AS A UNIT IN THE ORIGINAL FILE.

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS OF CSHB 202

* Sec. 42.05.020. Composition of Alaska Public Service Commission.

I have already commented at length on subsection (b) so will avoid repeating here.

* Sec. 42.05.030. Term of Office; Vacancy.

Changes made here are appropriate.

* Sec. 42.05.035 and .071.

No significant changes made.

* Sec. 42.05.081. Oath of Office.

The change here is appropriate.

* Sec. 42.05.091. Compensation of Members of Commission.

The question of dual salaries has already been brought to the Committee's attention.

* Sec. 42.05.101 and .111.

No significant changes made.

* Sec. 42.05.121. Employment of Commission Personnel.

The matter of a commissioner also serving as executive director has already been discussed. This, however, is optional. The question should be thoroughly researched before implementation.

The elimination of provisions for employing hearing officers has merit provided it does not contribute to delay rather than remedy the P.S.C. sad experiences with hearing officers in the past.

I agree that it is much more desirable to have the Commission hear all formal proceedings rather than use hearing officers. I do not foresee any problems from the exclusion of hearing officers for at least a couple of years.

* Sec. 42.05.131. Restrictions on Members and Employees.

The extension of restrictions is good.

* Sec. 42.05.141. General Powers and Duties of the Commission.

The revisions to subsection (1) should accomplish the objectives of the original bill. The revisions are an improvement.

Changes in other subsections are minor.

* Sec. 42.05.151. Administrative Authority of Commission; Regulations and Hearing Procedures.

I commented in some detail on the corresponding section in H.B. 202. The revised version is equally appropriate.

* Sec. 42.05.161. Application of Administrative Procedure Act.

I concur in the revisions made in the corresponding section in H.B. 202.

* Sec. 42.05.171. Formal Investigations and Hearings.

The objectives of this revised section are substantially the same as in the original. One difference is the number of commissioners required to hear a case. I commented on this aspect in my notes on this section in H.B. 202.

The restriction that a commissioner must have read or heard the entire record is well stated and appropriate.

* Deletion of section on Hearing Officers and Agents.

This substitute bill deletes the subject section (42.05.181 of H.B. 202). Since the committee has determined to eliminate the hearing officer from the procedural processes, this deletion is appropriate.

The purposes of the original section are expressed in my comments on the original bill.

* Sec. 42.05.181. Final Orders of the Commission.

This section has been added and is appropriate.

* Sec. 42.05.191. Reports on Proceedings.

This section has been added and is appropriate.

* Sec. 42.05.201. Publication of Reports, Orders, Decisions and Regulations.

This section has been added. To some extent it duplicates provisions of sections 42.05.161 and 191. The section is appropriate .

* Sec. 42.05.211. Annual Report.

The provisions of this section are found in Sec. 42.05.131 of H.B. 202.

* Sec. 42.05.221. Certificates Required.

This section contains the same provisions as Sec. 42.05.191 of H.B. 202 plus the addition of a subsection granting grandfather rights. I have commented on this previously.

* Secs. 42.05.231 and 241.

No substantive change from counterparts in H.B. 202.

* Sec. 42.05.251. Use of Streets In Cities and Boroughs.

This is a new section and is desirable.

* Sec. 42.05.261. Discontinuance, Suspension, or Abandonment of Certificated Service.

No substantive changes from original provisions.

* Sec. 42.05.271. Modification, Suspension or Revocation.

The inclusion of the word "willful" in subsections (4) and (5) is beneficial.

* Secs. 42.05.281, 291, 301, 311, 321, 331 and 341.

No substantive changes from corresponding sections in H.B. 202.

* Sec. 42.05.351. Testing of Appliances.

The Principal revision in this section corrects an error in the original.

* Sec. 42.05.361. Tariffs, Filing and Public Inspection.

The principal revision in subsection (a) reclassifies contracts which affect rates as special tariffs. This is a matter of convenience and not substantive. The word "rate" is defined in the definitions section as including "charges."

The revision to subsection (c) should not require a hearing but simply give opportunity for hearing after notice.

* Sec. 42.05.371. Adherence to Tariffs.

No substantive change from counterpart.

* Sec. 42.05.381. Rates to Be Just and Reasonable.

The addition of subsection (b) is probably unnecessary except the provision for taxes.

* Sec. 42.05.391. Discrimination in RAtes.

No objection to deletion of subsection (b) contained in the original. No other substantive changes have been made.

* Sec. 42.05.401. Apportionment of Joint RAtes.

The deletion of subsection (b) of the original was discussed with the committee. I agree that the objectives are satisfactorily provided for in other sections.

* Sec. 42.05.411. New Or Revised Tariffs.

No substantive changes.

* Sec. 42.05.421. Suspension of Tariff Filing.

The only significant change here is in subsection (b) which reduces the suspension period from 7 to 5 months. The standard in most states is 10 months.

* Sec. 42.05.431. Power of Commission to Fix Rates.

No substantive changes.

* Deletion of Secs. on "reparations"

No objection to such deletion.

* Sec. 42.05.441. Valuation of Property of a Public Utility.

Subsection (b) of this section has been changed substantially. I have already commented on it in some detail to the Committee so will limit my statements here to matters not already covered.

Assuming that no change is to be made in the "original cost" - RCND formula, I suggest the addition of the words "and obsolescence" at the end of the sentence. The first sentence would then read:

> "(b) In determining fair value of public utility property for rate making purposes, the commission shall be guided primarily by the average of original cost, less accrued depreciation and reproduction cost, less physical depreciation and obsolescence."

This additional language should be acceptable to everyone since the principal concern is, or should be, that the value to be determined by the formula more nearly reflects the actual value at the time the determination is made. No reasonable argument can be made that the fair value should exceed the actual value at any given point in time. Requiring obsolescence to be taken into account provides an additional safeguard against the possibilities that a fixed RCND formula will yield something greater than actual value.

An accounting for physical depreciation does not necessarily account for obsolescence.

One additional matter should be touched upon and that is the relationship between plant valuation and financing. It has been suggested that a utility cannot obtain financing under an "original cost" valuation policy. However, a very substantial majority of the states apply original cost and reject RCND completely. I know of no instance (and I m sure that no one else can cite one) where these states have experienced abnormal utility growth. As a matter of fact, California has one of the most vigorous and advanced electric utility industries in the nation and it has always been strictly an "original cost" state.

Public utilities cannot be compared with other industries in most respects and particularly financing, because they

(1) occupy a lawful monopoly position;

(2) the service is essential to their customer and is bought continuously by many small buyers;

(3) the consumer has an urgent need for the service and that need cannot be postponed; and

(4) the consumer has no acceptable alternative.

* Sec. 42.05.451. System of Accounts and Reports.

Subsection (a) will permit utilities to "adopt a generally recognized system of public utility accounting." This is the language of the current statute. H.B. 202 would revise this provision to allow the commission to prescribe the system.

The reasons for this revision are covered in my comments on Sec. 42.05.431 of H.B. 202.

Suffice it to repeat here that uniform accounting by all utilities of a type, is highly beneficial to the regulatory process. Subsection (b) relating to annual reporting changes the time allowance for annual reports from 75 to 90 days with provision for extensions if circumstances warrant. These are beneficial revisions.

* Sec. 42.05.461. Continuing Property Records.

No change from H.B. 202, Sec. 441.

* Sec. 42.05.471. Depreciation Rates, Initial Losses and ACcounts.

Subsection (a) and (b) - no substantive change from H.B. 202, Sec. 451(a) and (b).

Subsection (c) - This is a new subsection and allows a new utility to amortize operating losses, if any, which it has incurred in developing its market and system. This provision has merit but could be the subject of abuse and possibly extra profit. I suggest that the commission be given additional discretionary control over the extent to which losses may be amortized. This could perhaps be accomplished by providing additional qualifications.

At the very least, the word "reasonable" should be inserted between the words "of" and "net" and the word "necessarily" be inserted between "losses" and "incurred." I would also suggest that the phrase "not otherwise compensable" be added after the word "losses." The subsection would then read, "(c) The amount of reasonable net operating losses, not otherwise compensable and necessarily incurred by. . . ."

To some extent net operating losses are compensated for by carry-over into future years for purposes of computing income taxes payable in such future years. Since a utility's profit is computed as a rate of return after taxes the utility could realize extra profit in the carry-over years unless the commission can take this factor into account.

* Sec. 42.05.481. Subsidiary Business Accounts.

No substantive changes.

* Sec. 42.05.491. Records and Accounts to be Kept in State.

No substantive changes.

* Sec. 42.05.501. Inspection of Books and Records by Commission.

Only clarifying langauge added.

* Sec. 42.05.521. Impaired Capital.

The added expression "or might become impaired by continuation of current practices" is desirable.

* Sec. 42.05.531. Distribution of Surplus and Profits.

I agree with the changes here.

* Secs. 42.05.541 - 621 - Re. Judicial Review, Penalties and Enforcement.

The principal substantive change in these sections is to remove their application to non-utilities. As indicated in my comments on H.B. 202, these provisions, as originally drafted, k were similar to the California Code as well as that of Washington and Pennsylvania. (These were the only states researched on the subject.) Their application to non-utilities as well as utilities assures non-interference by parties not otherwise covered by the Act. I do not know to what extent, if any outside interference is or might be a problem.

Another change made in the substitute bill removes application of civil penalties to officers, etc. of the utility. I see no problem from this revision since they are covered under criminal penalties.

Sec 42.05.131. Regulation by Municipality
The provision (a) in the Bill 202 was taken from the current statute. By its deletion [Sec. 42.05.861 (a)] I take it the committee feels it has outlived it's usefulness or else the committee believes that such prior contractual arrangements should be terminated.

* Sec. 42.05.671. Public Disclosure of Information
This matter is covered in my comments on HB202. I do not believe the added language is necessary but at the same time no problem is created by leaving it in.

Anchorage, Alaska
March 6, 1965

TO: The Honorable Eugene Guess
Chairman - House Judiciary Committee

Re: House Bill No. 138

The Honorable Homer Moseley
Chairman - House Commerce Committee

Gentlemen:

Following is a summary of the amendments requested on behalf of ALASKA PIPELINE COMPANY - ANCHORAGE NATURAL GAS COMPANY, and in some instances utilities in general, presented and requested by the undersigned near the close of the hearings of your joint committees in Juneau last week.

We favor a board of not less then five (5) members, and feel that appointment from the various segments of the utilities industry has merit. Unless members are appointed who have some background in utility operation, whether from experience in the industry, accounting, legal, engineering, or as a previous service in regulation, it will take some time to become familiar with the philosophy,concepts, and obligations to protect the public, protect the utility, and to protect the investors. We feel that the proposed six-year term is moritorious and that removal should be for cause. We would like to see some independence,in the commission, whether it be organized within the Department of Commerce, or otherwise, such as election as the chairman by the commission, each two years. However, we are confident that the most capable commissioners will be sought out. The importance of having the most fit and capable commissioners cannot be over-emphasized, as a very large segment of the Alaskan economy will be under complete regulation under the terms of the proposed Act.

.035: add at end of section ", based on their professional qualifications and experience."

.055: We do not feel that high-type commissioners would be prejudiced in their decision making by owning stock in a truckline, gas company, air operation, telephone, or electrical utility.

Thus we would be willing to see this entire section stricken. However, if it is not stricken, we see no reason that the equity holder of a REA financed co-op should be an exception in the restrictions. With the admitted lack of qualified persons, the restrictions eliminate a great mass of potentially qualified members for the Commission.

.085: If the Commission is to proceed to full scale regulation as this Bill contemplates, members of the Commission will have to be compensated on at least a part-time basis.

.105: In proceedings in which the Attorney General represents a party as a advocate in a proceeding, the Act should provide that his services terminate at the end of the taking of testimony so that he cannot continue to advise the Commission during the process of their making findings, conclusions, and decisions. The Commission will have in its staff, at that time, professionally trained persons competent to draw the findings, and the basis therefor.

.125: The Commission should not be permitted to delegate all of its functions, e.g. the judicial or quasi-judicial functions of decision making. Request that the word procedural or ministerial be inserted at line 18 before the word "function".

.165: A number of States finance utility regulation from the general fund. In the case of ALASKA PIPELINE - ANCHORAGE NATURAL GAS, franchise fees,or taxes of 2% of gross revenue,are paid within the Cities of Anchorage and Soldotna, and within the Greater Anchorage Borough for the services furnished within what was the Spenard Public Utility District, where a franchise is also held. These companies also pay real and personal property taxes within the cities - borough, presently pay gross business license tax to the State, and it is anticipated that substantial income tax payments will be made to the State and to the Federal Government when profits result. Thus, from this variety of tax contributions to local - State government, it can be argued that this industry is entitled to some services of the regulatory body. However, if an additional tax is to be imposed, it is obvious that the 1% tax on the entire industry in Alaska would bring in some $400,000 at this time, and that the amounts of this revenue would probably increase rapidly. Any such tax is burdensome, the burden being relative to the amount of the tax, and the method of collecting it. Comments at the hearing indicated the likelihood of applying the tax, if imposed, to wholesale sales, and to retail sales. In this event, we would request a specific provision, that where a company sells at wholesale to a wholly owned subsidiary, the tax would be collected but once, on total ultimate sales to consumers.

.175: Amendment is indicated in light of exemptions and definitions contemplated in the Act.

.185: The last sentence of this provision permits the Commission to delegate in writing to "any person" its authority to conduct an informal investigation. This would permit conceivably, the appointment of either an irate consumer, or a disgruntled competitor, to investigate the utility affected. We would suggest that an additional provision be inserted to the effect either that it be a person "having no interest in the outcome of the investigation," or, that the person appointed, if not a regular member or employee of the Commission, have the concurrence of the utility affected.

We note that the proposed Act has no prohibition or penalty against disclosure of information by members or employees without the approval of the Commission. This could be extremely dangerous to a utility. We recommend the language of the Illinois Statute, but others would probably be just as good. Section 18 of the Illinois Act, 111 2/3 §18, Penalty for Divulging Information provides as follows:

> "Any officer or employee of the Commission who divulges any fact or information coming to his knowledge during the course of an inspection, examination or investigation of any account, record, memorandum, book or paper of a public utility except in so far as he may be authorized by the Commission or by a court of competent jurisdiction, or a judge thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction, be subject to imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year, or to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or to both."

This provision, and requirement, is important to all utilities, although none noted at the hearing the absence of such a provision.

.215: In the first sentence, insert after the words "shall make", "or cause to be made". Line 26, after the word "hearings", insert, "or investigations, formal or informal" are held.

The reason for this is that both the complaining party, and the utility, should be able to see and read in the Commission files or receive a report of the investigation, whether it be only a paragraph long.

Also, at line 26, and 27, and 28, after the words, "its decision and order", insert, "and the basis therefor".

I am advised that this serves a highly useful purpose in insuring against any pre-conceived or immature conclusions, or conclusions entered upon incomplete investigation. Such a requirement insures further thoroughness and fairness to all parties and provides a more clearcut record in the event appeal is sought by any party.

.225: Line 5, delete, "OR PRIVILEGE".

We cannot see and do not visualize any instance in which the denial of a privilege should result in a hearing It would seem that the present language might result in burdensome, numerous hearings, requested by parties wishing a privilege which does not exist under the law, or the rules and regulations of any affected utility.

In the last line of the same section, following the words "public utility", change the language to read, "or any party to the proceeding."

This change is recommended for clarification so that the Commission and the parties to any proceeding will be protected from demands for hearing by any one of a multitude of interested persons who are not, in the legal sense, interested parties or "party to the proceeding".

.235: As pointed out earlier, some States pay the entire costs of regulation from the general funds. Others, to varying degrees, pass the costs of hearing on to the party concerned, as anticipated by this section of the bill. We requested and recommended that in the basis for apportioning costs, the section making "ability to pay", one of the criteria be deleted. This is too much of an open invitation to load the costs against what might appear to be a prosperous utility, even though the utility were found to be acting in good faith. It must be remembered that the costs of a proceeding are not only the costs incurred by the Commission, but generally equal costs will be incurred by the utility affected, which it must absorb. Ultimately of course, all of the costs of the utility in preparing for and conducting its presentation before the commission, have to be borne by the consumers - rate payors of the utility, as would any portion of the commission's cost which are assessed against the utility. Therefore we further recommend the addition of further limiting language at line 17 after the words "mitigating circumstances" as follows: "HOWEVER, IN NO EVENT, SHALL ANY UTILITY, PARTY TO THE PROCEEDING, BE ASSESSED MORE THAN ONE-HALF THE COSTS THEREOF."

.245: There was general agreement that grandfather's rights should be preserved, or specifically, that existing certificates obtained under the present law of Alaska, should be validated.

Otherwise, a tremendous amount of work already done by the utilities and the Commission, would be wasted and time and expense of re-application would be burdensome to all. At this point we recommended a new provision as follows:

> "Until changed by Order of the Commission, the rates rules, and regulations of Utilities, operating under franchises, or under the jurisdiction or local regulatory bodies empowered by law to so regulate, are hereby approved."

This brings us to the question we raised at the opening of our presentation, which is: What is the status under the proposed legislation of utilities presently regulated by Home Rule Cities under franchise granted by such Home Rule Cities? We feel that there is a real and serious question for the legislature to resolve at this time. Are we, for example, subject to dual regulation, and if so, do the determinations of the PSC override those of the Home Rule City where they conflict, or does the conferring of power by this Act upon PSC displace and negate the former powers of the home Rule City to regulate the matters over which jurisdiction is given to the PSC, or, as suggested by some of the electrical co-operatives and cities, in testimony before the Committees, would Home Rule Cities retain the power to regulate franchised utilities within their geographic boundaries and the PSC regulate only beyond the city limits.

.295: We recommend addition at the end of the Section, the following language:

> "Sale of equipment, appliances, and materials, and installation thereof, by the utility, directly or by contract, are hereby excluded, provided however, that records of all the revenues and costs associated therewith shall be maintained separate from the remainder of, or the general operating accounts of the utility."

.325: The requirement of filing with rate schedules "all contracts which affect or relate in any manner to the rates" can be terrifically burdensome, both to the utility and to the Commission. This language would require filing copies of contracts for every purchase, every employment, every job, etc., as these do "relate in any manner". Our suggestion and recommendation is preferably to delete this requirement, otherwise the Commission will soon have warehouses full of copies of purchase orders, work orders, etc., and the utility will be burdened in its administration, or in the alternative, if the requirement must exist, change the language to read, "and all contracts which directly affect the rates." It should be pointed out that the Commission, through its very general and generous powers, can at all times ascertain any of these matters without having to become a great storehouse for a volume of paperwork, to which it could never pay any attention, without maintaining a horde of agents to scrutinize the minute detail of daily operations of all utilities affected.

.425: We find this section unclear and meaningless. We do not know the origin or intent of this section, and feel that the prior and subsequent two sections probably accomplish the intent of the drafter. If there is a purpose which we have overlooked or failed to understand, I would greatly appreciate an explanation, so that we would not be in a position of opposing something proper simply because of ignorance upon our part.

.435: At line 20, we recommend deleting the word "APPLIANCES" , and substituting the words, "metering equipment".

In our industry, appliances are conceived to be household items, such as ranges, heaters, dryers, etc.

Again, we do not understand the use of the word "standards" at line 22, of this section.

.455: In previous hearings on the present Act concerning valuation of public utility properties, our representative and perhaps others, sought and obtained the present reference to "fair value of such property", which appears in the present Act, and the language of the proposed Section. We propose a further revision which makes fair value a more significant ultimate goal of the Commission in determining valuation of utility property rate-making purposes. The language we propose and recommend is as follows:

> "The Commission may, when necessary, for rate-making purposes, investigate and ascertain the actual legitimate costs of the property used and useful of every public utility, the depreciation therein, and other facts which bear on the determination of such cost or depreciation, and the fair value in fact of such property."

The remainder of the proposed section seems satisfactory.

.465: This is a typical section, and exists in our present law. The need for it has generally disappeared with exemption of small utilities under $100,000.00 gross, as practically all larger utilities do utilize "generally recognized systems". Line 29 at the bottom of page 15, we recommend changing the word "system" to "systems", so that the Commission will not feel bound to prescribe one system which must be used by all varities of utilities. We further recommend and request the following addition within the section:

> "A public utility presently using a generally recognized system of accounting, will not be required to change to another system."

.475 and .485: We recommend substitution of provisions similar to that in effect in Illinois, at Section 111 2/3, §14, which provides as follows:

> "Depreciation accounts. The Commission shall have power, after hearing, to require any or all public utilities to keep such accounts as will adequately reflect depreciation, obsolescence and the progress of the arts. The Commission, may, from time to time, ascertain and determine and by order fix the proper and adequate rate of depreciation of the several classes of property for each public utility; and each public utility shall conform its depreciation accounts to the rates so ascertained, determined and fixed."

In order to prevent misuse or dissipation of depreciation and other reserves, we would suggest addition of the following language:

"And may govern the use of such reserves to prevent any improper alienation of assets of the utility."

Our particular concern, and that expressed by other utilities at the hearing is, that the Commission should not be empowered to require the utility to maintain the reserve in the form of cash, or investment in U. S. or State bonds, or bank savings accounts, as none of these pay, or yield a return as high as the rate charged on the bonds and borrowings of the utilities. It is thus common practice, and the practice of the company making this presentation to project, schedule, and use these reserves for payment and repayment of interest, and indebtedness, and for extension of new facilities to obviate additional borrowing. The contrary situation is true in the case of REA financed co-operatives paying 2% interest. They, of course, could use their reserve account for investment earnings at a rate higher than their required interest payments. However, they too should have the right to utilize their funds to maximum advantage with the Commission empowered simply to see that they are not wasted dissipated, or alienated.

.485: We question whether the State is ready, or should be required to regulate the financing of all utilities. If it must, we strongly urge some definition and exceptions. Our information is that the Wisconsin Commission, whose Act was copied in this section, is a very mature Commission, which has gained a great deal of competence through the many years it has been in existance, and that it operates with a view to assuring and maintaining the health of the utilities as well as protecting the consumers, and that they also attempt to protect the purchasers of securities in their investments. I understand further that by practice, some leeway is given the utilities that is not actually provided within the strict language of the Act. We recommend and urge the following:

a. Exempt utilities complying with this act from the provisions of Alaska's general securities Act, "the Blue Sky Law", so that utilities would not be burdened with the administrative detail, costs and expenses of compliance with both. Regulation under this Act is much more comprehensive and affords the public full protection.

b. Exempt stock dividends and stock splits from the operation of this act. These do not affect the financial condition of the utility.

c. Exempt short-term borrowing. We would like to see borrowing up to three years exempt as such financing on a relatively minor scale is generally available in the normal money market to a sound utility, permitting the utility to finance temporary requirements in this manner without undertaking the burden of preparing and selling a bond issue for long-term financing, which is believed to be the true objective of this section. The Legislature could well consider in granting the exemption of short-term financing up to three years, placing some limitation on such borrowing, such as "not to exceed 10% of the total debt of the utility". This exception for short-term borrowing makes possible temporary financing from time to time, should the money market not be favorable to long-term bonded indebtedness.

d. Exempt endorsements and guarantee of the undertakings of others in due course of business. Many utilities, electrical co-operatives, as well as the gas industry . sell appliances, etc.

on contracts, or take installment notes, which are then endorsed, sold, or assigned, to other financial institutions for cash. It would be extremely burdensome on the utility as well as the PSC to require these transactions to be processed by the Commission.

It is our strong recommendation that Section .585, the Power of Eminent Domain, is a definite and common requisite of public utilities. This power exists, and is presently exercised under the Code of Civil Procedure, Section 00.53.340, et seq. It might be well to so clearly state by adoption of this section, (.585), in the proposed Act.

We appreciate the opportunity to appear before the joint Committees and the fine manner in which the hearings were conducted, and the fair treatment accorded all witnesses including the undersigned.

If we can be of any assistance whatever, or if our comments or help is desired at any time in the process of preparing or considering the Act, we would be happy to be called upon.

Very truly yours,

COMMENTS OF DON HALL, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF ALASKA PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION, ON SB 54

Section No.

.005 In my opinion 5 part-time commissioners would be impractical and needlessly expensive. Hawaii is the only state that now has 5 part-time commissioners. Seven commissions have 5 full-time commissioners, but they have large staffs and all of them regulate transportation agencies as well as public utilities. If there is anything wrong with the Commission it cannot be attributed to the fact that it only has 3 instead of 5 part-time commissioners. Thirty-six of the 57 state regulatory commissions have 3 full-time commissioners and four have 3 part-time commissioners; so it is apparent that three commissioners are all that are really needed. If we should have 5 commissioners in this State I am confident the Governor would find it advisable to appoint them so that various population centers and geographic areas were represented. Thus, the State would have to bear the expense of bringing 5 instead of 3 commissioners to meetings approximately once a month which would greatly increase inside travel costs. Moreover, I can testify to the fact that it requires a great deal of staff time to keep three Commissioners informed of current developments, as they occur, between regular meetings and that the task of assembling records and material for every Commission meeting takes far more time and effort than is generally realized. The staff burden would obviously be greater if there were 5 Commissioneers.

In the final analysis, I think it can be generally agreed that a Commission's success or failure depends mainly on how wise and fair the decisions are rather than how many people participate in the decisions that must be made. After all, three commissions have only one commissioner. This has been going on for many, many years.

.015 6 years is the term of office 35 states prescribe for commissioners.. 11 states prescribe 4-year terms. Only one prescribes a 5-year term. What if February 1, 1969 passes without enacting the law. It would be better to make the terms effective as of the effective date of the law.

.025 The term "fitness to exercise the powers and duties of the commission" is almost meaningless, unless it made meaningful by some procedure such as that of Idaho which requires an investigation by a gubernatorial appointment committee. Our present law is far superior in this respect to that of any other state. The qualifications should be definite. Since Alaska is already head and shoulders above all other states in spelling out the qualifications of commissioners, we should not go backward. Only four other states now require specific qualifications as distinguished from those such as age, citizenship, residency, etc., namely; Indiana, Michigan, Virginia and West Virginia.

.035 In most states (28) the Governor names the Chairman during his term of office. In 22 others, however, the Commission elects one of its members as chairman. In 2 states the Chairman is designated by rotation and in one by seniority.

.055 No response

.065 No response

.075 The salary of $6000 is the maximum amount recommended by APSC consultants and the amount suggested in APSC proposed legislation for a 3-member Commission.

.085 OK except that the Commission would apparently be unable to name an Executive Director who did not meet the minimum qualifications established by the Personnel Department. This might hamper the selection if the Personnel Department should adopt the recommendation of the APSC consultants who suggested a college degree with emphasis in engineering, accounting, economics, business administration or a utility oriented field plus 10 years of experience in a governmental agency that regulates public utilities.

.095 Under what circumstances will the Attorney General be required to represent the public interest? The way the law is written, it appears that the Attorney General is the only one who would make this decision. There is a question in my mind as to the propriety of allowing the Attorney General to represent the Commission as well as the public in the same proceeding. In Washington State the Attorney General engages the services of an attorney in private practice. This, I believe, would be a more acceptable procedure.

.105 The word "are" in lines 13 and 14 seems to be the wrong word. "Shall be" would be better.

.115 No response

.125 Line 24: Place period after parentheses and strike the rest of the sentence. Is it necessary to include hearing officers, or would the would the word "officers" include hearing officers who are not on the Commission's regular payroll?

.145 If this means the Commission must print or mimeograph or multilith all of its orders and give copies to anyone who asks for them, free of charge, the cost could be prohibitive. Moreover, it would require a lot of staff time which could be better devoted to other matters. Large, well financed commissions can do this, and some do, but I doubt that it would be practical for Alaska. It would be more practical to simply provide that all of the Commission's orders and regulations shall be open to public inspection. Ordinarily people are interested only in a particular order or a particular set of regulations, and they would undoubtedly ask for a copy too, and maybe a certified copy, even if they already had a publication containing all orders or all regulations. In short, I feel that the implementation of this section would be needlessly burdensome and costly to the State. To save staff time, I think that if this section becomes law, the APSC would have to request contractual funds to have all the orders in its order book printed. Some idea of the extent of the printing bill can be gained by the fact that our order book for the year ended December 31, 1968 contains 379 pages 8½ x 14 in size.

.165 It should be realized that the Commission's budget does not now include sufficient funds to adequately regulate municipally-owned utilities and the Alaska Pipeline Company in addition to the ACS when it is sold. In fact, the present budget (after two revisions) is not even sufficient to take care of the problem of assembling a qualified staff to prepare for the job of regulating the ACS purchaser. This is something that needs to be started this year because it is going to be extremely difficult to find qualified employees. Without adequate funding the APSC could not possibly hope to effective regulate any more utilities than it already regulates.

.175(a) Utilities should be subject to "surprise audits." With a five day notice requirement, the Commission would often be frustated in its efforts to determine whether or not a utility is guilty of infractions of the law. This is clearly a utility-oriented provision which I believe is ill advised. Five days would give a utility plenty of time to hide or revise pertinent records.

.175(b) This does not help solve one of the biggest problems the Commission has encountered; namely, whether or not the Commission can, or should, issue a subpoena duces tecum order for the benefit of a party to an adversary proceeding. In our Cause No. U-68-7 the City of Anchorage asked the Commission to issue a subpoena duces tecum order requiring Chugach Electric Association to produce a vast amount of data--much of it, according to Chugach, for discovery purposes to find out if the City had a good case. As I understand it, subpoenas are issued only with respect to people, not records.

.185 This section is satisfactory but should possibly be accompanied by a provision allowing the Commission to assess the costs of an investigation against the utility investigated which is the situation in 29 other state commissions. Also nothing is said about instituting a formal investigation on the motion of a complainant with suitable safeguards to prevent expensive investigations from being instituted, on a mandatory basis, based only upon frivolous and totally unsupported allegations. Although this section, as written, does not prohibit investigations by the Commission on the motion of other parties, it could be improved by making the fact clear.

.195(a) Should specify a time for notice such as at least 10 days prior to the hearing--also specify the manner of determining the days such as 10 days not counting the mailing date or the hearing date.

.195(b) Trying to comply with the APA on hearings has proven to be so difficult and impractical that George Benesch and another Assistant Attorney General have concluded the APSC should be exempt from the APS except in respect to the provisions thereof relating to regulations. Other attorneys have concurred.

.205 Requiring reports in writing is an unnecessary and burdensome requirement. So long as written orders are entered in respect to all formal proceedings it should not be necessary to make written reports. Also, the word "proceeding" should be defined to mean only formally docketed proceedings. This is the present system--and it works. Informal investigations could also be classified as proceedings, but it would be highly impractical to make a written report on proceedings of that kine. If all formal files are open to public inspection the Commission should not have to also make written reports. Possibly a satisfactory solution would be to require that all formal orders in formal proceedings must include a reasonably complete statement of all the pertinent facts and circumstances. Then the order itself would be the equivalent of a written report. We simply do not have staff enough to do anything that is not absolutely necessary. In the past, APSC orders have been sufficiently detailed, in my opinion, to obviate the necessity of a separate written report.

.235 How about grandfather certificates? Does this section mean that grandfather rights will no longer be recognized? In view of Sec. 42.05.615 (2)(A) does this section make it clear that utilities that already hold a certificate will continue to be regulated even if their gross revenues do not exceed $25,000. In this connection, I refer to the words "now issued" in line 24. The phrase (in line 23) "delineating the area where service is to be provided." is not adequate. When the ACS purchaser applies for a certificate it would be inadvisable to grant it the whole State of Alaska as its service area because this would give it a monopoly of all toll service. Instead, it will be found that the practical way to proceed in many cases is to grant it the right to provide toll service between point A and point B by wire line, or radio links. In other words, we will often be certifying toll routes, rather than areas; although certain area certifications will also be required such as the places where toll centers are located.

It has also been found wise to require a separate certificate for each kind of utility service a utility provides. In view of the foregoing, I would suggest that a period be placed after the word "option" on line 22; then strike the rest of the section and substitute the following:
When a utility seeks to provide more than one kind of utility service a separate certificate of public convenience and necessity shall be required for each of such utility services. Every certificate shall describe the nature and extent of the authority granted therein including, as appropriate for the utility services involved, a description of the area or areas granted and the authorized scope of operations of the utility.

.255 I suggest that this section be revised to read as follows:
No certificate shall be issued unless the commission finds that the applicant is fit, willing, and able to provide the utility services applied for and that such services are required for the convenience and necessity of the public. The commission may issue a certificate granting an application in whole or in part and attach to the grant thereof such terms and conditions as it deems necessary to protect and promote the public interest including the condition that the applicant must serve an area or provide a necessary service not contemplated by the applicant. The commission may, for good cause, deny an application with or without prejudice.

.275 I suggest a period be placed after the word "stated" in line 25 and strike the rest because it places the Commission is the impossible position of making a "finding" as to the reasonableness of rates charged within a municipality. This would require an investigation concerning the reasonableness of rates within corporate boundaries of every municipality that wants to place in effect a franchise tax or other charge to be separately stated on the utility bills of customers who reside in the municipality. I submit that the proposed statement would place an unwarrented burden on municipalities. It is enough to simply require that the city's charges be separately stated.

.295 Suggested Revision: (Should be .305)

Sec. 42.05.295. COMPLIANCE WITH TARIFFS. No public utility may, directly or indirectly, demand, charge, or receive a greater or lesser compensation for any utility service rendered or utility commodity furnished than is specified in its effective tariff filed in the manner provided in this Act, or fail to provide facilities of the kind and quality offered pursuant to its effective tariff. A public utility may charge its customers, and others, an amount not exceeding the actual cost for extraordinary services provided, including the cost of repairing damages to its facilities.

.305 Suggested Revision: (Should be .295)

Sec. 42.05.305. FILING OF TARIFFS AND CONTRACTS. (a) Under regulations prescribed by the commission each public utility shall file with the commission its tariffs and all contracts. Such tariffs and contracts shall show every rate and charge associated with the sale of any utility service or commodity and every classification, rule, regulation or practice affecting rates or charges. Each public utility shall print, or type, its complete tariff and keep an up-to-date copy of it on file at its principal business office and at each station or office where payments for service are accepted. Such tariffs shall be made available to, and be subject to inspection by, the general public on demand.

(b) The commission may reject, or modify, any tariff or any provision thereof which it finds inconsistent with the public interest or the utility tariff regulations of the commission. Any tariff or tariff provision which is rejected is void.

.315 Suggested Revision:

Sec. 42.05.315. NEW AND REVISED TARIFFS AND CONTRACTS. (a) Unless the commission otherwise orders no new rate or charge, classification of service, or contract relating thereto shall become effective and no change in any existing rate, charge, classification, regulation or contract shall become effective, except after 30 days' notice to the commission and to the public. This notice shall be given by the utility by filing with the commission and keeping open for public inspection the new or revised tariff or contract plainly stating the nature of the filing and the effective date thereof and by issuing a public notice briefly summarizing the facts and the effect of the filing in such a way as to clearly acquaint the public with its scope and purpose. The commission may prescribe additional means of giving notice. For good cause shown, the commission may allow a new or revised tariff or contract to take effect without requiring 30 days notice by issuing an order specifying the changes to be made, the time they shall take effect and the manner in which they shall be filed and published. [Note: This supersedes (and improves upon) previously proposed legislation I suggested which is word for word the same as sec. 42.05.315 of SB 54.]

(b) Coincident with the filing of any new or revised tariff or contract with the commission the utility shall also place a true copy thereof on file at its principal business office and at every office or station where payments for service are accepted. [Note: This provision is in AS 42.05.500 of present law.]

.325 Line 28--Change heading as follows:

Sec. 42.05.325. SUSPENSION OF TARIFF OR CONTRACT FILING. (a) When a tariff or contract is filed containing a new or revised rate, charge, toll, rule, regulation, classification, or practice, the commission may, either upon complaint or upon its own iniative without complaint, at once, or if it so orders, upon reasonable notice, enter upon an investigation and hearing on the lawfulness of the proposed filing.

(b) Pending the investigation, hearing and decision, the commission may, by order, suspend the operation of the proposed new or revised tariff or contract for a period of time not more than ten (10) months beyond the date the proposed filing would otherwise go into effect. After a full hearing, during the suspension period, the commission may issue orders granting, denying or modifying the proposed new or revised tariff or contract in whole or in part. If no order is issued during the suspension period, the proposed revision shall go into effect at the end of the 10-month suspension period.

(c) In the case of a proposed increased rate or charge, the commission may be order require the interested utility or utilities to keep accurate account, in detail, of all amounts received by reason of the increase, specifying by whom and in whose behalf the amounts are paid. Upon completion of the hearing and decision the commission may be order require the public utility to refund, with interest not exceeding six per cent per annum, to the persons in whose behalf the amounts were paid, that portion of the increased rates or charges which by its decision was found not to be justified.

(d) At any hearing involving any proposed new or revised tariff or contract filing the burden of proof to show that the filing is fair and reasonable shall be upon the public utility. The commission shall give to the hearing and decision of these questions priority over other questions pending before it and render its decision thereon as speedily as possible.

NOTE: Sec. 42.05.325 of SB 54 reduces suspension period to 5 months. Only 3 states now have a 5-month suspension period. Eight states have a 6-months period and 5 have a 10-month period. I favor a 10-month period because of the Commission's limited staff, which makes it difficult to complete investigations within a short period of time. This should be the determining factor--and 10 months is not out-of-line. Ten months gives greater flexibility since if an investigation can be completed in 5 months there is nothing to prevent limiting the suspension period to 5 months. On the other hadn, a 5-month period could force the staff to do a sloppy job in order to meet the statutory deadline.

The filing of a written statement of the reasons for a suspension together with the suspended filing would be a burdensome and unnecessary requirement. The suspended tariff or contract would be on file anyway; so all that need be done, actually, is for the Commission to make a complete statement of the reasons for the suspension in the suspension order itself. This would be adequate, in my opinion, since a suspension order would have to be served on the utility in any event.

Regarding the provision beginning on line 26 with the words "At a hearing involving a rate or charge sought to be increased...: I don't believe it is a good idea to limit the burden of proof requirement only to increased rates or charges. Right now we have a proceeding before the Commission which was instituted by Chugach Electric Association to reflect a substantial rate reduction. The City of Anchorage and a number of CEA's customers have objected to the reduction on the grounds it is unjustly discriminatory. Chugach should, and is, assuming the burden of proof in this case. Therefore the controlling law shoudl be substantially like section (d) of my suggested revision.

.335 No comment except that if the rates of a municipality should be changed pursuant to any covenant with bondholders (which, more aptly, should be bond purchasers) the law should require the municipality to file its revised rates with the Commission together with a statement, under oath, setting forth the reason for the filing (along with supporting documents and data) and require that the Commission allow such rates to become effective of the desired date, if properly supported, without regard to any complaint that might be filed. In any event the rates, when fixed by contract with bond purchasers, should be filed with the Commission as provided in AS 42.05.305 and .315 rather than being completely exempt from all filing requirements as indicated by the reference to "secs. 275 - 405" on line 14.

.345(b) Line 23: examine misspelled.
This section should be strong enough to enable the Commission to make all salaries subject to the Commission's prior approval to the extent they are not established by arms-length bargaining. Otherwise the owners of small utilities and the affiliated interests of large utilities will be in a position to absolutely control their rate of return by salary charges to utility operating expenses over which the Commission has no control. I question whether the section, as written goes far enough to give the Commission a chance to control salaries adequately.

.355 Suggest that AS 42.05.271 of SB 128 be substituted for following reasons:
1. Line 29, p. 9: the utilities regulated by the Commission do not have tracks or subway so these words should come out.
2. Line 12, p. 10: a telephone utility is the only kind that transmits messages.
3. Line 13, p. 10: telephony in this day and age has gone far beyond the simple transmission of messages. It now includes circuitry for data processing, facsimile transmission, remote control faciliites, etc. In addition, we must recognize that many telephoee connections are now effected by radio links rather than the physical connection of wires.
4. Line 21, p. 10: the word "physical" should be omitted for the reason indicated above.
5. Sec. (c), pp. 10-11: it is a recognized and normal industry practice for public utilities to include a line extension policy in their tariffs. I wrote section (c) of 42.05.271 in SB 128 and believe it is a better way to handle the problem because, among other reasons, it is uniformly applicable to all utilities rather than being limited only to electric utilities.

.365 Sec. 42.05.281 of SB 128, as drafted, includes a number of suggested revisions I made--and I think it is better. Subsection (b) is a case in point because there are times when it would be totally unfair to require one party or the other to bear all the cost of maintaining a connection. Sometimes both parties benefit from a connection, or share the revenues (as when toll revenues are shared or when EAS is established between adjoining exchanges of two utilities.)

.375 I think this section should be omitted. Industry practice determines the commercial units of any utility product or service. Further, I can see no practical need for any such provisions. I suggested it be omitted from an early draft of SB 128, for the above reasons, and it was.

.405 In actual practice this sort of thing is never done because it is not necessary for the Commission to "provide for a comprehensive classification of services for each public utility" except in an indirect way by regulatory supervision over tariff filings. Large utilities employ highly skilled consultants to advise them on classifications of service--and it is not uncommon for them to recommend that previous classifications be revised to adjust to changed conditions. Any comprehensive classifications the Commission might prescribe would tend to place all utilities in an undesirable straight jacket and make it difficult for them to achieve the flexibility required to adopt to changed costs and new market conditions. As for the smaller utilities, the problem of classification is usually so simple and self-evident that no regulatory control is necessary. In short, this is an area where regulatory safeguards need not be provided.

.425 Commissions in twenty-eight states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico plus the Federal Power Commission and the Federal Communications Commission follow the so-called original cost theory of rate base determination. The fact that a total of 32 regulatory commissions (including the largest such as California and New York) consider this method feasible provides a rather convincing argument for Alaska to do likewise. It is mainly for this reason that I recommend the section 42.05.411 of SB 128 be substituted for the language in sec. 42.05.425 of SB 54. There is a vast body of law and precedent for the original cost theory which, in essence, reduces rate base determinations mainly to an accounting procedure. Even a state, like Ohio, the only one in the nation that follows the reproduction cost theory, finds it it expedient to adopt, for accounting purposes, that uniform systems of accounts prescribed by the FPC and the FCC--both of which require original cost accounting.

.435 P. 13, lines 8-9: I am unable to reconcile the phrase "which are otherwise exempt from this chapter" with the broad definition of the term "public utility" as set forth in sec. 42.05.615(2) as applied to municipal corporations.

P. 13, lines 9-10: The present law, AS 42.05.290, provides that any "generally recognized system of accounting" can be followed, but the term "generally recognized" is not defined. Consequently, the various utilities in any given class are free to follow different systems. This completely destroys any effort to bring about uniformity of accounting procedures. Accounting uniformity is essential in utility regulation because without it the Commission cannot compare the accounts of one utility with those of others of the same kind without extensive analysis. Meaningful statistics cannot be compiled without such analyses in the absence of uniformity. In my 34 years of regulatory experience I have never found a state or federal regulatory agency that does not require uniform systems of accounts for the utilities they regulate. It is important to achieve effective regulation because it simplifies the task of maintaining constant surveillance which enables commissions to quickly determine whether or not there is good cause to suspect that any given utility is earning more than a reasonable return on its investment. In short the law, as it stands, should be changed in the manner indicated so that the Commission will not be hampered in its efforts to regulate utilities effectively--and without excessive and unnecessary cost to the State. The Commission is, of course, aware of the fact that the task of bringing about accounting uniformity cannot be accomplished overnight. It may take a considerable period of time--but it is something which, in the long run, must be done, as other states have discovered after many years of experience.

In view of the foregoing facts and circumstances I am compelled to say I prefer section 42.05.431 of SB 128 over section 42.05.435(a) of SB 54. However, I see nothing wrong with subsection (b) of 42.05.435.

.455 I think this section should be omitted because it requires burdensome reporting by utilities for no good reason other than to obtain information. The information that is required is along the lines of what is required in a public law regulating the issuance of securities by public utilities such as RCW 80.08.030 of the laws of Washington State which I administered for over 17 years. But the Washington law gives the Commission the power to grant, deny, or condition and restrict the issuance of securities. In the absence of this follow-up power, I see no good reason for this section. Further, I believe the APSC would be better off, at this stage of the game, if it did not undertake the task of regulating utility security issues.

.505 No comment except I recommend that a period be placed after the word "chapter" in line 3 and the rest of the sentence be stricken.

.525 I suggest that this section be re-written as follows:

Penalties. (a) In addition to all other penalties provided by law, any person who knowingly violates or knowingly aids in the violation of any provision of this chapter, or of any rule, regulation or order of the commission adopted under this chapter, is subject to a penalty of not more than $100 for each violation and, in the event of a continuing violation, not more than $100 for each day that the violation continues.

(b) The commission is authorized to determine, after hearing initiated by a complaint describing the alleged violation or violations with reasonable particularity, the existence of any violation described in (a) of this section and to impose such monetary penalties, not to exceed the amount provided in (a) of this section, as it deems justified under the circumstances. The determination and penalty imposed by the commission shall be enforced by suit commenced in the Superior Court by the Attorney General in the name of the commission.

(c) In the event the commission elects not to proceed pursuant to (b) of this section, or in the event a complaint is not answered within the time provided by the commission for answer, the Attorney General shall enforce the provisions of (a) of this section by suit commenced in the Superior Court in the name of the commission. In all such actions, the procedure and rules of evidence shall be the same as are applicable in ordinary civil actions.

(d) All penalties recovered under this section shall be paid into the general fund of the State of Alaska.

REASONS: At a meeting of the Legislative Council in Anchorage on October 12, 1968, Senator Brad Phillips asked me what the Commission could do in the event it made an investigation of a utility and found its services and facilities were sub-standard and that complaints to that effect by its customers were fully justified. I had to inform him our only recourse, under the present law, would be to revoke the utility's certificate of public convenience and necessity, in which event the company would then be free to completely abandon service if it so desired. It was then I informed him I had suggested last year that we have a monetary penalty law to take care of such cases and he seemed to think it was a good idea. In fact, he said the Legislative Council was going to meet again before the next session and would like to have all of our recommendations at that time.

It is very apparent to anyone who views the matter realistically that one of the most outstanding defects in AS 42.05 is the almost complete absence of any effective enforcement tools. The only specific enforcement provisions I find in the law as it stands now are for the purpose of dealing with specific problems. (See AS 42.05.055, AS 42.05.200, and AS 42.05.550). Insofar as I can determine, if there are any other enforcement tools that can be applied to other infractions of the governing law, they will be found in AS 44.62--the Administrative Procedure Act. It is my understanding, also, that the Commission must turn all of its enforcement problems over to the Attorney General--a tremendous burden. There is no procedure whereby the Commission can take direct action to deal with violations of AS 42.05. This is comparable to depriving State Patrolmen of the power to arrest traffic violators. The purpose of this proposed legislation is to remedy the situation and at the same time relieve the Attorney General of carrying the full burden of enforcement. There is absolutely nothing more frustrating to an administrator of laws containing numerous mandatory provisions than to be forced, as a practical matter, to depend almost exclusively upon voluntary compliance with the law and to have no prompt and effective recourse when voluntary cooperation is not forthcoming. In short, it is completely unrealistic to expect truly effective administration of AS 42.05 as it is now written, unless the APSC has a realistic means of enforcement.

.605 Sec. (2) cannot be reconciled with lines 8 and 9 on page 13 where reference is made to the exemption of municipally-owned utilities.

Sec. (2)(A) This section in the present law has been extremely difficult to interpret and administer as evidenced by the attached request for an opinion of the Attorney General and the opinion which contains the following statement: "But only one thing seems certain, the legislature must not have been aware of the collateral problems it created by the amendment."

Attention is also directed to omission of the words "for compensation" which is a qualification that is present in the definitions of all other types of utilities.

There is reason to believe that the term "telephone" needs to be more specifically defined. Should it include mobile telephone systems that are not connected with a local telephone exchange or a long-lines carrier? Shoudl it also include a wire line telephone utility not connected to a long-lines carrier? Should it include a mobile telephone service operated by a certificated company that has no telephone exchange of its own but does have a patch connection with a wire line exchange that, in turn, is connected with a long-lines carrier?

In view of previously recommended changes, I suggest that the term "tariff" be defined as follows:

"Tariff" means any or all rates, charges, tolls, rules or regulations of a utility relating to commodities or services furnished by a utility to the general public for compensation and every map, page, adoption notice, instrument or other document filed with the Commission setting forth the terms and conditions under which utility services or commodities are offered to the public together with instruments of concurrence and all other documents and data setting forth the terms of a utility's business relations with any other utility insofar as they affect the general public either directly or indirectly.

MEMORANDUM

State of Alaska

TO: Kent Edwards
Attorney General
Department of Law

DATE : September 12, 1968

FROM: Don Hall
Executive Director
Public Service Commission

SUBJECT: AS 42.05.640(2) as Re-enacted by HCSCSSB 167 (Chapter 188, Laws of 1968, Second Session)

AS 42.05.640(2), (A) provides that the term "public utility" or "utility" includes electric, telephone, and telegraph utilities "which produce an annual gross income in excess of $25,000. Prior to the effective date of the new law (July 29, 1968), all such utilities were included in the term "public utility" without regard to their annual gross revenue. It appears from the latest available information that approximately 16 electric, telephone, and telegraph utilities had gross revenues of less than $25,000 from operations during their latest fiscal year, and therefore, are not subject to regulation by the Commission.

Unfortunately, the problem of administering the new law is not limited to a simple determination of which utilities no longer fall within the definition of the term "public utility." The Alaska Public Service Commission has directed me to ask you for a legal opinion on these additional administrative problems as outlined below:

1. Can the Commission continue to regulate a utility simply because it states that it wishes to submit to regulation even though it is exempt from regulation by the controlling law? This is not a theoretical question as evidenced by the attached letter dated July 31, 1968 from John B. Heafer, President of Greater Anchorage Borough Telecommunications, Inc.

2. Is there an implied requirement that the Commission must specifically revoke all certificates of public convenience and necessity previously issued to utilities that are no longer required to have a certificate? The problem here is that these utilities were put to considerable time, effort, and expense to obtain their certificates. Some are now approaching the $25,000 gross revenue figure, and may reach it in the near future, at which time they would again be required to have a certificate.

In addition, there is a possibility the next legislature might strike the gross revenue requirement from the law, in which case all utilities would again be required to have a certificate. If it is discretionary with the Commission as to whether or not it should revoke the aforementioned certificates, could the Commission legally reinstate them (due to increased revenues or a change in the law) without requiring a new application and possibly a hearing? If the Commission could legally reinstate such certificates without application or hearing, it would simplify the task of reasserting its regulatory jurisdiction and, of course, spare the utilities a lot of time and expense. If this procedure is improper, what course of action would be open to the Commission to force the re-certification of a utility in the event it does not voluntarily make application?

3. If a utility with annual gross revenue in excess of $25,000 should apply for a certificate to serve an area served by a utility that has been de-regulated, would the Commission be within its legal rights to deny it on the grounds that it would result in duplication of utility facilities? Would it be within its legal authority to grant such an application if it found that the area could be served more adequately by the certificated utility?

4. Attached hereto is a letter from the Alaska Village Electric Cooperative, Inc. inquiring if it is required to obtain a certificate to serve five villages this year. The basic question is whether or not the Commission should require the Cooperative to apply for a certificate on the basis of projected revenues in excess of $25,000 or whether the Commission should inform the Cooperative that no certificate will be required until such time as it has actually earned $25,000 gross revenue during any consecutive 12-month period. Your opinion in this regard is needed right away because of the urgent need to start construction to serve five villages this year. If a certificate is required, the REA probably will not advance construction funds until the Cooperative has obtained a certificate authorizing it to serve the five villages.

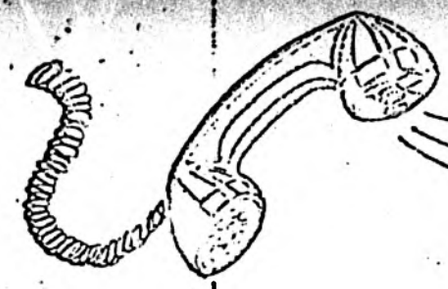
5. In the event the Commission had good reason to believe, or even suspected, that an electric, telephone, ~~communications~~ had earned gross revenue in excess of $25,000 in any given annual period, would it have a right to demand access to its accounting records to determine the facts in regard to its annual revenue? If not, what legal recourse, if any, would the Commission have to ascertain the facts necessary to require certification? This will undoubtedly become a problem in respect to certifying the Alaska Village Electric Cooperative either this year or next year when its gross revenues will apparently exceed $25,000. A corollary question is what legal penalty a utility would become subject to if it failed, or refused, to apply for a certificate after its annual revenue exceeds $25,000.

6. Also attached hereto is a copy of the statement of profit and loss of Sidney C. and Shirley J. Childers, dba Communications Equipment & Service Co., who have applied for a certificate of public convenience and necessity. The Commission received the said application prior to the effective date of the new law.



According to the data they submitted, the public utility portion of their business had expenses in 1967 of $27,541 from which could be imputed a gross revenue greater than $25,000; however, the question is whether or not the Commission may issue a certificate to the Childers at this time when their actual "utility" revenue was only $15,322 for the year.

A decision on the issuance of a certificate is a matter of urgency for the Childers since the FCC won't grant them an MCC license until they are able to show either that they have appropriate operating authorization from the State or that no such authorization is required. (They are operating now under the pseudo-authority of an FCC license which was issued to a predecessor company.)

Dear Mr. Hall:

This utility has complied with the request contained in the above reference. However, the Alaska Statute does not prohibit a utility from voluntarily subjecting itself to regulation by the Commission. Accordingly, in the public interest, this utility respectfully requests that it be continued under regulation for the service area so designated in its certificate.

Mr. Don Hall
Executive Director
ALASKA PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION
700 Mackay Building
338 Denali Street
Anchorage, Alaska 99501

Dear Mr. Hall:

This letter is to advise you that we are starting construction on a Rural Electrification Project to include approximately 60 villages in the State of Alaska.

The projected gross revenue upon completion of the entire construction project is $1,500,000 per year. Present plans indicate that we will complete construction of distribution systems in five villages in this calendar year. Annual revenue will be less than $25,000 per year from each of the five villages during the first five years of their operation. However, next year we contemplate the installation of an additional 25 projects and some of these will exceed $25,000 per year in revenue.

Will you please acertain for us whether or not our entire project will be subject to regulation by the Public Service Commission or will it be necessary for us to apply for certificates only for these individual villages where we expect the revenue to exceed $25,000 per year.

Any cooperation you can give us in this matter will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

W. C. Rhodes

FORM SA-18

MEMORANDUM State of Alaska

TO: Don Hall, Executive Director
Alaska Public Service Commission
Anchorage

DATE : November 13, 1968

FROM: G. Kent Edwards
Attorney General

By: George L. Benesch
Assistant Attorney General

SUBJECT: Effect of 1968 amendment (Sec. 1, Ch. 188, SLA 1968) on jurisdiction of Public Service Commission to certificate utilities prior to actual operation.

The question to which this opinion is primarily directed can be stated as follows:

Does the 1968 amendment establish the prerequisite that a new utility actually be operating and have realized the specified revenue before it comes within the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission? Stated another way, does it preclude commission certification of all prospective utilities?

At the outset we advise that all interpretations of the amendment create difficult problems, of application, regulation, enforcement and discretion. The answer is essentially a matter of determining the legislative intent. But only one thing seems certain, the legislature must not have been aware of the collateral problems it created by the amendment.

In our judgment, the matter requires legislative clarification. This should be sought at the earliest possible time.

If it is necessary or desirable for the commission to take positive action within the framework of the amendment prior to legislative clarification, our interpretation is as follows:

(a) An operating utility which grosses $25,000 or less during a full year of operation is not a public utility for the purposes of regulation.

(b) A utility which has not yet operated a full year but which is not expected to receive more than $25,000 gross revenue during its first full year of operation, is not subject to the commission's regulatory jurisdiction.

(c) A prospective utility whose gross revenue during its first full year of operation is reasonably projected at $25,000 or less is not subject to the commission's regulatory jurisdiction.

(d) All other utilities, whether prospective or operating, are within the commission's jurisdiction unless specifically exempted by AS 42.05.645.

(e) All utilities exempt from regulation simply because of the $25,000 limitation come within commission jurisdiction as soon as that limitation is exceeded in actual operations.

Although the language of the amendment is, in many respects, unfortunate and inadequate, we believe that the single, basic objective of the legislature was simply to relieve small utility systems from the presumed burdens of regulation. The systems it had in mind are defined in terms of annual monetary income. We are convinced that the legislature did not intend to otherwise change the commission's jurisdiction beyond achieving that objective. It is reasonably certain that the legislature considered the application of the amendment to be one of simple mechanics and procedure. That the application may prove to be difficult and involve numerous unforeseen legal problems does not necessarily mean that the legislature must have intended a more far-reaching jurisdiction restriction which would avoid some of those problems. This is particularly true in this case. Any interpretation of the amendment, different from that we have given here, also involves comparable difficulties and legal problems.

The provisions of the 1968 amendment with which we are here concerned reads as follows:

> AS 42.05.640(2). "'Public utility' or 'utility' includes every corporation, whether public, cooperative, or otherwise, company, individual, or association of individuals, their lessees, trustees, or receivers appointed by a court, that owns, operates, manages or controls any plant, pipeline, or systems for
> (A) the generation, transmission, or distribution of electric energy and power, or the furnishing of telephone or telegraph communications, any of which produces an annual gross income in excess of $25,000;". (Underlining added.)

Except for the language underlined above (which is new language) this quoted portion of the amendment reads exactly the same as the statute it supersedes.

The amendment is written in the present tense. But, as a matter of fact, the superseded statute also sounded in the present tense. Neither the previous statute nor the amendment says anything about a prospective utility. The tense employed in both appears to have been essentially a matter of convenience, without special meaning. AS 01.10.050 together with AS 01.10.020 provide the interpretive rule that "words in the present tense include the past and future tenses" unless "the construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intent of the legislature."

The "manifest intent" which must be ascertained here is not whether the legislature intended to exclude small utility systems from regulation. This intent is quite obvious. The interpretive problem is rather to determine whether the legislature intended to do away with certification of all prospective utilities irrespective of size.

If the legislature did not intend the broader exemption, then the achievement of the more limited objective is a matter of commission procedure rather than statutory interpretation.

In assessing the legislative intent, AS 42.05.640(2) must be read in context with the other provisions of AS 42.05. In this vein it should be kept in mind that AS 42.05.640(2) is simply a "definition" statute. It merely defines a "public utility" or "utility." The amended definition even encompasses municipal utilities.

As a definition statute the 1968 amendment reflects some improvements over its predecessor. The statute previously included a number of exemptions to the commission's jurisdiction. These exemptions are now removed from the definition and incorporated in a separate exemption statute, AS 42.05.645.

Having determined to remove primarily jurisdictional matters from the definition, it would be inconsistent to conclude that the legislature intended to nevertheless provide therein a new, purely jurisdictional limitation that removes all authority over all non-operating utilities. If this had been an objective of the legislature, it seems certain that it would have been expressly stated and placed elsewhere in the chapter, for example as an amendment to AS 42.05.193 or as an exemption in AS 42.05.645.

As a practical matter, the definition provided in the amendment is also jurisdictional in nature. But, aside from the fact that the amendment is written in the present tense (a matter already discussed), there is nothing to indicate that the legislature intended it to revoke commission jurisdiction over all prospective utilities.

The 1963 Legislature imposed certification requirements upon all public utilities coming within the commission's jurisdiction. (Sec. 1, Ch. 95, SLA 1963). Thus prospective as well as operating utilities were to be regulated. But this was accomplished by enacting a new statute, AS 42.05.193, not by amending the definition statute. AS 42.05.193 provides that "no public utility shall operate after January 1, 1964, without first having obtained . . . a certificate. . . ." By law, then, no public utility can now gain operating experience prior to certification unless otherwise exempt.

A companion statute, AS 42.05.196, enacted by the same legislature, grants the commission discretionary authority to "issue a certificate as requested or for good cause shown deny the same in whole or part." This discretionary authority is limited by a grandfather clause applied to utilities which were "actually operating in good faith on October 15, 1962 . . . or . . . installing the facilities necessary to furnish service under a franchise as of that date." (AS 42.05.194).

The language of these certification statutes remains the same today. The commission derives its jurisdictional authority and guidance from them insofar as prospective utilities are involved. Neither the definition statute nor the exemption statute expressly revokes that authority.

Certification of prospective utilities is a very important function to effective regulation. The rescission of such authority should not be presumed in the absence of a clear indication that that was the result intended. In order to find such an intention in the 1968 definition amendment it would also be necessary to conclude that the legislature intended to do away with all future certification. Delay of certification until after a utility has commenced operation is analogous to closing the barn door after the horse escapes. A principal objective of certification is establishment of controlled monopoly. Furthermore, this interpretation would lead to perhaps the most complicated legal problems of any interpretation.

What, for example, happens to the utility that builds its system, commences operations and shortly thereafter grosses $25,000? Must it wait until that point in time to receive certification? And must it cease operation thereafter until certified? Furthermore, does the commission still have the discretion at that time to grant or deny certification?

Theoretically, the answers to all three questions would be yes. The 1968 amendment could not be construed as yielding a different result. These could be very serious problems where two prospective utilities build competing facilities to serve the same area; or if the new utility was seeking a certificate in an area already certificated.

Thus we arrive at the conclusion that if the commission previously had jurisdiction to certificate proposed utility systems (and we find that it did), it was not divested of that authority by the 1968 amendment. The basic difference now is that the commission must first determine whether a particular system or prospective system is that of a utility within the "25,000" definition. Although it may be difficult in some instances, we doubt that this is an insurmountable task. The degree of difficulty in performing a task does not negate jurisdiction.

Even though the commission may not have jurisdiction over a particular utility system which will not gross $25,000, it nevertheless has the inherent authority to make that determination. 1/

We recognize that our conclusions in this matter leave a number of pressing questions on application unanswered. Hopefully, however, it provides a sufficient working guide to permit reasonable functioning of the commission in the area of prospective utilities until such time as the legislature takes corrective measures. It would be our thought that any prospective utility can voluntarily confer jurisdiction on the commission by stating that it expects to produce an annual gross income in excess of $25,000. Whether or not the commission necessarily loses jurisdiction thereafter if the first full year of actual operating experience shows less than $25,000 is a question we defer until such time as it may arise. We suggest, however, that in the case of a voluntary invitation to continued jurisdiction there may be room for relying on a future projection, even for an operating utility.

1/ In Sayre Land Co. v. Pennsylvania Public Utilities Commission, (1959) 27 PUR3d 502, the Pennsylvania Court of Common Pleas stated "The commission has the function to determine the existence of the fact of ownership or operation of public utility facilities, upon which fact the commission's jurisdiction over public utilities depends."

Re: Senate Bill No. 128 - Alaska Public Service Commission

Dear Senator Haggland:

I wrote to you on February 17, 1969 regarding Senate Bills Nos. 54 and 128. That letter was principally with respect to the composition of the Commission, the employment of Hearing Officers and the advantages of having at least one full-time Commissioner. Since writing that letter I have obtained from the Secretary of State information concerning the amount paid for Hearing Officers in the important proceedings before the Commission. The following is offered for your information:

1966-67 Application of Native Village of Tyonek, $1,680.00

Rates, services and facilities of Alaska Electric Light and Power Company, $3,318.50

1967-68 Rates of A. J. Industries, Inc.,$3,279.02

Applications of North State Telephone and Glacier State Telephone, $13,369.20.

The following are observations concerning Senate Bill No. 128 and to some extent the same apply to Senate Bill No. 54.

The present law requires that one member of the Commission be an attorney, one an engineer and one an accountant. I was instrumental in having that provision put in the present law and I think it is essential that the Commission have talent which includes all of these three fields in order for the Commission to be able to sit down and make intelligent decisions without reference to information other than is contained in the record of the proceeding. Under my proposal for a full-time Commissioner I believe he should be an attorney.

The bill requires that tariffs be filed according to rules set by the Commission. The Commission has never adopted any tariff rules, but it is in the process of doing so.

The bill sets up a procedure for obtaining reparations for charges which have been unreasonable, but collected according to a tariff, provided that the rates have not previously been determined by the Commission as fair and reasonable. The Commission has had a rate proceeding for Alaska Electric Light and Power Company in which it has approved the rates. So far as I know, all other utilities filed their rates at the time they received Certificates of Public Convenience and Necessity and have never had those rates approved. Therefore, in any future proceeding, if the Commission determines that the rates which have been charged have been excessive, it could order a refund to customers, many of whom could not even be found. This would be making rates retroactively and in my opinion is strictly unconstitutional. The common law is that rates cannot be made retroactively and refunds cannot be ordered to be made by a Commission except where rates have been put into effect on the condition that a portion of the revenue be put in a trust fund and refunded later if it is determined that the temporary rates are excessive. I have been advised by the attorney for the Commission that he caused this provision to be inserted in the law and admitted it was a job done in a hurry without a great deal of thought.

Section 42.05.351 provides that there be no unreasonable discrimination in rates "either as between localities or between classes of service". Therefore, if you are furnishing telephone service in a city where you have a density of population amounting to hundreds or thousands per square mile you cannot charge any more than you would in a rural area where the density of population is only ten or fifteen customers to the square mile. Moreover, a utility which operates in several communities would have to have the same rate for each community regardless of the cost of service. For instance, in one community you may have a fine head of water and produce all of the power by a hydroelectric system at a very low cost whereas in another community you have to operate with small diesel engines at very high cost. The provision against discriminating for classes of service is also unrealistic. Almost all electric and telephone rates distinguish between the service for business establishments and those for domestic establishments. Under this provision a business establishment which may have hundreds of telephone calls in a day could not be charged any more than a householder who only had a few calls a day.

Section 42.05.431 provides for a system of accounts and submission to the Commission within 75 days after the close of an annual accounting period of a report of the operations. These reports are prepared and certified by the accountants under present law. Particularly at the end of the calendar year corporations find it impossible to get their auditors to complete their audits and submit reports within 75 days. The Internal Revenue Service allows three and one-half months for filing income tax returns and an accountant can automatically get an extension of time by mailing a form stating that he is unable to complete the audit and returns on time. Most corporations do not file within the three and one-half months because they do not have the reports. This provision is wholly unrealistic and there should be an allowance of three and one-half months with the right of the Commission to extend the time for good cause shown.

Section 42.05.511 needs revision. It provides that the surplus, profits and operating margins of public utilities shall be distributed in accordance with the bylaws or ordinances controlling the utility. The words "operating margins" should be deleted for obvious reasons. Since utilities are under the control of the Public Service Commission, no control by municipal ordinances should be permitted. This section would allow the Commission to adopt regulations governing the distribution of surplus, profits and operating margins. In other words, the Commission could regulate by some unknown manner the amount of distributions to shareholders or prohibit them entirely. There is nothing wrong with allowing a public utility commission to enjoin the distribution of profits in the form of dividends if such distribution will impair the ability of the utility to furnish adequate and reliable service. There is no reason to give the Commission any more than this limited authority.

The Legislature has never amended the Municipal Code to delete the power of political subdivisions to regulate utilities so as to prevent a conflict between the powers granted to political subdivisions and those granted to the Public Service Commission.

Section 29.10.141 allows the Council to grant franchises for the exclusive right to furnish utility services. This power has been transferred to the Public Service Commission which issues Certificates of Public Convenience and Necessity. Since the authority of the Commission was granted subsequent to the authority granted to municipalities it is my opinion that the authority of the Commission is exclusive but it is very confusing to laymen to find that the law still gives the right to the municipalities to determine who shall furnish the service and in what areas. The authority of the Council to grant the use of the streets and other public places is also contained in the same section. In my opinion this power should be transferred to the Public Service Commission to be exercised under such rules and regulations as the Commission shall promulgate. In other words, if the Commission wants to allow a municipality to make a charge for the use of its streets such as the 3 per cent gross franchise tax imposed by the City of Juneau on Alaska Electric Light and Power Company, it should be allowed to do so but no municipality should be allowed to determine which utilities can use the streets when the Public Service Commission has determined who shall furnish the service. When the franchises of the presently operating utilities expire, the utilities have no rights to use the public streets and could theoretically be put out of business unless the municipalities are willing to grant such privilege on some reasonable basis. The Commission should be able to determine what is reasonable and to protect the utilities against municipalities making unreasonable charges. Alaska Electric Light and Power Company is now paying the City of Juneau in excess of $35,000 a year for the use of the streets while other public utilities pay nothing.

Section 29.10.144 gives the political subdivisions the right to regulate public utility rates and the Public Service Commission has subsequently been granted that right. This resulted about three years ago in the Attorney General of Alaska giving the Greater Juneau Borough an opinion that there was concurrent jurisdiction in both the Public Service Commission and the City to regulate rates. It seems to me that the opinion is ridiculous on its face. I have advised my clients that the Public Service Commission received its authority subsequent to the receipt of such authority by municipalities. Therefore, the Commission has exclusive jurisdiction and the Municipal Code should be amended in this regard. However, armed with that opinion from the Attorney General, the Chairman of the Greater Juneau Borough stated in a large public meeting that the Borough would regulate utility rates outside of the City of Juneau and outside of the City of Douglas.

I hope to be able to appear at the meetings which you will have on Senate Bill No. 128 but if I am not able to be present I would like to have my two letters to you on this subject read at the meeting.

Yours very truly,

STUDY OF STATE SUPERVISION OVER MUNICIPALLY OWNED UTILITIES

I. INTRODUCTION

This study is based primarily upon the article on the same subject by Charles M. Kneier appearing in 49 Columbia Law Review, pp. 180-200. Other sources are indicated by the citations.

The principal of regulation of public utilities is generally accepted since they are ordinarily monopolies, and where there is a monopoly, regulation is necessary to insure adequate service at reasonable rates. As of 1948, therefore, all of the states but Delaware had state commissions regulating public utilities. In some of these, local public utilities were largely regulated by the cities they served.

However, it is frequently questioned whether such regulation should extend to municipally owned utilities. Do the reasons for control of private monopolies apply to municipally owned public utilities? If regulation is needed, should it be by the state or by the voters of the city through their control over the city officials and by the initiative and referendum? As might be expected, the states vary greatly in the extent of regulation of such utilities.

II. DIFFERING POLICIES OF THE STATES

In many states, including Oregon, such utilities are exempt from state regulation by constitutional or statutory provisions, at least as to service within the city. A smaller group of states have statutes clearly giving some degree of state control. In some it is over service beyond the corporate limits. In others it is limited to such matters asprescribing methods of keeping accounts, requiring reports, and requiring certificates of convenience and necessity. In a third group of states the statutes and constitutions neither expressly include nor expressly exclude, control by the state commissions.

Three states, Lousiana, New Mexico, and Indiana, leave the question of state regulation up to the voters of the city, the first two by voting to ask for regulation. In Michigan and Kansas the commissions are required to advise the cities upon request, but cannot regulate city owned utilities. Other commissions give such advice and assistance informally.

III. STATE POWER TO REGULATE

A. General.

In the absence of a constitutional prohibition it is clear that the legislature may provide for regulation of municipally owned utilities by a state commission. It is equally clear that such utilities may be exempted, and privately-owned utilities cannot complain of deprivation of due process or equal protection under either the state or federal constitutions.

In Colorado, Montana and Utah the state constitutions provide that the legislature shall not delegate to a special commission any power to make, supervise, or interfere with any municipal functions. Holding that the purpose of such a provision is to "hold inviolate the right of local self-government...with re ct to municipal improvements, money, property, effects, the lev ng of taxes, and the performance of municipal functions" the Utah Supreme Court held unconstitutional a statute attempting to confer regulatory powers upon the state commission. Logan City v. Public Utilities Comm'n, (1928) 72 Utah 536, 271 Pac. 961, 972. Accord, Holyoke v. Smith, (1924) 75 Colo. 286, 226 Pac. 158; contra, Public Service Comm'n. v. Helena, (1916, held not a "special commission") 52 Mont. 527, 159 Pac. 24.

B. Home Rule As a Restriction On State Power.

Home rule usually restricts the power of the state legislature to interfere in local affairs. Under this doctrine Ohio has held that the state commission has no power to regulate rates of municipally-owned utilities, Shoemaker v. Village of Granville (Ohio Civil App., 1958) 156 N.E.2d 757. Water supply is a local affair in Oklahoma, Pitts v. Aleen (1929) 138 Okla. 295, 281 Pac. 126, and California, City of Pasadena v. Charleville, (1932) 215 Cal. 384, 10 P.2d 745. Sale and distribution of electricity is a local affair in California, Los Angeles Gas and Electric Corp. v. City of Los Angeles, (1922) 188 Cal. 307, 205 Pac. 125. The only state which permits a measure of control is Michigan, which has held that the provisions of the state labor mediation act is applicable to city employees of the utility, Local Union No. 876 v. State of Michigan Labor Mediation Board, (1940) 294 Mich. 629, 293 N.W. 809, 811. See also Antieau, Municipal Corporation Law, Section 3.19. Colorado has also held that home rule cities cannot be regulated as to utility services, at least as to service within the city limits, see infra.

C. Home Rule in Alaska.

Despite these cases and the lack of contrary decisions it is questionable whether they will be of help to Alaskan home rule cities in avoiding regulation. The local affairs-state concern dichotomy does not appear to be embodied in the Constitution of Alaska.

The convention, believing that the dichotomy led to an erosion of local powers through court decisions, instead vested "all legislative powers not prohibited by law or by charter" in home rule cities. It appears to be the intent of the framers that home rule cities would never have to ask for any enabling legislation, while reserving to the legislature the power to limit the city's powers in the event the city "abused" its powers or in the event the city came into conflict with the home rule borough (county) of which it is a part. See Article X, Constitution of Alaska, especially Sections 1, 2, and 11.

> "3. Specifically reviewed were the provisions authorizing the adoption of home rule charters. It was generally agreed that the procedure should be left to the legislature and to the local government body. The grant of powers is to be based upon "legislative powers" rather than a specific enumeration. Enumerations have frequently been restrictively interpreted by the courts. Nor was it felt desirable that the grant be on the basis of powers covering "local affairs" or "local government". Such terms have also given rise to continuous judicial interpretations, causing great uncertainty in what the actual powers of local government are. The grant of "legislative" power would be subject to restrictions contained in the constitution, to powers specifically withheld by the legislature and to powers withheld by the people in the adoption of their local charter." (emphasis added) Minutes, 24th Meeting, Committee on Local Government, Constitutional Convention. See also Minutes of the 35th and 40th Meetings.

Nevertheless, since the distriction was avoided in order to to protect the powers of home rule cities, such cities may argue that the omission was not intended to and did not sweep away the protection from unwanted and unwarranted interference by the legislature in municipal affairs, the protection which is afforded by constitutional home rule in the other states. Otherwise, the legislature could provide, for example, that home rule cities shall not use the city manager plan. Obviously there must be a line drawn somewhere, and in view of the cases cited it is at least possible that the courts would hold that the legislature cannot vest in the State Public Service Commission the power to regulate municipally-owned public utilities as to service within city limits.

This reasoning is especially applicable to certain aspects of such regulation contemplated by Chap. 199, S.L.A. 1959. Section 37 appears to give the commission control over staffing patterns, wage and salary scales, and management generally and the commission may order the correction of "abuses" which "adversely affect the cost...or service." Section 50 requires the commission to review municipal bonding ordinances, providing for issuance of bonds to construct or improve a public utility, and permits the commission to make orders in the event the commission finds that the ordinance will preclude the operation of the utility in the "best" public interest. Presumably the commission could order that proposed bonds not be issued.

It is probable that the extensions of the Fairbanks water system will be financed in part by revenue bonds and, at a lower interest rate, by general obligation bonds. Revenues would not be sufficient to finance wholly by revenue bonds. Though the interest rate would be lower, the City will probably not want to finance the extensions wholly by general obligation bonds because of the limit on such bonds in the city charter. Could the commission order the city to finance such extensions wholly by general obligation bonds? Apparently so, yet if the commission can do so, home rule in Alaska will not be a guarantee of maximum local self-government. The annual trek of city lobbyists to the state legislature will not be diminished, the only change will be that instead of seeking legislative authorization to handle their own affairs, they will be seeking to prevent further inroads of state interference.

Of course, home rule cities could, by ordinance, exempt their utilities from state control, but there can be little doubt that the legislature would react immediately to "specifically" withhold this legislative power from the cities.

D. Alaska Constitution, The "Appropriation"Clause.

One constitutional protection is, however, clearly available. "Local acts necessitating appropriations by a political subdivision may not become effective unless approved by a majority of the qualified voters voting thereon in the subdivision affected." Section 19, Article II, Constitution of Alaska. While restricted to local acts of the legislature, it seems doubtful that the State Public Service Commission could make orders requiring appropriations by the cities, as for example, to make extensions of a utility system, and avoid the election where the legislature could not do so. Not being bound by such a constitutional limitation, the state of New York appears to have required the City of New York to acquire and finance the public transit systems in that city, operational control of which was vested in a state board. See McCabe v. Voorhis (1926) 243 N.Y. 401, 153 N.E. 849 and McAneny v. Board of Estimate and Approptionment of City of New York, (1922) 232 N.Y. 377, 134 N.E. 187.

IV. EXTENT OF STATE REGULATION

A. Management.

In those states which do give regulatory powers over municipally-owned public utilities, some commissions have been relatively liberal in regulation, as compared to regulation of privately owned utilities, especially as to extensions. Further, the commissions repeatedly state that the power to regulate municipally-owned utilities is not the power to manage. Yet on occasion the commissions have invaded the area of management, ordering such utilities to give discounts on bills paid before the first of the month, to require safety guards on equipment, and to require the city to employ an engineer to inspect a building to ascertain whether the roof was in danger of collapse. Section 38 of Chapter 199, S.L.A. 1959 would appear to give carte blanche to the commission to manage city utilities once a complaint has been made. In this respect Alaska appears to vary greatly from the practice in the other states.

B. Rates and Discriminatory Practices.

Only nine states, as of 1948, gave their state commissions power to fix rates for municipal utility service within the city limits. An argument advanced in support of such regulation is that without it rates have been kept high and the surplus transferred to the general fund. This is condemned by some as inequitable, as favoring business property by reducing property taxes through surplus accumulated from the small holders, who are said to use proportionately more utilities.

Yet if to some it seems unwise to finance general city services out of utility earnings, is it necessary or good policy to control this through a state commission? If the citizens approve, why should the state interfere? If the citizens do not approve they can easily effect a change by election, recall, initiative or referendum. If such control is said to be more theoretical than practical, the same can be said of citizen control of all governmental activities. Shall the state now regulate and control the fire protection services of cities? And who shall regulate and control the state ferry system if the democratic controls provided by our constitution are deemed inadequate to prevent the state from operating it at a profit?

Speaking of profit, it should be noted that the Municipal Utilities System of the City of Fairbanks makes no contributions to the general fund, except by way of in lieu of tax payments, and the general fund is charged for utilities furnished to the city.

Though it is not yet true in Alaska, some cities have financed general operations out of utility earnings not by choice but by necessity, since many states have taken over all the best sources of tax revenue, and only through surplus earnings have city property taxes been kept within reasonable limits.

Finally, it has been well said that "experience teaches us that state government is not the repository of all wisdom."

State commissions which do have jurisdiction have found and removed discriminatory rates and other practices and, while there is somewhat greater justification for control to prevent discrimination as contrasted with control of profits, yet it is often a reasonable question as to whether a particular practice is discriminatory. Further, not only is state control contrary to the principle of local self-government, but bad practices may be corrected by the voters or by the courts, under the common law. The courts have not hestitated to correct real discrimination and other abuses wherever they have found such to exist, see McQuillin, Municipal Corporations, Sections 35.34 and 35.35, Antieau, Municipal Corporation Law, Sections 19.01, 19.02, 19.03 and 19.04.

C. Accounting and Reporting.

About 18 states have given state commissions the power to prescribe accounting methods and require reports from municipal utilities. A strong case can be made for this. Comparable statistics are needed by the public as well as the commission, and proper accounting and reporting are essential if the citizens of cities are to exercise effective local control over their municipally-owned utilities.

D. Critique.

> "Advocates of state control over municipal utilities take the position that if not necessary it is nevertheless desirable. They cite cases in jurisdictions making use of state control where rates have been increased or lowered on the basis of scientific ratemaking and not on the basis of what an uninformed public favors; where questions of discrimination in service or rates have been decided on the basis of experience and accepted practice rather than according to the influence or persuasivenss of the individual persons objecting; and where by the requirement of proper accounting and reporting not only the state commission but the people of the city have been able to judge the results of municipal operation of utilities. They look upon state control of municipal utilities as a means by which a staff of experts with accumulated knowledge assists and guides cities in the operation of their plants and saves them from errors.

A distinction might be made between the technical questions of operation of a municipally owned utility and questions of public policy. As to the latter, good practice would seem to dictate local determination, even though some mistakes might be made. The New York Public Service Commission, in refusing to grant a certificate to a village for the construction of a publicly owned electric plant, said: "The Commission is therefore called on to protect the village against itself. Public convenience and necessity do not require a village to embark on a disastrous business enterprise." Even though we assume that the case was properly decided and that the Commission did, as it suggested, protect the City against itself, there is a serious doubt as to whether the policy question of municipal ownership should be left to the determination of a state commission. If a city in some cases "burns its fingers," this is a small price to pay for local determination of public policies. And if, as many city officials feel, state commissions are in general believers in the principle of private ownership and public regulation, state control may place a serious obstacle in the path of the spread of municipal ownership. The Montana Commission, in ordering service restored to a customer, condemned as "inhuman, inconsiderate, cruel and un-American the action of the water commission and clerk in shutting off water." The customer, a county charge who failed to pay his bill, was, according to the Commission, "denied service without consideration and more despicably, more lowly and more contemptibly than he would have been by any of the predatory and greedy privately owned utilities in this state". It appears as if the practice here was bad, and the Commission was right in its disapproval. However, the management of the utility was subject to control by the electorate and the situation might have been remedied there. And if the principle of state supervision is accepted in such a case, then the door is open for interference in other questions of policy." Cited, Columbia Law Review, pp. 192, 193.

V. REGULATION WHEN SERVICE RENDERED OUTSIDE MUNICIPAL LIMITS

Here is the strongest case for state control, as the consumers are not citizens who can effect a change in policies if they are dissatisfied. In addition to nine states which regulate within as well as without the city limits, ten other states, in 1948, had given to their commission jurisdiction over service performed outside the city limits by municipally-owned public utilities. In some this is by statute, in others it is by judicial decision, and the courts have noted the need for protecting such consumers.

However, such jurisdiction is generally restricted to those cases where the city holds itself out as serving the general public beyond the city limits, thus becoming a public utility. If the city acts on a limited, contractual basis, the state commission will have no jurisdiction. Denver thus avoided regulation, though it had 4500 water users outside the city limits. Re City and County of Denver, (1937) 18 P.U.R. (N.S.).

In the absence of commission control there are varying state doctrines on the remedies available in the courts to consumers residing outside the city limits. The majority rule appears to be that the city is subject to all the common law duties of a public utility, at least where it holds itself out as such. At the other extreme, Georgia and South Carolina appear to impose no duties upon the city. At the risk of over simplification, it may be said that the remaining states require that the city not discriminate in service among such consumers and that the out of city rates not be excessive in comparison to the rates within the city, but the courts will not require the city to make extensions into new areas, nor will the courts examine the overall rate structure to determine whether the rate of return is excessive.

The reaction of this third group of states to these problems is reflected by the actions of the commissions which have regulatory powers. Most commissions permit higher rates to be charged to those consumers outside the city. Justifications for such a practice are said to be the added cost of service, the city assumes the risk of casualty losses, and, most frequently, such consumers have foregone nothing as taxpayers, and cannot expect to share in the benefits. Most commissions hesitate to order major extensions, recognizing this to be a matter of internal management, and that financing problems of such a utility are different from privately owned utilities.

VI. KNEIER'S CONCLUSION

> "That no right, conclusive, and unquestionable solution have yet been found to the problem of whether a state commission should have the same supervisory control over municipal utilities that it does over privately owned utilities is indicated by the varying practices in the states. City officials speaking as individuals and through state municipal leagues oppose such control. They look upon it as a further unnecessary interference with the right of cities to manage their own affairs. They believe that a remedy is available to the voters if there is mismanagement or if unpopular policies are adopted. If the state commissions have technical experts who can be helpful, then city officials believe their assistance should be available on a voluntary basis. The evidence, however, indicates that in the states where the latter practice has been adopted, cities have made little use of the technical service.
> Those who favor state control point to what they consider to be cases of mismanagement, discrimination in service and rates based on the political influence of individuals or groups, poor accounting methods, and rates that cannot be justified on economic grounds.

Some advocates of state control favor such a policy on the ground that it is fairer to privately owned utilities; "otherwise privately owned plants operate at a competitive disadvantage compared with municipally owned plants".

Opponents of state control are on their weakest ground when opposing supervision over methods of accounting and the requirement that reports be made to the state commission. Proper methods of accounting are not questions of policy to be left to local discretion. A state commission should be helpful, and giving control in this area can hardly be considered an encroachment on local self-government.

With an increase in the service by municipal plants beyond the corporate limits of the city, a strong case for state supervision of the rates and service can be made. Otherwise the remedies available to the outside consumer are inadequate. When served by a municipal plant he should pay higher rates than those who reside within the city. And state commissions have approved such higher rates. However, there should be a limit to the amount which he must pay for the privilege of living outside. To say that he can resort to the courts or that he can have a privately owned utility invade the field is hardly adequate.

State control of accounting or of rates charged beyond the corporate limits appears to the cities, however, as merely an opening wedge, a toe-in-the-door, and a step to full control of municipal utilities. On the basis of experience with state legislatures and with state boards and commissions, they fear a further invasion of the rights of local self-determination. The right of self-government is still charished, and this includes the management of municipally owned utilities." Cited, Columbia Law Review, pp. 196, 197.

*This table is based on state laws and the decisions of courts and public utilities commissions. The answers given in the table have been approved by the commissions in the following states: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. The Indiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island Commissions have furnished data on which the table is based, but they have not passed upon the specific answers given in the table. Data in table as of August 15, 1948.

1. Where the city takes on a few customers by special contract the commission has no jurisdiction.
2. The Indiana statute is very confusing and in fact the provisions are in conflict as to state supervision over municipally owned utilities. Data in the table based in part on Opinions of Attorney General of Indiana given to Chairman of the Public Service Commission of that state under date of April 24, 1947, and April 5, 1948.
3. The "Commission does have jurisdiction over construction and operation of all electric transmission lines outside cities and towns. Franchise is required and given after application, hearing and determination of propriety."
4. The Maryland Commission has no jurisdiction over water utilities except some very limited jurisdiction when water is supplied outside the municipal limits.
5. Baltimore is excepted from this requirement.
6. The Department of Public Utilities has no regulatory authority over municipal water system.
7. Municipal plant may not sell at less than cost of production without approval of state Department of Public Utilities; and it is limited to profit of eight per cent. Mass. Ann. Laws c.164 § 58 (1933).
8. The statutory requirement is for "towns", but this has been construed to include cities.
9. Required only for municipal gas and electric utilities.
10. No statutory provision for enforcing compliance. "Municipally owned utilities may completely disregard the forms as prescribed by the Commission."
11. Missouri municipalities have very limited power to furnish utility service beyond their corporate limits. City of Springfield v. Monday, 353 Mo. 981, 185 S.W. 2d 788 (1945); Re City of Springfield, 58 P.U.R. (N.S.) 237, 60 P.U.R.(N.S.) 161 (No. 1945); Taylor v. Dimmitt, 336 Mo. 330, 78 S.W.2d 841 (1934). The General Counsel of the Missouri Public Service Commission writes (letter dated Aug. 9, 1948) that: "If a municipally owned utility should attempt to render service to customers outside of the corporate limits, then to that extent it would lose its status as a municipal operation and would become subject to the regulation of the Commission in the same manner as any other privately owned public utility."
12. "Authorizes construction of lines, but does not issue certificates of convenience and necessity."
13. No jurisdiction over municipal water utilities except in cities of second class having over 120,000 population supplying water to inhabitants of another municipality.

14. The answer is "yes" for municipal electric utilities.
15. The answer would be "no" for municipal water utilities.
16. The answer would be "no" for municipal water utilities.
17. Commission no jurisdiction over municipal water works.
18. Consent of commission is necessary if service is extended to adjoining municipalities and a private utility is operating in the new territory.
19. "Municipal Corporation" as used in the statute means cities, boroughs, towns, townships, or counties, and also any public corporation, authority, or body whatsoever created for the purpose of rendering service similar to that of a public utility.
20. The only municipally owned utilities in Rhode Island are water works, and they are exempt from supervision by the Public Utility Administrator.
21. Electric utilities only.
22. The commission has no jurisdiction over municipally owned water, gas, or electric plants; it does have jurisdiction over the two municipally owned telephone systems. (Brookings and Beresford).
23. The Vermont commission has no jurisdiction over municipally owned water utilities.
24. The answer would be "yes" for transportation, but no municipally owned systems are operating in Virginia.

Public Service Commission

SUBJECT: HB 188 and HB 202

You asked for my comments in regard to HB 188 but made no similar request in regard to HB 202.

I have compared HB 188 and SB 54 and find that they are identical in every respect. I have also compared HB 202 with SB 128 and find that they too are identical in every respect with one exception; namely, that Sec. 42.05.691(b) of SB 128 has been omitted from HB 202. This deletion has the effect of broadening the Commission's authority.

I have already prepared detailed comments on SB 54 and SB 128, copies of which are in Mr. Sharrock's possession--and these comments, of course, apply also to their respective House companion bills.

You have the Commission's original budget in the amount of $347,800 as subsequently modified by the cost of upgrading certain positions and by adding $8,500 to cover the cost of regulating pipeline companies (principally the Alaska Pipeline Company). The cost of administering SB 54 would be somewhat greater than the cost of administering SB 128 because of the fact that SB 54 requires more extensive regulation of municipally owned and operated utilities. However, I believe that the aforementioned original budget as modified would be adequate to administer SB 54, at least during the first year.

Estimates have also been submitted regarding our budgetary requirements for the years ending June 30, 1970, 1971, and 1972. These estimates were specifically based upon administering SB 128 and consist of a three-year projection compiled in one document.

I believe the foregoing is an adequate response to your request for information in regard to the House and Senate bills mentioned above.

*The difference between this amount and the request for personnel services included on our original FY 1969-1970 budget request ($228,300 - $194,900 = $33,400) is comprised of nominal salaries for the three Commissioners plus six reclassifications which were recommended by consultants in recommendations on Commission Staffing.

200 Travel
We anticipate that our travel fund requirements, both outside and within the State, will remain fairly constant for the next three years. The moderate decrease projected for FY 1970-1971 is comprised of two items included in our present budget (ACS Sale Bid Proposal Evaluation conferences and transportation of new employees) which will no longer be needed. The moderate increase in FY 1971-1972 is anticipated because of increase in workload.

NOTE # III
300 Contractual Services
The $28,500 increase in FY 1969-1970 projected requirements is made up of the following costs:

a) $20,000 to provide funds for hearing officers appointed pursuant to AS 42.05, Section 181 of SB 128
b) $8,500 to provide funds for consultants to investigate operations of existing oil transmission pipelines within the State

The $47,400 decrease in FY 1970-1971 was computed as follows:

a) $5,100 increase in overall contractual services account due to increase in workload and change in methods and procedures utilized in accomplishing program of utility regulation.
b) $52,500 total decrease possible because of anticipated finalization of ACS sale by July 1, 1970 ($35,000); completion of investigation of safety programs of natural gas utilities ($18,500); completion of investigation of oil transmission pipelines ($8,500); and an increase of $10,000 for hearing officer fees.

NOTE # IV
400 Commodities
Our requirements in this area have reached a fairly stable level. The increase in FY 1970-1971 is necessary because of additional personnel to handle the added workload. However, we then expect requirements in this account to level off at the amount shown.

NOTE V
500 Equipment
Continuing decrease in requirements in this area is a reflection of the adequacy of budget requests made and appropriations received in the past.

NOTE VI
900 Interagency Charges
Moderate increase is for additional travel funds for the attorney on full-time assignment from Department of Law.

MEMORANDUM State of Alaska

TO: B. L. McMurtrey

FROM: Don Hall
Executive Director
Public Service Commission

SUBJECT: HB 188 and HB 202

You asked for my comments in regard to HB 188 but made no similar request in regard to HB 202.

I have compared HB 188 and SB 54 and find that they are identical in every respect. I have also compared HB 202 with SB 128 and find that they too are identical in every respect with one exception; namely, that Sec. 42.05.691(b) of SB 128 has been omitted from HB 202. COMMENTS OF CITY OF ANCHORAGE
S.B. 128 - PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

INTRODUCTION

The City of Anchorage has reviewed S.B. 128 and in this commentary would point out certain deficiencies in the bill and offer amendments to the bill. The fact that the City makes these comments and proposed amendments does not signify that the City is not strongly opposed to any jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission over municipally owned and operated utilities. The City still maintains that no sound reason exists for public service commission regulation, and that such regulation would constitute an unnecessary costly and time-consuming process to add to the almost prohibitive cost of living in this state.

This bill would establish a commission practically unlimited in its powers as the analysis will show. In addition, this bill could eliminate the City's municipal light and power utility because of its certificate requirements. This bill as designed is punitive in nature and proposes an invidious discrimination against municipally owned and operated utilities.

COMMENTS

ESTABLISHMENT

1. AS 42.05.020(a)

Add: "The Commission shall be an independent, quasi-judicial body."

Comment: The purpose of this amendment would be to establish the Commission as a "Section 26" board and to carry out the proposal that any commission having jurisdiction over valuable public properties should be a full-time commission.

2. AS 42.05.040-050.

These two sections should be repealed and reenacted as a new section to provide for qualifications commensurate with the concepts of a full-time commission .

Comment: A full-time commission is contemplated by the proposed amendment. A full-time commission should not necessarily be limited to a lawyer, engineer or accountant. The expertise in these fields, although helpful, could be supplied by staff members. Nevertheless, some qualifications should be stated so that the commission offices do not become patronage plums. It is a serious business to regulate one of the largest businesses in this state, as many of the utilities in this state constitute multi-million dollar operations. A bad commission decision may involve hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the commission should be composed of the most competent people with the full time available to dispatch with adequate review the commission business.

3. AS 42.05.091(d)

Amend the first sentence to read:

> "The annual salary for each member of the commission is the same annual salary received by the head of a principal department of the state."

Comment: The salary should be commensurate with the responsibility, and a commission member should be paid as well as the head of a state department, or as much as a superior court judge. Without such a salary incentive, it is doubtful that competent persons would be attracted to the position. The present $5,000 salary proposal may make a commissioner feel that he could afford a little more commission time, but it does not resolve the problem of providing a commission which would adequately tend to the increased number of utilities and their problems caused by regulation. The present commission apparently is of the opinion that it cannot adequately handle its present business. The present commissioners are doing the best job they can, but it is unfair to classify them as even being "part-time" commissioners because of the two or three days a month that they are able to meet. However, the extra $5,000 is not going to create even a part-time commission.

4. AS 42.05.133. Add a new section to replace existing AS 42.05.180 to read:

> "Facts and information in the possession of the commission are public and reports, files, books, accounts, papers and memoranda of every nature in its possession are open to public inspection at reasonable times, except commission work papers or agency memoranda not used by the commission in determining an issue before it. Facts and information developed or used by the commission, its staff or consultants affecting a commission proceeding or decision shall be disclosed to the parties prior to the hearing and are subject to cross-examination."

Comment: The total elimination of existing AS 42.05.180 would undoubtedly see materials required to be filed by the commission be classified as confidential information. If the commission is to regulate utilities, the utilities regulated should have full access to all of the facts, documents and statistics available to the commission without a Supreme Court case to obtain the information. The public should have a right to readily determine if the commission is accomplishing its tasks. Courts require commissions to divulge and make available for cross examination facts and statistics developed by staff personnel and usually used to brief the commission in secret. The prejudice of unknown evidence influencing a decision is evident and its use should be eliminated.

5. AS 42.05.135. Add a section to read:

"The commission shall provide for the publication of its reports, orders, decisions, rules and regulations. Publication shall be in a manner and form best adapted to public information and use."

Comment: Under the total regulation proposed by the bill the commission will build up a body of commission law and guideline which should be known to all utilities spread throughout this vast state, many of which just cannot afford to hire lawyers or other experts in Anchorage to find out what the commission requires, but who would be substantially affected by many of the commission actions, otherwise buried in files known only to the commission. Utilities and the public should have a readily available source of commission laws, decisions, policies, etc., in order to comply with proper regulations and to review the work of the commission.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION

6. AS 42.05.141(1) Amend to read:

"Supervise and regulate every public utility engaged or proposing to engage in such business within the state of Alaska except to the extent exempted by AS 42.05.641 [AND MAY DO ALL THINGS, WHETHER SPECIFICALLY DESIGNATED IN THIS CHAPTER OR IN ADDITION THERETO, WHICH ARE NECESSARY OR CONVENIENT IN THE EXERCISE OF SUCH POWER AND JURISDICTION] and the powers of the commission shall be reasonably construed to accomplish its stated purposes;"

Comment: This section clearly states that the commission may do all things in addition to those things which the Legislature has expressly empowered the commission to do. This is dangerous language and grants the commission carte blanche powers to regulate in areas in which the legislature undoubtedly would not desire the commission to regulate. No utility in this state should be subject to a complete legislative delegation of all regulatory powers to the commission. The proposed language is probably what is intended, and that is to give the powers of the commission a reasonable and not a strict construction by courts of law.

7. AS 42.05.141(6). Delete in its entirety.

[SUPERVISE AND REGULATE A PUBLIC UTILITY IN ALL OTHER MATTERS AFFECTING ITS RELATIONSHIP WITH OTHER PUBLIC UTILITIES, ITS CUSTOMERS AND WITH THE GENERAL PUBLIC.]

Make clear what is meant?

Comments: This provision is so vague as to be utterly meaningless. If a public utility is to be regulated, the public utility should understand in exactly what way it is being regulated so that it may protect itself against unwarranted and litigious commission interference. For example, this section could be construed to give the commission regulatory authority over the manner in which a city may establish a special assessment district for the furnishing of sewer or water service. The commission could presumably prescribe uniforms for customer service representatives. Such a vague grant of powers should not be tolerated by the legislature if only because the commission would not have the staff to handle every conceivable detail entrusted to it by this provision. If the commission is given power to regulate, it should be entrusted only with those matters it can regulate effectively within the power granted.

8. AS 42.05.151(a). Amend to read:

"The commission may make such reasonable regulations . . .".

Comment: As commission regulations have the effect of law, the commission regulations at their inception should be reasonable and not arbitrary.

9. AS 42.05.151(b). Amend to read:

"The commission shall by regulation establish reasonable rules of practice and procedure . . .".

Comment: The term "reasonable" here implies fundamental fairness, and due process of law does not in every case accord with what is reasonable.

10. AS 42.05.161(a) Amend to read:

> "The administrative adjudication procedures of the Administrative Procedures Act (AS 44.62) do not apply to adjudicatory proceedings of the commission except as final administrative determination by the commission are subject to decision procedure and judicial review as provided in AS 44.62.510,.520, .540, .560,.570."

Comment: The sections on judicial review are correlated to the APA sections concerning the commission decision and reconsideration. The APA provides mechanics for reconsideration of a final decision, and the judicial review sections, particularly the time for appeal, would be confusing without the prior sections containing decisions.

11. AS 42.05.161(b). Delete: Words after "rules of agency organization", lines 9-13, page 6.

Comment: The APA was originally conceived to correct the abuse of agencies adopting unknown (even to the agency) rules, including rules of practice and procedure. A person desiring to process a matter before the commission should have the right to consult the Alaska Administrative Code to determine what the rules of practice and procedure are. The APA does provide for emergency rule changes, and it is hard to visualize a situation which would be "contrary to the public interest" to avoid publication of a rule affecting public utilities. The commission should abide by its rules, and these rules should be available to everyone. The interpretive rules, general statements of policy and rules of agency organization should also be promulgated if the proposed amendment in Comment No. 5, appropriate means of making this information available, is not adopted.

12. AS 42.05.171. Amend next to last sentence to read:

> "A determination or order of a commissioner or commissioners on such an investigation or hearing, undertaken or held by him or them shall not be effective until approved and confirmed by at least a quorum of the commission upon a review of the entire record and after the parties have the opportunity for argument, to the commissioners not present at the hearing."

Comment: The amendment would add a procedural safeguard in that any commissioner who did not sit in on the hearing must have a record available and review that record. All parties should have the right to make an argument to at least a quorum of the commission when they must rely upon the cold record.

13. AS 42.05.181(d). Add new subsection to read:

"(d) The commission shall hold hearings in the locality where the utility involved is located."

pmb OK

Comment: Because of the drastic powers of the commission, it should hold hearings where the utilities are located. This amendment points out the insurmountable task of an effective commission regulation in this state.

CERTIFICATE OF PUBLIC CONVENIENCE AND NECESSITY

14. AS 42.05.191(b). Delete this subsection.

Comment: This provision is discriminatory as to utilities previously not subject to public service commission regulation. Most, if not all, service areas were granted by the commission in 1964 without a hearing or even notice of hearing, and certificates were issued without regard to the service areas of utilities not subject to commission jurisdiction.

For example, Chugach Electric Association was granted a certificate which blankets almost the entire City of Anchorage, even though Chugach was not in fact serving all of the city which was being served by the city utility. The problem becomes more acute where the blanket certificate of Chugach contains an area which is not served by either utility, and there is no actual conflict as to facilities. The fairest way to treat the new certificate problem would be to repeal without a savings clause all certificates. Further analysis will indicate that the discrimination between municipally owned utilities is even more invidious by the failure to include a grandfather clause.

15. 42.05.191(c) Delete this subsection.

Comment: Much ado has been made about service area conflicts, and protaganists for public service commission regulation have always pointed to the conflict of service area problems. Subsection (c) constitutes the magic formula of public service commission regulation which is intended to solve this conflict. The legislature merely states that the commission shall take "appropriate action" to eliminate competition and duplication of facilities" by delineation of service area or services. Surely, is the commission to be granted absolute regulation over municipal electric, telephone water and sewer utilities just so a bill may be passed to require the commission to take "appropriate action". No standards are supplied or direction given, even though the answer to the problem is simple. Unless the commission shall order one utility to relinquish its service, a doubtful conclusion of the authorization, no ready solution is offered by this entire bill. A court under simple standards, could easily and readily resolve the problem and would grant a local forum.

The commission will undoubtedly spend a couple of years and thousands of dollars of everyone's time in delineating and apportioning each resident, lot and parcel to each and every utility within this state. An appeal is bound to follow to ensure years of litigation at great cost to the consumer. But the fact exists that no duplication of facilities can be avoided except by expropriation and the payment of just compensation, a judicial matter. However, this bill does provide the commission with an even greater tool, it could conceivably destroy the competition altogether by not granting the municipal utility a certificate of public convenience and necessity.

16. AS 42.05.192. Add a section to read:

> "A certificate shall be granted if it appears to the commission that the public utility was actually operating in good faith on October 15, 1969, within the confines of the requested area, or that the public utility was installing the facilities necessary to furnish service to the requested area as of that date."

Comment: The absence of such a section in the bill as drafted represents invidious discrimination to municipally owned and operated utilities. The above section is commonly referred to as a "grandfather" provision, because it must constitutionally recognize existing rights. When the public service commission granted the original certificates of public convenience and necessity in 1964, every existing utility in this state regulated by the commission received a certificate based on its "grandfather" rights. Without exception, this state has provided in granting licenses to professions and operating authorities to motor carriers, air carriers and in all other situations where a person or entity was operating prior to the licensing, without requiring an examination or a showing of right to continue an occupation or operation within this state. However, publicly owned and financed municipally owned and operated utilities are not to be granted this long recognized right which could be destroyed by a prejudiced commission under this Act.

Certificated utilities in this state have received their grandfather certificates without a hearing or notice of hearing and have been granted more than their fair share of service areas, and have been granted areas within cities not served by them. Only an application was required to be filed with certain relevant information to grant a grandfather certificate, and most utilities had to make no showing other than to describe its area and scope of operations on the grandfather date.

Municipally owned and operated utilities, on the other hand, must come before the commission as if they were a brand new utility desiring to operate in an area with a certain utility service for the first time. The burden of proof would be upon the municipally owned and operated utilities that it would be to the public convenience and necessity to operate in each and every area in which it had previously operated prior to regualtion. The existing utility, where there is a service area conflict, would be the utility to be protected by the commission from the invasion of the certificated area by the upstart municipality, and the municipally owned and operated utilities would in most every case suffer an extreme loss of its operating territory. Municipal and bond revenues would be impaired, and the ability of the utilities to expand could be effectively destroyed. A city would undoubtedly have to hire experts and expend thousands of dollars of the consumer's money in trying to prove to the commission that it is entitled to serve a territory which conceivably could be, but in fact is not, served by the existing certificated utility.

The absence of the above section violates every concept of due process and fundamental fairness. Surely a municipally owned and operated utility should not have to bear the expense of proving public convenience and necessity, and/or of a long drawn out court fight to prevent its property being taken without due process of law and its bonding being impaired by the absence of such a right. The commission would be flooded by public convenience and necessity hearings, and without doubt many municipally owned and operated utilities would, in effect, be out of business, if the commission procedures take the not unusual two or three years for hearing and decision.

17. AS 42.05.193. Add new section to read:

"The commission upon obtaining jurisdiction and after notice and hearing shall proceed to delineate the service areas between public utilities with conflicting service areas in order to avoid duplicating facilities and services, and the commission shall consider and make full findings as to each of the following standards and preferences in making the delineation of the service areas:

(1) The commission shall consider the capabilities of the utilities involved to furnish an economically feasible and adequate service to the public in the areas in conflict without excessive or major extensions of facilities to serve the areas. The commission shall consider the ability of the utilities to expand their services and facilities into areas other than those in conflict in order to maintain appropriate expansion and a proper level of service.

(2) In areas where the conflicting facilities are close, but not intersecting or crossing, the commission shall apportion the service areas between the existing facilities in order that the existing facilities may be utilized to the fullest extent possible without duplication or unreasonable extensions of service between the existing facilities.

(3) In areas where the conflicting utility facilities are intermingled, each utility may continue to serve its existing customers. The commission shall apportion the service area to enable each utility to recoup its investment in the facilities and to make the best economic utilization of the existing facilities with the fewest and least expensive extensions of facilities.

(4) Where the facilities of one utility are substantially surrounded by the facilities of the other utility, the surrounded utility may continue to serve the existing customers within the enclave and such other customers in the proximity of the existing facilities as may enable the utility to recoup its investment and to make the best economic use of the existing facilities with the fewest and least expensive extension of facilities in the enclave.

(5) In contiguous areas where there are no existing facilities and no present demand, but a significant demand for services in the near future is likely, the commission, all other matters being equal, shall include the service area within the service area of the utility nearest the area to be served if the utility is ready, willing and able to furnish an adequate service at reasonable rates to the area and such service is economically feasible.

(6) In areas where there are no existing facilities and no present demand and a significant demand for electric utility services in the near future is unlikely to arise, the commission, particularly when an area exceeds five acres, shall not include the area within any service area until a reasonable demand or need for the service exists.

(7) In delineating any service area within a municipality, the commission shall give a preference to the municipally owned and operated utility if the municipality is ready, willing and able to serve the service area in conflict, and the extension of the municipal utility facilities into the area would be economically feasible. In delineating service areas outside municipalities, a municipally owned and operated utitity shall be given the same and equal consideration as any other public utility.

(8) Where a customer may be served by the existing facilities of more than one utility, the commission shall consider the customer's preference.

(9) The public utilities may, with the approval of the commission, assign, exchange, or otherwise transfer in writing to each other customers, facilities or service areas.

(10) "service area" as used in this section, includes any territory in which the utility is furnishing service to the public, or any territory which a utility claims is an extension of the territory in which the utility is presently providing service."

Comment: This section would provide the commission with reasonable guidelines to delineate areas and to protect municipal utilities from unfortuitous commission action based on the sole fact that cooperatives have received prior certificates from the commission. The section would permit the commission to apportion the service area with the least possible additions of new facilities and to avoid the taking of property without due process payment of just compensation.

The section illustrates the fact that the commission just cannot order a utility to abandon facilities and customers at the whim of the commission. If the legislature intends to "clean up" service areas, the legislature must provide other legislation which will contain provisions for the payment of just compensation for the facilities and business lost. Because any such matter will be appealed to the courts, jurisdiction in the courts in the first instance will save the affected utilities and the state thousands of dollars and time in having only one procedure. Besides, the commission has no expertise in such matters.

Any legislative action does not establish standards and the vested rights of cities is totally unacceptable to cities which recognize the announced prejudice of the commission to protect its regulated utilities.

The City of Anchorage is working on a bill which it intends to propose to the legislature to resolve the conflict problem as to duplicating and intermingled facilities, based on legislation from other jurisdictions having the same problem. The City legislation would not involve commission action.

18. AS 42.05.221(a). Amend the first sentence to read:

> "Except as otherwise provided in this section, no public utility may discontinue or abandon a service for which a certificate has been issued by the commission unless upon the application of the public utility and if after notice and opportunity for hearing the commission finds that discontinuance or abandonment [WILL NOT MATERIALLY HARM THE PUBLIC INTEREST] is not required by public convenience and necessity.

Appears good amendment

Comment: The same test set forth in (b) for resumption should be required for discontinuance. A discontinuance of service may be justified on the grounds of economic feasibility, lack of facilities, etc., even though the public interest might be "materially harmed".

19. AS 42.05.231. Delete in line 22, page 9 the language

> "includes but is not limited to" and lines 28-29 stating: [FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH THE PROVISIONS OF THIS CHAPTER OR THE RULES, REGULATIONS OR ORDERS OF THE COMMISSION]"

Comment: No utility should be placed in the position of having to guess what might be good cause for the loss of its certificate to operate, where the "not limited to" language grants the commission unlimited grounds. If the commission may revoke a certificate, the standards for revocation should be specifically set forth. Blanket provisions such as this have been stricken as being unconstitutional.

The fourth ground is extremely and unreasonably punitive. In the first place, no allowance is made for a lawful failure to comply with a commission order, etc. In the second place, there are ample grounds for enforcement of a commission order both civilly and criminally. The purpose of the public service commission is to "regulate" a utility and not to have the power of life or death over that utility. The commission did not create or finance the utility, nor should it have the unrestrained authority to revoke a certificate upon the slightest pretext that an insignificant regulation of the commission has been violated. In view of the prior section, which does not require "reasonable" rules or regulations, this provision is extremely onerous. The ability of the commission to revoke a certificate upon the slighest pretext can lead to great abuses of power because a utility must live in fear of punitive action in a variety of unknown ways, including specially designed orders and regulations to be punitive.

SERVICES AND FACILITIES - JOINT USE

20. AS 42.05.251(a). Amend the first sentence to read:

> "Each public utility shall furnish and maintain reasonably adequate [EFFICIENT, SAFE AND REASONABLE] service and facilities.

Comment: The amendment would change the statute back to the existing language. The added words seem to be innocuous enough, but they do underly a basic concept of more commission control and authority.

For example, what are "safe" services and facilities? By the addition of this little word, the legislature makes the public service commission the guardian and inspector for the state of the safety of every utility and utility plant in this state. It is submitted that there are other local and state laws and methods of enforcement of this provision which could permit the revocation of a certificate for what the commission thinks is a minor safety violation. If a safety problem exists the commission can refer the matter to the proper authority.

The commission is further given the power to inquire into management prerogatives and utility financing to an unreasonable extent. In the first place the word "adequate" generally includes efficiency. In the second place, the word "efficient" is not qualified by the word "reasonably" and this qualification is important. There is little doubt in this state that many utilities exist which do not have efficient service and facilities if only because of the economic feasibility to provide them. The word "reasonably" implies that a utility cannot do what it does not have the resources to do. Again the commission has arbitrary authority to dictate to a utility how the utility shall conduct its business, even though adequate facilities are provided.

21. AS 42.05.251(c). Delete on lines 16-17 the language:

"including the crossing of facilities".

Add the following sentence:

"In so doing, the commission shall conform to the standard practices of the industry."

Comment: It is not clear what the phrase "the crossing of facilities" means, a term more appropriate to Luther Burbank. The phrase could mean that the state and municipalities would no longer have any authority to control over roads and rights-of-way, a not too unlikely a possibility, in view of prior public service commission attempts to destroy the operations of the city electric utility by having the state highway department deny permits. The commission apparently acknowledges that it cannot handle today's business let alone handle all right-of-way permits.

The addition of the sentence would require the commission, as much as possible, to adhere to the standards of the industry. A utility and its management necessarily is bound by certain national standards in its practices and equipment, and a nascent public service commission hardly has the wisdom to change these standards. The utilities should have some objective standard by which they are protected against arbitrary and unreasonable commission action.

22. AS 42.05.251(d). Amend to read as follows:

"Whenever the commission, upon its own motion or upon complaint, after providing reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing finds that the service or facilities of a public utility are unreasonable, [UNSAFE] inadequate, [INSUFFICIENT], or unreasonably discriminatory, or otherwise in violation of this chapter, the commission shall determine and prescribe by regulation or order the reasonable [,] and [SAFE] adequate [SUFFICIENT] service or facilities to be observed, furnished, enforced or employer [INCLUDING ALL SUCH REPAIRS, CHANGES, ALTERATIONS, EXTENSIONS, SUBSTITUTIONS OR IMPROVEMENTS IN FACILITIES] as shall be reasonably necessary and proper for the [SAFETY] accommodation [,] and convenience of the public and shall fix the same by its order or regulation."

Comment: Changes are to clean up and delete unnecessary language in view of the prior comments concerning safety and in that adequate certainly includes sufficient service. The "including" language is not necessary in view of the prior comprehensive language.

23. AS 42.05.271(a). Amend the first section to read:

"A public utility having sewers, conduits, utilidors, poles, pole lines, pipes, pipelines, mains or other distribution or transmission facilities shall, for reasonable compensation, permit another utility to use them when public convenience and necessity requires such use and the use will not then or in the planned forseeable future result in substantial injury to the owner, or in substantial detriment to the service to the customers of the owner.

Comment: The planned upgrading or change in facilities may create, not now but a future situation which would cause substantial injury.

24. AS 42.05.271(b). Amend by inserting in line 8, page 12, after "public utility" the words:

"subject to regulation by the commission".

Comment: No interconnection should be required by a regulated to a nonregulated utility. At present telephone toll facilities are owned and operated by the federal government. The federal government has always used it leverage of not being subject to regulation in enforcing its will upon all telephone utilities in this state. No utility in this state should be required to connect merely because ACS expects the Alaska consumers to subsidize its entire operations by unfair toll separation settlements or other actions.

25. AS 42.05.301. Add a new subsection (b) to read:

"(b) In providing for testing, standards and measurements of meters or appliances, the commission shall conform to the standard practices of the industry."

Comment: Again industry standards should be followed by the commission, as the commission undoubtedly should adopt such standards when required.

26. AS 42.05.311. Add a new sentence after the first sentence to read:

"In so doing, the commission shall conform to the standard practices of the industry."

Comment: Again the commission would be required to do what it probably would do in any event.

RATES AND RATE SCHEDULES

27. AS 42.05.321(c) Amend to read:

"The commission may reject for filing all or part of a tariff which does not comply with the reasonable form or filing regulations of the commission. The commission may reject upon notice and hearing all or part of a tariff which is not consistent with this chapter or the reasonable regulations of the commission. A tariff or provision so rejected is void."

Comment: The commission should be able to reject a tariff which does not meet the minor, ministerial form and filing requirements of a tariff without notice and hearing. However, the commission should not arbitrarily be permitted to reject a tariff without a notice and hearing, and a public utility should be protected from arbitrary action, in having its vital rates denied without reason and hearing.

28. AS 42.05.321(d). Add a new subsection to read:

"Special arrangement contracts affecting rates and charges shall likewise be filed with the commission."

Comment: A utility at times, because of unusual or special circumstances not precisely covered by tariff, will enter into an agreement to furnish a utility service. Such agreements are usually made with a large user of electric power for example, because of the load and other factors not commonly present. Wholesale contractors for power are another source of agreement. The act should be made clear that these agreements are permissible under special circumstances.

29. AS 42.05.321(e). Add a new section to read:

"A municipality is entitled to a fair and reasonable rate of return in fixing the rates of municipally owned and operated utility, and a municipality may include in the utility revenue requirements a franchise fee and an amount the utility, if investor owned, would have paid to the municipality for taxes."

Comment: This section would insure that a municipally owned and operated utility will not be treated differently than an investor owned utility as to rates. A municipally owned and operated utility is entitled to the same return on its invested capital and should meet the same requirements as to franchise fees and taxes as would an investor owned utility.

29. AS 42.05.351(b). Delete this section.

Comment: This section apparently serves no good purpose if the commission does have the jurisdiction over the utility furnishing the toll. At present the commission has no jurisdiction over ACS and it is difficult to determine what this specific section intends. On the other hand, it appears that the utility "demanding" the charge is the culprit. Telephone utilities in Alaska operate as the collector of ACS tolls in return for which they obtain a certain toll settlement charge per call. The local telephone company has absolutely no authority over the rates charged by ACS, or over any connecting carrier. A local interconnecting company should not be responsible for irresponsible toll rates. A telephone toll rate is not the sum of various segments of rates, but is related to other factors. A ten mile call in Los Angeles is much more expensive than a ten mile call in rural Nebraska, because the plant, expenses and service necessary is much more complicated and expensive. However, the wisdom of a toll rate should be left to the commission, and certainly this provision could be a commission regulation or policy. Unless there is some unknown justification for this section, it should be omitted.

30. AS 42.05.361(b). Delete this subsection.

Comment: In this section the public service commission makes no decision but the vital rights of the utilities involved are left to "professional consultants" to decide the issue. If the commission does nothing except to select an arbitrator, the section should say so. But this the courts can do. If the parties desire to arbitrate the matter, the parties should provide for their own arbitrator and mode of arbitration. The costs of this section could be prohibitive. In a telephone toll separation settlement controversy, both sides could expend twenty-five or fifty thousand dollars apiece to prepare its case, and then have to spend an additional twenty-five or fifty thousand dollars apiece for the commission's consultants who must examine both utilities. The additional expense is unwarranted, and the consultants are not given any kind of standards by which valuable rights are to be tested.

31. AS 42.05.371(a). Amend the first sentence to read:

> "[UNLESS THE COMMISSION OTHERWISE ORDERS NO] Changes may be made by a public utility in its rates, classifications, rules, regulations or practices where any contract or agreement relating to a rate, classification, rule, regulation or practice upon [EXCEPT AFTER] thirty days notice to the commission and to the public."

Comment: The present statute, and the usual regulatory practice, is to permit a utility to file a rate which will become effective within thirty days and which will be the lawful rate unless objection to the rate is made within the thirty day period of time. Again the commission desires arbitrary powers to tell a utility how that utility is to be operated, when it may file a tariff and when a tariff becomes effective. A utility cannot operate and meet its financial commitments under this discretionary provision. Under the language perhaps the public utility could never change a tariff if the commission merely decides to order otherwise. The utility cannot wai months or years while the commission decides what it is going to do and the rate should become effective without commission interference upon suspension or punitive action.

32. AS 42.05.381(b), (d) Delete these subsections.

Comment: This suspension provision does not exist in the present statute and a commission suspension of seven months is totally unreasonable.

Once a rate is not charged, then the utility is the looser forever. City bonds and bondholders would be affected if a rate could not go into effect for a period of up to eight months (including the initial filing period). The suspension provision does not even contain a date in which the commission must act, and conceivably the commission could suspend a new tariff change which had been in actual operation for several months. Subsection (d) would give the commission the power to escrow a proposed rate increase, a much fairer provision. But the costs of such escrow would probably exceed any refund to the average small consumer in Alaska. Again no period is given in which the commission may order an escrow, and the commission should act within the thirty day objection period. (Subsection (e) should also be changed to eliminate the suspension language.) With the commission meeting generally only once a month and the demonstrated slow decision process of the commission the commission should first justify to the legislature that it has the maturity to exercise a suspension clause before such power is granted to the commission, and not to a court. Let the commission operate and show to the legislature that a suspension clause is necessary and will be administered properly before the power is given to cripple the ability of a utility to earn a timely and reasonable rate of return. In other words, if the commission is wrong the utility will have lost seven or eight months of its ability to earn a fair rate of return and to protect its finances and investment.

33. AS 42.05.391(b). Add a new subsection (b) to read:

> "No order of the commission shall change or affect any rates established or to be maintained under the covenants of any general obligation or revenue bonds of a municipality."

Comment: The contractual rights of bondholders should not be subject to possible impairment.

34. AS 42.05.401. Delete this section. The punitive nature of this bill is again demonstrated by this particular provision which enables the commission, at any time, to order reparations for perhaps ten or twenty years. In any event, once a tariff has been filed and no objection has been made to the tariff then no reparations should be required. If experience and facts show an abuse, then perhaps this power could be granted to the commission, otherwise, the utilities must have some indication and body of law and experience on which to draw to avoid what may be unlawful charges subject to reparation. If the commission is doing its job, a tariff change would be analyzed and proper proceedings instituted before reparations are necessary.

35. AS 42.05.411. Delete this section.

Comment: See above comments.

ACCOUNTS RECORDS AND REPORTS

36. AS 42.05.431(a). Amend to read:

> "Each public utility shall use and follow a system of public utility accounting prescribed by order of the commission [.], except where the public utility uses and follows a system of federal regulatory agency. The Commission shall prescribe wherever possible a generally recognized syster of public utility accounting.

Comment: Most of the large utilities in the state are required to maintain records by a federal regulatory agency which have developed generally accepted forms of utility accounting. The commission should not put a utility at the expense of adopting a whole new system of accounting merely to suit commission procedures. Where there is no federal regulation, then the commission should, nevertheless, follow recognized systems of public utility accounting wherever possible as these systems are generally used by most utilities and would enable accurate comparisons with other utilities.

Comment: This requirement could cost a utility thousands of dollars and the utility, even with the inclusion of the word "reasonable", would probably have to spend thousands of dollars preparing the necessary reports and statistics. The maintaining of records is quite expensive, and it is doubtful that smaller communities in this state could keep up the required accounts and reports except at prohibitive costs. A continuing property record requires expert accounting preparation and supervision.

37. AS 42.05.451(a). Insert in line 8, page 21, the words "by reasonable regulation" after the word "determine". Amend line 13, page 21, by inserting "allow" for "determine allowable". If the commission is to establish rates of depreciation, the commission should do so by regulation so that all public utilities affected may have an opportunity to be heard and to be guided by a proper regulation. The last sentence has been changed to require the commission to allow depreciation expense rather than to let stand the impression that the commission need not so allow.

38. AS 42.05.451(b). Delete this subsection.

Comment: This subsection is vague and evidently serves no good purpose. If the section is merely an attempt to establish an evidentiary rule, the commission can certainly do this by its reasonable regulations governing its proceedings. In any forecast "estimates" must be given because no actual depreciation and "statements" of depreciation under the section are inexplicable. If the subsection cannot be understood, the section should be stricken.

39. AS 42.05.481. Insert in line 17, page 22, the words "person authorized by it" for "of its employees". Insert in line 19, page 22, the words "or their affiliated interests", after the words "public utilities". Insert on line 20, page 22, the words "or its employees". ~~Insert in line 19, page 22, the words "or their affiliated interests" after the words "public utilities".~~ Insert on line 20, page 22, the words "or its affiliated interest" after the words "public utility".

Comments: The commission should have the authority to designate persons, such as its consultants, other than employees to examine records. The Section should make clear that affiliated interest records may be inspected.

FINANCIAL AND MANAGEMENT REGULATIONS

40. AS 42.05.501. Insert in line 8, page 23, the words:

"or may become impaired by continuation of current practices" after the word "impaired".

Comment: The proposed amendment would eliminate the "lock the barn door after the horse is stolen" situation, because it would make clear that practices which would impair the capital should be immediately stopped.

41. AS 42.05.511. Delete the second and third sentences of the subsection, lines 15-19, page 23.

Comment: Once the utility has somehow managed to receive a profit, what business is it of the commission to determine how that profit is to be distributed? Certainly the by-laws or ordinances are supposed to prevail, and the distributees would have their lawful recourse in the event that some ordinance or by-law was not followed. Just how the commission should interfere with corporate business in a matter which has nothing to do with the rates and services of the utility is not clear. What evil is to be avoided by this section is not explicit, and if there is a particular problem, then that problem should be dealt with openly. Again, the all powerful, arbitrary commission is promoted.

JUDICIAL REVIEW, PENALTIES AND ENFORCEMENT

42. AS 42.05.531(a). Insert "AS 44.65.510,.520,.540,.560, .570" for AS 44.62.560" in line 26, page 23. See comment No. 10.

43. AS 42.05.531(b). Delete in line 3, page 24, the words "and other process".

Comment: The words "and other process" are unknown in effect. Injunction is a normal remedy by which a commission order is enforceable, and whether dire, unpredictible consequence may ensue is unknown. If a reasonable explanation can be given as to how the court would otherwise act to enforce the order, other than an injunction, perhaps that form of relief should be provided.

44. AS 42.05.541. Reenact new section to read:

> "A public utility which knowingly and willfuly violates any provision of this chapter, or a rule, regulation or requirement, or order adopted under this chapter, or a term or condition of a certificate is guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction is punishable for each offense by a fine of not more than $500.00."

Comment: This section illustrates the cops and robbers approach to the entire bill. The commission is the "good guy" and all utilities, including everybody that works for a utility, or is affiliated with a utility, is a "bad guy" who needs to be brought to justice. The vagaries of the proposed criminal section would place every employee of a public utility in jeopardy, particularly when the intricacies of utility regulation are present. A simple violation would subject a minor employee to criminal sanction. The commission has civil means of enforcement of its orders without resort to criminal process which in practice is a last resort in any event. The above amended section has been taken from the Motor Carrier Act, AS 42.10.410, and appears to be a more reasonable provision, passed by a prior legislature.

45. AS 42.05.551, .571, .581(a), .591(a). Delete these sections and subsections.

Comment: These provisions are unconscionable. These provisions transform the public service commission into a court of law for no good reason. If a utility has not acted properly, the utility may be coerced by court action or deterred by criminal violation. A third, additional "civil penalty" may be applied to anyone who happens to be concerned with the violation and that person is subject to a fine without any legal safeguard other than to have an "opportunity to be heard" in the commission kangeroo court. A penalty may be levied even if a person in ignorance or negligently violates, or aids or abets any violation of any of the what should be numerous technical provisions, orders, rules or regulations of the commission. This concept of a civil penalty certainly is foreign to commission regulation, and probably unconstitutional in making the commission a court. If there is to be a civil penalty, the activities of the commission should be specifically spelled out in great detail so that a person may know in fact and law what he is supposed to do to avoid the commission kangeroo court.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

46. AS 42.05.611. Amend to read as follows:

"A public utility may exercise the power of eminent domain for public uses authorized by law, except as to publicly owned property. This section does not authorize the use of a declaration of taking by any public utility which does not have that power under another law."

Comment: A utility should not be permitted to condemn state, borough, and city properties and rights-of-way which should at all times be responsible to public needs. The other amendment makes clear that the declaration of taking is not limited if otherwise granted.

47. AS 42.05.621. Add a section as follows:

"Nothing in this chapter shall be interpreted to limit the power of a municipality to regulate and control, in the manner and to the extent provided by law, a public utility not otherwise subject to the express provisions of this chapter. Jurisdiction and control of public streets and rights-of-way within a municipality shall be vested in the municipality."

Comment: The amendment reinstates the present existing AS 42.05.620 with the addition that control of streets would remain with the municipality. In other words, the public service commission cannot authorize Anchorage Natural Gas to excavate under the city streets without meeting the city requirements. Nor can the commission supersede the city's building code, electrical safety code, etc. The extent of commission regulations should be to establish service areas and to review the rates and service provided by a public utility. This bill creates a commission with powers so broad that the commission, even with the best intentions, could not even review the paperwork necessary to review its jurisdiction.

48. AS 42.05.621(c). Add a new section to read:

"The commission shall have concurrent jursidiction with a municipality as to a franchise held by a public utility subject to regulation by the commission. Except when the commission acts on its own motion, the jurisdiction of the commission shall be to decide appeals from the franchise holder or grantor as to a decision of the grantor concerning rates or services."

Comment: A franchise holder obtains valuable rights from a city in exchange for a promise to render a service at certain rates. It would be manifestly unjust for a utility to obtain a franchise from a city, and then to evade its responsibilities under the franchise by obtaining the franchise and then turning around to the commission for different rates and service. The commission could still act in the public interest, but would give the franchise grantor the first opportunity to enforce the franchise on a local level. The commission just does not have the tools to enforce all franchises, and the local entity is the best means of seeing that the franchise is enforced.

49. AS 42.05.622. Add a new section to read:

"(a) The attorney general may, upon the complaint of the commission, or upon the complaint of customers of a municipally owned and operated utility residing outside the municipality, commence an action in the superior court in the judicial district in which the entity is located for relief to

(1) Order the municipality to cease and desist from imposing unreasonable rates or charges upon customers residing outside the boundaries of the municipality; or

(2) Order the municipality to cease and desist from any unreasonable difference in the standard of service provided nonresident customers of the utility.

(b) The consumers and the consumer's complaint shall meet all requirements of a complaint as required in § 672 of this chapter.

(c) The rates, charges or service of a municipality for a public utility service furnished beyond the corporate boundaries shall not be considered unreasonably discriminating solely by reason of the fact that a different rate, charge or standard of service exists for a similar service within its corporate limits.

Comment: This section would give consumers outside municipal boundaries the additional right to address a grievance to the attorney general over municipal service outside the boundaries. In view of the lack of justified complaints in this area, the commission and attorney general should be able to resolve the matter before the courts without costly commission jurisdiction.

50. AS 42.05.631. Amend the first sentence to read:

"At the conclusion of any public hearing held under this chapter the commission shall determine the cost and may apportion the costs among the parties, including the commission, as shall be [IT CONSIDERS] just."

Comment: The sentence as written is ungrammatical because the apportionment provision has been left out. The City of Anchorage has just experienced the arbitrary use of this section by the commission. The intent was not to give the commission arbitrary power to unreasonably assess costs, as the commission has done, and the objective standards should be made certain by striking the words "it consider". This provision is certainly unjust in many ways, because the utility, which may be brought into a public hearing by the commission, must pay for its share of the costs, even when it is not at fault.

51. AS 42.05.641(b). Amend to read as follows:

"With each application, except one filed under §192 of this chapter, filed with the commission pursuant to §191 of this chapter, the applicant shall pay the commission a fee of $50.00.

52. AS 42.05.651. Add a sentence to read:

"The superior court may permit an examination of the information filed upon a showing of good cause for the examination."

Comments: Secrecy of information is proper, provided that the statute does not preclude a legitimate reason or purpose for the examination. A court should permit the examination if good cause is shown.

53. AS 42.05.671. Insert "reasonable" after the word "by" on line 29, page 27, and on line 4, page 28.

54. AS 42.05.673. Add a new section to read:

"(a) A complaint involving the service, rates, charges, rules or regulations of a public utility shall first be made to the utility pursuant to such reasonable procedures as the utility or municipality owning and operating the public utility may prescribe. The decision of the utility or municipality on the complaint may be appealed to the commission.

(b) A complaint involving the rates, charges, rules or regulations of the utility may be appealed to the commission only if the complaint when first made to the utility was signed by not less than 25 directly affected consumers of the utility, or signed by the executive officer of a municipality when the complaint is made by a municipality.

(c) An appeal to the commission need not be in any particular form, but shall be in writing and verified, and shall state that the complainant has exhausted his administrative remedies as provided by the rules of the public utility. The commission may prescribe a fee for filing complaints. The commission shall proceed, with or without notice, to make an investigation of the complaint which it considers necessary or convenient. No order affecting a rate, toll, charge, schedule, regulation, practice or act complained of may be entered by the commission without giving the public utility a public hearing.

(d) The public utility may file a complaint as to any matter affecting its own rates or service with the same effect as a consumer or user.

(e) The commission shall not have any jurisdiction over disputed claims for debt between the utility and a customer, or any other billing or collection of a utility rate, charge or tariff.

Comment: The protagonists of commission regulation have insisted that no person outside a city has a forum, but they would have such a forum before the commission. Strangely, S.B. 128 does not provide for any complaints by consumers. Throughout the bill there are numerous references to the commission acting "upon a complaint", but nothing is stated as to how these complaints are to be made. It appears that the commission could act upon an anonymous complaint over the telephone by a person not even a consumer of a utility. Nothing is more fair than to require a person having a complaint to first exhaust his complaint with the utility involved, rather than to engulf the commission with hundreds of disputes. The commission is also entitled to some protection from unwarranted complaints. Complaints as to service should be appealable on an individual basis, but complaints involving rates, charges and other matters of a general application should be substantial enough before commission intervention is necessary. An individual has recourse before the utility, utility board or city council.

54. AS 42.05.691(b) - (d). Delete the subsections, and add new subsection to read:

"(b) The provisions of this chapter do not apply to municipally owned and operated public utilities."

Comment: This act should not apply to municipally owned and operated utilities within or outside the corporate boundaries. A discussion of this amendment is too lengthy to include in this commentary. The intent of the Alaska Constitution is that municipalities should have local authority to the fullest extent possible and that "home rule" means home rule without state interference.

55. Section 5. Delete "certificate" on line 20, page 30. Add new section to read:

> "The existing rates, charges, tariffs, rules and regulations, service and service area of a municipally owned utility shall continue and remain in full force and effect unless otherwise ordered by the commission under the provisions of this Act."

Comment: The deletion is necessary because all certificates are not grandfather certificates. The amended sentence is necessary to protect the cities' rights pending commission action. If a city's application takes two or three years to process through the courts, the city should be permitted to operate without a certificate under its existing policies.

TRANSMITTAL MEMORANDUM

March 4, 1969

By: Don Hall
Executive Director
Alaska Public Service Commission

Re: SB 128 Comments and Suggestions

Major Policy Decisions

In transmitting my comments on SB 128 I think it is important to inform everyone who is interested in the Bill that the Alaska Public Service Commission did not submit any legislative proposal to extend its jurisdiction in any manner whatsoever. Specifically it did not recommend that gas and oil pipelines or municipally owned and operated utilities be regulated. This does not indicate that the Commission is either for or against the idea. The Commission's reason for taking a neutral position on this important subject is first, because it feels such legislation should properly emanate from other sources and second, because it believe any attempt to suggest legislation in this area would be misinterpreted as a self-serving bureaucratic effort motivated solely by a desire to arrogate additional powers to the Commission.

Chairman Clouse and Commissioners Lounsbury and Zerbetz and I were given an opportunity to review early drafts of the Administration's proposed legislation affecting the APSC. We made numerous suggestions which, for the most part, are embodied in SB 128. I have not commented on the wisdom or need for regulating municipal utilities or pipelines because the Commission feels, as I previously indicated, that this is a matter requiring major policy decisions which already have been decided by the Administration and rightfully should be resolved by the legislative process.

Funding

I have been informed that the Commission's original budget proposal, seeking an appropriation of $347,800, was to be submitted at the time SB 128 was introduced. This budget was designed mainly to enable the Commission to meet the greatest regulatory challenge in its history--that of preparing, in advance, to regulate the purchaser of the Alaska Communication System. Incidentally (although it has nothing to do with SB 128) the ACS Sale bids were opened March 1, 1969 and it is my understanding that I will be designated to represent Governor Miller, and the State of Alaska, in the evaluation of the bids at Scott Air Force Base in Illinois. Arrangements have been made for financial and engineering consultants, specializing in communications, to assist me. This work will begin March 10, 1969 if present plans can be effectuated.

The Commission's original budget, submitted September 30, 1968 is based upon recommendations of professional consultants engaged to advise the Commission on how it should be organized and staffed. It contains the following statement of significance to the enactment of SB 128:

> "If history repeats itself, legislation will again be introduced to place municipally-owned and operated public utilities under the Commission's regulatory jurisdiction. In the event this should occur this budget, which is based primarily on regulating the ACS purchaser, will also be adequate to regulate the municipals unless new laws are enacted requiring expensive new regulatory programs."

Because our original budget did not provide funding for the regulation of gas and oil pipeline companies I have since informed Commissioner Sharrock of the Commerce Department that the Commission will need an additional $8,500 for this purpose in the event SB 128 becomes law.

It was not possible, under established budgetary procedures, to budget presently established positions at pay ranges equal to those recommended by our consultants. Our vacant position of Utilities Engineer, for example, was budgeted at pay range 20 because we are not permitted to budget it at pay range 23 which our consultants feel is necessary to attract qualified applicants. Since June 30, 1968, we have advertised this position in national trade magazines and in local newspapers, but it is still vacant--which indicates the consultants are right. As I understand it, however, their recommendations cannot be implemented unless the Personnel Department agrees with them.

What I have done, at Commissioner Sharrock's request, is the only thing I could do under the circumstances; namely, submit P-402 forms of the Personnel Department in respect to the six new positions included in our original budget and to up-grade existing positions to the pay ranges recommended by our consultants. In addition, I have submitted detailed figures to Commissioner Sharrock showing the budget increases that will be required for these purposes and to provide $20,000 for the purpose of initially paying hearing officer costs that may be incurred under sec. 42.05.631 of SB 128, and AS 42.05.610 of the present law. These figures show that our original budget will have to increased to $409,700 (or $61,900) to cover the aforementioned costs.

If all of our budget proposals are approved the Commission will wind up with sixteen authorized positions instead of the ten positions it has. It should be apparent, however, that the new positions will remain vacant if the salaries are not adequate. This undoubtedly explains why we still have three vacant positions, and only seven people actually on the job--which makes our staff smaller than any of the other 56 Commissions except the Virgin Islands.

If SB 131, SB 214 and SB 215 are enacted significant additional funding will be required, but since I have not yet seen the last two measures I am unable, at this time, to do anything except direct attention to the fact that they present an additional funding problem which cannot be ignored if they are enacted.

Commission's Minimum Requirements

Experience has demonstrated the fact that the present law under which the Commission operates is deficient in a number of respects. The correction of these deficiencies was the main thrust of the proposed legislation which the Commission submitted to Mr. Walter L. Kubley, the Governor's Legislative Assistant. Most of these proposals are embodied in the following thirteen sections of SB 128:

.121	3-4
.371	16-17
.381	17-18
.391	18
.431	20
.521	23
.621(b)	26
.681(2)(B)	28-29

The foregoing should not be taken as a blanket endorsement of the sections listed. To the extent that comments have been made, they should, of course, be considered. In addition to the specific comments relating to the above-listed sections, I feel it is also important that the comments regarding omissions be given consideration. These include my first two comments relating to the title of the Act as well as the two matters discussed under the heading of "Specific Omissions" plus the additional definitions set forth in my comments designated as sections .681(6)(F), .681(7), .681(8), and .681(9).

SB 128 and SB 54 Compared

I find that SB 54 contains 31 sections that are substantially the same as those in SB 128. These comparable sections are shown in the following tabulation:

Conclusion

Although there will undoubtedly be heated arguments regarding extending the Commission's jurisdiction to industries and operations that are now exempt from regulation, the Commission is hopeful the Legislature will not allow such controversies to overshadow, and perhaps eclipse, the genuine need for constructive legislation which is desperately needed to enable the State of Alaska to effectively regulate the purchaser of the Alaska Communication System. Our Annual Report and our original budget both emphasize this as its primary goal.

The purchaser of the ACS will be selected before the end of the fiscal year and the final transfer of the facilities is now scheduled to occur on July 1, 1970. Public Law 90-135 requires that the purchaser obtain a certificate of public convenience and necessity from the APSC prior to the date of transfer. Consequently, it is imperative that laws be enacted during this session of the legislature which will enable the Commission to certificate and effectively regulate the purchaser. The sections of SB 128 which will enable the Commission to do the job properly have been set forth under the heading of "Commission's Minimum Requirements." Most of these sections are comparable to sections in SB 54. It would be a travesty of justice to deny the Commission this non-controversial legislation because of arguments that may develop over provisions that are controversial.

The eyes of the Nation are on Alaska right now, because of its involvement in the sale of the ACS. We simply cannot afford to fall on our face in meeting the challenge of regulating the purchaser. Yet I am confident this is exactly what will happen if the Commission is not given the laws and financial resources it must have to perform its regulatory functions in a manner that will reflect credit on the State of Alaska.

COMMENTS OF DON HALL, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF ALASKA PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION, ON SB 128

Sub-section of SB 128
Title	Almost every other state in the nation has the name of the state as part of the name of its commission (i.e. New York Public Service Commission, California Public Utilities Commission, Washington Utilities and Transportation Commission). Therefore, I strongly urge we officially designate our Commission as the Alaska Public Service Commission.
.010	Not in SB 128, but should be so that name can be changed to Alaska Public Service Commission.
.020(a)	Line 13: Insert "Alaska" after "The" and before "Public".
.020(b)	Line 16: Suggested revision: One of the three members shall be appointed by the Governor to serve as chairman of the Commission during the term of the appointing governor. This is substantially like the wording of the comparable law in Washington State (see RCW 80.01.010). Reason: This will enable each new governor to designate the chairman of the Commission during his term of office and prevent an outgoing governor from saddling the new one with his appointee. Governors like to name the heads of the various agencies of government. Also SB 128 provides $300 additional compensation for the Chairman.
.091	P. 3, Line 1: Don't understand meaning of word "civil". The term should be clarified if its meaning is not common knowledge.
.091(b)	If the state can afford to pay 5 Commissioners $6000 a year (as provided in SB 54) it should certainly be able to afford $6000 for three Commissioners plus $300 more for the Chairman. Consultants engaged by the Commission recommended a salary range of $5000 to $6000.
.141(3)	The way this section now reads, the Commission would have the power to alter and amend "fair and reasonable rates" etc. If a rate is already fair and reasonable there would be no need to alter or amend it. I suggest the following revision.

(3) make and fix just, fair and reasonable rates, classifications, rules, regulations, practices, services and facilities;

(4) alter and amend ~~an fact~~, unfair and unreasonable rates, classifications, rules, regulations, practices, services and facilities.

Re-number secs. (4), (5) and (6) to (5), (6) and (7).

.151(b) Line 21: Add following sentence:
The commission shall apply analogous rules of the superior court in regulating the appearance before it of attorneys not admitted to practice in this state.
Reason: This proposal stems from the attached communication from Mr. Stanley Howitt, Executive Director of the Alaska Bar Association. In all the states I have knowledge of the state public service commission includes in its rules of practice and procedure a section titled "Appearance and Practice Before the Commission" which states who may appear before it in a representative capacity. I know of no other state which prohibits attorneys in other states from appearing before it. However, it is not uncommon for them to require that out-of-state attorneys be qualified and entitled to practice before the highest court of record of their own state.

The APSC is a quasi-judicial agency and should, therefore, be accorded the same right of waiver that a superior court has when it is performing its judicial functions.

The Commission engaged the services of a hearing officer in the so-called "Cook Inlet Telephone Case" (Cause No. U-66-24 et al.) who had the case 679 days during which time there were 8 days of hearings, 12 briefs with an aggregate total of 239 pages, and a hearing transcript of 1312 pages. From the time the first application was filed until the Commission entered its final order, the total elapsed time was 969 days. Much of the delay and resulting expense to the parties was due to the fact that several of them were represented by attorneys who had little or no experience. The hearing officer's bill for his services was $13,310.50 so the State (specifically the Secretary of State) certainly shared in the cost. Were it not for the fact that some of the attorneys were knowledgable in the field of public utility law, the case would have been even more expensive to all concerned.

I can sympathize with the desire of Alaska attorneys to get all the business they can but I can also see why the law gives our superior courts the right to allow out-of-state attorneys to represent those who appear before it. Whatever the reasons may be that superior courts have this privilege, by law, it should apply with equal force to the APSC.

.181(b) Does the term "special agent" include the contractual hiring of an accountant or engineer to make a special investigation of a company such as the Anchorage Natural Gas Company and the Alaska Pipeline Company or engaging the services of an attorney to prepare rules of practice and procedure? If so, would it be possible to appoint them without a contract for personal service which is the way that hearing officers are now appointed? These questions should be clarified in the law if there are any doubts--hopefully in a way that simplifies, rather than complicates.

the procedure that has heretofore been required to engage the services of professional engineers or accountants.

.191(c) The words "appropriate action" leave much to be desired. I suggest the addition of a sentence reading somewhat as follows: Appropriate action shall include, but not be limited to voluntary agreements between competing utilities subject to approval by the commission and compulsory arbitration by order of the commission.

It has been my observation that the problem of competition between utilities and the resulting duplication of facilities is pretty much limited to electric utilities in the cities of Kenai, Fairbanks and Anchorage.

.211 Line 25: After word "may" insert words "or shall".

.221(a) P. 9, Line 3: Strike "unless" and insert "except after".
P. 9, Line 4: Strike first word "the"; change "of" to "by"; and strike word "if".

.221(b) P. 9, Line 15: After "resumed", insert these words "and the resumption is found to be economically feasible".

.311 Consumers should never be permitted to use testing equipment or apparatus. I suggest the following revision of the third sentence: Upon payment of a reasonable fee, as provided in a utility tariff accepted by the commission for filing, a utility customer may demand that a scientific test be conducted as to the accuracy of any equipment or apparatus used by a utility to measure the utility services or commodities it furnishes.

.321 P. 15, Line 2: Change "is" to "a[illegible]".

.371(a) P. 16, Line 25: Change heading to read as follows:
NEW OR REVISED TARIFFS AND CONTRACTS
Reason: This section deals with contracts as well as tariffs; so the fact should be indicated in the heading. The section should also cover new rates, classifications, rules, regulations or practices and new contracts as well as changes in existing tariffs or contracts.

.371(b) P. 17, Line 9: Change as follows:
New tariff and contract rates, classifications, rules, regulations and practices and revisions thereof shall be filed in the manner provided in sec. 321(a) of this chapter.

371(c) P. 17, Line 11: Change as follows:
Upon the filing of a new tariff or contract, or the revision of an existing tariff or contract, the commission, upon complaint or upon its own motion, without notice, may initiate an investigation of the reasonableness and lawfulness thereof.

.401 This section was included at the suggestion of the Assistant Attorney General assigned to the APSC. It is not at all unusual in comparable laws of other states but the need for it is more common in the regulation of transportation companies. Washington State has one like it (RCW 80.04.020) which has been on the books since 1937. I was with that Commission from 7/10/34 to 9/30/67 but cannot recollect that it was ever implemented in respect to a public utility. Several people have already expressed concern about this section. Actually, I doubt that they have good cause to worry about it, but they certainly cannot be blamed for worrying. Consequently, if it should become a major issue I would suggest that it be deleted or amended to make it apply only when a utility charges more than the rates in its effective tariff. After all if a utility charges the rates in its tariff (as required by Sec. 42.05.331 of SB 128) it should not be required to make reparations except to the extent it deviates from its tariff.

.481 P. 22, Line 17: After "employees" insert agents or consultants. Reason: Section 42.05.361(b) provides for the employment of consultants and section 42.05.181 provides for the appointment of agents; so the fact should not be ignored is this section.

.491(a) P. 22: Revise as follows:
The commission may investigate the management of a public utility including but not limited to salaries fixed by the recipient and salaries established in the absence of arms-length bargaining and payments to affiliated interests for services rendered or for the purchase, sale, lease, rental or exchange of any property, right, or thing, or loans to or from affiliated interest, and any practice which may adversely affect the cost or quality of the services or commodities furnished by the utility.

.491(b) Revise as follows:
When any unreasonable managerial practice, payment, or loan is found to exist, the commission may, after providing reasonable notice and an opportunity for hearing, order the public utility to take such corrective action as the commission may require.
Reason: Two of the biggest loopholes in utility regulation relate to self-serving decisions by the management of the utility or by their corporate affiliates. These decisions sometimes include placing holding company officers on the payroll of a utility at high salaries when the services they perform for such salaries are minimal. Closely held corporations, as well as partnerships and individual proprietorships often succumb to the temptation of fixing their own salaries at unreasonably high levels--thus enabling them to virtually control their own rate of return. Holding companies that control local operating companies sometimes charge the local utility an excessive amount for services rendered, for interest on loans, or for the sale, lease or exchange of any property, right or thing. I know, because I administered the affiliated interest law of the Washington Utilities and Transportation Commission for 17 years-- and the above proposed revision contains some of the suggested language I have used (see RCW 80.08.12).

.631 P. 26, Line 20: Strike words "Investigation and" from heading. Reason: the word "investigation" does not appear in this section; so it should be omitted in the heading or else the section should be re-worded so as to clearly include investigations.

This section is the same as AS 42.05.610 of the present law. I seriously question the advisability of including it in SB 128 unless it is revised to require a hearing on the costs prior to entering an order and more realistic and precise criteria are specified for determining the amount assessed the various parties. I say this because I believe it is almost impossible to successfully apply any degree of mathematical precision to the criteria the Commission is now required to consider in assessing hearing costs; namely:

ability to pay evidence of good faith other relevant factors mitigating circumstances

Moreover, there is a need to specify exactly what costs the Commission may include as hearing costs. Does it include the traveling expenses of the Commission and its staff? Does it include the costs of any investigation prior to the hearing? Is it limited to the hearing officer's fees and expenses plus time charges of reporters? Then there is the question of who should apy the costs initially--the Secretary of State (who has been paying them) or the Commission. In the Cook Inlet case the hearing officer's fee was over $13,000 and the Secretary was not funded to pay the bill. I think he had to get it from the Governor's emergency fund. No matter which agency pays the hearing costs initially, it should be funded for it and the law should designate the agency. Judging from past experience, it is estimated that $20,000 will be required to pay hearing officer costs most of which, hopefully, can be recovered. It should be emphasized, however, that the Commission's current budget request does NOT include this $20,000.

P. 26, Line 22: .631 is same as AS 42.05.610 except for omission of words "of the hearing and shall by order apportion" after the word "costs"

For all practical purposes, this section could well be limited to apportioning the fees and expenses of hearing officers. The parties now pay for their own copy of hearing transcripts and the Commission gets one free if any other party orders one. The hourly rate paid for court reporters is not so great that the Commission could not pay it--and, next to the hearing officer's fee, this is the next largest expense of a hearing.

There is a possibility that the State might eventually decide it would be cheaper to hire its own full-time hearing officer.

.641(a) P. 27, Line 7: Insert word "intrastate" between "from" and "operations".

Under the provisions of SB 123 the Alaska Pipeline Company will become subject to regulation. For this reason, I suggest that consideration be given to whether or not it would be fair to collect a regulatory fee from the Pipeline Company on the basis of its sales to Anchorage Natural Gas Corporation and then require ANG to pay a regulatory fee on its gross revenues. This would result in a double regulatory fee on the same gas--which would then be passed on to ANG's customers. Under these circumstances I think it would be wise to add a sentence reading substantially as follows:

"Gross operating revenues from intrastate sales to a utility for resale to its customers shall be excluded from gross operating revenues for the purpose of this section."

Such a provision would relieve the Pipeline Company from paying a regulatory fee on gross revenues represented by sales to ANG but would require a fee on revenues from sales to the military bases and other customers.

.681 P. 28, Line 15: Strike "microwave". Microwave is not a service. It is only one means by which service can be provided.

P. 28, Line 16: Make it communication services instead of communications service.

P. 28, Line 20: If the State really wants to regulate LPG (propane or butane) distribution systems the fact should be made clear.
Reason: Petrolane, in Anchorage, apparently intends to take the position that propane is not a petroleum product. If the APSC is given authority to regulate the Alaska Pipeline Company it should be noted that funds for that purpose have not been included on the Commission's original budget request. Obviously any such request would be improper under the present law. If the Pipeline Company is brought under regulation there will undoubtedly be an immediate demand to investigate it. This will probably necessitate the employment of an accounting consultant at an estimated contractual cost of $8500. In this particular case I feel that independent professional consultants should be engaged for any investigation that is required so that the Commission can at least partially insulate itself against any accusation of bias.

.681(5) There appears to be no question but that this section, when read in conjunction with Sec. 42.05.681(2)(D), would extend the Commission's regulatory jurisdiction to the Alaska Pipeline Company--which, perhaps, may be its primary objective. There is a possibility, however, that it may go much much farther than was actually intended. For example, there is a relatively short natural gas pipeline between the Beluga power plant of Chugach Electric Association and the gas well that supplies the plant. Im my opinion this transmission line would be furnishing natural gas to a "limited portion of the public" and would therefore become a public utility. I doubt that any such thing was intended.

AS 42.05.645 of the present law specifically exempts the following from regulation by the APSC:
A. A person engaged in the production or gathering of natural gas or petroleum, and the plant, pipeline or system used for these purposes.
B. A person engaged in the distribution of natural or manufactured gas, or petroleum or petroleum products "to industrial customers only and not to the public generally" and the "plant, pipeline, or system used for these purposes."
C. Any plant, pipeline, or system used to distribute any concentrate or liquid substance by the owner or operator thereof "used solely for transportation."

The above provisions were enacted into law in 1968. As a result the Commission dismissed a proceeding then in progress to determine the regulatory status of the Kenai Pipeline Company. SB 128 would, in effect, cancel the 1968 amendment.

I also understand there is a pipeline from the Port Dock in Anchorage to the Internation Airport which is used to transport jet fuel. This is presumably a pipeline used to furnish petroleum or petroleum products to a "limited portion of the public" and would therefore be regulated.

There would undoubtedly be other pipelines that would come within the definition of the term "public utility" as defined in SB 128.

In keeping with the Commission's position of neutrality in respect to the extension of its regulatory authority, I would prefer not to express an opinion on this matter. However, I feel obligated to point to the possible ramfication of SB 128 as written and to suggest that the matter be given careful consideration with due regard to the question of whether or not there is an actual need to extend the Commission's jurisdiction to all of the pipelines which would be made subject to regulation under SB 128. If specific exemptions are disired the bill should be amended, or additional funding be provided.

.681(6)(F) New Section to read as follows:
"Any corporation 5% or more of whose voting securities are owned or held, directly or indirectly, by a public utility or by any corporation designated in secs. (A) (B) and (C) of this sub-section.
Reason: To make it clear that the subsidiaries of public utilities are affiliated interests as well as the owners of their voting securities. Subsections (A) (B) and (C) define up-stream affiliates; (F) would take care of down-stream affiliates.

.681(7) "tariff" means any or all rates, charges, tolls, rules or regulations of a utility relating to commodities or services furnished by a utility to the general public for compensation and every map, page, adoption notice, instrument or other document filed with the Commission setting forth the terms and conditions under which utility services or commodities are offered to the public together with instruments of concurrence and all other documents and data setting forth the terms of a utility's business relations with any other utility insofar as they affect the general public either directly or indirectly.

.681(8) "telephone exchange" means an operating unit consisting of one or more central offices together with the associated plant and switching equipment used in furnishing communication services within a defined geographic area embracing a city, town, village or area in which the subscribers served have a general community of interest.

.681(9) "telephone" means the transmission of voice communications, or in some cases, data or signals, by means of wire lines or Hertzian waves, between subscriber stations or central office stations located within one or more telephone exchanges or specified service areas, but excluding transmissions wholly within a radiocommunication system which is not interconnected with a telephone exchange or long lines system or another radiocommunication system.

.691(a) P. 30, Line 3: Place period after word "utility" and strike the rest of the line.

SIGNIFICANT OMISSIONS

I

No provision for power of Commission to assess the costs of special investigations against the utilities investigated. The present law gives the Commission this power--but only in connection with proceedings involving the valuation of utility property (see AS 42.05.270). There are 57 regulatory commissions, including the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. Twenty-four (24) of them have this power, including California, New York, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Washington, Arizona, Wisconsin, Wyoming, etc.

> .80.20.020. Cost of investigation may be assessed against company. Whenever the commission in any proceeding upon its own motion or upon complaint shall deem it necessary in order to carry out the duties imposed upon it by law to investigate the books, accounts, practices and activities of, or make any valuation or appraisal of the property of any public service company, or to investigate or appraise any phase of its operations, or to render any engineering or accounting service to or in connection with any public service company, and the cost thereof to the commission exceeds in amount the ordinary regulatory fees paid by such public service company during the preceding calendar year or estimated to be paid during the current year, whichever is more, such public service company shall pay the expenses reasonably attributable and allocable to such investigation, valuation, appraisal or services. The commission shall ascertain such expenses, and, after giving notice and an opportunity to be heard, shall render a bill therefor by registered mail to the public service company, either at the conclusion of the investigation, valuation, appraisal or services, or from time to time during its progress. Within thirty days after a bill has been mailed such public service company shall pay to the commission the amount of the bill, and the commission shall transmit such payment to the state treasurer who shall credit it to the public service revolving fund. The total amount which any public service company shall be required to pay under the provisions of this section in any calendar year shall not exceed one percent of the gross operating revenues derived by such public service company from its intrastate operations during the last preceding calendar year. If such company did not operate during all of the preceding year the calculations shall be based upon estimated gross revenues for the current year. [1961 c 14 §80.20.020. Prior: 1939 c 203 §2(a); RRS § 10458-6a(a).]

80.20.030 Interest on unpaid assessment--Action to collect. Amounts so assessed against any public service company not paid within thirty days after mailing of the bill therefor, shall draw interest at the rate of six percent per annum from the date of mailing of the bill. Upon failure of the public service company to pay the bill, the attorney general shall proceed in the name of the state by civil action in the superior court for Thurston county against such public service company to collect the amount due, together with interest and costs of suit. [1961 c 14 § 80.20.030. Prior: 1939 c 203 § 2(b); RRS § 10458-6a(b).]

80.20.040 Commission's determination of necessity as evidence. In such action the commission's determination of the necessity of the investigation, valuation, appraisal or services shall be conclusive evidence of such necessity, and its findings and determination of facts expressed in bills rendered pursuant to RCW 80.20.020 through 80.20.060 or in any proceedings determinative of such bills shall be prima facie evidence of such facts. [1961 c 14 § 80.20.040. Prior: 1939 c 203 § 2(c); RRS § 10458-6a(c).]

80.20.050 Order of commission not subject to review. In view of the civil action provided for in RCW 80.20.020 through 80.20.060 any order made by the commission in determining the amount of such bill shall not be reviewable in court, but the mere absence of such right of review shall not prejudice the rights of defendants in the civil action. [1961 c 14 § 80.20.050. Prior: 1939 c 203 § 2 (d); RRS § 10458-6a(d).]

80.20.060 Limitation on frequency of investigation. Expenses of a complete valuation, rate and service investigation shall not be assessed against a public service company under this chapter if such company shall have been subjected to and paid the expenses of a complete valuation, rate and service investigation during the preceding five years, unless the properties or operations of the company have materially changed or there has been a substantial change in its value for rate making purposes or in other circumstances and conditions affecting rates and services. [1961 c 14 § 80.20.060. Prior 1939 c 203 § 2(e); RRS § 10458-6a(e).]

Please note the provision for an opportunity to be heard and the 5-year limitation on the frequency of a "complete valuation, rate and service investigation."

If it should be decided that SB 128 should be amended to include authority to assess costs of an investigation against the utilities investigated, possibly it could be included as part of sec. 42.05.631.

II

SB 128, as written, provides for APSC investigations, upon complaint, in the following sections: 42.05.221(b), .231, .251(c) and (d), .371(c), .381(a), .401.

I am of the opinion some safeguards should be included in SB 128 to protect utilities and the Commission from needlessly spending time and money to deal with frivolous, unfounded, or harassing complaints. Attached hereto is a Xerox copy of an article in the February 8, 1969 issue of Telephony (p. 44) indicating what Colorado proposes to do to solve the problem. I am not sure I agree with Colorado's proposed solution to the problem, but the article does indicate that, potentially at least, there is a problem. At a recent meeting of Alaska City Managers, which I attended, considerable concern was expressed about the possibility that the cities, if regulated, would be subjected to the expense of defending every single complaint. I agree that they should be concerned and that the law should protect utilities in some manner.

We have a few regulated utilities that have only one customer; so the present Colorado law (and one like it in Washington State) could not be used as a guide since they allow 25 or more customers to file a complaint. It seems to me that the best procedure would be to insert in the law somewhere a provision to the effect that the Commission may in its rules of practice and procedure establish the terms, conditions, and restrictions applicable to the filing of complaints. Since the rules themselves could not be adopted without giving the public a chance to be heard, the Commission presumably could not be arbitrary or unreasonable. Further, if experience should demonstrate the need for a subsequent change, it could be accomplished without revising the law.

west Tennessee member of the commission. He has been on the Tennessee commission since 1953, and served as chairman in 1957-58 and 1963-64.

North Carolina asks Bell for improvements under raise

The North Carolina State Utilities Commission on Jan. 17 reversed a former decision and ordered Southern Bell Tel & Tel Co. to file a detailed list of service improvements it would institute if a company request for rate charges were approved and put into effect (TELEPHONY, Jan. 11).

In an order of Dec. 18, setting a public hearing on the company's rate request, the commission stated that "the proceeding would not be considered as a general case."

In the order of Jan. 17, it said "such a conclusion was based, at least in part, upon the understanding that the tariff filing was part of Southern Bell's service improvement plan, and was not offered primarily for revenue purposes."

Since the Dec. 18 order, the North Carolina attorney general's office and the North Carolina Consumer Council have raised the question of whether the real reason for the rate request is service improvements or increased profits. Both argued, contending the matter should be considered a general rate case and that the question whether the company's service has improved or declined in recent years also should be a matter for study.

In the Jan. 17 order reversing its former stand, the North Carolina commission said, "In view of the questions raised at the prehearing, the commission is now of the opinion that Southern Bell should specify in a verified pleading whether the tariff filing in question is part of a service improvement plan . . . and if so, should specify in detail the facts and details of such service improvement plan."

The commission asked that the list of service improvements planned be filed by Jan. 24 and if details are not provided by that date, the company's request would be considered solely on the basis of whether it is reasonable as a revenue-generating device, and without regard to promised improvements.

Southern Bell has proposed a 50-cent increase in service charges on private one-party lines, a $2 increase in installation fees and reductions up to $3.50 a month in some zone and mileage charges.

A company spokesman has said the changes would bring in about $2 million in additional revenue during the first year, and that the extra income is needed to carry out the company's planned service improvements.

Colorado bill would erase right to protest rates

A bill aimed at streamlining Colorado's public utility laws would also take away a right of utility customers to protest unreasonable rates, it was reported Jan. 8.

Colorado law now allows 25 or more customers to file a complaint with the Colorado Public Utilities Commission, and the commission is required to consider it. The proposed law, written by an interim study committee, would delete that provision.

Consumers still would be able to complain indirectly about utility rates, it was explained. But in order to get an investigation and hearing, they would first have to convince their city council, county commissioners or the state commission that their complaint had merit.

The 78-page bill, printed for introduction Jan. 8 in the Colorado Senate, is designed generally to modernize the laws dealing with the commission.

Have written for copy of this bill

It repeals obsolete wording of many sections.

It also writes into law the tradition of having both major political parties represented on the three-man commission.

Elimination of the provision for customer complaints was recommended to the study committee by the commission. The commission said under the present law "a single disgruntled customer can very easily obtain not only 25, but a considerable number of signatures, to institute a rate proceeding that could be wholly without merit."

Commissioner Howard Bjelland, starting his second six-year term, said he has no clear recollection of any commission inquiry arising from a consumer complaint. He said he felt the provision ought to be repealed, anyway, to avoid a potential waste of time and money.

It would be "pretty expensive" for a public utility (such as the Public Service Co. of Colorado or Mountain States Tel & Tel Co.) to answer an unfounded complaint in a public hearing, Bjelland said. And in the end, the cost of such a hearing would be paid by consumers, he pointed out.

Chief sponsor of the bill, Sen. George Jackson (R., Colorado Springs) said the committee discussed the possibility of requiring more than 25 customers to sign complaints, but concluded it would be better to repeal the whole thing. An alternative to repealing the provision would be to require a greater number of signatures on customer petitions, Jackson said.

Subject: Unauthorized Practice of Law by Out-of-State Attorneys before Administrative Agencies

Gentlemen:

A number of cases have been reported to the Alaska Bar Association concerning the unauthorized practice of law by out-of-state counsel before administrative agencies such as the Public Service Commission, Alaska Transportation Commission, Department of Highways-Contract Claims Board and Air Commerce Commission.

This memorandum is to advise you that under the present law, out-of-state attorneys may not appear before administrative agencies even if they are associating with Alaska counsel. Usually however, no attempt has been made by the out-of-state attorney to associate.

The conclusion reached by the Alaska Bar Association on this matter is based upon the fact that there is no provision whatsoever for appearances of out-of-state attorneys before administrative agencies in law, by court rule, or by rule of the Board ofGovernors. The occasional appearance of an out-of-state attorney in the courts of the state is governed by Rule 81, Rules of Civil Procedure, Out-of-state attorneys are allowed to appear in the state courts on a case by case basis. But such appearances are at the discretion of the Court, and the Court may deny such appearances if such action is warranted. This rule was promulgated by the court system itself. There is no similar rule regarding out-of-state attorney appearances before administrative agencies and therefore the statutory provisions would apply. The provision in point is A.S. 08.08.230 which reads as follows:

> "Section 08.08.230. Unlawful Practice a Misdemeanor. Any person not an active member of the Alaska Bar who engages in the private practice of law or represents himself as entitled to engage in the private practice of law in the state other than as permitted by this chapter is guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction is punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both."

There is no other provision in the chapter 8 of Title 8 of Alaska Statutes to permit the appearances before administrative agencies by outside counsel. Appearances before administrative agencies have been defined as the practice of law by the Alaska Supreme Court in the case of Application of Babcock , 387 P.2d 694 (Alaska 1963) wherein the Court stated at page 697:

> "One is engaged in the practice of law when he, for a valuable consideration, engages in the business of advising persons, firms, associations or corporations as to their rights under the law, or appears in a representative capacity as an advocate in the proceedings pending or prospective, before any court, commissioner, referee, board, body, committee, or commission constituted by law or authorized to settle controversies, and there, in such representative capacity, performs any act or acts for the purpose of obtaining or defending the rights of their [sic] clients under the law. Otherwise stated, one who, in a representative capacity, engages in the business of advising clients as to their rights under the law, or while so engaged, performs any act or acts either in court or outside of court for that purpose, is engaged in the practice of law." (Underlining added).

and the Court further stated that the practice of law is:

> "Not limited to appearing in court, or advising and assisting in the conduct of litigation, but embracing the preparation of pleadings, and other papers incident to actions and special proceedings, conveyancing, the preparation of legal instruments of all kinds, and the giving of all legal advice to clients: State v. Chamberlain, 132 Wash. 520, 232 Pac. 337, 338. It embraces all advice to clients and all actions taken for them in matters connected with the law. Rhode Island Bar Ass'n v. Lesser, 68 R.I. 14, 26 A.2d 6, 7." (Underlining added).

In order to eliminate this area of unauthorized practice of law, you are asked to submit to the Alaska Bar Association the following information for the years 1967-1968-1969 to date:

1. A list of all out-of-state attorneys who have appeared before your administrative agency at hearings or in any other proceeding.

2. The docket number of the hearing or proceeding.

3. Please indicate if the out-of-state attorney attempted to associate with Alaska counsel.

4. Please state the name of the client who was represented by the out-of-state attorney.

We intend to inform the out-of-state attorneys whose names you submit to us of the fact that they are engaged in the unauthorized practice of law in this state.

We would appreciate your aid and assistance with regard to future hearings and proceedings in which out-of-state counsel attempt to represent clients within this state. Please serve us with a notice of such appearances so that we can raise proper objections. We also request that your agency take action to prevent such unauthorized practice of law from occurring.

We are aware that this matter has been going on for a considerable length of time owing to the fact that the Alaska Bar Association has not previously notified your agency and requested your assistance to eliminate this area of unauthorized practice of law. With the inauguration of a bar office and the employment of a full time staff, this situation is now altered so that the association is in a position to go forward and clarify and define this area of unauthorized practice. Permitting this unauthorized practice to continue over a period of time does not give it any legal status.

It might be mentioned furthermore, that even when an out-of-state attorney attempts to associate with Alaska counsel, at the present time there is no provision to permit this activity and his activities in the proceedings or hearings is still considered unauthorized practice of law.

We would appreciate your immediate assistance in this matter. Should you have any questions, please do not hesitate to inquire.

Very truly yours,

SUBJECT: Truth-In-Lending

Attached are copies of a pamphlet issued by the Federal Reserve System concerning their Regulation Z.

It is felt that as you study and prepare this type of legislation for Alaska, that these might be helpful as the national banks in the state are now subject to this regulation as are finance companies. State banks are currently subject to Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation regulations which are basically the same as Regulation Z.

Consumer Credit Cost Disclosure

About This Pamphlet

If you extend consumer credit, then you must become familiar with Regulation Z on Truth in Lending. You will be responsible, as a creditor, for complying with the Regulation.

This pamphlet tells you how Regulation Z affects your business. It tells you what you must let your customers know when you offer or extend them consumer credit—including agricultural credit and real estate credit.

Here is what you'll find on the following pages:

- List of Federal Agencies that will enforce Regulation Z—as well as give you more information.
- Questions and Answers—answers to some of the questions you may ask. There are six sections: (1) general questions (2) finance charges and annual percentage rate (3) open end credit (4) loans and other types of credit (5) real estate credit and rescission (6) the advertising of credit. At the end of each answer you will find a reference to the section of Regulation Z that applies.
- Model forms to guide you.
- Example of a table.
- Regulation Z and the Law reprinted in its entirety—in center section.

Please note that the outside pamphlet material has been stated as simply and clearly as possible. However, for exact information on what you must do to comply with the law, you must read thoroughly the applicable sections of Regulation Z.

This new Regulation comes into effect on July 1, 1969, and covers exactly what you must disclose in writing to your customers and clients when you extend, arrange or just offer them credit.

Its Purpose

The purpose of Regulation Z is to let borrowers and customers know the cost of your credit so that they can compare your costs with those of other credit sources and avoid the uninformed use of credit. Regulation Z does not fix maximum, minimum, or any charges for credit.

Two Important Points to Bear in Mind

The finance charge and the annual percentage rate are really the two most important disclosures required by this regulation. They tell your customer, at a glance, how much he is paying for his credit and its relative cost in percentage terms.

The Businesses Affected

Regulation Z applies to: banks, savings and loan associations, department stores, credit card issuers, credit unions, automobile dealers, consumer finance companies, residential mortgage brokers, and craftsmen—such as plumbers and electricians. It also applies to doctors, dentists and other professional people, and hospitals. In fact to any individual or organization that extends or arranges credit for which a finance charge is or may be payable or which is repayable in more than four installments.

Material in this pamphlet has been prepared by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

Enforcement

Specific responsibilities for enforcement of Regulation Z are divided among nine Federal agencies. A complete list of these agencies and the types of businesses they cover follows this section.

Penalties Under The Truth in Lending Act

If you fail to make disclosures as required under this legislation, your customer may sue you for twice the amount of the finance charge—for a minimum of $100, up to a maximum of $1000—plus court costs and attorney's fees. And if you willfully or knowingly disobey the law or Regulation Z and are convicted you could be fined up to $5000, or be imprisoned for one year, or both.

New Credit Forms and The Ones You Use Now

If you have taken the proper steps to get any needed new credit forms before July 1, 1969, and find they cannot be delivered to you by that date, then you may be able to use your existing forms. But they must show clearly the information a customer must be given under Regulation Z. You may do this by adding to or altering your forms. However, after December 31, 1969, you may no longer do this.

Annual Percentage Rate—Tables

Figuring out the annual percentage rate of the cost of credit on individual transactions can be very complex in some instances. Chart makers can furnish you with specialized tables to meet your business needs. If you do not have special tables, and wish to obtain a set of tables that apply to all creditors you may write to your nearest Federal Reserve Bank or to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, Washington, D.C. 20551.

From these sets of tables you can determine annual percentage rates or the amount of the finance charge for a given rate. Volume I, which costs $1, provides four tables:

FRB100–M Covering up to 60 monthly payments with rates from 2% to 61.75%

FRB200–M Covering 61 to 120 monthly payments with rates from 2% to 41.75%

FRB100–W Covering up to 104 weekly payments with rates from 2% to 61.75%

Volume II, also available at the cost of $1, gives another set of tables with instructions, for use with Volume I above. It will help you work out annual percentage rates on irregular payment or multiple advance transactions.

Further Information

If you want more information or have any questions after studying this pamphlet, including Regulation Z, you can get help from the Federal agencies listed on the next page. You'll find trade associations and Chambers of Commerce helpful, too.

Federal Agencies

From the list that follows, you will be able to tell which Federal Agency covers your particular business. Any questions you have should be directed to that agency. These agencies are also responsible for enforcing Regulation Z.

REGULATION

Z

Some general questions and answers

Q: What types of credit are covered under Regulation Z?

A: Generally, credit you extend to people for personal, family, household or agricultural uses, not exceeding $25,000.
(Reg. Z/226.2 (k))
But ALL real estate credit transactions for these purposes are covered regardless of the amount.
(Reg. Z/226.3 (c))

Q: What types of credit are not covered?

A: The following are not affected by Regulation Z: (Reg. Z/226.3)

1. Business and commercial credit—except agricultural credit.
2. Credit to Federal, State and local governments. (However, governmental units extending credit to individuals are affected by this law.)
3. Transactions in securities and commodities accounts with a broker dealer registered with the Securities & Exchange Commission.
4. Transactions under certain public utility tariffs.
5. Credit over $25,000—except real estate transactions.

Q: Can a State law be substituted for Regulation Z?

A: Yes it can, provided The Federal Reserve Board makes that determination as provided by law. Any determination made will be published (Reg. Z/226.12). Creditors should be guided by Reg. Z/226.6 (b) and (c) in the meantime.

Q: What happens if I not only follow Regulation Z but also elect to follow inconsistent State law?

A: In these cases the State disclosure may be shown on a separate sheet. They may also be shown on the same statement as the Federal disclosures. But in this event they must appear separately and below the Federal disclosure, clearly marked that they are inconsistent with the Federal disclosures, and separated by a dividing line.
Regulation Z is very specific on these points. (Reg. Z/226.6 (c))

Q: Is any special terminology prescribed?

A: Yes, certain terminology is specified that must be used in making disclosures required by the Regulation.
(Reg. Z/226.6 (a); Reg. Z/226.7 (b) (c);
Reg. Z/226.8 (b) (c) (d); Reg. Z/226.9 (b); Reg. Z/226.11 (c))

Q: Do disclosures have to be made in the order they appear in the Regulation?

A: No, but they must be listed in an order which will be meaningful to your customer. The examples of forms illustrate ways in which this may be done. (See pages 18 to 29 of this pamphlet.) (Reg. Z/226.6 (a))

Q: What terms are used to describe credit transactions in the Regulation?

A: The Regulation divides all consumer credit transactions into two broad categories; open-end credit, and credit other than open-end. These are discussed in subsequent sections of these Questions and Answers.

Q: How long do I have to keep records?

A: You should keep evidence of compliance for two years. (Reg. Z/226.6 (i))

Q: Will anyone inspect my records?

A: If asked by the proper agency you must show your records relating to disclosure and evidence of compliance. (Reg. Z/226.6 (i))

Some questions and answers on the finance charge and annual percentage rate

Q: What is the finance charge?

A: It is the total of all costs which your customer must pay, directly or indirectly for obtaining credit. (Reg. Z/226.4)

Q: What costs are included in the finance charge?

A: Here are some of the more common items that you must include in your finance charge. See Reg. Z/226.4 for others and for qualifications which apply.

1. Interest.
2. Loan fee.
3. Finders fee or similar charge.
4. Time price differential.
5. Amount paid as a discount.
6. Service, transaction or carrying charge.
7. Points.
8. Appraisal fee (except in real estate transactions).
9. Premium for credit life or other insurance, should you make this a condition for giving credit.
10. Investigation or credit report fee (except in real estate transactions).

Q: Are all costs part of the finance charge?

A: No, some costs which would be paid if credit were not employed may be excluded. However, you must itemize and show them to your customer. (Reg. Z/226.4 gives a complete list.) Here are a few examples:

1. Taxes.
2. License fees.
3. Registration fees.
4. Certain title fees and other legal fees.
5. Some real estate closing fees.

Q: In what form is the finance charge to be shown to the customer?

A: It must be clearly typed or written, stating the dollars and cents total and the annual percentage rate. The words "finance charge" and "annual percentage rate" must stand out especially clear. (Reg. Z/226.6 (a))
In the sale of dwellings, the total dollar finance charge need not be stated, although the annual percentage rate must be included.

Q: What is the annual percentage rate?

A: Simply put, it is the relative cost of credit in percentage terms. (Reg. Z/226.5 (e))

Q: Are maximum or minimum rates specified in Regulation Z?

A: No. Regulation Z does not fix maximum, minimum, or any charges for credit. But it requires that you show whatever rate you do charge.

Q: Do you ever have a choice about how you state the annual percentage rate?

A: Before Jan. 1, 1971 you have the option to disclose the annual percentage rate in dollar terms. For example—"$11 finance charge per year per $100 of unpaid balance." However, beginning Jan. 1, 1971, the rate must be stated as a percentage. (Reg. Z/226.6 (j))

Q: How accurate must the annual percentage rate be?

A: Accurate to the nearest one quarter of one percent. (Reg. Z/226.5)

Q: How is the annual percentage rate computed?

A: It depends on whether the credit is open end (Reg. Z/226.5 (a)) or other than open end credit. (Reg. Z/226.5 (b))

Some questions and answers about open end credit

Q: What is open end credit?

A: Typically it covers most credit cards and revolving charge accounts in retail stores, where finance charges are usually made on unpaid amounts each month. (Reg. Z/226.2 (r); Reg. Z/226.7)

Q: What must an open end credit customer be told under this law?

A: If it is a new account, then your customer must receive these specific items in writing to the extent applicable: (Reg. Z/226.7 (a))

1. The conditions under which the finance charge may be imposed and the period in which payment can be made without incurring a finance charge.
2. The method used in determining the balance on which the finance charge is to be made.
3. How the actual finance charge is calculated.
4. The periodic rates used and the range of balances to which each applies.
5. The conditions under which additional charges may be made along with details of how they are calculated.
6. Descriptions of any lien which you may acquire on a customer's property.
7. The minimum payment that must be made on each billing.

Q: What about customers who already have open end accounts on July 1, 1969?

A: The same information must be sent to them by July 31 if the account has an unpaid balance on July 1. Where no balance is owed on that date, the same information must be supplied on or before the first billing that follows use of the account. (Reg. Z/226.7 (f))

Q: Are periodic statements necessary on open end accounts?
A: Yes, but only where there is an unpaid balance over $1 or where a finance charge is made. (Reg. Z/226.7 (b))

Q: What sort of information must accompany a monthly statement?
A: Where applicable, you must give customers this information: (Reg. Z/226.7 (b))

1. The unpaid balance at the start of the billing period.
2. The amount and date of each extension of credit and identification of each item bought.
3. Payments made by a customer and other credits: this includes returns, rebates and adjustments.
4. The finance charge shown in dollars and cents.
5. The rates used in calculating the finance charge plus the range of balances to which they apply.
6. The annual percentage rate.
7. The unpaid balance on which the finance charge was calculated.
8. The closing date of the billing cycle and the unpaid balance at that time.

Q: Where must this information appear?
A: Some items must appear on the actual face of the statement. Others may be shown on the reverse side; or, on a separate form enclosed in the same envelope. (Reg. Z/226.7 (c))

Q: How is the annual percentage rate determined on open end credit?
A: The finance charge is divided by the unpaid balance to which it applies. This gives the rate per month or whatever time period is used. The result is multiplied by 12 or the other number of time periods used by you during the year. (Reg. Z/226.5 (a))

Here's an example:

A typical charge of 1½% is made on an unpaid balance where bills are sent out monthly. The annual percentage rate would be twelve times 1½% or 18%.
Other methods for calculating the annual percentage rate on open end credit are detailed in Reg. Z/226.5 (a) and Reg. Z/226.7 (b) (6).

Z

Some questions and answers about credit other than open end

Q: What types of credit are included?

A: Both loans and sales credit—in every case for a specified period of time where the total amount, number of payments, and due dates are agreed upon by you and your customer. Typically, it is used in buying or financing the purchase of "big ticket" items. A good example is a loan from a finance company to buy an automobile. Another example is credit extended by a store to buy a washing machine, a television set, or other major appliance. It also includes a single payment loan. (Reg. Z/226.8)

Q: What must the credit customer be told in these types of transactions?

A: You must present to your customer in writing the following information as applicable, plus additional information relating to the type of credit extended. (Reg. Z/226.8 (b))

1. The total dollar amount of the finance charge; except in the case of a credit transaction to finance purchase of a dwelling.
2. The date on which the finance charge begins to apply, if this is different from the date of the transaction.
3. The annual percentage rate. (For exception see Reg. Z/226.8 (b) (2) (i) (ii))
4. The number, amounts and due dates of payments.
5. The total payments—except in the case of first mortgages on dwelling purchases.
6. The amount you charge for any default, delinquency, etc. or method you use for calculating that amount.

7. Description of any security you will hold.
8. Description of any penalty charge for prepayment of principal.
9. How the unearned part of the finance charge is calculated in the case of prepayment. Charges deducted from any rebate or refund must be stated.

Q: Are there any other things customers must be told?

A: That depends on the transaction—whether it is a loan or a credit sale:

Q: In the case of a loan, what do I have to tell my customers?

A: In addition to the information given your customer, as previously indicated, you must also provide this information: (Reg. Z/226.8 (d))

1. The amount of credit to be given to your customer. This includes all charges which are part of the amount of credit extended but are not a part of the finance charge. This information must be itemized.
2. Amounts that are deducted as prepaid finance charges and required deposit balances.

Q: Regarding credit sales, what additional information do I give these customers?

A: Again, you must give your customers all the information in the answer to the second question in this section, and the following additional information as applicable: (Reg. Z/226.8 (c))

1. The cash price
2. The down payment, including trade-in
3. The difference between the two
4. All other charges, itemized, that are included in the amount financed but not part of the finance charge
5. The unpaid balance
6. Amounts deducted as prepaid finance charges or required deposit balances
7. The amount financed
8. The total cash price, finance and all other charges. (This does not apply to the sale of a dwelling.)

Q: When must customers receive all this information on loan or credit sales?

A: Before the credit is extended. (Reg. Z/226.8 (a))

Q: Must this information be given to customers in writing?

A: Yes. You must include the information on the face of the note or other instrument evidencing the obligation, or on a separate sheet that identifies the transaction. (Reg. Z/226.8 (a))

Q: Are monthly statements required?

A. No. But if you do send out monthly statements, you must show clearly the annual percentage rate, and the period in which a payment must be made to avoid late charges. (Reg. Z/226.8 (n))

Q: How is the annual percentage rate calculated on loans or credit other than open end?

A: By the actuarial method—payments are applied first to interest due and any remainder is then applied to reduce principal. (Reg. Z/226.5 (b))

Q. What are examples of the actuarial method?

A: Here are two simple examples:

1. A bank loan of $100 repayable in equal monthly installments over one year is made, at a 6% add-on finance charge. The annual percentage rate would be 11%. The borrower would repay $106 over one year. He would only have use of the full $100 until he made his first payment, and less and less each month as payments are made. The effect is that the actual annual percentage rate is almost twice the add-on percentage rate.
2. Using the same example as above with the 6% finance charge discounted in advance. The annual percentage rate would be 11½% because the customer would only receive $94 and have to repay $100. He would have full use of only $94 of the loan up to the time he makes his first payment.

Q: But isn't the actuarial method very complicated?

A: Yes, it is. Recognizing this, the Federal Reserve Board has prepared tables showing the annual percentage rate based on the finance charge and the number of weekly or monthly payments to be made. These tables are available from the Federal Reserve Board and Federal Reserve Banks at a nominal cost. (Reg. Z/226.5 (c))

Q: Must I use the Board's Annual Percentage Rate tables?

A: No. You may wish to purchase specially prepared tables for your type of business from one of several table or chart publishers. Trade associations and financial institutions can be helpful also. (Reg. Z/226.5 (c) (2))

Q: Must the creditor always show the annual percentage rate?

A: Generally yes, except that on credit other than open end credit, if the finance charge is $5 or less, and applies to credit of $75 or less, it need not be shown. The same exception applies to a finance charge of $7.50 or less on credit of more than $75. (Reg. Z/226.8 (b) (2) (i) & (ii))

Z

Some questions and answ about real estate

Q: Is real estate credit covered under Regulation Z?

A: Yes. All real estate credit in any amount is covered under this Regulation when it is to an individual and not for business purposes, unless the business purpose is agriculture.

Q: Does real estate credit cover more than mortgages?

A: Yes, very definitely. Any credit transaction that involves any type of security interest in real estate of a consumer is covered. (Reg. Z/226.2 (w), (x) (y) & (z))

Q: Are there any special provisions that apply to real estate credit?

A: Two basic points:

1. You do not have to show the total dollar amount of the finance charge on a credit sale or first mortgage loan to finance the purchase of the customer's dwelling. (Reg. Z/226.8 (c) (8) and (d) (3))
2. In many instances, your customer has the right to cancel a credit arrangement within three business days if his residence is used as collateral for credit. (Reg. Z/226.9)

Q: Must a creditor inform his customer of the right to cancel?

A: Yes. He must furnish the Notice prescribed by the Regulation. (Reg. Z/226.9 (b))

Q: What must the customer do to cancel a transaction under the Regulation?

A: A customer may cancel a transaction

1. By signing and dating the Notice to customer required by Federal law, which he receives from the creditor, and either
   (a) mailing the Notice to the creditor at the address shown on the Notice, or (b) delivering the Notice to the creditor at the address shown on the Notice either personally or by messenger (or by other agents), or 2. by sending a telegram to the creditor at the address shown on the Notice. A brief description of the transaction which the customer wishes to cancel should be included in the telegram.

or 3. by preparing a letter (or other writing) which includes a brief description of the transaction which he wishes to cancel, and either (a) mailing the letter (or other writing) to the creditor at the address shown on the Notice.

or (b) delivering the letter (or other writing) to the creditor at the address shown on the Notice either personally or by messenger (or by other agents).

Q: What if the customer telephones that he is going to cancel?

A: A telephone call to the creditor may not be used to cancel a transaction; WRITTEN notice of cancellation is required. If the customer takes one of the above steps to cancel within the three day period, he has effectively cancelled the transaction.

Q: What if I haven't received the notice of cancellation in three days?

A: You should allow time for a mailed letter or telegram sent within the three day period to be delivered, and determine that your customer has not cancelled the transaction.

Q: Does this right of cancellation apply to a first mortgage on a residence?

A: A first mortgage to finance the purchase of your customer's residence carries no right to cancel. However, a first mortgage for any other purpose and a second mortgage on the same residence may be cancelled. (Reg. Z/226.9 (g))

Q: What happens regarding cancellation in the case of a mechanic's lien or similar security interest acquired by a craftsman who works on credit?

A: Take a craftsman, for example, who charges his customers a finance charge or allows payment in more than four installments. His customer does have a right to cancel, but only within three business days. Unless there is an emergency the craftsman should wait three days before starting work. (Reg. Z/226.9 (c))

Q: Suppose a customer needs emergency repairs and cannot wait for three days?

A: A customer may waive his right to cancel a credit agreement if credit is needed to meet a bonafide personal financial emergency and if failure to start repairs would endanger him, his family, or his property. (Reg. Z/226.9 (e))

Some questions and answers about the advertising of credit

Q: Does Regulation Z affect credit advertising?

A: Yes it does. It affects all advertising to aid or promote any extension of consumer credit regardless of who the advertiser may be. An association, for example, which advertises that its members extend consumer credit is subject to the advertising provisions of Regulation Z.

Q: What kinds of advertising are affected?

A: All types of advertising: television, radio, newspapers, magazines, leaflets, flyers, catalogs, public address announcements, direct mail literature, window displays, billboards, etc. (Reg. Z/226.2 (b))

Q: How does Regulation Z affect your advertising as a creditor?

A: Generally, you may not advertise that the down payment, installment plan or amount of credit can be arranged unless you usually arrange terms of this type. (Reg. Z/226.10 (a))

Q: How else is credit advertising affected?

A: If it is open end credit see Reg. Z/226.10 (c). For credit other than open end see Reg. Z/226.10 (d). If you advertise in catalogs, see Reg. Z/226.10 (b). But generally you are not permitted to advertise any specific credit term unless all other terms involved are stated clearly and can be easily seen.

Typical formats of disclosures under Regulation Z are shown on the following pages for demonstration only. They are not intended for the requirements of your business. For full information, please refer to the provisions of the Regulation.

NOTICE OF RIGHT OF RESCISSION

The following form is the form of notice of the right to rescind a transaction required to be given to customers under certain circumstances set forth in Section 226.9 of Regulation Z. This exhibit is set in capitals and lower case letters of 12 point bold faced type, the minimum size permissible under Regulation Z.

Notice To Customer Required By Federal Law:

You have entered into a transaction on _____ (Date) which may result in a lien, mortgage, or other security interest on your home. You have a legal right under federal law to cancel this transaction, if you desire to do so, without any penalty or obligation within three business days from the above date or any later date on which all material disclosures required under the Truth in Lending Act have been given to you. If you so cancel the transaction, any lien, mortgage, or other security interest on your home arising from this transaction is automatically void. You are also entitled to receive a refund of any downpayment or other consideration if you cancel. If you decide to cancel this transaction, you may do so by notifying

(Address of Creditor's Place of Business)

by mail or telegram sent not later than midnight of _____ (Date). You may also use any other form of written notice identifying the transaction if it is delivered to the above address not later than that time. This notice may be used for that purpose by dating and signing below.

I hereby cancel this transaction.

The following paragraph may appear on the face or the reverse side of the notice shown on the opposite page. If it appears on the reverse side of the notice, the face of the notice shall state, "See reverse side for important information about your right of rescission."

EFFECT OF RESCISSION. When a customer exercises his right to rescind under paragraph (a) of this section, he is not liable for any finance or other charge, and any security interest becomes void upon such a rescission. Within 10 days after receipt of a notice of rescission, the creditor shall return to the customer any money or property given as earnest money, downpayment, or otherwise, and shall take any action necessary or appropriate to reflect the termination of any security interest created under the transaction. If the creditor has delivered any property to the customer, the customer may retain possession of it. Upon the performance of the creditor's obligations under this section, the customer shall tender the property to the creditor, except that if return of the property in kind would be impracticable or inequitable, the customer shall tender its reasonable value. Tender shall be made at the location of the property or at the residence of the customer, at the option of the customer. If the creditor does not take possession of the property within 10 days after tender by the customer, ownership of the property vests in the customer without obligation on his part to pay for it.

EXHIBIT G

SAMPLE PAGE FROM TABLE FOR COMPUTING ANNUAL PERCENTAGE RATE FOR LEVEL MONTHLY PAYMENT PLANS

EXAMPLE

Finance charge = $35.00; Total amount financed = $200; Number of monthly payments = 24.

SOLUTION

Step 1—Divide the finance charge by the total amount financed and multiply by $100. This gives the finance charge per $100 of amount financed. That is, $35.00 ÷ $200 = .1750 x $100 = $17.50.

Step 2—Follow down the left hand column of the table to the line for 24 months. Follow across this line until you find the nearest number to $17.50. In this example $17.51 is closest to $17.50. Reading up the column of figures shows an annual percentage rate of 16%.

NUMBER OF PAYMENTS	ANNUAL PERCENTAGE RATE
	14.00%	14.25%	14.50%	14.75%	15.00%	15.25%	15.50%	15.75%	16.00%	16.25%	16.50%	16.75%	17.00%	17.25%	17.50%	17.75%

REGULATION Z

INTERPRETATIONS

As of September 11, 1969, thirty-nine interpretations of Regulation Z have been issued by the Board. Although the interpretations are listed in the table of contents under the main section of the Regulation to which they relate, in some cases an interpretation may be applicable to more than one section. In these cases, cross references are shown in the table of contents.

TRUTH IN LENDING INTERPRETATIONS OF REGULATION Z

SECTION 226.201—LAY-AWAY PLANS AS EXTENSIONS OF CREDIT

Many vendors offer Lay-Away Plans under which they retain the merchandise for a customer until the cash price is paid in full and the customer has no contractual obligation to make payments and may, at his option, revoke a purchase made under the plan and request and receive prompt refund of any amounts paid toward the cash price of the merchandise.

A purchase under such a Lay-Away Plan shall not be considered an extension of credit subject to the provisions of Regulation Z.

SECTION 226.202—SECURITY INTEREST—CONFESSION OF JUDGMENT—COGNOVIT NOTES

Under § 226.2(z) "security interest" is defined to include confessed liens whether or not recorded and, in general, to include any interest in property which secures payment or performance of an obligation. In certain transactions involving a security interest, under § 226.9 the customer has a right of rescission.

In some of the States, confession of judgment clauses or cognovit provisions are lawful and make it possible for the holder of an obligation containing such clause or provision to record a lien on property of the obligor simply by recordation entry of judgment; the obligor is afforded no opportunity to enter a defense against such action prior to entry of the judgment.

Since confession of judgment clauses and cognovit provisions in such States have the effect of depriving the obligor of the right to be notified of a pending action and to enter a defense in a judicial proceeding before judgment may be entered or recorded against him, such clauses and provisions in those States are security interests under § 226.2(z) and for the purposes of § 226.7 (a)(7), § 226.8(b)(5), and § 226.9. This is the case even if the judgment cannot be entered until after a default by the obligor.

Confession of judgment clauses and cognovit provisions which, by their terms, exclude a lien on all real property which is used or is expected to be used as the principal residence of the customer, would not bring a transaction under the provisions of § 226.9.

SECTION 226.203—OPEN END CREDIT DISTINGUISHED FROM OTHER CREDIT

The fundamental qualification for "open end credit" under § 226.2(r) is that consumer credit be extended on an account pursuant to a plan under which (1) the creditor may permit the customer to make purchases or obtain loans from time to time directly or indirectly from the creditor, as the plan may provide; (2) the customer has the privilege of paying the balance in full or in installments; and (3) a finance charge may be computed by the creditor from time to time on an outstanding unpaid balance. Under an open end credit account plan, it is contemplated that there will or may be repetitive transactions on a revolving basis.

In certain cases, a form of contract or note relating to a single transaction provides that the finance charge be computed from time to time by application of a rate to the unpaid balance and stipulates required minimum periodic payments. However, the obligor has the privilege of making larger and more frequent payments than stipulated or paying the obligation in full at any time without penalty. The question arises as to whether the creditor should make disclosures in such circumstances under § 226.7 for open end credit accounts or under § 226.8 for credit other than open end.

Although the terms of such a contract or note meet the second and third requirements for such a plan, they do not meet the first of such requirements nor the basic qualification that consumer credit be extended on an account pursuant to a plan. Therefore, disclosures in this case are required to be made under § 226.8.

SECTION 226.301—AGRICULTURAL PURPOSES—WHEN EXEMPT FROM THE REGULATION

Under § 226.3(a), the Regulation does not apply to "Extensions of credit to organizations, including governments, or for business or commercial purposes, other than agricultural purposes." The definition of "organization" in § 226.2(s) includes a corporation trust, estate, partnership, cooperative, or association as well as governmental entities. The question arises as to whether the Regulation applies to extensions of credit to organizations, including governments, for agricultural purposes.

Extensions of credit to organizations, including governments, for agricultural purposes are exempt from the Regulation.

SECTION 226.401—SERVICE CHARGES ON ACCOUNTS NOT PAID WITHIN A GIVEN PERIOD OF TIME

Some vendors bill their customers for property or services purchased under the terms of a credit plan which requires that the full amount of each billing be paid within a stipulated period after billing, with no privilege of paying in instalments. If a bill is not paid within that stipulated period of time, the vendor imposes a service charge periodically on the unpaid balance until the account is paid in full. The question arises as to whether Regulation Z applies to such transactions.

When in the ordinary course of business a vendor's billings are not paid in full within that stipulated period of time, and under such circumstances the vendor does not, in fact, regard such accounts in default, but continues or will continue to extend credit and impose charges periodically for delaying payment of such accounts from time to time until paid, the charge so imposed comes within the definitions of a "finance charge" [§ 226.2(q)] applicable in each case to the amount of the unpaid balance of the account. Under such circumstances the credit so extended comes within the "open end credit" in § 226.2(r), the vendor is a creditor as defined in § 226.2(m), and the disclosures required for open end credit accounts under § 226.7 shall be made.

SECTION 226.402—TERM OF INSURANCE COVERAGE

Under § 226.4(a)(5) and (6) certain disclosures of insurance premium costs, if applicable, are required. The question arises as to whether such amounts of cost disclosed must include the cost of insurance for the full term of the transaction.

Under § 226.4(h) the cost of insurance for the full period of insurance coverage which the creditor will require shall be disclosed if the cost of the insurance premium is required to be included in the finance charge. However, if the cost of insurance is not required to be included in the finance charge, the cost to be disclosed need only be the cost of premiums for the term of the initial policy or policies written in connection with the transaction, accompanied by a statement of the type of insurance and the term thereof.

SECTION 226.403—DISCLOSURE OF COST OF PROPERTY INSURANCE WHEN NOT OBTAINABLE FROM OR THROUGH THE CREDITOR

In many cases a creditor requires insurance against loss or damage to property or liability arising out of its use but such insurance is not obtainable from or through him. The question arises under § 226.4(a)(6) as to whether such a creditor must make any disclosures to avoid having to include the insurance premium in the finance charge.

Irrespective of whether such insurance may be obtained from or through the creditor, if the creditor requires property insurance and wishes to exclude the cost from the finance charge, he is required to state clearly and conspicuously to the customer that he may choose the person through which the insurance is to be obtained. However, if the insurance is not obtainable from or through the creditor, he is not required to disclose the cost of that insurance, unless, of course, the premiums are included in the "amount financed, in which case it would have to be disclosed under § 226.8 (c)(4) or (d)(1), as the case may be.

SECTION 226.404—PREMIUMS FOR VENDOR'S SINGLE INTEREST INSURANCE REQUIRED BY CREDITOR

Under § 226.4(a)(6), charges or premiums for insurance, written in connection with credit transaction, against loss of or damage to property may be excluded from the finance charge if the creditor makes the disclosures required under that subparagraph. Under § 226.4(a)(7), a premium or other charge for any other guarantee or insurance protecting the creditor against the customer's default or other credit loss is included in the finance charge. The question arises as to whether Vendor's Single Interest (V.S.I.) coverage, when required by the creditor to be written in connection with a transaction, is insurance of the type described in § 226.4(a)(6) or in § 226.4(a)(7).

V.S.I. coverage is written only in connection with a credit transaction and indemnifies the creditor against, among other perils, conversion, embezzlement, and secretion of the collateral by the customer; and amounts payable on account of loss are payable only to the creditor; and the amount of any indemnity payable under the policy is directly related to the amount of the credit loss, in that such indemnity can never exceed the amount of the unpaid principal balance of the debt. The insurer has no liability under a V.S.I. policy unless, at the time the policy was written, no payment was more than a specified number of days past due, and a claim under the policy is not valid unless the customer has defaulted in payment. Additionally, many V.S.I. policies indemnify the creditor against expense incurred in transporting the collateral to the creditor from the place of repossession.

V.S.I. coverage is, therefore, insurance which protects the creditor against the customer's default or other credit loss, and when required by the creditor to be written in connection with any transactions, the premium therefor is included in the finance charge under § 226.4(a)(7).

SECTION 226.405—PROPERTY INSURANCE WRITTEN IN CONNECTION WITH A TRANSACTION—OBTAINED FROM OR THROUGH THE CREDITOR

Footnote 4 to § 226.4(a)(6) specifies that a policy of insurance against loss or damage to property or liability arising out of its use is not considered to be "written in connection with" a transaction when it ". . . was not purchased by the customer for the purpose of being used in connection with that extension of credit." Therefore, whenever such a policy is purchased by the customer for the purpose of being used in connection with a specific extension of credit, it is insurance "written in connection with" that transaction.

If the customer elects to purchase such insurance otherwise than from or through the creditor, the creditor is not required to disclose the cost of the insurance or include the premium in the finance charge. However, if the cost of such insurance is to be financed through the creditor, the premiums must be included in the "amount financed" and disclosed under § 226.8(c)(4) or (d)(1), as the case may be.

SECTION 226.501—USE OF RANGES OR BRACKETS TO DETERMINE PERIODIC RATE OF FINANCE CHARGE ON OPEN-END ACCOUNTS

Section 226.5( ) of Regulation Z, in effect, gives a creditor the option in certain circumstances of stating (1) two or more separate annual percentage rates (e.g., the rate on a $700 balance might be stated as 18% on balance to $500 and 12% on balance over $500), or (2) a single annual percentage rate determined by the "quotient method" resulting from applying the rates to a total balance (e.g., in the example above, an annual percentage rate of 16¼% on a $700 balance).

Section 226.5(a)(2), which relates to the use of ranges or brackets to compute periodic finance charges, does not prevent a creditor who uses such brackets from exercising the options referred to in section 226.5(a)(1).

SECTION 226.502—ANNUAL PERCENTAGE RATE ON SINGLE ADD-ON RATE TRANSACTIONS

The application of a single add-on rate to transactions of varying maturities, when converted to an annual percentage rate determined by the actuarial method, results in minor variations. Such annual percentage rate variations on maturities up to 60 months are so insignificant that separate computations are unwarranted.

The question arises as to whether a creditor may disclose a single annual percentage rate on all such transactions based upon the highest rate which will arise from the application of the same single add-on rate to each of such transactions.

When the same add-on rate is applied to all transactions within a range of maturities up to 60 months, and provided that all payments on each transaction are equal in amount and due at equal intervals of time within the limits provided by § 226.5(d), a single annual percentage rate may be disclosed, in which case it shall be the highest annual percentage rate that may be applicable to any such transactions.

SECTION 226.503—MINOR IRREGULARITIES—MAXIMUM IRREGULAR PERIOD LIMITS

Section 226.5(d) specifies certain minimums in determining what minor irregularities in first payment periods may be disregarded in determining the annual percentage rate. The question arises as to what maximum limits for such periods would still permit the irregular periods to be considered regular in computing the annual percentage rate.

If the period from the date on which the finance charge begins to accrue and the date the final payment is due is not less than three months in the case of weekly payments, six months in the case of biweekly or semimonthly payments, or one year in the case of monthly payments, the maximum interval of time from the date the finance charge begins to accrue to the date the first payment is due is as follows:

(1) in the case of weekly payments, 12 days;
(2) in the case of biweekly or semimonthly payments, 25 days;
(3) in the case of monthly payments, 50 days

If the period from the date on which the finance charge begins to accrue and the date the final payment is due is less than three months in the case of weekly payments, six months in the case of biweekly or semimonthly payments, or one year in the case of monthly payments, the maximum interval of time from the date the finance charge begins to accrue to the date of the first payment is due is as follows:

(1) in the case of weekly payments, 10 days;
(2) in the case of biweekly or semimonthly payments, 21 days;
(3) in the case of monthly payments, 42 days.

SECTION 226.504—TREATMENT OF "PICK-UP PAYMENT" IN AN INSTALMENT CONTRACT

In some instances involving an instalment contract arising from a credit sale, the purchaser may not pay the full amount of the required downpayment at the time he signs the contract or otherwise enters into the credit transaction. In such cases, the creditor may include in the instalment contract or accept a separate obligation for the unpaid portion of the downpayment, commonly called a "pick-up payment," the amount of which usually carries no finance charge and is to be paid on or before a specified date independent of the other scheduled payments.

The question arises whether the "pick-up payment" must be treated as part of the "amount financed" for purposes of disclosure and determination of the "annual percentage rate" or whether it may be treated as a deferred portion of the downpayment.

In determining the "amount financed" the creditor may exclude the amount of the "pick-up payment" provided that:

(1) The amount of the finance charge applicable to the transaction does not exceed the amount that would have been imposed had the required down payment been paid in full upon consummation of the transaction; and

(2) The due date of the "pick-up payment" is not later than the due date of the second payment otherwise scheduled.

In making the disclosures required under § 226.8 (b) (3), if such "pick-up payment" is more than twice the amount of an otherwise regularly scheduled equal payment, the creditor shall state the conditions, if any, under which such "pick-up payment" may be refinanced if not paid when due; and such "pick-up payment" may be identified using that term or the term "balloon payment."

226.505—APPLICATION OF THE MINOR IRREGULARITIES PROVISIONS IN DETERMINING THE AMOUNT OF THE FINANCE CHARGE

Some creditors calculate finance charges in a credit transaction on the basis of predetermined percentage rate or rates, e.g., 1% per month on the unpaid balances. Determination of the amount of the finance charge is fairly routine for these creditors if the contracts are written for regular payments at regular intervals. However, many times the first payment may be irregular either in amount or payment period, or both, especially in those instances where creditors require payments to fall due on fixed dates or those who are paid by means of payroll deductions. The minor irregularities provisions of § 226.5(d) of the Regulation and § 226.503 of the interpretations to Regulation Z, which pertain to the determination of the annual percentage rate, also apply to the determination of the finance charge. For convenient reference, the applicable provisions of § 226.5(d) and § 226.503 as they apply to the determination of the finance charge are set forth below.

In determining the finance charge, a creditor may, at his option, consider the payment irregularities set forth below in subparagraphs (1) and (2) as if they were regular in amount or time, as applicable, provided that the transaction to which they relate is otherwise payable in equal instalments scheduled at equal intervals.

(1) If the period from the date on which the finance charge begins to accrue and the date the final payment is due is not less than 3 months in the case of weekly payments, 6 months in the case of biweekly or semimonthly payments, or 1 year in the case of monthly payments either or both of the following:

(i) The amount of 1 payment other than any downpayment is not more than 50 per cent greater nor 50 per cent less than the amount of a regular payment; or

(ii) The interval between the date on which the finance charge begins to accrue and the date the first payment is due is not less than 5 nor more than 12 days for an obligation otherwise payable in weekly instalments, not less than 10 nor more than 25 days for an obligation otherwise payable in biweekly or semimonthly instalments, or not less than 20 nor more than 50 days for an obligation otherwise payable in monthly instalments.

(2) If the period from the date on which the finance charge begins to accrue and the date the final payment is due is less than 3 months in the case of weekly payments, 6 months in the case of biweekly or semimonthly payments, or 1 year in the case of monthly payments, either or both of the following:

(i) The amount of 1 payment other than any downpayment is not more than 25 per cent greater nor 25 per cent less than the amount of a regular payment; or

(ii) The interval between the date on which the finance charge begins to accrue and the date the first payment is due is not less than 6 nor more than 10 days for an obligation otherwise payable in weekly instalments, not less than 12 nor more than 21 days for an obligation otherwise payable in biweekly or semimonthly instalments, or not less than 25 nor more than 42 days for an obligation otherwise payable in monthly instalments.

For the purposes of § 226.8(b)(3) in disclosing the number, amount and due dates or periods of payments scheduled to repay the indebtedness and the "total of payments," the creditor may treat such irregular payments or payment periods, or both, as if they were regular. If the creditor so elects, he may indicate the exact amount or payment period involved in the minor irregularity.

SECTION 226.601—OVERSTATEMENT OF ANNUAL PERCENTAGE RATE

Section 226.6(h) of Regulation Z provides that in certain circumstances the disclosure of an annual percentage rate which is greater than that required to be disclosed under the Regulation does not in itself constitute a violation of the Regulation. Under this section may a disclosure regarding an annual percentage rate (e.g. "the annual percentage rate does not exceed 18%") be preprinted on a contract or periodic statement and comply with disclosure requirements when the actual rate will at times be lower (e.g. 15%) for some transactions?

Section 226.5 specifies the methods which shall be employed in determining annual percentage rates. Section 226.6(h) is not intended to provide an alternative to these requirements, but is merely to provide appropriate relief to a creditor who overstates accidentally. Any disclosure of an annual percentage rate whether preprinted or otherwise which overstates the annual percentage rate determined in accordance with section 226.5 other than through inadvertence does not comply with requirements.

SECTION 226.602—TRANSITION PERIOD—USING EXISTING FORMS, SUITABLY ALTERED OR SUPPLEMENTED

Section 226.6(k) of Regulation Z provides that, in some circumstances, if a creditor has been unable to obtain needed new printed forms by July 1, 1969, he may use existing forms until new ones are obtained, but not later than December 31, 1969. In such instances, the existing forms must be suitably altered or supplemented to make necessary disclosures clearly and conspicuously. The requirement that existing forms be supplemented is met by attachments or enclosures.

Also in some instances, creditors encounter unavoidable delays in obtaining necessary equipment or computer programs needed to utilize new printed forms. Such delays can produce problems comparable to those involved in delays in obtaining printed forms. In such a situation, a creditor, under § 226.6(k), may continue to use existing forms until the means of utilizing the new forms are available, but in no event later than December 31, 1969, and subject, of course, to the conditions applicable under § 226.6(k): namely, that the creditor must have taken bona fide steps prior to July 1, 1969, to obtain the necessary equipment or computer programs, and the existing forms must be "altered or supplemented as necessary to assure that all of the items of information the creditor is required to disclose are set forth clearly and conspicuously."

SECTION 226.603—DISCLOSURES IN TRANSACTION INVOLVING MULTIPLE CUSTOMERS

Section 226.6(e) states the general rule that, except in the case of a rescindable transaction under § 226.9, where there are multiple customers in a transaction, the creditor is only required to make disclosures to one of them. However, in determining which customer shall receive disclosures, the creditor may not select a customer who is secondarily liable, such as an endorser, comaker (when designated as surety), guarantor, or a similar party. This does not prohibit the creditor from also furnishing disclosures to such persons who are secondarily liable.

SECTION 226.604—INCONSISTENT STATE REQUIREMENTS

Section 226.6(5) of Regulation Z indicates types of State law requirements that are inconsistent with Regulation Z, and § 226.6(c) indicates the methods of dealing with such inconsistent requirements of State law.

Whether State laws are inconsistent with Regulation Z necessarily depends on the nature of the State laws. Section 226.6(b) (1) provides that State law is inconsistent to the extent that it "requires a creditor to make disclosures different from the requirements of this part with respect to form, content, terminology, or time of delivery." This refers to disclosures of the kinds of information covered by Regulation Z, and not to other or collateral information such as a statement telling the customer that he should read the contract carefully, or that there should be no blanks in the contract. Similarly, it does not refer to headings that State law may require on a contract such as "Retail Installment Contract." Similarly, a specification in a State law that certain size type must be used is not necessarily inconsistent with the requirements of Regulation Z.

SECTION 226.605—RATE CHARTS AND TABLES UNAVAILABLE

Subject to certain conditions, § 226.6(f) of Regulation Z permits a creditor to use an estimate or approximation of information when the information is "unknown or not available to the creditor, and the creditor has made a reasonable effort to ascertain it."

It appears that some creditors who require special charts or tables in order to operate with necessary efficiency in compliance with Regulation Z, and who have placed orders for such charts or tables with suppliers of them, may be unable to obtain such charts or tables by July 1, 1969, the effective date of Regulation Z.

In the circumstances indicated, when the necessary charts or tables have been ordered prior to July 1 1969, and are temporarily unavailable to a creditor who has thus made a reasonable effort to obtain them, § 226.6(f) permits the creditor to use an estimate or approximation of the annual percentage rate and other information during the interim until they become available, subject, of course, to the other requirements of that paragraph.

SECTION 226.701—PERIODIC STATEMENTS—FINANCE CHARGE RESULTING FROM MORE THAN ONE PERIODIC RATE

Section 226.7(b) (4) of Regulation Z requires that a periodic statement for open end credit show the amount of any finance charge, and that the statement also itemize and identify that portion of the finance charge that is due to application of one or more periodic rates and that portion due to any other charge such as minimum, fixed, check service, transaction, activity, or similar charge.

This does not require the statement to state separately the portions of a finance charge due to application of two or more periodic rates. For example, if a creditor charges 1½% per month on the first $500 of a balance and 1% per month on amounts over $500, the monthly charge on a $600 balance would be $8.50, which must be shown. However, it would not be necessary to itemize the two components ($7.50 and $1.00) of the $8.50 charge. Under section 226.7(b) (5), the periodic rates that may apply to the account, and the applicable range of balances must, of course, be shown, but this could be preprinted.

SECTION 226.702—LOCATION OF STATEMENT OF HOW THE BALANCE WAS DETERMINED

Section 226.7(b)(8) requires the creditor of an open end credit account to disclose on the periodic statement, "the balance on which the finance charge was computed, and a statement of how that balance was determined." Under § 226.7(c) which relates to the location of disclosures there is no specific reference to the placement of the "statement of how that balance was determined" when separated from the balance to which it relates. The question arises as to where, under such circumstances, this required statement shall appear on the periodic statement.

If separated from the balance to which it relates, the required statement of how the balance was determined may be placed on the face of the periodic statement, the reverse side of the periodic statement, or on an enclosed supplement; however, where such statement and balance do not appear together, the statement shall make clear the balance to which it refers.

SECTION 226.703—FINANCE CHARGE BASED ON AVERAGE DAILY BALANCE IN OPEN END CREDIT ACCOUNTS

Section 226.7(b)(8) requires that periodic statements for open end accounts shall disclose, among other things, "The balance on which the finance charge was computed, and a statement of how that balance was determined." In some instances, creditors compute a finance charge on the average daily balance by application of a monthly periodic rate. In such case, this information is adequately disclosed if the statement gives the amount of the average daily balance on which the finance charge was computed, and also states how the balance is determined. In other instances, the finance charge is computed on the balance each day by application of a daily periodic rate and such charges are accumulated and debited to the account in a single amount for the billing cycle. The question arises whether the periodic statement must show for each day of the billing cycle a balance on which a finance charge was computed.

If a daily periodic rate is used, the balance to which it is applicable shall be stated as follows:

(1) A balance for each day in the billing cycle; or

(2) The sum of the daily balances during the billing cycle, or

(3) The average daily balance during the billing cycle in which case the creditor shall state on the face of the periodic statement, its reverse side, or on an enclosed supplement that the average daily balance is multiplied by the number of days in the billing cycle and the periodic rate applied to the product to determine the amount of the finance charge.

In each case the annual percentage rate shall be determined and disclosed by multiplying the daily periodic rate by 365.

SECTION 226.704—ANNUAL PERCENTAGE RATE COMPUTATION WHERE TRANSACTION CHARGES ARE IMPOSED ON OPEN END CREDIT ACCOUNTS

Section 226.7(b)(6) prescribes the method by which an annual percentage rate is computed where the creditor of the open end credit account imposes finance charges with respect to specific transactions during the billing cycle.

In determining the denominator of the fraction under § 226.7(b)(6), no amount will be used more than once when adding the sum of the balances to which periodic rates apply to the sum of the amounts financed to which specific transaction charges apply. In every case the full amount of transactions to which specific transaction charges apply shall be included in the denominator. Other balances or parts of balances shall be included according to the manner in which a periodic rate is applied, as illustrated in the following examples of accounts on monthly billing cycles:

1. Previous balance—none

   A specific transaction of $100 occurs on first day of the billing cycle.

   The average daily balance is $100.

   A specific transaction charge of 3% is applicable to the specific transactions.

   The periodic rate is 1½% applicable to the average daily balance.

   The numerator is the amount of the finance charge, which is $4.50.

   The denominator is the amount of the transaction (which is $100), plus the amount by which the balance to which the periodic rate applies exceeds the amount of specific transactions (such excess in this case is 0), totaling $100.

The annual percentage rate is the quotient (which is 4.5%) multiplied by 12 (the number of months in a year), i.e. 54%.

2. Previous balance—$100
   A specific transaction of $100 occurs at midpoint of the billing cycle.
   The average daily balance is $150.
   A specific transaction charge of 3% is applicable to the specific transaction.
   The periodic rate is 1½% applicable to the average daily balance.
   The numerator is the amount of finance charge, which is $5.25.
   The denominator is the amount of the transaction (which is $100), plus the amount by which the balance to which the periodic rate applies exceeds the amounts of specific transactions (such excess in this case is $50), totaling $150.
   As explained in example 1, the annual percentage rate is 3.5% x 12 = 42%.

3. If, in example 2, the periodic rate applies only to the previous balance, the numerator is $4.50 and the denominator is $200 (the amount of the transaction, $100, plus the balance to which only the periodic rate is applicable, the $100 previous balance).
   As explained in example 1, the annual percentage rate is 2.25% x 12 = 27%.

4. If, in example 2, the periodic rate applies only to an adjusted balance (previous balance less payments and credit) and the customer made a payment of $50 at midpoint of billing cycle, the numerator is $3.75 and the denominator is $150 (the amount of the transaction, $100 plus the balance to which only the periodic rate is applicable, the $50 adjusted balance). As explained in example 1, the annual percentage rate is 2.5% x 12 = 30%.

5. Previous balance—$100
   The average daily balance is $150.
   The specific transaction charge is 25 cents per check. The periodic rate is 1½% applied to the average daily balance. The numerator is the amount of the finance charge, which is $2.50, and includes the 25 cents check charge and the $2.25 resulting from the application of the periodic rate. The denominator is the full amount of the specific transaction (which is $100) plus the amount by which the average daily balance exceeds the amount of the specific transaction (which in this case is $50), totaling $150. As explained in example 1, the annual percentage rate would be 1⅔% x 12 = 20%.

Regardless of such method of computation, the annual percentage rate to be disclosed shall be not less than the periodic rate multiplied by the number of periods in a year or the rate as may otherwise be determined under § 226.5(a).

SECTION 226.801—LOCATION OF DISCLOSURES WHEN CONTRACT, SECURITY AGREEMENT, AND EVIDENCE OF TRANSACTION ARE COMBINED IN A SINGLE DOCUMENT

Some creditors incorporate the terms of a contract, a security agreement, and evidence of a transaction in a single document. These documents are designed for processing by mechanical and electronic equipment. If all of the required disclosures under § 226.8 should be placed on the face of such a document, the creditor will be unable to utilize conventional accounting and record keeping equipment because of the size of the resulting document. The question arises as to whether required disclosures may be made on the face and the reverse side of such a document.

Where a creditor elects to combine disclosures with the contract, security agreement, and evidence of a transaction in a single document, the disclosures required under § 226.8 shall, in accordance with § 226.6, be made on the face of that document, on its reverse side, or on both sides, provided that the amount of the finance charge and the annual percentage rate shall appear on the face of the document, and, if the reverse side is used, the printing on both sides of the document shall be equally clear and conspicuous, both sides shall contain the statement, "NOTICE: See other side for important information," and the place for the customer's signature shall be provided following the full content of the document.

SECTION 226.802—DISCLOSURES ON MAIL OR TELEPHONE ORDERS

Under § 226.8(g), disclosures may be made at any time not later than the date the first payment is due under certain conditions. The question arises as to when disclosures shall be made on mail or telephone orders where the information outlined in § 226.8(g)(1) and (2) is not available to the customer or prospective customer.

Under the circumstances set forth in the above question, the creditor shall make the disclosures required under Regulation Z as follows:

1. With respect to credit sales, not later than at the time of delivery of the property or first performance of service ordered.
2. With respect to loans, not later than at the time proceeds of the loan are disbursed.
3. Except that if the transaction is subject to the provisions of § 226.9, the disclosures shall be made before the transaction is consummated.

SECTION 226.803—DISCLOSURES WHEN DISCOUNTS APPLY FOR PROMPT PAYMENT

Under § 226.8(o), disclosures shall be made on the billing statement whereas under § 226.8(a) disclosures shall be made before the transaction is consummated. The question arises as to which provision prevails.

The provisions of § 226.8(o) prevail under the conditions set forth in that paragraph unless the transaction is also subject to the provisions of § 226.9 in which event the disclosures shall be made before the transaction is consummated.

SECTION 226.804—SERIES OF SALES—CONTENT OF AGREEMENT

Under § 226.8(h), if a credit sale is one of a series of transactions made under an agreement providing for the addition of a current sale to an existing outstanding balance and the customer has approved in writing the annual percentage rate or rates and certain other requirements are met, disclosures may be made at any time not later than the date the first payment for that sale is due.

The question arises as to how the annual percentage rate or rates should be shown in an agreement where, for example, an 18% annual percentage rate applies to the first $500 of balance, a 12% annual percentage rate applies to all balances over $500, and the mix of the two rates on transactions over $500 will produce a gradually decreasing annual percentage rate as the amount of balance over $500 increases.

In addition to meeting the other requirements of § 226.8(h), if two or more annual percentage rates apply to ranges of balances, the agreement need only state each annual percentage rate and the range of balances to which it applies. However, the disclosures which must be made not later than the date the first payment is due must include the actual annual percentage rate applicable to that sale.

SECTION 226.805—SERIES OF SALES AS DISTINGUISHED FROM REFINANCING, CONSOLIDATING, OR INCREASING

The question arises as to the distinction between the provisions of § 226.8(h), series of sales, and the provisions of § 226.8(j), refinancing, consolidating, or increasing.

Section 226.8(h) is applicable only when a credit sale is made pursuant to an agreement which provides for the addition of a current (or new) sale to an existing outstanding balance. In such cases, and provided that all of the requirements of § 226.8(h)(1) and (2) are met, the disclosures may be made at any time not later than the date the first payment for that sale is due.

If there is no agreement, or if the agreement does not meet all of the requirements of § 226.8(h), the disclosures required in connection with any subsequent sale, which is added to a previously outstanding balance shall be made under the provisions of § 226.8(j). For example, the fact that an agreement provides a method of computing an unearned portion of the finance charge in the event of prepayment, but does not otherwise meet the requirements of § 226.8(h), will not qualify transactions made pursuant to that agreement for disclosure under the terms of § 226.8(h).

SECTION 226.806—DEPOSIT BALANCES APPLIED TOWARD SATISFACTION OF CUSTOMER'S OBLIGATION

Section 226.8(e)(2) provides that required deposit balances must be deducted under § 226.8(e)(6) and excluded under § 226.8(d)(1) in determining the amount financed. Subdivision (ii) of § 226.8(e)(2) provides an exception in the case of Morris Plan type transactions in which payments in the transaction are made and accumulated in a deposit account which is then wholly applied to satisfy the obligation.

Unless the deposit balance account is created for the sole purpose of accumulating payments and then being applied toward satisfaction of the customer's obligation in the transaction, such deposit balance does not fall within the exception provided in subdivision (ii).

In any case in which a deposit balance qualifies for this exception, each deposit made into the account shall be considered the same as a payment on the obligation for the purpose of computations and disclosures.

SECTION 226.807—ASSUMPTION OF AN OBLIGATION—DISCLOSURES

The question arises as to which disclosures are required to be made under § 226.8(k).

For the purposes of § 226.8(k), an "assumption" occurs only when, by written agreement entered into between a subsequent customer and the creditor, that subsequent customer is or will be accepted by that creditor as an obligor on an existing evidence of debt. In such circumstances, disclosures shall be made as follows:

(1) If the finance charge originally imposed on the existing evidence of debt was an add-on or discount type finance charge, the creditor need only disclose:

(i) The unpaid balance of the obligation assumed;

(ii) The total amount of the charges imposed by the creditor, individually itemized, in connection with the assumption;

(iii) The number, amount, and due dates of remaining payments to be made after assumption, the total of such payments, and any other applicable information required under § 226.8(b)(3);

(iv) Identification of the type of security interest, if any, retained or to be acquired in any property of the assuming customer and a brief identification of that property;

(v) The information required to be disclosed under § 226.8(b)(4), (6) and (7);

(vi) If applicable in connection with the assumption, the disclosures required under § 226.4(a)(5) and (6); and

(vii) If that obligation was entered into on or after July 1, 1969, the annual percentage rate originally disclosed on the existing obligation.

(2) If the existing evidence of debt is subject to a finance charge computed from time to time by application of a percentage rate to an unpaid balance, the creditor shall make the disclosures required under § 226.8(b) and (d) and, if applicable in connection with the assumption, the disclosures required under § 226.4(a) (5) and (6), except that in determining the amount of the finance charge and the annual percentage rate to be disclosed to the customer who assumes the obligation, the creditor may disregard any prepaid finance charges paid by the original customer, but shall include in the finance charge as as "prepaid finance charge" the total amount of the charges imposed by the creditor, individually itemized, in connection with the assumption.

SECTION 226.808—DISCLOSURE OF AMOUNT OF SCHEDULED PAYMENTS

Section 226.8(b)(3) requires the creditor to disclose the "amount . . . of payments scheduled to repay the indebtedness." In certain transactions each payment consists of an equal amount to apply on principal and a finance charge which is determined by application of a rate to the decreasing unpaid balance. In such cases no two payments are equal in amount. The question arises as to whether it is necessary to list the respective dollar amount of each such payment to comply with this requirement of § 226.8(b)(3), or whether an optional disclosure is permitted.

In any transaction in which the amount of each regularly scheduled payment (other than a first or last payment) includes an equal amount to be applied on principal and a finance charge computed by application of a rate to the decreasing unpaid balance, at the creditor's option the requirement of § 226.8(b)(3) with respect to the amount of each payment may be met by disclosing the following information:

(1) The amount of each payment to be applied on principal, and an identification of that amount as payment on principal;

(2) The respective amount of finance charge included in the first and last scheduled payments so described;

If this option is utilized, the exceptions provided under paragraphs (b)(3), and (c)(8) and (d)(3) of § 226.8 shall not apply.

SECTION 226.809—DISCLOSURES FOR CERTAIN STUDENT LOANS

Footnotes 10 and 11 to Regulation Z provide an exception from specified disclosure requirements for interim student loans under certain Federally insured student loan programs. These exceptions are applicable to other student loans of the same type including those made to students under Federally supported loan programs or programs of loan guarantee, administered by or under agreement with the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. In all of such cases, however, all disclosures must be made prior to the time the final note is executed or repayment schedule is agreed upon.

SECTION 226.810—DISCLOSURES—VARIABLE INTEREST RATES

In some cases a note, contract, or other instrument evidencing an obligation provides for prospective changes in the annual percentage rate or otherwise provides for prospective variation in the rate. The question arises as to what disclosures must be made under these circumstances when it is not known at the time of consummation of the transaction whether such change will occur or the date or amount of change.

In such cases, the creditor shall make all disclosures on the basis of the rate in effect at the time of consummation of the transaction and shall also disclose the variable feature.

If disclosure is made prior to the consummation of the transaction that the annual percentage rate is prospectively subject to change, the conditions under which such rate may be changed, and, if applicable, the maximum and minimum limits of such rate stipulated in the note, contract, or other instrument evidencing the obligation, such subsequent change in the annual percentage rate in accordance with the foregoing disclosures is a subsequent occurrence under § 226.6(g) and is not a new transaction.

SECTION 226.811—RENEWALS OF NOTES BY MAIL

Under paragraph (j) of § 226.8, renewals of notes with new maturity dates constitute refinancings and are consequently new transactions. A common practice is for creditors to permit renewal of such notes by mail. In many such instances the creditor does not know whether the customer will reduce his original obligation by a payment on principal or, if reduced, the amount of that reduction. The question arises as to what disclosures should be made by mail to the customer in these circumstances.

If the creditor knows the amount of the principal payment, all disclosures should be made on the basis of the resulting new amount financed. If, however, the creditor does not know whether the customer will reduce his original obligation, or if so, by how much, he should disclose on the assumption that there will be no reduction. In such circumstances he may make one or more additional disclosures based on one or more examples of graduated principal reduction. For example, if a single payment note was for $1,000 at 8% for 3 months, in addition to the other required disclosures, the creditor should disclose an amount financed of $1,000 with a finance charge of $20, and may, in addition, disclose that with a principal payment of $300 the amount financed would be $700 with a finance charge of $14, and with a principal payment of $500 the amount financed would be $500 with a finance charge of $10.

SECTION 226.901—WAIVER OF SECURITY INTERESTS—EFFECT ON THE RIGHT OF RESCISSION

Section 226.9(a) provides for a right of rescission "in the case of any [consumer] credit transaction in which a security interest is or will be retained or acquired in any real property which is used or is expected to be used as the principal residence of the customer." Under § 226.2(z) security interests include mechanic's and materialmen's liens. If a creditor effectively waives his right to retain, or to acquire such a lien, he has not retained or acquired such security interest. The question arises, however, of whether waiver of a creditor's lien rights is effective to remove a transaction from the scope of rescission when lien rights which are not waived arise in favor of subcontractors, workmen, or others who are not creditors in the transaction.

The fact that the creditor waives his lien rights does not, in itself, determine whether or not the transaction is rescindable. If all security interests are effectively waived, the transaction is not rescindable. On the other hand, if as a result of the transaction, a security interest is or will be retained or acquired by a subcontractor, workman, or other person, the transaction is rescindable. In the latter case the creditor would be responsible for delivering the rescission notice as well as other applicable disclosures, delaying performance as provided under § 226.9(c), and identifying himself as the creditor on the rescission notice. The subcontractors, workmen, and others would not be responsible for delivering rescission notices to the customer.

SECTION 226.902—"CUSTOMERS" AND JOINT OWNERS OF PROPERTY UNDER THE RIGHT OF RESCISSION

Section 226.9(f) provides that, for the purpose of the right of rescission, "customer" shall include two or more customers where joint ownership is involved. The question arises of whether this means that all joint owners of record, regardless of whether or not they are parties to the transaction, are customers for this purpose, and whether each of such owners of record (1) must receive disclosures and a notice of the right of rescission, (2) may exercise the right of rescission, and (3) must join in signing a waiver if one is appropriately taken by the creditor.

Under § 226.9(f) where there are joint owners the right to receive disclosures and notice of the right of rescission, the right to rescind, and the need to sign a waiver of such right, apply only to those joint owners who are parties to the transaction.

SECTION 226.903—REFINANCING AND INCREASING—DISCLOSURES AND EFFECTS ON THE RIGHT OF RESCISSION

In some cases the creditor of an obligation will refinance that obligation at the request of a customer by permitting the customer to execute a new note, contract, or other document evidencing the transaction under the terms of which one or more of the original credit terms, including the maturity date of the obligation, are changed. Although such refinancing constitutes a new transaction, and all disclosures required under § 226.8 must be made, the question arises as to whether that transaction is subject to the right of rescission under § 226.9 where the obligation is already secured by a security interest in real property which is used or expected to be used as the principal residence of that customer.

If the amount of such new transaction does not exceed the amount of the unpaid balance plus any accrued and unpaid finance charge on the existing obligation, § 226.9 does not apply to the transaction.

If, however, such new transaction is for an increased amount, that is, for an amount in excess of the amount of the unpaid balance plus any accrued and unpaid finance charge on the existing obligation, § 226.9 applies to the transaction. However, such right of rescission applies only to such excess and does not affect the existing obligation (or related security interest) for the unpaid balance plus accrued unpaid finance charge.

If a transaction is refinanced by a creditor other than the creditor of the existing obligation, the entire transaction is subject to § 226.9.

SECTION 226.1001—ADVERTISING OF CREDIT TERMS IN OTHER THAN OPEN END CREDIT

The statement of certain credit terms in advertisements such as "no downpayment", the amount of any instalment payments, dollar amount of finance charge, number of payments, etc., as provided in § 226.10(d)(2), requires that certain other terms also be stated in the same advertisement. The question arises as to how a creditor may advertise credit terms in a meaningful way when all of his credit sales or loans are not made on the same basis.

The advertising of credit terms may be made by giving one or more examples of typical extensions of credit and stating all of the terms applicable to each example. In any such case, the advertiser shall set forth one or more examples which are, in fact, typical of the type of credit and terms usually and customarily made available by the creditor to present and prospective customers and each shall be clearly and conspicuously identified as examples of typical transactions.

SECTION 226.1002—CATALOGS—TABLES OR SCHEDULES OF CREDIT TERMS

Under § 226.10(b) in order that a catalog may qualify as a single advertisement, among other things, it must include a table or schedule of credit terms. It has been the practice of catalog houses to include such tables in catalogs; however, such tables generally state amounts of purchases, amounts of finance charges, and number and amount of payments for brackets up to a certain level and then contain an instruction to include a specified dollar amount in computing the finance charge by application of a percentage rate on any purchase in excess of that level. Tables to show the actual terms including annual percentage rates for all purchases into thousands of dollars would be unwieldy, present a formidable appearance, and may be more confusing than helpful to the user. The question arises as to whether a creditor who publishes a catalog is required to include tables in detailed amounts from the minimum up to, for example, $5,000, his highest priced cataloged merchandise.

Tables or schedules of terms in catalogs must include all amounts up to a level of the more commonly sold higher priced property or services which are offered for sale, but in no event greater than $1,000 unless the creditor elects to do so. If the creditor offers property or service for sale at prices higher than the uppermost level covered by his table, he shall state the method by which the finance charge is computed on larger amounts, how the amount of payments and the number and periods of payments are determined and state, for each representative amount in increments of not more than $500 up to the highest priced property or service offered, the annual percentage rate. Any catalog which contains such a table or schedule of credit terms will comply with requirements of § 226.10(b) provided all other requirements are met and such catalog shall be considered adequate for the purpose of § 226.8(g)(1).

Amended August 11, 1969

TRUTH IN LENDING

REGULATION *

SECTION 226.1—AUTHORITY, SCOPE, PURPOSE, ETC.

(a) Authority, scope, and purpose. (1) This Part comprises the regulations issued by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System pursuant to Title I (Truth in Lending Act) and Title V (General Provisions) of the Consumer Credit Protection Act (Public Law 90-321; 82 Stat. 146 et seq.) Except as otherwise provided herein, this Part applies to all persons who in the ordinary course of business regularly extend, or offer to extend, or arrange, or offer to arrange, for the extension of consumer credit as defined in paragraph (k) of § 226.2.

(2) This Part implements the Act, the purpose of which is to assure that every customer who has need for consumer credit is given meaningful information with respect to the cost of that credit which, in most cases, must be expressed in the dollar amount of finance charge, and as an annual percentage rate computed on the unpaid balance of the amount financed. Other relevant credit information must also be disclosed so that the customer may readily compare the various credit terms available to him from different sources and avoid the uninformed use of credit. This Part also implements the provision of the Act under which a customer has a right in certain circumstances to cancel a credit transaction which involves a lien on his residence. Advertising of consumer credit terms must comply with specific requirements, and certain credit terms may not be advertised unless the creditor usually and customarily extends such terms. Neither the Act nor this Part is intended to control charges for consumer credit, or interfere with trade practices except to the extent that such practices may be inconsistent with the purpose of the Act.

(b) Administrative enforcement. (1) As set forth more fully in section 108 of the Act, administrative enforcement of the Act and this part with respect to certain creditors is assigned to the Comptroller of the Currency, Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, Federal Home Loan Bank Board (acting directly or through the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation), Director of the Bureau of Federal Credit Unions, Interstate Commerce Commission, Civil Aeronautics Board, Secretary of Agriculture, and Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

(2) Except to the extent that administrative enforcement is specifically committed to other authorities, compliance with the requirements imposed under the Act and this part will be enforced by the Federal Trade Commission.

* This text corresponds to the Code of Federal Regulations, Title 12, Chapter II, Part 226, cited as 12 CFR 226. The words "this Part", as used herein, mean Regulation Z.

(c) Penalties and liabilities. Section 112 of the Act provides for criminal liability for willful and knowing failure to comply with any requirement imposed under the Act and this Part, and section 130 of the Act provides for civil liability on the part of any creditor who fails to disclose any information required under Chapter 2 of the Act and under the corresponding provisions of this Part. Pursuant to section 108 of the Act, violations of the Act or this Part constitute violations of other Federal laws which may provide further penalties.

SECTION 226.2—DEFINITIONS AND RULES OF CONSTRUCTION

For the purposes of this Part, unless the context indicates otherwise, the following definitions and rules of construction apply:

(a) "Act" refers to the Truth in Lending Act (Title I of the Consumer Credit Protection Act).

(b) "Advertisement" means any commercial message in any newspaper, magazine, leaflet, flyer or catalog, on radio, television or public address system, in direct mail literature or other printed material, on any interior or exterior sign or display, in any window display, in any point-of-transaction literature or price tag which is delivered or made available to a customer or prospective customer in any manner whatsoever.

(c) "Agricultural purpose" means a purpose related to the production, harvest, exhibition, marketing, transportation, processing, or manufacture of agricultural products by a natural person who cultivates, plants, propagates, or nurtures those agricultural products. "Agricultural products" includes agricultural, horticultural, viticultural, and dairy products, livestock, wildlife, poultry, bees, forest products, fish and shellfish, and any products thereof, including processed and manufactured products, and any and all products raised or produced on farms and any processed or manufactured products thereof.

(d) "Amount financed" means the amount of credit of which the customer will have the actual use determined in accordance with paragraphs (c)(7) and (d)(1) of § 226.8.

(e) "Annual percentage rate" means the annual percentage rate of finance charge determined in accordance with § 226.5.

(f) "Arrange for the extension of credit" means to provide or offer to provide consumer credit which is or will be extended by another person under a business or other relationship pursuant to which the person arranging such credit receives or will receive a fee, compensation, or other consideration for such service or has knowledge of the credit terms and participates in the preparation of the contract documents required in connection with the extension of credit. It does not include honoring a credit card or similar device where no finance charge is imposed at the time of that transaction.

(g) "Billing cycle" means the time interval between regular periodic billing statement dates. Such intervals may be considered equal intervals of time unless a billing date varies more than 4 days from the regular date.

(h) "Board" refers to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

(i) "Cash price" means the price at which the creditor offers, in the ordinary course of business, to sell for cash the property or services which are the subject of a consumer credit transaction. It may include the cash price of accessories or services related to the sale such as delivery, installation, alterations, modifications, and improvements, and may include taxes to the extent imposed on the cash sale, but shall not include any other charges of the types described in § 226.4.

(j) "Comparative Index of Credit Cost" means the relative measure of the cost of credit under an open end credit account, computed in accordance with § 226.11, and is the expression of the "average effective annual percentage rate of return" and the "projected rate of return" which appear in section 127(a)(5) of the Act.

(k) "Consumer credit" means credit offered or extended to a natural person, in which the money, property, or service which is the subject of the transaction is primarily for personal, family, household, or agricultural purposes and for which either a finance charge is or may be imposed or which, pursuant to an agreement, is or may be payable in more than 4 instalments. "Consumer loan" is one type of "consumer credit."

(l) "Credit" means the right granted by a creditor to a customer to defer payment of debt, incur debt and defer its payment, or purchase property or services and defer payment therefor. (See also paragraph (bb) of this section.)

(m) "Creditor" means a person who in the ordinary course of business regularly extends or arranges for the extension of consumer credit, or offers to extend or arrange for the extension of such credit.

(n) "Credit sale" means any sale with respect to which consumer credit is extended or arranged by the seller. The term includes any contract in the form of a bailment or lease if the bailee or lessee contracts to pay as compensation for use a sum substantially equivalent to or in excess of the aggregate value of the property and services involved and it is agreed that the bailee or lessee will become, or for no other or for a nominal consideration has the option to become, the owner of the property upon full compliance with his obligations under the contract.

(o) "Customer" means a natural person to whom consumer credit is offered or to whom it is or will be extended, and includes a comaker, endorser, guarantor, or surety for such natural person who is or may be obligated to repay the extension of consumer credit.

(p) "Dwelling" means a residential-type structure which is real property and contains one or more family housing units, or a residential condominium unit wherever situated.

(q) "Finance charge" means the cost of credit determined in accordance with § 226.4.

(r) "Open end credit" means consumer credit extended on an account pursuant to a plan under which (1) the creditor may permit the customer to make purchases or obtain loans, from time to time, directly from the creditor or indirectly by use of a credit card, check, or other device, as the plan may provide; (2) the customer has the privilege of paying the balance in full or in instalments; and (3) a finance charge may be computed by the creditor from time to time on an outstanding unpaid balance. The term does not include negotiated advances under an open end real estate mortgage or a letter of credit.

(s) "Organization" means a corporation, trust, estate, partnership, cooperative, association, government, or governmental subdivision, agency, or instrumentality.

(t) "Period" means a day, week, month, or other subdivision of a year.

(u) "Periodic rate" means a percentage rate of finance charge which, under an open end credit plan, is or may be imposed by a creditor against a balance for a period. (See also § 226.5(a)(3).)

(v) "Person" means a natural person or an organization.

(w) "Real property" means property which is real property under the law of the State in which it is located.

(x) "Real property transaction" means an extension of credit in connection with which a security interest in real property is or will be retained or acquired.

(y) "Residence" means any real property in which the customer resides or expects to reside. The term includes a parcel of land on which the customer resides or expects to reside.

(z) "Security interest" and "security" mean any interest in property which secures payment or performance of an obligation. The terms include, but are not limited to, security interests under the Uniform Commercial Code, real property mortgages, deeds of trust, and other consensual or confessed liens whether or not recorded, mechanic's, materialmen's, artisan's, and other similar liens, vendor's liens in both real and personal property, the interest of a seller in a contract for the sale of real property, any lien on property arising by operation of law, and any interest in a lease when used to secure payment or performance of an obligation.

(aa) "State" means any State, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and any territory or possession of the United States.

(bb) Unless the context indicates otherwise, "credit" shall be construed to mean "consumer credit," "loan" to mean "consumer loan," and "transaction" to mean "consumer credit transaction."

(cc) A transaction shall be considered consummated at the time a contractual relationship is created between a creditor and a customer irrespective of the time of performance of either party.

(dd) Captions and catchlines are intended solely as aids to convenient reference, and no inference as to the intent of any provision of this part may be drawn from them.

SECTION 226.3—EXEMPTED TRANSACTIONS

This Part does not apply to the following:

(a) Business or governmental credit. Extensions of credit to organizations, including governments, or for business or commercial purposes, other than agricultural purposes.

(b) Certain transactions in security or commodities accounts. Transactions in securities or commodities accounts with a broker-dealer registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

(c) Non-real property credit over $25,000. Credit transactions, other than real property transactions, in which the amount financed [1] exceeds $25,000, or in which the transaction is pursuant to an express written commitment by the creditor to extend credit in excess of $25,000.

(d) Certain public utility bills. Transactions under public utility tariffs involving services provided through pipe, wire, or other connected facilities, if the charges for such public utility services, the charges for delayed payment, and any discount allowed for early payment are filed with, reviewed by, or regulated by an agency of the Federal Government, a State, or a political subdivision thereof.

SECTION 226.4—DETERMINATION OF FINANCE CHARGE

(a) General rule. Except as otherwise provided in this section, the amount of the finance charge in connection with any transaction shall be determined as the sum of all charges, payable directly or indirectly by the customer, and imposed directly or indirectly by the creditor as an incident to or as a condition of the extension of credit, whether paid or payable by the customer, the seller, or any other person on behalf of the customer to the creditor or to a third party, including any of the following types of charges:

(1) Interest, time price differential, and any amount payable under a discount or other system of additional charges.

(2) Service, transaction, activity, or carrying charge.[2]

(3) Loan fee, points, finder's fee, or similar charge.

(4) Fee for an appraisal, investigation, or credit report.

(5) Charges or premiums for credit life, accident, health, or loss of income insurance, written in connection with [3] any credit transaction unless

(i) the insurance coverage is not required by the creditor and this fact is clearly and conspicuously disclosed in writing to the customer; and

(ii) any customer desiring such insurance coverage gives specific dated and separately signed affirmative written indication of such desire after receiving written disclosure to him of the cost of such insurance.

(6) Charges or premiums for insurance, written in connection with [4] any credit transaction, against loss of or damage to property or against liability arising out of the ownership or use of property, unless a clear, conspicuous, and specific statement in writing is furnished by the creditor to the customer setting forth the cost of the insurance if obtained from or through the creditor and stating that the customer may choose the person through which the insurance is to be obtained.[5]

(7) Premium or other charge for any other guarantee or insurance protecting the creditor against the customer's default or other credit loss.

(8) Any charge imposed by a creditor upon another creditor for purchasing or accepting an obligation of a customer if the customer is required to pay any part of that charge in cash, as an addition to the obligation, or as a deduction from the proceeds of the obligation.

(b) Itemized charges excludable. If itemized and disclosed to the customer, any charges of the following types need not be included in the finance charge:

(1) Fees and charges prescribed by law which actually are or will be paid to public officials for determining the existence of or for perfecting or releasing or satisfying any security related to the credit transaction.

[1] For this purpose, the amount financed is the amount which is required to be disclosed under § 226.8 (c)(7), or (d)(1), as applicable, or would be so required if the transaction were subject to this Part.

[2] These charges include any charges imposed by the creditor in connection with a checking account to the extent that such charges exceed any charges the customer is required to pay in connection with such an account when it is not being used to extend credit.

[3] A policy of insurance owned by the customer, which is assigned to the creditor or otherwise made payable to the creditor to satisfy a requirement imposed by the creditor, is not insurance "written in connection with" a credit transaction if the policy was not purchased by the customer for the purpose of being used in connection with that extension of credit.

[4] A policy of insurance owned by the customer, which is assigned to the creditor or otherwise made payable to the creditor to satisfy a requirement imposed by the creditor, is not insurance "written in connection with" a credit transaction if the policy was not purchased by the customer for the purpose of being used in connection with that extension of credit.

[5] A creditor's reservation or exercise of the right to refuse to accept an insurer offered by the customer, for reasonable cause, does not require inclusion of the premium in the finance charge.

(2) The premium payable for any insurance in lieu of perfecting any security interest otherwise required by the creditor in connection with the transaction, if the premium does not exceed the fees and charges described in subparagraph (1) of this paragraph which would otherwise be payable.

(3) Taxes not included in the cash price.

(4) License, certificate of title, and registration fees imposed by law.

(c) Late payment, delinquency, default, and reinstatement charges. A late payment, delinquency, default, reinstatement, or other such charge is not a finance charge if imposed for actual unanticipated late payment, delinquency, default or other such occurrence.

(d) Overdraft charges. A charge imposed by a bank for paying checks which overdraw or increase an overdraft in a checking account is not a finance charge unless the payment of such checks and the imposition of such finance charge were previously agreed upon in writing.

(e) Excludable charges, real property transactions. The following charges in connection with any real property transaction, provided they are bona fide, reasonable in amount, and not for the purpose of circumvention or evasion of this Part, shall not be included in the finance charge with respect to that transaction:

(1) Fees or premiums for title examination, abstract of title, title insurance, or similar purposes and for required related property surveys.

(2) Fees for preparation of deeds, settlement statements, or other documents.

(3) Amounts required to be placed or paid into an escrow or trustee account for future payments of taxes, insurance, and water, sewer, and land rents.

(4) Fees for notarizing deeds and other documents.

(5) Appraisal fees.

(6) Credit reports.

(f) Prohibited offsets. Interest, dividends, or other income received or to be received by the customer on deposits or on investments in real or personal property in which a creditor holds a security interest shall not be deducted from the amount of the finance charge or taken into consideration in computing the annual percentage rate.

(g) Demand obligations. Obligations other than those debited to an open end credit account which are payable on demand shall be considered to have a maturity of one-half year for the purpose of computing the amount of the finance charge and the annual percentage rate, except that where such an obligation is alternatively payable upon a stated maturity, the stated maturity shall be used for the purpose of such computations.

(h) Computation of insurance premiums. If any insurance premium is required to be included as a part of the finance charge, the amount to be included shall be the premium for coverage extending over the period of time the creditor will require the customer to maintain such insurance. For this purpose, rates and classifications applicable at the time the credit is extended shall be applied over the full time during which coverage is required, unless the creditor knows or has reason to know that other rates or classifications will be applicable, in which case such other rates or classifications shall be used to the extent appropriate.

SECTION 226.5—DETERMINATION OF ANNUAL PERCENTAGE RATE

(a) General rule—open end credit accounts. The annual percentage rates for open end credit accounts shall be computed so as to permit disclosure with an accuracy at least to the nearest quarter of 1 per cent. Such rate or rates shall be determined in accordance with § 226.7(a)(4) for purposes of disclosure before opening an account, § 226.10(c)(4) for purposes of advertising, and in the following manner for purposes of disclosure on periodic statements:

(1) Where the finance charge is exclusively the product of the application of one or more periodic rates

(i) by multiplying each periodic rate by the number of periods in a year; or

(ii) at the creditor's option, if the finance charge is the result of the application of two or more periodic rates, by dividing the total finance charge for the billing cycle by the sum of the balances to which the periodic rates were applied and multiplying the quotient (expressed as a percentage) by the number of billing cycles in a year.

(2) Where the creditor imposes all periodic finance charges in amounts based on specified ranges or brackets of balances, the periodic rate shall be determined by dividing the amount of the finance charge for the period by the amount of the median balance within the range or bracket of balances to which it is applicable, and the annual percentage rate shall be determined by multiplying that periodic rate (expressed as a percentage) by the number of periods in a year. Such ranges or brackets of balances shall be subject to the limitations prescribed in subdivision (iv) of paragraph (c)(2) of this section.

(3) Where the finance charge is or includes a minimum, fixed, or other charge not due to the application of a periodic rate, and

(i) exceeds 50 cents for a monthly or longer billing cycle, or the pro rata part of 50 cents for a billing cycle shorter than monthly, by dividing the total finance charge for the billing cycle by the amount of the balance to which applicable and multiplying the quotient (expressed as a percentage) by the number of billing cycles in a year; or

(ii) does not exceed 50 cents for a monthly or longer billing cycle, or the pro rata part of 50 cents for a billing cycle shorter than monthly, by multiplying each applicable periodic rate by the number of periods in a year, irrespective of the imposition of such minimum, fixed, or other charge.

(b) General rule—other credit. Except as otherwise provided in this section, the annual percentage rate applicable to any extension of credit, other than open end credit, shall be that nominal annual percentage rate determined as follows:

(1) In accordance with the actuarial method of computation so that it may be disclosed with an accuracy at least to the nearest quarter of 1 per cent. The mathematical equation and technical instructions for determining the annual percentage rate in accordance with the requirements of this paragraph are set forth in Supplement I to Regulation Z which is incorporated in this Part by reference. Supplement I to Regulation Z may be obtained from any Federal Reserve Bank or from the Board in Washington D.C., 20551, upon written request.

(2) At the option of the creditor, by application of the United States Rule so that it may be disclosed with an accuracy at least to the nearest quarter of 1 per cent. Under this rule, the finance charge is computed on the unpaid balance for the actual time the balance remains unpaid and if the amount of a payment is insufficient to pay the accumulated finance charge, the unpaid accumulated finance charge continues to accumulate to be paid from the proceeds of subsequent payments and is not added to the amount financed.

(c) Charts and tables. (1) The Regulation Z Annual Percentage Rate Tables produced by the Board may be used to determine the annual percentage rate, and any such rate determined from these tables in accordance with instructions contained therein will comply with the requirements of this section. Volume I contains table FRB—100-M covering 1 to 60 monthly payments, table FRB—200-M covering 61 to 120 monthly payments, table FRB—300-M covering 121 to 480 monthly payments, and table FRB—100-W covering 1 to 104 weekly payments. Volume I also contains instructions for use of the tables in regular transactions and most irregular transactions which involve only odd first and final payments and odd first payment periods. Volume II contains factor tables and instructions for their use in connection with the tables in Volume I in the computation of annual percentage rates in any type of irregular payment or payment period transaction and in transactions involving multiple advances. Each volume is available from the Board in Washington, D.C., 20551, and the Federal Reserve Banks.

(2) Any chart or table other than the Board's Regulation Z Annual Percentage Rate Tables also may be utilized for the purpose of determining the annual percentage rate provided:

(i) It is prepared in accordance with the general rule set forth in paragraph (b) (1) or (2) of this section;

(ii) It bears the name and address of the person responsible for its production, an identification number assigned to it by that person which shall be the same for each chart or table so produced with like numerical content and configuration and, if prepared for use in connection with irregular transactions, an identification of the method of computation ("Actuarial" or "U.S. Rule");

(iii) Except as provided in subdivision (iv) of this subparagraph, it permits determination of the annual percentage rate to the nearest one-quarter of 1 per cent for the range of rates covered by the chart or table; and

(iv) If applicable to ranges or brackets of balances, it discloses the amount of the finance charge and the annual percentage rate on the median balance within each range or bracket of balances where a creditor imposes the same finance charge for all balances within a specified range or bracket of balances, and provided further that if the annual percentage rate determined on the median balance understates the annual percentage rate determined on the lowest balance in that range or bracket by more than 8 per cent of the rate on the lowest balance, then the annual percentage rate for that range or bracket shall be computed upon any balance lower than the median balance within that range so that any understatement will not exceed 8 per cent of the rate on the lowest balance within that range or bracket of balances.

(3) In the event an error in disclosure of the amount of a finance charge or an annual percentage rate occurs because of a corresponding error in a chart or table acquired or produced in good faith by the creditor, that error in disclosure shall not, in itself, be considered a violation of this Part provided that upon discovery of the error, that creditor makes no further disclosure based on that chart or table and promptly notifies the Board or a Federal Reserve Bank in writing of the error and identifies the inaccurate chart or table by giving the name and address of the person responsible for its production and its identification number.

(d) Minor irregularities. In determining the annual percentage rate a creditor may, at his option, consider the payment irregularities set forth in this paragraph as if they were regular in amount or time, as applicable, provided that the transaction to which they relate is otherwise payable in equal instalments scheduled at equal intervals.

(1) If the period from the date on which the finance charge begins to accrue and the date the final payment is due is not less than 3 months in the case of weekly payments, 6 months in the case of biweekly or semimonthly payments, or 1 year in the case of monthly payments, either or both of the following:

(i) The amount of 1 payment other than any downpayment is not more than 50 per cent greater nor 50 per cent less than the amount of a regular payment; or

(ii) The interval between the date on which the finance charge begins to accrue and the date the first payment is due is not less than 5 days for an obligation otherwise payable in weekly instalments, not less than 10 days for an obligation otherwise payable in biweekly or semimonthly instalments, or not less than 20 days for an obligation otherwise payable in monthly instalments.

(2) If the period from the date on which the finance charge begins to accrue and the date the final payment is due is less than 3 months in the case of weekly payments, 6 months in the case of biweekly or semimonthly payments, or 1 year in the case of monthly payments, either or both of the following:

(i) The amount of 1 payment other than any downpayment is not more than 25 per cent greater nor 25 per cent less than the amount of a regular payment; or

(ii) The interval between the date on which the finance charge begins to accrue and the date the first payment is due is not less than 6 days for an obligation otherwise payable in weekly instalments, not less than 12 days for an obligation otherwise payable in biweekly or semimonthly instalments, or not less than 25 days for an obligation otherwise payable in monthly instalments.

(e) Approximation of annual percentage rate—other credit. In an exceptional instance when circumstances may leave a creditor with no alternative but to determine an annual percentage rate applicable to an extension of credit other than open end credit by a method other than those prescribed in paragraphs (b) or (c) of this section, the creditor may utilize the constant ratio method of computation provided such use is limited to the exceptional instance and is not for the purpose of circumvention or evasion of the requirements of this Part. Any provision of State law authorizing or requiring the use of the constant ratio method or any method of computing a percentage rate other than those prescribed in paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section does not justify failure of the creditor to comply with the provisions of those paragraphs, as applicable.

SECTION 226.6—GENERAL DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS

(a) Disclosures; general rule. The disclosures required to be given by this Part shall be made clearly, conspicuously, in meaningful sequence, in accordance with the further requirements of this section, and at the time and in the terminology prescribed in applicable sections. Where the terms "finance charge" and "annual percentage rate" are required to be used, they shall be printed more conspicuously than other terminology required by this Part. Except with respect to the requirements of § 226.10, all numerical amounts and percentages shall be stated in figures and shall be printed in not less than the equivalent of 10 point type, .075 inch computer type, or elite size typewritten numerals, or shall be legibly handwritten.

(b) Inconsistent State requirements. With respect to disclosures required by this Part, State law is inconsistent with the requirements of the Act and this Part, within the meaning of section 111(a) of the Act, to the extent that it

(1) Requires a creditor to make disclosures different from the requirements of this Part with respect to form, content, terminology, or time of delivery;

(2) Requires disclosure of the amount of the finance charge determined in any manner other than that prescribed in § 226.4; or

(3) Requires disclosure of the annual percentage rate of the finance charge determined in any manner other than that prescribed in § 226.5.

(c) Additional information. At the creditor's option, additional information or explanations may be supplied with any disclosure required by this Part, but none shall be stated, utilized, or placed so as to mislead or confuse the customer or contradict, obscure, or detract attention from the information required by this Part to be disclosed. Any creditor who elects to make disclosures specified in any provision of State law which, under paragraph (b) of this section, is inconsistent with the requirements of the Act and this Part may

(1) Make such inconsistent disclosures on a separate paper apart from the disclosures made pursuant to this Part, or

(2) Make such inconsistent disclosures on the same statement on which disclosures required by this Part are made; provided:

(i) All disclosures required by this Part appear separately and above any other disclosures,

(ii) Disclosures required by this Part are identified by a clear and conspicuous heading indicating that they are made in compliance with Federal law, and

(iii) All inconsistent disclosures appear separately and below a conspicuous demarcation line, and are identified by a clear and conspicuous heading indicating that the statements made thereafter are inconsistent with the disclosure requirements of the Federal Truth in Lending Act.

(d) Multiple creditors; joint disclosure. If there is more than one creditor in a transaction, each creditor shall be clearly identified and shall be responsible for making only those disclosures required by this Part which are within his knowledge and the purview of his relationship with the customer. If two or more creditors make a joint disclosure, each creditor shall be clearly identified. The disclosures required under paragraphs (b) and (c) of § 226.8 shall be made by the seller if he extends or arranges for the extension of credit. Otherwise disclosures shall be made as required under paragraphs (b) and (d) of § 226.8.

(e) Multiple customers; disclosure to one. In any transaction other than a transaction which may be rescinded under the provisions of § 226.9, if there is more than one customer, the creditor need furnish a statement of disclosures required by this Part to only one of them other than an endorser, comaker, guarantor, or a similar party.

(f) Unknown information estimate. If at the time disclosures must be made, an amount or other item of information required to be disclosed, or needed to determine a required disclosure, is unknown or not available to the creditor, and the creditor has made a reasonable effort to ascertain it, the creditor may use an estimated amount or an approximation of the information, provided the estimate or approximation is clearly identified as such, is reasonable, is based on the best information available to the creditor, and is not used for the purpose of circumventing or evading the disclosure requirements of this Part.

(g) Effect of subsequent occurrence. If information disclosed in accordance with this Part is subsequently rendered inaccurate as the result of any act, occurrence, or agreement subsequent to the delivery of the required disclosures, the inaccuracy resulting therefrom does not constitute a violation of this Part.[8]

[8] Such acts, occurrences, or agreements include the failure of the customer to perform his obligations under the contract and such actions by the creditor as may be proper to protect his interests in such circumstances. Such failure may result in the liability of the customer to pay delinquency charges, collection costs, or expenses of the creditor for perfection or acquisition of any security interest or amounts advanced by the creditor on behalf of the customer in connection with insurance, repairs to or preservation of collateral.

(h) Overstatement. The disclosure of the amount of the finance charge or a percentage which is greater than the amount of the finance charge or percentage required to be disclosed under this Part does not in itself constitute a violation of this Part: Provided, That the overstatement is not for the purpose of circumvention or evasion of disclosure requirements.

(i) Preservation and inspection of evidence of compliance. Evidence of compliance with the requirements imposed under this Part, other than advertising requirements under § 226.10, shall be preserved by the creditor for a period of not less than 2 years after the date each disclosure is required to be made. Each creditor shall, when directed by the appropriate administrative enforcement authority designated in section 108 of the Act, permit that authority or its duly authorized representative to inspect its relevant records and evidence of compliance with this Part.

(j) Percentage rate as dollars per hundred. Prior to January 1, 1971, any rate required under this Part to be disclosed as a percentage rate may, at the option of the creditor, be expressed in the form of the corresponding ratio of dollars per hundred dollars using the term "dollars finance charge per year per $100 of unpaid balance." (For example, an add-on finance charge of 4 per cent per year on an obligation payable in 36 equal monthly instalments is equivalent to an annual percentage rate, rounded to the nearest quarter of 1 per cent, of 7.50 per cent which may be stated as "$7.50 finance charge per year per $100 of unpaid balance.")

(k) Transition period. Any creditor who can demonstrate that he has taken bona fide steps, prior to July 1, 1969, to obtain printed forms which are necessary to comply with requirements of this Part may, until such forms are received but in no event later than December 31, 1969, utilize existing supplies of printed forms for the purpose of complying with the disclosure requirements of this Part, other than the requirements of paragraph (b) of § 226.9: Provided, That such forms are altered or supplemented as necessary to assure that all of the items of information the creditor is required to disclose to the customer are set forth clearly and conspicuously.

SECTION 226.7—OPEN END CREDIT ACCOUNTS—SPECIFIC DISCLOSURES

(a) Opening new account. Before the first transaction is made on any open end credit account, the creditor shall disclose to the customer in a single written statement, which the customer may retain, in terminology consistent with the requirements of paragraph (b) of this section, each of the following items, to the extent applicable:

(1) The conditions under which a finance charge may be imposed, including an explanation of the time period, if any, within which any credit extended may be paid without incurring a finance charge.

(2) The method of determining the balance upon which a finance charge may be imposed.

(3) The method of determining the amount of the finance charge, including the method of determining any minimum, fixed, check service, transaction, activity, or similar charge, which may be imposed as a finance charge.

(4) Where one or more periodic rates may be used to compute the finance charge, each such rate, the range of balances to which it is applicable, and the corresponding annual percentage rate determined by multiplying the periodic rate by the number of periods in a year.

(5) If the creditor so elects, the Comparative Index of Credit Cost in accordance with § 226.11.

(6) The conditions under which any other charges may be imposed, and the method by which they will be determined.

(7) The conditions under which the creditor may retain or acquire any security interest in any property to secure the payment of any credit extended on the account, and a description or identification of the type of the interest or interests which may be so retained or acquired.

(8) The minimum periodic payment required.

(b) Periodic statements required. Except in the case of an account which the creditor deems to be uncollectable or with respect to which delinquency collection procedures have been instituted, the creditor of any open end credit account shall mail or deliver to the customer, for each billing cycle at the end of which there is an outstanding debit balance in excess of $1 in that account or with respect to which a finance charge is imposed, a statement or statements which the customer may retain, setting forth in accordance with paragraph (c) of this section each of the following items to the extent applicable:

(1) The outstanding balance in the account at the beginning of the billing cycle, using the term "previous balance."

(2) The amount and date of each extension of credit or the date such extension of credit is debited to the account during the billing cycle and, unless previously furnished, a brief identification [7] of any goods or services purchased or other extension of credit.

(3) The amounts credited to the account during the billing cycle for payments, using the term "payments," and for other credits including returns, rebates of finance charges, and adjustments, using the term "credits," and unless previously furnished, a brief identification [8] of each of the items included in such other credits.

(4) The amount of any finance charge, using the term "finance charge," debited to the account during the billing cycle, itemized and identified to show the amounts, if any, due to the application of periodic rates and the amount of any other charge included in the finance charge, such as a minimum, fixed, check service, transaction, activity, or similar charge,[9] using appropriate descriptive terminology.

(5) Each periodic rate, using the term "periodic rate" (or "rates"), that may be used to compute the finance charge (whether or not applied during the billing cycle), and the range of balances to which it is applicable.

(6) The annual percentage rate or rates determined under § 226.5(a), using the term "annual percentage rate" (or "rates"), and, where there is more than one rate, the amount of the balance to which each rate is applicable. Where the creditor of the open end credit account imposes finance charges with respect to specific transactions during the billing cycle, such charges shall be combined with all other finance charges imposed during the billing cycle, and the annual percentage rate to be disclosed shall be determined by:

(i) Dividing the sum of all of the finance charges imposed during the billing cycle by the sum of the balances to which the periodic rates apply (or by the average of daily balances if a daily periodic rate is used), plus the sum of the amounts financed to which the specific transaction charges apply, and

(ii) Multiplying the quotient (expressed as a percentage) by the number of billing cycles in a year.

(7) If the creditor so elects, the Comparative Index of Credit Cost in accordance with § 226.11.

(8) The balance on which the finance charge was computed, and a statement of how that balance was determined. If the balance is determined without first deducting all credits during the billing cycle, that fact and the amount of such credits shall also be disclosed.

(9) The closing date of the billing cycle and the outstanding balance in the account on that date, using the term "new balance," accompanied by the statement of the date by which, or the period, if any, within which, payment must be made to avoid additional finance charges.

(c) Location of disclosures. The disclosures required by paragraph (b) of this section shall be made on the face of the periodic statement, on its reverse side, or on the periodic statement supplemented by separate statement forms provided they are enclosed together and delivered to the customer at the same time, and further provided that

(1) The disclosure required by paragraph (b)(1) of this section, the amounts or respective totals of the amounts required to be disclosed under paragraph (b)(2), (3), and (4) of this section, and the disclosure required under paragraph (b)(6) and (9) of this section shall appear on the face of the periodic statement. If the amounts and dates of the charges and credits required to be disclosed under paragraph (b)(2) and (3) of this section are not itemized on the face or reverse side of the periodic statement, they shall be disclosed on a separate statement or separate slips which shall accompany the periodic statement and identify each charge and credit and show the date and amount thereof. If the disclosures required under paragraph (b)(4) are not itemized on the face or reverse side of the periodic statement, they shall be disclosed on a separate statement which shall accompany the periodic statement.

(2) The disclosures required by paragraph (b)(5)

[7] Identification may be made on an accompanying slip or by symbol relating to an identification list printed on the statement.

[8] Identification may be made on an accompanying slip or by symbol relating to an identification list printed on the statement.

[9] These charges include any charges imposed by the creditor for the issuance, payment, or handling of checks, for account maintenance or otherwise, to the extent that such charges exceed any similar charges the customer is required to pay when an account is not being used to extend credit.

and (6) of this section and a reference to the amounts required to be disclosed under paragraph (b)(4) and (8) of this section, if not disclosed together on the face or the reverse side of the periodic statement, shall appear together on the face of a single supplemental statement which shall accompany the periodic statement.

(3) The face of the periodic statement shall contain one of the following notices, as applicable: "NOTICE: See reverse side for important information" or "NOTICE: See accompanying statement(s) for important information" or "NOTICE: See reverse side and accompanying statement(s) for important information;" and

(4) The disclosures shall not be separated so as to confuse or mislead the customer or obscure or detract attention from the information required to be disclosed.

(d) Finance charge imposed at time of transaction. Any creditor, other than the creditor of the open end credit account, who imposes a finance charge at the time of honoring a customer's credit card, any other device, or form of identification for a purchase of property or services or for a cash advance to be debited to the customer's open end credit account shall make the disclosures required under paragraphs (b)(2) and (d) of § 226.8, Credit other than open end—specific disclosures, at the time of that transaction, and the annual percentage rate to be disclosed shall be determined by dividing the amount of the finance charge by the amount financed and multiplying the quotient (expressed as a percentage) by 12. If disclosure is made under this paragraph, the creditor of the open end credit account need make no further disclosure with respect to the finance charge on that transaction.

(e) Change in terms. If any change is to be made in terms of an open end credit account plan previously disclosed to the customer, the creditor shall mail or deliver to the customer written disclosure of such proposed change not less than 30 days prior to the effective date of such change or 30 days prior to the beginning of the billing cycle within which such change will become effective, whichever is the earlier date.

(f) Open end credit accounts existing on July 1, 1969. In the case of any open end credit account in existence and in which a balance remains unpaid on July 1, 1969, and which balance is deemed to be collectible and not subject to delinquency collection procedures, the items described in paragraph (a) of this section, to the extent applicable, shall be disclosed in a notice mailed or delivered to the customer not later than July 31, 1969. If a customer subsequently utilizes such an account in existence on July 1, 1969, in which no balance remained unpaid on that date, and a notice required by paragraph (a) of this section has not previously been furnished that customer, then such notice shall be mailed or delivered to that customer before or with the next billing or that account.

SECTION 226.8—CREDIT OTHER THAN OPEN END—SPECIFIC DISCLOSURES

(a) General rule. Any creditor when extending credit other than open end credit shall, in accordance with § 226.6 and to the extent applicable, make the disclosures required by this section with respect to any transaction consummated on or after July 1, 1969. Except as provided in paragraphs (g) and (h) of this section, such disclosures shall be made before the transaction is consummated. At the time disclosures are made, the creditor shall furnish the customer with a duplicate of the instrument or a statement by which the required disclosures are made and on which the creditor is identified. All of the disclosures shall be made together on either

(1) The note or other instrument evidencing the obligation on the same side of the page and above or adjacent to the place for the customer's signature; or

(2) One side of a separate statement which identifies the transaction.

(b) Disclosures in sale and nonsale credit. In any transaction subject to this section, the following items, as applicable, shall be disclosed:

(1) The date on which the finance charge begins to accrue if different from the date of the transaction.

(2) The finance charge expressed as an annual percentage rate, using the term "annual percentage rate," except in the case of a finance charge

(i) which does not exceed $5 and is applicable to an amount financed not exceeding $75, or

(ii) which does not exceed $7.50 and is applicable to an amount financed exceeding $75.

A creditor may not divide an extension of credit into two or more transactions to avoid the disclosure of an annual percentage rate, nor may any other percentage rate be disclosed if none is stated in reliance upon subdivisions (i) or (ii) of this subparagraph.

(3) The number, amount, and due dates or periods of payments scheduled to repay the indebtedness and, except in the case of a loan secured by a first lien or equivalent security interest on a dwelling made to finance the purchase of that dwelling and except in the case of a sale of a dwelling, the sum of such payments using the term, "total of payments."[10] If any payment is more than twice the amount of an otherwise regularly scheduled equal payment, the creditor shall identify the amount of such payment by the term "balloon payment" and shall state the conditions, if any, under which that payment may be refinanced if not paid when due.

(4) The amount, or method of computing the amount, of any default, delinquency, or similar charges payable in the event of late payments.

(5) A description or identification of the type of any security interest held or to be retained or acquired by the creditor in connection with the extension of credit, and a clear identification of the property to which the security interest relates or, if such property is not identifiable, an explanation of the manner in which the creditor retains or may acquire a security interest in such property which the creditor is unable to identify. In any such case where a clear identification of such property cannot properly be made on the disclosure statement due to the length of such identification, the note, other instrument evidencing the obligation, or separate disclosure statement shall contain reference to a separate pledge agreement, or a financing statement, mortgage, deed of trust, or similar document evidencing the security interest, a copy of which shall be furnished to the customer by the creditor as promptly as practicable. If after-acquired property will be subject to the security interest, or if other or future indebtedness is or may be secured by any such property, this fact shall be clearly set forth in conjunction with the description or identification of the type of security interest held, retained or acquired.

(6) A description of any penalty charge that may be imposed by the creditor or his assignee for prepayment of the principal of the obligation (such as a real estate mortgage) with an explanation of the method of computation of such penalty and the conditions under which it may be imposed.

(7) Identification of the method of computing any unearned portion of the finance charge in the event of prepayment of the obligation and a statement of the amount or method of computation of any charge that may be deducted from the amount of any rebate of such unearned finance charge that will be credited to the obligation or refunded to the customer.

(c) Credit sales. In the case of a credit sale, in addition to the items required to be disclosed under paragraph (b) of this section, the following items, as applicable, shall be disclosed:

(1) The cash price of the property or service purchased, using the term "cash price."

(2) The amount of the downpayment itemized, as applicable, as downpayment in money, using the term "cash downpayment," downpayment in property, using the term "trade-in" and the sum, using the term "total downpayment."

(3) The difference between the amounts described in subparagraphs (1) and (2) of this paragraph, using the term "unpaid balance of cash price."

(4) All other charges, individually itemized, which are included in the amount financed but which are not part of the finance charge.

(5) The sum of the amounts determined under subparagraphs (3) and (4) of this paragraph, using the term "unpaid balance."

(6) Any amounts required to be deducted under paragraph (c) of this section using, as applicable, the terms "prepaid finance charge" and "required deposit balance," and, if both are applicable, the total of such items using the term "total prepaid finance charge and required deposit balance."

(7) The difference between the amounts determined under subparagraphs (5) and (6) of this paragraph, using the term "amount financed."

(8) Except in the case of a sale of a dwelling:

(i) The total amount of the finance charge, with description of each amount included, using the term "finance charge," and

(ii) The sum of the amounts determined under subparagraphs (1), (4), and (8)(i) of this paragraph, using the term "deferred payment price."

(d) Loans and other nonsale credit. In the case of a loan or extension of credit which is not a credit sale, in addition to the items required to be disclosed under paragraph (b) of this section, the following items, as applicable, shall be disclosed:

(1) The amount of credit, excluding items set forth in paragraph (e) of this section, which will be paid to the customer or for his account or to another person on his behalf, including all charges, individually itemized, which are included in the amount of credit extended but which are not part of the finance charge, using the term "amount financed."

(2) Any amount referred to in paragraph (e) of this section required to be excluded from the amount in subparagraph (1) of this paragraph, using, as applicable, the terms "prepaid finance charge" and "required deposit balance," and, if both are applicable, the total of such items using the term, "total prepaid finance charge and required deposit balance."

(3) Except in the case of a loan secured by a first lien or equivalent security interest on a dwelling and made to finance the purchase of that dwelling, the total amount of the finance charge,[11] with description of each amount included, using the term "finance charge."

(e) Finance charge payable separately or withheld; required deposit balances. The following amounts shall be disclosed and deducted in a credit sale in accordance with paragraph (c)(6) of this section, and in other extensions of credit shall be excluded from the amount disclosed under paragraph (d)(1) of this section, and shall be disclosed in accordance with paragraph (d)(2) of this section:

(1) Any finance charge paid separately, in cash or otherwise, directly or indirectly to the creditor or with the creditor's knowledge to another person, or withheld by the creditor from the proceeds of the credit extended.[12]

(2) Any deposit balance or any investment which the creditor requires the customer to make, maintain, or increase in a specified amount or proportion as a condition to the extension of credit except:

(i) An escrow account under paragraph (e)(3) of § 226.4,

(ii) A deposit balance which will be wholly applied toward satisfaction of the customer's obligation in the transaction,

(iii) A deposit balance or investment which was in existence prior to the extension of credit and which is offered by the customer as security for that extension of credit, and

(iv) A deposit balance or investment which was acquired or established from the proceeds of an extension of credit made for that purpose upon written request of the customer.

(f) First lien to finance construction of dwelling. In any case where a first lien or equivalent security interest in real property is retained or acquired by a creditor in connection with the financing of the initial construction of a dwelling, or in connection with a loan to satisfy that construction loan and provide permanent financing of that dwelling, whether or not the customer previously owned the land on which that dwelling is to be constructed, such security interest shall be considered a first lien against that dwelling to finance the purchase of that dwelling.

(g) Orders by mail or telephone. If a creditor receives a purchase order or a request for an extension of credit by mail, telephone, or written communication without personal solicitation, the disclosures required under this section may be made any time not later than the date the first payment is due, provided:

(1) In the case of credit sales, the cash price, the downpayment, the finance charge, the deferred payment price, the annual percentage rate, and the number, frequency, and amount of payments are set forth in or are determinable from the creditor's catalog or other printed material distributed to the public; or

(2) In the case of loans or other extensions of credit, the amount of the loan, the finance charge, the total scheduled payments, the number, frequency, and amount of payments, and the annual percentage rate for representative amounts or ranges of credit are set forth in or are determinable from the creditor's printed material distributed to the public, in the contract of loan, or in other printed material delivered or made available to the customer.

(h) Series of sales. If a credit sale is one of a series of transactions made pursuant to an agree-

[11] The disclosure required by this subparagraph need not be made with respect to interim student loans made pursuant to federally insured student loan programs under Public Law 89-329, Title IV Part B of the Higher Education Act of 1965, as amended.

[12] Finance charges deducted or excluded as provided by this paragraph shall, nevertheless, be included in determining the finance charge under § 226.4.

ment providing for the addition of the amount financed plus the finance charge for the current sale to an existing outstanding balance, then the disclosures required under this section for the current sale may be made at any time not later than the date the first payment for that sale is due, provided:

(1) The customer has approved in writing both the annual percentage rate or rates and the method of treating any unearned finance charge on an existing outstanding balance in computing the finance charge or charges; and

(2) The creditor retains no security interest in any property as to which he has received payments aggregating the amount of the sale price including any finance charges attributable thereto. For the purposes of this subparagraph, in the case of items purchased on different dates, the first purchased shall be deemed first paid for, and in the case of items purchased on the same date, the lowest priced shall be deemed first paid for.

(i) Advances under loan commitments. If a loan is one of a series of advances made pursuant to a written agreement under which a creditor is or may be committed to extend credit to a customer up to a specified amount, and the customer has approved in writing the annual percentage rate or rates, the method of computing the finance charge or charges, and any other terms, the agreement shall be considered a single transaction, and the disclosures required under this section at the creditor's option need be made only at the time the agreement is executed.

(j) Refinancing, consolidating, or increasing. If any existing extension of credit is refinanced, or two or more existing extensions of credit are consolidated, or an existing obligation is increased, such transaction shall be considered a new transaction subject to the disclosure requirements of this Part. For the purpose of such disclosure, any unearned portion of the finance charge which is not credited to the existing obligation shall be added to the new finance charge and shall not be included in the new amount financed. Any increase in an existing obligation to reimburse the creditor for undertaking the customer's obligation in perfecting, protecting or preserving the security shall not be considered a new transaction subject to this Part. Any advance for agricultural purposes made under an open end real estate mortgage or similar lien shall not be considered a new transaction subject to the disclosure requirements of this section, provided:

(1) The maturity of the advance does not exceed 2 years;

(2) No increase is made in the annual percentage rate previously disclosed; and

(3) All disclosures required by this Part were made at the time the security interest was acquired by the creditor or at any time prior to the first advance made on or following the effective date of this part.

(k) Assumption of an obligation. Any creditor who accepts a subsequent customer as an obligor under an existing obligation shall make the disclosures required by this part to that customer before he becomes so obligated. If the obligation so assumed is secured by a first lien or equivalent security interest on a dwelling, and the assumption is made for the subsequent customer to acquire that dwelling, that obligation shall be considered a loan made to finance the purchase of that dwelling.

(l) Deferrals or extensions. In the case of an obligation other than an obligation upon which the amount of the finance charge is determined by the application of a percentage rate to the unpaid balance, if the creditor imposes a charge or fee for deferral or extension, the creditor shall disclose to the customer

(1) The amount deferred or extended;

(2) The date to which, or the time period for which payment is deferred or extended; and

(3) The amount of the charge or fee for the deferral or extension.

(m) Series of single payment obligations. Any extension of credit involving a series of single payment obligations shall be considered a single transaction subject to the disclosure requirements of this Part.

(n) Permissible periodic statements. If a creditor transmits a periodic billing statement [13] other than a delinquency notice, payment coupon book, or payment passbook, or a statement, billing, or advice relating exclusively to amounts to be paid by the customer as escrows for payment of taxes, insurance, and water, sewer, and land rents, it shall be in a form which the customer may retain and shall set forth

[13] Any statement, notice, or reminder of payment due on any transaction payable in instalments which is mailed or delivered periodically to the customer in advance of the due date of the instalment shall be a periodic billing statement for the purpose of this paragraph.

(1) The annual percentage rate or rates; and

(2) The date by which, or the period, if any, within which payment must be made in order to avoid late payment or delinquency charges.

*(o) Discount for prompt payment of sales transactions. (1) For the purposes of this paragraph, a "transaction subject to § 226.8(o)" is a credit sale transaction which is not exempt under § 226.3 and which is subject to a discount for payment on or before a specified date (e.g. 2% discount if paid within 10 days) or to a charge for delaying payment after a specified date (e.g. $98 cash, $100 if paid in 30 days). Both such a discount and such a charge are referred to in this paragraph as a "discount." In the case of any transaction subject to § 226.8(o), notwithstanding the provisions of the last sentence of paragraph (a) of this section, the creditor shall disclose on the invoice or other evidence of such sale, as applicable:

(i) The date of the sale or invoice.

(ii) The rate of discount, the date by which or period within which the discount may be taken, and the date by which or period within which the full amount of the obligation is due and payable. (For example, "2%/10 days, net 30 days"; or "$1 per ton/10 days, net 30 days.")

(iii) The information required under § 226.8 (b)(4) and (5).

(iv) The amount of the discount, designated as a "finance charge," using that term.

(v) If the discount shown for prompt payment exceeds 5% of the obligation to which the discount relates, the "annual percentage rate," using that term, computed in accordance with subparagraph (2) of this paragraph, but subject to the exceptions provided under § 226.8 (b)(2).

(2) For the purposes of subparagraph (1)(v) of this paragraph, the annual percentage rate shall be determined by dividing the amount of the finance charge by the least amount payable in satisfaction of the obligation and multiplying the (quotient expressed as a percentage) by a fraction in which the numerator is 12, and the denominator is the number of whole months (but not less than 1) between the first day of the monthly billing cycle in which the transaction is consummated and the first day of the monthly billing cycle in which the obligation becomes due.[18a]

(3) In a transaction with multiple discount rates (for example 6%/10 days, 4%/20 days, net 30 days), the largest discount shall be used for purposes of disclosing the amount of the finance charge under subparagraph (1)(iv) of this paragraph and the annual percentage rate under subparagraph (1)(v) of this paragraph.[18b]

(4) In order to determine the applicability of subparagraph (1)(v) of this paragraph and to facilitate disclosure of an annual percentage rate, if the amount of the discount for prompt payment is related, pursuant to usual business practice, to weight, quantity, or other physical measure (e.g. $1 per ton or 1¢ per gallon) rather than expressed as a percentage of discount, that discount may be converted to an approximate discount rate and, under subparagraph (2) of this paragraph, a reasonably accurate approximation of the annual percentage rate by using approximate or projected prices per physical unit determined on the basis of past experience, current information, or projected analysis.[18c]

(5) If by its terms a transaction subject to § 226.8(o) is payable in a single payment and no finance charge other than a discount is or may be imposed, and such discount is not utilized for the purpose of circumvention or evasion of disclosure requirements, the disclosure required by subparagraph (1) of this paragraph shall constitute compliance with the requirements of § 226.8 and under § 226.9(a) shall constitute "all other material disclosures required under this Part."

(6) If a transaction subject to § 226.8(o) is debited to an open end credit account, disclosures shall be made as specified in subparagraph (1) of

* Amended in its present form August 11, 1969

[18a] For example, a $1,000 purchase of feed subject to terms of 6%/10 days, net 30 days (or 6%/10 days, net E.O.M.; or 6%/10 days, net 10th of the following month; or 6%/20 days, net 30 days; or 6%/30 days, net 30 days; or 6% discount for cash, net 30 days) results in a finance charge of $60, a least amount payable of $940, and an annual percentage rate of 76.56%, which may be rounded to 76.50% or 76½%. Terms of 6%/20 days, net September 29 applied to an April purchase, assuming a calendar month billing cycle, result in an annual percentage rate of 15.31% (i.e. 6/94 x 12/5) which may be rounded to 15.25% or 15¼%. In this example the 29 days in September are ignored and the denominator (5) is determined by the number of whole months in the period.

[18b] For example, terms of 6%/10 days, 4%/20 days, net 30 days would be treated like terms of 6%/10 days, net 30 days, which would represent an annual percentage rate of 76½%.

[18c] For example, if terms of $3 discount per ton/10 days, net 30 days are offered on fertilizer that is expected to sell in a range of about $48 to $52 per ton, the annual percentage rate could be approximated for preprinting as if it were 6% (i.e. $3 on $50)/10 days, net 30 days, that is, 76½%.

this paragraph and also as specified in § 226.7. The full amount of the obligation including the amount of the discount may be debited to the open end credit account, under § 226.7(b)(2), and the amount of any finance charge representing the discount need not be added to any other finance charge for the purpose of computing and disclosing the total amount of finance charge and the annual percentage rate under § 226.5(a) and § 226.7.[18d]

(7) If a transaction subject to § 226.8(o) is not debited to an open end credit account, but either is subject to an additional finance charge or is payable by its terms in more than one payment, disclosures shall be made as specified in subparagraph (1) of this paragraph and also as specified in paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section. In such a case, if the transaction is payable in more than one payment, the amount of the discount shall be deducted for the purpose of computing and disclosing the cash price under paragraph (c)(1) of this section and shall be added to any other finance charge for the purpose of computing and disclosing the amount of the finance charge under paragraph (c)(8)(i) of this section and the annual percentage rate under paragraph (b)(2) of this section.[18e] If the transaction is payable in a single payment, the discount may be disregarded in computing and disclosing such cash price, finance charge, and annual percentage rate.[18f]

(8) Notwithstanding the provisions of the second sentence of paragraph (a) of this section, the disclosures required under subparagraph (1) of this paragraph made on the invoice or other evidence of sale may be delivered subsequent to consummation of the transaction.

(9) Amended paragraph (o) of § 226.8 shall become effective August 11, 1969, but until March 1, 1970, any creditor may at his option use any printed forms which were prepared before such effective date in accordance with paragraph (o) of § 226.8 in effect at the time of such preparation.

[18d] For example, if a $1,000 sale on terms of 2%/10 days, net 30 days, is debited to an open end account on which 1% per month is charged, the periodic statement under § 226.7(b) (assuming no other transactions in the account) would show a previous balance of $1,000, a finance charge of $10, and an annual percentage rate of 12%.

[18e] For example, if a $1,000 sale on terms of 2%/10 days, net 30 days is subject to an add-on finance charge of $100 and is payable in instalments, the disclosures under § 226.8(b) and (c) would include a cash price of $980 and a finance charge of $120.

[18f] For example, if a $1,000 sale on August 2 not under an open end account is subject to terms of 2%/10 days, net 30 days, thereafter 8% per annum until December 1, the disclosures under § 226.8(b) and (c) would include a cash price of $1,000, a finance charge of $19.95, and an annual percentage rate of 8.00%.

SECTION 226.9—RIGHT TO RESCIND CERTAIN TRANSACTIONS

(a) General rule. Except as otherwise provided in this section, in the case of any credit transaction in which a security interest is or will be retained or acquired in any real property which is used or is expected to be used as the principal residence of the customer, the customer shall have the right to rescind that transaction until midnight of the third business day [19] following the date of consummation of that transaction or the date of delivery of the disclosures required under this section and all other material disclosures required under this Part, whichever is later, by notifying the creditor by mail, telegram, or other writing of his intention to do so. Notification by mail shall be considered given at the time mailed; notification by telegram shall be considered given at the time filed for transmission; and notification by other writing shall be considered given at the time delivered to the creditor's designated place of business.

(b) Notice of opportunity to rescind. Whenever a customer has the right to rescind a transaction under paragraph (a) of this section, the creditor shall give notice of that fact to the customer by furnishing the customer with two copies of the notice set out below, one of which may be used by the customer to cancel the transaction. Such notice shall be printed in capital and lower case letters of not less than 12 point bold-faced type on one side of a separate statement which identifies the transaction to which it relates. Such statement shall also set forth the entire paragraph (d) of this section, "Effect of rescission." If such paragraph appears on the reverse side of the statement, the face of the statement shall state: "See reverse side for important information about your right of rescission." Before furnishing copies of the notice to the customer, the creditor shall complete both copies with the name of the creditor, the address of the creditor's place of business, the date of consummation of the transaction, and the date, not earlier than the third business day following the date of the transaction, by which the customer may give notice of cancellation.

Notice to customer required by Federal law:

You have entered into a transaction on (date) which may result in a lien, mortgage, or other security interest on your home. You have a legal right under Federal law to cancel this transaction, if you desire to do so, without any penalty or obligation within three business days from the above date or any later date on which all material disclosures required under the Truth in Lending Act have been given to you. If you so cancel the transaction, any lien, mortgage, or other security interest on your home arising from this transaction is automatically void. You are also entitled to receive a refund of any downpayment or other consideration if you cancel. If you decide to cancel this transaction, you may do so by notifying at (Address of creditor's place of business) by mail or telegram sent not later than midnight of (date) . You may also use any other form of written notice identifying the transaction if it is delivered to the above address not later than that time. This notice may be used for that purpose by dating and signing below.

I hereby cancel this transaction.

(c) Delay of performance. Except as provided in paragraph (e) of this section, the creditor in any transaction subject to this section shall not perform, or cause or permit the performance of, any of the following actions until after the rescission period has expired and he has reasonably satisfied himself that the customer has not exercised his right of rescission:

(1) Disburse any money other than in escrow;

(2) Make any physical changes in the property of the customer;

(3) Perform any work or service for the customer; or

(4) Make any deliveries to the residence of the customer if the creditor has retained or will acquire a security interest other than one arising by operation of law.

(d) Effect of rescission. When a customer exercises his right to rescind under paragraph (a) of this section, he is not liable for any finance or other charge, and any security interest becomes void upon such a rescission. Within 10 days after receipt of a notice of rescission, the creditor shall return to the customer any money or property given as earnest money, downpayment, or otherwise, and shall take any action necessary or appropriate to reflect the termination of any security interest created under the transaction. If the creditor has delivered any property to the customer, the customer may retain possession of it. Upon the performance of the creditor's obligations under this section, the customer shall tender the property to the creditor, except that if return of the property in kind would be impracticable or inequitable, the customer shall tender its reasonable value. Tender shall be made at the location of the property or at the residence of the customer, at the option of the customer. If the creditor does not take possession of the property within 10 days after tender by the customer, ownership of the property vests in the customer without obligation on his part to pay for it.

(e) Waiver of right of rescission. A customer may modify or waive his right to rescind a transaction subject to the provisions of this section provided:

(1) The extension of credit is needed in order to meet a bona fide immediate personal financial emergency of the customer;

(2) The customer has determined that a delay of 3 business days in performance of the creditor's obligation under the transaction will jeopardize the welfare, health or safety of natural persons or endanger property which the customer owns or for which he is responsible; and

(3) The customer furnishes the creditor with a separate dated and signed personal statement describing the situation requiring immediate remedy and modifying or waiving his right of rescission. The use of printed forms for this purpose is prohibited.

(f) Joint ownership. For the purpose of this section, "customer" shall include two or more customers where joint ownership is involved, and the following shall apply:

(1) The right of rescission of the transaction may be exercised by any one of them, in which case the effect of rescission in accordance with paragraph (d) of this section applies to all of them; and

(2) Any waiver of the right of rescission provided in paragraph (e) of this section is invalid unless signed by all of them.

(g) Exceptions to general rule. This section does not apply to:

(1) The creation, retention, or assumption of a first lien or equivalent security interest to finance the acquisition of a dwelling in which the customer resides or expects to reside.

(2) A security interest which is a first lien retained or acquired by a creditor in connection with the financing of the initial construction of the residence of the customer, or in connection with a loan committed prior to completion of the construction of that residence to satisfy that construction loan and provide permanent financing of that residence, whether or not the customer previously owned the land on which that residence is to be constructed.

(3) Any lien by reason of its subordination at any time subsequent to its creation, if that lien was exempt from the provisions of this section when it was originally created.

(4) Any advance for agricultural purposes made pursuant to paragraph (j) of § 226.8 under an open end real estate mortgage or similar lien, provided the disclosure required under paragraph (b) of this section was made at the time the security interest was acquired by the creditor or at any time prior to the first advance made on or following the effective date of this Part.

SECTION 226.10—ADVERTISING CREDIT TERMS

(a) General rule. No advertisement to aid, promote, or assist directly or indirectly any extension of credit may state

(1) That a specific amount of credit or instalment amount can be arranged unless the creditor usually and customarily arranges or will arrange credit amounts or instalments for that period and in that amount; or

(2) That no downpayment or that a specified downpayment will be accepted in connection with any extension of credit, unless the creditor usually and customarily accepts or will accept downpayments in that amount.

(b) Catalogs and multi-page advertisements. If a catalog or other multiple-page advertisement sets forth or gives information in sufficient detail to permit determination of the disclosures required by this section in a table or schedule of credit terms, such catalog or multiple-page advertisement shall be considered a single advertisement provided:

(1) The table or schedule and the disclosures made therein are set forth clearly and conspicuously, and

(2) Any statement of credit terms appearing in any place other than in that table or schedule of credit terms clearly and conspicuously refers to the page or pages on which that table or schedule appears, unless that statement discloses all of the credit terms required to be stated under this section. For the purpose of this subparagraph, cash price is not a credit term.

(c) Advertising of open end credit. No advertisement to aid, promote, or assist directly or indirectly the extension of open end credit may set forth any of the terms described in paragraph (a) of § 226.7, the Comparative Index of Credit Cost, or that no downpayment, a specified downpayment, or a specified periodic payment is required or any of the following items unless it also clearly and conspicuously sets forth all the following items in terminology prescribed under paragraph (b) of §226.7.:

(1) An explanation of the time period, if any, within which any credit extended may be paid without incurring a finance charge.

(2) The method of determining the balance upon which a finance charge may be imposed.

(3) The method of determining the amount of the finance charge, including the determination of any minimum, fixed, check service, transaction, activity, or similar charge, which may be imposed as a finance charge.

(4) Where one or more periodic rates may be used to compute the finance charge, each such rate, the range of balances to which it is applicable, and the corresponding annual percentage rate determined by multiplying the periodic rate by the number of periods in a year.

(5) The conditions under which any other charges may be imposed, and the method by which they will be determined.

(6) The minimum periodic payment required.

(d) Advertising of credit other than open end. No advertisement to aid, promote, or assist directly or indirectly any credit sale including the sale of residential real estate, loan, or other extension of credit, other than open end credit, subject to the provisions of this Part, shall state

(1) The rate of a finance charge unless it states the rate of that charge expressed as an "annual percentage rate," using that term;

(2) The amount of the downpayment required or that no downpayment is required, the amount of any instalment payment, the dollar amount of any finance charge, the number of instalments or the period of repayment, or that there is no charge for credit, unless it states all of the following items in terminology prescribed under § 226.8:

(i) the cash price or the amount of the loan, as applicable.

(ii) the amount of the downpayment required or that no downpayment is required as applicable.

(iii) the number, amount, and due dates or period of payments scheduled to repay the indebtedness if the credit is extended.

(iv) the amount of the finance charge expressed as an annual percentage rate. The exemptions from disclosure of an annual percentage rate permitted in paragraph (b)(2) of § 226.8 shall not apply to this subdivision.

(v) Except in the case of the sale of a dwelling or a loan secured by a first lien on a dwelling to purchase that dwelling, the deferred payment price or the sum of the payments, as applicable.

SECTION 226.11—COMPARATIVE INDEX OF CREDIT COST FOR OPEN END CREDIT

(a) General rule. Any creditor who elects to disclose the Comparative Index of Credit Cost on open end credit accounts

(1) Shall compute the Comparative Index of Credit Cost in accordance with paragraph (b) of this section.

(2) Shall recompute the Comparative Index of Credit Cost in accordance with paragraph (b) of this section based upon any new open end credit account terms to be adopted and shall disclose the new Comparative Index of Credit Cost in accordance with paragraph (c)(2) of this section concurrently with the notice required under paragraph (e) of § 226.7.

(3) Shall, when making such disclosure under the provisions of subparagraphs (a)(5) and (b)(7) of § 226.7, make the disclosure to all open end credit account customers; and

(4) Shall not utilize such disclosure so as to mislead, or confuse the customer or contradict, obscure, or detract attention from the required disclosures.

(b) Computation of Comparative Index of Credit Cost. The Comparative Index of Credit Cost for each open end credit plan shall be computed by applying the creditor's terms of that plan to the following hypothetical factors:

(1) A single transaction in the amount of $100 is debited on the first day of a billing cycle to an open end credit account having no previous balance.

(2) The creditor imposes all finance charges including periodic, fixed, minimum or other charges applicable to such account in amounts and on dates consistent with his policy of imposing such charges upon open end credit accounts.

(3) The exact amount of the required minimum periodic payment is paid on the last day of each subsequent and successive billing cycle until the amount of the single transaction, together with applicable finance charges, is paid in full.

(4) The Comparative Index of Credit Cost shall be expressed and disclosed as a percentage accurate to the nearest quarter of 1 per cent and shall be determined by dividing the total amount of the finance charges imposed by the sum of the daily balances and multiplying the quotient so obtained (expressed as a percentage) by 365.

(c) Form of disclosure. Any creditor who elects to disclose the Comparative Index of Credit Cost shall:

(1) Make the disclosure in the form of the following statement: "Our Comparative Index of Credit Cost under the terms of our open end credit account plan is ___% per year, computed on the basis of a single transaction of $100 debited on the first day of a billing cycle to an account having no previous balance, and paid in required minimum consecutive instalments on the last day of each succeeding billing cycle until the transaction and all finance charges are paid in full. The actual percentage cost of credit on your account may be higher or lower depending on the dates and amounts of charges and payments."

(2) Disclose any newly computed Comparative Index of Credit Cost in the form of the statement prescribed in subparagraph (1) of this paragraph, except that the statement shall be preceded by the words "Effective as of (date) ," and the words "will be" shall be substituted for the word "is" in the second line of the statement.

SECTION 226.12—EXEMPTION OF CERTAIN STATE REGULATED TRANSACTIONS

(a) Exemption for State regulated transactions. In accordance with the provisions of Supplement II to Regulation Z (§ 226.12—Supplement), any State may make application to the Board for exemption of any class of transactions within that State from the requirements of Chapter 2 of the Act and the corresponding provisions of this Part: Provided, That

(1) Under the law of that State, that class of transactions is subject to requirements substantially similar to those imposed under Chapter 2 of the Act and the corresponding provisions of this Part; and

(2) There is adequate provision for enforcement.

(b) Procedures and criteria. On or before July 1, 1969, the Board will promulgate and publish Supplement II to Regulation Z (§ 262.12—Supplement) in which will be set forth, as established by the Board, the procedures and criteria under which any State may apply for the determination provided for in paragraph (a) of this section. Upon publication of Supplement II of Regulation Z application may be made to the Board for such determination.

(j) The term "State" refers to any State, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, and any territory or possession of the United States.

(k) Any reference to any requirement imposed under this title or any provision thereof includes reference to the regulations of the Board under this title or the provision thereof in question.

(l) The disclosure of an amount or percentage which is greater than the amount or percentage required to be disclosed under this title does not in itself constitute a violation of this title.

§ 104. Exempted transactions

This title does not apply to the following:

(1) Credit transactions involving extensions of credit for business or commercial purposes, or to government or governmental agencies or instrumentalities, or to organizations.

(2) Transactions in securities or commodities accounts by a broker-dealer registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

(3) Credit transactions, other than real property transactions, in which the total amount to be financed exceeds $25,000.

(4) Transactions under public utility tariffs, if the Board determines that a State regulatory body regulates the charges for the public utility services involved, the charges for delayed payment, and any discount allowed for early payment.

§ 105. Regulations

The Board shall prescribe regulations to carry out the purposes of this title. These regulations may contain such classifications, differentiations, or other provisions, and may provide for such adjustments and exceptions for any class of transactions, as in the judgment of the Board are necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of this title, to prevent circumvention or evasion thereof, or to facilitate compliance therewith.

§ 106. Determination of finance charge

(a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, the amount of the finance charge in connection with any consumer credit transaction shall be determined as the sum of all charges, payable directly or indirectly by the person to whom the credit is extended, and imposed directly or indirectly by the creditor as an incident to the extension of credit, including any of the following types of charges which are applicable:

(1) Interest, time price differential, and any amount payable under a point, discount, or other system of additional charges.

(2) Service or carrying charge.

(3) Loan fee, finder's fee, or similar charge.

(4) Fee for an investigation or credit report.

(5) Premium or other charge for any guarantee or insurance protecting the creditor against the obligor's default or other credit loss.

(b) Charges or premiums for credit life, accident, or health insurance written in connection with any consumer credit transaction shall be included in the finance charge unless

(1) the coverage of the debtor by the insurance is not a factor in the approval by the creditor of the extension of credit, and this fact is clearly disclosed in writing to the person applying for or obtaining the extension of credit; and

(2) in order to obtain the insurance in connection with the extension of credit, the person to whom the credit is extended must give specific affirmative written indication of his desire to do so after written disclosure to him of the cost thereof.

(c) Charges or premiums for insurance, written in connection with any consumer credit transaction, against loss of or damage to property or against liability arising out of the ownership or use of property, shall be included in the finance charge unless a clear and specific statement in writing is furnished by the creditor to the person to whom the credit is extended, setting forth the cost of the insurance if obtained from or through the creditor, and stating that the person to whom the credit is extended may choose the person through which the insurance is to be obtained.

(d) If any of the following items is itemized and disclosed in accordance with the regulations of the Board in connection with any transaction, then the creditor need not include that item in the computation of the finance charge with respect to that transaction:

(1) Fees and charges prescribed by law which actually are or will be paid to public officials for determining the existence of or for perfecting or releasing or satisfying any security related to the credit transaction.

(2) The premium payable for any insur-

§ 101. Short title

This title may be cited as the Truth in Lending Act.

§ 102. Findings and declaration of purpose

The Congress finds that economic stabilization would be enhanced and the competition among the various financial institutions and other firms engaged in the extension of consumer credit would be strengthened by the informed use of credit. The informed use of credit results from an awareness of the cost thereof by consumers. It is the purpose of this title to assure a meaningful disclosure of credit terms so that the consumer will be able to compare more readily the various credit terms available to him and avoid the uninformed use of credit.

§ 103. Definitions and rules of construction

(a) The definitions and rules of construction set forth in this section are applicable for the purposes of this title.

(b) The term "Board" refers to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

(c) The term "organization" means a corporation, government or governmental subdivision or agency, trust, estate, partnership, cooperative, or association.

(d) The term "person" means a natural person or an organization.

(e) The term "credit" means the right granted by a creditor to a debtor to defer payment of debt or to incur debt and defer its payment.

(f) The term "creditor" refers only to creditors who regularly extend, or arrange for the extension of, credit for which the payment of a finance charge is required, whether in connection with loans, sales of property or services, or otherwise. The provisions of this title apply to any such creditor, irrespective of his or its status as a natural person or any type of organization.

(g) The term "credit sale" refers to any sale with respect to which credit is extended or arranged by the seller. The term includes any contract in the form of a bailment or lease if the bailee or lessee contracts to pay as compensation for use a sum substantially equivalent to or in excess of the aggregate value of the property and services involved and it is agreed that the bailee or lessee will become, or for no other or a nominal consideration has the option to become, the owner of the property upon full compliance with his obligations under the contract.

(h) The adjective "consumer", used with reference to a credit transaction, characterizes the transaction as one in which the party to whom credit is offered or extended is a natural person, and the money, property, or services which are the subject of the transaction are primarily for personal, family, household, or agricultural purposes.

(i) The term "open end credit plan" refers to a plan prescribing the terms of credit transactions which may be made thereunder from time to time and under the terms of which a finance charge may be computed on the outstanding unpaid balance from time to time thereunder.

ance in lieu of perfecting any security interest otherwise required by the creditor in connection with the transaction, if the premium does not exceed the fees and charges described in paragraph (1) which would otherwise be payable.

(3) Taxes.

(4) Any other type of charge which is not for credit and the exclusion of which from the finance charge is approved by the Board by regulation.

(e) The following items, when charged in connection with any extension of credit secured by an interest in real property, shall not be included in the computation of the finance charge with respect to that transaction:

(1) Fees or premiums for title examination, title insurance, or similar purposes.

(2) Fees for preparation of a deed, settlement statement, or other documents.

(3) Escrows for future payments of taxes and insurance.

(4) Fees for notarizing deeds and other documents.

(5) Appraisal fees.

(6) Credit reports.

§ 107. Determination of annual percentage rate

(a) The annual percentage rate applicable to any extension of consumer credit shall be determined, in accordance with the regulations of the Board,

(1) in the case of any extension of credit other than under an open end credit plan, as

(A) that nominal annual percentage rate which will yield a sum equal to the amount of the finance charge when it is applied to the unpaid balances of the amount financed, calculated according to the actuarial method of allocating payments made on a debt between the amount financed and the amount of the finance charge, pursuant to which a payment is applied first to the accumulated finance charge and the balance is applied to the unpaid amount financed; or

(B) the rate determined by any method prescribed by the Board as a method which materially simplifies computation while retaining reasonable accuracy as compared with the rate determined under subparagraph (A).

(2) in the case of any extension of credit under an open end credit plan, as the quotient (expressed as a percentage) of the total finance charge for the period to which it relates divided by the amount upon which the finance charge for that period is based, multiplied by the number of such periods in a year.

(b) Where a creditor imposes the same finance charge for balances within a specified range, the annual percentage rate shall be computed on the median balance within the range, except that if the Board determines that a rate so computed would not be meaningful, or would be materially misleading, the annual percentage rate shall be computed on such other basis as the Board may by regulation require.

(c) The annual percentage rate may be rounded to the nearest quarter of 1 per centum for credit transactions payable in substantially equal installments when a creditor determines the total finance charge on the basis of a single add-on, discount, periodic, or other rate, and the rate is converted into an annual percentage rate under procedures prescribed by the Board.

(d) The Board may authorize the use of rate tables or charts which may provide for the disclosure of annual percentage rates which vary from the rate determined in accordance with subsection (a)(1)(A) by not more than such tolerances as the Board may allow. The Board may not allow a tolerance greater than 8 per centum of that rate except to simplify compliance where irregular payments are involved.

(e) In the case of creditors determining the annual percentage rate in a manner other than as described in subsection (c) or (d), the Board may authorize other reasonable tolerances.

(f) Prior to January 1, 1971, any rate required under this title to be disclosed as a percentage rate may, at the option of the creditor, be expressed in the form of the corresponding ratio of dollars per hundred dollars.

§ 108. Administrative enforcement

(a) Compliance with the requirements imposed under this title shall be enforced under

(1) section 8 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, in the case of

(A) national banks, by the Comptroller of the Currency.

(B) member banks of the Federal Reserve System (other than national banks), by the Board.

(C) banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (other than members of the Federal Reserve System), by the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

(2) section 5(d) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, section 407 of the National Housing Act, and sections 6(i) and 17 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (acting directly or through the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation), in the case of any institution subject to any of those provisions.

(3) the Federal Credit Union Act, by the Director of the Bureau of Federal Credit Unions with respect to any Federal credit union.

(4) the Acts to regulate commerce, by the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to any common carrier subject to those Acts.

(5) the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, by the Civil Aeronautics Board with respect to any air carrier or foreign air carrier subject to that Act.

(6) the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921 (except as provided in section 406 of that Act), by the Secretary of Agriculture with respect to any activities subject to that Act.

(b) For the purpose of the exercise by any agency referred to in subsection (a) of its powers under any Act referred to in that subsection, a violation of any requirement imposed under this title shall be deemed to be a violation of a requirement imposed under that Act. In addition to its powers under any provision of law specifically referred to in subsection (a), each of the agencies referred to in that subsection may exercise, for the purpose of enforcing compliance with any requirement imposed under this title, any other authority conferred on it by law.

(c) Except to the extent that enforcement of the requirements imposed under this title is specifically committed to some other Government agency under subsection (a), the Federal Trade Commission shall enforce such requirements. For the purpose of the exercise by the Federal Trade Commission of its functions and powers under the Federal Trade Commission Act, a violation of any requirement imposed under this title shall be deemed a violation of a requirement imposed under that Act. All of the functions and powers of the Federal Trade Commission under the Federal Trade Commission Act are available to the Commission to enforce compliance by any person with the requirements imposed under this title, irrespective of whether that person is engaged in commerce or meets any other jurisdictional tests in the Federal Trade Commission Act.

(d) The authority of the Board to issue regulations under this title does not impair the authority of any other agency designated in this section to make rules respecting its own procedures in enforcing compliance with requirements imposed under this title.

§ 109. Views of other agencies

In the exercise of its functions under this title, the Board may obtain upon request the views of any other Federal agency which, in the judgment of the Board, exercises regulatory or supervisory functions with respect to any class of creditors subject to this title.

§ 110. Advisory committee

The Board shall establish an advisory committee to advise and consult with it in the exercise of its functions under this title. In appointing the members of the committee, the Board shall seek to achieve a fair representation of the interests of sellers of merchandise on credit, lenders, and the public. The committee shall meet from time to time at the call of the Board, and members thereof shall be paid transportation expenses and not to exceed $100 per diem.

§ 111. Effect on other laws

(a) This title does not annul, alter, or affect, or exempt any creditor from complying with, the laws of any State relating to the disclosure of information in connection with credit transactions, except to the extent that those laws are inconsistent with the provisions of this title or regulations thereunder, and then only to the extent of the inconsistency.

(b) This title does not otherwise annul, alter or affect in any manner the meaning, scope or applicability of the laws of any State, including, but not limited to, laws relating to the types, amounts or rates of charges, or any element or elements of charges, permissible under such laws in connection with the extension or use of credit, nor does this title extend the applicability of those laws to any class of persons or transactions to which they would not otherwise apply.

(c) In any action or proceeding in any court involving a consumer credit sale, the disclosure of the annual percentage rate as required under this title in connection with that sale may not be received as evidence that the sale was a loan or any type of transaction other than a credit sale.

(d) Except as specified in sections 125 and 130, this title and the regulations issued thereunder do not affect the validity or enforceability of any contract or obligation under State or Federal law.

§ 112. Criminal liability for willful and knowing violation

Whoever willfully and knowingly

(1) gives false or inaccurate information or fails to provide information which he is required to disclose under the provisions of this title or any regulation issued thereunder,

(2) uses any chart or table authorized by the Board under section 107 in such a manner as to consistently understate the annual percentage rate determined under section 107 (a)(1)(A), or

(3) otherwise fails to comply with any requirement imposed under this title, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

§ 113. Penalties inapplicable to governmental agencies

No civil or criminal penalty provided under this title for any violation thereof may be imposed upon the United States or any agency thereof, or upon any State or political subdivision thereof, or any agency of any State or political subdivision.

§ 114. Reports by Board and Attorney General

Not later than January 3 of each year after 1969, the Board and the Attorney General shall, respectively, make reports to the Congress concerning the administration of their functions under this title, including such recommendations as the Board and the Attorney General, respectively, deem necessary or appropriate. In addition, each report of the Board shall include its assessment of the extent to which compliance with the requirements imposed under this title is being achieved.

§ 121. General requirement of disclosure

(a) Each creditor shall disclose clearly and conspicuously, in accordance with the regulations of the Board, to each person to whom consumer credit is extended and upon whom a finance charge is or may be imposed, the information required under this chapter.

(b) If there is more than one obligor, a creditor need not furnish a statement of information required under this chapter to more than one of them.

§ 122. Form of disclosure; additional information

(a) Regulations of the Board need not require that disclosures pursuant to this chapter be made in the order set forth in this chapter, and may permit the use of terminology different from that employed in this chapter if it conveys substantially the same meaning.

(b) Any creditor may supply additional information or explanations with any disclosures required under this chapter.

§ 123. Exemption for State-regulated transactions

The Board shall by regulation exempt from the requirements of this chapter any class of credit transactions within any State if it determines that under the law of that State that class of transactions is subject to requirements substantially similar to those imposed under this chapter, and that there is adequate provision for enforcement.

§ 124. Effect of subsequent occurrence

If information disclosed in accordance with this chapter is subsequently rendered inaccurate as the result of any act, occurrence, or agreement subsequent to the delivery of the required disclosures, the inaccuracy resulting therefrom does not constitute a violation of this chapter.

§ 125. Right of rescission as to certain transactions

(a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, in the case of any consumer credit transaction in which a security interest is retained or acquired in any real property which is used or is expected to be used as the residence of the person to whom credit is extended, the obligor shall have the right to rescind the transaction until midnight of the third business day following the consummation of the transaction or the delivery of the disclosures required under this section and all other material disclosures required under this chapter, whichever is later, by notifying the creditor, in accordance with regulations of the Board, of his intention to do so. The creditor shall clearly and conspicuously disclose, in accordance with regulations of the Board, to any obligor in a transaction subject to this section the rights of the obligor under this section. The creditor shall also provide, in accordance with regulations of the Board, an adequate opportunity to the obligor to exercise his right to rescind any transaction subject to this section.

(b) When an obligor exercises his right to rescind under subsection (a), he is not liable for any finance or other charge, and any security interest given by the obligor becomes void upon such a rescission. Within ten days after receipt of a notice of rescission, the creditor shall return to the obligor any money or property given as earnest money, downpayment, or otherwise, and shall take any action necessary or appropriate to reflect the termination of any security interest created under the transaction. If the creditor has delivered any property to the obligor, the obligor may retain possession of it. Upon the performance of the creditor's obligations under this section, the obligor shall tender the property to the creditor, except that if return of the property in kind would be impracticable or inequitable, the obligor shall tender its reasonable value. Tender shall be made at the location of the property or at the residence of the obligor, at the option of the obligor. If the creditor does not take possession of the property within ten days after tender by the obligor, ownership of the property vests in the obligor without obligation on his part to pay for it.

(c) Notwithstanding any rule of evidence, written acknowledgment of receipt of any disclosures required under this title by a person to whom a statement is required to be given pursuant to this section does no more than create a rebuttable presumption of delivery thereof.

(d) The Board may, if it finds that such action is necessary in order to permit homeowners to meet bona fide personal financial emergencies, prescribe regulations authorizing the modification or waiver of any rights created under this section to the extent and under the circumstances set forth in those regulations.

(e) This section does not apply to the creation or retention of a first lien against a dwelling to finance the acquisition of that dwelling.

§ 126. Content of periodic statements

If a creditor transmits periodic statements in connection with any extension of consumer credit other than under an open end consumer credit plan, then each of those statements shall set forth each of the following items:

(1) The annual percentage rate of the total finance charge.

(2) The date by which, or the period (if any) within which, payment must be made in order to avoid additional finance charges or other charges.

(3) Such of the items set forth in section 127(b) as the Board may by regulation require as appropriate to the terms and conditions under which the extension of credit in question is made.

§ 127. Open end consumer credit plans

(a) Before opening any account under an open end consumer credit plan, the creditor shall disclose to the person to whom credit is to be extended each of the following items, to the extent applicable:

(1) The conditions under which a finance charge may be imposed, including the time period, if any, within which any credit extended may be repaid without incurring a finance charge.

(2) The method of determining the balance upon which a finance charge will be imposed.

(3) The method of determining the amount of the finance charge, including any minimum or fixed amount imposed as a finance charge.

(4) Where one or more periodic rates may be used to compute the finance charge, each such rate, the range of balances to which it is applicable, and the corresponding nominal annual percentage rate determined by multiplying the periodic rate by the number of periods in a year.

(5) If the creditor so elects,

(A) the average effective annual percentage rate of return received from accounts under the plan for a representative period of time; or

(B) whenever circumstances are such that the computation of a rate under subparagraph (A) would not be feasible or practical, or would be misleading or meaningless, a projected rate of return to be received from accounts under the plan.

The Board shall prescribe regulations, consistent with commonly accepted standards for accounting or statistical procedures, to carry out the purposes of this paragraph.

(6) The conditions under which any other charges may be imposed, and the method by which they will be determined.

(7) The conditions under which the creditor may retain or acquire any security interest in any property to secure the payment of any credit extended under the plan, and a description of the interest or interests which may be so retained or acquired.

(b) The creditor of any account under an open end consumer credit plan shall transmit to the obligor, for each billing cycle at the end of which there is an outstanding balance in that account or with respect to which a finance charge is imposed, a statement setting forth each of the following items to the extent applicable:

(1) The outstanding balance in the account at the beginning of the statement period.

(2) The amount and date of each extension of credit during the period, and, if a purchase was involved, a brief identification (unless previously furnished) of the goods or services purchased.

(3) The total amount credited to the account during the period.

(4) The amount of any finance charge added to the account during the period, itemized to show the amounts, if any, due to the application of percentage rates and the amount, if any, imposed as a minimum or fixed charge.

(5) Where one or more periodic rates may be used to compute the finance charge, each such rate, the range of balances to which it is applicable, and, unless the annual percentage rate (determined under section 107(a)(2)) is required to be disclosed pursuant to paragraph (6), the corresponding nominal annual percentage rate determined by multiplying the periodic rate by the number of periods in a year.

(6) Where the total finance charge exceeds 50 cents for a monthly or longer billing cycle, or the pro rata part of 50 cents for a billing cycle shorter than monthly, the total finance charge expressed as an annual percentage rate (determined under section 107(a)(2)), except that if the finance charge is the sum of two or more products of a rate times a portion of the balance, the creditor may, in lieu of disclosing a single rate for the total charge, disclose each such rate expressed as an annual percentage rate, and the part of the balance to which it is applicable.

(7) At the election of the creditor, the average effective annual percentage rate of return (or the projected rate) under the plan as prescribed in subsection (a)(5).

(8) The balance on which the finance charge was computed and a statement of how the balance was determined. If the balance is determined without first deducting all credits during the period, that fact and the amount of such payments shall also be disclosed.

(9) The outstanding balance in the account at the end of the period.

(10) The date by which, or the period (if any) within which, payment must be made to avoid additional finance charges.

(c) In the case of any open end consumer credit plan in existence on the effective date of this subsection, the items described in subsection (a), to the extent applicable, shall be disclosed in a notice mailed or delivered to the obligor not later than thirty days after that date.

§ 128. Sales not under open end credit plans

(a) In connection with each consumer credit sale not under an open end credit plan, the creditor shall disclose each of the following items which is applicable:

(1) The cash price of the property or service purchased.

(2) The sum of any amounts credited as downpayment (including any trade-in).

(3) The difference between the amount referred to in paragraph (1) and the amount referred to in paragraph (2).

(4) All other charges, individually itemized, which are included in the amount of the credit extended but which are not part of the finance charge.

(5) The total amount to be financed (the sum of the amount described in paragraph (3) plus the amount described in paragraph (4)).

(6) Except in the case of a sale of a dwelling, the amount of the finance charge, which may in whole or in part be designated as a time-price differential or any similar term to the extent applicable.

(7) The finance charge expressed as an annual percentage rate except in the case of a finance charge

(A) which does not exceed $5 and is applicable to an amount financed not exceeding $75, or

(B) which does not exceed $7.50 and is applicable to an amount financed exceeding $75.

A creditor may not divide a consumer credit sale into two or more sales to avoid the disclosure of an annual percentage rate pursuant to this paragraph.

(8) The number, amount, and due dates or periods of payments scheduled to repay the indebtedness.

(9) The default, delinquency, or similar charges payable in the event of late payments.

(10) A description of any security interest held or to be retained or acquired by the creditor in connection with the extension of credit, and a clear identification of the property to which the security interest relates.

(b) Except as otherwise provided in this chapter, the disclosures required under subsection (a) shall be made before the credit is extended, and may be made by disclosing the information in the contract or other evidence of indebtedness to be signed by the purchaser.

(c) If a creditor receives a purchase order by mail or telephone without personal solicitation, and the cash price and the deferred payment price and the terms of financing, including the annual percentage rate, are set forth in the creditor's catalog or other printed material distributed to the public, then the disclosures required under subsection (a) may be made at any time not later than the date the first payment is due.

(d) If a consumer credit sale is one of a series of consumer credit sales transactions made pursuant to an agreement providing for the addition of the deferred payment price of that sale to an existing outstanding balance, and the person to whom the credit is extended has approved in writing both the annual percentage rate or rates and the method of computing the finance charge or charges, and the creditor retains no security interest in any property as to which he has received payments aggregating the amount of the sales price including any finance charges attributable thereto, then the disclosure required under subsection (a) for the particular sale may be made at any time not later than the date the first payment for that sale is due. For the purposes of this subsection, in the case of items purchased on different dates, the first purchased shall be deemed first paid for, and in the case of items purchased on the same date, the lowest priced shall be deemed first paid for.

§ 129. Consumer loans not under open end credit plans

(a) Any creditor making a consumer loan or otherwise extending consumer credit in a transaction which is neither a consumer credit sale nor under an open end consumer credit plan shall disclose each of the following items, to the extent applicable:

(1) The amount of credit of which the obligor will have the actual use, or which is or will be paid to him or for his account or to another person on his behalf.

(2) All charges, individually itemized, which are included in the amount of credit extended but which are not part of the finance charge.

(3) The total amount to be financed (the sum of the amounts referred to in paragraph (1) plus the amounts referred to in paragraph (2)).

(4) Except in the case of a loan secured by a first lien on a dwelling and made to finance the purchase of that dwelling, the amount of the finance charge.

(5) The finance charge expressed as an annual percentage rate except in the case of a finance charge

(A) which does not exceed $5 and is applicable to an extension of consumer credit not exceeding $75, or

(B) which does not exceed $7.50 and is applicable to an extension of consumer credit exceeding $75.

A creditor may not divide an extension of credit into two or more transactions to avoid the disclosure of an annual percentage rate pursuant to this paragraph.

(6) The number, amount, and the due dates or periods of payments scheduled to repay the indebtedness.

(7) The default, delinquency, or similar charges payable in the event of late payments.

(8) A description of any security interest held or to be retained or acquired by the creditor in connection with the extension of credit, and a clear identification of the property to which the security interest relates.

(b) Except as otherwise provided in this chapter, the disclosures required by subsection (a) shall be made before the credit is extended, and may be made by disclosing the information in the note or other evidence of indebtedness to be signed by the obligor.

(c) If a creditor receives a request for an extension of credit by mail or telephone without personal solicitation and the terms of financing, including the annual percentage rate for representative amounts of credit, are set forth in the creditor's printed material distributed to the public, or in the contract of loan or other printed material delivered to the obligor, then the disclosures required under subsection (a) may be made at any time not later than the date the first payment is due.

§ 130. Civil liability

(a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, any creditor who fails in connection with any consumer credit transaction to disclose to any person any information required under this chapter to be disclosed to that person is liable to that person in an amount equal to the sum of

(1) twice the amount of the finance charge in connection with the transaction, except that the liability under this paragraph shall not be less than $100 nor greater than $1,000; and

(2) in the case of any successful action to enforce the foregoing liability, the costs of the action together with a reasonable attorney's fee as determined by the court.

(b) A creditor has no liability under this section if within fifteen days after discovering an error, and prior to the institution of an action under this section or the receipt of written notice of the error, the creditor notifies the person concerned of the error and makes whatever adjustments in the appropriate account are necessary to insure that the person will not be required to pay a finance charge in excess of the amount or percentage rate actually disclosed.

(c) A creditor may not be held liable in any action brought under this section for a violation of this chapter if the creditor shows by a preponderance of evidence that the violation was not intentional and resulted from a bona fide error notwithstanding the maintenance of procedures reasonably adapted to avoid any such error.

(d) Any action which may be brought under this section against the original creditor in any credit transaction involving a security interest in real property may be maintained against any subsequent assignee of the original creditor where the assignee, its subsidiaries, or affiliates were in a continuing business relationship with the original creditor either at the time the credit was extended or at the time of the assignment, unless the assignment was involuntary, or the assignee shows by a preponderance of evidence that it did not have reasonable grounds to believe that the original creditor was engaged in violations of this chapter, and that it maintained procedures reasonably adapted to apprise it of the existence of any such violations.

(e) Any action under this section may be brought in any United States district court, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction, within one year from the date of the occurrence of the violation.

§ 131. Written acknowledgment as proof of receipt

Except as provided in section 125(c) and except in the case of actions brought under section 130(d), in any action or proceeding by or against any subsequent assignee of the original creditor without knowledge to the contrary by the assignee when he acquires the obligation, written acknowledgment of receipt by a person to whom a statement is required to be given pursuant to this title shall be conclusive proof of the delivery thereof and, unless the violation is apparent on the face of the statement, of compliance with this chapter. This section does not affect the rights of the obligor in any action against the original creditor.

CHAPTER 3—CREDIT ADVERTISING

Sec.
141. Catalogs and multiple-page advertisements.
142. Advertising of downpayments and installments.
143. Advertising of open end credit plans.
144. Advertising of credit other than open end plans.
145. Nonliability of media.

§ 141. Catalogs and multiple-page advertisements

For the purposes of this chapter, a catalog or other multiple-page advertisement shall be considerd a single advertisement if it clearly and conspicuously displays a credit terms table on which the information required to be stated under this chapter is clearly set forth.

§ 142. Advertising of downpayments and installments

No advertisement to aid, promote, or assist directly or indirectly any extension of consumer credit may state

(1) that a specific periodic consumer credit amount or installment amount can be arranged, unless the creditor usually and customarily arranges credit payments or installments for that period and in that amount.

(2) that a specified downpayment is required in connection with any extension of consumer credit, unless the creditor usually and customarily arranges downpayments in that amount.

§ 143. Advertising of open end credit plans

No advertisement to aid, promote, or assist directly or indirectly the extension of consumer credit under an open end credit plan may set forth any of the specific terms of that plan or the appropriate rate determined under section 127(a)(5) unless it also clearly and conspicuously sets forth all of the following items:

(1) The time period, if any, within which any credit extended may be repaid without incurring a finance charge.

(2) The method of determining the balance upon which a finance charge will be imposed.

(3) The method of determining the amount of the finance charge, including any minimum or fixed amount imposed as a finance charge.

(4) Where periodic rates may be used to compute the finance charge, the periodic rates expressed as annual percentage rates.

(5) Such other or additional information for the advertising of open end credit plans as the Board may by regulation require to provide for adequate comparison of credit costs as between different types of open end credit plans.

§ 144. Advertising of credit other than open end plans

(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), this section applies to any advertisement to aid, promote, or assist directly or indirectly any consumer credit sale, loan, or other extension of credit subject to the provisions of this title, other than an open end credit plan.

(b) The provisions of this section do not apply to advertisements of residential real estate except to the extent that the Board may by regulation require.

(c) If any advertisement to which this section applies states the rate of a finance charge, the advertisement shall state the rate of that charge expressed as an annual percentage rate.

(d) If any advertisement to which this section applies states the amount of the downpayment, if any, the amount of any installment payment, the dollar amount of any finance charge, or the number of installments or the period of repayment, then the advertisement shall state all of the following items:

(1) The cash price or the amount of the loan as applicable.

(2) The downpayment, if any.

(3) The number, amount, and due dates or period of payments scheduled to repay the indebtedness if the credit is extended.

(4) The rate of the finance charge expressed as an annual percentage rate.

§ 145. Nonliability of media

There is no liability under this chapter on the part of any owner or personnel, as such, of any medium in which an advertisement appears or through which it is disseminated.

COMMENTS MADE AT HEARING OF
HB 497
4:00 P.M. February 23, 1970
By Richard T. Hall

In developing the bank credit card for Alaska, we did so because we were constantly asked for such a program by the consumer over the past three to four years. Bank credit cards became prevelant throughout the lower 48 states and have such wide acceptability that both the existing citizens of the state and the new comers are desiring such a card. In addition, the merchants throughout the state were extremely desirous of the bank credit card in order to offer their customers the choice of a credit or cash sale. We did not feel that our bank could initiate a program statewide that would be able to reach a great enough market to make it pay. However, after a thorough and extensive survey and study, we felt a program could be initiated statewide that would reach a break-even point sometime approximately two years after inception of the program.

We developed the program as it is today using BankAmericard, which we feel is the finest bank credit card system in the world today. It offers the complete spectrum of a credit card program with its various facets to the people to Alaska and their tremendous endorsement of the program speaks for their acceptance.

At the present time, Alaska BankAmericard has over 22,000 cardholders. These are adults, responsible citizens of the state, that were picked on strict criteria based on their ability to handle credits. Following Alaska law, we did not mail unsolicited cards, but rather wrote letters to people we felt were qualified to receive the cards, asking them to directly solicit a card from us. The response was terrific. At this point, I should mention too, that one of the major objections voiced elsewhere on bank credit cards has been the fact the potential cardholder assumes a liability if his card is lost or stolen. However, Alaska BankAmericard does not either imply or in practice create any liability to the cardholder for a lost or stolen card.

Another criticism voiced recently about credit cards in the south 48 is that they tend to have an inflationary effect. I can only say that our research indicates that this is not so. The recent speach by Mr. Andrew Brimer, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, which made an extensive survey of all bank credit cards, indicates that their findings do not lead them to believe that bank credit cards are inflationary. The report indicates that bank credit cards are creating a shifting of credit from one type to another.

1. This bill presumes that all merchants on a credit card program change their prices to absorb the cost of the credit card program. This is not a valid argument for the following reasons:

a) If merchants changed their price they would no longer be competetive.

b) The merchant pays for and gets a full credit card program through the bank at a rate much less than the cost of major retail department store credit operations. According to a 1968 study of the National Retail Merchants Association, the cost of major retail department store credit operations was set at 7.77% of the total credit sales.

2. A person asking for the cash discount from the merchant assumes that all persons will be carrying a bank credit card and all customers will have the choice of purchasing either with cash or with a bank credit card. In actuallity, statistics show that even after several years of a successful credit card operation, a merchant can only expect 30% of his sales to be credit sales.

3. House Bill 497 also assumes that a retail merchant will have sold the same volume of sales with or without the bank credit card. In actuallity, the bank credit card allows the small retail merchant to expand his sales by offering a credit option to his customers. It allows him for once, particularly in Alaska, to compete favorably with the large retail merchants who have their owen credit programs. To pass this bill would put the small merchant back in the same position he has always had in Alaska and that is not being able to offer a credit program to his customers and not being able to effectively compete with the larger retail outlets.

In addition, there is proof that bank credit cards are sought by the merchant to expand sales [redacted] many times, and this is true in Alaska. We have signed merchants that already have and have retained their own credit operation after signing with BankAmericard. They have signed because they recognize that BankAmericard in Alaska can expand their sales. It is therefore, then, the expansion of the sales that allows them to absorb the cost of the credit card program.

4. Now let's take a look at the merits of the program to the merchant that offset the merchant discounts.

a) Immediately can turn his receivables into cash.

b) He can offer a complete credit card program to his customers with no liability of loss to himself.

5. Let's take a look at the merits of the program from the consumer standpoint.

a) Since BankAmericard in Alaska allows the cardholder the option of properly budgeting his monthly expenses rather than having to suffer a month of high expenses, the cardholder can more effectively budget his income.

b) For reasons mentioned above, the customer does not pay additional for his merchandise by the use of his card.

c) Not only is this card usable within the State of Alaska but it gives the cardholder the option of shopping at over 1,000,000 outlets on a world wide basis.

d) The cardholder, as stated in the original agreement form, is not liable should his card be lost or stolen. This is not always true of other credit cards.

6. Proof of the pudding - have the merchants and consumers of Alaska accepted the program?

a) As of February 2, 1970 there were over 22,000 cardholders in Alaska. Also it should be remembered that these people had to ask for the card and most had to send back a legal acceptance card as prescribed by Alaska statute 06.05.209.

b) Over 825 merchants have signed up for the program and the number continues to grow daily.

c) Are the card holders using the card? As of February 12, there was over $1,400,000.00 outstanding on the system.

d) It should also be remembered that all banks in Alaska were asked to join the program. Seven out of 10 banks in Alaska chose the program. This program is designed to provide credit to the small credit user or consumer who previously did not have such credit available.

7. What would be the effect of passage of House Bill #497?

Passage of house bill #497 would gut the BankAmericard program in Alaska. Obviously no merchant could afford to discount over half of his sales that were made on the basis of cash. This means that we would go back to being the only state not having the availability of an international credit card program such as provided by the BankAmericard program.

Also, other forms of credit cards would be prohibited from operating within Alaska. This would include Carte Blanche, American Express, Diner's Club, Select and others. I do not believe that the people of Alaska desire to be discriminated against by the careless passage of such a bill.

Re: Credit Card Bill Pending
Before Alaska Legislature

I understand that there is a bill pending in the Alaska Legislature which would require a merchant who honors a credit card and sells the underlying obligation to a credit card issuer at a discount to sell, with respect to a similar transaction involving a non-credit card purchase, the goods or services at a price equal to the net proceeds received by the merchant in the credit card transaction. For example, if an item sells for $100, and if the discount is 3%, the net proceeds to the merchant in a credit card sale involving that item equals $97, and the proposed legislation would require the merchant to offer that item for sale in a non-credit card sale at a price of $97. Passage of this legislation would create significant problems for merchants under the Truth in Lending Act and Regulation Z.

Section 226.2(i) of the Regulation defines "cash price" as "the price at which the creditor offers, in the ordinary course of business, to sell for cash the property or services which are the subject of a consumer credit transaction." Under the proposed legislation, in the context of the example given above, the cash price would appear to be $97. The price paid by the credit card holder would, however, be $100. Under Section 226.4(a) of the Regulation, the extra $3 which the credit card holder pays would be classified as a finance charge.

Under Section 226.2(f) to "arrange for the extension of credit" means to provide or offer to provide consumer credit which is or will be extended by another person under a business or other relationship pursuant to which the person arranging such credit receives or will receive a fee, compensation, or other consideration for such service or has knowledge of the credit terms and participates in the preparation of the contract documents required in connection with the extension of credit." This section further specifically provides that it does not include honoring a credit card or similar device where no finance charge is imposed at the time of that transaction. Because, as set forth above, the merchant in the example given will have imposed a finance charge, the merchant does not come within the exclusion. Therefore, the merchant is a person who "arranges for the extension of credit." This makes the merchant a "creditor" under the Regulation because under Section 226.2(m) thereof, the term "creditor" is defined as "a person who in the ordinary course of business regularly extends or arranges for the extension of consumer credit, or offers to extend or arrange for the extension of such credit."

Under the definitions of "consumer credit" and "credit" set forth in Section 226.2 of the Regulation, since the merchant is a creditor, the sales transaction becomes a consumer credit transaction. Therefore, the merchant would be required under the Regulation to give a Truth in Lending Disclosure Statement. This would be in addition to the open-end credit disclosure statement that would have been given by the credit card issuer to the cardholder prior to the use of the credit card.

The form of required disclosure is set forth in Section 226.8(d) of the Regulation. Basically, the form of disclosure is a loan disclosure under Section 226.8(d). The annual percentage rate to be disclosed would be determined by dividing the amount of finance charge by the amount financed and multiplying the quotient (expressed as a percentage) by 12. In the example given above, the rate would be approximately 37%.

In addition, since it is clear that both the credit card issuer and the merchant are "creditors" as defined in the Regulation, Section 226.6(d) of the Regulation, which deals with multiple creditors, would be applicable.

The application of the Regulation as a whole to this type of hybrid transaction is extremely difficult to clearly ascertain. The risks of non-compliance with Regulation Z are enormous.

It is open to question whether any kind of compliance with Regulation Z would be possible in cases involving a merchant who accepted various types of credit cards under plans involving different discounts. Regulation Z provides no clue as how the "cash price" would be determined in such a situation.

This memorandum is not intended to be a detailed analysis of the problems involved because time does not permit. The problems are, however, overwhelming.

NEW HORIZONS IN CREDIT CARD BANKING

by

Andrew F. Brimmer*

In the summer of 1968, the Federal Reserve Board published a comprehensive assessment of bank credit cards. Since then, the expansion of bank credit card programs has continued at a rapid pace. Even so, some features of credit card banking that were of concern during the period prior to the System study are still attracting considerable attention, not only in the nation's press, but also among members of Congress and within Government regulatory agencies.

The System Task Force that was established by the Federal Reserve Board in the Spring of 1967 -- and whose report was released just over a year ago -- explored quite thoroughly the implications of the growth of bank credit cards for consumers, merchants, the banking system, bank supervision, and the management of monetary policy. I was the Board member most closely identified with that study.

We have just completed a review of the bank credit card situation to determine whether recent developments warrant any change in the earlier assessment. This review has included an analysis of recent trends in credit card banking, a survey by the Federal Reserve Banks of the mailing procedures used in the launching of new credit card plans and an analysis of bank examination reports over the last year to determine the extent to which State member banks are following the guidelines on credit card operations suggested by the Board as a result of our earlier study. Our review has also had the benefit of the preliminary results of the Federal Reserve Board's Survey of Consumer Awareness of Credit Costs. The BankAmericard and Interbank organizations provided recent information relating to their respective plans.

*Member, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. I am grateful to a large number of persons in the Federal Reserve System for assistance in the preparation of these remarks. I am particularly indebted to the following members of the Board's staff: Tynan Smith, Brenton C. Leavitt, David Hull, Katharyne Reil, and N. Edwin Demoney, Jr. Jerome W. Shay helped with the discussion of antitrust implications of bank credit cards.

On the basis of this review, it appears that developments in credit card banking in recent months do not call for a change in the basic conclusion of our earlier study: that credit card programs are legitimate and useful services provided by banks to their consumer and merchant customers. Furthermore, there appears to be no reason to change the Board's position that the System has adequate supervisory powers governing the development of bank credit card programs and does not see any necessity for special legislation to limit or control bank credit cards.

At the present time, however, the principal questions regarding bank practices in issuing credit cards are virtually the same as they were two years ago. There is still considerable concern that the mailing of unsolicited credit cards imposes a burden upon consumers who have to destroy or return unwanted cards. Also, there is the fear that some consumers may have their credit standing jeopardized as a result of misuse of cards lost or stolen in the mails, or at least might be subject to litigation to prove their lack of liability for such misuse. Credit cards are also being blamed for encouraging some consumers to overextend their use of credit, thus contributing to personal bankruptcies. It has been alleged that credit cards are adding to inflationary pressures.

In the last few months, it has become even more clear that two large, nation-wide systems are playing a dominant role in credit card banking. So far, this development is posing no problems in terms of competition, but the trend may raise a range of questions of public policy in the future.

Before examining these issues in more detail it might be helpful to provide perspective by highlighting recent trends in bank credit card programs.

Recent Trends in Credit Card Banking

On June 30 of this year, 699 banks were offering credit card plans, and they had $1.7 billion of credit outstanding. (See Table 1, attached). Thus, in the first six months of 1969, the number of banks with credit card plans rose by 189 (37 per cent) and the amount outstanding climbed by $393 million (30 per cent). In addition to these nearly seven hundred banks with credit balances outstanding under credit card programs, several thousand agency banks were participating in credit card plans but did not hold receivables.

The share of total credit card balances held by each class of bank has changed little during the last two years. National banks continue to hold more than three-quarters of the total while another one-sixth is held by Federal Reserve State member banks. Although the amount of credit outstanding at nonmember banks under credit card plans remains small, the number of such banks with credit card plans has been increasing more rapidly than for any other class of bank. At the end of last June, these banks represented more than one-third of all credit card banks.

Large banks (those with deposits of $1 billion and over) held more than two-fifths of the total amount outstanding on credit card plans at the end of 1968, about the same proportion as in September 1967 (when the Federal Reserve Board began to collect data on such plans). However, these banks have not kept pace with the small and medium-sized institutions going into the credit card field -- dropping from 9 per cent of the total number to 5 per cent in the 15-month period. Banks with total deposits of less than $25 million have shown a faster rate of entry than other size groups. Yet, although they represented more than two-fifths of all credit card banks, they held less than two per cent of total receivables at the end of last year. Most of the outstanding indebtedness on credit cards continues to be in the hands of banks in the $100 million and over deposit class. Many of these banks had plans in operation before the Fall of 1967.

These trends are charted on the basis of information obtained every six months from the Call Reports submitted by all insured banks. In addition, monthly data on bank credit cards have been collected since the beginning of 1968. This series has been published as part of the Board's monthly report on consumer credit since June 1968. An examination of the monthly data also shows a steady increase in the amount of credit outstanding as well as considerable fluctuation of a seasonal nature in monthly extensions and repayments. (Table 2). However, much longer experience will be necessary before seasonal adjustment factors can be derived and applied to these figures. Another limitation of the reported totals is a slight degree of understatement because of the lag in obtaining reports from additional banks that are continually entering the credit card field. We expect to overcome this difficulty before the end of 1969 by shifting to a sampling basis for obtaining monthly reports.

Regional Growth Patterns

The western section of the country continues to be the principal center of credit card banking, but this technique of consumer financing is spreading rapidly in other regions of the country. (Table 3.) At the end of last December, 115 both member and non-member banks in the San Francisco Federal Reserve District had $531 million of receivables outstanding under credit cards, representing over one-fifth of all the banks with such plans and two-fifths of the total credit. Second place was held by the Chicago District which had $182 million in outstandings. The New York District was fairly close behind with $155 million. The next two in order were the banks in Atlanta and Richmond, with $100 million and $93 million, respectively, in outstandings.

The slower growth in bank credit cards in the Northeast Districts through 1968 partly reflected the relatively greater popularity of check-credit plans. At the end of last year, about $800 million was outstanding under check-credit plans -- of which well over two-fifths was concentrated in the Boston, New York and Philadelphia Federal Reserve Districts. In contrast, banks in these same Districts accounted for less than one-fifth of the amount of credit outstanding under bank credit cards at the end of 1968. From the monthly consumer credit series, it appears that check-credit rose by one-fifth in the first seven months of 1969, while the amount outstanding under bank credit cards rose by over one-third. During the last 18 months, the share of check-credit in the total shrank from two-fifths to one-third. The relative positions of the two types of bank credit plans may shift further in favor of credit cards over coming months -- reflecting the recent adoption of the credit card form by several major New York banks which previously offered only check-credit plans.

The regional pattern of growth in bank credit card plans is shown in the results of the survey made by the Federal Reserve Banks in August of this year. (Table 4.) Between the end of June 1968, and the end of August 1969, the number of banks offering credit plans rose by 68 per cent. The increase was sharpest in the Richmond District (346 per cent), followed by Atlanta (192 per cent), Kansas City (120 per cent), and Cleveland (100 per cent), New York (82 per cent), and Dallas (76 per cent). The pace of expansion was slow in other Districts -- including no expansion at all in the number of banks offering bank credit cards in the Philadelphia District. In some Districts (San Francisco and Chicago, for example), the initial efforts to launch bank credit cards had been made earlier.

Distribution of Bank Credit Cards

Banks have found that the most effective way to develop customers for a new credit card plan is to mail a large number of unsolicited cards. This procedure resolves simultaneously the problem of having enough merchants signed to the bank's plan to make the card useful to consumers and of having sufficient people obtain the card to make forming the plan attractive to merchants. Competitive situations appear to rule out the alternative method of depending on applications to be returned before cards are mailed.

Yet, the use of unsolicited mailings has become one of the principal sources of controversy surrounding the advent of credit card banking. The practice involves some financial risks to the issuing banks and some inconvenience to the small percentage of potential customers who do not want to receive such cards. The substantial financial losses experienced by a number of Midwest banks a few years ago when they launched credit card plans on the basis of unsolicited (and in some cases unscreened) mailings led banks to take special steps to protect themselves against theft of cards during the process of distribution. They have also taken measures to minimize losses to customers through misuse of cards once they have been accepted. However, there has been no fundamental revision in the technique of distributing bank credit cards: the use of unsolicited mailings remains the basic method.

The Federal Reserve Board has been highly conscious of the problems involved in unsolicited mailing of bank credit cards. For this reason, in the summer of 1968, the Board expanded the check list of questions used in the examination of State member banks; examiners were instructed "to make sure that banks realize the importance of developing initial mailing lists from their own records and carefully screening them before use." The same quidelines applied to State member banks are also applied to national banks through the examination procedures. The Office of the Comptroller of the Currency was the first Federal bank supervisory agency to use a separate credit card section in its examination report, and it has instructed its examiners to see that the national banks use prudent procedures in connection with unsolicited mailings.

At the Federal Reserve Board, we have made an assessment of the extent to which State member banks are following the suggested guidelines with respect to credit card plans. On the whole, these banks seem to have exercised prudence in credit card management. This conclusion is derived from a review of reports of examination for 65 State member banks with credit card plans.1/

While unsolicited mailings were found to have been the principal means of distributing cards, no significant problems were uncovered --

1/ As of June 30, 1968, there were 64 State member banks with credit card plans. On last December 30, the number was 65, and it was 93 on June 30, 1969. Since State member banks are examined once each year, the reports on 65 banks provide almost complete coverage since the guidelines were recommended in the late summer of 1968.

certainly none of the magnitude of the difficulties surrounding the Chicago episode of late 1966 and early 1967. Nine of the 65 banks mailed cards on an unsolicited basis without obtaining adequate credit information on potential customers.

Other unsatisfactory features drawing comments of examiners are as follows:

Problem	Number of banks
Lack of control over unissued cards	1
Ineffective collection policies and practices	3
Inadequate procedures for reclaiming credit cards when accounts became delinquent	2
No preprinted expiration dates*	2
Lack of control on customers exceeding limits	4
Customers not informed of credit-card limits	1
Slow processing of items	3

In each of these instances, the unsatisfactory features noted by Federal Reserve bank examiners were corrected by management where problems existed. Specifically, in the nine cases involving lack of adequate credit information, practices were changed promptly, and such information is now obtained before cards are granted.

An even sharper view of bank credit card distribution practices is provided by the results of the survey undertaken by the Federal Reserve Banks in August this year. The survey covered the practices followed by Federal Reserve member banks which began bank credit card plans between June 30, 1968, and the end of August 1969. The results are summarized in

*Plans were effective in the 1950's, and no problems have been encountered.

Table 5. Several conslusions can be drawn from the information submitted. Unsolicited mailing of cards is used more often than not in starting new plans; but in some Federal Reserve Districts, an application-type system is also used frequently. In most cases, mailing lists are compiled from present customers of the banks, and these are screened before cards are mailed. In three Districts (Cleveland, Richmond, and Atlanta), a few banks were reported to have used outside sources (such as directory services, credit bureaus or credit rating firms) in adding to their mailing lists -- which were composed primarily of their own customers. In one case (in the Kansas City District), a bank was reported to have used unsolicited mailing of cards to launch its credit card plan -- including the use of names obtained outside the bank -- without screening the lists prior to mailing cards to potential customers. Moreover, in that case, reportedly no credit check is made of the accounts until such time as the accounts became active.

Where information was available from the Federal Reserve Bank survey, it indicated that pre-mailers were generally used, as recommended in the Federal Reserve guidelines. These pre-mailers advise the customer that a card is being sent unless the customer indicates to the bank that he wishes his name removed from the list. In this way the customer is able to refuse a card before it is sent. The pre-mailer also helps reduce the prospect of fraud by alerting the customer to expect the card and also informs the bank of changes in addresses. During a single week this summer, for example, more than 2 million bank credit cards were mailed in New York when a new plan was adopted by a group of three major banks. The fact that these cards had been preceded by pre-mailers undoubtedly contributed to holding reported losses or thefts of cards during this mailing to 250 cases.

On the other hand, the pre-mailer still puts the burden on the potential card recipient to take a positive step to stop the card's arrival if he does not want it. This is one of the remaining sources of complaint voiced by consumers. An even more serious complaint stems from the sending of cards via registered mail in a few instances. So far only a handful of banks have adopted this practice -- mainly because they consider it to be too costly to the bank. (One bank is reported to have spent an average of 80 cents per mailing to distribute its cards by registered mail.) However, in my personal opinion, the really important objection to the use of registered mail in the distribution of unsolicited credit cards is the burden placed on consumers. Since registered mail must be accepted by a responsible person at the address indicated, in many cases this means that the potential card holder must make a special effort to pick up the letter at his post office. Not infrequently this means taking time off from work (many times without pay), incurring transportation costs and other inconveniences. Consequently, the actual cost to potential card holders may be substantially greater than that borne by the sending bank. Since the main objective of employing the registered mail technique is to minimize the exposure of banks to financial losses associated with the distribution of its own card through unsolicited mailings, I personally feel that the shifting of any part of this cost to potential consumers is entirely unwarranted.

Aside from the above reservations, it appears that precautions banks have taken recently to avoid potential problems with credit card mailings are being helpful. In the summer of 1968, the Board decided, after reviewing the results of the System Task Group Study, that there was no need to ban unsolicited mailings. That position has not changed.

Earlier this month, the Federal Trade Commission held hearings on a pending regulation that would forbid the mailing of credit cards without the written request or written consent of the recipient. Such mailings would be designated as unfair trade practices and unfair competition. Banks would not be covered by this prohibition since the Federal Trade Commission lacks jurisdiction over the banking system. If the Federal Trade Commission decides to adopt this regulation, legislation to prohibit the unsolicited mailing of bank credit cards undoubtedly would be pushed.

The Board's position has been and continues to be that (while the unsolicited mailing of credit cards by banks has involved some problems) there have not been any developments thus far that appear to make Federal legislation necessary. With respect to the effect of unsolicited distributions of credit cards upon competition, the Board has concluded that the prohibition of this method of issuance of cards would seriously hamper banks in launching credit card plans, thus giving those banks already in the field a protected position that would discourage competition. On October 9, 1968, I testified on behalf of the Board before the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. In my statement, I said:

> "Banks have found that the most effective way of starting a new credit-card plan is to mail a large number of unsolicited cards. This is necessary to resolve simultaneously the problem of having enough stores signed to the bank's plan to make the card useful to consumers and of having sufficient people using the card to make forming the plan attractive to merchants. Reliance on the alternative method of depending upon application returns entails considerable delays in reaching a profitable volume of business, delays which may be unacceptable when trying to compete with other banks' plans."

I still believe that the opportunity to distribute credit cards via unsolicited mailings should not be closed off. I believe it is to the country's advantage to keep the competitive channels open for the thousands of banks that have yet to enter the credit card field. On the other hand, several further steps need to be taken to minimize the remaining burdens on consumers.

Customer Liability for Fraud Losses

The most critical remaining problem involves customer liability for fraud losses if he fails to receive a card. It should be recognized that this is not entirely a problem of unsolicited mailing -- the same problem could arise for requested cards and renewals of existing cards. In addition, cards can be and sometimes are fraudulently used after the customer accepts the card.

With regard to the first type of fraud -- the unauthorized use of cards stolen before they are received or accepted by the proper person -- we know that most banks do not attempt to collect from the intended recipient. If there are banks which do, at least the Board is not aware of them. Moreover, it seems evident that they would have legal difficulties. In addition, the trend is for states to pass laws specifically exempting from liability the customer who has not accepted or begun to use an unsolicited card.

In the case of misuse of cards stolen or lost after being accepted by the cardholder, it is generally true that the customer has no liability for fraud losses after the bank has been informed that the card is lost or stolen. As for the liability of the cardholder prior to informing the bank, there is much more variation in banks' policies. Some banks seek to collect in these cases from the customer for all losses occurring before the bank is notified. Others do not attempt to collect, even where the customer does not report the loss or theft of the card. Still other banks (and some State statutes) specify an upper limit on the dollar liability of the customer.

The majority of banks apparently follow the practice of absorbing losses, but do not reveal that policy to their customers for fear they might be unduly careless in their handling of the card. This is often true even where the bank informs the customer that his liability is limited to $50 or $100. These announced limits are primarily designed to make the customer take care in the handling of the card and to stimulate prompt reporting of lost or stolen cards. Thus, actual policy is often much more lenient than announced policy.

I would like to see all banks inform their customers of their potential liability. It is possible to do this in the literature accompanying the card, and a number of banks have developed statements which achieve this objective in a simple, straightforward manner. At a minimum, announcements mailed by banks should reassure customers that they are not responsible for cards stolen before they are received. Such announcements should specify what a customer's maximum liability is after acceptance of the card. Of course, whether a bank actually attempts to collect infrequently, if at all, is a decision for management. But uncertainty on the part of the customer as to the potential liability while not as susceptible to advance determination, is in rather the same category as uncertainty about true interest rates. In any event, failure to disclose the terms of liability are no longer tolerable standards of business conduct for card issuers.

The question of legislation has arisen on this issue, and it may be helpful to restate the comments I made last October on behalf of the Board before the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. The Board felt as a matter of principle (1) that the entire burden of loss arising from cards stolen before being received by the customer should rest entirely on the issuer and (2) after acceptance, the customer could become liable for losses before the bank is informed, but the liability on the customer should be limited. The issuer is in a much better position to bear losses and control them. In any event, the customer should be clearly informed of his liability.

The Board believes that some legislation may be required to clarify the liability question and to achieve uniformity of treatment. If appropriate legislation is enacted with respect to customer liability, the major problem associated with unsolicited mailing will be solved. To be effective and equitable, such legislation should apply to other credit cards, including travel and entertainment cards, gasoline company cards and so on, as well as to bank credit cards. The legislation might be at either the State or Federal level. It is not self-evident that a Federal law is needed -- although it may be. In states such as Illinois which have laws on this subject, the legislation has apparently had no adverse effects on the banks' operations while helping clarify the position of the cardholder.

Ownership of Bank Credit Cards

It has been evident for quite some time that the vast majority of consumers accept bank credit cards once they are received -- although they may acquire them through unsolicited mailings. Moreover, a sizable proportion of those receiving such cards actually use them. In contrast, very few potential bank customers seem prepared to initiate applications for such cards.

To learn more about the extent of bank credit card ownership, a question was included on the questionnaire used in the Federal Reserve Board's Survey of Consumer Awareness of Credit Costs conducted in June of this year. This Survey, covering 5,150 households, was undertaken mainly to provide a benchmark measure of consumer knowledge before the Truth in Lending Law went into effect on July 1, 1969. Questions were designed primarily to find out the extent to which consumers now know about the finance charges and interest rates on their various types of consumer credit transactions. The interviewing was completed about July 1, but processing of the complete results will not be finished for a month or so. In the meantime, preliminary data on the ownership of bank credit cards by education and income were developed on the basis of a random subsample of 1,025 of the 5,150 responses in the Survey.* The results are shown in Table 6.

These findings are by no means surprising. About one-quarter of the total respondents had a bank credit card. This proportion increased steadily as the level of income and education rose. While only one-sixth of respondents with grade school educations had bank credit cards, the proportion was 26 per cent for high school graduates and 32 per cent for college graduates. Among those with post graduate college experience, 48 per cent had a bank credit card.

With respect to personal income, the same trend is evident. Only 7 per cent of respondents with incomes under $3,000 reported having such a card. In the income range $5,000 - 7,999, only about one-fifth of the households reported having a bank credit card. In the range $10,000 - 14,999, the proportion was 31 per cent. For those with incomes over $15,000 the ratio reached 44 per cent.

Again, this new evidence on the ownership of bank credit cards reinforces the conclusions reached earlier: the American public taken as a whole has accepted the credit card as a useful innovation in banking.

Use Patterns and Economic Impact of Bank Credit Cards

It is becoming increasingly evident that credit extended through

* Sampling experts involved in the Survey have given assurance that the proportions shown for this subsample probably will not be very much different from those shown by the entire sample.

Start of excellent agreement against idea that bank credit cards have furthered inflation.

bank credit cards is being used as a substitute for some other forms of credit. However, there is no evidence suggesting that the total amount of bank credit extended to consumers has accelerated because of the spreading use of cards.

Credit card banks were transacting a somewhat larger proportion of their consumer instalment business through credit cards at the end of 1968 than a year earlier. At the end of last year, about one-tenth of their instalment credit was on credit cards, compared with slightly less than one-twelfth at the close of the preceding year. Nearly all of the credit card receivables continue to arise from retail sales. In spite of the fact that many plans offer cash advances, such transactions now account for less than one-sixth of all credit card loan volume and appear to be declining in relative importance so far this year. (See Table 7.)

Consumer instalment credit has increased in recent months, but not as a proportion of total bank loans. During the last two years of rapid credit card growth, consumer instalment credit has accounted for only one-seventh of the banks' total loan portfolio and credit card receivables for less than one per cent. (See Table 8.) In spite of the marked increase in credit card outstandings, total holdings are still too small relative to both consumer borrowing and total bank borrowing to be of great significance in the recent expansion.

It appears that the increased use of bank credit cards has lessened to some extent consumers' reliance on other types of credit card plans. However, because of the aggregate nature (and seasonal variablity) of data, it is difficult to pinpoint the degree of substitution that is taking place. Nevertheless, the available statistics do seem to point in this direction. (See Table 9.) During the 18 months ending June 30 of this year, the amount outstanding under bank credit cards more than doubled, rising from $800 million to $1.7 billion. In contrast, consumer outlays financed by travel and entertainment cards registered no growth at all. On a year-to-year basis (which partly eliminates seasonal factors), department store revolving credit outstanding under credit card plans rose by about $200 million through the end of last June. Retail charge accounts rose by $600 million between December 1967, and December 1968, but in the twelve months ending last June, the increase was only $300 million. The year-to-year increase in the amount outstanding under oil company credit cards was also about $200 million.

Thus far, there is no conclusive evidence that credit cards have tended to raise prices. While the retailer is faced with an extra cost in the form of the merchant discount each time a credit card purchase is made, it does not follow that there is a net increase in costs or that the purchase would have been made without a card. To the extent credit cards replace high-cost merchant-operated credit plans, they reduce costs; and to the extent they attract customers who wish to buy on credit, they generate increased sales which may offset any increases in costs.

Thus, although the evidence is admittedly not conclusive, it does suggest that credit cards have not had -- and at present magnitudes are not likely to have -- any noticeable impact on general price levels.

There is also the question of whether individual consumers might get deeply into debt because of easy credit extended through these plans. Again it is difficult to point to a quantitative conclusion. The average line of credit extended under credit card plans is in the neighborhood of $350. This is not so high as to be a cause in itself of a customer incurring excessive indebtedness. In addition, the credit standards aim at middle-income consumers who by and large can afford to contract debt within the applicable limits. This is indicated also by the preliminary tabulation from the Board's Survey of Consumer Awareness of Credit Costs mentioned above. While about one-fourth of the consumers covered by this Survey reported having a bank credit card, nearly one-half had incomes over $10,000, and only about one-tenth had incomes of less than $5,000.

Finally, there is no evidence that the use of credit cards is contributing substantially to inflationary pressures. Only a small part of the growth in consumer credit in recent months can be attributed to the expansion of bank credit card plans.

Evolving Structure of Credit Card Banking: Implications for Public Policy

The Federal Reserve's study of bank credit cards published last year concluded that there was no reason to believe that the most widely-used systems raised any serious questions under the antitrust laws. At that time, the Department of Justice had initiated actions in a few cases (involving potentially adverse effects on competition or requirements that merchants limit their participation to one bank's plan). But, in general, there was no suggestion that serious antitrust problems were on the horizon. The same conclusion seems warranted today.

However, as the two national interchange systems for bank credit cards continue to grow, the implications for antitrust policy may become more important. As of last June 30, commercial banks which were members of these two systems (BankAmericard and Interbank) held a total of $1.5 billion of credit card outstandings (Table 10). This was 90 per cent of the total outstandings of $1.7 billion on that date.

While the details differ somewhat between the two systems, the scope of their activities is reasonably comparable. While Interbank has enrolled a somewhat greater number of card-issuing banks, BankAmericard (at least as of last June) seems to have enlisted a somewhat greater proportion of the large banks. This is suggested by the fact that the amount of outstanding credit averaged $3.6 million for banks in the BankAmericard system, compared with $1.8 million for those in the Interbank system. The number of agency banks (those which offer a credit card but do not carry receivables on their own books) in the two systems was fairly close -- 2,900 for BankAmericard and 2,550 for Interbank. BankAmericard member banks had 22.9 million cardholder accounts, and Interbank members had 20.5 million. The two systems had about the same number of merchant members (450,000). The amount of outstanding credit totaled $660 million for BankAmericard member banks and $900 million for those in Interbank. The average amount outstanding per active account was virtually identical for banks associated with the two organizations -- $185 for BankAmericard and $180 for Interbank.

It may be that the BankAmericard and Interbank systems soon will have even more banks signed up. As this occurs, which seems likely from the antitrust law standpoint, it would be important that the two systems continue to remain open for new banks to join.

The mere fact that the two interchange systems are attracting more and more banks is not the critical question under present Federal antitrust statutes, but rather how the interchange groups exercise the power acquired, as it were, through "bigness It may be recalled that the Associated Press (which also runs an interchange system) had antitrust troubles in the 1940's. These did not arise just because it was the news-gathering agency for more than 1,200 subscribing member newspapers, but because of unreasonable restrictions on admissions of new members and other anticompetitive restrictions (such as exclusive dealing arrangements) binding on the subscribing newspapers.

A question that thus far has been more theoretical than practical is whether nonbank institutions should be able to join bank credit card systems. The two major systems currently do not have non-bank members.

During the preparation of the Federal Reserve's bank credit card study in 1967-68, the matter of "nonbank entry" was discussed, but it was not pressed. However, if small, nonbank credit cards find it difficult to meet the competition of bank cards in the future, the question of nonbank entry into nationwide interchange systems may take on some importance.

Whether credit card operations, especially those under BankAmericard and Interbank, ought to be likened to public utilities has occurred to some observers. Whether this is a proper comparison remains open. To begin with, in some respects the regulation of banking today is much like public utility regulation, except for rate regulation. Aside from usury and similar statutes, the permissible interest charges on loans are not regulated. In addition, there appears to be no legal obligation for card-issuing banks to serve all applicants for service in the sense that such an obligation has developed in the public utility field for water companies, telephone companies, and the like. Banks that have issued credit cards -- including banks in national card interchange systems -- are individual competitive units. The sale of credit may be an indispensable service, but at present it is not monopolized, although we may be moving in the direction of fewer banking institutions. The credit card device, plus computers, may move us faster on that course than in earlier periods, however.

While views on the matter may differ, as indicated above, some might feel that the development and growth of credit card interchange arrangements suggest the advisability of utility-type regulation. For example, interstate bank credit card interchange systems might be made expressly permissible but only under a Federal licensing procedure. The practices of any such system, including those of the card-issuing banks, would be subject to regulatory standards prescribed by the Federal licensing authority, which might be responsible also for prescribing maximum permissible finance charges for card holders and maximum permissible discounts on other costs for merchants and other concerns participating in a card with an interchange arrangement. Regulatory standards could be devised to assure, among other things, the entry of new banks and acceptance of new cardholders on equitable, nondiscriminatory bases.

The theory -- and reality -- of such an approach, of course, would depend on whether the bank credit card interchange arrangements were approaching monopoly proportions. In this posture, the tendency for uniform practices would seem to increase, as might the likelihood of operating techniques not conducive to the public interest. Credit being virtually an indispensable service, and the advantages of interchange arrangements being what they are to the banks, their cardholders, and participating businesses, at least some of the basic features for the application of a utility-type control would seem to be present.

As will be noted, such an approach as outlined generally above ignores the gas and oil cards, the T and E cards, and other cards issued by nonbanks. It will be a long time, if ever, before these cards are displaced by bank cards. In the meantime, the Utility-type control limited to bank card interchange syst might seem unfair and opposed on this ground.

Briefly, however, it seems fair to conclude that, for the time being, and so long as BankAmericard and Interbank operate as they do now, it is unlikely that any antitrust issues will be raised. But, if either of those two systems -- or any other bank credit card plan, for that matter -- should initiate restrictive, anticompetitive arrangements, the antitrust laws could be expected to be invoked. An example of such a restriction would be that used one time by a bank which prohibited any merchant that signed up with that bank's card from signing up also with another credit card issuer. This practice was stopped by a consent decree following an antitrust challenge by the Department of Justice.

Finally, the key lesson is that banking institutions (or any other group) possessing substantial market power must be especially alert not to act oppressively or unreasonably. So far, the existing interchange systems for bank credit cards seem to be meeting this standard of responsible behavior.

Dear Mr. Jackson:

During recent years, there has been much concern on the part of legislators regarding consumer protection. This concern is quite rightly reflected from the concern evidenced by your constituants in all segments of our society.

One of the more important subjects in this field is, of course, consumer credit; an area of our economy that has shown fantastic growth. In 1939 consumer credit outstanding totaled about Seven Billion Dollars. Today, it exceeds 113 Billion Dollars and is still growing.

Existing laws & regulations covering consumer credit are really not adequate to provide the necessary safeguards to consumers , nor are they sufficiently clear, in some respects, to insure complete understanding by the credit industry. One well thought out approach to this problem is the Uniform Consumer Credit Code, drafted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws.

As you know, the Uniform Consumer Credit Code was introduced in the Alaska Senate as Senate Bill 211 in February of 1969. Our Association supports this measure and urges that you give it some study and consideration.

(over please)

We are enclosing a summary booklet on the code which, we hope, will be of aid to you. Additionally, we have prepared a comparison study which compares UCCC with existing Alaska statutes and the Federal Consumer Credit Protection Act of 1968 (Truth In Lending). Copies of this study are available from Association offices upon request.

Very Truly Yours:

DEAN EHRICH
Executive Director

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF COMMISSIONERS ON UNIFORM STATE LAWS
1155 East 60th Street
Chicago, Illinois 60637

The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws is an organization of state appointed officials who are practicing lawyers, judges and law school professors. Customarily the governor of each state appoints three men to serve as Commissioners. The Commissioners serve without compensation. The expenses of the Conference are paid from appropriations made by the states, and when special projects are undertaken, foundations and interested groups often make contributions. The function of the Conference is to draft legislation in areas of the law where uniformity among the states is particularly desirable and offer it to the states for enactment.

THE PROBLEM

Consumer credit is treated under a variety of laws in each state today. Historically, a type of statute that has dominated the growth of consumer credit has been the simple general usury statute. These statutes, originating in this country as early as 1664, set flat 6% and 8% per annum ceilings on the rate of interest that may be charged for loans of money. In the twentieth century these ceiling rates have been unevenly increased in some states so that today the ceiling rates range from 6% to 12% per annum with one state having a 16% ceiling, one state a 21% ceiling and two states none at all. The 6% to 12% rates are below those at which legitimate creditors can extend many kinds of consumer credit. As a result, many exceptions and exemptions from usury laws have been created by courts and legislatures. In most states today general usury statutes cover only a small portion of consumer credit transactions, and this coverage is highly erratic and generally unreasoned.

Exceptions to usury statutes have come from both the courts and the legislatures. The so-called "Time Price" doctrine developed by the courts exempts from general usury statutes all sales credit purchases. This doctrine creates an enormous exception to usury statutes and is recognized in all but two of the states.

State legislatures have recognized the distinction between credit sales and direct loans and have enacted many laws regulating credit sales. Often there is one law regulating credit sales of motor vehicles, and another regulating credit sales of goods other than motor vehicles. Sometimes there are additional laws governing home improvement sales, revolving store charge accounts, and insurance premium financing. Generally these laws are limited to consumer transactions, but occasionally they have broader application. Not infrequently these laws provide different ceilings on rates that can be charged, and express the rate ceilings differently (add-on, discount, U.S. Rule, per cent per month, etc.). Often these laws treat substantially similar aspects of different credit transactions differently where no reason for the difference in treatment exists.

In addition to the exemption from usury laws for sales credit, state legislatures have enacted a number of laws permitting loans to be made at rates in excess of the usury rate. Most common are the Small Loan Laws which require the lender to be licensed and limit both the amount and length of the loan. In addition to the Small Loan Laws, many states have enacted so-called Installment Loan Laws, Industrial Loan Laws and other laws exempting from general usury statutes certain classes of lenders such as commercial banks, credit unions and savings and loan associations or a certain class of transactions such as revolving loan accounts. These laws also frequently set different rules for what are very similar aspects of the various transactions.

Finally, some states have enacted laws dealing with specific aspects of consumer credit transactions such as door-to-door sales cancellation acts, rate disclosure (truth-in-lending) acts and so forth.

Compounding the problem of the numerous laws governing the consumer credit market is the new Federal Truth-in-Lending Act which is effective July 1, 1969. It requires full disclosure of the terms of substantially all consumer credit transactions including, among other things, the rate of the credit service or loan finance charge stated in terms of an annual percentage. This law provides that if a state passes a law which requires substantially similar disclosure, the state law will apply and the control will move back from the federal to the state government.

THE UNIFORM CONSUMER CREDIT CODE — GENERALLY

The Uniform Consumer Credit Code is a balanced consumer protection law. It restructures all laws imposing maximum charges on the cost of money or credit, regulates consumer credit generally and brings substantially all consumer credit transactions under one comprehensive code. In the area of maximum charges and rate ceilings it imposes a single and standard set of maximum charges on substantially all types of consumer credit and, except in the case of extortionate charges, frees substantially all types of business credit from any maximum charge or rate ceiling. It puts all creditors extending consumer credit on substantially an equal footing so far as maximum charges and control of practices are concerned. It stimulates competition by eliminating artificial barriers to entry into the credit granting business and by requiring disclosure of the cost of the credit, both in terms of the dollar amount and in terms of an annual percentage rate. While the Uniform Consumer Credit Code sets maximum ceilings on rates which may be charged in consumer transactions, it relies on competition to fix actual effective rates. It restricts certain practices of creditors which have been shown to be particularly subject to abuse and has broad provisions to eliminate unconscionable conduct.

It is designed to secure for any state enacting it exemption from the Federal Truth-in-Lending Act.

COVERAGE

Generally, the Code applies to consumer credit transactions and excludes business transactions. The basic test is the kind of debtor involved. If the debtor is an individual, some or all of the provisions of the Code apply. If the debtor is an organization, (a corporation, partnership, trust, governmental body or the like), with one minor exception regulatory and maximum rate provisions of the Code do not apply. The non-application of the Code to organizations eliminates the major portion of all business credit from regulatory coverage.

If an individual debtor (sometimes called a sole proprietor) seeks not in excess of $25,000 of credit for a business purpose, the transaction will be covered only by the provisions of the Code relating to maximum rates and charges which can be made. In other words, the sole proprietor of a corner grocery is given maximum rate protection under the Code in transactions up to $25,000 but otherwise the transaction is unregulated.

The major concern of the Code is with consumer credit and except for the provisions on rates and maximum charges having limited applicability to non-consumer transactions, all of the Code's provisions apply only to consumer credit. Consumer credit includes and is limited to credit extended for the personal, family, household or agricultural purpose of the person to whom credit is extended.

Credit extended for agricultural purposes is included in consumer credit, but it is excluded from a number of the substantive provisions found to be unsuited to the particular characteristics of farm financing. Of course, if the debtor is not an individual, regulatory provisions of the Code do not apply.

Credit sales of homes and home mortgages entered into for a consumer purpose are covered by the maximum rate and charge limitations as well as the disclosure requirements of the Code. Transactions in which the rate of credit service or loan finance charge exceeds 10%, calculated as prescribed in the Code, are subject to all of the substantive provisions of the Code.

REGULATION OF PRACTICES

The Code takes three basic approaches to the problem of better enabling the consumer to deal with the professional creditor. First, it requires full disclosure of the cost of credit to the consumer prior to or at the time the transaction is entered into. Second, it makes illegal or severely limits certain specific practices of creditors which have been shown to be subject to abuse. Finally, it has broad provisions for attacking and eliminating unconscionable conduct.

The first approach is the requirement of complete disclosure of the terms of the credit transaction including disclosure of the cost to the debtor both in dollar amounts and in terms of an annual percentage rate. The disclosure provisions are more fully discussed below.

The second approach is to prohibit or greatly limit certain kinds of agreements and practices. In deciding what practices to prohibit or limit, the Commissioners recognized that unless there were very real and corresponding benefits to the consumer, restrictions on rights of creditors could, in fact, hurt consumers because the restrictions might result in higher costs and consequently higher rates throughout the consumer credit market. With this process of evaluating and balancing in mind, the Commissioners sought only to restrict rights and practices in which evidence of serious abuse of consumers was strong.

Among the specific restrictions the Code imposes is the prohibition of negotiable promissory notes in sales credit transactions. Closely related to t' is is the treatment of the buyer's waiving as to an assignee of the consumer's con'ract any defenses he might have against the seller. The Code offers alternative sections, either of which might be enacted. The first alternative prohibits and renders non-effective the buyer's waiving his defenses. The second alternative requires the buyer promptly to inform the assignee of any defenses which arise within three months of the sale and if he fails to do so, the assignee is free from defenses arising during the three month period. Under the present law of most states, once the contract is assigned, the buyer must pay the finance company and try to seek his remedy from the seller. The theory of the Code's provision is that the financing institution is in a better position to guard against the seller pushing shoddy and sub-standard goods or services than the buyer who very likely has only a single isolated transaction with the seller.

Another practice the Code prohibits in sales credit transactions is the seeking of a deficiency judgment after goods have been repossessed if the original cash price of the goods was less than $1,000. In effect, where the cash price is less than $1,000, the Code provides that the creditor must either elect to sue on the contract or repossess the goods; he may not do both. The theory of this sectio is that in transactions in which the cash price is under $1,000, the right to seek a deficiency after repossession is worth little to the legitimate creditor, but it can be used abusively by the unscrupulous creditor.

The Code eliminates in sales credit the practice of the seller's taking a security interest in a houseful of furniture to secure the payment of the price of a single refrigerator or television set. Although the Code does permit taking a security interest in more than the goods sold when debts arising out of other sales are consolidated, it requires payments to be allocated so that the goods are freed from the security interest on a first in first out basis.

The Code restricts balloon payments which often have been used to push a debtor into extending and refinancing the debt. It also prohibits irrevocable assignments of earnings, garnishment proceedings prior to judgment, and confessions of judgment. It sets limits on charges which can be made on default, attorney's fees which can be collected from debtors, and the amount of a debtor's earnings subject to garnishment. It limits small loans to 25 months or 37 months when the annual rate of loan finance charge exceeds 10%. It gives buyers three days to cancel home solicitation sales and prohibits referral sales. It includes provisions on credit life insurance and credit accident and health insurance like those now in force in states which effectively regulate such insurance.

The third approach of the Code toward eliminating harmful practices and enabling consumers to deal more effectively with creditors is contained in provisions which permit courts in proceedings commenced by the Administrator to declare any agreement or part of an agreement unconscionable and unenforceable as a whole or in part. The court is empowered to order the enforcement of the agreement in such a way as to avoid any unconscionable result. Debtors themselves and also the Administrator may bring proceedings to recover excess charges, the Administrator may himself order creditors to cease violating the Code and the Administrator may bring court proceedings to obtain injunctions against violations of the Code and against unconscionable conduct. Varying special civil and criminal penalties are provided for different kinds of violations. Studies have shown that the major part of overreaching and abuse stems from a relatively small percentage of creditors. In total effect the Code sets standards of conduct for all creditors participating in consumer credit and provides strong and effective remedies against creditors committing serious abuses without impairing the rights of legitimate creditors and without seriously raising the general cost of credit to consumers.

DISCLOSURE

The disclosure requirements of the Code are in most cases the same as those in the Federal Truth-in-Lending Act. Where they differ, the Code's provisions are more stringent.

Basically, in a credit sale the seller is required to set forth: 1) what is being sold; 2) the cash price; 3) the down payment; 4) the balance owing; 5) amount payable for registration or certificate of title fees not included in the cash price; 6) the amount of official fees and taxes; 7) a brief description of any insurance provided and, if a separate charge is made, the amount of the charge; 8) in the case of a sale of land the amount and a description of the closing costs; 9) the total amount financed; 10) the dollar amount of the credit service charge; 11) the total unpaid balance; 12) the annual rate of the credit service charge; 13) the payment schedule; 14) the charges to be made in the event of default; and 15) a description of any security interest taken.

The dollar amount of the credit service charge is not required in a land transaction if the rate of credit service charge is under 10%.

Similar disclosure is required in the case of loans, and under somewhat different mechanical requirements, in the case of revolving sale and loan accounts, and in refinancings, consolidations, and deferrals.

The percentage rate which is disclosed must be computed according to what is known as the U.S. Rule. This is the method traditionally employed in first mortgage real estate financing where payments are applied first to accrued interest and then to the reduction of principal.

The kinds of charges which may be excluded from the calculation of the rate to be disclosed are limited. Except for certain closing costs in real estate transactions involving a credit service or loan finance charge not exceeding 10% per year, all extra charges must be included in the credit service or loan finance charge except a defined category called "additional charges". "Additional charges" are official fees and taxes, liability and casualty insurance if the buyer is told that he can choose the insurer, and life, health and accident insurance if such insurance is not a factor in the granting of the credit and the buyer is so told. If insurance charges do not meet these tests, they must be included in the credit service charge or loan finance charge. Other charges of benefit to the debtor apart from the granting of credit may be excluded from the finance charge if the Administrator has approved them.

These exceptions from the credit service and loan finance charge are the same as those in the Federal Truth-in-Lending Act. All other extra charges must be included in the credit service or loan finance charge in calculating the rate.

The theory of the disclosure requirements is that the buyer or borrower will be able to shop for credit just as he shops for other commodities. The dollar cost of having goods or money immediately rather than waiting will be clear to him. The requirements that all creditors state a rate in the same manner (in terms of an annual percentage) will permit the consumer to make meaningful comparisons and choose between alternative sources of credit and get the best deal. Looking at the dollar cost and the rate, the consumer might decide to use savings rather than to incur debt at all.

RATES

The rates in the Code are based on the underlying principle that legislation should not attempt to fix rates in the sense that public utility commissions fix rates for public utilities, but rather that the economic forces of free enterprise and supply and demand should set rates through improved competition within maximum ceilings prescribed in the consumer credit area. In consumer credit, ceilings are imposed in part because they have been imposed frequently in the past and in part because consumers are generally considered not to have equal bargaining power with creditors. On the other hand, with two narrow exceptions, no ceilings are imposed for business credit and any residual ceilings still applicable to business credit under general usury statutes are removed.

In deciding what the rate maximums should be, the Commissioners took into account that raising and lowering maximum rates have the inevitable effect of increasing or decreasing the size of the consumer credit market. High maximums permit more persons to obtain credit from legitimate sources; low maximums decrease the number of persons who may obtain credit. The maximum ceilings provided in the Code are designed to permit most credit-worthy consumers to have access to the consumer credit market.

The basic maximum rate in the Code is 18%. There are higher graduated rates where the amount of the credit is small. 36% per annum is permitted on the amount of the unpaid balance up to $300, 21% on the amount from $300 to $1,000 and 15% on the amount over $1,000, with the composite actual rate under these graduated rates levelling off at 18%. In order to charge rates in excess of 18%, a lender (but not a seller) must either be licensed or a supervised financial organization, e.g., a bank, credit union or the like.

On revolving charge accounts in sales credit, the maximum permitted rate is 2% per month (24% per year) on the amount outstanding up to $500 and 1½% per month (18% per year) on the amount in excess of $500.

LICENSING, FEES AND ADMINISTRATION

Each creditor who is regularly engaged in the business of granting consumer credit is required to notify the Administrator that he is so engaged. In addition, he is required to pay an annual fee based upon the amount of the consumer credit obligations owed to him. This fee is designed to defray all or part of the cost of administering the Act.

In order to make loans at rates in excess of 18%, a lender must first obtain a license from the Administrator. The Administrator is directed to investigate the applicant and grant the license only if he finds that the financial responsibility, character and fitness of the applicant are such as to warrant belief that the business will be conducted fairly.

Banks and other institutions which are supervised by other governmental agencies are not subject to the licensing requirement.

The Administrator has broad powers to investigate, issue orders and go to court to obtain compliance by creditors with the act. His actions, however, are subject to notice, fair hearing and other due process requirements.

Among his other powers, the Administrator is authorized to seek an injunction against unconscionable agreements or conduct.

EFFECT OF CODE ON POWERS OF ORGANIZATIONS

The Code prescribes maximum charges for all creditors extending consumer credit and displaces existing limitations on the powers of creditors based on maximum charges.

In the case of sellers of goods or services, small loan companies, licensed lenders, consumer and sales finance companies, industrial banks and loan companies, and commercial banks and trust companies, the Code displaces existing limitations on their powers based solely on amount or duration of credit.

Except as to maximum charges, the Code does not displace limitations on powers of credit unions, savings banks, savings and loan associations, or other thrift institutions.

Except as to maximum charges, the Code does not displace limitations on powers either of commercial banks or thrift institutions with respect to the amount of a loan to a single borrower, the ratio of a loan to the value of collateral, the duration of a loan secured by an interest in land or other similar restrictions designed to protect deposits.

THE FEDERAL CONSUMER CREDIT PROTECTION ACT (FCCPA)

The Federal Consumer Credit Protection Act [Public Law 90-321, 82 Stat. 146] does not purport to be a comprehensive consumer credit law. It requires disclosure of the terms of a credit transaction and regulates credit advertising (Title I), it makes extortionate extensions of credit illegal (Title II), it restricts the amount of a debtor's earnings subject to garnishment (Title III), and it sets up the National Commission on Consumer Finance which is directed to study the consumer credit industry (Title IV).

Title I of the FCCPA is officially named the "Truth-in-Lending Act". Section 123 of that law directs the Federal Reserve Board to exempt from the disclosure requirements of the Act any class of transactions if the Board determines that under the law of the state the class of transactions is subject to requirements "substantially similar" to those imposed by the "Truth-in-Lending Act" and that there is adequate provision for enforcement.

The Code is designed and intended to have disclosure requirements which meet the "substantially similar" test in order that any state enacting the Code will be exempt from the disclosure requirements of the Federal "Truth-in-Lending Act".

The Federal Reserve Board has not yet issued regulations under the FCCPA. A final ruling that the Code will exempt any state enacting it from the disclosure requirements of the "Truth-in-Lending Act" is being requested in August, 1968.

The Code's provisions on advertising are substantially the same as those in the FCCPA, and the Code's provision on garnishment is more restrictive than that in the FCCPA.

Assuming the Code meets the "substantially similar" and adequate enforcement tests of the FCCPA, the FCCPA would affect only credit advertising and extortionate extensions of credit in any state enacting the Code.

THE UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE'S APPLICATION

The Uniform Commercial Code provides that the rules it sets forth are subject to regulatory legislation particularly in consumer transactions. Thus the Consumer Credit Code will supplement the Commercial Code. The Commercial Code sets the background and its rules will continue to apply to consumer transactions except where the Consumer Credit Code provides different rules for consumer credit transactions.

HON BARRY JACKSON ALASKA STATE HOUSE OF REPRES

POUCH V STATE CAPITOL BLDG JUN 1967

WE WOUL' APPRECIATE YOUR ENTERING THE FOLLOWING TESTIMONY REGARDING HOUSE BILL NUMBER 497 RELATING TO REVOLVING CREDIT PLANS INTO THE MINUTES OF YOUR COMMITTEE HEARING ON FEBRUARY 5, 1970. THIS REPRESENTS THE VIEWS OF THE ALASKA RETAIL ASSOCIATION ON THAT MEASURE.

HB 497 WOULD REQUIRE A SELLER OF GOODS AND SERVICES WHO SELLS INSTRUMENTS TO A BANK AT A DISCOUNT, TO, UPON REQUEST OF A BUYER OF GOODS AND SERVICES, SELL THEM FOR CASH EQUAL TO THE REGULAR PRICE, LESS THE DISCOUNT. FRANKLY, IT IS A LITTLE DIFFICULT TO DETERMINE THE EXACT PURPOSE OF THIS MEASURE. IT WOULD APPEAR THAT THIS BILL WOULD HAVE THE EFFECT OF ATTEMPTING TO CONTROL THE PRICES A SELLER CHARGES. IN ESSENCE, HB 497 IS SAYING TO RETAILERS: "YOU MUST SELL AT A DISCOUNT TO ANYONE REQUESTING IT." THIS COULD LEAD TO SOMEWHAT CHAOTIC MARKET CONDITIONS IF THIS PHILOSOPHY IS CARRIED FAR ENOUGH. ON THE SURFACE, THIS SEEMS TO BE A SOMEWHAT DANGEROUS PIECE OF LEGISLATION IF THIS IS INDEED THE INTENT.

HB 497 IS APPARENTLY AIMED DIRECTLY AT THE BANK CREDIT CARD CONCEPT, WHICH IS PRESENTLY BEING UTILIZED BY APPROXIMATELY 850 SMALL AND MODERATE SIZED RETAILERS THROUGHOUT ALASKA. THE RETAILER, IN CONTRACTING FOR THIS SERVICE, AGREES TO A FEE AMOUNTING TO A SPECIFIED PERCENTAGE OF GROSS SALES MADE UNDER A BANK REVOLVING CREDIT PLAN. THIS FEE IS A DIRECT COST TO THAT RETAILER AND IS REGARDED AS A PART OF HIS COST OF OPERATION. REQUIRING A RETAILER TO GIVE A DISCOUNT BECAUSE HE HAPPENS TO SELL CERTAIN INSTRUMENTS TO A BANK AT A DISCOUNT SEEMS UNUSUALLY

A FORM OF PRICE CONTROL.

A RETAILER'S CASH PRICE IS GEARED TO TWO BASIC THINGS: COST OF OPERATION AND COMPETITION. INCREASES IN VOLUME THROUGH USE OF BANK CREDIT CARDS CAN OFF-SET AT LEAST A PORTION OF THE COST OF THE DISCOUNT PAID TO THE BANK. REQUIRING THAT RETAILER TO GIVE EVERYONE A DISCOUNT COULD SERVE TO DRIVE THAT CASH PRICE UP, WITH A CONSEQUENT LOSS TO ALL CONSUMERS--BOTH THOSE WHO BUY ON A STRICTLY CASH BASIS AND THE CREDIT CUSTOMER.

THE ADVANTAGES OF A BANK CREDIT CARD PLAN TO A RETAILER ARE

(1) QUICK TURN-OVER OF CASH AND

(2) INCREASED BUSINESS THROUGH BEING IN A POSITION TO OFFER HIS CUSTOMERS EXTENDED TERMS; SOMETHING THE AVERAGE SMALL RETAILER IS USUALLY UNABLE TO DO COMPETITIVELY.

THE QUESTION MIGHT ARISE: WHY SHOULD A BANK OBTAIN A PERCENTAGE FEE FROM THE RETAILER AND THEN, ADDITIONALLY, CHARGE THE CONSUMER A MONTHLY FINANCE CHARGE ON TOP OF THIS? THE ANSWER IS READILY APPARENT. EVEN THOUGH THE INSTRUMENTS SOLD TO A BANK ARE DISCOUNTED AND ARE ON A NON-RECOURSE BASIS, THERE ARE STILL HANDLING COSTS TO CONSIDER FROM THE POINT OF VIEW OF THE BANK. WHILE WE DON'T HAVE THE EXACT FIGURES, IT IS OBVIOUS THAT A FAIR PERCENTAGE OF THE DISCOUNT FEE IS USED UP IN THOSE HANDLING COSTS. FROM THE POINT OF VIEW OF THE RETAILER, HE IS ABLE TO FINANCE A PORTION OF HIS ACCOUNTS RECEIVABLE AT WHAT IS, IN THIS DAY AND AGE, A VERY SATISFACTORY RATE. BORROWING DIRECT TO FINANCE HIS OWN RECEIVABLES WOULD COST SUBSTANTIALLY MORE. BECAUSE OF THESE COST FACTORS, WHICH LARGELY WIPE OUT THE FEE PAID TO THE BANK BY THE RETAILER, IT IS NECESSARY AND REASONABLE FOR THE BANK TO CHARGE A FINANCE FEE TO THE CONSUMER-USER OF THE CREDIT CARD PLAN. ADDITIONALLY, LIKE MOST RETAIL CREDIT PLANS, A CUSTOMER MAY PAY IN FULL WITHIN 25 TO 30 DAYS WITHOUT INCURRING ANY FINANCE CHARGE.

TRANSCRIPT OF ORAL DECISION RENDERED IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, FIRST JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
STATE OF ALASKA, AUGUST 28, 1963,
BY JUDGE THOMAS B. STEWART

This time has been fixed for the rendering of a decision in the case of Mellin et al vs. Miller, No. 63-158. Before considering the merits of the case I wish to preface my remarks by noting that the opinion I am about to render is most informal rather than a more precise written opinion that I should have preferred to prepare in this case, but as counsel, who have prepared excellent briefs, well know, the problem of writing a precise statement is one that consumes a great deal of time and in view of the public significance of this case and the desirability of there being a decision at the trial level, without any further delay I have determined that this course is preferable and the purpose of my remarks is mainly to inform both the interested public and the reviewing court, if there should be a review or appeal, of the reasons why I have reached the conclusion that I have.

Upon close examination of all the briefs and in view of the cases cited in the briefs I do not believe there is any significant case authority outside of that that has been provided to me and I, therefore, am going to avoid the citation of cases and the statement of my reasons can be related to the citations that are in the briefs upon anyone wishing to review what I have to say.

The facts of the case I think are set out perhaps most completely in the memorandum submitted on behalf of the plaintiffs. These plaintiffs submitted petitions to the Secretary of State, the defendant Miller that is, requesting that the names of George C. Wallace and Samuel M. Griffin be placed on the November general election ballot, that is November 5, 1968, and that votes for those candidates be counted as votes for the petitioners who seek to be shown as presidential electors in the case. Petitions were signed by over 1700 persons and were in the form prescribed by law for all nominations by petitions, that is no party nominations as titled in the statute. The Secretary accepted the petitions but informed the plaintiffs that he refused to recognize them as legally valid to accomplish their nomination to the office of presidential elector. Upon being advised of the Secretary's action the plaintiffs commenced this litigation in which they request the court to direct the Secretary to do what he has refused to do, that is to recognize their petitions as valid and place the names of the candidates for the national offices whom they support on the general election ballot, or in the alternative, that if the nomination is not permitted by petition, then the law which would be found to be restricted to nominations through political parties receiving 10% of the vote at the last gubernatorial election be found unconstitutional. So the issues of law involved are first, whether the applicable statutes may be reasonably interpreted to permit the selection, the appointment, of these plaintiffs as presidential electors, or if not, whether the applicable statutes are constitutional, specifically under the due process and equal protection provisions of the Alaska Constitution, Sections 1 and 7, Article 1, or the United States Constitution, the Fourteenth Amendment. In procedure in the case before the court on cross motions for summary judgment, both parties have agreed that there are no genuine issues of material fact and the facts are taken as shown by the pleadings on file and by the affidavits submitted in support of them. In my view, the central concern is that there is indeed a serious constitutional problem if the statutory plan can now be held to permit nominations of presidential electors by petition. Without an alternate means of nomination there is no practical way for any new party or group of voters, no matter how substantial, to gain a place on the ballot. I think the seriousness of the constitutional challenge is shown by the Idaho case which is specifically cited in plaintiffs reply memorandum and which was discussed in the oral argument before this court. Even though in this case a different constitutional provision was involved, the challenge to the constitutionality of the statute was to a provision of the Idaho Constitution directly relating to suffrage, and the courts, neither the trial court nor the Supreme Court of Idaho, considered specifically the application of the equal protection clauses of their state Constitution or the federal Constitution. But it seems to me that equal protection would be denied these plaintiffs and the substantial group of voters they represent where the Legislature has fixed a plan for the appointment of presidential electors that provides for all qualified voters of the state to vote on their appointment, which is the plan in effect in Alaska, yet a substantial group cannot vote for candidates of their choice in that system because of the restrictive plan that exists that there is no alternate route for substantial groups to get the names of their preferred national candidates other than that of the two major parties on the general election ballot. So initially, in this case, I take the course of avoiding decision on the constitutional issue which is indeed a serious one, if by any reasonable construction the statutes can be found to permit these names to be placed on the ballot as sought by plaintiffs under the present provisions. In this I follow the principal of the _____ case cited in the briefs and it is reiterated, that is the principal, reiteration of the principal in other cases cited by the plaintiffs. Then I turn to the statutes to examine whether by their construction the constitutional question can be avoided. There are in fact two alternatives exposed, one is nomination by petition and the other would be selection of the presidential electors at the general election through a write in process. In examining first the write in process I would recommend a reading of the analysis given by the trial court in the Idaho case in which it is clearly set out that this is not a practical and reasonable means to accomplish the end. Not only would these voters have to select, have to write in the names of three electors which are uncommon, that is publicly unknown names, but the very process would deny what is available to other voters, that is to cast their vote having confronted before them the names of the candidates for president and vice president. It seems to me that the interpretation problem is at least as complicated if not more so by the use of the write in provisions of our statutes than by use of the petition provisions, and the procedure is, might become, equally unwieldy, or more outside the intent of the legislature to use the write in provisions for this purpose than to use the petition provisions as an alternate route to nominate these presidential electors.

The defendants have set out several bases on which the court should find that petition provisions, which are in Chapter 25 of Title 15, should not be interpreted to allow the nomination of these plaintiffs as presidential electors. They [illegible] that they do not hold an office as the term is used in the statutes. Well, as plaintiffs indicate, the right to nomination by that process refers to candidates, to obtain [illegible] public office or offices, but the rights to [illegible] which refers to candidates, and I believe certainly that these plaintiffs are candidates, not only that, but candidates for office and I see no reason to reach the--to consider the phrase public office. The statute is not cast in those terms. The defendants make substantial argument as to the inconsistency of other provisions of Chapter 25 with the proposition that these plaintiffs can be nominated by (indistinguishable) / as well as by petition. It may very well be that there are inconsistencies but I think a reasonable interpretation of the whole picture is that the Legislature by some oversight or omission would not apply the procedural provisions with the relation to other offices to the office of presidential elector, and the reasonable interpretation of the statute in the circumstance, in the face of the constitutional question, is that the procedural provisions of Chapter 30 which specifically deals with presidential elections ought to be used, reasonably as they are available, for the procedural problems in relation to the placing of names on the ballot, including the use of the candidates for national office, Mr. Wallace and Mr. Griffin, to be reproduced on the ballot, and that votes for them be counted for these petitioners as the electors pledged to support them. I think this answers some of the suggestion of inconsistencies which are to be found only if you rather narrowly confine your view of the statute to Chapter 25, and I think that it is not at all unreasonable or an unfair reading of the statute to relate Chapter 30 to Chapter 25 when you are considering the office of presidential elector, which removes some of the problems of inconsistency. It seems to me further that the inconsistencies are greater with respect to the use of the write in provision which defendants suggests might be an alternative than by using the petition provisions as an alternative to the one that is explicitly set out relative to nomination by political parties. The defendants make an argument that these should be applied here the legal doctrine expressly until the statute amended, that is since the statute speaks expressly on nomination by political party, that any other route must be found beyond legislative intent. As indicated, I think the reasonable interpretation is to read Chapters 25 and 30 together, in which case I think it is not so clear that there is a legislative expression intending to exclude nomination of electors by petition. I find nothing unreasonable in the use of the figure 1000 voters as being the minimum to assure that this group is a significant one, not one that is so insignificant that it would be more expensive, more trouble, more difficult, more awkward that it would be justified to burden the ballot with their names. The defendant argues that 10% of the vote in the preceding general election ought to be used, but interpreting, as I say, Chapters 25 and 30 together, peremptory, as it were, I see no reason why the Legislature would have sought any more signatures for the office of president or vice president than they would have the office of United States senator or United State congressman or for governor as a basis to indicate that there is indeed a substantial group standing for the candidacy of these national officers. Defendant argues that plaintiffs suggest the principal of the case of Hale, Hale vs. Hyde, the Alaska case in which an interpretation of the construction, liberal interpretation of the construction became the purpose as made by the Supreme Court of Alaska even though that case did involve the interpretation of the Constitution and not of a statute, I think the analogy is not an unreasonable one for me to consider in terms anyway whether a reasonable interpretation of this statute permits nomination of presidential electors by petition. In substance, then, I hold that the relief sought by the plaintiffs should be granted. That relief should include the placing of the names of the national candidates whom these plaintiffs' names on the election ballot and that votes for those candidates be counted for these petitioners as presidential electors pledged to support those national candidates. Plaintiffs may submit a form of judgment in accordance therewith.

WILLIAMS ET AL. v. RHODES, GOVERNOR OF OHIO, ET AL.

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF OHIO.

No. 543. Argued October 7, 1968.—Decided October 15, 1968.*

Under the Ohio election laws a new political party seeking ballot position in presidential elections must obtain petitions signed by qualified electors totaling 15% of the number of ballots cast in the last gubernatorial election and must file these petitions early in February of the election year. These requirements and other restrictive statutory provisions virtually preclude a new party's qualifying for ballot position and no provision exists for independent candidates doing so. The Republican and Democratic Parties may retain their ballot positions by polling 10% of the votes in the last gubernatorial election and need not obtain signature petitions. The Ohio American Independent Party (an appellant in No. 543), was formed in January 1968, and during the next six months by securing over 450,000 signatures exceeded the 15% requirement but was denied ballot position because the February deadline had expired. The Socialist Labor Party (an appellant in No. 544), an old party with a small membership, could not meet the 15% requirement. Both Parties brought actions challenging the Ohio election laws as violating the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. A three-judge District Court held those laws unconstitutional and ruled that the Parties were entitled to write-in space but not ballot position. The Parties appealed to this Court. The Independent Party immediately sought interlocutory relief from MR. JUSTICE STEWART, which he granted by order after a hearing at which Ohio represented that it could place the Party's name on the ballot without disrupting the election if there was not a long delay. Several days after that order the Socialist Labor Party sought a stay which he denied because of that Party's failure to move quickly for relief, the State having represented that at that time the granting of relief would disrupt the election. Held:

Re: House Bill No. 782

Dear Tom:

Pursuant to my telephone call to you this past Friday, I wish to confirm that I did get the expected materials and have had them duplicated and accordingly enclose one copy each of the following:

1. Confidential Committee Print No. 1 of Senator Magnuson's bill S. 2236 creating a Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation. This represents the most recent printer version of the bill. However, there was a meeting last week in Washington, D. C., to consider still further amendments, but we do not have any copies. The indication is that the amendments will further reduce the Federal bureaucracy required and further strengthen state regulation.

2. The Nixon Administration's bill S. 3542 establishing a Federal insurance guaranty program under the Federal Insurance Administrator in the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

3. A statement by Senator Norris Cotton, Republican of New Hampshire, when he introduced S. 3542 at the request of the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

4. A Committee statement comparing the Committee redraft of S. 2236 (Confidential Committee Print No. 1) with the Administration bill S. 3542.

I realize the Committee is probably inclined to go along with Director Fritz's recommendation, but I am equally sure that the NAIC policy is based on Senator Magnuson's bill and not on S. 3542.

Sincerely yours,

FEDERAL INSURANCE GUARANTY: A Comparison Between the Magnuson Proposal (S. 2236 revised) and the Administration Proposal (S. 3542)

Form

The Magnuson proposal establishes a Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation that is independent of existing governmental machinery.

The Administration bill creates a Federal Insurance Guaranty Program under the Federal Insurance Administrator in the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Management

The Magnuson proposal vests the management of the Corporation in an Administrator appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate for a term of six years. The Administrator is assisted by an Advisory Committee consisting of consumer representatives, insurance industry spokesmen, and state insurance commissioners. In addition to advising the Administrator, the Committee is given actual power to approve or reject proposed national standards for insurance regulation and liquidation. The Committee must also concur in any decision by the Administrator to revoke guaranty status.

The management of the Program is vested in the Secretary of HUD and the Federal Insurance Administrator who is appointed by the Secretary. An Advisory Committee chaired by the President's Adviser on Consumer Interests is created and given only advisory power.

Financing

The Magnuson proposal provides for the independent financing of the Corporation through the issuance of capital stock and yearly national assessment on companies whose policies are guaranteed under the Act. The Corporation is also authorized to borrow from the Treasury to cover any immediate obligations. Funds generated through national assessments or special state post-insolvency assessments are used to repay the loans and interest. There are certain important ceilings imposed by the Magnuson proposal:

1. Yearly national assessments are limited to one twenty-fifth of 1 per centum of the net direct premiums written. (Currently about $10 million per year or 4 cents per $100 of premium.)

2. The Corporation can spend no more than $7.5 million per year for administrative expenses.

3. National assessments cease when the guaranty fund exceeds one-eighth of 1 per centum of the net direct premiums written (currently about $30 million.)

4. State assessments cannot exceed 1 per centum of the net direct premiums written in any one year.

5. There is an outstanding treasury loan ceiling of $100 million.

The Administration's Federal Insurance Guaranty Program is financed through appropriations that are maintained in a separate fund and through monies received from post-insolvency state assessments and treasury loans. The only ceiling imposed is the 5% ceiling on administrative expense add-on to any post-insolvency assessment Because interest on treasury loans is designated as an administrative expense, the ability to borrow from the treasury could be hampered by the unavailability of appropriations to cover all administrative expenses including interest on loans. In other words, the 5% ceiling, as a practical matter, may prevent the Program director from actually borrowing money to meet the guaranty obligations of the Corporation.

PROTECTION OF CONSUMERS

Prevention of Insolvencies

(1) Improvement of State regulation:

The Magnuson proposal attempts to improve state regulation by providing for the setting of voluntary national standards for regulation, rehabilitation, and liquidation. In so doing, the Corporation is required to pay attention to the Wisconsin Liquidation and Rehabilitation Act which the National Association of Insurance Commissioners has adopted as a model state act. No standards become effective until the Advisory Committee, by majority vote, approves them.

By creating two guaranty statuses, the Magnuson proposal attempts to create incentives for the states to meet the national voluntary standards. A state living up to the national standards is insulated from any and all unwanted Federal intervention. The Corporation performs the guaranty function only upon presentation by the State of the unadjudicated claims. Because insurance companies domiciled in States meeting the national standards are not subject to Federal examination and are granted permanent guaranty status, the Magnuson proposal provides incentives for the domiciliary insurance companies to work with the State supervisory authority and the State legislature in order to meet national standards. An ostensible incentive for improving State insurance regulation is also provided by the possible post-insolvency assessment liability of companies (and therefore their policyholders) doing business in a State where an insolvency occurs.

The Administration relies upon the post-insolvency assessment approach as its only vehicle for improving state regulation. The efficacy of this approach was questioned in hearings on S. 2236 (pages 287 and 298). Would the threat of assessment cause the insurance industry of the State to bring pressure upon the State supervisory authority to do a better job of regulating? Does the ability of the insurance industry to pass most of the assessment cost on to the public reduce the likelihood of strong industry pressure for improved regulation? Would the ten or fifteen cent price increase per policy so incense the public that they would insist that the State supervisory authority do a better job of preventing insolvencies?

If the State post-insolvency assessment approach does provide incentive for improved State regulation, does it provide such strong incentives that no other incentives need be provided?

(2) Monitoring of interstate activities, providing of useful information, and availability of a body of experts --

The Magnuson proposal, by providing for an independent Corporation which is independently financed, insures that the Federal Corporation will assist the State commissioners by providing them with information related to the interstate operations of insurers. It could also provide accurate information about security values and generally serve as an information gathering agency for State regulatory authorities.

The Magnuson proposal would certainly provide State commissioners a much needed expertise.

The National Association of Insurance Commissioners has recognized the need for such services in their Report of the Special Committee on Automobile Insurance Problems at pages 196 and 197:

> (3) Technical Staff Assistance to the States. A third function of the Corporation would be to provide State insurance departments with professional expertise and assistance both before and during an insolvency proceeding. The Corporation would possess knowledgeable consultants from which the individual commissioner could solicit aid if and when desired.
> The State insurance departments would retain their jurisdiction; insolvency proceedings would be handled in the usual way.. However, an insurance company insolvency can be a complicated transaction. It is frequently difficult to find, on a local basis, accountants or lawyers with special expertise in this area. Insolvencies create extra work demands on State insurance departments which they are not always equipped to meet, and liquidation costs are sometimes higher because those handling them are dealing with them for the first time. This also applies to ancillary proceedings. But, with the Corporation available to pull the interstate pieces together for the local insolvency proceedings, greater efficiency and lower costs could result.

> . . . The existence of a competent, well staffed and well financed group of experts in the Corporation, to supplement the insurance department staffs, could be most helpful in efforts to speedily administer criminal and civil justice." (emphasis added.)

The Administration's Program depends upon appropriations for staffing and other administrative activities. The imposition of a 5% add-on to any post insolvency assessment to cover administrative costs (including interest on treasury loans) suggests that the Administration contemplates a rather limited role for the Program staff.

(3) Loans to participating insurers --

Section 8(c) of the Magnuson proposal authorizes the Corporation to advance loans to participating insurers in order to get them back on their feet and prevent their liquidation. This loan authority has enabled the FDIC and FSLIC to keep many banks from becoming insolvent.

The Administration's bill has no comparable provision.

(4) Federal examination of companies domiciled in states not meeting federal standards --

To further aid in the prevention of insolvencies, the Magnuson proposal authorizes the Corporation to examine, when necessary, companies domiciled in states not meeting the voluntary national standards. Such examinations are to be conducted by Federal examiners in cooperation with the State supervisory authority. No federal examination is authorized in those states meeting the national standards.

The Administration proposal has no such provision.

(5) Revocation of guaranty status --

The Magnuson proposal allows the Corporation to revoke the guaranty status of participating insurers in order to put them out of business. The revocation of any insurer domiciled in a State meeting the voluntary national standards can only take place if the State supervisory authority asks the Corporation to revoke an insurer's guaranty status or concurs in such a motion made by the Corporation. The Corporation may revoke the guaranty status of an insurer domiciled in a State not meeting the national standards, but such revocation cannot take place without the concurrence of a majority of the Advisory Committee. A company who continues to do business without guaranty status when it is required to have guaranty status is subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 per day.

The Administration bill has no comparable provision.

Payment of Guaranty

(1) Scope of protection --

The Magnuson proposal requires the Corporation to assume all the insurance company's guaranteed policy obligations, including the obligation to provide legal defense. The Corporation steps into the shoes of the insurer without interferring with the State and performs as if it were the company pursuant to the suggestion of the NAIC Report, supra. The only limitations on the scope of the protection are those imposed by the policy contract provisions themselves.

The Administration's proposal protects the consumer to the extent the State liquidator determines he should be protected. The Program pays the adjudicated claims that the State liquidator files with the Secretary of HUD. In those states having post-insolvency assessment plans, the Secretary will not pay the first $100 of any valid claim. In other words, citizens of states having post-insolvency assessment plans are afforded less protection than those in states without such plans.

(2) When is the consumer protected?

Under the Magnuson proposal the consumer is protected as soon as the insurance company is placed in liquidation (for whatever reason) and ceases to meet its policy obligations. Claimants against companies who are domiciled in States meeting national standards file their claims with the State liquidator who immediately turns them over to the corporation which is required to investigate, examine, adjust, compromise, or settle them as quickly as possible. The Corporation becomes the receiver of companies domiciled in States not meeting the national standards when they are placed in liquidation and cease to meet their policy obligations. It pays valid claims against the company as soon as possible. Under the Magnuson proposal no consumer should go without payment of valid claims for any significant length of time -- certainly no longer than several months from the time the Corporation receives the claim and much less time if the claim is for return of uncarned premium.

Under the Administration's proposal the time of payment is very uncertain. If a State had the Wisconsin Rehabilitation and Liquidation Act and an experienced liquidator, the Administration approach might work as speedily as the Magnuson approach if the borrowing authority under the Administration bill were workable. But only Wisconsin has such a law, even though the National Association of Insurance Commissioners adopted the Wisconsin law as the model rehaibilitation and liquidation law in 1968. The previous model legislation was the New York Uniform Liquidation Act adopted in 1939. To date only twenty-eight states have adopted the 1939 model act.

Under the Administration bill the following must occur before any claimant is paid:

(1) Insurer placed in liquidation.

(2) Insurer adjudicated insolvent.

(3) Private contractual remedies of claimant pursued.

(4) Claim submitted to State liquidator.

(5) Claim investigated, adjusted, compromised or settled by State liquidator with court approval where necessary, or by the insurance industry in the State if the State has a post-insolvency assessment plan.

(6) Claim submitted to the Secretary for payment.

(7) Payment, either before or after periodic assessment, to the State liquidator.

(8) State liquidator pays the claimant.

An adjudication for insolvency alone can take as much as five years.

Of course time factors vary from State to State. But as the NAIC has stated: "It is frequently difficult to find, on a local basis, accountants or lawyers with special expertise in this area." (see supra.) The Administration's proposal does not seem to guarantee "the expeditious compensation of consumers for insured losses arising under policies of property, liability, or surety policies issued in interstate commerce by insurers which become insolvent," even though "expeditious compensation" is a stated purpose of the Administration's bill.

Agreement on principles reflected in the two proposals

1. Federal legislation is needed to guarantee that every citizen, every policyholder, and every claimant is properly and fully compensated for his insured losses. (Hearings at 274)
2. The Federal legislation should provide incentives for improving State regulation. (Hearings at 287)
3. The Federal legislation should not disturb the basic framework of State regulation. (Hearings at 276; see also id. at 190, 200, and 201.)
4. If a State has acted already or decides to act in the future the Federal legislation should not conflict with it but only reinforce and bolster it up. (Hearings at 280)

Possible Disagreement

1. Magnuson's proposal: Voluntary national standards for regulation, rehabilitation, and liquidation do not disturb the basic framework of State regulation. (Hearings at 200-01.)

Administration's view:

2. Federal standards might very well constitute Federal regulation. (Hearings at 276)

S. 3542--INTRODUCTION OF THE FEDERAL INSURANCE GUARANTY ACT

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, at the request of the department involved, I now introduce the administration's proposed Federal Insurance Guaranty Act and ask unanimous consent that it be referred to our Committee on Commerce.

I make this request in view of the fact that on May 23, 1969, a similar measure, S. 2236, was introduced by the distinguished Senator from Washington (Senator Magnuson) for himself and others, which was referred to our Committee on Banking and Currency which subsequently discharged the bill for referral to our Committee on Commerce.

Since that time our Committee on Commerce has held several days of hearings on the bill S. 2236, the last being on February 10 of this year at which time administration witnesses testified in response to the committee's request indicating that it, the administration, would submit its own legislative proposal as an alternative to the bill S. 2236.

Mr. President, this alternative legislative proposal is the one which I now introduce and, as previously noted, request unanimous consent for its referral to our Committee on Commerce.

In making this introduction, I am mindful of the fact that there is considerable concern both within and without Congress with respect to such legislative proposals and the probable impact of such upon the McCarran-Ferguson Insurance Regulation Act which provides in part a congressional declaration that "the continued regulation and taxation by the several States of the business of insurance is in the public interest."

It is my understanding, Mr. President, that the bill which I now introduced is in consonance with this congressional declaration of policy and will do minimum violence to it. Quite frankly, if it were to do otherwise and upset this long-standing Federal/State relationship, then I would be constrained to oppose its enactment. I have been advised, however, that this alternative legislative proposal will serve to meet the particular problem at hand without any such adverse impact, and I would hope that subject to the granting of my unanimous-consent referral to our Committee on Commerce, such legislative proposal will be accorded every consideration along with the bill S. 2236 now pending before that committee.

91ST CONGRESS
2D SESSION

S. 3542

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

MARCH 4, 1970

Mr. COTTON introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Commerce

A BILL

To authorize the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to establish a Federal insurance guaranty program under the Federal Insurance Administrator to protect the American public against losses resulting from the insolvency of insurers, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Insurance Guaranty Act".

PURPOSE

SEC. 2. The purpose of this Act is to provide a national program within the framework of State regulation of the insurance industry, for the expeditious compensation of consumers for insured losses arising under policies of property, liability, or surety insurance issued in interstate commerce by insurers which became insolvent, where the funds readily available from all other sources are insufficient to satisfy the insurer's valid outstanding claims in full.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. (a) When used in this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the term—

(1) "approval of a claim" or "approved claim" means any unpaid claim—

(i) including claims for refunds of unearned premiums, but excluding amounts due any reinsurer, insurer, insurance pool, or underwriting association, as subrogation recoveries or otherwise,

(ii) arising under and within the coverage and limits of insurance policies issued by any insurer adjudged, subsequent to the effective date of this Act, to be insolvent under the laws of its domiciliary State, and

(iii) which has been finally determined administratively or judicially under applicable State law to be valid in a fixed amount;

(2) "certification of an approved claim" or "certified approved claim" means an approved claim (in whole or in part) which the State insurance authority of the domiciliary State of an insolvent insurer certifies to the Secretary (i) is unpaid, and (ii) is not payable under any other policy or contract of insurance or reinsurance, or under any State insolvency or guaranty fund, pool, association, or assessment;

(3) "domiciliary State" means:

(i) the State of incorporation or organization of an insurer organized or incorporated in the United States, or

(ii) the State of entry of an alien insurer;

(4) "Federal Insurance Administrator" means the Federal Insurance Administrator within the Department of Housing and Urban Development, authorized by section 1105 of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 (42 U.S.C. 3533a);

(5) "insolvency" or "insolvent," as applied to an insurer, shall be construed in accordance with the applicable laws of its domiciliary State;

(6) "insurance" means all kinds of direct insurance except life, title, disability; and mortgage guaranty insurance;

(7) "insurance policy" or "policy" means any contract or policy of insurance, including any valid endorsement thereto, delivered or issued for delivery in any State;

(8) "insurer" means any person licensed to engage in the business of insurance under the laws of any State, which issues policies of insurance in interstate commerce or reinsures its policies (in whole or in part) in interstate commerce;

(9) "interstate commerce" means trade or commerce between or among several States or within the District of Columbia;

(10) "net direct premiums written" means gross direct premiums written on insurance policies, less return premiums thereon and dividends paid or credited to policyholders on such direct business, and excluding premiums on contracts between insurers or reinsurers;

(11) "person" means any individual or group of individuals, corporation, partnership, association, or any other organized group of any of the foregoing, and includes State and local governments and agencies thereof;

(12) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development;

(13) "State" or "United States" means the several States, the District of Columbia, the territories and possessions, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands; and

(14) "State insurance authority" means the person having legal responsibility for regulating the business of insurance within a State.

(b) The Secretary is authority to define, by rules and regulations, any technical or trade term, insofar as such definition is not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

GENERAL AUTHORITY

SEC. 4. The Secretary is authorized to establish under the Federal Insurance Administrator, and to carry out under his direct supervision, a national insurance guaranty program in accordance with the provisions of this Act to protect the consumer public from uncompensated losses arising under insurance policies issued by insurers subsequently adjudged to be insolvent under the laws of their domiciliary State.

LISTS OF INSURERS

SEC. 5. Each State insurance authority shall file with the Secretary within sixty days after the effective date of this Act, and on or before August 31 of each calendar year thereafter, a list of all insurers licensed to do business in the State, showing the amounts of net direct premiums written by lines of insurance to which this Act applies in the State by each insurer during the preceding calendar year.

INFORMATION ON INSOLVENCY PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 6. (a) Within ten days after finding any domestic, foreign, or alien insurer insolvent, the State insurance authority making such finding shall so notify the Secretary.

(b) Within ten days after the institution of any proceeding to rehabilitate or liquidate an insurer or which might result in the rehabilitation or liquidation of an insurer, the State insurance authority of the State where such proceeding is instituted shall so notify the Secretary, and shall keep the Secretary currently and fully informed of the progress and outcome of each such proceeding.

NOTIFICATION OF POSSIBLE CLAIMS

SEC. 7. (a) Whenever an insurer is adjudged insolvent and placed in receivership or liquidation by a court of competent jurisdiction, the State insurance authority in its domiciliary State shall promptly determine and notify the Secretary if it appears that all the valid outstanding claims against such insurer cannot be fully and expeditiously paid from its assets and such funds as may be available from other insurers or reinsurers and from insolvency or guaranty funds or associations established under State laws. For the purposes of this Act, it shall be presumed that such claims, arising in any State in which an applicable insolvency or guaranty fund or association established under State law does not exist, cannot be fully and expeditiously paid, but such presumption shall be subject to an explicit contrary determination and certification by the domiciliary State insurance authority.

(b) Whenever the Secretary receives the foregoing notice from the domiciliary State insurance authority that an insurer has been adjudged insolvent and that any outstanding claim may not be fully and expeditiously paid, the Secretary shall promptly notify all other insurers licensed within the domiciliary State of the insolvent insurer of the possibility that he may be required to make guaranty payments under the authority of this Act shall that the insurers so notified may be required to pay assessments to provide the necessary funds.

CERTIFICATION AND PAYMENTS OF CLAIMS

SEC. 8. (a) As soon as he has determined that any approved claims cannot be fully and expeditiously satisfied without recourse to the Secretary, the domiciliary State insurance authority shall certify to the Secretary, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, such approved claims for payment by the Secretary.

(b) Upon receipt from the domiciliary State insurance authority of a list, or of periodic lists, of certified approved claims, the Secretary shall, as promptly as practicable, pay to the appropriate receiver or liquidator in such State sufficient moneys to satisfy in full such certified approved claims: Provided, That with respect to any State where an insolvency or guaranty fund or association has been established pursuant to State law, only that portion of each approved claim shall be paid by the Secretary which is in excess of $100 and is less than $300,000, and is not payable under such State law.

INSURER ASSESSMENTS

SEC. 9. (a) Whenever he is required to make guaranty payments under the authority of this Act to satisfy the certified approved claims of an insolvent insurer, the Secretary shall obtain funds for or reimbursement of such payments by periodically (but not more often than monthly) assessing each other insurer licensed to do business in the domiciliary State of the insolvent insurer for a proportionate share of (1) the total amount of the guaranty payments required, plus (2) up to an additional 5 per centum of such amount to defray his estimated administrative and operating expenses. Such proportionate share for each insurer shall be based upon its relative share of the total net direct premiums written within that State by all insurers in the calendar year prior to the year in which the insolvent insurer was determined to be insolvent: Provided, That in the event the total assessments under any applicable State law and by the Secretary upon any insurer in any State in any calendar year (including any assessment balance from a prior year) exceed 2 per centum of its net direct premiums written in such State in the applicable prior year, the excess over 2 per centum, plus interest as provided herein, may be paid to the Secretary in the immediately succeeding year or years thereafter.

(b) Payments by insurers of such assessments shall be due and payable within thirty days of receipt of notice from the Secretary of the amounts owed. After such thirty-day period, interest shall begin to accrue on any unpaid amounts at a rate determined by the Secretary: Provided, That such rate shall not be less than the sum of (1) a rate determined annually by the Secretary of the Treasury taking into consideration the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity of less than one year, and (2) a fee of 1 per centum per annum.

(c) Within forty-five days after date of notice of assessment, but only after making such payment or the portion thereof due in the current year, any insurer may file a written notice of objection to the Secretary's determination and shall be entitled to a hearing in accordance with the provisions of this Act to determine whether all or a portion of such assessment should be refunded.

SUBROGATION

SEC. 10. (a) The Secretary shall be subrogated to any approved claim which any claimant has against the estate of the insolvent insurer in the amount paid by the Secretary to satisfy such approved claim.

(b) The Secretary shall credit equitably to the assessed insurers of the domiciliary State of an insolvent insurer, and periodically repay to such insurers, subject to appropriate offsets and less any additional expenses incurred in connection with such collections, any amounts which he may recover through his subrogation to claims against the estate of such insolvent insurer.

PENALTIES

SEC. 11. Section 709 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting after the eighth paragraph thereof the following new paragraph:

"Whoever, except with the specific written authorization of the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development or of the Federal Insurance Administrator, uses the words 'Federal Insurance Guaranty', 'Federal Insurance Administration', 'FIA', or any combination or variation of those words or letters alone or with other words or letters as a business name or part of a business name, or publishes, advertises, or represents by any device or symbol or other means reasonably calculated to convey the impression that he or it has a connection with or authorization from, or in any way represents or acts as agent for, or is insured or protected against loss or insolvency by, the Department of Housing and Urban Development or the Federal Insurance Administration, for the purpose of inducing or influencing any person to purchase or with respect to the purchase or retention of insurance; or".

HEARINGS

SEC. 12. (a) All hearings in which an insurer is a principal party shall be held before a hearing examiner appointed by the Secretary in the Federal judicial district for the State in which such insurer is domiciled unless the insurer afforded the hearing consents to another place, and shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code. All hearings shall be public, unless the party afforded the hearing and the State insurance authority jointly request a private hearing to protect the public interest. After such hearing, and within ninety days after the Secretary has notified the insurer that the case has been submitted to him for final decision, the Secretary shall render his decision (which shall include findings of fact upon which his decision is predicated) and shall issue and cause to be served upon each party to the proceeding an order or orders consistent with the provisions of this section. Judicial review of any such order shall be exclusively as provided in subsection (b). Unless a petition for review is timely filed in a court of appeals of the United States, as hereinafter provided in subsection (b), and thereafter until the record in the proceeding has been filed as so provided, the Secretary may at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as he shall deem proper, modify, terminate, or set aside any such order with permission of the court.

(b) Any party to the proceeding may obtain a review of any order served pursuant to this subsection (other than an order issued with the consent of the insurer), by filing in the court of appeals of the United States for the circuit in which the insurer is domiciled, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, within thirty days after the date of service of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Secretary be modified, terminated, or set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith transmitted by the clerk of the court to the Secretary, and thereupon the Secretary shall file in the court the record in the proceeding, as provided in section 2112, title 28, United States Code. Upon the filing of such petition, such court shall have jurisdiction, which upon the filing of the record shall, except as provided in the last sentence of subsection (a), be exclusive to affirm, modify, terminate, or set aside, in whole or in part, the order of the Secretary. Review of such proceedings shall be had as provided in chapter 7 of title 5, United States Code. The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari as provided in section 1254, title 28, United States Code.

(c) The Secretary may, in his discretion, petition the court of appeals of the United States for the circuit in which the insurer is domiciled, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, for the enforcement of any final order issued by the Secretary under this section, and such court shall have jurisdiction and power to order and require compliance therewith.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE

SEC. 13. (a) There is hereby established a Federal Insurance Guaranty Advisory Committee composed of not less than seven, nor more than eleven, members to be appointed by the Secretary from among representatives of the Federal and State governments, including State insurance authorities, the insurance industry, and consumers. The Special Assistant to the President for Consumer Affairs shall be a member of such Committee and shall serve as Chairman. The Committee shall elect a Vice Chairman of the Committee.

(b) Each member of the Committee, other than the Chairman, shall serve for a term of two years or until his successor has been appointed, except that no person who is appointed while a full-time employee of a State or the Federal Government shall serve in such position after he ceases to be so employed unless he is reappointed. Any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of that term.

(c) The Chairman shall preside at all meetings, and the Vice Chairman shall preside in the absence or disability of the Chairman. The Committee shall meet at the call of the Chairman, or at the request of the Secretary, but not less often than four times a year.

(d) The Committee shall advise and make recommendations to the Secretary with respect to obtaining the cooperation of insurers, industry groups, and Federal and State agencies in the insurance guaranty program; improving the effectiveness of the insurance guaranty program; and on such general policy matters as may be appropriate.

(e) The members of the Committee shall not, by reason of such membership, be deemed to be employees of the United States, and such members, except those who are regular full-time employees of the Government, shall receive for their services as members per diem equivalent to the rate for grade GS–18 of the General Schedule under section 5332, title 5, United States Code, when engaged in the performance of their duties, and each member of the Committee shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by section 5703, title 5, United States Code, for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

TREASURY LOANS

SEC. 14. (a) As authorized in appropriation Acts, and such authorizations may be without fiscal year limitation, the Secretary may borrow from the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to lend to the Secretary, such funds as in the judgment of the Secretary are required for the purposes of this Act. Such loans shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury taking into consideration the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the average maturities of such loans. For such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds of the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, are extended to include such loans. Any such loan shall be used by the Secretary solely in carrying out his functions with respect to insurance. All loans and repayments under this section shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.

(b) Interest charged to the Secretary shall be an administrative expense of the Secretary and interest payments received by the Secretary shall be regarded as income to be used by the Secretary for operating and administrative expenses.

FINANCING, BUDGET, AND AUDIT PROVISIONS

SEC. 15. (a) Funds are hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time in such amounts as are necessary to finance the establishment, maintenance, and operation of the Federal insurance guaranty program.

(b) Amounts appropriated under the above authority, together with the proceeds of loans advanced from the Treasury Department, payments made by insurers upon assessment by the Secretary, and any other receipts of the program shall be administered as a separate fund in the Treasury of the United States.

(c) The Secretary shall prepare annually and submit a budget program as provided for wholly owned Government corporations by title I of the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 847).

(d) The Secretary shall maintain an integral set of accounts which shall be audited annually by the General Accounting Office in accordance with the principles and procedures applicable to commercial transactions as provided by title I of the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 850–851).

GENERAL POWERS

SEC. 16. In the performance of, and with respect to, the functions, powers, and duties vested in him by the Act, the Secretary, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, may—

(a) sue or be sued;

(b) without regard to sections 3648 and 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (31 U.S.C. 529 and 41 U.S.C. 5), and section 322 of the Act of June 30, 1932 (47 Stat. 412, as amended (40 U.S.C. 278a)), enter into and perform contracts, leases, cooperative agreements, or other transactions, on such terms as he may deem appropriate, with any agency or instrumentality of the United States, or with any State or agency or political subdivision thereof, or with any person, firm, association, or corporation and consent to modification thereof, and make advance or progress payments in connection therewith;

(c) without regard to sections 3648 and 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (31 U.S.C. 529 and 41 U.S.C. 5), and section 322 of the Act of June 30, 1932 (47 Stat. 412, as amended (40 U.S.C. 278a)), by purchase, lease, or donation acquire such real and personal property and any interest therein, make advance or progress payments in connection therewith, and hold, use, maintain, insure against loss, sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of such real and personal property as the Secretary deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act;

(d) issue such rules and regulations as he deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act;

(e) enter into such contracts, agreements, treaties, or other arrangements without regard to section 3679 (a) of the Revised Statutes of the United States (31 U.S.C. 655 (a)) as he may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of the Act; and

(f) exercise all powers specifically granted by the provisions of this Act and such incidental powers as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

A BILL

To create a Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation to protect the American public against certain insurance company insolvencies.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation Act".

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. As used in this Act—

(1) The term "insurer" means any enterprise engaged in the business of issuing property, casualty, or surety insurance policies in interstate commerce or engaged in the business of issuing property, casualty, or surety policies which are reinsured (in whole or in part) in interstate commerce.

(2) The term "local insurer" means any enterprise engaged in the business of issuing property, casualty, or surety insurance policies solely within one State.

(3) The term "participating insurer" means any enterprise whose property, casualty, or surety insurance policies are guaranteed under this Act.

(4) The term "policy" means (a) any contract of property, casualty, or surety insurance, including any endorsements thereto and without regard to the nature or form of the contract or endorsements, insuring against legal liability and/or loss contingencies, other than those provided for by life, accident and health, or title insurance; (b) any agreement written by the insurer or reinsurer in favor of a self-insurer; or (c) any agreement written by an insurer or reinsurer in favor of another insurer assuming 100 per centum of all obligations of the ceding insurer.

(5) The term "policy required to be guaranteed" means any property, casualty, or surety policy issued or delivered in the United States by any insurer (or its agent) to any person (including any individual, partnership, association, or corporation).

(6) The term "net direct premiums written" means direct gross premiums written on property, casualty, and surety insurance policies required to be guaranteed under this Act less return premiums thereon and dividends paid to policyholders on such direct business.

(7) The term "policyholder claim" means (a) a claim of a policyholder or insured or his assignee within the coverage of a policy, arising out of an occurrence wherein such policyholder or insured suffered damage or is subject to liability for damages within the coverage of the policy, or (b) a claim by a policyholder or insured or his assignee for return premium arising out of the termination of the policy by reason of insolvency.

(8) The term "Administrator" means the Administrator of the Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation.

(9) The term "Fund" means the Federal Insurance Guaranty Fund as described in section 9 (b).

(10) The term "interstate commerce" means trade or commerce among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any possession of the United States and any State or other possession, or within the District of Columbia.

(11) The term "State" means any State, any possession of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

(12) The term "State supervisory authority" means the agency or individual of the State of domicile of the insurer having responsibility for regulating the business of insurance within that State: Provided, That in the case of an insurer organized under the laws of a foreign country that has no domicile in the United States the "State supervisory authority" means the agency or individual of the State in which policies required to be guaranteed are primarily issued or delivered.

CREATION OF CORPORATION

SEC. 3. There is hereby created a Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation (hereinafter referred to as the "Corporation") which shall guarantee, as hereinafter provided, the contractual performance of participating insurers and which, in connection therewith, shall have the powers hereinafter granted.

MANAGEMENT OF CORPORATION

SEC. 4. (a) ADMINISTRATOR.—The management of the Corporation shall be vested in an Administrator appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Administrator shall hold office for a term of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the person whom he shall succeed: Provided, however, That upon the expiration of his term of office the Administrator shall continue to serve until his successor shall have been appointed and shall have qualified. The Administrator shall be ineligible during the time he is in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any participating insurer; and he shall not be an officer or director of any participating insurer or hold stock in any participating insurer; and before entering upon his duties as Administrator he shall certify under oath that he has complied with this requirement and file such certification with the Secretary of the Corporation.

(b) (1) There is hereby established an Advisory Committee consisting of eleven members appointed by the Administrator. Of the members of the Committee, one shall be the Special Assistant to the President on Consumer Affairs, four shall be selected from among representatives of the private insurance industry (including one representative of the reinsurance industry), four shall be representatives of State insurance authorities, and two shall be consumer representatives of the general public.

(2) The Administrator shall designate a Chairman and a Vice Chairman of the Committee.

(3) Each member shall serve for a term of two years or until his successor has been appointed, except that no person who is appointed while a full-time employee of a State or the Federal Government shall serve in such position after he ceases to be so employed, unless he is reappointed.

(4) Any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of that term.

(5) The Chairman shall preside at all meetings, and the Vice Chairman shall preside in the absence or disability of the Chairman. In the absence of both the Chairman and Vice Chairman, the Administrator may appoint any member to act as Chairman pro tempore. The Committee shall meet at such times and places as it or the Administrator may fix and determine, but shall hold at least four regularly scheduled meetings a year. Special meetings may be held at the call of the Chairman or any three members of the Committee, or at the call of the Administrator. A majority of the members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

(6) The Committee shall review general policies of the Corporation and advise the Administrator with respect thereto, assist in obtaining the cooperation of insurers, industry groups, and Federal and State agencies, consult with and make recommendations to the Administrator with respect to carrying out the purposes of this Act, and perform such other functions as the Administrator may, from time to time, assign. The written reports and recommendations of the Committee shall be made available by the Administrator to the public.

(7) The members of the Committee shall not, by reason of such membership, be deemed to be employees of the United States, and such members, except the one who is a regular full-time employee of the Government, shall receive for their services, as members, the per diem equivalent to the rate for grade GS–18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, when engaged in the performance of their duties, and each member of the Committee shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by section 5703 of such title for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

INCORPORATION; POWERS

SEC. 5. (a) Upon the date of enactment of this Act, the Corporation shall become a body corporate and shall be an instrumentality of the United States, and as such shall have power—

(1) to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal;

(2) to have succession until dissolved by an Act of Congress;

(3) to make contracts, and execute all instruments necessary and appropriate in the exercise of its powers;

(4) to sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of law or equity, State or Federal. All suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity to which the Corporation shall be a party shall be deemed to arise under the laws of the United States, and the United States district courts shall have original jurisdiction thereof without regard to the amount of controversy; and the Corporation may, without bond or security, remove any such action, suit, or proceeding from a State court to the United States district court for the district or division embracing the place where the same is pending by following any procedure for removal now or hereafter in effect. No attachment or execution shall be issued against the Corporation or its property before final judgment in any suit, action, or proceeding in any State, county, municipal, or United States court. The Administrator shall designate an agent upon whom service of process may be made in any State, territory, or jurisdiction in which any participating insurer does business;

(5) to appoint through its Administrator such officers, employees, attorneys, agents, adjusters, examiners, and other persons as may be necessary for the performance of its duties, to define their duties, fix their compensation, require bonds of them and fix the penalty thereof, and to dismiss at pleasure such officers or employees. Nothing in this chapter or any other Act shall be construed to prevent the appointment and compensation as an officer or employee of the Corporation of any officer or employee of the United States in any board, commission, independent establishment, or executive department thereof;

(6) to prescribe through its Administrator bylaws not inconsistent with law, regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed;

(7) to exercise by its Administrator, or duly authorized officers or agents, all powers specifically granted by the provisions of this Act, and such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry out the powers so granted;

(8) to make examinations of and to require information and reports from any insurer or local insurer making application for guaranty status in accord with subsection (f) of section 6 of this Act; and

(9) to prescribe by its Administrator such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

(b) No individual, association, partnership, or corporation, other than the Corporation, shall hereafter use the words "Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation" or any combination of such words, as the name or part thereof under which he or it shall do business. Any violation of this subsection shall be punishable by a fine of not exceeding $1,000 for each day during which such violation is committed.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 6. (a) The Administrator shall administer the affairs of the Corporation fairly and impartially and without discrimination. The Administrator shall determine and prescribe the manner in which its obligations shall be incurred and its expenses allowed and paid within the limitations imposed by this Act. The Corporation shall be entitled to the use of the United States mails in the same manner as the executive departments of the Government and, with the consent of the head of any department or agency of the Federal Government, or of any State government, may avail itself of the use of information, services, and facilities thereof in carrying out the provisions of this Act.

(b) GUARANTY STATUSES.—Any insurer or local insurer issuing policies guaranteed under this Act shall be placed in one of two guaranty statuses characterized as either "temporary guaranty status" or "permanent status." Any participating insurer shall inform the purchaser prior to purchase of its guaranty status and shall prominently display its guaranty status on each and every guaranteed policy it issues in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Corporation.

(c) APPLICATION FOR GUARANTY STATUS.—Each insurer shall, and each local insurer may, make application to the Corporation for guaranty status under this Act. Such application shall be in such form and contain such information as the Corporation shall by regulation prescribe.

(d) APPROVAL OF APPLICATION AND ASSIGNMENT OF GUARANTY STATUS.—

(1) Any insurer or local insurer making application to the Corporation in the prescribed manner shall be granted temporary guaranty status if that application is certified by the State supervisory authority of the applicant. Such certification shall state that the applicant is conducting its business in a sound and solvent manner and, in determining whether such certification shall be made, the State supervisory authority shall give consideration, along with such other factors as it may deem necessary and appropriate, to the applicant's capital and surplus, reasonableness of operational expenses, premium writings are related to surplus, adequacy of loss and expense reserves, reinsurance, investment portfolio, and managerial qualifications.

(2) Any insurer or local insurer making application to the Corporation in the prescribed manner shall be granted permanent guaranty status if that application is certified by the State supervisory authority in the domiciliary State of the applicant and if that State supervisory authority has met certain national insurance regulation standards established by the Corporation in accordance with the provisions of this Act: Provided, That any such State supervisory authority can request that any insurer be retained on temporary status.

(e) Establishment of standards.—The Corporation shall establish by regulation, after opportunity for hearing, standards for insurance regulation that must be met by a State supervisory authority before an insurer can be granted permanent guaranty status in the Corporation. No such standards shall become effective until approved by a majority of the Advisory Committee: Provided, That in promulgating standards for State insurance regulation the Corporation shall incorporate as part of its national standards, insofar as appropriate, the standards for regulation, rehabilitation, and liquidation embodied in chapter 89, Wisconsin Session Laws of 1967.

(f) Corporation examination of participating insurers assigned temporary status.—

(1) The Corporation, through appointed examiners, shall have the power to examine any insurer or local insurer whose policies are temporarily guaranteed under this Act, whenever in the judgment of the Corporation such examination is necessary. In making necessary examinations of such participating insurers, the Corporation shall have the power to make examinations as if it were a State supervisory authority complying with national standards.

(2) All examiners appointed by the Corporation shall cooperate as far as practicable with the appropriate State supervisory authorities in conducting any necessary examinations under this Act. Copies of reports of examinations by examiners appointed by this subsection shall be furnished by the Corporation to the appropriate State supervisory authorities which shall be afforded the opportunity to comment thereon.

(g) Reports to the Corporation.—Each participating insurer shall make to the Corporation reports of condition which shall be in such form, at such time, and shall contain such information as the Administrator may require. The Administrator may require reports of condition to be published in such manner, not inconsistent with any applicable law, as it may direct. Every participating insurer which fails to make or publish any such report within ten days of its due date shall be subject to a penalty of not more than $1,000 for each day of such failure, which penalty shall be recoverable by the Corporation for its use.

(h) Revocation of guaranty status.—

(i) Any participating insurer who has attained permanent guaranty status may have its guaranty status revoked if its State supervisory authority so recommends or if the State supervisory authority concurs in a motion of revocation made by the Corporation. The Corporation shall give any participating insurer who has attained permanent guaranty status thirty days written notice of intention to terminate its guaranty status and opportunity to correct the deficiencies of its operation which are stated in that notice as grounds for termination. Any participating insurer, prior to termination, shall upon request be granted an opportunity for a hearing which shall be conducted in accord with the provisions hereinafter provided.

(2) Any participating insurer who has been granted only temporary guaranty status may have its guaranty status revoked whenever the Administrator, with the concurrence of a majority of the Advisory Committee, shall find that such participating insurer or its directors or officers have engaged or are engaging in unsafe or unsound practices in conducting the business of the insurer, the insurer is in an unsafe or unsound condition to continue operations as a participating insurer, or the insurer has violated any provisions of this Act or any rule, regulation, or order issued pursuant to this Act. Prior to revocation the Administrator shall give the insurer and the State supervisory authority a statement with respect to such practices or violations for the purpose of securing the correction thereof. Unless correction shall be made within one hundred and twenty days from receipt of such statement, or such shorter period as may be fixed by the Corporation (but in any event not less than twenty days) in any case where the Administrator in his discretion has determined that the insurance risk of the Corporation is unduly jeopardized, or unless within such time the Corporation shall have received acceptable assurances that such correction will be made within a time and in a manner satisfactory to the Corporation, or in the event such assurances are submitted to and accepted by the Corporation but are not carried out in accordance with their terms, the Administrator, if he shall determine to proceed further, shall give to the insurer not less than thirty days' written notice of intention to terminate its guaranteed status. Such notice shall contain a statement of the facts constituting the alleged violation or unsafe or unsound practice or condition and shall fix a time and place for a hearing before the Administrator or before a person, designated by him to conduct such hearing, at which evidence may be produced, and upon such evidence the Administrator shall make written findings which shall be conclusive, subject to right of review as hereinafter provided for. If the Administrator shall find that any unsafe or unsound practice or condition or violation specified in such statement has been established and has not been corrected within the time above prescribed in which to make such corrections, the Administrator may terminate guaranteed status of the insurer on a date subsequent to such finding and to the expiration of the time specified in such notice of intention. Unless the insurer shall appear at the hearing by a duly authorized representative, it shall be deemed to have consented to the termination of its guaranteed status and termination of such status thereupon may be ordered. Any insurer whose guaranteed status has been terminated by order of the Administrator under this subsection shall have the right of judicial review of such order only to the same extent as provided for the review of orders under subsection (i) of this section. The Corporation may publish notice of such termination and the insurer shall give notice of such termination to each of its policyholders at his last address of record on the books of the insurer, in such manner and at such time as the Administrator may find to be necessary and may order for the protection of policyholders. In the event of failure to give the notice to policyholders as herein provided, the Corporation is authorized to give such notice. An order terminating the guaranteed status of any participating insurer shall not affect any guaranteed policy issued by such insurer prior to the date on which the order was issued, but shall be effective with respect to (1) the renewal of such policy, and (2) any property, casualty, or surety insurance policy thereafter issued by such insurer.

(i) Hearings and judicial review.—

(1) Any hearings provided for in this Act shall be held in the Federal judicial district or in the territory in which the principal officer of the insurer is located unless the party afforded the hearing consents to another place, and shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code. Such hearing shall be public, unless the Corporation, in its discretion, after fully considering the views of the party afforded the hearing, determines that a private hearing is necessary to protect the public interest. After such hearing, and within ninety days after the Corporation has notified the parties that the case has been submitted to it for final decision, the Corporation shall render its decision (which shall include findings of fact upon which its decision is predicated) and shall issue and cause to be served upon each party to the proceeding an order or orders consistent with the provisions of this section. Judicial review of any such order shall be exclusively as provided in this subsection. Unless a petition for review is timely filed in a court of appeals of the United States, as hereinafter provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, and thereafter until the record in the proceeding has been filed as so provided, the Corporation may at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify, terminate, or set aside any such order. Upon such filing of the record, the Corporation may modify, terminate, or set aside any such order with permission of the court.

(2) Any party to the proceeding may obtain a review of any order by filing in the court of appeals of the United States for the circuit in which the principal office of the insurer is located, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, within thirty days after the date of service of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Corporation be modified or set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith transmitted by the clerk of the court to the Corporation, and thereupon the Corporation shall file in the court the record in the proceeding, as provided in section 2112 of title 28, United States Code. Upon the filing of such petition, such court shall have jurisdiction, which upon the filing of the record shall, except as provided in the last sentence of said paragraph (1), be exclusive, to affirm, modify, or set aside, in whole or in part, the order of the Corporation. Review of such proceedings shall be had as provided in chapter 7 of title 5, United States Code. The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari as provided in section 1254 of title 28 of the United States Code.

(3) The commencement of proceedings for judicial review under paragraph (2) of this subsection shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of any order issued by the Corporation.

PENALTIES

SEC. 7. (a) Any insurer (other than a local insurer) issuing any property, casualty, or surety insurance policy which is required to be but is not guaranteed under this Act shall forfeit to the United States a sum of not more than $1,000 for each and every day that such policy is in effect and is not guaranteed under this Act. Such forfeiture shall be payable to the Corporation for its use. The Corporation is authorized to collect any unsatisfied forfeiture claim from the directors and officers of the Corporation individually. This subsection shall take effect upon the expiration of one year after the effective date of this Act.

(b) Whoever falsely advertises or otherwise misrepresents by any device whatsoever that any property, casualty, or surety insurance policy is guaranteed by the Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation, or by the Government of the United States, or by any instrumentality thereof, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

PAYMENT OF GUARANTY

SEC. 8. (a) Participating insurers assigned permanent guaranty status.—Whenever any such insurer is placed in liquidation, the Corporation shall pay all justified loss claims, unearned premium and small loss claims, judgments, interest thereon, including the first $50 of such claims.

(1) The liquidator appointed by the State supervisory authority will present such claims to the Corporation which is authorized to investigate, examine, adjust, compromise, or settle any such claim.

(2) The Corporation shall investigate, examine, adjust, compromise, or settle such claims as quickly as possible in order to provide the public the insurance protection that would have been available but for the liquidation.

( ) The Corporation shall present the liquidator with a complete report of the disposition of such claims and [illegible] by the Corporation.

( ) The Corporation is authorized to defend any action pending or brought against the policyholder or the insured for an insurable event occurring before or fifteen days after the date of issuance of the liquidation order.

(5) The Corporation shall be entitled to any valid claim against the liquidator up to an amount equal to the liabilities of such insurer paid by the Corporation. Payment of such claim shall follow the normal order of distribution of the liquidation laws of the State.

(b) Participating insurers assigned temporary guaranty status—

(1) The Corporation shall assume and perform all the obligations of a participating insurer under policies which are guaranteed under this Act, if such insurer is placed in liquidation and cannot perform its insurance function by paying valid claims of policyholders and insureds or their claimants or providing contracted for legal services of policyholders and insureds. In such a situation the receiver or liquidator shall make all books and records (including claim files) available to the Corporation; and the Corporation shall file forthwith a certificate of assumption with the court having jurisdiction over such insurer.

(2) Upon the filing of a certificate of assumption, all proceedings pending in any court against the insured or the insurer arising out of an occurrence within the coverage of a policy guaranteed under this title shall be stayed automatically for a period of thirty days.

(3) The Corporation shall be subject to the same obligations, liabilities, terms, conditions, and waivers of the insurer and shall have available any defense or defenses (including that of policy limits) which would be available to the insurer.

(4) The Corporation is authorized to investigate, examine, adjust, compromise, or settle any claim pending against the insured or the insurer on or after the date of the filing of a certificate of assumption. The Corporation is authorized to defend any action pending or brought against the policyholder or the insured on or after the date of the filing of such certificate.

(5) The Corporation shall be entitled to valid claim against the insurer, or its liquidator, rehabilitator, conservator, receiver, or trustee in bankruptcy, in an amount equal to the liabilities of such insurer paid from the Fund.

(c) When the Corporation has determined that a participating insurer is in danger of becoming insolvent, in order to prevent such insolvency the Corporation, in the discretion of the Administrator, is authorized to make loans to such insurer upon such terms and conditions as the Administrator, in consultation with the State supervisory authority, may prescribe.

(d) Any person (including any individual, partnership, association, or corporation) having a claim against his insurer under any insolvency protection provision contained in his insurance policy, which claim arises out of the insolvency of a participating insurer, may file a claim with the liquidator or Corporation for the total amount of the alleged loss without first proceeding against the insurer. If any person having a claim against his insurer under any insolvency protection provision contained in his insurance policy first proceeds against the liquidator or the Corporation, the Corporation is subrogated to the rights of that person against his insurer. If any person first proceeds against his insurer, any valid claim against the liquidator or Corporation will be reduced by the amount recovered from his insurer under any insolvency protection provision contained in his insurance policy.

(e) When a participating insurer who has issued assessable policies is liquidated, the Corporation shall exercise discretion when claiming against the assets of the liquidated insurer in order to avoid, so far as possible, the imposition of unreasonable assessments on policyholders who were unaware of the assessment exposure.

FINANCING

SEC. 9. (a) CAPITAL STOCK.—The Corporation shall have a capital stock of $10,000,000 which shall be divided into shares of $1,000 each. The total amount of such capital stock shall be subscribed to by the Secretary of the Treasury. For the purpose of making payments for such stock the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds of the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, and the purpose for which securities may be issued under such Act are extended to include such purchases. The Corporation shall make annual payments to the Secretary of the Treasury as interest on the amounts advanced to the Corporation on stock subscription, from the time of such advance until the amounts thereof are repaid, at a rate determined annually by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States.

(b) GUARANTY FUND.—

(1) Funds obtained by the Corporation from the sale of its capital stock, as provided in subsection (a) of this section, and from guaranty fees collected pursuant to subsection (c) of this section shall be deposited in the Guaranty Fund which is hereby established. The Fund shall be held by the Corporation and used by it for carrying out its guaranty functions under this Act, and for operating expenses arising in connection therewith not to exceed $7,500,000 per year.

(2) Whenever after retirement of the outstanding Treasury shares issued pursuant to subsection (a) of this section the net asset value of the Fund exceeds one-eighth of 1 per centum of the annual net direct premiums written by all participating insurers, the Corporation shall waive the requirements for fees as herein stated: Provided, That such requirement shall be reinstated whenever the net asset value of such Fund is less than one-eighth of 1 per centum of the annual net direct written premiums written by all participating insurers: Provided further, That no distribution or rebate shall be made by reason of the fact that the total amount in fees collected by the Corporation at any time exceeds one-eighth of 1 per centum of such annual direct written premiums. In determining net asset value for the purposes of this paragraph, the Board shall include estimated liabilities that may be chargeable to such Fund.

(3) The Corporation shall retire as rapidly as practicable, having due regard to the need to maintain at all times the solvency of the Fund, the capital stock of the Corporation which is held by the Treasury.

(4) In the event that the Congress should repeal this Act, any moneys remaining in such Fund at that time, after redemption of any outstanding capital stock, repayment of any outstanding loans from the Treasury under subsection (c) of this section and discharge of all expenses and obligations under this Act, shall be returned to the participating insurers pro rata in accordance with the guaranty fees they have paid into the Fund.

(5) In the event that the Congress should reduce the size of the Fund specified in subsection (b) of this section, any excess in the Fund above the new statutory limit shall be returned to the participating insurers pro rata in accordance with the guaranty fees they have paid into the Fund.

(c) Assessments.—

(1) National assessments —

(i) Each calendar year following the year in which the application of a participating insurer was certified, such participating insurer shall pay to the Corporation at guaranty fee. This fee, which shall be equal to one twenty-fifth of 1 per centum of the net direct premiums written by the participating insurer during the year, shall be assessed semiannually, based on net direct premiums written during the periods January 1 through June 30 and July 1 through December 31.

(ii) On or before the last day of the first month following each of the above-mentioned semiannual periods, each participating insurer shall file with the Corporation a certified statement showing the net direct premiums written by such insurer during that period. In the event that accurate information is not available at that time, an estimate may be filed: Provided, however, That a final certified statement must be filed not later than sixty days from the last day of the reporting period.

(iii) The certified statements required to be filed with the Corporation under subparagraph (ii) of this paragraph shall be in such form and set forth such supporting information as the Administrator shall prescribe and shall be certified by the president of the insurer or any other officer designated by its board of directors to be, to the best of his knowledge and belief, true, correct, and complete and in accordance with this Act and regulations issued thereunder. The assessment payments required from participating insurers under subparagraph (i) of this paragraph shall be made in such manner and at such time or times as the Administrator shall prescribe, provided the time or times so prescribed shall not be later than sixty days after filing the certified statement setting forth the amount of assessment.

(iv) Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, the Administrator shall prescribe all needful rules and regulations for the enforcement of this subsection. The Administrator may limit the retroactive effect, if any, of any of its rules or regulations.

(v) The Corporation may (1) refund to a participating insurer any payment of assessment in excess of the amount due to the Corporation, or (2) credit such excess toward the payment of the assessment next becoming due from such insurer and upon succeeding assessments until the credit is exhausted.

(vi) Any participating insurer which fails to make any report of condition under subsection (g) of section 6 of this Act or to file any certified statement required to be filed by it in connection with determining the amount of any assessment payable by the insurer to the Corporation may be compelled to make such report or file such statement by mandatory injunction or other appropriate remedy in a suit brought for such purpose by the Corporation against the insurer and any officer or officers thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in the district or territory in which such insurer is located.

(vii) The Corporation, in a suit brought at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be entitled to recover from any participating insurer the amount of any unpaid assessment lawfully payable by such insurer to the Corporation, whether or not such insurer shall have made any such report of condition under subsection (g) of section 6 of this Act or filed any such certified statement and whether or not suit shall have been brought to compel the insurer to make any such report or file any such statement. No action or proceeding shall be brought for the recovery of any assessment due to the Corporation, or for the recovery of any amount paid to the Corporation in excess of the amount due to it, unless such action or proceeding shall have been brought within five years after the right accrued for which the claim is made, except where the participating insurer has made or filed with the Corporation a false or fraudulent certified statement with the intent to evade, in whole or in part, the payment of assessment, in which case the claim shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the Corporation that the certified statement is false or fraudulent.

(viii) Should any participating insurer fail to make any report of condition under subsection (9) of section 6 of this Act or to file any certified statement required to be filed by such insurer under any provision of this section, or fail to pay any assessment required to be paid by such insurer under any provision of this Act, and should the insurer not correct such failure within thirty days after written notice has been given by the Corporation to an officer of the insurer, citing this subparagraph, and stating that the insurer has failed to file or pay as required by law, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the insurer granted to it under this Act shall be thereby forfeited. Whether or not the penalty provided in this subparagraph has been incurred shall be determined and adjudged after hearing in the manner provided in section 6(i) of this Act. The remedies provided in this subparagraph and in the two preceding subparagraphs shall not be construed as limiting any other remedies against any participating insurer, but shall be in addition thereto.

(ix) Any participating insurer which willfully fails or refuses to file any certified statement or pay any assessment required under this Act shall be subject to a penalty of not more than $1,000 for each day that such violations continue, which penalty the Corporation may recover for its own use.

(2) State contributions and assessments.—

(i) Whenever the Corporation has advanced funds in excess of those available from the sale of its capital stock and collected guaranty fees in order to perform its guaranty function under this Act and has not recovered said funds (including any interest due because of such advancement) from the assets of the insurer upon final liquidation, then the Corporation shall seek recovery of said funds in the domiciliary State through the appropriate insurance insolvency protection plan.

(ii) If the domiciliary State cannot provide for the recovery of said funds, then the Corporation, in order to recover such funds, is authorized to assess participating insurance companies doing business in the domiciliary State on a pro rata basis relative to the net direct premiums written in the State. No such assessment shall exceed 1 per centum of the net direct premiums written in any one year. Participating insurers assessed by the Corporation in the domiciliary State shall be subject to the same rules and regulations during the State assessment process as they are during the national assessment process.

(3) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to deny the several States the right to levy taxes or require license fees for insurers doing business within their jurisdiction: Provided, however, That no participating insurer shall be required automatically to pay any annual or other periodic or continuing assessment or fee under any State insurers insolvency or liability security fund law for any period during which the insurance policies of that insurer are guaranteed pursuant to this Act.

(d) Treasury loans.—The Corporation is authorized to borrow from the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to loan to the Corporation on such terms as may be fixed by the Corporation and the Secretary, such funds in the judgment of the Administrator of the Corporation is from time to time required for insurance purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate $100,000,000 outstanding at any one time, or such further sum as the Congress, by joint resolution, may from time to time determine: Provided, That each loan made pursuant to this subsection shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury taking into consideration the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the average maturity of such loans. For such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds of the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, are extended to include such loans. Any such loan shall be used by the Corporation solely in carrying out its functions with respect to such insu ance. All loans and repayments under this subsection shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.

CORPORATION MONEYS; INVESTMENT

SEC. 10. Money of the Corporation not otherwise employed shall be invested in obligations of the United States or in obligations guaranteed as to principal and interest by the United States: Provided, That the Corporation shall not sell or purchase any such obligations for its own account and in its own right and interest, at any one time aggregating in excess of $100,000 without the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may waive the requirement of his approval with respect to any transaction or classes of transactions subject to the provisions of this section for such period of time and under such conditions as he may determine.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION

SEC. 11. All notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations issued by the Corporation shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation (except estate and inheritance taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority: Provided, That interest upon or any income from any such obligations and gain from the sale or other disposition of such obligations shall not have any exemption, as such, and loss from the sale or other disposition of such obligations shall not have any special treatment, as such, under the Internal Revenue Code, or laws amendatory or supplementary thereof. The Corporation, including its franchise, its capital, reserves, and surplus, and its income, shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority, except that any real property of the Corporation shall be subject to State, territorial, county, municipal, or local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed.

FORMS OF OBLIGATIONS

SEC. 12. In order that the Corporation may be supplied with such forms of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations as it may need for issuance under this Act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prepare such forms as shall be suitable and approved by the Corporation, to be held in the Treasury subject to delivery, upon order of the Corporation. The engraved plates, dies, bed pieces, and other material executed in connection therewith shall remain in the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Corporation shall reimburse the Secretary of the Treasury for any expenses incurred in the preparation, custody, and delivery of such notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations.

REPORTS; AUDITS

SEC. 13. (a) The Corporation shall annually make a report of its operations to the Congress as soon as practicable after the 1st day of January in each year. Such report shall include a statement with respect to the status of the fund established pursuant to section 9, together with such recommendations concerning its adequacy or inadequacy as the Corporation deems necessary or desirable.

(b) The financial transactions of the Corporation shall be audited by the General Accounting Office in accordance with the principles and procedures applicable to commercial corporate transactions and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Comptroller General of the United States. The audit shall be conducted at the place or places where accounts of the Corporation are normally kept. The representatives of the General Accounting Office shall have access to all books, accounts, records, reports, files, and all other papers, things, or property belonging to or in use by the Corporation pertaining to its financial and other operations and determined necessary by the Comptroller General to facilitate the audit, and they shall be afforded full facilities for verifying transactions with the balances or securities held by depositaries, fiscal agents, and custodians. All such books, accounts, records, reports, files, papers, and property of the Corporation shall remain in possession and custody of the Corporation.

(c) The fiscal year of the Corporation shall be the calendar year. A report of the audit for each calendar year shall be made by the Comptroller General to the Congress not later than July 15 following the close of the calendar year. The report shall also show specifically any program, expenditure, or other financial transaction or undertaking observed in the course of the audit, which, in the opinion of the Comptroller General, has been carried on or made without authority of law. A copy of each report shall be furnished to the President and to the Corporation at the time submitted to the Congress.

GOVERNMENT CORPORATION CONTROL ACT

SEC. 14. (a) Section 101 of the Government Corporation Control Act, as amended (31 U.S.C. 846), is amended by adding after "Federal Housing Administration", the following: "Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation".

(b) To the extent of any inconsistency between the provisions of this Act and the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act, the provisions of this Act shall govern.

SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

SEC. 15. If any provision of this Act is declared unconstitutional, or the applicability thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the constitutionality of the remainder of the Act and the applicability thereof to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Re: House Bill No. 782

Dear Chairman Jackson:

As I understand your instructions, I am to submit a short statement of the position of American Insurance Association with respect to HB 782 now being considered by your Committee.

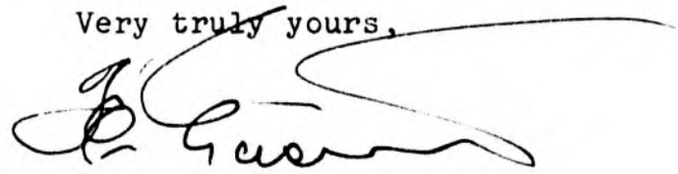
AIA agrees with the concept embodied in S. 2236 that if the insuring public is to be provided the protection it deserves in a timely fashion, action at the federal level is needed.

It agrees also with the concept that the protection is required in the property, casualty and surety fields.

As to the terms of S. 2236, and the amendments offered by the Administration on March 16, I have been advised by telegram that copies of both are on the way to me.

The Administration amendments are represented as creating a federal agency operating on a significantly reduced scale both in size and scope with that proposed in S. 2236; and, would limit the role of the federal agency to that of a vehicle for compensating the insolvency of claimants and policyholders while leaving full responsibility for insurance regulation in the hands of state authorities.

The states would continue to have sole authority for examination of insurers for solvency and would retain full and exclusive regulatory powers.



I suggest, without the ability to demonstrate, that the opposition of the NAIC to the federal approach was formulated prior to the proposed amendments to S. 2236, and that if the opposition is not eliminated or reduced by the amendments, the Committee is left to appraise the benefits of a uniform federal act as compared to a variety of state acts.

As already mentioned in my testimony to the Committee the AIA is opposed to the creation of a number of State funds for security of policyholders against insolvencies, such as the New York State fund of some $125 million with a ceiling of $200 million. The AIA is of the opinion that the federal approach will give wider and more uniform security, without encroachment upon state regulatory powers, and at less cost to the policyholders.

I will provide the Committee with copies of S. 2236 and the proposed amendments as soon as received.

Very truly yours,

Re: House Bill No. 782, to Guarantee Certain Insurance Contracts

Dear Mr. Chairman:

As a representative of American Mutual Insurance Alliance I am interested in appearing before the Judiciary Committee of the House when you consider House Bill No. 782 which was reported favorably by the Commerce Committee of the House today and is next referred to your committee.

If this bill is enacted it will incorporate a corporation consisting of members. Every insurance company doing business in Alaska in the kinds of insurance covered by the Act will be required to be members of the corporation in order to continue doing business in Alaska. The insurance companies would elect a Board of Directors and if they failed to do so, the Insurance Commissioner would appoint directors.

In the event any insurance company which does business in Alaska is declared insolvent in Alaska or elsewhere, the corporation would go into action to reimburse anyone insured by that company who had suffered a loss prior to or within thirty days after the decree of insolvency is entered by any court. Moreover, the policyholder whose policies would otherwise be worthless have thirty days within which to turn in their policies and get a refund of the unearned premium from this corporation. One of the duties of the corporation is to give public notice of the insolvency of any insurance company declared to be insolvent by any competent court anyplace in the United States. Otherwise persons holding policies from such companies which may be doing only a small amount of business in Alaska may have no knowledge of the insolvency until some official notice is received from a trustee in bankruptcy. Until they get new insurance they would be otherwise uninsured. The policyholders in Alaska would have thirty days from the date of the decree of insolvency within which to replace their insurance with some other company, get a refund of their unearned premium and recover for any loss suffered whether before the decree or within thirty days thereafter.

The corporation would make an assessment on its members after the insolvency occurred. In Alaska we are proposing the alternative provision which would set up three separate accounts which would be as follows: workmen's compensation, automobile insurance and all other insurance coming under the act. If the insolvent insurance company was writing only automobile and workmen's compensation insurance in Alaska there would be separate assessments against every company in Alaska writing these two kinds of insurance. Payment of the assessments would be a condition to the continuance of doing business in Alaska. From the fund raised thereby the unearned premiums of the worthless policies and accumulated claims would be paid.

All kinds of insurance companies except life, title, security, disability, credit, mortgage guarantee and ocean marine insurance would participate as members.

No claim would be paid amounting to less than $100 and claims would be paid up to a limit of $300,000 except workmen's compensation claims would be fully paid including claims for permanent disability or death which run for long periods of time.

This bill is a model bill approved by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners on December 4, 1969, after which time it became available to the various state legislatures and being promoted by the Insurance Commissioners of the various states. It has already been adopted by South Dakota, Georgia, Iowa, West Virginia, Idaho and because of the need for this legislation it has probably been adopted by other states without my knowledge.

The model bill was revised by the Local Affairs Agency for the Commerce Committee to the extent necessary to make it conform to the style used in Alaska. After this was done I checked the bill against the model bill and found that it conforms to the model bill.

During the past few years we have had no losses by policyholders as a result of insolvency of insurance companies but in the not too distant past we have had several companies registered to do business in Alaska who were declared insolvent elsewhere and the policyholders had to go to court to fight over the bond posted by the Insurance Commissioner. Although the industry is closely regulated it is a hazardous industry as evidenced by the fact that the Wall Street Journal carried an article last Monday to the effect that State Farm Insurance Company lost $91,000,000 in 1969 in the automobile casualty business.

This bill is a foolproof system of guaranteeing that the other insurance companies admitted to do business in Alaska will pay the claims and redeem the policies for their unexpired premiums of any company which does business in Alaska in the lines of insurance covered by the bill provided the policyholders will surrender their policies and present their claims within thirty days of the date of insolvency.

It is a system in which the Director of Insurance sits on the sidelines and polices the operation but the insurance companies do the work through their own board of directors and at their own expense except that directors can be repaid for their actual expenses in connection with their duties out of the corporation funds. The insurance companies would be allowed to take any losses into consideration in determining their premiums thereafter.

It is unfortunate that this bill is coming to your committee so late in the session and still must go to the Senate in order to be enacted. It is, therefore, requested that you give this matter your attention as soon as possible and let me know when it will be considered.

Yours very truly,

N. C. Banfield

Re: House Bill No. 782

Dear Chairman Jackson:

Here are the following enclosures which have an important bearing on the subject bill:

1. Key excerpts from Nixon Administration Testimony before Senate Commerce Committee

2. Statement of T. Lawrence Jones, President, American Insurance Association with respect to S. 2236 providing a Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation Act, before Senate Commerce Committee.

I understand that Director Fritz and Mr. Banfield for the Mutual Alliance testified in favor of HB 782 and it was reported out favorably by the House Commerce Committee.

The American Insurance Association opposes HB 782 in favor of the federal approach in S. 2236 by Senator Magnuson. I would like to appear to answer the proponents of the bill at such time as your Committee considers it. In the meantime perhaps you and members of your Committee would like to review the enclosed material.

KEY EXCERPTS FROM NIXON ADMINISTRATION TESTIMONY
BEFORE SENATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE
ON S.2236 TO CREATE A FEDERAL INSURANCE GUARANTY CORP.
JOINT STATEMENT OF DEPARTMENTS OF COMMERCE AND TRANSPORTATION
FEBRUARY 10, 1970

This Administration is strongly in support of federal legislation to guarantee that every citizen, every policyholder and every claimant is properly and fully compensated for his insured losses. We will present an Administration proposal for your consideration next month . . .

* * * *

With more than $25 billion of premiums written annually, something less than $25 million of insured property and casualty losses are going unmet each year as a result of insurer insolvencies . . .

Together, we speak for the Administration when we say that while the problem area is modest in comparison with the insurance in force nationwide, the adverse impact of insurer insolvency especially on individuals and smaller insureds, warrants federal legislation.

* * * *

It is impossible not to be impressed by the remarkable consensus regarding the importance of the problem shared among those whose views as to its solution are divergent . . .

* * * *

We believe that action is needed now. Even though some states have enacted insolvency plans and a number of others are considering doing so, the continuing lack of adequate protection for many consumers from the financial consequences of insolvencies is incompatible with the interests of either the public or the insurance industry . . .

We also agree that if the insuring public is to be provided the protection it deserves in a timely fashion, action at the federal level is needed. We are prepared to cooperate in taking that action. . .

* * * *

The Administration believes that consumers should be protected from the financial consequences of insolvencies of insurance companies in the property, casualty and surety fields. Such protection can be afforded through a guaranty mechanism. . .

* * * *

The Administration does not favor the enactment of S.2236 in its present form. We will submit a proposal next month. . .

The Administration believes that a measure can be developed and enacted which can effectively accommodate the needs and interests of the consumer public, the insurance industry, state supervisory authorities and state governments generally . . .

* * * *

The activities of the federal agency should be those only of an administrator of the guaranty mechanism and not a regulator of the insurance industry. The basic supervisory function should remain the province of state supervisory authorities. The federal agency should work through the state supervisory authorities whenever any question arises as to the solvency of a specific company.

There should be an assessment mechanism to meet reasonable and validated claimant and policyholder losses created by insolvency through a post-insolvency assessment technique. Such assessment mechanism should be compatible with programs which have been or may be adopted by any of the several states to meet the insolvency problems on a state basis and at the same time avoid the immobilization of insurance capital which is needed to supply the economy's growing demands for insurance and for the constructive employment of capital . . .

The federal agency contemplated by the Administration's proposal would operate on a significantly reduced scale both in size and scope compared with that currently provided in S.2236. The Administration proposal would limit the role of the federal agency to that of a vehicle for compensating the insolvency losses of claimants and policyholders while leaving full responsibility for insurance regulation in the hands of state authorities.

The states would continue to have sole authority for examination of insurors for solvency and would retain full and exclusive regulatory powers.

THE NEED FOR PROTECTION AGAINST INSURANCE COMPANY INSOLVENCIES

The Problem:

- Insurance company insolvency continues to be a problem for the public, state regulators and the insurance industry itself. It has cost the public over $135,000,000 during the last twelve years in loss claims and premiums, plus additional indirect losses that are difficult to measure exactly.

- Present systems of surveillance and regulation have not been able to ameliorate the problem. Some insolvencies occur every year and an average of more than ten have occurred every year in the last twelve years.

- Victims of insurance company insolvency are not generally guaranteed reimbursement. For their benefit and for the health and strength of the industry, a system of prompt payment of innocent victims is needed, as is an improved system of detection of faulty insurance company operation..

The Background:

Public officials, legislators and the insurance industry itself have been concerned with the problem of insurance company insolvency for more than ten years.

All three groups agree that the prime consideration must be protection of the public in the event of an insurance company insolvency.

All three groups agree that a key objective of legislation or regulatory procedures should be the prevention of insurance company insolvencies.

Various Suggested Proposals:

1. Expansion of uninsured motorist endorsement.

2. State pre - insolvency assessment fund laws.

3. State post - insolvency assessment laws.

4. Private national or regional insurance guaranty facility.

5. National guaranty facility through a governmental corporation (Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation).

The Solution:

WE BELIEVE THAT A FEDERAL INSURANCE GUARANTY CORPORATION -- PATTERNED AFTER THE HIGHLY - SUCCESSFUL FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION IN THE BANKING FIELD -- IS CLEARLY PREFERABLE TO ALL OTHER PROPOSALS.

The Reason:

Only the Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation meets all of the essential requirements of:

- Strengthening the insurance regulatory process by supplementing state examination authority and responsibility, otherwise leaving state regulatory authority and responsibility and state taxation unchanged;
- Assisting in the detection of the interstate shifting of a company's assets, which has been a factor in many insolvencies; and,
- Prohibiting proliferation of state insolvency funds which are unsound and unfair in the concept.

The Shortcomings of the Other Suggested Proposals:

1. Expansion of the uninsured motorist insolvency coverage places the financial burden of insurance company insolvency where it does not belong, that is, on the responsible individual who selected a strong company. He pays for his own insurance and then has to insure himself against the unwise selection of another person. This coverage is slow to respond and cumbersome to administer. Lengthy procedures must be followed before insolvency is established and right to reimbursement is determined. There are significant "gaps" in the extent of coverage; many innocent victims of insolvency have no uninsured motorist coverage against which to proceed.

2. Pre - insolvency assessment laws in all states would add up to an unrealistic liability that would constrict the capacity of insurance companies and, therefore, the amount of insurance they would be able to make available. Such laws also create funds that can be diverted by the states to meet other financial obligations.

3. State post - insolvency assessment laws place the total economic burden on the solvent and well managed insurers. They are governmentally unsound in that they give the state regulator a "blank check" with which to cover the damage arising from failures of performance. And, they put a contingent liability on well managed companies that will make it difficult to portray and evaluate the exact financial condition of insurance companies.

   Neither the pre - insolvency nor the post - insolvency assessment laws, as presently written, provide complete or prompt guarantee of reimbursement to the victims of insurance company insolvency and neither make any sound and workable contribution to the prevention of insolvency.

4. Private insurance guaranty facility would require extensive rewriting of the federal laws, including possible expansion of anti - trust exemptions, and would pose problems of practicality and propriety in requiring competitors to police one another.

Statement of T. Lawrence Jones, President
American Insurance Association
With Respect to S. 2236, Providing A Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation Act,
Before Senate Commerce Committee
November 19, 1969

My name is T. Lawrence Jones and I am President of American Insurance Association, an organization of insurance companies writing all kinds of property and casualty insurance throughout this country. Our member companies have a premium volume of over $7 billion. We are pleased to have this opportunity to appear before the Senate Commerce Committee to present our views on the general problem of insurance company insolvency, and more particularly on S. 2236. This bill, introduced by Senator Magnuson and co-sponsored by Senators Dodd, Hart, Hollings, Inouye, Moss and Pastore, would create a Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation for the purpose of protecting the American public against insurance company insolvencies.

Public officials, legislators and the insurance industry itself have been concerned with the problem of insurance company solvency for many years. As could be expected, the intensity of concern has varied substantially as the number of company insolvencies rose and fell and as reports of insurance company liquidations increased and decreased.

Regardless of the understandable ups and downs of public concern, American Insurance Association is convinced that there is a real problem to which a solution must be found.

Historical Position of Insurance Industry

Some years ago the insurance industry held to the position that all measures by which insurance companies collectively helped, in one way or another, to defray the losses of insolvent insurance companies were unsound. It was argued that these measures put weak companies on a parity with strong ones and tolerated, if not encouraged, bad management. It was further argued that these plans removed incentives on the part of agents and brokers to be sure they were placing their business with responsible and reputable insurance companies. We cannot disagree with the logic of these arguments, but times have changed. Today, such arguments are outweighed by social considerations and we believe the prime consideration is that the public must be protected in the event of an insurance company insolvency. In addition, the nagging insolvency problem damages the industry as a whole and each company suffers in public esteem.

The Dimensions of the Problem

There has been considerable debate as to the size of the problem.[1] Some have endeavored to treat it as de minimis. It is our view that the figures should speak for themselves, but in any event we have concluded that one insurance company insolvency is one too many, especially if there is no way to reimburse the victims of that insolvency.

The only question open for discussion, in our judgment, is what solution will best serve the public interest.

Solutions

Expansion of Uninsured Motorist Endorsement

American Insurance Association has been seeking the best solution over a period of years and with renewed intensity since the introduction in January 1967 of S. 688, providing for a Federal Motor Vehicle Insurance Guaranty Corporation.[2]

Until recently the discussion has centered on automobile insurance. In fact, the earlier bills, such as S. 688, would have provided protection only against the insolvency of automobile insurers. The focus on automobile insurance suggested to some the desirability of expanding the uninsured motorist coverage specifically to include insurance company insolvencies.

All states, except Maryland and North Dakota, now have mandatory uninsured motorist laws.[3] Most of these laws are specifically applicable in cases where the insurer is insolvent but, even in those states where the law is silent as to coverage in case of insurer insolvency, there is a strong likelihood that the laws would be construed to apply. In fact, practically all auto insurers today have voluntarily included provisions in their uninsured motorist coverage making the coverage specifically applicable to insolvencies.

American Insurance Association has never regarded the uninsured motorist endorsement with coverage for insolvency as either an adequate or effective answer to insurance company insolvencies.

These uninsured motorist laws are confined to automobile insurance and therefore do not provide protection to other claimants and policyholders who may be the victims of an insurer insolvency.

[2]A similar bill, S. 3919, was introduced in 1965 by Senators Dodd, Clark, Magnuson and Hart.

[3]See attached American Insurance Association Chart Analysis, October 1969.

Even in the area of automobile accidents they do not protect the non-car-owning pedestrian who has the misfortune of being injured by a motorist whose insurance company has become insolvent.

The uninsured motorist insolvency coverage is an obvious example of placing the financial burden of insurance company insolvency where it does not belong. It is not a valid solution and we doubt whether anyone today will seriously contend otherwise.

State Security Funds

A number of states have endeavored to meet the problem by the enactment of laws providing for state security or insolvency funds. These laws were originally enacted to protect employees under state workmen's compensation laws. (See attached list of states having workmen's compensation security funds.) Most of these laws were enacted during the 1930 depression years. Legislators were concerned that workers injured in industrial accidents might find their workmen's compensation benefits endangered by insurance company insolvencies.[4]

Most of these workmen's compensation security funds were of the pre-insolvency assessment type - i.e. they required the collection of funds by assessing insurers prior to a company insolvency. Two of them (Maryland and Minnesota) are post-assessment insolvency funds, which means insurers are assessed only after the insolvency has occurred.

[4] The workmen's compensation laws, as originally enacted, made the employer liable for workmen's compensation benefits in the event the insurer became insolvent. This provision was eliminated in a few states which subsequently enacted security fund statutes.

The security-fund solution for automobile liability insurance companies was first enacted by the State of New York in 1947.[5] This law (Section 333 of the New York Insurance Law) was amended in 1969 to make the New York security fund applicable to all property and casualty lines other than workmen's compensation which continues to have its own security fund law.

In the 1950's Maryland and New Jersey enacted automobile liability insurance security fund laws of the pre-insolvency assessment type. In subsequent years some state legislatures, from time to time, considered insolvency fund legislation but no additional states enacted these laws until the renewed interest this year when California, Michigan, New Hampshire and Wisconsin enacted post-insolvency assessment laws and, as noted above, New York expanded its law to cover other property and casualty lines. In addition, New York has also placed a much needed ceiling of $200 million on the fund.[6] This year Maryland amended its law to make the fund applicable to automobile physical damage insurance.[7]

This renewed interest in state insolvency fund legislation has been caused by a recent flurry of insolvencies, some of which

[5] In 1939 New York had established an insolvency fund to protect persons who had claims against a company providing the compulsory coverage for public motor vehicles.

[6] Under the New York law, before the 1969 amendment, the method of assessing insurers provided no realistic limitation on the size of the fund. It had grown to an amount in excess of $125 million. For a number of years AIA and others have urged a limitation be placed on the size of this fund.

[7] See the attached AIA Special Management Legislative Bulletin summarizing insolvency fund legislation in 1969. See also attached summary of Property and Liability Security Fund laws.

have been widely publicized. In addition, the introduction of legislation in the Congress, patterned after the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Act with strong support in both the Senate and House of Representatives, has rekindled interest in legislation at the state level.

The position of American Insurance Association on state pre-insolvency assessment funds (Maryland, New Jersey and New York) and state post-insolvency assessment laws (California, Michigan, New Hampshire and Wisconsin) is clear-cut. Neither, in our judgment, provides a sound solution to the problems and we do not think the public interest is well served by such legislation.

State Pre-Insolvency Fund Laws

The pre-insolvency assessment type of law creates a fund in anticipation of some possible future insolvency. The proliferation of such funds in each of the fifty states to protect policyholders and claimants from insolvencies in a business which is transacted across state lines would be difficult to justify from the standpoint of efficient and sound public administration. In the years following the Southeastern Underwriters Association decision by the United States Supreme Court in 1944, it was recognized that a sure way to encourage federal action would be for a number of states to enact pre-insolvency security fund laws. It did not make sense then, and it makes no sense today, to have fifty states amass such funds, administer them and make payments to claimants and policyholders. If one accepts the hypothesis that pre-insolvency funding is more effective and equitable than post-insolvency laws, then clearly one fund is preferable to the establishment of fifty funds.

There is valid concern that these state pre-insolvency funds which tend to reach amounts far in excess of foreseeable needs will be diverted to other purposes. This fear has been ridiculed by some public officials but the plain fact is that such diversion has happened in the past few years. Twice the New Jersey automobile security fund monies have been diverted into the New Jersey Claim and Unsatisfied Judgment Fund (Chapter 241, Laws of 1967 and Chapter 322, Laws of 1968). So this is not a fanciful fear; it is a real possibility.

A major weakness in the state pre-insolvency fund legislation is that it is solely a "bail-out" remedy. It does absolutely nothing to bolster and strengthen regulatory procedures in order to prevent insolvencies. Some have even suggested that these pre-insolvency funds may accelerate the number of insolvencies because state regulatory authorities may become complacent and less diligent in exercising their supervisory functions, knowing that the funds will take care of policyholders and claimants. We disagree with that view. There are far too many other discomforting consequences which will beset an insurance commissioner in the event of an insolvency - including market restrictions, loss of jobs, loss of tax revenue and all the other heartaches associated with a liquidation proceeding. While regulatory bodies will not relax their vigilance in regulating to preserve solvency, these security fund laws in no way help to prevent insolvencies. The industry has long held the view, and I believe it does today, that any solution to the insolvency problem which provides financial assistance to policyholders and claimants must be accompanied by additional affirmative regulatory procedures to prevent insolvencies. American Insurance Association still holds to that proposition.

State Post-Insolvency Assessment Laws

The post-insolvency assessment law avoids, or at least lessens, some of the defects inherent in pre-insolvency assessment fund laws. Large sums are not accumulated and thus do not remain idle and unproductive long before they are needed. Also, since no funds are accumulated, there is no enticing opportunity for diversion to other purposes. However, like the pre-insolvency laws, post-insolvency assessment laws do not make any sound and workable contribution to the prevention of insolvency.

The post-insolvency assessment plan has other serious defects. It exposes insurers to unknown liabilities which could occur at a time when they might be least able to sustain such additional liabilities, even though there are annual limitations on assessments.

There is no way the post-insolvency assessment plan can soften the patent inequity of placing the total economic burden on solvent and well-managed insurers. The post-insolvency law, as we have noted, does nothing to prevent insolvencies and then compounds this inadequacy by making the strong and reputable companies pay for the sins of the mis-managed and weak, including a number whose managements might have engaged in highly questionable, if not at times clearly fraudulent, practices.

The post-insolvency assessment concept is embodied in model state legislation being proposed by the American Mutual Insurance Alliance. The AMIA model bill, as we understand it, places some regulatory power in an insolvency board composed of the insurance commissioner and representatives of insurance companies, thereby recognizing that something more than a financial rescue is needed. Whether it is a proper responsibility for the private sector to become involved in this kind of industry policing, is debatable. It is noteworthy that up to the present time, no post-insolvency assessment law has bestowed any such authority on insurance companies.

Summarizing our views on state security fund laws, American Insurance Association is completely opposed to a solution which would establish security funds in each state by means of an annual assessment on insurers. We are also opposed to the post-insolvency assessment plan although we recognize that it is probably the least objectionable remedy available at the state level. An additional reason that these state post-insolvency assessment laws are less objectionable than some of the other state proposals is that they can be effectively meshed into a national solution should a national plan prove to be the ultimate answer.

Alternative Measures

Since the American Insurance Association companies have realized the shortcomings of the conventional state-oriented solutions, we have explored alternatives to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation approach in order to see if we could develop a national plan which could be administered largely, if not solely, by the industry.

In this phase of our study, we were guided by the following basic criteria:

1. Any such plan must provide additional safeguards to prevent insolvencies; bail-out alone would be unacceptable.
2. It should include a private guaranty facility, national in scope.
3. In order to avoid further echelons of regulation, the role of state and federal regulation should be as little as legally possible.
4. All insurers should be compelled or strongly induced to participate in the facility.

Within the context of these criteria, we studied the concept of a private facility along the lines of the National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD) which is authorized by the 1938 amendments to the Securities Exchange Commission Act of 1934 to regulate over-the-counter brokers. Such a plan would have contemplated one or more private facilities guaranteeing the policies of its members. All insurers would be required to belong to a facility which would have certain examination powers over its members.

In the course of our study of this proposal we were advised by counsel that a purely private facility without federal legislation could present problems. It was recommended to us that it might be necessary to have some federal supervisory power over the private facility and that members of the facility should have the right to appeal the action of the facility to the supervising federal body. It was further suggested that it might be necessary to have some exemption from the federal antitrust laws. Part of the reasoning for this suggestion was that the activities of the facility would include the policing of insurers and this could be construed to constitute, "boycott, coercion and intimidation" which are expressly excluded from the scope of the exemption contained in the McCarran-Ferguson Act.

If it were necessary to obtain federal legislation to permit the operation of a private insurance guaranty facility, three practical questions had to be answered.

1. Could we reasonably anticipate that the Congress would favorably consider legislation authorizing a private facility to exercise a policing function, albeit a limited one?
2. Would the Congress be likely to expand the present antitrust exemption even for such a worthy purpose as providing policyholder and claimant security against insolvencies?
3. Against the background of the highly successful Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, is there any reasonable likelihood that the Congress would consider a different approach in the insurance area?

We have endeavored to analyze realistically and objectively these three questions and have concluded that they must be answered in the negative.

One other consideration has affected our view of the private facility approach. Some of our member companies do not believe that private insurers should become involved in the policing of their competitors.[8] Even if there were no federal legislative problems, they would be opposed to a private facility with policing powers. Additionally, we should reiterate that American Insurance Association is opposed to any solution which does not make a workable contribution to the prevention of insolvencies.

Although we have concluded that the private facility approach is not feasible, if we could be convinced that it did not necessitate far-reaching federal legislation, we would be willing to re-evaluate our position. The one caveat would be the practicality and propriety of any device requiring competitors to police one another.

We have examined other variations of the private facility approach, including the private insurance guaranty corporation proposal outlined in the June 16, 1969 Automobile Insurance Study Background Memorandum, prepared by the staff of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners' Central Office for consideration by the NAIC Special Committee on Automobile Insurance Problems.

We believe that our comments with respect to a private facility suggested by present regulation of over-the-counter brokers by NASD is applicable to the proposal suggested by staff of the NAIC Central Office.

[8]Some have attempted to compare this private industry role to insurance industry organizations which assist law enforcement authorities. We believe this is a far-fetched analogy and not at all relevant in the area of competitors.

July 8, 1969 submitted a report to the DOT on S. 2236. This advisory committee suggested its own proposal in lieu of S. 2236. Their plan would provide for the enactment by the Congress of a law providing for the imposition of a "substantial federal general revenue tax on insurance premiums derived within each state." It would further provide that the tax be forgiven in full as to all states which have in effect an insolvency guaranty law meeting certain criteria specified in the federal law. The purpose of this proposal is to apply maximum pressure on "state legislatures and regulators to have adequate legal requirements and adequate administrative supervision of insurers." The proposal contemplates the possibility of state enactment of insolvency fund laws similar to the New York law or a post-insolvency assessment law such as those enacted in four states this year.

This plan has all the weaknesses of the state insolvency measures and it is hard to see what it does to improve state regulatory machinery to prevent insolvencies.

We have great respect for the members of this advisory committee but we cannot convince ourselves that a tax threat proposal of this sort is a workable solution.

S. 2236

We come now to S. 2236, the consideration of which is the reason for the hearings of your committee.

S. 2236 is patterned on the highly successful federal legislation establishing the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation which insures the deposits of all its member banks. The bill establishes a corporation to be known as the Federal Insurance Guaranty Corporation, to which practically all insurers are required to belong. Only a small number of insurers would not be required to join since very few companies are not in one way or another engaged in interstate commerce.

Each insurer would pay an annual fee equal to one-eighth of one percent of its net direct premiums. These fees would be continued only to the extent it would be necessary to keep the net asset value of the fund at an amount not less than two percent of the annual direct premiums written by all participating insurers. Before this cut-off the corporation would have to retire the outstanding Treasury shares amounting to $50 million which supply the initial financing.

The FIGC would be empowered to settle or adjust any claim against an insolvent member insurer. Claims for return premiums would not be allowed in excess of fifty percent of unearned premiums. The bill would require claimants to exhaust their claims against state insolvency funds before receiving payment from FIGC. No further fees or assessments under any state insolvency law would be permitted for any period during which the insurance policies of that insurer are guaranteed under this legislation.

In the case of insolvency protection under the uninsured motorist endorsement, a policyholder would first have to exhaust his remedies against any applicable state insolvency fund and then against the FIGC before receiving any payment from his insurer.

It is clear, therefore, that the bill seeks to establish a single program for providing payments to those who have claims against an insolvent insurance company.

The bill grants broad examination powers to the corporation. All such examinations are required to be coordinated as far as practicable with appropriate state supervisory authorities and the National Association of Insurance Commissioners. It authorizes the corporation to terminate the guaranteed status of an insurer if it finds:

1. That the insurer is engaging in unsafe or unsound practices,
2. The insurer is in unsafe or unsound condition, or
3. The insurer has violated this law or any rule or regulation issued under it.

The corporation also has power to bring cease-and-desist proceedings if it believes an insurer is enaging in an unsafe or unsound practice or is violating the law.

American Insurance Association, as previously stated, recognizes that a problem exists and a solution must be found. We have shared with this committee our analysis and conclusions with respect to the various proposals which are under consideration. It is our view that S. 2236, patterned after the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, is clearly preferable to all other proposals and we endorse this legislation.

It should be noted that S. 2236 provides a sure way to protect members of the public against the possibility of insurance company insolvency. It also prohibits the proliferation of state insolvency funds which, in our judgment, is a totally unacceptable solution. Finally, unlike all the other solutions under discussion, S. 2236 strengthens the regulatory process. It should prove to be especially helpful in preventing the interstate shifting of company assets, which has been beyond the reach of state regulatory power and which has been such a significant factor in a number of insolvencies.

We disagree with those who contend that this legislation portends the end of state regulation or that it diminishes the important role of state regulation. On the contrary, we believe it compliments and supplements state supervision. It will, in fact, strengthen state regulation by removing a long-standing source of criticism.

We have reached our decision supporting S. 2236 only after the most careful study. We are well aware that in varying degree a number of segments of the industry are opposed to this legislation. We also know that the National Association of Insurance Commissioners has adopted a resolution against this legislation. Our decision to support this bill reflects our considered judgment that the FDIC approach offers the most effective and workable solution to the insolvency problem of a business which is extensively transacted across state lines.

Respectfully submitted.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION SECURITY FUNDS

Arizona - Uninsured Employers and 2nd Injury Special Fund. -§23-1065, Revised Statutes - Fund is maintained by a tax not to exceed 2% of premiums; also in no-dependency death cases, carriers shall pay $1,150 into fund. §23-907B authroizes payments out of special fund plus a 10% penalty on employer.

Connecticut - 2nd Injury & Compensation Assurance Fund - §§31-354 and 31-355-Gen. Stats.-1% of compensation paid during preceding year with payments to cease when fund reaches $100,000 and to be resumed when it falls below $100,000.

Maryland - §§85-89, Art. 101, Maryland Code-Post-insolvency assessment, pro-rata, upon all insurers not to exceed 1% of workmen's compensation premiums written during preceding calendar year.

Minnesota - §§79-28, 79-29, Minn. Stat. 1965. Assessment of other carriers for the payment of unpaid workmen's compensation awards of insolvent company. Pro-rata assessment in any one year in no case to exceed 1% of workmen's compensation premiums written during the preceding calendar year.

New Jersey - Sec. 34:15-103 ff. Revised Statutes of 1937. 1% of net written premiums payable bi-annually until fund, over and above liabilities, equals 5% of workmen's compensation loss reserves of all stock carriers as of December 31 next preceding; payments to be resumed when said fund falls below this figure.

New York - Art. 6-A (§§106-109) of Workmen's Compensation Law. One percent of net written premiums payable until fund, less liabilities, equals 5% of New York Workmen's Compensation loss reserves of all stock carriers as of December 31 next preceding, or equals $2,300,000, whichever sum is greater. Payments are resumed when fund is reduced below this amount. Payments to be made quarterly.

North Carolina - Art. 3, Chap. 97, §§97-105-97-117, Gen. Stats. One percent of net written premiums payable bi-annually until fund over and above liabilities equals 5% of workmen's compensation loss reserves of all stock carriers as of December 31 next preceding; payments to be resumed when said fund falls below this figure.

Oregon - Direct Responsibility Employer's Adjustment Reserve §656.614, Oregon Rev. Stats.-Pro-rata assessment upon (DRE) employers sufficient to pay unpaid claims because of insolvency of surety or guarantor of employer.

Pennsylvania - Act No. 470, Laws of 1937. One percent of net written premiums payable annually until fund, over and above liabilities, equals 5% of workmen's compensation loss reserves of stock carriers as of June 30 next preceding. Payments are to be resumed when the fund falls below this amount.

United States Longshoremen's and Harbor Worker's Act - Special Fund - §§18 (b) and 44 - $1,000 paid into Fund by employer in each no-dependency death case.

Wisconsin - Workmen's Compensation Law, Sec. 102.65. One percent of earned premiums payable annually until fund, over and above liabilities, equals 5% of the loss reserves of all stock carriers for the payment of benefits under said section as of December 31 next preceding. Payments are to be resumed when fund falls below this amount. Payments into stock fund are not to be discontinued unless said fund consists of at least $25,000 over and above its known liabilities. This fund has now been consolidated with the mutual and reciprocal funds and transformed into a temporary fund for payment of assessments into the newly created post assessment Insurance Security Fund which has broad coverage, including workmen's compensation (S.B. 525) Chapter 144, Laws of 1969.

Broad Guarantee Provisions Including Workmen's Compensation

California - Act 14.2 Sec. 1063 ff. of the Insurance Code. Provides for creation of California Insurance Guarantee Association to which all insurers, with certain exceptions life, title, etc. must belong. Workmen's compensation writers included as a separate category. Post insolvency assessment limited to 1% of net direct premium written in particular category (Chapter 1347, Laws of 1969, effective August 31, 1969).

Michigan - Secs. 7833 and 7901 ff. (compiled Laws of 1948, added by Act No. 277, Laws of 1969) creates Property and Casualty Guaranty Association to which all insurers, except life, must belong. Workmen's compensation writers included as a separate category. Post insolvency assessment limited to 1% net direct premium written in previous calendar year in particular category.

HOUSE BILL NO. 782

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

SIXTH LEGISLATURE - SECOND SESSION

A BILL

For an Act entitled: "An Act relating to guaranteeing certain insurance contracts."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

* Section 1. AS 21 is amended by adding a new chapter to read:

CHAPTER 80. ALASKA INSURANCE GUARANTY ASSOCIATION ACT.

Sec. 21.80.010. PURPOSE. The purpose of this chapter is to provide a mechanism for the payment of covered claims under certain insurance policies to avoid excessive delay in payment and to avoid financial loss to claimants or policyholders because of the insolvency of an insurer, to assist in the detection and prevention of insurer insolvencies, and to provide an association to assess the cost of this protection among insurers.

Sec. 21.80.020. SCOPE. This chapter applies to all kinds of direct insurance, except life, title, surety, disability, credit, mortgage guaranty, and ocean marine insurance.

Sec. 21.80.030. CONSTRUCTION. This chapter shall be liberally construed to effect the purpose under sec. 10 of this chapter which constitute an aid and guide to interpretation.

Sec. 21.80.040. CREATION OF ASSOCIATION. There is created a nonprofit incorporated legal entity to be known as the Alaska Insurance Guaranty Association. All insurers defined as member insurers in sec. 190(6) of this chapter shall be and remain members of the association as a condition of their authority to transact insurance in this state. The association shall perform its functions under a plan of operation established and approved under sec. 70 of this chapter and shall exercise its powers through a board of directors established under sec. 50 of this chapter. For purposes of administration and assessment, the association shall be divided into three separate accounts; the workmen's compensation insurance account; the automobile insurance account; and the account for all other insurance to which this chapter applies.

Sec. 21.80.050. BOARD OF DIRECTORS. (a) The board of directors of the association shall consist of not less than five nor more than nine persons serving terms as established in the plan of operation. The members of the board shall be selected by member insurers subject to the approval of the commissioner. Vacancies of the board shall be filled for the remaining period of the term in the same manner as initial appointments. If no members are selected within 60 days after the effective date of this chapter, the commissioner may appoint the initial members of the board of directors.

(b) In approving selections to the board, the commissioner shall consider among other things whether all member insurers are fairly represented.

(c) Members of the board may be reimbursed from the assets of the association for expenses incurred by them as members of the board of directors.

Sec. 21.80.060. POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE ASSOCIATION. (a) The association shall

(1) be obligated to the extent of the covered claims existing prior to the determination of insolvency and arising within 30 days after the determination of insolvency, or before the policy expiration date if less than 30 days after the determination, or before the insured replaces the policy or causes its cancellation, if he does so within 30 days of the determination, but this obligation shall include only that amount of each covered claim which is in excess of $100 and is less than $300,000, except that the association shall pay the full amount of any covered claim arising out of a workmen's compensation policy; in no event shall the association be obligated to a policy holder or claimant in an amount in excess of the obligation of the insolvent insurer under the policy form which the claim arises;

(2) be considered the insurer to the extent of its obligation on the covered claims and to that extent shall have all rights, duties, and obligations of the insolvent insurer as if the insurer had not become insolvent;

(3) allocate claims paid and expenses incurred among the three accounts separately, and assess member insurers separately for each account amounts necessary to pay the obligation of the association under (a)(1) of this section subsequent to an insolvency, the expenses of handling covered claims subsequent to an insolvency, the cost of examinations under sec. 110 of this chapter and other expenses authorized by this chapter; the assessments of each member insurer shall be in the proportion that the net direct written premiums of the member insurer for the preceding calendar year on the kinds of insurance in the account bears to the net direct written premiums of all member insurers for the preceding calendar year on the kinds of insurance in the account; each member insurer shall be notified of the assessment not later than 30 days before it is due; no member insurer may be assessed in any year on any account an amount greater than two per cent of the member insurer's net direct written premiums for the preceding calendar year on the kinds of insurance in the account. If the maximum assessment, together with the other assets of the association in any account, does not provide in any one year in any account an amount sufficient to make all necessary payments from that account, the funds available shall be prorated and the unpaid portion shall be paid as soon thereafter as funds become available; the association may exempt or defer, in whole or in part, the assessment of any member insurer, if the assessment would cause the member insurer's financial statement to reflect amounts of capital or surplus less than the minimum amounts required for a certificate of authority by any jurisdiction in which the member insurer is authorized to transact insurance; each member insurer may set off against an assessment, authorized payments made on covered claims and expenses incurred in the payment of these claims by the member insurer if they are chargeable to the account for which the assessment is made;

(4) investigate claims brought against the association and adjust, compromise, settle and pay covered claims to the extent of the association's obligation and deny all other claims and may review settlements, releases and judgments to which the insolvent insurer or its insureds were parties to determine the extent to which settlements, releases and judgments may be properly contested;

(5) notify persons as the commissioner directs under sec. 80(b)(1) of this chapter;

(6) handle claims through its employees or through one or more insurers or other persons designated as servicing facilities; designation of a servicing facility is subject to the approval of the commissioner, but designation may be declined by a member insurer;

(7) reimburse each servicing facility for obligations of the association paid by the facility and for expenses incurred by the facility while handling claims on behalf of the association and shall pay the other expenses of the association authorized by this chapter.

(b) The association may

(1) employ or retain those persons necessary to handle claims and perform other duties of the association;

(2) borrow funds necessary to effect the purposes of this chapter in accord with the plan of operation;

(3) sue or be sued;

(4) negotiate and become a party to those contracts as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this chapter;

(5) perform all other acts necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of this chapter;

(6) refund to the member insurers in proportion to the contribution of each member insurer to that account that amount by which the assets of the account exceed the liabilities if, at the end of any calendar year, the board of directors finds that the assets of the association in any account exceed the liabilities of that account as estimated by the board of directors for the coming year;

(7) appear in, defend, and appeal any action on a claim brought against the association.

Sec. 21.80.070. PLAN OF OPERATION. (a) The association shall submit to the commissioner a plan of operation and any amendments necessary or suitable to assure the fair, reasonable, and equitable administration of the association. The plan of operation and amendments shall become effective upon approval in writing by the commissioner. If the association fails to submit a suitable plan of operation within 90 days following the effective date of this chapter or if at any subsequent time the association fails to submit suitable amendments to the plan, the commissioner shall, after notice and hearing, adopt and promulgate reasonable rules necessary or advisable to effectuate the provisions of this chapter. These rules shall continue in force until modified by the commissioner or superceded by a plan submitted by the association and approved by the commissioner.

(b) All member insurers shall comply with the plan of operation.

(c) The plan of operation shall

(1) establish the procedures whereby all the powers and duties of the association under sec. 60 of this chapter will be performed;

(2) establish procedures for handling assets of the association;

(3) establish the amount and method of reimbursing members of the board of directors under sec. 50 of this chapter;

(4) establish procedures by which claims may be filed with the association and establish acceptable forms of proof of covered claims; notice of claims to the receiver or liquidator of the insolvent insurer shall be deemed notice to the association or its agent and a list of these claims shall be periodically submitted to the association or similar organization in another state by the receiver or liquidator;

(5) establish regular places and times for meetings of the board of directors;

(6) establish procedures for records to be kept of all financial transactions of the association, its agents, and the board of directors;

(7) provide that any member insurer aggrieved by a final action or decision of the association may appeal to the commissioner within 30 days after the action or decision;

(8) establish the procedures whereby selections for the board of directors will be submitted to the commissioner;

(9) contain additional provisions necessary or proper for the execution of the powers and duties of the association.

(d) The plan of operation may provide that any or all powers and duties of the association, except those under secs. 60(a)(3) and 60(b)(2) are delegated to a corporation, association, or other organization which performs or will perform functions similar to those of this association, or its equivalent, in two or more states. Such a corporation, association or organization shall be reimbursed as a servicing facility would be reimbursed and shall be paid for its performance of any other functions of the association. A delegation under this subsection shall take effect only with the approval of both the board of directors and the commissioner, and may be made only to a corporation, association, or organization which extends protection not substantially less favorable and effective than that provided by this chapter.

Sec. 21.80.080. DUTIES AND POWERS OF THE COMMISSIONER. (a) The commissioner shall

(1) notify the association of the existence of an insolvent insurer no later than three days after he receives notice of the determination of the insolvency;

(2) upon request of the board of directors, provide the association with a statement of the net direct written premiums of each member insurer.

(b) The commissioner may

(1) require that the association notify the insureds of the insolvent insurer and any other interested parties of the determination of insolvency and of their rights under this chapter; this notification shall be by mail at their last known address, when available, but if sufficient information for notification by mail is not available, notice by publication in a newspaper of general circulation shall be sufficient;

(2) suspend or revoke, after notice and hearing, the certificate of authority to transact insurance in this state of any member insurer which fails to pay an assessment when due or fails to comply with the plan of operation. As an alternative, the commissioner may levy a fine on any member insurer which fails to pay an assessment when due; this fine may not exceed five per cent of the unpaid assessment per month, except that no fine may be less than $100 a month;

(3) revoke the designation of any servicing facility if he finds claims are being handled unsatisfactorily.

Sec. 21.80.090. EFFECT OF PAID CLAIMS. (a) A person recovering under this chapter shall be considered to have assigned his rights under the policy to the association to the extent of his recovery from the association. Every insured or claimant seeking the protection of this chapter shall cooperate with the association to the same extent as the person would have been required to cooperate with the insolvent insurer. The association shall have no cause of action against the insured of the insolvent insurer for any sums it has paid out except those causes of action as the insolvent insurer would have had if the sums had been paid by the insolvent insurer. In the case of an insolvent insurer operating on a plan with assessment liability, payments of claims of the association shall not operate to reduce the liability of insured to the receiver, liquidator, or statutory successor for unpaid assessments.

(b) The receiver, liquidator, or statutory successor of an insolvent insurer shall be bound by settlements of covered claims by the association or a similar organization in another state. The court having jurisdiction shall grant these claims priority equal to that which the claimant would have been entitled in the absence of this chapter against the assets of the insolvent insurer. The expenses of the association or similar organization in handling claims shall be accorded the same priority as the liquidator's expenses.

(c) The association shall periodically file with the receiver or liquidator of the insolvent insurer statements of the covered claims paid by the association and estimates of anticipated claims on the association which shall preserve the rights of the association against the assets of the insolvent insurer.

Sec. 21.80.100. NONDUPLICATION OF RECOVERY. (a) A person having a claim against an insurer under a provision in an insurance policy other than a policy of an insolvent insurer which is also a covered claim, shall be required to exhaust first his right under the policy. Any amount payable on a covered claim under this chapter shall be reduced by the amount of recovery under the insurance policy.

(b) A person having a claim which may be recovered under more than one insurance guaranty association or its equivalent shall seek recovery first from the association of the place of residence of the insured except that if it is a first party claim for damage to property with a permanent location, he shall seek recovery first from the association of the location of the property, and if it is a workmen's compensation claim, he shall seek recovery first from the association of the residence of the claimant. A recovery under this chapter shall be reduced by the amount of recovery from any other insurance guaranty association or its equivalent.

Sec. 21.80.110. PREVENTION AND DETECTION OF INSOLVENCIES. (a) It is the duty of the board of directors, upon majority vote, to notify the commissioner of information indicating that a member insurer may be insolvent or in a financial condition hazardous to the policyholders or the public.

(b) The board of directors may, upon majority vote, request that the commissioner order an examination of a member insurer which the board in good faith believes may be in a financial condition hazardous to the policyholders or the public. Within 30 days of the receipt of the request, the commissioner shall begin the examination. The examination may be conducted as a National Association of Insurance Commissioners Examination or may be conducted by those persons the commissioner designates. The cost of the examination shall be paid by the association and the examination report shall be treated as are other examination reports. In no event may the examination report be released to the board of directors before its release to the public, but this does not preclude the commissioner from complying with (c) of this section. The commissioner shall notify the board of directors when the examination is completed. The request for an examination shall be kept on file by the commissioner but it shall not be open to public inspection before the release of the examination report to the public.

(c) It is the duty of the commissioner to report to the board of directors when he has reasonable cause to believe that a member insurer examined or being examined at the request of the board of directors may be insolvent or in a financial condition hazardous to the policyholders or the public.

(d) The board of directors may, upon majority vote, make reports and recommendations to the commissioner upon any matter germane to the solvency, liquidation, rehabilitation or conservation of a member insurer. These reports and recommendations shall not be considered public documents.

(e) The board of directors may, upon majority vote, make recommendations to the commissioner for the detection and prevention of insurer insolvencies.

(f) The board of directors shall, at the conclusion of an insurer insolvency in which the association was obligated to pay covered claims, prepare a report on the history and causes of the insolvency, based on the information available to the association, and submit this report to the commissioner.

Sec. 21.80.120. EXAMINATION OF THE ASSOCIATION. The association shall be subject to examination and regulation by the commissioner. The board of directors shall submit, not later than March 30 of each year, a financial report for the preceding calendar year in a form approved by the commissioner.

Sec. 21.80.130. TAX EXEMPTION. The association shall be exempt from payment of all fees and all taxes levied by the state or any of its subdivisions except taxes levied on real or personal property.

Sec. 21.80.140. RECOGNITION OF ASSESSMENTS IN RATES. The rates and premiums charged for insurance policies to which this chapter applies shall include amounts sufficient to recoup a sum equal to the amounts paid to the association by the member insurer less any amounts returned to the member insurer by the association and these rates shall not be considered excessive because they contain an amount reasonably calculated to recoup assessments paid by the member insurer.

Sec. 21.80.150. IMMUNITY. There shall be no liability on the part of and no cause of action of any nature shall arise against a member insurer, the association or its agents or employees, the board of directors, or the commissioner or his representatives for action taken by them in the performance of their powers and duties under this chapter.

Sec. 21.80.160. STAY OF PROCEEDINGS AND REOPENING OF DEFAULT JUDGMENTS. All proceedings in which the insolvent insurer is a party or is obligated to defend a party in a court in this state shall be stayed for 60 days from the date the insolvency is determined to permit proper defense by the association for all pending causes of action as to any covered claims arising from a judgment under a decision, verdict or fi[illegible]based on the default of the insolvent insurer or its failure to defend an insured. The association either on its own behalf or on behalf of the insured may apply to have this judgment, order, decision, verdict or finding set aside by the same court or administrator that ma d the judgment, order, decision, verdict or finding and shall be permitted to defend against the claim on the merits.

Sec. 21.80.170. TERMINATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS. (a) The commissioner shall by order terminate the operation of the Alaska Insurance Guaranty Association as to any kind of insurance covered by this chapter with respect to which he has found, after hearing, that there is in effect a statutory or voluntary plan which

(1) is a permanent plan which is adequately funded or for which adequate funding is provided; and

(2) extends, or will extend to the Alaska policyholders and residents protection and benefits with respect to insolvent insurers not substantially less favorable and effective to the policyholders and residents than the protection and benefits provided with respect to the kinds of insurance under this chapter.

(b) The commissioner shall by the same order authorize discontinuance of future payments by insurers to the Alaska Insurance Guaranty Association with respect to the same kinds of insurance so long as the assessments and payments continue, as necessary, to liquidate covered claims of insurers adjudged insolvent before the order and the related expenses not covered by the other plan.

(c) If the operation of the Alaska Insurance Guaranty Association is terminated as to all kinds of insurance otherwise within its scope, the association, as soon as possible thereafter, shall distribute the balance of money and assets remaining (after discharge of the functions of the association with respect to prior insurer insolvencies not covered by the other plan, together with related expenses) to the insurers which are then writing in this state policies of the kinds of insurance covered by this chapter and which had made payments to the association, pro rata upon the basis of the aggregate of the payments made by the respective insurers during the period of five years next preceding the date of the termination order. Upon completion of this distribution with respect to all of the kinds of insurance covered by this chapter, this chapter shall be considered to have expired.

Sec. 21.80.180. TITLE. This chapter may be known and cited as the Alaska Insurance Guaranty Association Act.

Sec. 21.80.190. DEFINITIONS. In this chapter, unless the context requires otherwise,

(1) "account" means any one of the three accounts created by sec. 40 of this chapter;

(2) "association" means the Alaska Insurance Guaranty Association;

(3) "commissioner" means the commissioner of the Department of Commerce or his representative;

(4) "covered claim" means an unpaid claim, including one of unearned premiums, which arises out of and is within the coverage and not in excess of the applicable limits of an insurance policy to which this chapter applies issued by an insurer, if the insurer becomes an insolvent insurer after the effective date of this chapter and (A) the claimant or insured is a resident of this state at the time of the insured event; or (B) the property from which the claim arises is permanently located in this state; "covered claim" does not include any amount due a reinsurer, insurer, insurance pool, or underwriting association, as subrogation recoveries or otherwise;

(5) "insolvent insurer" means an insurer (A) authorized to transact insurance in this state either at the time the policy was issued or when the insured event occurred and (B) determined to be insolvent by a court of competent jurisdiction;

(6) "member insurer" means a person who (A) writes any kind of insurance to which this chapter applies under sec. 20 of this chapter including the exchange of reciprocal or inter-insurance contracts, and (B) is licensed to transact insurance in this state;

(7) "net direct written premiums" means direct gross premiums written in this state on insurance policies to which this chapter applies, less return premiums thereon and dividends paid or credited to policyholders on direct business; "net direct written premiums" does not include premiums on contracts between insurers or re-insurers.

JUNEAU ALASKA

Mr. John M. Elliott
Executive Director
Legislative Affairs Agency
Pouch Y
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Dear John:

Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 589 amended contains sections 19.40.034 through 19.40.037, relating to an oil and gas severance tax. Wording of these provisions of the bill has caused concern among several members of the House that the provisions are either unconstitutional or present serious legal ramifications. Among the more significant questions raised are the following:

1. Do the provisions violate the equal protection or due process clauses of the state and federal constitution by imposing a tax on all oil and gas production regardless of whether or not the producer benefits from the proposed pipeline or the road?

2. Are the provisions defective because of vagueness; i.e.,
   (a) Is the tax on North Slope production only or on all production in the state?

   (b) Does the tax terminate when the amount reimbursed plus interest is paid or the amount not reimbursed plus interest is paid?

3. If the tax is levied to obtain reimbursement of funds not required to be reimbursed by an agreement, does the tax constitute a breach of the agreement by the state?

4. Since the tax is imposed on all producers, if the road contractor does not make reimbursement does this constitute delegation of the state's taxing authority?

5. Does the tax constitute a violation of Article 9, section 7, relating to dedicated funds?

I would appreciate your immediate response to these questions in particular and your comments on these provisions of the bill in general.

Very truly yours,

Chancy Croft
State Representative

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY MEMBERS OF THE LEGISLATURE
ON THE LEGAL ASPECTS OF THE N.S. ROAD

1. What are the plans of the Department of Interior with regard to the pending litigation that has been brought by both the Wilderness Society and others, and Stevens Village and others, that is, those in the District of Columbia courts, with respect to the proposal by the State to build the road? This is to include both the right-of-way and any permits that may be necessary.

2. Whether it is the position of the department that the injuncti ns that have been issued in any way would affect the right of the state to proceed to accept the right-of-way under the statute and whether or not the injunctions would in any way affect the right of the Secretary of Interior to grant permits for airports or for gravel, incident to the construccion of the road?

3. Whether the Secretary of the Department sees any difficulty in obtaining a change in the Rampart withdrawal?

4. Aside from litigation, what time frame may be involved in the permits themselves?

5. Whether or not the department expects to have to consult with the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee on any phase of the state road? If so , what phase?

6. Would it be legally possible for the Secretary to, in a case of this kind, modify the land freeze order to the extent that it would cover the route of the proposed road where it would be crossing federal lands?

7. When someone buys or takes property from the federal government they theoretically have access afforded to cross intervening federal lands to that property, do they not? (In this case the state has obtained lands in the Prudhoe Bay area.) Wouldn't the state have road access across federal intervening lands to get to the state lands?

8. I have seen the theory that the 1866 Act is not applicable to lands to which there is Indian title. If this is so, in the absence of the law suit brought by the Indians on their land claims, what would be the position of the Secretary as guardian to allow effective acceptance of the offer as in the statute? Obviously he can't do anything under the statute, but, perhaps he could refuse to give permits for gravel and airports?

IN REPLY REFER TO:

UNITED STATES
DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20240

MAY 22 1970

Honorable Barry W. Jackson
Chairman
Judicial Committee
Alaska House of Representatives
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This letter is in reply to the several telegrams we have received from your Committee and specifically to the eight questions which you presented to our Regional Solicitor on May 7 in Juneau.

With respect to the first question, we anticipate that the Justice Department, which represents this Department in the actions brought by the Native Village of Allakaket et. al. and by The Wilderness Society et. al., will bring the matter of the State of Alaska proposal for a road from the Yukon River to Prudhoe Bay to the attention of the Court, by appropriate motions, at such time as we have a definite and specific factual situation to present to the Court for a ruling. We do not believe that the matter of the road is now in a posture sufficient for presentation to the Court.

With respect to your second question, we do not believe that the injunction in either the Wilderness case or the Allakaket case would in any way affect the right of Alaska to proceed under R. S. 2477. The State is not a party to either action. We do believe, however, that the injunctions, and particularly that in The Wilderness Society case, may affect the right of the Secretary to grant permits for airports or gravel incident to the construction of the road. We will not be able to reach any final conclusion in this regard, however, until the State has taken final action on the road.

In answer to the third question, we do not at this time foresee any difficulty in obtaining a change in the Rampart withdrawal.

In answer to the fourth question, we are not in a position to give any meaningful estimate as to when the pipeline right-of-way will be issued. The Trans Alaska Pipeline system is providing us with additional information which will have to be evaluated before we can make such an estimate.

In reply to your fifth question, we believe that, pursuant to Secretary Hickel's commitment to the Interior Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, we will have to consult with those Committees with respect to any modifications of PLO 4582 for gravel for the road or any other matter relating to the road.

In answer to the sixth question, it is legally possible for the Secretary to modify the land freeze order.

We do not believe we are in a position, at this time, to provide answers to the seventh and eighth questions. They raise particularly complex and difficult legal issues that can best be answered only in the context of a specific factual situation.

Sincerely yours,

Solicitor

JOURNAL

SUPPLEMENT

SENATE AND HOUSE - SUPPLEMENT NO. 6 May 5, 1970

REMARKS BY GOVERNOR KEITH H. MILLER

BEFORE A JOINT SESSION OF THE ALASKA LEGISLATURE

"Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, members of the Sixth Alaska Legislature:

I have come here today to request that you appropriate up to $120 million from the general fund for the construction of a permanent highway from the very heart of Alaska north to the rim of the North American Continent.

It is an unprecedented request and one warranted by the unprecedented circumstances that exist in Alaska today.

The Constitution of the State of Alaska states that 'it is the policy of the State to encourage the settlement of its land and the development of its resources by making them available for maximum use consistent with the public interest.'

I want the state to build a highway from the Yukon River to the Arctic Ocean because I believe that no other highway in Alaska's history is so much in the public interest.

This highway, stretching north through the Arctic, will begin to open up a practically untouched third of the state. It will provide access to vast wealth we know to be there; to wealth we strongly suspect is there; and, if recent experience be a guide, wealth beyond our present hopes and dreams.

It will promote the convenience of public travel above the Arctic Circle and provide for orderly development and conservation of the Arctic. It will provide access to state lands and facilitate better environmental control of the same lands.

It will expedite and augment the state's revenues.

But, more than this, we know that the highway is an integral part of the trans Alaska pipeline system that must be built if the oil from the North Slope is to move to market through Alaska.

Because of a deep and continuing concern over the effects on Alaska and her people of the delays that have plagued the proposed pipeline, my administration has been working for months to facilitate the project. It is that deep concern that brings me before you today.

We have spared no energy or time in our efforts to get on with this project that is so vital to Alaska's future.

Last week at this time I was in Washington, D.C., with a distinguished group of Alaskans -- legislators, business, labor and conservation leaders who compromised my emergency task force.

I cannot praise those people highly enough. They deserve the thanks of all Alaskans for the outstanding job they did in going about their assigned duties in the nation's capital.

We went to Washington with a story to tell; we told our story and also listened to the other side and Alaska is better off today because we made that trip.

My request of you today is that you appropriate up to $120 million to construct the permanent highway north and that you authorize the state to build it by contracting with a corporation formed by the Trans Alaska Pipeline System.

The state is to be reimbursed by TAPS for the $120 million, or the actual cost of the construction, whichever is lesser.

It is only by contracting with the TAPS corporation that we can take advantage of the engineering work and mobilization that already has been done.

We must remember that we are actually talking about a highway to the Arctic Ocean from Livengood. The first section of that road, from Livengood to the Yukon River, has been completed by TAPS at a cost of $19.4 million.

As I said earlier, unprecedented circumstances exist in Alaska today.

Without the permanent highway, and the construction of the pipeline, Alaska's future social, economic growth and financial stability could be severely damaged.

Let us look at some particulars.

Work stoppage on the North Slope highway and pipeline will result in immediate significantly increased unemployment in central and southcentral Alaska. Monthly unemployment rates will be from 50 per cent to 100 per cent higher than normal, depending on the slack picked up by offsetting construction projects.

Alaska, statewide, would lose employment growth of about 2,400 in 1970, 3,300 in 1971, and 4,300 in 1972. Projected population growth loss would be 3,900 in the first year, rising to 12,800 with a three-year delay. Total dollar loss to Alaska's economy is estimated to be $60 million after one year, rising to over $400 million after three years.

Two or three years ago, faced with these circumstances, Alaska would have been powerless to turn the tide.

Times have changed somewhat. True, we cannot authorize construction of the pipeline at this time; but we can get on with the building of the highway to forestall the disastrous economic consequences that are sure to result if it is not built.

A copy of the agreement between the state and TAPS has been given to the Senate President and Speaker this morning.

However, even if there were no reimbursement agreement, I would still recommend the building of this highway.

Some possible difficulties remain concerning gravel sites, but I am confident they can be resolved in a short time. The administration will continue to work on these points while you consider the proposal.

There are those who do not believe the state should build such a highway. They say the state's resources should be used almost solely for sewer and water facilities, schools, and housing.

The budget and the package of investment legislation which I proposed both provide for extensive upgrading of such facilities throughout Alaska.

I have reviewed the budget I submitted to you in January and I find no reason to propose changes in that document or any of the other administration investment proposals.

I am asking simply that we take $120 million out of the general fund to build a highway to state secondary specifications. That money is to be returned to the state and will go back into the general fund to be invested. The loss of interest revenue that would accrue from the investment of these funds will be more than offset by increased tax revenues and other numerous benefits resulting from the project.

At this crucial time in our history, we must give our full measure to the establishment of a firm economic base that will allow for steady economic and social growth.

To do any less would be to betray the public trust and confidence that has been placed in us.

It is not acceptable to me to have the cities of Anchorage Fairbanks and Valdez and the rest of the state poised for the promised economic boom only to have it delayed time and time again.

The uncertainty places us in a sort of limbo where planning and developing for the needs of the future is almost impossible.

For the first time since statehood, we have the means to propel ourselves out of the limbo and we cannot do any less.

We have been assured that the pipeline will indeed be built, but we must not sit idly by and wait. Let's get on with the building of the highway so there won't be any more delay necessary once the construction permit is granted.

If the highway is not built before the pipeline construction permit is granted, the completion of the pipeline will be delayed by a year. That delay will result in the loss of millions of dollars to the state in royalties and severance taxes.

We have been assured by Secretary Hickel and officials of the companies involved that no major route change for the pipeline is contemplated or necessary so that should pose no problem for the highway construction.

The highway will conform to the stipulations agreed upon between the interior department and TAPS, and will further conform to state secondary highway standards as approved by the Bureau of Public Roads.

Ever since last January 12, when the second session of the Sixth Alaska Legislature convened, we have heard it said over and over again that this is the most important legislative session in Alaska's history. Certainly nobody here quarrels with that assessment.

We have recognized that the needs of Alaskans lie far beyond the scope of any single party and I am confident we will continue to work together in a spirit of cooperation to meet those needs.

We are determined to do that which is right as well as that which is necessary.

I urge your favorable and speedy approval of this proposal.

Thank You."

Mr. Jackson:

I talked with Dick Bradley re N.S. Road public hearing and the desire to have answers to our questions by then. He suggested calling Sol. Mitchell Melick in Washington, D.C., but didn't think they could have answers by then. I got the numbers for both Mr. Melick and Mr. Wade - in Anchorage. What is your wish?

MEMORANDUM

TO: Representative Barry Jackson
Chairman, House Committee on the Judiciary

DATE: April 29, 1970

FROM: John S. Hedland
Director of Litigation
Alaska Legal Services Corporation

Mr. Art Peterson of the Judiciary Committee's staff has requested that Alaska Legal Services, along with various other organizations, present its views as to the legality of state construction of an access road for the Trans Alaska Pipeline System. Since the Committee is presumably considering legislation which would provide a sufficient framework of state law for such a project, these comments are limited to whether such action would contravene any provisions of federal law. In addition, they are not directed to the fiscal or other propriety of such action. Finally, it should be noted that this office represents clients whose vital interests would be affected by any action or non-action with respect to construction of a TAPS road, and these comments are necessarily offered in that context. In this regard, it should also be noted that we have previously supplied a special subcommittee of this committee, chaired by Representative Fink, with a complaint filed by this office in Village of Allakaket, et al. v. Miller, et al., U.S. District Court, District of Alaska, No. A-45-70. This case raises some of the questions within the scope of this memorandum.

Simply put, the question of the state's proposed action is whether there is any provision in federal law authorizing state construction of a road, acquisition of a right-of-way, or conveyance to a third party of a right-of-way over land which is (1) federally owned and (2) subject to "Indian title" or the right of aboriginal use and occupancy. The only provisions relating to state acquisition of rights of way over federal or Indian land of which we are aware are 25 U.S.C. §357 and 43 U.S.C. §932.

25 U.S.C. §357 provides for state condemnation, with the award of just compensation, of "(l)ands alloted in severalty to Indians." This statute is inapplicable to "Indian title" lands, and could conceivably provide for state acquisition of a right of way only over isolated portions of the TAPS route which traversed Native allotments. Even as to such lands, the statute is probably unavailable at present, due to the land freeze. See discussion, infra.

43 U.S.C. §932 provides as follows:

> The right of way for the construction of highways over public lands, not reserved for public uses, is hereby granted.

Section 932 is a federal offer of a right of way which must be accepted by the state in accordance with state law. 43 C.F.R. §2234. 2-5(b). This section is inapplicable to lands held in "Indian title" by Natives, and does not authorize extinguishment of "Indian title." Bennett County v. United States, 394 F.2d 8 (8th Cir. 1968). Moreover, the section is inapplicable at present with respect to any federally owned lands--whether or not subject to "Indian title--because of the land freeze, P.L.O. 4582, 43 C.F.R. Ch. 1, Appendix. The land freeze withdraws, until the end of 1970, all otherwise available federal land in Alaska > from all forms of appropriation under the public land laws (except locations for metalliferous minerals) . . . for the determination and protection of the rights of the native Aleuts, Eskimos, and Indians of Alaska.

Modifications to the land freeze by the Interior Secretary are authorized, but none have been made which would permit state construction of the TAPS road. On January 7, 1970, Secretary Hickel issued P.L.O. 4760 (35 Fed. Reg. 424) which modified P.L.O. 4582 so as to permit him to issue such a right-of-way, which he has not yet done. Nor does a "Notice of Proposed Classification of Lands for Multiple Use Management" at 35 Fed. Reg. 16-17, creating a "utility and transportation corridor" in northern Alaska, have the effect of lifting the land freeze. The effect of the corridor's creation was merely to segregate the land from location under various homestead, allotment and mining laws, and the notice expressly provides that it > will not affect . . . the determination and protection of the rights of the Native Aleuts, Eskimos and Indians of Alaska.

Finally, part of the proposed TAPS route, in the Stevens Village and Rampart areas, crosses land classified as a "powersite" for the Rampart Dam project by PLO 3520 (30 Fed. Reg. 271); see also 28 Fed. Reg. 2826-31, 3558, and 4040. Such lands are not "public lands, not reserved by public uses" within the meaning of section 932. 16 U.S.C. §818 provides that lands classified as a powersite are reserved "from entry, location or other disposal under the laws of the United States" unless permitted by the Federal Power Commission or by Congress. No such permission has been given.

It should be pointed out that the existing Livengood road (south of the Yukon) was constructed under the authority of 43 U.S.C. §932. In that case, both the land freeze (PLO 4582) and the power-site classification (PLO 3520) were expressly modified by the Interior Secretary to permit state acquisition of a right-of-way under §932. See RLO 4717 (34 Fed. Reg. 17170) and PLO 4676 (34 Fed. Reg. 13415). Neither has been so modified with respect to the proposed extension north of the Yukon. Moreover, as to the Stevens Village protest area, which lies along its route, the Secretary appears to be enjoined from so doing by the terms of a preliminary injunction entered April 3, 1970, in Native Village of Allakaket, et al., v. Hickel, (U.S. District Court, District of Columbia, No. 706-70) This order enjoins the Secretary:

> from directly or indirectly: Issuing or granting any person or corporation a right-of-way for either a pipeline or a road through (the Stevens Village protest area) without the consent of the proper tribal and/or band officials of Stevens Village.

Mr. John M. Elliott
Executive Director

Dear John:

Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 589 amended contains sections 19.40.034 through 19.40.037, relating to an oil and gas severance tax. Wording of these provisions of the bill has caused concern among several members of the House that the provisions are either unconstitutional or present serious legal ramifications. Among the more significant questions raised are the following:

1. Do the provisions violate the equal protection or due process clauses of the state and federal constitution by imposing a tax on all oil and gas production regardless of whether or not the producer benefits from the proposed pipeline or the road?

2. Are the provisions of section 19.40.034 discriminatory because of variances; i.e.,
   (a) Is the tax on North Slope production only or on all production in the state?

   (b) Does the tax terminate when the amount reimbursed plus interest is paid or the amount not reimbursed plus interest is paid?

3. If the tax is levied to obtain reimbursement of funds not required to be reimbursed by an agreement, does the tax constitute a breach of the agreement by the state?

4. Since the tax is imposed on all producers, if the road contractor does not make reimbursement does this constitute delegation of the state's taxing authority?

5. Does the tax constitute a violation of Article 9, section 7, relating to dedicated funds?

I would appreciate your immediate response to these questions in particular and your comments on these provisions of the bill in general.

Very truly yours,

Chancy Croft
State Representative

IN REPLY REFER TO

UNITED STATES
DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20240

MAY 22 1970

Honorable Barry W. Jackson
Chairman
Judicial Committee
Alaska House of Representatives
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This letter is in reply to the several telegrams we have received from your Committee and specifically to the eight questions which you presented to our Regional Solicitor on May 7 in Juneau.

With respect to the first question, we anticipate that the Justice Department, which represents this Department in the actions brought by the Native Village of Allakaket et. al. and by The Wilderness Society et. al., will bring the matter of the State of Alaska proposal for a road from the Yukon River to Prudhoe Bay to the attention of the Court, by appropriate motions, at such time as we have a definite and specific factual situation to present to the Court for a ruling. We do not believe that the matter of the road is now in a posture sufficient for presentation to the Court.

With respect to your second question, we do not believe that the injunction in either the Wilderness case or the Allakaket case would in any way affect the right of Alaska to proceed under R. S. 2477. The State is not a party to either action. We do believe, however, that the injunctions, and particularly that in The Wilderness Society case, may affect the right of the Secretary to grant permits for airports or gravel incident to the construction of the road. We will not be able to reach any final conclusion in this regard, however, until the State has taken final action on the road.

In answer to the third question, we do not at this time foresee any difficulty in obtaining a change in the Rampart withdrawal.

In answer to the fourth question, we are not in a position to give any meaningful estimate as to when the pipeline right-of-way will be issued. The Trans Alaska Pipeline system is providing us with additional information which will have to be evaluated before we can make such an estimate.

In reply to your fifth question, we believe that, pursuant to Secretary Hickel's commitment to the Interior Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, we will have to consult with those Committees with respect to any modifications of PLO 4582 for gravel for the road or any other matter relating to the road.

In answer to the sixth question, it is legally possible for the Secretary to modify the land freeze order.

We do not believe we are in a position, at this time, to provide answers to the seventh and eighth questions. They raise particularly complex and difficult legal issues that can best be answered only in the context of a specific factual situation.

Sincerely yours,

Solicitor

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY MEMBERS OF THE LEGISLATURE ON THE LEGAL ASPECTS OF THE N.S. ROAD

1. What are the plans of the Department of Interior with regard to the pending litigation that has been brought by both the Wilderness Society and others, and Stevens Village and others, that is, those in the District of Columbia courts, with respect to the proposal by the State to build the road? This is to include both the right-of-way and any permits that may be necessary.

2. Whether it is the position of the department that the injunctions that have been issued in any way would affect the right of the state to proceed to accept the right-of-way under the statute and whether or not the injunctions would in any way affect the right of the Secretary of Interior to grant permits for airports or for gravel, incident to the construction of the road?

3. Whether the Secretary of the Department sees any difficulty in obtaining a change in the Rampart withdrawal?

4. Aside from litigation, what time frame may be involved in the permits themselves?

5. Whether or not the department expects to have to consult with the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee on any phase of the state road? If so , what phase?

6. Would it be legally possible for the Secretary to, in a case of this kind, modify the land freeze order to the extent that it would cover the route of the proposed road where it would be crossing federal lands?

7. When someone buys or takes property from the federal government they theoretically have access afforded to cross intervening federal lands to that property, do they not? (In this case the state has obtained lands in the Prudhoe Bay area.) Wouldn't the state have road access across federal intervening lands to get to the state lands?

8. I have seen the theory that the 1866 Act is not applicable to lands to which there is Indian title. If this is so, in the absence of the law suit brought by the Indians on their land claims, what would be the position of the Secretary as guardian to allow effective acceptance of the offer as in the statute? Obviously he can't do anything under the statute, but, perhaps he could refuse to give permits for gravel and airports?

HOUSE AND SENATE JOINT JUDICIARY COMMITTEE MEETING MINUTES OF THE MEETING
MAY 6, 1970

Meeting was called to order at 8:10 p.m. by Chiarman Barry Jackson of the House Judiciary Committee. Present were: Banfield, Harris, Metcalf, Orbeck, Rettig, Cornelius, Fink, Senator Miller, Lewis, Palmer, Merdes, and Rader. Senators Begich and Josephson were also in attendance.

Mr. Jackson gave an outline of the program by saying that the hearing would commence with Robert Ward, Secretary of State, being first on the program; followed by Commissioner Beardsley and his staff. Mr. Robert Price, for the AG's office, would give his testimony following this.

Robert Ward: I do not have a formal presentation tonight. Our purpose is to react to the wishes of your committee. In this regard, we did furnish the basic framework of the memoranda of agreement with TAPS. The TAPS people left on Friday to circulate this among their own people and will be back Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday of this week. As yet we have not received their signed copies of this agreement. We have received confirmation by wire from the major participants Since that time, we have been finalizing construction contracts. We do not have copies available but can discuss the provision of those contracts with you tonight. Tomorrow there will be hearings held with State Affairs and TAPS. I would like to point out that we have with us tonight Mr. Bob Price, from the AG's office. Besides myself, Mr. Price, Commissioner Beardsley, Deputy Commissioner Scougal, Commissioner Kelly, and Henry Pratt were on the negotiating team. John Becker, Chief Design Engineer, is also with us tonight. These people will be available to respond to your questions.

Senator Josephson: Question that occurs to me is in regard to Senator Rader's making a public proposal that the reimbursement on the road construction be done by adding to the severance tax on the North Slope production. What is your feeling on this?

Robert Ward: The governor felt the road was necessary whether or not the state got the money back.

Senator Josephson: I am interested in whether or not the administration had made an economic study of the effect of the state picking up the entire cost and not asking for reimbursement. What difference would this make? Particularly participating on an equity basis? Mr. Jackson did not want to pursue this line of questioning at this point.

Representative Cornelius: If it works out that the participants cannot agree on the memoranda, is the state prepared to go ahead and build the road without the pipeline participants?

Robert Ward: We don't think there will be basic disagreement on this.

Rep. Fink: I think Cornelius' question was that if the oil companies do not care to sign this agreement, would you change your position?

Robert Ward: No, because they have already agreed to sign.

Rep. Cornelius: Do we need this road regardless of whether the oil companies participate or not?

Robert Ward: Yes.

Mr. Beardsley and Mr. Price were asked to testify at this time. Mr. Jackson related that he had a memo from Alaska Legal Services that he had requested from them. He handed these out to the members that were seated at the table.

Mr. Price asked to explain that he was testifying for Attorney General Edwards. He also wanted to briefly explain their reaction to the memo that was furnished to him by Mr. Jackson. The position of the AG is that this memo from John Hedland, copy of which was addressed to Barry Jackson at his request, discusses certain questions which are at present in litigation in the courts. The question which is raised in the memo, the ethics question, is raised by the cannons of ethics which govern the testimony which I may give tonight. This would prohibit an attorney, expeically in the AG's office, from discussing questions that are presently under litigation. He read from a supreme court decision of 1959 to back this position. Generally speaking it is improper and contrary to the code of ethics for any attorney to publicly discuss a case in which he is or maybe interested. In that respect, the AG is under no less of an obligation than any other attorney. I would like to point out to the committee that if they wish me to testify with reference to the memo and answer the questions raised by Mr. Hedland, it should be done in executive session, or under conditions where this testimony will not be made public. ----------or that I have been specifically asked to testify. Mr. Jackson after consultation with committee members requested Mr. Price to testify. Mr. Price also stated that circumstances would require him to comment before a legislative committee. The committee does request Mr. Price to comment on these issues.

Commissioner Beardsley will testify first--Most of what I have prepared related more to the merits of the case rather than the legal aspects. I may be able to answer questions.

Rep. Jackson: You do have a full set of the drawings and documents that were referred to in the ----------. Have you had adequate opportunity to review them?

Beardsley: Yes, sir. I became aware in the late fall last year. I requested my chief engineer, John Becker, to review the designs to that point and to make any suggestions for the design that would be more in conformity with out own designs. A number of meetings were held and some changes were made. The design that we are considering is not a snap decision. This is the result of 3-5 months study. It became apparent that it could become a part of our state system.

Rep. Jackson: Do the drawings substantially meet the standards of secondary highways?

Beardsley: State secondary highway standards are not hard and fast criteria. They are living criteria by continually being under change. They are based on the American Association of State Highways recommendations designed for the lower "48". They are modified by our staff in accord with Alaskan conditions. They are designed with the objective of getting the State of Alaska under the Federal Highway Aid Program. Our standards must be concurred in and approved by the BPR. Under normal procedure this is done on a project by project basis. These are not fixed standards. With the company design consultants for TAPS we tried to bring their design in as close conformity with our normal practice of constructing secondary state highways as possible. We have conditions like the Brooks Range. This range has never been traversed with highways before so we don't know all the problems that we will encounter. For all practical purposes and from review plans and field notes and documents along with aerial inspection, we are satisfied that in excess of 90 per cent of this project will be no more difficult than the 50 miles of existent highway. Grades will be no greater than 9 per cent. These construction people in the field may encounter special problems. These have to be acceptable in highway construction. The fact is that since there will be no federal monies involved---------.

Jackson: If federal money were involved, do you think that all sections would meet federal standards? (Just give your own opinion.)

Beardsley: In my expert opinion, nearly all would receive the concurrence of the BPR. Although there will be some field changes.

Jackson: Have you considered culvert size problems?

Beardsley: What the designers have done is size the culverts knowing that some will have to be changed. We will be influenced from our Fish and Game Department and the Department of Interior. The TAPS peopls have already sent up a ----- what they expect to encounter. This is normal practice. Some will have to be changed. We will probably have some surplus culvert.

Jackson: Has your department and TAPS been in contact with State Fish and Wildlife?

Beardsley: Yes.

Jackson: In the memo it says that the state will not be responsible for maintenance during the time it is being used by TAPS. Will there be any commitment that they would be maintaining it?

Beardsley: The contractors working under this agreement will provide maintenance of the highway. Following this, we don't exactly know when the pipeline construction will occur. Before the road, then the maintenance of the road will be continued by the subcontractors. As long as we haven't accepted the road it will be maintained by the subcontractors. The state will not be obligated for maintenance and implies that TAPS will be. It is my understanding that they will.

Begich: Do you have the construction contract and the corporation to be formed?

Beardsley: We will furnish copies as soon as they are available.

Jackson: Will you have serious routing problems? Movement of earth; slide areas; etc. Do you anticipate necessary field changes in construction?

Beardsley: They are provided for. The first 57 miles will be as difficult as any construction problems that will be encountered. We have established as a joint team with TAPS design consultants and BLM, Fish and Game, to protect the environment and to cause this construction to become what is now cited as a model of construction in the Arctic. We have learned from this and can qualify that by saying the contractors made and we have worked out new techniques and the arrangement by which we determine having field changes.

Jackson: Is the general routing dictated by the pipeline routing? There has to be a comparison over another routing if there are no other considerations involved, especially in construction or future maintenance cost and utility for an all year round road. Do you have any comments on that?

Beardsley: I would like to correct an impression. The pipeline was seeking in its constructive design the same kind of materials and security that a road would seek. And, in fact, TAPS investigators did a great deal of work that was a great assistance to the highway department. It is a fact that the highways department favors the route that TAPS has picked. This general route is the most favorable route. The Anatuvik Pass, the winter road, is different than an all year round road. This first one is good for a winter road or trail, but when you are seeking to build a permanent road, that is another matter. North of Anatuvik Pass there are a great many problems, such as overflowing streams, etc. This is a traditional route, especially as a winter trail. The difference in elevation in the other route, but we feel that the TAPS suggestion is favored.

Jackson: Is there any opportunity for federal assistance on this route:

Beardsley: This is a definite point. Nearly all of our federal apportionment is already listed to the upgrading of the existing highway system. We have succeeded in completing 1/3 of this program. The monies that we have diverted have been nominal. We have only extended the highway system by 10 per cent. If we take our federal aid monies and devote them to this top priority program and improve our maintenance factor, we have a 15-year program ahead of us. What I am saying is that the hard facts are--we don't have federal monies fo this highway.

T. Miller: What would be your best guess after the legislature appropriates money, what mechanical things would than happen?

Beardsley: The first thing is to send a team headed by John Becker and including Woody Johanson to conduct an on the ground and aerial survey of the route to satisfy that there are no field problems readily seen. Probably assign two construction inspectors to each segment of the highway. There will be seven, I believe. Then the field changes that are necessary will be made. We anticipate that this would be the first phase, and it would take approximately ten days.

Senator Miller: Do you anticipate fairly quick action here? Would you be able to move rather quickly? Fink asked that if it weren't for the pipeline, would you be recommending this road to be built?

Beardsley: I would work in this direction. This isn't part of our five-year highway program.

Fink: Isn't it true that the primary reason is because of the pipeline?

Beardsley: The five-year program is for reconstruction of our existing highway network. If we had an expansion program, this would be our first priority. TAPS is to reimburse us less any federal funds.

B----: Is there any reason that this is not in the contract?

Beardsley: If we wanted to dilute our present programs, we could go ahead and build this.

.... You have mentioned several times that BPR doesn't have anything to do with this road. Do you anticipate that they will have any inspectors on the road at all? TAPS is using it .....that the state doesn't have any obligation to maintain it? If it is a public road for public use and when will it become available for public use?

Beardsley: After we accept it. I still have the right to close it for safety purposes. We will have to have some means for safe travel on the highways. If there is no pipeline, then we will have to make special provision for safety on the highway.

..... TAPS as a cooperative matter.

Beardsley: I can't give you a concrete answer to that question.

.....Do you believe that the road will be able to be used simultaneously along with TAPS? If the public is using it, the state then has the obligation to maintain the road?

Beardsley: TAPS will be required to maintain it.

.... In regard to the bills sent down---one eliminates the authorization of contract by bid, why?

Beardsley: Two reasons: (1) It appears that we should deal with the existing contractors through TAPS. Subcontractors through TAPS have already gone through a bidding procedure. They are there because they are successful bidders. This is not under state procedures but they are selected and evaluated as providing the most road for the least amount of dollars. The intent of the law would be threatened in this case. We get into a mish-mash of renegotiation between the new contractors and the ones existing there. There wouldn't be any construction season left. We felt that they were there and that their existing arrangement with TAPS should be honored.

.... cost plus contract? Set fee?

Beardsley: The contract limits the state's obligation to $120 M; if the cost is less we pay this amount. If the cost exceeds $120 M TAPS will pick up the rest. Two types of contractors--target contract and the other is a unit contract. Because of the scope, the cost will fluctuate. There will be a new corporation formed which in turn will pick up the contractor with the prime bid ers on the road.

Jackson: This appears to be a contract on a cost only basis. No profit provided for that corporation. Is this, then, a nonprofit corporation?

Fink: As of this moment, does the state have any environment stipulations?

Beardsley: There will be a number of state departments involved besides highways. HW and Fish and Game. They were also involved in the first 57 miles.

Fink: At this stage, do you anticipate any federal people on the road? Especially in regard to federal stipulations?

Beardsley: BLM people will be up there. They were also there for the first 57 miles. We have a good working basis with these people.

Merdes: His question related how to determine what was "economically feasible"? Defines that as a permit to build the pipeline with TAPS routing currently in existence.

Mr. Price: ..... sum of the money that might be termed cost--whether or not TAPS organization has a sum which is its proposed cost which makes it economically feasible. The latest figure is $1,300,000,000. There are a couple of factors that should be brought out. This is planned for underground pipeline. They are getting serious about above ground construction. The factor of whether or not it will be above or below might make a difference. I can't speak to the question. You might ask TAPS representatives. When the governor told the Legislature that the highway would further conform to state secondary highway system..... The Governor was in error in referring to BPR. Those are the design that we had.

Senator Josephson: Have these drawings been agreed upon by the Department of Interior and TAPS? Fink mentioned that there would be difficulty on gravel pits. What difficulties, and how much gravel?

Price: The question that you are raising, Senator, relating to the gravel permits is the question that is raised in the litigation back in Washington, D. C., in the Wilderness Society versus Hickel. In that action a preliminary injunction was issued by Judge Hart 23 April 1970. It would be helpful if I read from that and discussed it a bit more fully. (Read from the case.).....hereby enjoined from issuing a permit with the TAPS system to any person or corporations. .....Construction of a haul-road over public lands of the United States from Prudhoe Bay to the Yukon. .....to the use of gravel for such a road. .....perhaps it should differ on the haul-road. This is in the case against Governor Miller--gravel from public lands. The language of the injunction states that it is deposited on a dedication of the road with the pipeline, however, if the state constructs a road independently of the pipeline system the two are split off. You have a changed condition. At the present time the Secretary of Interior is enjoined from issuing to any persor or corporations.... This referred to TAPS. The use of gravel from public lands is cited. What are public lands, when you consider the 1866 Road Act? The permits for gravel did not require a permit, furthermore, there is also the possibility that gravel found in navigable waters that belong to the state already belong to the state.

Josephson: Some people are concerned that ....they think we have done something. Doesn't the state have any plan to test the theories that you have recited so that the legislature can be sure that the passage of the Governor's program would be barred?

Price: There would be different ways for this to take place. Request the court to reconsider its preliminary injunction on the basis of changed conditions. .....draw rest in litigation filed by ALS in the Anchorage District Court where the state is preparing an answer. I am not sure when this will be filed.

Josephson: Commissioner, normally if there were problems in the field the contractor can process claims on the job. .....with the fact that we are relying on design by the parties in the general contractors corporations. Our liability is limited to $120 M. There is a claims section.

Price: In the target contracts..... In the two contracts that are set units there will be a clause in it. Commonly found in government contracts.

Beardsley: If total cost came below $120 M there would be the possibility of increasing that cost by such claims above the $120 M. After having reviewed their construction quotes that we had in, it would be fortunate to build this road for under $120 M.

Cornelius: You have indicated that the construction problems north of the Yukon would be much the same as south of the Yukon.

Beardsley: No, south of the Yukon is similar to other roads already built. When you are out of the mountain range they are similar to the section of Livengood and the Yukon Road. The cost per mile for the 57 miles was 19.4 M dollars. $340 per mile. We anticipate $327,000 per mile projection for the entire road.

Cornelius: Fink asked about your 5-year program. Did TAPS propose to build a road to Prudhoe Bay? Would your office have considered building a road into that area?

Beardsley: The problem is involved. Basically you have to envision a projected need. Then you have to remember that the 5-year program is for reconstruction of existing highways. No extension of new roads was in the new program.

Cornelius: On Page 14 there is a reference to a possibility that the federal program may pick up part of the cost. Are you going to go ahead with plans to try and get federal participation?

Beardsley: I am concerned that we are so limited that to do the job we have at hand that I would consider it not prudent to devote any federal money to new highways.

.....If you follow the general federal requirements would it be possible at a later time to make an application for funds to reimburse the state for a percentage of the costs involved?

Beardsley: I read the contract that I can't see how this could be done. It will be part of the highway system. It can be improved with federal highway funds at a later date.

..... What I am getting at, we can't make an application with BPR but is it possible to go ahead and use what we have ....and then get that approved at a later date and also get reimbursed at a later date.

Beardsley: I talked with the District Engineer. He thought that it would be difficult. Mr. Fink already asked about the maintenance. The state is responsible because it was a state road. The question arose that in the contract the state will not be responsible.

.....Can't the state contract with TAPS to maintain this?

Beardsley: This was done this winter.

Orbeck: There seems to be a lot of confusion. Isn't it true that they were bid under unit cost system? On the unit cost basis?

Beardsley: .....1-5 year bid on a target brief and the subcontractors benefits vary.

Orbeck: Isn't it cost plus? Isn't it true then that Livengood cost was high because it was started in the winter.

Beardsley: This road would be built in the summer and should cost less.

Senator Palmer: You thought that you would be surprised if it cost less than $120 M. I have hear that it might cost $250 M.

Beardsley: Anything in excess would be paid by TAPS. This would be whether the permit was granted or not.

Beardsley: Let me state that I understand it that there is somethink under $40 M in mobilization cost and administrative costs in addition to this, anything in excess they will pick up the remainder. This does not include $19 M they spent on the Livengood Road.

Rader: Do you feel that the route of the pipeline is certain now?

Beardsley: This isn't my area to judge.

Rader: I notice that the contract provides that if it goes an alternate route there would be no repayment. Are we taking the pipeline companies word on that?

Secretary of State Ward: This gets into policy--major deviations could negate their having to reimburse the state. We have had a strong assurance as we can get and have indicated that there was no change in their plans and the route that they favored was the route throught the Detrick Pass. ....no desire to move the pipeline. If they got a permit that said you cannot construct it through the other pass instead of the Detrick and they are not party to that then their agreement says that the state would be reimbursed on the road that did follow the pipeline route.

Rader: Doesn't this make a different a state ris and not a pipeline risk? They specifically have it..... We are relying on the pipeline for the route and we don't have a choice. Is the state taking the risk or the pipeline?

Secretary of State Ward: The realities of the situation is that they will go along that route. They already follow that.

Jackson: To close this line of thinking--let us return to Commissioner Beardsley.

Metcalf: Do you intend to let the public use the road?

Beardsley: This will be maintained 12 months out of the year--when the state takes it over. Use would be based on volume of traffic.

Metcalf: Do you have an estimate of maintanance--such as $2,000 or $2,500 per mile?

Fink: Federal government allows so many dollars which comes from highway user taxes. This is divided among the states according to population and other factors. Most are apportioned in the neighborhood of 94% to 6% for state dollars. There are certain things they will not participate in. In other areas you will find 88% federal dolaars to 12% state dollars. The ratio is so high because of your high precentage of federal lands. This amounts to $48 M per year.

Fink: Any federal funds that we apply to the road have to be taken away from other programs.

Beardsley: We can use it any way that we see fit. Any federal funds that we put on the road will have to come from other programs. Livingood is not a public road today. Until the pipeline is completed in accordance with the agreement with TAPS.

Fink: What about North of the Yukon to Prudhoe Bay?

Beardsley: It will be a public road. You have no way to get to it until such time as the pipeline is completed. If the pipeline construction is in the picture. Before the pipeline is completed it is almost a fair statement to say that it is not a state road. It will be limited public use.

Jackson: Do you anticipate that there will be limited public use from Livengood to Yukon.

Beardsley: We have discussed this with them. We have merely agreed that there was a problem but we don't have that worked out.

Jackson: Who will provide the Yukon crossing?

Beardsley: There will be an ice bridge in the winter and a ferry in the summer, both operated by TAPS. Following that we will negotiate with TAPS.

Jackson: How many months out of the year do you expect to be able to use this road?

Beardsley: 10 months.

Robert Ward: .....federal provision in the contract.....
The inclusion for repayment to TAPS if any federal funds were received by the state. Our original draft did not have that in there.....not devote any funds available and not jeopardize the construction of this road. The participants asked if we would object in the event that we would get any reimbursement. That is why it is in there.

Senator Miller: What general braod public policies bind public roads. As Commissioner do you feel that the North Slope Road has a value as a logistic notwithstanding the pipeline? Do you feel that the state would feel justified to build this road even if the pipeline were not built? Should the state bear the risk rather than the companies in the route deviations?

Beardsley: This might not be an important consideration. First on the value of logistics rather than a tool to build the pipeline. The risk isn't too great then because the state can recover because of the.....

Robert Ward: I would like to put any businessman's mind at ease as to where the risks lie. Every program that we have invested in whether by the administration or legislature sponsored, in any case, it requires an appropriation of funds. It requires a lot of money. If it is to be done in an orderly fashion. The administration and the legislature have recognized that we have to have continuing revenue. Oil is the number one thing now. Along with that in marketing the oil we can accomplish that and get the road too. If it is the administration and the commissioner that the road will serve a basic purpose besides the pipeline then some of these questions in terms of broad policy and other methods that the state can use to recover its cost if this agreement doesn't work out.

Senator Hammond: The states liability would not exceed $120 million regardless.

Ward: We are assured that TAPS will underwrite a road regardless of cost.

Hammond: Or does this mean at TAPS option? They will say we don't want the road to go any further. Is it assuredly going to go from point "A" to point "B"?

Cornelius: Fink brought out an interesting point about public highways in regard to Livengood to the Yukon. The basic reason that we would appropriate for this road without an absolute guarantee from TAPS is because it is important for supplying the oil fields by the trucking industry. Don't you think it is important that at the time for scheduled completion of the road north of the Yukon be a public road the same as south of the Yukon?

Beardsley: We have not reached any formal agreement on this yet. Isn't any real strong... .of making both parts a public road at the same time. I mean on the part of TAPS.

Cornelius: Why couldn't this be included in the agreement?

Beardsley: We have discussed this but there has been no agreement at the present time. We don't know what the safety standards will be. If we can work out this arrangement without impeding the construction..... Traditionally the highway program has used about 15% of the budget. The $120 million is roughly 15% of the $900 million.

Rettig: According to the timetable expressed in the agreement, sometime before June, 1971 the road is finished, the state is reimbursed, and then they finish the pipeline. At that point, who owns the road?

Beardsley: The state owns the road.

Rettig: How about maintenance equipment along the road. Is that part of the transfer to the state?

Beardsley: No, that would be TAPS construction equipment.

Rettig: How much does it cost to put in the ice bridge?

Beardsley: $25,000 per year. .....That is our part of the road.

Rettig: Would the ferry be part of the road system?

Beardsley: I will be negotiating with them.

Rettig: Did I understand that the participants are to use their best interests to get their permit. After that they are not obligated to try anymore.

Rader: The road has other purposes. Assume that the road was built to Anatuvik Pass. Would a second road to the slope be authorized?

Beardsley: Yes, this opens a great recreational area.

Rader: If TAPS built a road to Anatuvik Pass, would you suggest a parallel road?

Beardsley: If we built a road over the route, we are talking about the state taking one route and TAPS another route, then we would have two routes to the slope. This would be a duplication. Thi: would not be a permanent road. It would be impossible to maintain this road.

Rader: Do you think that two roads would be justified?

Beardsley: At least part way. 'p to the vicinity of Anatuvik Pass. It will open up a new area there.

(Five minute recess)

Price: We have exempted the monies from state income tax. The corporation is not exempt from state tax.

Jackson: The contract would be written that this would not be a profit corporation.

Ward: Overhead is a part of the $120 million. The state.....

Jackson: Mention of airports at three locations. Are they to be state airports? Also what legal problems are involved in getting land for the airports?

Price: I may have some answers to these. As I understand the modifications to the land freeze, there have already been arrangements made for airports. I don't know whether or not they apply. There would have to be appropriate modification made for these airports. Or, if they are tied to the pipeline they would be covered by present exemption.

Ward: TAPS corporation has shown.....as part of the pipeline. Total number needed for the pipeline. This is for the airports not necessary to the road construction.

Jackson: Last sentence refers to the environmental provisions of the state. Could you provide us with a copy of those.

Price: I can provide a copy. Parties to the agreement anticipate that it may be necessary to get further modification in he land right-of-way under (USCA 932). It may be necessary to get permits from the federal government for gravel and other materials.

Jackson: What problems may be encountered?

Price: It may be necessary to get modifications from the land freeze to use these materials. It is a question of whether the.....with material necessary to have a further modification of the freeze or whether it is unnecessary because of the present modifications which we have.

Jackson: Would it be necessary to have Judge Hart modify his preliminary injunction?

Price: At the present time there is just different schools of what to do. Probably go to Judge Hart and ask that he modify his injunction in regard to the gravel sites. I think the changes are fairly good. Secretary Hickel has.....

Jackson: Question of the withdrawal for the Rampart Dam site.

Price: There has been an early modification of the Rampart site withdrawal for the road from Livengood to the Yukon River. There is still a portion which is in the withdrawal and we have assurances that there will be no problem in getting a modification on this. Power Commission and Secretary of Interior must act of this. This provides that once there has been a modification, the state has the first opportunity to take advantage of the power site withdrawal for the purposes of right-of-way.

Jackson: In a particular statute?

Price: I will furnish that after the hearing.

Jackson: It has also been suggested that even after that the land order is necessary to obtain right-of-way with or without being pushed by Native groups. This may present a problem.

Price: The state is involved in the litigation, we have no way of saying about those villages north of the Yukon. This is the only suit in which the state is presently involved. The suits in Washington D. C. and the other suit in Anchorage only involves TAPS or the Secretary of Interior, therefore, what I discuss would relate to the suits that have been filed..... Land freeze when the question was presented to the Senate Committee on Insular Affairs they did not feel that they.....for a road and the.....in no way affected the native land claims. I am not sure whether you want me to go into details of the litigation in Anchorage. It might take up more time than you would like to have occupied by a legal commentary on a memo.

Jackson: I will leave that up to the committee. Assuming that the suit was withdrawn, would there still be a problem as to whether or not you could obtain a right-of-way because of the comments in the memo?

Price: I don't see any. If there were necessity for a native village to pass through a tribe organized under the Indian Organization Act. It may sound that there were a number of hypothesis that had to be overcome.

Jackson: In paragraph 4--In that the company would pay all costs over $120 million rather than the state would have to pay this without reimbursement. That appears not to be in intent. I suggested that the language in the section should be amended to make it clear that while the state is agreeing to pay the corporations for additional costs it is limited solely to the funds that are advanced by TAPS.

Price: I think you are referring to the sentence in the event..... It is anticipated by that clause that if for example there is a cost overrun over $120 million that the participants of TAPS will furnish the money to the state to continue its payment to the general contractor who in turn will furnish it to his subs.

Jackson: Is that obligation on the part of TAPS without the limits or.....Nothing to do with the granting of the permits on the pipeline itself. Reimbursement of the state? Why the date June 1, 1971, was selected as a cut off date and what its purpose was?

Ward: I think the original discussion was to time that to the end of the road construction besides that the TAPS people would be binding upon them. Originally they didn't think it should be taking long.... time to the completion of the road. That is the main reason for that date.

Jackson: What happens if the permit is granted after that date?

Ward: If TAPS builds the pipeline then along the same route within two years after this date, they would reimburse under this agreement.

Jackson: The participants but not the total corporations then, they would be reimbursed according to the percent of their participation?

Ward: All of this gets tied up in the economically feasible permit. Definition, of course, if they get a permit that they agree to, that is when they June 1, 1971. They reimburse whether they build the pipeline or not. If they don't agree--this is the permit and the condition so onerous they say we can't build a pipeline. They would not be required to follow this. As long as they agree that it would be economically feasible is one thing and the permit is favorable they are forced to pay.

Jackson: For other reasons they do not want to build. There is no builtin incentive for them to continue. Even up until then. How do you define "good faith" and "best efforts"?

Ward: No provision for changes in the participation among the members of TAPS. Whether or not that may not present a problem.....especially if the pipeline is commenced after 1971. Then the provision is for the participation in accordance with the percentage of participation with TAPS. They are bound until then.

Jackson: I am confused on the last sentence on page 6. On the paragraph beginning "after the listing of the participants and on through page 7.

Ward: What you have are different alternatives--covered by the sentences that you referred to. If there is a legally defensible and economically feasible permit by 1971. Next constructing a pipeline basically along the same route from 1971-73. Participate in the reimbursement to the state with the percentage set out in the first paragraph on page 7. In the three...If they received the permit prior to 1971 for a different route than what they applied for, the state would only be reimbursed as to the portion that followed the pipeline.

Jackson: Why are you using the term "tax fees" permits and not used on page 6?

Ward: This is to cover the last question that you raised. Along about two years or three we wouldn't have the last sentence. We raised the question that if on July 1 you began to build the pipeline.....From then we started the two years. etc. We would get as much reimbursement as we could.

Jackson: On the definition section--Legally defensible. Permit the immediate construction of the TAPS. This raises the question in my mind, what if the permit is issued but there is litigation that holds up construction? Does this let the company off the hook? and they do proceed with the construction of the pipeline.

Price: If there were litigation which madethe permit grant invalid at the end of that litigation then the permit would have been one that would not have been legally defensible. This in no way makes the permit on that wasn't legally indefensible.

Jackson: I raised that question because on page 6 you have a good clause that one or more of the participants commences the pipeline. You are covered. If a permit is issued in the near future but litigation does hold up the construction of the pipeline until early 1971, what then? It seems to me that a strict reading of this language would let them off the hook.

Ward: There is strong concern for us too. They were to guard against what even though a remote possibility that perhaps by Congressional action it would not be legally possible. Economically feasible-- when the terms would be unable to be met by TAPS.

Jackson: The word immediate construction should be made to allow construction to be started by June 1, 1971. The other problem I have is.....the point has been raised about the design and cost. .....will not meet the Department of Interior requirements. There will have to be some major changes. What does this do to the plans we have now?

Beardsley: Suggested that the actual cost may not be any greater. I am reluctant to delve too deeply into this and TAPS people will be here tomorrow. In view of this, I think TAPS and the Department of Interior..... Their main hangup was they hadn't heard about how to build the pipeline above ground. TAPS would get engineering requirements for building above ground. They do have the designs ready now. The main difference was how much above the ground. They had room to move.....toward the limits of the possibilities of the Department of Interior.

Senator:
Earlier you indicated the state owns the gravel under the waters of the state. To use that gravel does the state have to get anyone's permission? Such as Corps of Engineers?

Beardsley: No, Senator, on the beds of submerged bodies of waters. There is a question about navigable. Once the beds of navigable waters have been defined.....

Senator: Are there adequate gravel beds under water between Prudhoe Bay and the Yukon?

Beardsley: At this time, we are not sure.

Senator: What steps did you take? Before the new corporation goes into operation?

Price: Right-of-way is all right now. No action is necessary. He read from the regulation--a federal code. 1866 Act. .....reference to a right-of-way by anyone under the 1866 statute. "No application should be filed under RS.....2777.....As no action on the part of government is necessary."

Fink: Is there a standing offer from the federal government to anyone?

Beardsley: You would have to get permits to use the gravel. There would have to be permits.

Fink: Contract, gravel permits, 200' right-of-way. If you aren't about to come up with the permits, do you consider this a legally binding contract?

Price: This will not be binding until you pass legislation. It is an agreement.

Fink: Could they go to court and sue on this.

Price: Yes. It is legal.

Fink: Is Employment Security Contribution a tax?

Price: This is more general than the language in the proposed bill. Advance payments.....it is always an advance against something. It is clear enough that they are paying some other money that they owe us. Monthly advance payments. When you advance something, you are paying something that will be due. They are giving us money which we will give to the general contractor who will use it for something else.

Borer: Roughly what is the cost of the road that you are presently .....road from Palmer to Fairbanks?

Beardsley: This is not available. I would say about $250 to $350 thousand per mile. This is my estimate.

Jackson: One point. I suggested to you that it will be necessary to put a clause to cover these additional payments beyond the $120 million. If they are paid to the state and intend to be funnelled.....to be..... subject to appropriation. We do this with certain federal actions with a wild card clause.

Price: It is in the appropriate act. There is a paragraph which is entitled "For reimbursement" which might cover that.

Rettig: Page 6 (1).....for all cost incurred if the permit is received by June 1, 1971. What is the implication of related.....Is this overhead type costs?

Beardsley: Primarily.

Jackson: Would the department be paid its overhead?

Beardsley: The department expects the pay or portion out of state funds.

Jackson: Does this mean that you would allocate up to the $120 million limit? A certain portio.. of department operations as they are related to the pipeline? Is that what it says?

Beardsley: The costs are defined in the construction contract which you will have shortly. They do not expect to pick up state costs. Costs related to and necessary for the construction. Not direct costs for moving gravel, say. Camp maintenance would be another one.

Price: The construction contract is incorporated by reference into this agreement. There is no one overriding document.

Jackson: Has this been signed by all of the parties?

Ward: No, it has not been signed by all parties.

Rettig: (2) Advance payment. Say, May 31, 1971. They have two years to come under this paragraph. 2% to 3 1/4%. Say if Home Pipeline construction undertook the job. 2% of $120 million isn't very much. .....if one can be completed at all.

Ward: That is on the basis of this agreement. Only to the percentage of their participation with TAPS.

Rettig: Doesn't the state have to take the risk of the dissolution of TAPS?

Ward: TAPS has indicated quite clearly that they would not.

Rettig: If I am reading it properly, this is binding on TAPS on June 1, 1971. After they decide.....this they do not have to pursue it any longer. It seems to me that it would be very easy for one of these participants to undertake construction on his own and allow the others to get off the hook. In which case none of the others would have to participate and then only to the percentage of their participation.

Ward: This agreement would bind them to the consortium.

Cornelius: One of the minorities to go and construct it by themselves and that way the state would be reimbursed only to the state as say 2% of the cost. Then sell its interest to the other companies and they have voided reimbursing the state within that two year period. They would not have proceeded in "good faith".....in order to get two more years.

Ward: There is no "good faith" requirements on the extra two years. This is only up until the 1971 date. We might consider putting that in there.

Cornelius: As you know there is a tremendous amount of money involved. There aren't any nice guys. In respect to Judge Hart's order, would you please read that portion again?

Ward: "order that the defendant agent's attorneys.....any persons in the act of consortium enjoined until final determination for an injunction and other relief from issuing a permit to the TAPS system. ..... Constructing a haul-road over public roads from Prudhoe to Yukon River.... to the use of gravel from public lands of the United States for such a road."

Cornelius: Wouldn't it be possible for the Secretary of Interior in case this injunction were interpreted to the uses, could he modify the land freeze and allow the state to select these lands so that it would be state lands instead of federal lands?

Price: This is one possibility.

Cornelius: Would that be a possible alternative in case legal problems developed.

Senator Josephson: I thought that state land should be in compact continuous tracts. Do you mean that we could select a 200' strip of land?

Price: It is compact. The state department of law is involved with a department of justice in the matter of the cases before Judge Hart in Washington, D. C.

Josephson: Are we a party?

Price: No, we are not a party. The Justice Department has made its offices available to us. They do not cost anything. Our interests are compatible. We do have law suits that involved the department of justice.

.....I have heard from others that your department has elected not to intervene in either case before Judge Hart.

Price: At the present time we have not intervened.

.....Do you have any expectations of the outcome of those cases as to whether the department of law would be.....

Price: I think Judge Hart was wrong He said that he would reconsider his ruling because he could be wrong. In our brief in Washington the Justice Department had not applied because they had no new arguments to present. They have not yet chosen to request Judge Hart to reconsider his decision. The reason I ask is that the matter I raised initially, the logic of his decision still plagues the road program. Some action has to be taken. You replied that the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee has responded affirmatively to the request by Secretary Hickel on whether or not the state had the authority under 1866 statute to construct a highway over public lands. Do you think that that affects Judge Hart's decision.

Price: It is possible to cite the House Committee on their modification. This was approved by the House Committee. This carries a certain amount of weight with the Judge.

.....Feeling that way, does the department have any present plans while the legislature is still here to clarify the claimed right of the state to proceed under the.....?

Price: The AG attorneys will be here tomorrow. If there were action by the legislature that indicates an intention to go along and set up authorization and appropriate this would come in the argument to Judge Hart that it was a separate highway project independent of the pipeline project and his decision and his decision in the suit was based on a different set of circumstances.

TAPS then applied for a haul-road in conjunction with the pipeline right-of-way application. State can exercise its rights under highway legislation. Really then you don't want the state to be a party in the court.

Price: I would have to refer that the AG. We are engaged in the litigation. If we are to file successfully in the district court in Anchorage.....that did not preclude or amend the orders, injunctions against the district court in Washington D. C. If there were inconsistent orders, the governor of the state of Alaska would only be bound by the State of Alaska and not by the District of Columbia. Only the Secretary of Interior is bound by Judge Hart.

Rettig: Page 7, paragraph 7. The participants employ agents and contractors during the time of construction and the operation does not have to pay any state imposed cost. Fuel taxes, highway taxes, use permits, employment taxes?

Price: I do not read this as a tax. As a tool maybe.

Rettig: It is possible to construe the word that broadly but would not fit in the contract. Used here in a legal sense. It is extended for the life of the pipeline which might be 50 years.

Price: It wasn't the intention that cost would include exemption from state gas tax. Just to provide a tool I presume.

Rettig: For the life of the pipeline?

Price: It is going to be part of the state highway system. It is a state highway. You cannot change tools.

Rettig: If there isn't any purpose in it, why is it in there?

Price: For caution by the TAPS people.

Jackson made some closing announcements.

He hoped to have Hugh Wade tomorrow night on the legal problems. TAPS representatives if they wish to appear on the same problem. This meeting will be recessed until 8:00 p.m. tomorrow evening, May 7.

Meeting recessed at 11:05 p.m.

TAPS HEARING - May 7, 1970

Meeting was called to order at 8:10 p.m.

The AG will not be here tonight. I gave him a copy of the list of questions I had on the contract based on the testimony taken yesterday. He advised that these concerned administrative policies. Mr. Price said he was committed tonight and could not appear. Mr. Beard reported that he was unable to line up anyone for tonight. Mr. Wade from the Department of Interior will be here and also TAPS representatives will be willing to meet with us. Either in the afternoon or in the evening. Hopefully for 4:00 p.m.

Miller: I would go along with that on the investigation, that it was my understanding that we ask for subpoenas to be issued if they do not attend.

Kerttula thinks Mr. Miller has a good point.

Cornelius: Because of my personal feelings of hoping for this road and the pipeline permit. It really pains me to see this, but in my mind it is without a doubt one of the worst legal documents I have ever seen. There is a potential law suit in every paragraph, whether the pipeline is built or not. As a result of the.....there are so many loopholes that it is just painful. Particularly one that Mr. Rettig brought out last night, if the pipeline permit is given after July 1, 1971. Only liable to the amount of their participation in TAPS. Two per cent interest. The state gets back only 2% of the money. They could assign their interest to any of the other interests. This is just one of the examples. I am concerned about this.

Jackson: We have to recognize that they have been under intense pressures to come up with an agreement. It is not needed for changes in the agreement. When would Mr. Bradley expect Mr. Wade? A member of the audience went to see about this. I don't know what we can do at this time. I could review points I have discovered, but I hate to do that.

Fink: I can't agree with Mr. Cornelius at all. I think that we have to acknowledge that the contract was handed out by two parties after negotiation. Looking at the viewpoint of one party, it is not the way you would like it to be. There are two parties involved. There is no question in my mind that the state will be reimbursed. There is a lot of question in my mind. The 2% bit is absurd. We could get it from them in other ways. Government regulates. The big issue is whether it will ever be built. We could criticize the administration and TAPS. Not written for either one, but to give certain advantages to both.

Miller: I have listened to both of these. I think the contract lacks a lot for either side. Benefits to the state are so clearly lacking that I would question it on the basis of mutuality if not for other legal theory.

Cornelius: Maybe we will have to make a policy decision. Some feel that the road should be built regardless. There are $100 million worth of resources up there--and just a supply road for these deposits would be advantageous. We should build it for the minerals there. Whether or not the pipeline is built. We should have a better contract than this one. The railroad to the West was built to help private enterprise get to the West Coast. It opened up a large section of the United States. The same possibility exists up there.

.....We haven't offered them every section.

Kerttula: That railroad caused the states' legislatures to be controlled by the railroad.

Miller: I agree with most of what Cornelius said. I think it should be built for the sole purpose of opening up that country. We are going to build it a 100 miles at a time. Now we can develop the state beyond all imagination. If you are going to tie it to the contract--well, there are weaknesses in the contract. It should be mutual and fair to all. On the other hand, if you are going into economics there is copper and asbestos, and other developments, homesteading, and agriculture, too. There are many advantages to opening the road. There is also lumbering and other things besides oil. Really the purpose is to develop the pipeline and the delay is very expensive. $400 million in three years. The road is needed and should be built.

Harris: I request a ten minute recess until Mr. Wade arrives.
(Recessed until Hugh Wade and Dick Bradley arrived.)

You probably will not be able to give definitive answers to the questions we will ask tonight. You have had an opportunity to see the agreement between the state and TAPS. Comment first of all on the question of permits for airports and free use materials. The committee has received copies of applications for gravel--What is the benefit in the department of the handling of that? When is action expected?

Mr. Hugh Wade, Department of Interior: I would like to explain my position and our position on this whole thing. I had a call from Art Peterson and he indicated that he thought that maybe we could be helpful, so I communicated with the office in Washington, D. C., the Solicitor, and was told that we are not in on all of the negotiations of the pipeline and the highway permit so it probably would be best if the state had any legal questions that you should refer your questions to Washington. In view of these instructions, I didn't think we could appear. I called the Solicitor and told him about this and he said we have talked at length with the AG for the State and you have answered many of the questions he had. We haven't had time to communicate what his answers were and his questions. You probably better stay away from the meeting. About an hour later he said I talked with the Secretary's office. No, the Secretary feels that if the committee in the legislature feels that we can be helpful, it would be best for us to appear. But, I did want you to know that under established precedent for the last 9 months.....TAPS had a legal problem that was presented to BLM in Anchorage or not to the Solicitor's office in Anchorage but to Washington, D. C. Washington answered it. I can frankly say that lots of times the Solicitor doesn't communicate everything that he has discussed about Alaska with the Regional Solicitor. Many problems that we are not aware of and know nothing about. The Secretary reversed the Solicitor and said, "No, I would like to have Mr. Wade appear and tell the committee that if the Interior Department can be helpful they will be glad to do so." Peterson sent a wire to the Solicitor when I talked to him he had not yet received an answer. .....asking a very general question of what legal problems were anticipated? I talked today with the Solicitor and practically asked him if he received the wire yet. He didn't mention it. I am sure you will be receiving an answer from the Solicitor of his views.

Jackson: I would like to know what the plans are of the Department of Interior with regard to the pending litigation that has been brought by both the Wilderness Society and others and Stevens Village and others. In the District of Columbia courts with regard to the proposal by the state to build the road. Both as to right of way and as to any permits that may be necessary. (2) Whether it is the positionof the Department that the injunctions that have been issued in any way would affect the right of the state to proceed to accept the right of way under the statute and whether or not the injunction would in any way affect the right of the Secretary to grant permits for airports or for gravel, incident to the construction of the road. (3) Whether the Secretary of the Department sees any difficulty in obtaining a change in the Rampart withdrawal? It is my understanding that a formal request has been issued by the state. (4) Aside from litigation, what time frame may be involved in the permits themselves? (5) Whether or not the department expects to have to consult with the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee on any phase of the state road? If so, what phase?

Mr. Wade: I can't/any one of the four or five questions that you posed. I have not been aware that there is any problem as far as airport sites are concerned. In connection with construction of the highway?

Jackson: Yes, sir.

Mr. Wade: One thing I can comment on I think. That is that yesterday I met with the two assistant attorney generals, Kishowa and.....Ranking assistant attorney general in the Department of Justice. He was in Anchorage yesterday and with his assistant Mr. Pittle who tried and argued the five village cases before Judge Hart and the Wilderness case. The reason we met that they thought that we ought to be informed as to what their arguments were and the status of the case at the present time. No indication as to what their plans were for following up the injunctions. Except to say that they are considering either an appeal which would take some time to get a decision on and a request for modification. This is the status of the thinking at this time. They brought up this question about the Secretary's letter to the various committees. And I had seen the Congressional Record that had come in that day that the Chairman of the House Committee, Mr. Aspinall, had replied to the Secretary's inquiry. There was daily debate as it affected the Interior Department. The Congressional Record came in three or four days later. They had notified the Secretary that they had replied to his letter. They had no objection to the state application for highway right-of-way. Mr. Pittle spoke up.....we saw and we were aware of this and this is an accredited report.

Jackson: Has the House answered the letter?

Wade: I asked if they had any answers from the Senate Committee. They had not at that time. I would say in talking with the gentlemen from the Department of Justice. They had not replied to it and they made quite a point of saying that the AG was not going to rule on the question. But legal affairs of the Department of Justice would probably have a pronouncement to make. What the ....I don't know. After the Legal Affairs decision of the Department of Justice receives the problem you will probably get some sort of an answer.

Jackson: I think you will recognize that members of the committee that even if we appropriate the $120 million tomorrow and not seek reimbursement but because there may be legal implications.....any assistance you can give us.

Cornelius: Would it be legally possible for the Secretary to in a case of this kind modify the land freeze order to the extent of the route of the proposed road.....state and the road would not be crossing federal lands?

Wade: This might be an approach and I expect to talk with them tomorrow and ask them about this.

(6) Another question - When someone buys or takes property from the federal government they theoretically have access to cross intervening federal lands to that property. In this case the state has obtained or partially obtained lands in the Prudhoe Bay area. Doesn't the state have road access across federal intervening lands to get to the state lands?

Wade: This would be without a permit from the Interior Department. We have a case similar to this and it could be something to explore on the part of the state.

Jackson: Would you say without the necessity of a permit from the Interior Department?

Wade: This is what we have determined in this other particular case.

Miller: I think that the law provides that the permit is required where it becomes a permanent dedication. Just to use it I don't think you need a permit.

(7) I have seen the theory that the 1866 Act is not applicable to lands to which there is Indian title. If this is so, in the absence of the law suit brought by the Indians on their land claims, what would be the position of the Secretary as guardian, to allow effective acceptance of the offer as in the statute? Obviously, he can't do anything under the statute perhaps, but perhaps he could refuse to give permits for gravel and airports?

Wade: I can't answer except to say that the Interior Department does not recognize Indian title on lands in Alaska at this time.

Bradley: The 1866 Act says when it is self-executing. If it applies we don't have to do anything to give it to you.

Jackson: If it does apply, the Secretary may not recognize the Act.

Wade: I am sorry that I was told that TAPS was coming down here. Maybe you would get to us sometime during the evening. I thought I would come about 8:30. Sorry I was late. I will assure you that if by tomorrow I can have these specific questions that you asked, I will be able to telephone the Solicitor and say these are the questions that the committee would like an answer to. I did want to let you know that the Secretary and the Solicitor told me that we were to cooperate fully.....willing to do anything that the state asked them to do if it wasn't contrary to law and regulations of the department.

Closing remarks by Jackson: We will be continuing to work on this. An executive session is planned with administration and TAPS sometime tomorrow.

Cornelius: Would it be possible that Mr. Wade be present at the executive session?

Wade: You can reach me at Dick's office.

Fink: From what you said I am not sure about the law of 1866. Where its application has anything to do with being North of the Yukon.

Wade: Tom, he must have had in mind that the state was going to select some land up there.....10950.....anyone that wanted to do anything up there. Pertains only to when the state wants to select the land. I think that is what the Solicitor would say. This question has already been sent in to the Solicitor. 6 (c) of the statehood act spells it out pretty much as to when and what you can do. This limitation only affects selection by the State of Alaska. That is my opinion, Tom.

Miller: Since you mentioned that the law doesn't pertain to this these lands are not public lands. These are, aren't they?

Bradley: The Interior Department has not recognized this. They are public lands.

Miller: This law would apply to them? Wouldn't it tie down that actually this applies to the withdrawal of these lands for this particular purpose?

Bradley: The question I had was whether.....changes the character of "super freeze" all vacant and unused land.

Miller: That is the question. These lands are not unreserved public lands according to the 1866 Act.

Jackson: For the information of the committee "from all forms of appropriations of the public land laws." An action to accept a right-of-way is an appropriation of public lands.

Wade: We haven't gotten an answer at this point.

.....(8) The state testified that they probably had the authority from navigable waters for construction of the road. This belongs to the state under the Statehood Act. Is that true? What is the Interior Department's position as to what is and what is not navigable waters? (9) Take gravel from navigable waters you still have to get a permit from the Corps of Engineers or other agency?

Wade: The mere taking of gravel needs a permit from the department unless in the course of taking they obstruct navigable waters.

Cornelius: What about fisheries, there is a problem here. State Fish and Game might prohibit you. I don't think Sport Fisheries and Wildlife have any authority to stop anybody from doing it. They can advise you not to do it. You may be ruining a spawning ground.

Miller: The state department of natural resources controls streams. It would be changed to the Department of Fish and Game so the state would control this.

The meeting adjourned at 9:00 p.m.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE REPORT

ON HOUSE BILL NO._____, ESTABLISHING

THE ALASKA LAW REVISION COMMISSION

This bill establishes a law revision commission as a vehicle for continually reviewing the law of this state and providing in-depth legal research through the cooperation of the legislative council, the Alaska Bar Association and various law schools. (The bar has reached tentative agreement with the dean and some faculty of the U.C.L.A. Law School.) The lawyers and law students engaged in these activities will not be paid for their time, but members of the commission will be entitled to payment of a per diem allowance and travel expenses for commission business.

This arrangement would provide legal services and recommendations to the legislative council beyond which the revisor of statutes and the rest of the staff of the Legislative Affairs Agency presently have time for. It appears to have been the experience of some other states with a law revision commission that whereas the legislative council or comparable agency of the legislature has primarily devoted itself to "new law" or revision of "public law", the commission has been able to devote more time and effort to the development of "private law" -- the law which is administered between citizen and citizen.

The commission's research projects will be only on topics which the legislature has approved, and the commission will operate under the supervision and control of the legislative council, with adminstrative services provided by the Legislative Affairs Agency to the extent authorized by the council. It is expected that where there may be some overlapping of functions between the commission and the revisor of statutes the commission will work through him in presenting its recommendations to the council.

HOUSE BILL NO.

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

SIXTH LEGISLATURE - FIRST SESSION

A BILL

For an Act entitled: "An Act establishing the Alaska Law Revision Commission."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

* Section 1. AS 24.20 is amended by adding new sections to read:

ARTICLE 3. LAW REVISION COMMISSION.

Sec. 24.20.400. ALASKA LAW REVISION COMMISSION. (a) The Alaska Law Revision Commission is established, under the control + supervision of the ~~as a permanent agency of the legislature.~~ A Leg Council. It is comprised of five members of the Alaska Bar Association and the following seven governmental members: the chairmen of the judiciary committees of the state Senate and House of Representatives, or their designees from among the members of their respective committees, the chairman of the Alaska Legislative Council, and a member of the council from the opposite party appointed by the chairman, or their designees from among the members of the council; the attorney general, or his designee from among his staff; one justice of the Alaska Supreme Court, chosen by the justices of that court, or his designee from among the justices; one judge of the Alaska Superior Court, chosen by the judges of that court, or his designee from among the judges of that court. The first bar association members of the commission are to be selected by the president of the association and subsequent ones by statewide election by active members of the association with at least one commission member from the first judicial district, one ... from the third ... and one from the second or fourth judicial districts.

(b) Vacancies on the commission shall be filled by the respective selecting authorities for the remainder of the terms of the vacated positions.

(c) The commission shall elect one of its members to serve as chairman for a term prescribed by the commission.

(d) The attorney general, the supreme court justice and the superior court judge are nonvoting members and may not serve as chairman.

Sec. 24.20.410. TERM OF OFFICE. The term of office for nongovernmental members and for the judge and justice is four years, and they shall hold office until the selection of their successors. Initial nongovernmental members shall be appointed by the president of the bar association for staggered terms as follows: two members for two years, two for three years and one for four years.

Sec. 24.20.420. TRAVEL EXPENSES AND PER DIEM. Each member of the commission is entitled to payment of travel expenses and per diem as provided in AS 39.20.180, but is not entitled to receive compensation for his services.

Sec. 24.20.430. ADMINISTRATIVE SERVICES. ~~Necessary~~ Administrative services for the commission ~~shall~~ may be provided by the Legislative Affairs Agency to the extent authorized by the Leg Council.

Sec. 24.20.440. STATE RESEARCH FACILITIES AVAILABLE TO COMMISSION. The material of the state law libraries and other state libraries shall be made available to the commission. All state agencies and all persons connected with them shall give the commission full cooperation and reasonable assistance in matters of research requiring recourse to them or to data within their knowledge or control.

Sec. 24.20.450. ~~RESTRICTIONS ON LEGISLATIVE ACTIVITIES.~~ No member other than a legislator or the attorney general may, with respect to proposed legislation concerning matters assigned to the commission for study under sec. 490 of this chapter, advocate the passage or defeat of any such legislation by the legislature or the approval or veto of any such legislation by the governor or appear before any committee of the legislature as to such matters unless requested to do so by the committee or its chairman. The legislative members are not bound by their vote on a given matter when it later comes up for consideration by the legislative council or legislature. No ~~governmental~~ member of the commission may advocate the passage or defeat of any legislation or approval or veto of any legislation by the governor in his official capacity as a member.

Voting Leg Member shall not be

Sec. 24.20.460. RULES. The commission shall make rules providing for internal operation and administration.

Sec. 24.20.470. DUTIES OF COMMISSION. The commission shall within the limitations imposed by sec. 490 of this chapter:

(1) examine the statutes ~~of the state,~~ the common law and judicial decisions for the purpose of discovering defects and anachronisms in the law and recommending needed reforms;

(2) receive and consider proposed changes in the law recommended by the American Law Institute, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, any bar association or other learned body;

(3) receive and consider suggestions from judges, justices, public officials, lawyers, and the public generally as to defects and anachronisms in the law;

(4) recommend changes in the law it considers necessary to modify or eliminate antiquated and inequitable rules of law, and to bring the law of this state into harmony with modern conditions;

(5) recommend the express repeal of all statutes repealed by implication, or held unconstitutional by the supreme court of the state or the Supreme Court of the United States.

Sec. 24.20.480. REPORTS. ~~(a)~~ The commission shall, within the limitations of sec. 490 of this chapter, submit to the Leg. Council reports ~~with its~~ on subjects selected by the recommendations (prepared in accordance with the Legislative Affairs Agency's legislative drafting manual) as to revision of the laws, ~~to the legislative Council.~~

~~(b)~~ The reports and proposed legislative measures shall be printed by the leg. affairs ag. on auth. by the Leg. Council ~~state under the supervision of the commission. The exhibits shall be printed so as to show in the clearest manner the changes and repeals proposed by the commission.~~

Sec. 24.20.490. STUDIES. The commission shall file with each regular session of the legislature a list of the topics selected by it for study, the studies in progress and the topics intended for future consideration. After the filing of its first list, the commission shall confine its studies to those topics set out in its last preceding list which are approved for its study by concurrent resolution of the legislature.

Sec. 24.20.500. COOPERATION WITH OTHER INSTITUTIONS OR ORGANIZATIONS. (a) The commission may cooperate with any bar association or other learned, professional, or scientific association, institution or foundation in any manner suitable for the fulfillment of the purposes of this chapter.

(b) The commission may, with the approval of the commissioner of administration, enter into, amend and terminate contracts with colleges, universities, schools of law or other research institutions, or with qualified individuals for the purposes of research.

FISCAL ANALYSIS

The $5,880 estimate for Personal Services is based on Mr. Howitt's thoughts that there would be two 5-day meetings per year, one in Anchorage and one in Juneau. This figure allows for per diem to be paid also for the travel time to and from the meeting places.

The Travel estimate of $1,660 is as close an estimate as is possible without knowing the resident city of each member who would comprise the commission. However, taking into consideration those governmental members who will automatically be on the commission, it is my best estimate that the commission will be composed of 6 people from the Anchorage area, 4 from the Fairbanks area, and 2 from the Juneau area. If this is the case, the $1,660 travel estimate would be an accurate figure.

There is no way at this time to estimate an amount needed for Equipment or Commodities as these items of expenditure would depend entirely upon the work projects of the commission. In this fiscal note I have estimated $2,460 for Commodities, which would make the total amount needed to fund the commission for F.Y. 1969-70 $10,000.

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION FOR THE CREATION OF THE ALASKA LAW REVISION COMMISSION

This report and recommendation was prepared by James Singleton and Daniel Moore and is an outgrowth of meetings by the Committee on Law Revision. A tentative draft was circulated to all members of the Committee.

The Committee on Law Revision was formed as a special committee within the Alaska Bar Association. Its purpose is to find a method for the orderly and effective revision of antiquated laws and for the adoption of uniform laws for the state. It was recognized by the committee that some guidance, assistance to the legislature, and overall practical review by professional persons engaged on a daily basis in utilizing our laws might prove of benefit to the state. Toward this end, a proposed Alaska Law Revision Commission has been suggested and draft legislation is enclosed. The concept of the Commission has been endorsed by the Alaska Bar Association.

Stanley Howitt, Director
Alaska Bar Association

Leg Aff. Ag. – has not done enough on law revision Prob. comm in legislature to be established at UCLA law school graduating student as possible staff atty for L.A.A.
ABA – civil contracts time w/o cost (except per diem + travel)
Att'y gen – do not have staff or time for statutory revision
Should be in legislative branch

BILL NO.

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

SIXTH LEGISLATURE - FIRST SESSION

A BILL

For an Act entitled: "An Act creating an Alaska Law Revision Commission."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

Section 1. AS 24 is amended by adding a new chapter to read:

CHAPTER 60. ALASKA LAW REVISION COMMISSION

Sec. 24.60.010. ALASKA LAW REVISION COMMISSION. There is created in the state government the Alaska Law Revision Commission. The Commission consists of members as follows: The Chairmen of the Judiciary Committees of the House and of the Senate; the Chairman of the Alaska Legislative Council; the Attorney General or his designate; one justice of the Alaska Supreme Court, chosen by the justices of that Court, who shall be a non-voting member; one judge of the Alaska Superior Court, chosen by the judges of that court.

The foregoing members shall be designated the government members. The Commission shall further consist of five members of the Alaska Bar Association, the first members to be selected by the President of the Association and thereafter by statewide election by active members of the Association with at least one member each, from the First Judicial District and Second or Fourth Judicial District. The Commission shall elect one of its members to serve as chairman for a term prescribed by the commission. A vacancy shall be filled by the appointing power for the remainder of the term.

Sec. 24.60.020 TERM OF OFFICE. The members, other than government members, shall be selected for a term of four years and shall hold office until the selection and qualification of their successors. However, initial non-government members of the commission shall be appointed by the President for staggered terms as follows: two members for two years; two members for three years and one member for four years.

Sec. 24.60.030. TRAVEL EXPENSES AND PER DIEM. Each member of the Commission shall be allowed travel expenses and per diem as provided by AS 39.20.180, but shall not receive compensation for his services.

Sec. 24.60.040. DIRECTOR OF RESEARCH, EMPLOYMENT AND COMPENSATION GENERALLY. The commission may appoint a Director of Research and other professional, clerical or other employees which it considers necessary for the performance of the duties and exercise of the powers conferred upon the commission and provide for their compensation in accordance with law.

Sec. 24.60.050. STATE LAW LIBRARIES AND OTHER STATE AGENCY RESEARCH LIBRARIES AND FACILITIES TO BE AVAILABLE TO COMMISSION. The material of the State Law Libraries and other state and legislative research libraries shall be made available to the commission. All state agencies, and other official state organizations, and all persons connected therewith shall give the commission full cooperation and reasonable assistance in any matters of research requiring recourse to them, or to data within their knowledge or control.

Sec. 24.60.060. RESTRICTIONS ON LEGISLATIVE ACTIVITIES. No employee of the commission and no member other than a member of the State Legislature or the Attorney General shall, with respect to any proposed legislation concerning matters assigned to the commission for study pursuant to A.S. 24.60.120, advocate the passage or defeat of any such legislation by the legislature or the approval or veto of any such legislation by the Governor or appear before any committee of the legislature as to such matters unless requested to do so by the committee or its chairman. The government members are not bound by their vote on a given matter when it later comes up for consideration by the legislature. In no event shall an employee or non-government member of the commission advocate the passage or defeat of any legislation or the approval or veto of any legislation by the Governor in his official capacity as such employee or member.

Sec. 24.60.070. RULES. The commission shall make rules implementing this chapter and rules providing for internal operation and administration.

Article 2. Duties

Sec. 24.60.080. DUTIES OF COMMISSION. The commission shall within the limitations imposed by A.S. 24.60.120 of this code:

(a) Examine the common law and statutes of the judicial decisions for the purpose of discovering defects and anachronisms in the law and recommending needed reforms.

(b) Receive and consider proposed changes in the law recommended by the American Law Institute, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, any bar association or other learned bodies.

(c) Receive and consider suggestions from judges, justices, public officials, lawyers, and the public generally as to defects and anachronisms in the law.

(d) Recommend, from time to time, such changes in the law as it deems necessary to modify or eliminate antiquated and inequitable rules of law, and to bring the law of this State into harmony with modern conditions.

Sec. 24.60.090. COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS ON STATE STATUTES.

(a) The commission shall recommend the express repeal of all statutes repealed by implication, or held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the State or the Supreme Court of the United States.

(b) The commission shall submit its reports, and its recommendations as to revision of the laws to the Legislative Council.

(c) The commission may, within the limitations imposed by A.S. 24.60.120 of this code, include in its report the legislative measures proposed by it to effect the adoption or enactment of the proposed revision. The reports may be accompnaied by exhibits of various changes, modifications, improvements, and suggested enactments prepared or proposed by the commission with a full and accurate index thereto.

(d) The Commission shall file a report at each regular session of the legislature which shall contain a calendar of the topics selected by it for study, including a list of the studies in progress and a list of topics intended for future consideration. After the filing of its first report the commission shall confine its studies to those topics set forth in the calendar contained in its last preceding report which are thereafter approved for its study by concurrent resolution of the legislature.

Sec. 24.60.100. PRINTING OF REPORTS. The reports, exhibits, and proposed legislative measures shall be printed by the State under the superivison of the commission. The exhibits shall be so printed as to show in the readiest manner the changes and repeals proposed by the commission.

Sec. 24.60.110. COOPERATION WITH OTHER PUBLIC OR PRIVATE INSTITUTIONS OR ORGANIZATIONS.

(a) The commission may cooperate with any bar association or other learned, professional, or scientific association, institution or foundation in any manner suitable for the fulfillment of the purposes of this chapter.

(b) The commisison may, with the approval of the Commissioner of Administration, enter into, amend and terminate contracts with colleges, universities, schools of law or other research institutions, or with qualified individuals for the purposes of research.

A SUMMARY OF THE ORGANIZATION'S INTERNAL PROCEDURE

The committee recommends that once the legislature has approved a program for research, each topic in that program be assigned to a committee chaired by a member of the commission.[6] The commission as a whole will determine whether the basic research required by the topic will be done by

(a) An expert consultant specifically chosen,

(b) The UCLA Alaska Committee,

(c) Some other law school's students,

(d) A special research committee chosen from the Alaska Bar, or

(e) The staff of the Legislative Affairs Agency.[7]

The committee feels, based upon comments made at the commission's initial meeting that due to the heavy work load presently carried by the Legislative Affairs Agency, that it should only be asked to assist as a last resort.[8]

Once the basic research is done and proposed legislation drafted, the sub-committee will make its recommendations which will in turn be discussed, debated, and determined by the entire commission.

The research study will hopefully: (1) identify the problem under consideration, (2) outline the present Alaska law on the problem, (3) set out the solutions to the problem found in the law of other jurisdictions, (4) identify the various competing policies involved. All relevant cases and statutes will be considered (foreign as well as domestic) as well as pertinent legal literature e.g. treatises, periodicals, restatements, model or uniform laws. Factual investigation is not contemplated.

Once the commission has approved a draft statute and issued its recommendations, it is assumed that the government members will see that the material reaches the legislators and is properly introduced.

ORGANIZATIONAL PROCEDURES FOR THE ACCOMPLISHMENT OF THE LAW REVISION COMMISSION'S OBJECTIVES[9]

A. Basic Structure.

1. The appointment of an executive secretary and director of research. This person has the responsibility to acquire a research and clerical staff and to organize the work of the commission.

2. The executive secretary directs inquiries to Judges, lawyers, reporters, annotaters of the Americal Law Institute or to other groups interested or concerned with the reform of the law.

3. The executive secretary will compile a list for immediate study or reserved list for subjects to be given long-term consideration.

4. The establishment of an office and clerical staff for the commission.

B. The Plan of Research Within The Commission.

1. The government members presence at working sessions of the commission would be appreciated but not required.

2. The government members may not be able to regularly attend all the meetings and therefore they should not receive any definite assignments for the project undertaken.

3. The government members are not bound by their vote on a given matter when it later comes up for consideration by the legislature.

4. The non-government members would not be responsible for the basic legal research required on the project work assigned.

C. The Selection of Projects.

1. Source: The commission will accept project suggestions from the courts, the Governor, the legislature, public officials, lawyers, or the public.

2. Action on the Suggestions: The commission will be required to consider projects suggested by the Governor or the legislature. The commission, within its discretion, will decide whether or not to consider projects suggested by other sources.

3. Factors considered: The commission in deciding whether to undertake a particular project will consider its complexity, urgency, research facilities, manpower, budgetary fund, and evidence of the need for such undertaking. If the subject matter is under study by another State agency or within an agency's jurisdiction or concerns policy matters, this commission will not undertake the project.

D. Project Reports.

1. A current project report on each topic under consideration will be submitted annually. This report shall consist of two parts (a) a short statement explanatory of topics submitted for the first time, and (b) a brief restatement bringing up to date topics previously submitted not yet researched, explaining why the matter has been delayed or suspended.

2. Calendar of topics for study: This will have three divisions: (a) the immediate study list, i.e., the topics on which study has been authorized and assigned; (b) the reserved list, i.e., those topics not rejected or referred elsewhere on which study has not yet been authorized but which will be re-examined, and (c) the suspended study list, i.e., those topics which have been previously studied and have been submitted to the legislature but which were not accepted by it, or subjects to which after study by the commission no recommendation was made for legislation, including those subjects upon which study was begun but not completed for some reason.

3. Factors considered for placement of subject matter on the immediate study list: The commission's decision for placement of this list will involve the following factors: (a) the availability of qualified personnel to undertake the study; (b) a prediction made substantially ahead of the time the legislature opens as to what will be a balance program of proposed bills including an estimate of the work that can be finished before the legislative session commences; and (c) a judgment as to what project studies are most likely to result in legislation and which are not; and (d) a balancing of the work among the members of the commission in accordance with their specialized interest or professional experience.

E. Organization of the Membership of the Commission With Respect to Research.

1. The chairman of the commission will appoint one or two members of the commission to undertake a preliminary study of the project work selected.

2. The members of the commission appointed on the committee for the particular project work will engage the services of researchers to make a basic study of the subject matter coordinating the same with the director of research.

3. The members of this committee will hold any necessary meeting and/or direct correspondence to the researcher and will be responsible for obtaining a complete report for submission to the full commission with its recommendantions for a plan of action.

4. The commission will then consider the report and recommendations of the subcommittee. If no decision can be reached, the matter will again be referred back to the committee for further study. If the commission decides to recommend legislation, consideration will then be given to the drafting of a suitable statute to accomplish this purpose.

F. The Function of the Research Assistants or Consultants.

1. Source: On Page __ of this report on organization is set forth the possible sources from which the necessary research can be accomplished.

2. Research Study: The project work must include an analysis of the Alaska law, a comparison of it with laws of other jurisdiction, including foreign law, and a consideration of the policy questions involved. Statutory as well as decisional law should be examined, and the ideas and thoughts of jurists, text writers and eminent authorities should be consulted, as well as all pertinent legal literature such as treatises, periodicals, restatements, model or uniform laws, etc. If actual investigations are called for, provision should be provided for this need. Where legislation is recommended, the research study will include a proposed draft of a statute resolving the problem studied.

G. Necessary Steps After Approval of the Research Study.

1. When the commission decides that legislative action is desirable then a draft of the proposed statute will be prepared.

2. The bill form submitted to the legislature should be accompanied by an explanatory "statutory note" and a separate document known as the "recommendation" which sets forth the reason for the proposed legislation and reviews concisely but fully the entire problem presented in the research study. The legislation proposed must be the product of the joint consideration of the members of the commission and have been fully considered before submission to the legislature.

3. The commission should then submit the proposed bill to a standing committee of the Alaska Bar Association for consultation and recommendations. Any criticisms or recommendations suggested by the standing committee of the Alaska Bar Association will then be reconsidered by the full commission for acceptance, rejection or modification. When this is accomplished, the bill will then be submitted to the chairman of the judiciary committees of both houses for introduction to the legislators.

4. Following the introduction of the bill, the commission should be willing to hold a full meeting before any legislative committees and the member of the commission who was assigned the particular subject matter shall have the responsibility of explaining and answering questions raised concerning it by the legislators.

FOOTNOTES

1. The legislative members are considered necessary to insure a good working relationship with the legislature. See Sutton, The English Law Commission: A New Philosophy of Law Reform, 20 Vanderbilt Law Review 1009, 1016-1017 (1967). The New York and California Acts have similar provisions cf. McDonald Note 2 Infra.

Following Justice Rabinowitz's suggestion regarding possible conflicts no judicial voting member is recommended but cf. Cardoza, A Ministry of Justice, 35 Harv. Law Rev. 113 (1921) suggesting substantial judicial involvement and cf. Sutton, supra 1017-1018 text accompanying Note 35. No lay members other than members of the legislature are contemplated but cf. McDonald, Note 2, infra, pp 407-409 Note 35 and See Note 40 pp 413-414.

The committee considered these alternatives for choosing non-government members:

(a) The commission requests from the president of each bar association names of those interested in serving and chooses among volunteers.

(b) Election by bar association (cf. Judicial Council).

(c) Appointment by Judicial Council.

(d) Appointment by Governor with (as in California) or without (as in New York) approval by Senate.

The committee felt, if politically feasible, that the President of the Bar Association should choose the initial members and that vacancies should thereafter be handled under alternative (a). The committee expresses no opinion regarding geographical representation.

2. One of the major problems facing the commission will be that of funding. (Note: The New York Commission pays each appointed member a salary. (originally $5,000, now $9,000) See McDonald, Legal Research Translated into Legislative Action: The New York Law Revision Commission 1934-1963, 48 Cornell L. Quarterly, 401, 445-446 (1963). The budget is found Id. at 453.

Naturally, if appropriate funding is unavailable, the statute will have to be modified.

3. Note two, supra.

4. Note two, supra.

5. California provides for general cooperation between legislature and commission. The committee understood that in Alaska it would work through the Legislative Affairs Agency.

6. McDonald, supra, Note 2, pp. 421-422.

7. See Stone and Pattee, Revision of Private Law, 54 Harv. L. Rev. 221, 226-227 (1938). The authors argue that the Legislative Council is primarily concerned with "new Law" and "Public law" rather than the revision or reformation of old "private law". Consequently, that organization is overloaded to the extent that it must also handle questions of private law revision.

Local Boundary Commission

State of Alaska

Decision Regarding the Proposed Nenana Boundary Change

On February 1,1969, the Local Boundary Commission convened in Nenana, Alaska, for the purpose of hearing public comment on a petition to annex certain lands lying south of and contiguous to the City Boundaries.

At the hearing testimony was advanced in support of the proposed annexation and no opposition to the proposal was expressed. Based on the testimony and information submitted by the Local Affairs Agency, the Commission finds as follows:

(1) A petition in proper form was filed on December 20, 1968, by the Honorable Ray Brown, Mayor, on behalf of the City of Nenana;

(2) No answer or other written objection to the petition has been filed;

(3) Public notice of the hearing has been given in compliance with statutory requirements and Commission regulations;

(4) The City of Nenana is subject to recurrent flooding from the Tanana and Nenana Rivers;

(5) The area proposed to be annexed is at a sufficient elevation to give the City developable land safe from flooding;

(6) The southward expansion of the City is one of the alternatives for development recommended by the Alaska State Housing Authority's comprehensive plan for the City of Nenana;

(7) It appears that future development will take place in the area proposed to be annexed;

(8) Annexation will enable the City to provide for the planned and orderly development of the area;

(9) The area will benefit from annexation through receiving fire and police protection, public utilities, and other municipal services.

It is the conclusion of the Commission, based on the foregoing, that the boundary change proposed by the petition is in the best interests of the City of Nenana and the area concerned.

Now therefore, it is the decision of the Local Boundary Commission that the Commission recommend to the Legislature, pursuant to Article X, Sec. 12, of the Alaska State Constitution and Alaska Statutes 44.19.260, that the boundaries of the City of Nenana be described as follows:

> From the point of Beginning, which is the Southeast Corner of Section Thirty-six (36), Township Four (4) South, Range Eight (8) West, Fairbanks Meridian, go Northerly along the Township Line to the point in Section 24, Township 4 South, Range 8 West, Fairbanks Meridian, where the Township line intersects the Southerly Bank of the Tanana River; thence Meandering along the Southerly bank of the Tanana River in a Northwesterly, Westerly and Southwesterly direction to the confluence of the Tanana River and the Nenana River; thence meandering along the Easterly Bank of the Nenana River, in a Southwesterly, Southerly, Southeasterly, Westerly, Northwesterly, Easterly and Northeasterly direction to the intersection of the Easterly bank of the Nenana River with the Southerly Township line of Township 4 South, Range 8 West, Fairbanks Meridian, which intersection is located in Section 34, Township 4 South, Range 8 West, Fairbanks Meridian; thence East along the South Township line of Township 4 South, Range 8 West, Fairbanks Meridian, to the Southeast corner of Section 36, Township 4 South, Range 8 West, Fairbanks Meridian, the point of beginning.

The Director of the Local Affairs Agency is hereby directed to prepare a recommendation in accordance with this decision, and to submit the same to the Legislature on behalf of the Commission.

MINUTES
LOCAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION
PUBLIC HEARING

February 1, 1969

Mr. Singleton: At this time we will call to order the meeting of the a Local Boundary Commission in Nenana, Alaska to consider a petition of the City to extend its boundaries. With me today are members of the Local Boundary Commission: Mrs. Johnson from Nome; Mrs. Stokley from Petersburg, Mrs. Stokke; Mr. Norton from Delta Junction; Mr. Gill from Anchorage; and as representative of the Local Affairs Agency, Mr. Beard. I am Jim Singleton, Chairman of the Local Boundary Commission. Our normal procedure since we have in the report to the Local Boundary Commission a statement of the procedures that have been carried on so far to give public notice of the meeting. We can, I believe, waive any additional discussion of that and proceed directly to the presentation by the proponent of annexation. It is my understanding, Mr. Coghill, that you are going to speak today on behalf of the proponents of annexation.

Mr. Coghill: That is correct.

Mr. Singleton: Our procedure is to allow the proponents to make a brief opening statement, outlining first of all what the City desires in the way of annexation? Why the City desires such annexation? What the function of the additional land is to be and what services, if any, will be performed in that area? You can or you may, for purposes of your statements, take for granted that each member of the Local Boundary Commission has had an opportunity to review all the materials assembled with the petition. You may also assume that the Local Affairs Agency has made a report to the Local Boundary Commission in which it has included a statement or information drawn from the various state agencies regarding the proposed annexation. That information, incidently, is available to you and I don't know whether you've had an opportunity to look at it yet. Naturally, that material will be made available to the City. So, if we may then, we would like to begin with you, Mr. Coghill, and then if anyone else wishes to speak on behalf of the petition, we will hear from them and finally, we will hear briefly from anyone who wishes to oppose the petition. Once those desiring to oppose the petition have finished their remarks, you will be given a brief opportunity to answer any questions that they might have propounded, or to offer any rebuttalment here that they might have come up with. So at this time, we'll turn the meeting over to you and ask you to speak on behalf of the annexation petition.

Mr. Coghill: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First of all, I'd like to greet all of you folks here to Nenana. Nenana, of course, has its place in the history of and place in the events of Alaska. We are the riverport community; we serve just about 1/3 of the large mass of land to the west of the railbelt area; we are the riverport community for interior Alaska. And, of course, on this river, we have our annual Nenana Ice Classic event, which is the thing that brings tourist attraction to our community every spring. Nenana, of course, being a small community, came about being brought into the direct travel of the new Alaska with the highway system and the completion of the highway bridge across the Tanana River about a year ago. The problems we see in our small community at this particular time is that of "what is going to happen to the area?" Are we going to have a checkerboard development in the valley? Are we going to have people putting up nice homes in certain areas along the road, more particularly, close to Nenana and at the same breath have somebody that is trying to reek a living out of wrecking cars and building a junkyard putting in a massive wrecking yard right next to someone that desires to build a $50 or $60,000 home? I think that, basically, this is the key to the City's proposal to annex a portion to the south of Nenana, basically, for zoning purposes. You are all aware of that August 14 of 1967 we had a disastrous flood in the Tanana Valley. Since that time, why we have spent quite afew hours trying to devise means and methods of controlling the Tanana Valley as far as our small community is concerned. We are situated 60 miles south of Fairbanks; of course, we're not in the North Star Borough, but we are a first class city incorporated in 1923. This gives us our legal entity to contract with state government or with the federal government as far as any type of flood control program we might desire to do. And I believe that we could have gone for a limited type flood control program, but we have to look a little bit to the future before we ask state and federal agencies to spend large sums of tax money to aid a community of four or five hundred people. We have to look a little bit to the future, and of course, this brings in the second phase of our request for annexation, and that is, that we want to develop to the south of Nenana and hinge our hopes on the possibility of the North Commission becoming successful in pushing forward their much needed rail link into the Arctic and to the mineraly enriched area of the Kobuk Valley. We feel that, I personally feel, that in order to spend large sums of money, you have to spend them to a solid future; you can't spend them just to something that is just contemporary or something that has been in the past. If we were to build a dike around Nenana or we were to build Nenana up and then the railroad became a reality, the riverport community for interior of Alaska would move to the Yukon River, because in transportation, river transportation, for the interior of Alaska, the Tanana River is really the stopping block of being able to haul larger loads; have larger barges; and have larger tugs, and once they put a port, a river port on the Yukon River, why their annual capacity of moving freight will almost go five times greater because of the draft of the river. So we see a reality that possibly Nenana could then no longer be identified as the riverport community. So in looking to the future, we felt that before homestead entry, before many other types of entry developed into this area that we requested, that the City of Nenana should have this as part of their City and then therefore, be able to control to a great degree how it's developed and it would actually, in fact, cost much less when the community would be developed in this area because if we had to go in and buy out entries that had already been placed after the fact, why, this of course, we find in development in many areas where the community is growing, so I would say that this is the second reason. Now the third reason being that our community is basically a railroad orientated community of 1918 through 1923. In 1923 we were incorporated. At that time we were incorporated into approximately a mile square area, according to your exhibits and the maps which we have produced for you. In 1941 the C.A.A. built an airfield about a mile and one half to the south of us and was operated by the F.A.A. up until we took, until we became a state in 1959. The F.A.A. under contra operated this airfield for three more years under a contract with the state. In 1963 the City of Nenana, through the surplus properties agreement with General Services Administration, took over the operation and the ownership of the Nenana airport. Since that time we have up-graded it and now we have a first class field of about 4700 feet. However, the area around the airport and the airport itself is not within the City boundaries; it just happens to be a piece of city property. And between the airport and our southern boundary there are many acreages; lots that were sold by the Land Department that are a part of what they call the Nenana Acreage Addition, but they're not within our taxing unit. These people that acquired this property bought it for $25.00 a block acreage just by paying for the filing fee and now today they're speculating on it and we have no tax revenue off this property or no way of saying "well, either develop it or turn it over to somebody that is going to develop it" so we do have a stifeling effect to our economy where this is more or less put into a freeze area. We feel that this is the third most important part of our fight to get this area annexed. The coupling of all three of these items together is basically the reason for the, for the petition to annex. It has to do with development; how we can plan; how we can go forward; how we can keep things in their proper perspective, but if somebody is going to put a junk yard in or wants to put in a parking lot or a trucking firm or a trucking area; wants to build a housing development, then the City has the power to zone so that we can keep the development in their proper place. Nenana has a school - it has the capacity of holding about 400, about 300 people, 300 students. To this date, we're, our average daily membership is around 225. We have the possibility of developing more. Out of this 225, almost a hundred of them are transported into our system and out of our tax base. The City Council decided in their annexation of last year, of their proposal for annexation, of last year, when I was still mayor, that we only proposed to go to the end of Section 36 - and personally, I would like to see it go farther, but this comes into the area of how far does the Boundary Commission and the Local Affairs Agency wish to develop this and how large can a city be before we get into the area of where does a borough start and where does a city stop? One of the things that's very definite, gentlemen, ladies and gentlemen, is that Nenana and the Nenana area does not want to become a part of the North Star Borough. If there's any leads in this way or any developments that looks like they're going to try to extend their southern boundary, why, then we would respectively submit to you that a hearing be held in Nenana because I would imagine probably this would force dual government in the valley. I don't think we're large enough yet to have dual government and this is the reason why we're asking just to have a city enlarged, just this far, for this particular time. I think that pretty well sums up our presentation.

Mr. Singleton: Thank you very much, Mr. Coghill. I will ask at this time if any of the members of the BoundaryCommission have any questions they wish to direct to Mr. Coghill, they do so. Mrs. Johnson, did you have anything you wanted to ask?

Mrs. Johnson: No, thank you.

Mr. Singleton: Mrs. Stokke?

Mrs. Stokke: The talk of tax bases, that's for school purposes?

Mr. Singleton: Yes.

Mrs. Stokke: You don't plan to give other services on that area that you annex?

Mr. Coghill: We actually give this service now, in a limited manner. What we would probably do in this annexed area, we would pay for the street lights that the individuals now pays for themselves. We would, in part, help pay for the police protection. We had a contract state trooper living in Nenana and because of the financial burden, and because of other things, why the Public Safety Department decided not to contract anymore but to leave a policeman here and we'd provide certain services, we'd provide him with an office and such stuff as this, though, actually, the community is in effect in a small way, participating in this. The tax base, our tax base, is ten mills. Out of the ten mills, why we have our fire protection, we have our street snow removing of which would be extended into this area; we have our street light program which, of course, would be extended into this area.

Mr. Norton: That's volunteer - fire department?

Mr. Coghill: Yes, yes sir, in this type of thing. And we have our school. As I remember our income is basically around $20,000 a year from our tax -

Mr. Norton: On the ten mill basis?

Mr. Coghill: On the ten mill basis. And out of that why we pay about 11 or 12,000 of the total paid. You know, a real interesting . . .

Mr. Norton: That's augmented by the 219 or 220 per student that comes in above the regulars?

Mr. Coghill: Oh yes, yes. We would never be able if we didn't have state tuition formula and the Public Law 874 formula and the school Foundation formula, why we would be a state operated school.

Mr. Norton: I can understand that.

Mr. Coghill: In fact, you know, I might digress for a minute - this is one of the problems that we have in the smaller communities - of being able to provide this basic function which is schools. If you go to some of the unincorporated areas, and George, I now talk about Big Delta, or Tok Junction, or Glennallen and you compare your school facilities with ours which we have built on our own - we've got - our assessed evaluation is around a million five hundred thousand and we have a million dollar school facility that was built by this community -

Mr.Norton: I know what you're talking about.

Mr. Singleton: George, did you have anything else you wanted to ask?

Mr. Norton: No.

Mr.Singleton: Vic?

Mr. Gill: Yes. How far does the North Star Borough, how far does it come, how close does it get - what milepost maybe?

Mr. Coghill: You drove down?

Mr. Gill: Yes.

Mr. Coghill: Up on top of the rise as you come out of Fairbanks, and you pass the Curtis Lumber, I don't know whether you . . .

Mr. Gill: They don't have a sign there anymore.

Mr. Coghill: They don't have a sign there anymore but you pass a . . .

Mr. Gill: There's a little bar there. Did you notice that little bar there?

Mr. Coghill: Just off to the left there's a place that has an Olympia beer sign - and there's a couple houses there . . . .

Mr. Gill: Cripple Creek. Where is it in relation to Cripple Creek?

Mr. Coghill: Its more than 30 miles . . . Well, I'll tell you, if you notice where you hit the pavement, its about four miles before you get off the pavement.

? Oh, is it on the top? . . .

Mr. Coghill: It's on the top of the hill. It's barely in there - its barely in the borough.

Mr.Gill: That puts it roughly, how far away from here?

Mr. Coghill: Roughly, 22 miles away from here. I could show you on the map.

Mr. Gill: No, I just wanted to know how close it is.

Mr. Coghill: They cut across the hills there and cut in just below Saulich and Dunbar on the railroad, went over to the Chatanika River and followed the Chatanika River up behind Fairbanks and then cut off into down by Salcha - cut across and took in the whole bombing range and come down to the watershed of the Wood River and the Wood River comes into the Tanana River about twenty miles north of us.

Mr. Gill: Well, my point was if it is close here, why maybe the North Star Borough could move in here because by the same token its a long ways away; it may be wiser, and you'd have to study the economy, to form your own little borough if it was forced upon you.

Mr. Coghill: I would imagine that if we were faced with this decision that you would find a south star borough.

Mr. Gill: Yea, yea . . . That was why I was wondering how far away it was. I have no more questions.

Mr. Coghill: I might add, Mr. Chairman, that I probably am the largest by far property holder in this area to be annexed, and as far as taxes are concerned, I would be paying probably 50% of the tax base earned in this particular area. I am building a $60,000 home out, on, in the section 36 section.

Mr. Singleton: You don't contemplate any change in your mill rate or any change in your taxation level. You are just anticipating extending the tax level you have already reached to this new area.

Mr. Coghill: This is correct, we . . .

Mr. Singleton: Approximately how many people would be involved in the extension or the expansion, Mr. Coghill?

Mr. Coghill: I would say that probably about, about, 15 to 20 families.

Mr. Singleton: And they all use,shop in Nenana, they use the Nenana post office, is that right?

Mr. Coghill: That is correct, yes.

Mr. Singleton: In otherwords, they would have, the people in that area . . .

Mr. Gill: This says 45 persons.

Mr. Singleton: . . . the people would have . . .

Mr. Coghill: About 15 or 20 families would be about 45 or 50 people.

Mr. Gill: That's right.

Mr. Singleton: But, I assume that these people were aware of this meeting.
Mr. Coghill: It has been posted on our bulletin board. We have two of the members of the council here, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Burlingame and Mr. Speck.
Mr. Speck: It has been well talked about. I hear about it every night.
Mr. Coghill: Mr. Speck has the Moocher's Bar on the corner and of course, he is a very valuable person on the council because he is the buffer board for the council as far as public opinion. (laughs)
? That's understandable.
Mr. Singleton: Alright, then if thats the end of your presentation and there are no further questions from the Boundary Commission. I would ask if there is anyone else here who wishes to speak on behalf of the petition.
Mr. Beard: Mr. Chairman, might I address one or two questions to Mr. Coghill?
Mr. Singleton: Oh, certainly.
Mr. Beard: Can you give us an idea - do you know how much area you are talking about? In square miles or acres? If you extend the boundaries proposed to the baseline of Section 36.
Mr. Coghill: We're talking about three sections.
Mr. Beard: Well , . .
Mr. Coghill: Our township is about three sections. Now a section has about . . .
Mr. Beard: 640 acres.
Mr. Coghill: 640 - so we're talking in the - probably around 2,000 acres.
Mr Beard: Do you have any idea how this property will be assessed? What value, assessed value you're going to be picking up?
Mr. Coghill: It will be assessed in the same manner, I imagine,
Mr. Beard: No, but I mean do you now know what the value is? Can you project at this time what the additional city revenues will be?
Mr. Coghill: No, I don't have that information off hand - we could probably get a barnyard guess on it for you, but you see its not really a move to increase revenue as much as it is to zone and control.
Mr. Beard: That I understand, but as I understand it you're also talking about being able to make services available to this additional section and I wondered if you had any way of comparing the cost that the City would be called upon to expend with the revenues that it would generate.
Mr. Coghill: Oh, the City would make money off it, because the only things that you would be - they already have the volunteer fire department - they're already supporting the schools - the tuition rate from these children would not offset the personal property tax and the real property tax. A large portion of these forty-five people would be coming from the now FAA station, that is -
Mr. Beard: So there'd still be no federal money?
Mr. Coghill: But yes, we'd get this not only in taxes but we also get it in Public Law 874 fund.
Mr. Beard: How many students are there in this area?
Mr. Coghill: In this area? There are about 22.
? Might I ask this, Jack? This section 36 that you're speaking of, of course, if its a section or whatever plot of ground it is, it isn't intersurveyed in lots or anything, is it?
Mr. Coghill: No sir, there is, there are five parcels of property on this school ground section 36 that the state subdivided about five or six years ago, and they were sold and they've just been sitting and nobody has done anything with them -
? Yes, I can understand that type of operation. It happens every place.

Mr. Coghill: And what they've done is they've just plucked them off and let it sit . . .

? Speculation . . .

Mr. Coghill: . . and they're just betting on the _____and the thing is if we have some way or another of getting in there and say "Buster, you'd better start doing something" because you go try to buy one of these pieces of property and it's worth 20 times what they paid for it, alright, if its worth 20 times, they can pay taxes on it.

? Same thing exists at home.

Mr. Coghill: And its the same thing as is true around our airport. There's some property around the airport on this, in this, acreage addition. You try to buy a piece of that property and it's worth six - seven thousand dollars. Alright, this is worth six - seven thousand dollars, let them put it in their own self-assessment forms of which we - this is the form of which we operate.

? Self-assessment, huh?

Mr. Coghill: We have a self-assessment system.

? (laugh) That's pretty nice.

Mr. Beard: One more serious question.

Mr. Coghill: Yes, sir?

Mr. Beard: I take it this ground is on higher ground and will not be subject to flooding like the present town?

Mr. Coghill: Yes, we have, we have a series of plans that were projected by an engineering firm through the, through the Alaska State Housing Authority under a contract between the City, the state, and ASHA and they came up with, oh, four or five different plans. They came up with one of building up the community -- some of it was quite sophisticated.

Mr. Coghill

? Present.

Coghill: What?

? The present community.

Mr. Coghill: The present community.

Mr. Beard: A land fill.

Mr. Coghill: Some, one was a landfill, of different natures. I have those all right here before me, Mr. Chairman, I could present them to you.

Mr. Beard: Well, I wonder if you could just advise the Commission as to what effect this annexation will have on flood relief.

Mr. Coghill: This annexation thing, if we should have anotherflood this year and get into as much damages as we had before - we've all pretty much signed waivers that we're living in a flooding area and we're going to have to move, well, if the Tanana Valley is getting so saturated with dams, dikes and roads and stuff like this where this flow or this raise is a permanent type thing in the Tanana, why then we're going to have to move someplace.

Mr. Beard: And this will be safer ground?

Mr. Coghill: This did not get wet during, - it got wet from the rain because we had 22 days of constant rain but it was not innovated by the water.

Mr. Beard: Do you expect that by the very fact that it will be within city boundaries will help to generate movement on an individual basis from the present townsite, of individual.

Mr. Coghill: I think so, plus the fact that this will be an orderly movement, if it takes place.

Mrs. Stokke: You plan to zone the whole area before you start this movement?

Mr. Coghill: Yes, mam, yes, mam, this is probably one of the first issues that would take place.

Mr. Singleton: Any further questions, does anyone else have any further questions? (To the Commission members) Was there anyone else who wished to speak on behalf of the petition? (To the audience) Have anything to say that Mr. Coghill hasn't covered? If there are none, is there anyone who wishes to speak against the petition. And if there are none, we wish to thank the people of Nenana for having us here for the hearing today and you will be receiving word of the Local Boundary Commission decision very shortly, Mr. Coghill. Thank you.

Mr. Coghill: Thank you.

MINUTES OF LOCAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION MEETING

NENANA, ALASKA February 1, 1969

Chairman Singleton convened the meeting of the Boundary Commission on February 1, 1969, at 1:55 P.M. in Nenana, Alaska immediately following the hearing on the petition to change the boundaries of the City of Nenana.

Members of the Commission present were Victor Gill, Bernice Stokke, Grace Johnson, George Norton, and James Singleton. Also in attendance was John Beard, Director of the Local Affairs Agency.

Chairman Singleton indicated that the purpose of the meeting was to discuss and reach a decision upon the proposed boundary change. A general discussion followed and it was observed that the necessity and desirability of the boundary change was fully documented in the presentation of Mr. Coghill, the only person who testified at the hearing. It was noted that no person had spoken in opposition to the proposal.

The members of the Commission agreed that the information presented to the Commission demonstrated that the area to be annexed would provide the City with land, free from flooding, in which to develop.

Mr. Gill moved, seconded by Mrs. Johnson, and it was passed without objection that the boundary change as presented in the petition be accepted and recommended to the Legislature.

It was then discussed that the recommendation must be submitted to the Legislature within the first ten days of the session. Mr. Gill requested that the Local Affairs Agency prepare a formal Memorandum of Decision, setting forth the findings of the Commission as previously discussed. Chairman Singleton directed Mr. Beard to prepare this memorandum and to circulate it for the signatures of the Commission members; and to draft a formal recommendation of the boundary change and submit the recommendation to the Legislature, on behalf of the Commission, within the 10 day requirement.

Meeting adjourned at 2:05 P.M.

LOCAL AFFAIRS AGENCY REPORT to

LOCAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION

Nenana Annexation

January 27, 1969

LOCAL AFFAIRS AGENCY JUNEAU, ALASKA

Proceedings to Date

On December 20, 1968, the Local Affairs Agency received a petition, in the form of a letter from Ray Brown, Mayor of Nenana, on behalf of the Nenana City Council, for a boundary change that would effect an annexation of certain lands to the City of Nenana.

The Agency determined, upon review of the petition, that it was in proper form and that, there being no political subdivisions in and about the territory involved other than the petitioning city, proper service of the petition had been accomplished.

To date, no answer to the petition has been filed with the Agency.

From information contained in the petition, and from further information in the Agency's file, the Agency determined that it was highly desirable that the Local Boundary Commission hold its hearing in time for its recommendation to be submitted to the forthcoming legislative session. Upon ascertaining that a quorum of the Local Boundary Commission could be assembled in Nenana on February 1, 1969, the Agency sent notice of the hearing, by certified mail, to the city of Nenana. Notice was received by the petitioner on January 15, 1969. Notice was published in the Fairbanks News-Miner, a newspaper of general circulation in the Nenana area, on January 17, 1969. The City was requested to post copies of the notice in three public and prominent places in the City and was instructed to have a copy of the petition available for public inspection at the City Clerk's office. A copy of the Notice of Hearing is appended to this report.

It is the opinion of the Local Affairs Agency that all statutory and regulatory notice requirements have been complied with.

Introduction

Due to the limited time between receipt of the petition and date of hearing, the Agency has not had an opportunity to resort to all of the sources of information upon which it usually draws in preparing its reports to the Commission. The Alaska State Housing Authority is preparing a staff report on the Nenana economy, however, and has provided us a preliminary draft of that report. The draft, which is also appended, provides a great deal of pertinent information. This Agency's report will summarize ASHA's major findings and provide such supplemented information as is available.

Vital Statistics

Population of Nenana: 396. This figure was provided by Mayor Brown. It is assumed that it includes residents of St. Mark's native village, an area located east of (and not included within) city boundaries. ASHA study estimates 282 in City, 28 in St. Mark's as of August, 1968.

Population of area to be annexed: 45. (provided by Mayor Brown)

School enrollment: 210 (provided by Mayor Brown). ASHA estimates that about 100 students reside outside the City. The Agency has no figures on students residing in the area of proposed annexation.

School costs: $1,012 per average daily member. The City is reimbursed by the state, for nonresident students, at the rate of $219.72 per student.

Location: Bounded on the north by the Tanana River, on the west by the Nenana River.

Access: Highway (approx. 60-65 miles from Fairbanks on Anchorage-Fairbanks Highway); Air (City owned airport, located south of and contiguous to city boundary, in area to be annexed; no scheduled service); Railroad (passesger service to Anchorage and Fairbanks, daily in summer, twice weekly in winter; year-round freight service); River (railhead for Tanana-Yukon waterway)

The Annexation Proposal

Nenana is not located within an organized borough. The territory which the City proposes to annex is primarily rural in nature - the nearest "urban" development to the south being in the Anderson-Clear area, some 15-20 miles away. The present petition, then, does not represent an attempt to resolve jurisdictional disputes or to consolodate contiguous urbanized areas under a central governing authority. To this extent, the Commission is not being called upon to resolve the conflicting claims of City, Borough, and/or service area that each is best designed and most able to provide needed services to residents of the affected area. The considerations that would apply to a boundary change in the Anchorage area, for example, and that are anticipated in much of the Minnesota legislation, are not wholly applicable in this instance.

Nenana's petition appears to have been prompted largely, if not entirely, by the City's flooding problem. The nature of this problem is discussed briefly on page 11 of the ASHA report, and its influence upon Nenana's plans for the future is a continuing theme through that report. ASHA concludes (pp 37 et.seq.) that without flood alleviation, Nenana's population "could drop as low as 250-275 by 1971" and would be unlikely to grow "much beyond 350-400 by 1985", notwithstanding possible industrial development. Moreover, recurrent flooding would cause constant population fluctuation, with the probable gradual loss of business and population to the Anderson area.

The 1967 flood, by its severity, focused attention on Nenana's acute need for flood relief. Studies by the Corps of Engineers, ASHA, and private consultants resulted in four proposed flood protection programs (ASHA report, p. 29). The report discusses only the last two of the alternatives, considering them to be the most practicable; and by its petition and supporting information, the City indicates that it envisages the fourth - southward relocation - to be the more desirable.

No funds are currently available for a concerted relocation project. Quite possibly, monies would be more readily available once the land were brought under City's jurisdiction. The City feels, however, that individual residents would be attracted away from the river and into the safer Sand Hill area, even without financial assistance, if the area were annexed to the City. (It may be that such individual resettlement in this area is already occurring. The Commission will perhaps wish to inquire into this, for purposes of gauging the present need for City planning and zoning).

The economic effect of relocation in the Sand Hill area is also assessed by the ASHA study, page 37. Briefly, it is estimated that the City's population would stabilize at 400-450 people by 1985, barring significant industrial growth. Over the land-fill alternative, the annexation-relocation approach has the advantages of (a) being less costly and (b) affording room for additional growth in the event of rapid development.

Rapid development, as more fully explained in the report, is not to be expected, however. Of primary significance is Nenana's situation at the railhead of the Tanana-Yukon river highway. It is the staging area for river commerce to the interior. When the proposed North railway is constructed, Nenana will lose this advantage. Goods will be shipped by rail to the Yukon River and thence distributed downriver. (ASHA, pp. 33-35)

The City is hopeful, at least, that the northern spur will join the mainline at Nenana. This would generate substantial economic activity during the construction period and would possibly retain for Nenana maintenance and storage facilities, with attendant jobs.

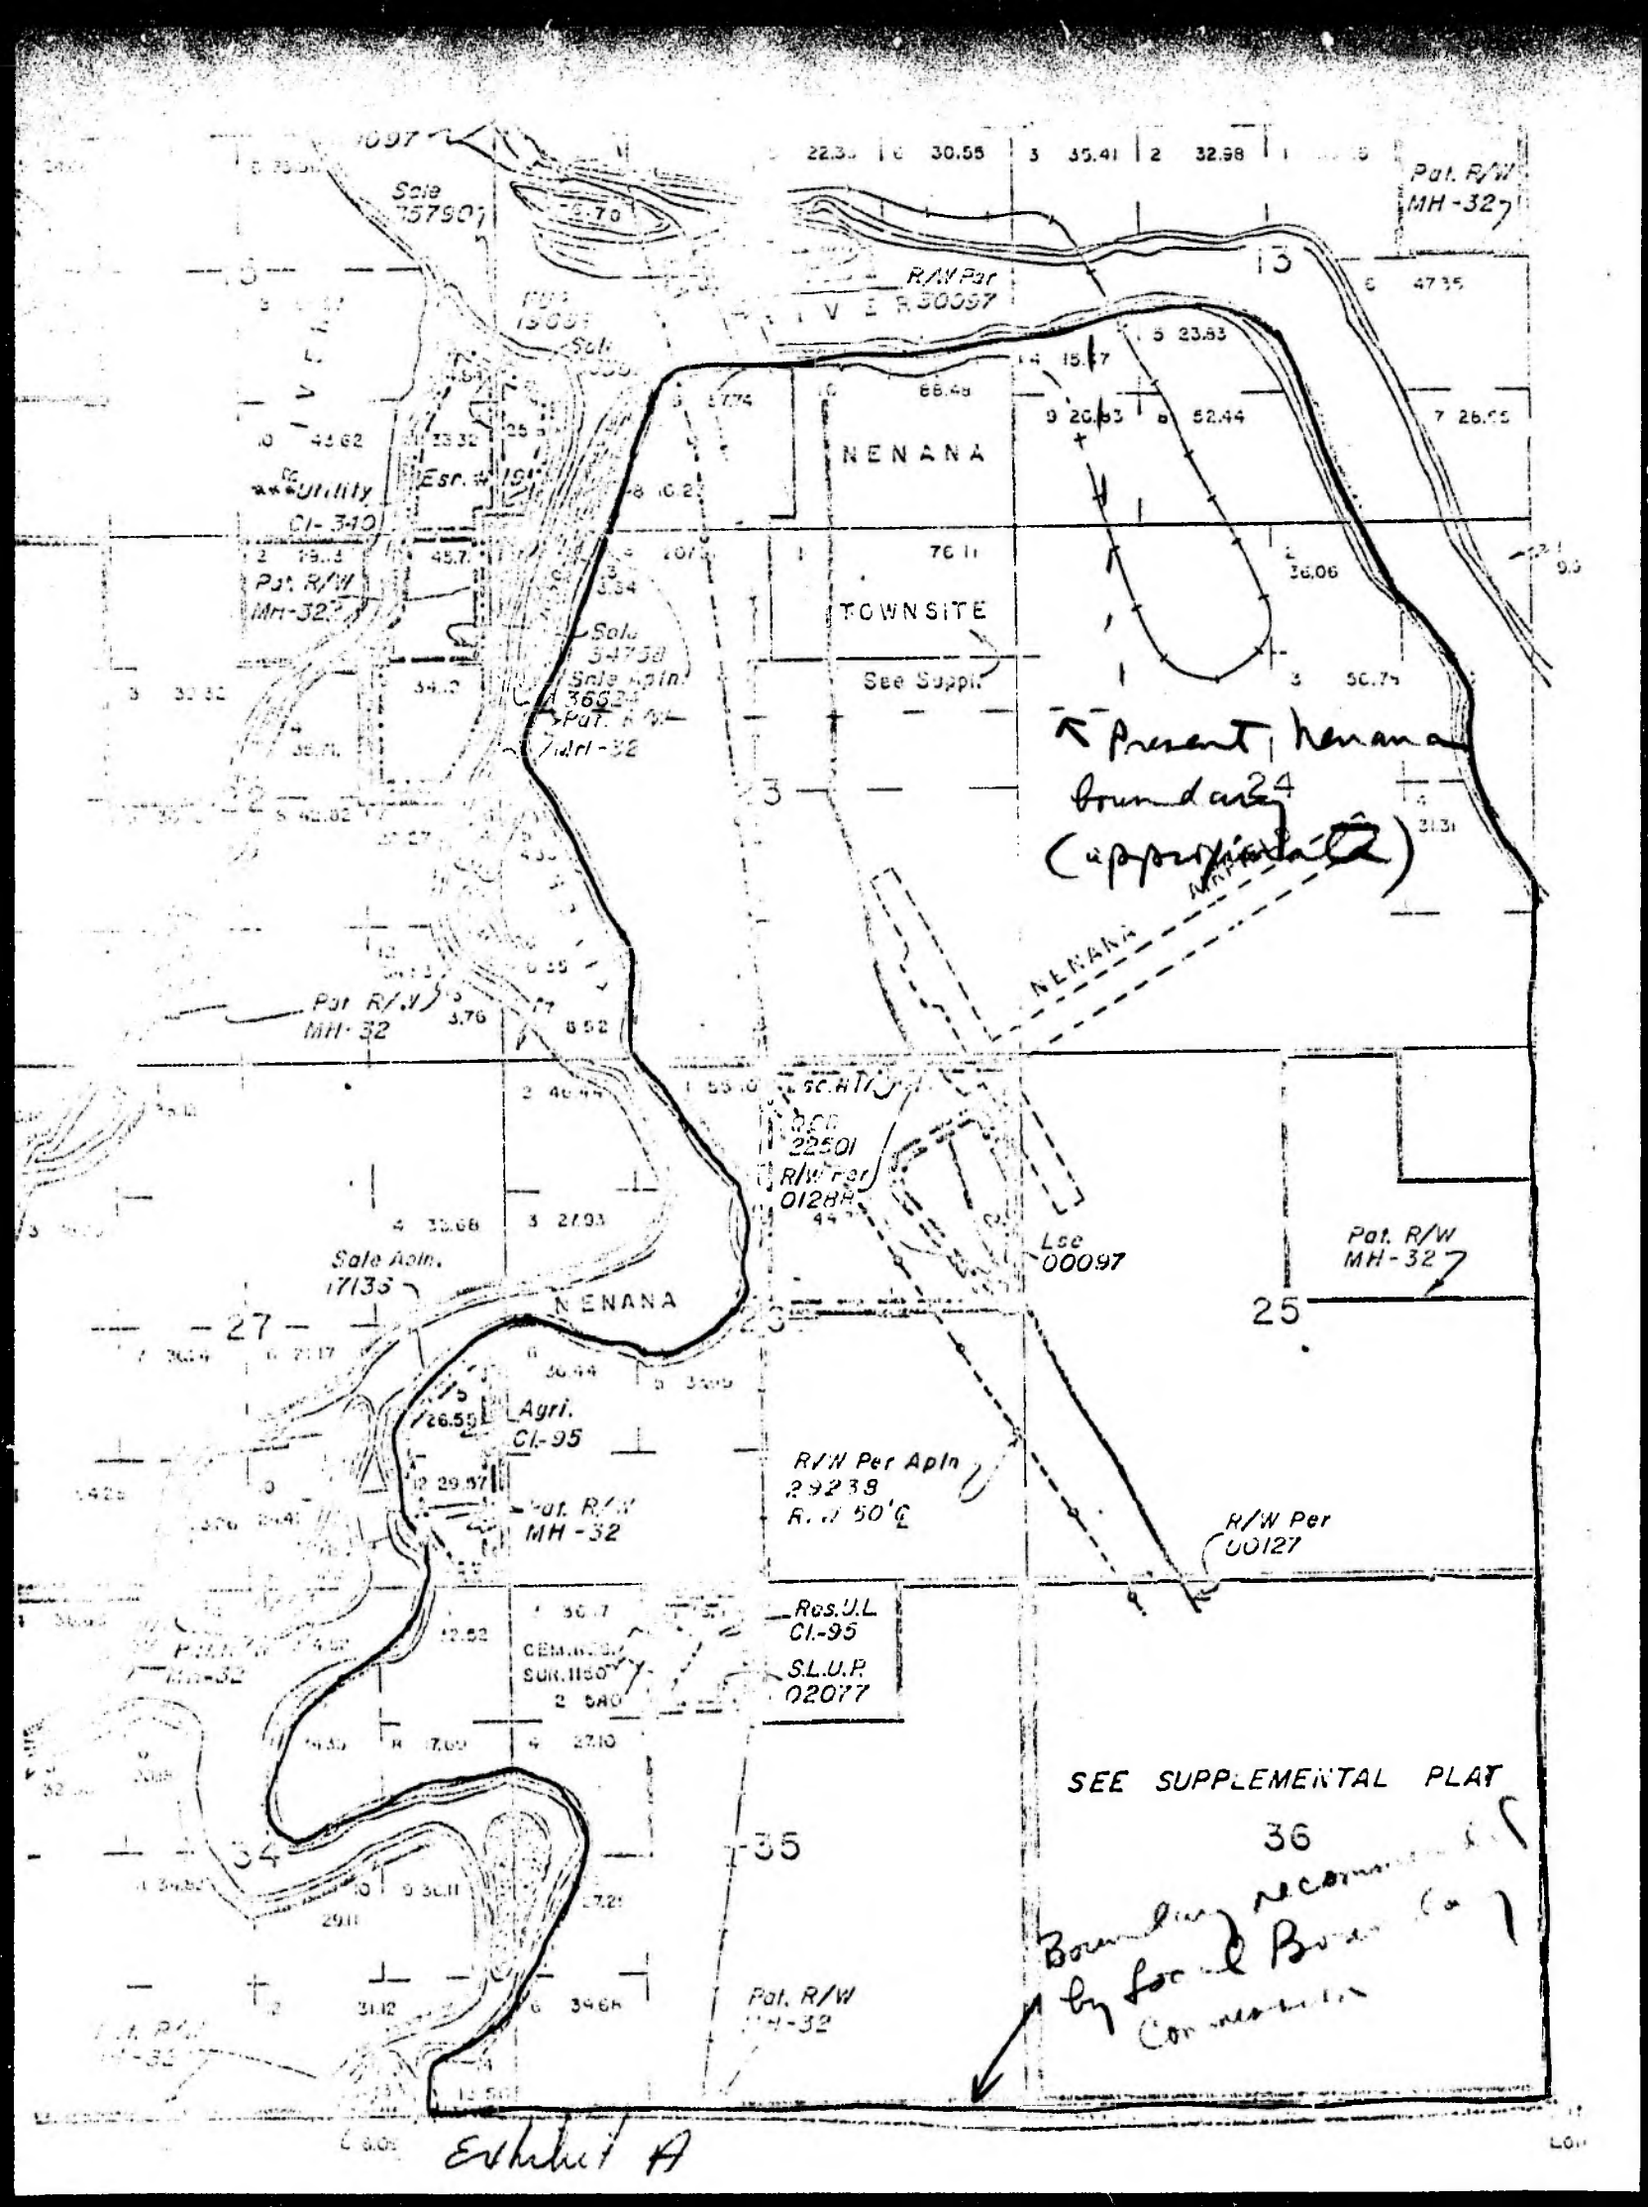
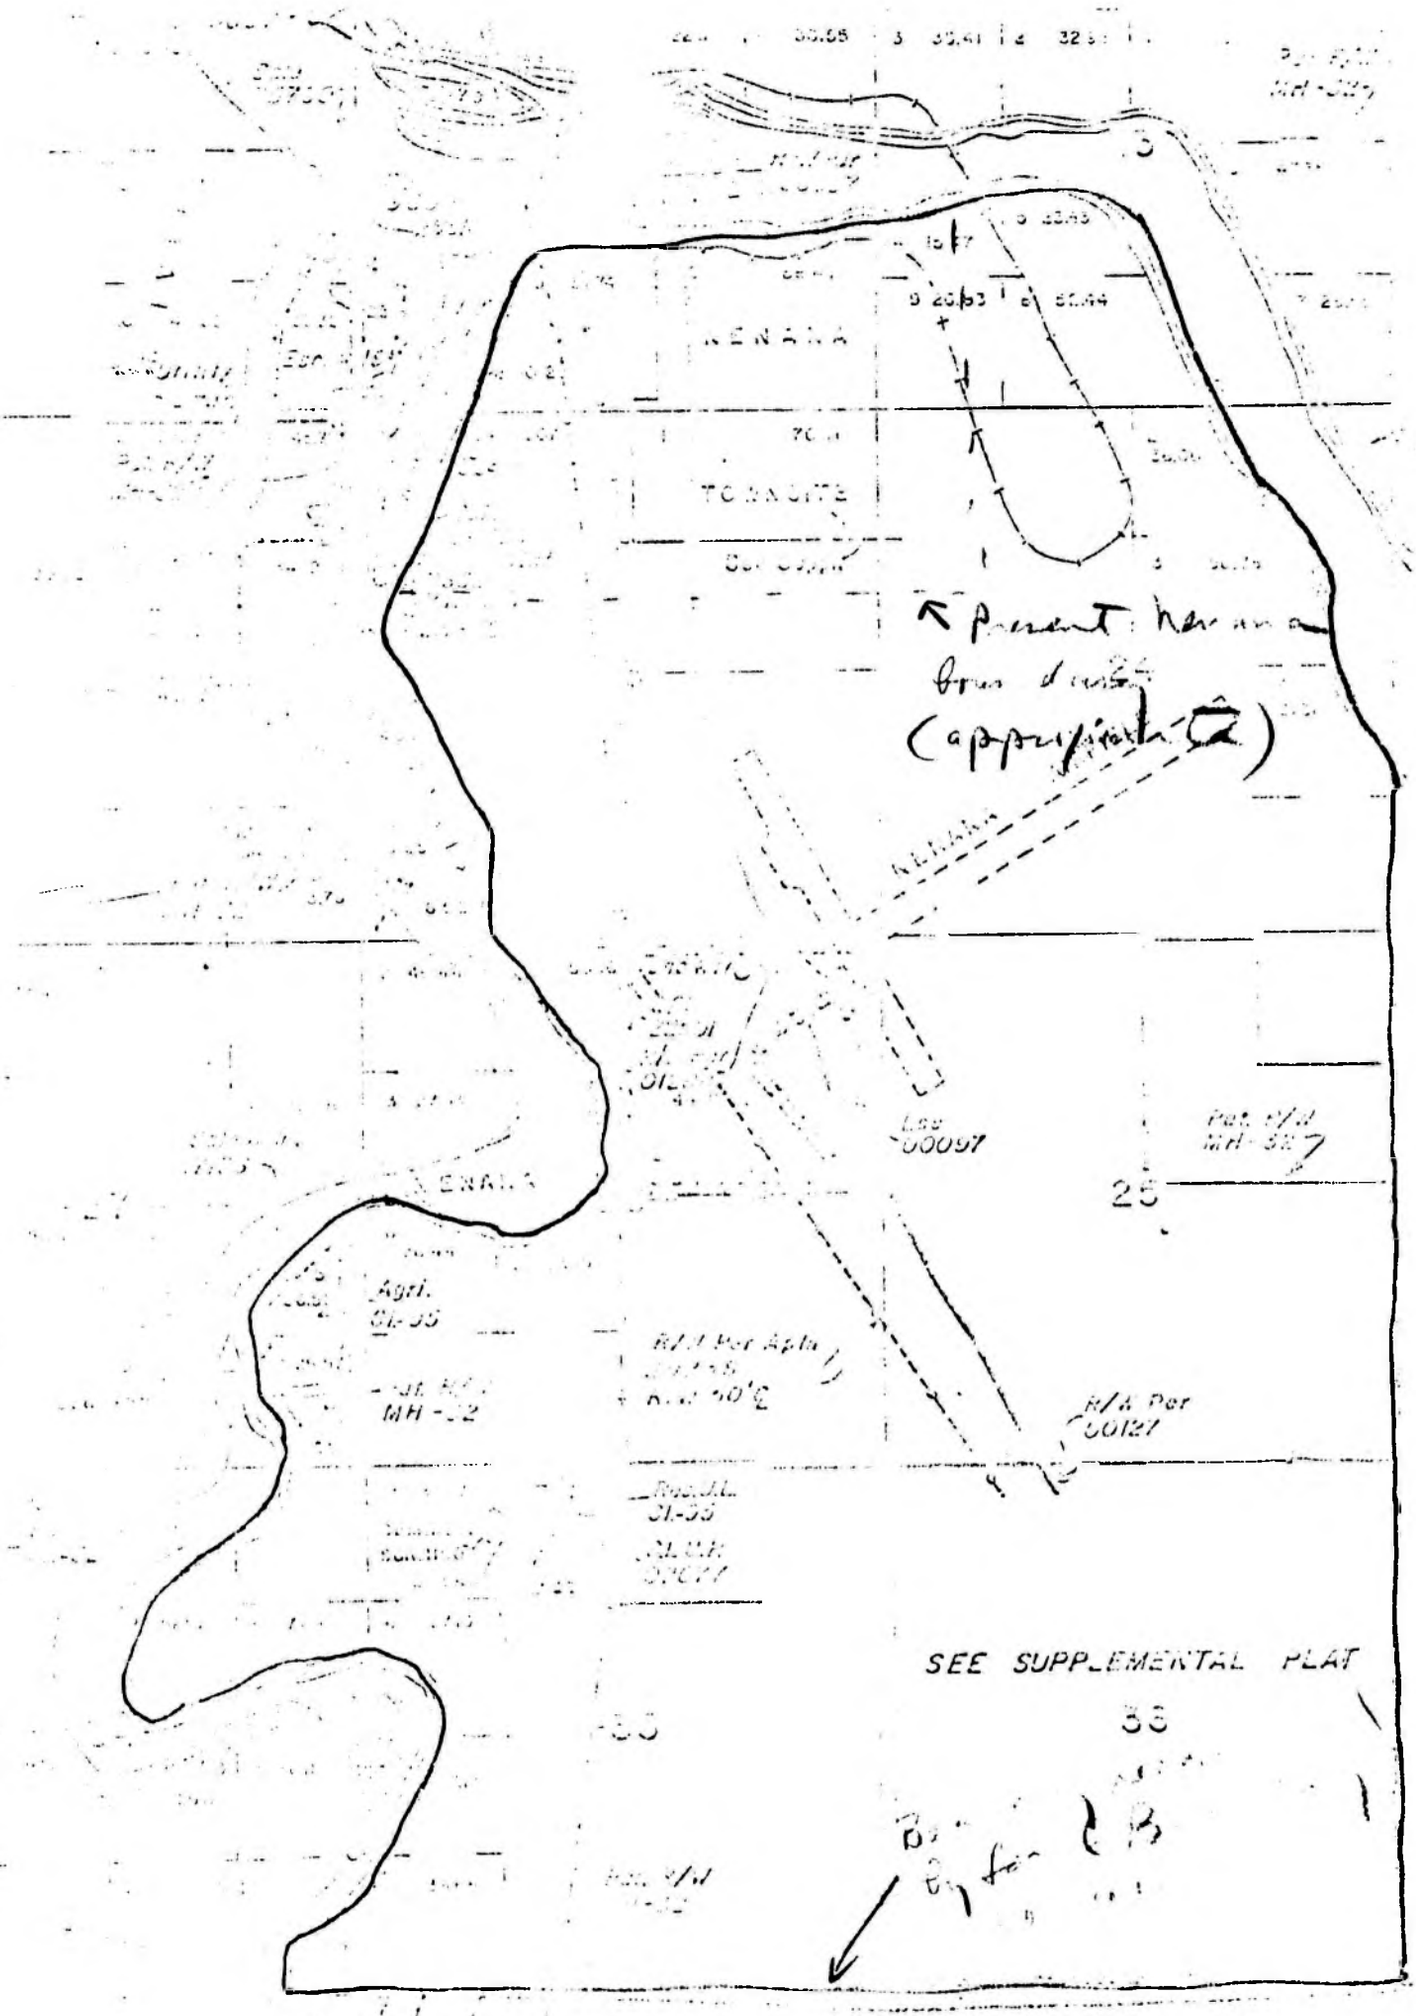
Conclusion



Nenana has been the subject of a good deal of economic and development study of late. Most of these studies have not been entirely finalized - and have been unavailable to the Agency - but the apparent lesson of all will be a need for flood protection. It seems, too, that accord has been reached on development of a "new city" in the area of proposed annexation as a viable answer to that need.



The Agency considers annexation to be a good first-step toward such development. It would enable the City to extend services - water, sewer, police, streets - into the protected area, thus encouraging individuals to remove from the present flood plain (and perhaps fostering, as well, an imigration of residents from further south). Should funds become available for a total relocation project, annexation will be essential.

The Agency does not have sufficient information on the residents and land owners in the area of expansion to determine how annexation will affect them. The Commission will want to know (and the City has been so informed) what services will be made available to this area and what the cost of these services - both to the City and to the residents - will be.

It should be noted, in addition, that the City has stressed, as a reason supporting annexation, its desire that the airfield be within city boundaries. The Agency understands that the airfield is city-owned, located on city property contiguous to the present boundaries. This being the case, the airport could be annexed by ordinance (AS 29.70.210). Should it develop at the hearing that the airfield is the only justification for annexation, the Agency recommends that the Commission deny the petition and make no recommendation to the Legislature.

Subject to the above qualifications, it is the Agency's opinion that the proposed Nenana boundary change would serve a positive purpose and is in the best interest of the State and the City.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plaintiff,	)
vs.	)	Criminal No. A-61-69
JAMES FAYE VINSON, Defendant.	)

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF MOTION TO SUPPRESS

The Defendant's first contact with police officers in this case was on January 26, 1969, when his baggage was searched under a lawful warrant alleging the Defendant was carrying a quantity of marijuana. A careful search was made and no marijuana was found. However, eight (8) photographs and four (4) reels of 8 mm film, subsequently alleged to be obscene, were found. The photographs and film were not seized at that time.

On January 29, 1969, a search warrant was issued covering the Defendant's residence to search for obscene pictures and motion picture films. The warrant was based solely on the affidavit of Donald Watson, Customs Agent. (A copy of the Search Warrant and Affidavit are attached.) The affidavit does not even assert that the conclusion of obscenity was based on the affiant's personal observation of the photographs or films.

Under the warrant, a search of Defendant's residence was made. In addition to the four reels of film and eight photographs mentioned in the affidavit, thirteen other films were seized along with numerous photographs. Also, a careful search for marijuana was carried on in the residence under the warrant for obscene films.

Subsequently, after viewing one or more of the films and photographs seized, the Grand Jury indicted the Defendant charging violation of Title 18 U.S.C. Sec. 1461(a) and 1465.

To this point, several fatal errors have appeared in the Government's case.

eb

The affidavit of the Customs Agent was insufficient to show probable cause as there was no allegation that his statements were based on personal knowledge. After all, that is the purpose of an affidavit.

Conceding for purposes of argument that the Customs Agent had viewed the films, his affidavit stating so and reaching the personal conclusion that the films were obscene, the warrant is still invalid. In Lee Art Theatre v. Virginia, 392 U.S. 636 (1968), the U. S. Supreme Court reversed a State Court conviction of possessing and exhibiting lewd and obscene motion pictures. The fatal defect was the use of evidence seized under a search warrant based on the affidavit of a police officer > "which stated only the titles of the motion pictures and that the officer had determined from personal observation of them and of the billboard in front of the theatre that the films were obscene." Lee Art Theatre, supra, P. 636.

> "However, we need not decide in this case whether the Justice of the Peace should have viewed the motion picture before issuing the warrant. The procedure under which the warrant was issued solely upon the conclusionary assertions of the police officer without any inquiry by the Justice of the Peace into the factual basis for the officer's conclusions was not a procedure 'designed to focus searchingly on the question of obscenity', id., at 732, 6 L. Ed. 2d at 1136, and therefore fell short of constitutional requirements demanding necessary sensitivety to freedom of expression." id, at 637.

In other cases, Courts have required a prior judicial determination of obscenity before a warrant can issue, and even declared invalid warrant issued after the Judge had viewed the film. The defect in that case was the lack of an adversary hearing on the question of obscenity before the warrant issued. See Cambist Films v. Illinois, 292 F. Supp. 185 (1968).

In U. S. v. Brown, 274 F. Supp. 561 (1967), the Defendant was charged, as in the present case, of transporting obscene material in interstate commerce [illegible] plus a quantity of comics, as in the present case, [illegible] search warrant based on the affidavit of an FBI officer who observed the material.

None of the contents were submitted, as in the present case, to the Commissioner for his persual. The Court held the seizure unlawful and ordered the evidence suppressed and returned to the Defendant.

The Court stated that

> "the common thread running through recent Supreme Court decisions on the seizure of allegedly obscene matter is that because the line between protected and unprotected speech is so difficult to draw, dissemination of a particular work should be completely undisturbed, at least until an independent determination of obscenity is made by a judicial officer. Complete restraint on any work must await a final judicial determination of obscenity." U. S.v. Brown, supra, p. 563.

The Court in Brown relied heavily on Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717 (1961), and A Quantity of Copies of Books v. Kansas, 378 U.S. 205 (1964). Conceding that the Supreme Court in Marcus and A Quantity of Books was expressing its view in the context of civil forfeiture cases, the Court in Brown as did the U.S. Supreme Court in Lee Art Theatre, supra, applied similar procedures to criminal obscenity prosecutions.

> "A search and seizure for the purpose of gathering evidence for a criminal obscenity prosecution imparts at least the same potential restraint on the dissemination of material protected by the First Amendment as one made solely for the purpose of commencing forfeiture proceedings." U. S. v. Brown, supra, p. 563.

Another interesting question and probably of first impression in this Court has arisen as the result of the recent U. S. Supreme Court case, Stanley v. Georgia, 37 Law Week 4315 (1969). In that case, the Court held Stanley had a right to possess obscene films in his own home. It should logically follow that a warrant designed to deprive a person of possession in his own home of obscene matter is invalid. If he has the right to possess the matter in his own home, no one should have the right to take it from him while in his home.

If he has the right to possess it in his own home, logically he should have the right to bring it there, unless he had stolen it somewhere.

You can pa-3-yes it for your illegally gotten Gains.

It could be argued that the seizure was not to deprive the Defendant of possession in his own home, but to use that seized as evidence of violation of another statute. That contention is confronted by at least two problems in the present case. First, are we to discriminate against those who must purchase the material out of State? That is, those who purchase the material in Alaska and take it to their own homes in Alaska have violated no law. Those who purchase the material outside Alaska are subject to prosecution for violation of a number of laws, if the material is held obscene. One of the stated purposes of Title 18, Sect. 1462, the statute the Defendant is accused of violating, was to supplement State legislation. If there is no legislation prohibiting possession in one's home, or if such legislation exists and is unconstitutional as a result of Stanley, that purpose is no longer existent.

Secondly, is the manner in which the officers initially discovered the material alleged to be obscene. During a valid search for marijuana, the officers found the photographs and films, and went to great pains to view the contents, especially of the films, by unrolling the film and looking through the individual frames in the light. This type procedure occurred in the Stanley case while the officers were searching the Defendant's home for gambling devices under a lawful warrant for that purpose. Mr. Justice Stewart, with whom Mr. Justice Brennan and Mr. Justice White joined, in a concurring opinion, stated:

> "This is not a case where agents in the course of a lawful search came upon contraband, criminal activity, or criminal evidence in plain view. For the record makes clear that the contents of the films could not be determined by mere inspection. And this is not a case that presents questions as to the permissible scope of a search made incident to a lawful arrest. For the appellant had not been arrested when the agents found the films. After finding them, the agents spent some 50 minutes exhibiting them by means of the appellant's projector in another upstairs room. Only then did the agents return downstairs and arrest the appellant.... [illegible] to invite a [illegible] ingly [illegible] to get into a [illegible] > launch forth upon unconfined searches and indiscriminate seizures as if armed with all the unbridled and illegal power of a general warrant.

> Because the films were seized in violation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments, they were inadmissible in trial." Stanley v. Georgia, supra, p. 4319.

True, the films in the present case were not seized immediately after such a search described in Stanley, but the later seizure was certainly a fruit of the unconstitutional procedures of January 26, 1969.

CONCLUSION

The evidence seized should be suppressed and returned to the Defendant for one or more of the following reasons:

1. It is the belief of the Defendant, that the January 29, 1969 search warrant was not issued to the F.B.I., but to a Customs Agent and transferred to F.B.I. without approval of the Commissioner, therefore, the F.B.I. had no authority to make the search;

2. The affidavit on which the January 29, 1969 warrant was based did not allege personal observations and conclusions of the affiant, and, therefore failed to show probable cause. Nor does the affidavit state as the warrant asserts that the affiant believes the films to be on the premises to be searched;

3. The January 29, 1969 search warrant was invalid because prior safeguards to protect the Defendant's First Amendment rights were not taken before the warrant was issued;

4. Under the January 29, 1969 search warrant, the material seized was in the possession of the Defendant in his own home and a warrant to deprive the Defendant of that possession is invalid; and

5. The January 29, 1969 search warrant was the fruit of an illegal search undertaken under the auspices of the January 26, 1969 search warrant.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plaintiff,	)
vs.	)
JAMES FAYE VINSON, Defendant.	)

Criminal No. A-61-69

REPLY MEMORANDUM

Defendant, JAMES FAYE VINSON, is satisfied that the warrant was issued to an F.B.I. Agent instead of a Customs Agent, but the other points raised in the Defendant's MEMORANDUM have not been satisfied by the Plaintiff's MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION.

The MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION states in the first sentence that Defendant has admitted in Paragraph 1 of the MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF MOTION TO SUPPRESS, "that the search pursuant to the warrant of January 26, 1969, was legal". Referring the Court to Paragraph 1 of that memorandum, no such admission can be found. The Defendant admits in that paragraph that the warrant was lawful, but does not state that the search was lawful. In fact, the second paragraph on Page 4 and the first paragraph on Page 5 of the MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT are devoted to illustrating the illegality of the searching procedures on January 26, 1969 with respect to the allegedly obscene material.

Referring to the January 26, 1969 warrant, the Defendant does not deny that a search warrant can be valid if based on hearsay; however, certain basic rules must be followed. One rule is that the hearsay affiant must state that he "believes" the objects of the proposed search are on the premises to be searched. Nowhere, in the affidavit of Donald Watson, does he state that he believes the alleged obscene materials to be on the premises searched. His affidavit is based solely on what transpired on January 26, 1969.

Secondly, the MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT points out that the U. S.

eb

Supreme Court has ruled unconstitutional searches for obscene materials based on the affidavit of an enforcement officer stating his personal observations. It should surely follow that a search warrant for alleged obscene materials based on an affidavit of an enforcement officer that does not state the conclusion of obscenity was based on his personal observations, is invalid.

Much of the MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT was devoted to illustrating that the Defendant's First Amendment rights have been violated. The MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION does not even discuss this question though faced with U. S. Supreme Court cases and lower Court cases that indicate the proper procedures to protect the Defendant's First Amendment rights were not followed.

Much of the law cited in the MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION does not go to the real questions in issue. The Plaintiff cites Rule 41 (c) as allowing the Commissioner to issue a search warrant based on affidavit if the Commissioner believes there is probable cause. But the Commissioner must require certain procedures before he can determine probable cause. As pointed out earlier, the affiant must state he believes the objects of the search are on the premises to be searched, and, in the case of obscene materials, an independent determination of obscenity must be made by someone other than the police officer, most cases requiring a judicial determination (see Pages 2 and 3 of MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT), before a search warrant can be issued and the material seized.

Referring to the matter at the bottom of Page 1 of the MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION, the Defendant does not quarrel with the Plaintiff's position that a warrant may be based on hearsay, but again, with respect to a search for alleged obscene materials, even warrants based on personal observations have been held invalid (see Pages 2 and 3 of MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT).

Referring to the matter at the top of Page 2 of the MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION, the Defendant agrees with a policy of not imposing stringent over-technical standards upon a Commissioner in determining probable cause; however, the requirement that the affiant state he believes the objects of the search are on the premises to be searched is a basic requirement certainly not over-technical. The cases have shown that a prior independent determination of obscenity is also basic.

The Defendant also agrees, referring to the last paragraph on Page 2 of the MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION, that enforcement officers may search and seize fruits of an alleged crime, but again the basic issue has been avoided. That is, the search warrant used for that search must be valid.

Referring to Page 3 of the MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION, the Plaintiff seems to argue that a presumption contained in 18 U.S.C. 1465 takes precedence over the recent U. S. Supreme Court case of Stanley v. Georgia, 37 Law Week 4315. Then in the last sentence, the Plaintiff admits that the presumption does not go to the issue of suppression of evidence or dismissal of endictment. The Defendant quite agrees and cannot understand why the presumption was referred to if it has no relevance to the issue of suppression of evidence.

Finally, not only does the Plaintiff avoid completely the issues of protection of the Defendant's First Amendment rights and failure of the affiant to state he believes the objects of the search are on the premises to be searched, but no reply has been made to the Defendant's allegations contained in the last paragraph on Page 4 and the first paragraph on Page 5 of the MEMORANDUM OF SUPPORT. That is, the procedures in the January 20, 1969 search were illegal and that the January 29, 1969 search warrant was based on the fruits of the illegal procedure during the first search. The quoted portion from the Stanley opinion is certainly right on point.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Plaintiff,

v.

JAMES FAYE VINSON,

Defendant.

FILED

AUG 1 1969

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
DISTRICT OF ALASKA
By..... Deputy.

No. A-61-69 Cr.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

This matter is before the Court on defendant's motion to suppress evidence, return seized property, and dismiss the indictment, based on an allegedly unlawful search and seizure.

On January 26, 1969, defendant's baggage was searched for marijuana at Anchorage International Airport, pursuant to a valid search warrant. No marijuana was found, but four reels of motion picture film and eight still photographs, believed by the Customs Agent to be obscene, were observed.

Three days later Customs Agent Watson executed an affidavit before the United States Commissioner alleging the above facts and no more. On the basis of that affidavit a search warrant was issued to search defendant's home for "obscene pictures, motion picture film" concealed in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§1462(a), 1465(1964). The warrant was executed and the evidence seized which defendant now moves to suppress.

Agent Watson's affidavit, the sole support for the warrant on the record, is fatally defective in two respects.

First, in obscenity cases a magistrate issuing a search warrant is required to make an independent finding of probable cause not only as to the presence of the offending matter, but also as to its obscenity. The "conclusary assertions of a single police officer" are not sufficient. Lee Art Theatre, Inc. v. Virginia, 392 U.S. 636 (1968); Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717, 731-32 (1961). Here the affidavit states only that the materials in question "were observed to be obscene." Agent Watson's grounds for this conclusion are not given, nor does the record show that any such grounds were laid before the Commissioner.

Second, there is nothing in the record to connect the allegedly obscene matter with defendant's home. The affidavit states that on January 26, obscene matter was observed in defendant's suitcase at International Airport. On this basis a search warrant was issued three days later for defendant's home. There is no indication that any law enforcement officer had probable cause to believe, from personal observation, hearsay or otherwise, that the material seen in the suitcase three days previously was then in defendant's home.

It is therefore ORDERED:

1. THAT defendant's motion to suppress is GRANTED;

2. THAT the motion picture film and photographs seized be returned to defendant's possession;

3. THAT the indictment herein is DISMISSED.

DATED at Anchorage, Alaska, this first day of August, 1969.

United States District Judge

cc: Stanley P. Cornelius Marvin S. Frankel, United States Attorney

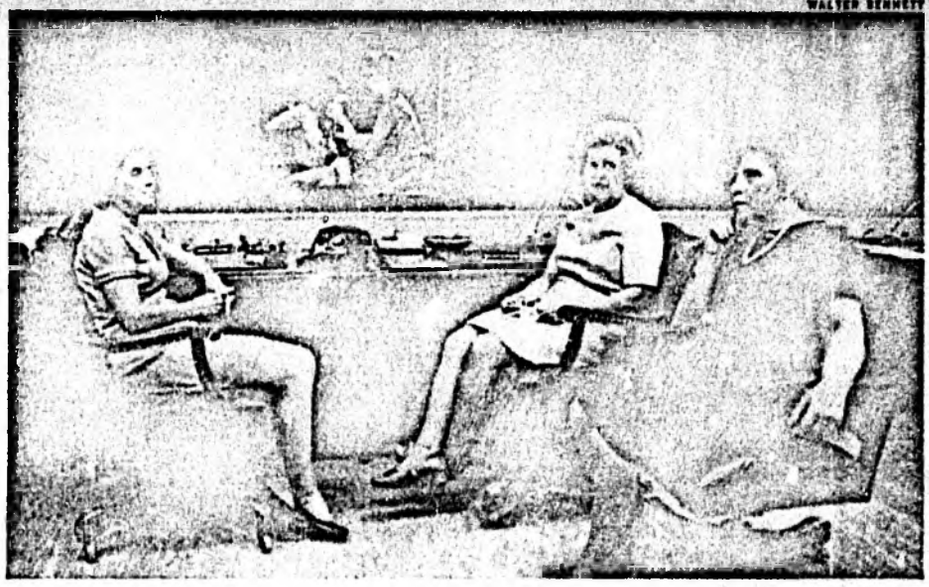
he said. "The shadow of the swastika is on every courthouse, on universities, on Government buildings."

Ugly Mood. After the speech, a crowd of 500 gathered in a park to listen to student radicals. Many of the wholesome-looking youths, clenched fists raised, appeared to be out for a lark. But the mood suddenly turned ugly, and when police patrol cars appeared a block away, the crowd began hurling rocks.

With 1,000 students and street people shouting "Burn, baby, burn!" youths set fire to piles of debris and shoved them through the Bank of America doorway. Some of the students argued that the attack was senseless. The burners, unable to articulate their reasons, answered that the bank was a "symbol of corporate corruption."

Though outnumbered, state patrolmen and sheriff's deputies took the offensive. But after a ten-minute rock barrage, they retreated, leaving a patrol car behind. The students set it afire. Meanwhile, the bank burned to the ground —a $275,000 loss.

Tear Gas. The third night, despite a curfew and the arrival of some 500 additional state law-enforcement officers, the students continued their rock hurling. Police attempted unsuccessfully to break up unruly crowds, and from a hovering helicopter equipped with a loudspeaker ordered them to disperse. With only one known exception, the police kept their firearms holstered, sometimes throwing rocks themselves when they ran out of tear gas. One cop was even photographed using a slingshot.



The authorities' restraint kept casualties down: 32 lawmen and two civilians were injured. There were 135 arrests. Finally, Governor Ronald Reagan, who described the rioters as "cowardly little bums," ordered a force of 400 National Guardsmen into Isla Vista and peace was restored. The destructive rampage, like other riots for little or no justification, did more than destroy property and endanger lives. It hurt the cause of rational dissenters while strengthening the hand of those who would quash dissent of any kind.

MORALS

Defense Against Dirt

"They call us the dirty-movie ladies," says Mrs. Margery Shriver. "They don't realize," adds Mrs. Mary Avara, "the headaches we get from watching this stuff." "Can you imagine," asks Mrs. Rosalyn Shecter, "kids at drive-ins getting to see stuff like this? They do elsewhere, you know."

The "stuff" is flesh flicks, and the three middle-aged, middle-class mothers constitute Maryland's defense against them. The last state to censor motion pictures in advance of distribution, Maryland pays the members of its Board of Motion Picture Censors between $4,000 and $4,500 a year each. In fiscal 1969, the trio previewed 687 movies, censored objectionable portions from 14, and rejected 59 outright. Half of those rejected were 8-mm. porno productions made on a shoestring, which is more than most of the performers wore. None of the disapproved films was produced by members of the Motion Picture Association of America, which voluntarily rate their movies for their suitability for different audiences. To look at the issue through the censors' eyes, TIME Correspondent Art White spent a day with the ladies in the Baltimore State Office Building theater. His report:

WALTER BENNETT

CENSORS SHRIVER, SHECTER & AVARA AT WORK
You wouldn't believe the headaches they get.

Electrodes. "O.K., let's go," says Mrs. Shriver, 44. The first film of the day is a Japanese import, The Daydream, a collage of sensual sounds and sadomasochistic fury. On the screen, a man hangs a girl from the ceiling by ropes, then cuts off her clothing with a knife. "I'm either out of touch with Oriental culture," says Mrs. Shriver, wife of an oil-company executive, "or there's something here that escapes me." In another scene, the man strokes the girl's private parts. Both are naked except for masks. "I can't tell what they're doing," says Mrs. Shriver. "Don't ask," replies Mrs. Avara, 60, a widow who has been on the board since 1960.

Electrodes are placed on the girl's breasts. "This is going to be shocking," cracks Mrs. Shriver. The film grinds to a finale in which the hero stabs the nude girl. "We're turning the whole picture down," says Mrs. Avara. "They insult us by submitting stuff like this." Among the films banned last year was I Am Curious (Yellow), the Swedish import found by federal district courts to possess sufficient "redeeming social value" to qualify for constitutional protection.*

Italian Shoes. The projector again whirls, and the women settle back behind their desks to watch Decameron 69. They see two figures squirming on a bed; he removes her sweater, she fondles his fly. "Mark that," Mrs. Shriver shouts to the technician; the scene will be deleted. "Look at his testicles showing there," she calls later. "Mark that." As the film grinds on, the women exchange comments. "I can't tell which country this is because there's no dialogue," complains Mrs. Shriver. "They look like Italian shoes," says Mrs. Shecter, 55, wife of a Baltimore advertising executive.

Watching as a girl is stripped by a male partner (he wearing gloves), Mrs. Shecter observes: "Some of the girls have wonderful undergarments, wonderful bras." Adds Mrs. Shriver: "When I first started seeing these films, they looked like they were made by underwear salesmen."

Susan Saved. At this point, the soundtrack voice interrupts: "As a prostitute, Samantha Jane makes 20 times as much as she'd make as a secretary." The scene shows a young man and a big-bosomed brunette in what appears to be a motel room. Says the brunette: "I need it all the time now." Says Mrs. Shriver: "You make a film like this for a couple of thousand dollars and gross ten or twenty times as much. All you need is a bed, a photographer, and a man and a woman."

As lunchtime approaches and the ladies watch a man mutilate another man with a knife, the board's pretty administrative assistant enters the screening room. "Don't look, Susan," Mrs. Shriver warns, and Susan rushes out. The women send out for sandwiches and coffee, then sit grimly munching in the dark, eyes on the screen.

By now, the cinematic activities have begun to exhibit a staggering sameness, and the joking becomes more strained. Two lesbians perform for the camera, and Mrs. Avara wonders aloud "what's going through their minds." Whatever it is, there is little likelihood that other Marylanders will get a chance to guess. The dirty-movie ladies rejected the film.

* The film's American distributor is challenging Maryland's ban in the U.S. Supreme Court, which has also been asked to rule on the constitutionality of the Maryland board.

The Honorable Judge
Edward V. Davis
Superior Court

Anchorage, Alaska 99501

Dear Judge Davis:

This date the House Judiciary Committee has voted to take up the general question of laws or the like thereof relating to pornography.

In conjunction therewith, it was the feeling of the committee that we would like to review the films that were confiscated from the Billikin Drive In in Anchorage.

The showing of these films will be held here in Juneau in an executive session, that is, only members of the committee and staff will be present.

By this letter we are seeking your permission for such a showing and await your reply to make further arrangements.

Very truly yours,

Barry W. Jackson

Dear Jess:

Please find attached the material you requested. Unfortunately, much of the material brought to my attention during the year had no evidentiary value and as a result was either given to interested legislators or destroyed.

I would propose that you consider asking Mr. Herb Shaindlin, News Director for Station KHAR, to appear before your committee. I have determined that he has conducted probably the most extensive investigation into pornography that has been done so far. He devoted fourteen months to collecting material in Alaska and throughout the United States, and is very knowledgable of how the distributors of pornography are operating. I asked Mr. Shaindlin if he would be willing to testify and bring his collection of material before the committee and he assured me he would be more than glad to do so. In the event you would be interested in his appearing, I would be happy to assist you in making the necessary arrangements.

Mr. Hal Tobey of the State Attorney's office is not in Anchorage today but upon his return I will discuss with him the questions concerning the Billiken film.

I hope this will be of some assistance to you.

Sincerely,

HOUSE BILL NO. 643

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

SIXTH LEGISLATURE - SECOND SESSION

A BILL

For an Act entitled: "An Act amending the Alaska Banking Code."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

* Section 1. AS 06.05.005(3) is amended to read:

(3) authorize a state bank [UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE NEXT REGULAR SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE]

(A) to participate in a public agency created under the laws of this state or of the United States, for the purpose of affording advantages or safeguards to banks or to depositors and to comply with all requirements and conditions imposed upon such participants;

(B) to engage in any banking activity in which a bank subject to the jurisdiction of the federal government may be authorized by federal legislation to engage;

* Sec. 2. AS 06.05.015 is amended by adding a new subsection to read:

(11) charge off all debts owed to the bank in which interest due has been unpaid for a period of six months unless the debt principal is adequately secured and the bank is in process of collection.

* Sec. 3. AS 06.05.025 is amended to read:

AS 06.05.025. BANK EXAMINATIONS. (a) The department shall select one or more competent persons [A COMPETENT PERSON] to make a detailed examination of banks. A report [THE RESULT] of each [HIS] examination and findings shall be transmitted to the department. A copy of the report of examination shall be sent to the organization examined.

MEMORANDUM State of Alaska

Small Loans & Corporations

SUBJECT: H.B. 643
Amendments to the Alaska Banking Code

The following are brief summaries of each section of H.B. 643:

Sec. 1. AS.06.05.005 is amended by deleting certain language as it was originally adopted from the model banking code. This section is known as the "wild-card" statute and its purpose is to ensure a competitive balance between state and national banks. However, as it now stands, it is not as useful as it might be since it requires that any banking powers authorized by the department to maintain the competitive balance must be acted upon by the legislature by the close of the next session. It is suggested that time limit represented in "until the close of the next regular session of the legislature" be deleted. Of the six states having this type of statute, three have no time limit.

Sec. 2. AS.06.05.015 is amended by adding a new subsection defining bad debts. As we broaden the powers of state chartered banks, we must also concern ourselves with asset quality. Most other state banking codes, as well as the national banking law, contain statutory bad debt provisions.

Sec. 3. AS.06.05.025 is amended to clearly authorize the employment of an examination team and conduct whatever examinations are required in the discretion of the commissioner, including followup examinations for mergers or branch banks.

Sec. 4. AS.06.05.035 is amended to enable the department to charge and collect adequate examination and investigation fees.

Under the existing examination statutes (Sections .025 through .035), every examination or investigation performed results in a substantial loss to the department. Due to the increased examination responsibilities, and activities of the department, as well as the increasing number of new bank and branch applications, we feel that it is businesslike and appropriate to collect sufficient fees to offset the costs incurred.

Sec. 5. A new section covering leasehold and development loans is proposed. This section would permit banks to make loans, within certain limits, secured by first lien leaseholds. A leasehold loan is a type of real estate loan in which the borrower (lessee) is the holder, or owner of a leasehold estate, which is of sufficient qualility to warrant a lender accepting it as security for a loan. In other words, the borrower holds a long term lease, which together with the improvements provide security to the lender. Leasehold loans normally apply to hotels, office buildings, warehouses, service stations, apartment houses, and other similar commercial development. This method of lending is now being used extensively throughout the nation and should be made available to our state chartered banks.

Sec. 6. AS.06.05.207 is rewritten to allow a bank to make second mortgage real estate loans. This will permit our banks to serve customers who have a substantial equity in real property and avoid a rewrite of the first mortgage loan. Due to the loan/value ratios and amortization rates established, we believe that the concept is sound and also believe that it will provide a definite advantage over national banks.

This section is rather lengthy due to rearranging existing language for clarification, however, nothing was deleted or added except the provision covering second mortgages.

Sec. 7. A new section is proposed, allowing state chartered banks to make loans secured by forest tracts. We believe this is particularly important to banks and their customers located in areas where there is a significant and economically marketable timber resource. National banks may make such loans and the more modern state banking codes contain such a provision.

Sec. 8. A new section permitting banks to invest in a bank service corporation is proposed. A bank service corporation normally provides computerized bookkeeping and record keeping services to other banks, businesses, and the public. Such an investment is subject to examination and regulations by the department. Bank service corporations are quite common throughout the nation.

Sec. 9. The new section proposed would permit banks to acquire and lease at the request of the customer, both real and personal property. This enables the bank to offer broader services to its customers, relieving them of capital investment and providing tax advantages. The bank's investment in real and personal property under lease arrangements combined with other investments under Sec.230 is limited to an amount not to exceed the shareholder's equity. National banks may engage in leasing and the more modern state banking codes contain such a provision.

Sec. 10. It is proposed that AS.06.05.235 be rewritten to provide clarification and a broader definition for domestic bank holding companies. The definition (AS.06.05.540(9)) as it now reads is very confusing and limits corporate ownership of bank stock to the controlling interest in one bank. We believe this is too restrictive and should be changed.

The proposed new section would require a company to register as a domestic bank holding company, if it owns 10% or more of an Alaska bank or banks. The term "company" includes a corporation, business trust, partnership, association, or other similar organizations. The language used in the proposed new section is sufficiently broad to recognize a registered bank holding company (Bank Holding Company Act of 1956, controlling two or more banks), provided there is compliance with the domestic qualifications under this section. We believe this type of organization is desirable if not vital to the smaller banks in this state for purposes of remaining competitive with the larger banks.

Sec. 11. This is a proposed new section covering various banking practices, including issuing letters of credit, trade acceptances, banker's acceptances, and the sale of data processing services.

Due to the increasing involvement of Alaska in foreign trade and frequency of large commercial transactions between banks and their customers in this state, our own state banks should have such authorized capability.

Authorizing the sale of data processing services should not be confused with the proposed bank service corporation legislation. This section permits the bank to offer the same services, but does not involve an investment in a separate corporate subsidiary.

Sec. 12. AS.06.05.345(a) is amended to reduce the par value of the capital stock from $10 to $1. We believe reducing the par value to $1 will allow a broader distribution of the capital stock, thus encouraging wider ownership of Alaska financial institutions.

Sec. 13. It is proposed that AS.06.05.365 be amended to provide that applications for new bank charters be accompanied by an application fee of $1,000. This is to ensure that new charters receive adequate feasibility study and investigation. In this connection, please refer to Sec. 3 and Sec. 4 of this memo.

Sec. 14. The amendment contained in this section is proposed in order to provide the department with adequate information in regard to bank conversions, mergers, and consolidations.

Sec. 15. This section repeals the existing domestic bank holding company definition. Please refer to Sec. 10 of this memo.

HOUSE JOURNAL

Judiciary Committee Report

on

CS for HOUSE BILL NO. 643

The Judiciary Committee recommends passage of this bill in order to improve the competitive balance between state and national banks and to allow state chartered banks to make loans and extend services to customers not authorized at the present time.

The bill authorizes banks to make second mortgage real estate loans, loans secured by forest tracts, loans secured by a first lien on a leasehold of improved real estate, and land development loans. In recognition of Alaska's increasing involvement in foreign trade, banks are authorized to issue and confirm letters of credit and invest in trade and bank acceptances. The bill allows banks to invest in a bank service corporation, which normally provides computerized bookeeping and record keeping services to bank customers,and,when national banks are engaged in the same activity, to acquire and lease real and personal property to customers.

The provision of these additional services are subject to limitations designed to maintain asset quality, safeguard the interest of depositors, and prevent undue competition with other commercial enterprises. A new section defining bad debts further enhances asset quality.

Another section of the bill amends the Alaska Mutual Savings Bank Act to allow a savings bank to pay interest at a stated rate and issue certificates of deposit.

Chapter 29

LEASE FINANCING

*By KEITH G. CONE

The word "lease" has been used to define the terms and conditions under which the owner of either real or personal property (called the "lessor") makes such property available for use by another (called the "lessee"). The lessor often has to find financing for the property which is the subject of the lease. Consequently, the position of a bank in the community makes it susceptible to requests to finance the purchase of such property. In view of the fact that the financing of personal property for lease purposes is much more common than requests to finance real property, this chapter will be devoted to the discussion of personal property financing only.

BANK ENTRY INTO THE FIELD

Financing of a purchase of personal property for leasing purposes was not generally done by banks prior to World War II. As a matter of fact, it was not until immediately after World War II that the first general indications that banks might become interested in such financing occurred. A small number of banks became interested in financing motor vehicles for leasing companies. However, as the leasing of automobiles grew in importance and volume, it appeared that there was also a tremendous market for leasing of all other types of equipment. It is possible to lease anything from the heaviest piece of equipment to the smallest. As a matter of fact, in the daily rental area, as contrasted to the term-leasing area, dishes, tablecloths, linens, and such are made available. However, this chapter will discuss only the financing of equipment for a specified term of months or years and will not be concerned with the financing of personal property used on a daily, weekly, or month-to-month rental basis.

Banks developed interest in lease financing slowly. It was not until the latter part of the 1950s that any appreciable number of banks entered into the lease financing business as an aggressive part of development of instalment business. The banks' interest in leasing was increased as a result of the amendment of Regulation Q which made available much larger amounts of loanable funds than heretofore had been the case. Then, too, when the Comptroller of the Currency ruled, in March of 1963, that national banks could become lessors, it added another dimension to the business of lease financing.

A bank may become interested in lease financing in any one or more of several different ways. (1) A manufacturer, whether or not a customer of the bank, may request that the bank develop a plan to finance equipment which the manufacturer, as the lessor, leases to its customers. (2) The lessee, a customer of the bank, seeking to obtain a more favorable lease rate, may ask that the bank finance his lessor's purchase of the equipment. (3) A leasing company may ask the bank to develop a plan which it may use in developing its leasing business. (4) A customer of a national bank and in some states a state bank may request the bank to purchase equipment and lease it to the customer as a direct lessor transaction. The first three ways are clearly within the area of direct financing of the equipment for the use of the lessee, while (4) is in the nature of a service which makes equipment available to the lessee without the intervention of a third party as lessor. When a bank becomes the owner-lessor, it becomes subject to all the laws relating to ownership and leasing in the various states in which the property is used. Depreciation taken on the equipment, as well as the impact of tax credits given or taken, will have an important effect on the earnings of the bank. It is essential that expert advice be sought and followed by any bank desiring to direct-lease on a major scale.

TYPES OF LEASES

Maintenance or Service Leases

Inasmuch as the lease document is the basic instrument used to outline the terms, this chapter will briefly define the three basic types of leases. A maintenance lease is sometimes called a service lease and is used in all forms of leasing, although automobile leasing companies employ the maintenance lease more than do other types of equipment lessors. The lessor agrees to lease the described equipment to the lessee and, in addition, the lessor undertakes to provide certain described types of maintenance over the period of the lease. Such maintenance is determined through negotiation. In the case of automobiles, it usually requires the lessor to provide maintenance for mechanical problems, tires, battery replacements, and the like. Under this type of lease the lessee's responsibility is usually limited to paying the required rental each month for the term of the lease and providing the gasoline and oil necessary in the case of an automobile in order to keep it running and to return the equipment to the lessor at the end of the period in the lease in good condition, reasonable wear and tear excepted. Under this type of arrangement the lessor bears the responsibility for absorbing ordinary depreciation and is also subject to the fluctuations that may take place in the market value of the equipment at the time it is surrendered. Of importance to a bank is the fact that usually the amount allocated to the bank from rentals will not be of sufficient amount to retire the amount advanced. Therefore, the bank must look to the lessor for amounts outstanding at the conclusion of the lease.

Finance Leases

Another type of lease is known as a finance lease, although in various parts of the country other designations are used. Finance lease is a descriptive term for the instrument that is drawn up to make it the obligation of the lessee to pay the entire amount of the advance by the bank to the leasing company to finance this equipment. The lease then can be used as the basis for obtaining credit by the lessor because of the obligation of the lessee. Such a lease requires the lessee to make rental payments under the terms of the lease to an assignee of the lessor free from any defenses which the lessee might have against the lessor. There is also a provision comparable to a deficiency clause in a chattel mortgage or conditional sale contract. While the obligation of the lessee is not as unqualified as that of the maker of a note or mortgagor under a chattel mortgage, nevertheless, the effect is practically the same. In this type of lease the lessor assumes only the responsibility of providing the equipment for use by the lessee and for disposing of the equipment at the conclusion of the lease, subject, however, to certain taxes, such as the income tax, which are the responsibility of the lessor; other taxes are usually the responsibility of the lessee. The bank under this type of lease has the obligation of the lessee to pay the total amount it has advanced to the lessor as contrasted to the obligation of the lessee under a maintenance lease. This type of lease is responsible for the great growth of both automobile fleet leasing and equipment leasing to corporations.

Net Lease

A net lease is a variation of either the maintenance lease or the finance lease and is most often used in the motor vehicle type of finance lease. It usually establishes a term of sufficient duration to permit the retirement of the total advance made by the financing institution, although it may not always do so. The main thing is that no maintenance is required, whether or not the lease generates enough in lease payments to pay out the advance made by thhe financial institution.

GENERAL CREDIT ASPECTS

Leasing is an attractive type of financing for banks. It offers banks another means for financing the needs of its customers in the community. However, it does not in any way permit deviation from the fundamental principles of credit upon which a bank predicates its loan policies. There has been a tendency to ascribe some type of magic to leasing. There is none. It must be approached and analyzed exactly in the same way as any other type of credit. The difference is in the application of the credit, in the documentation, and in the rights of the respective parties. Documents are of considerable importance. No bank should enter into lease financing without careful consideration and the opinion of competent counsel. Mention has been made concerning the use of the finance lease particularly in obtaining credit for use in the purchase of equipment. To a considerable degree, the same is present in other types of leasing such as the maintenance lease.

The bank in approaching the problem of credit granting must analyze the credit of the lessor as well as the credit of the lessee, even though the credit of the lessee may be of sufficient proportions to support the entire amount of the credit. The fact that the credit of the lessee is sufficient relates only to the possibility of obtaining repayment of the funds advanced. In the event that there is a problem on the part of the leasing company with its creditors, or the lessor does not have sufficient know-how, or has problems with the Internal Revenue Service, the lender faces a very real danger that his rights may be precluded because the leasing company did not protect itself and in the process protect the lender. Legal counsel should be consulted on this important question. In the event that the maintenance type of lease is used, there is an even greater reason why the credit of the lessor is important. Usually, in such types of leasing, the amount recovered under the terms of the lease is not sufficient to pay off the entire amount advanced. Consequently, the lender may be in the position of looking primarily at the sale of the equipment in order to pay off the remaining balance, a position it will not like, since it is axiomatic in banks that the collateral should not be the source from which repayment is obtained. The bank does not want to be in a position of having to look primarily to the market value of the property at the end of the lease for recovery of the remaining balance. The ability of the lessor to come up with any amounts needed to repay the advance is most important to the bank. Credit of the lessee is also important, but not to the same degree as in a finance lease. It is important to both the lessor and the bank which depend upon the credit of the lessee to fulfill the payment terms of the lease. Consequently, in appraising credit, the bank must have credit passers who are skilled in analyzing the credits of both the lessor and the lessee and applying the results of that analysis to the type of lease involved.

This chapter has already discussed some of the aspects of a finance lease and its usage. It might be well to go into more detail since this instrument has become of such importance in the lease financing world. It originally was developed to enable a leasing company that had only nominal capital and could not support with its own statement the amounts needed to acquire equipment desired by the lessee; since the original need for such equipment appeared to be in the area of the larger corporations, the finance lease was an effective instrument for obtaining credit in far greater sums for the lessor than would have been the case under any other type of financing. There have been many developments in the instruments over a period of years, but basically it is still a fundamental requirement that the documents be of such nature as to, in effect, be an unqualified promise of the lessee to pay the sums required under the lease, free from any defenses against the lessor. Maturities in this type of lease range all the way from 3 to 15 or 20 years depending upon the nature of the equipment leased.

ASSESSING THE MARKET

Ordinarily the leasing company rate is determined by the credit of the lessee, to which the leasing company adds its fee for servicing its requirements under the lease. There has been a considerable decrease in the rental rates charged companies because of the fact that interest rates available to leasing companies have steadily decreased. Over the past few years lessees have succeeded in establishing rates in connection with leasing of the equipment which are based on short- and long-term borrowing rates available to the lessee. This aspect of the present rate situation should be carefully analyzed to determine whether the rate and conditions are of such nature as to adequately compensate the lender for the risk and expense. A lease instrument is not a term loan document. As a result the lessor, and the bank as assignee in particular, do not have the same control and protection. Generally speaking, such type leasing should be available only to the better credits. Originally the finance lease was used primarily for large fleets of items of equipment. However, there is a large market for lease financing for smaller items and smaller but good companies as lessees. It is possible to obtain better rates primarily on an add-on basis of $4.00 to $7.00 per $100 per annum.

Maintenance leasing appeals to lessees who do not want to have the responsibility for maintaining the equipment in good repair. Their theory is that the lessor is in a better position to provide maintenance than is the lessee. This is particularly true in the case of accounting equipment of which International Business Machines is the outstanding example. It leases its equipment through what is termed an operating lease. It agrees that in addition to making the equipment available it will also maintain it in good working order. The same principle applies to the lease of other types of equipment, particularly automotive equipment.

Leasing early became a favorite method of trucking companies for acquiring the use of equipment—for a local operation or in over-the-road operations. The maintenance leasing of automotive equipment, insofar as individuals were concerned, was used primarily by professional men who used the vehicles in their businesses and consequently felt that it was to their advantage to be able to exchange the vehicle from time to time and have it maintained in proper working order in the interim. In recent years, however, more and more individuals have turned to leasing rather than a conventional purchase.

It is important for a lender to determine whether a leasing company it finances has any great proportion in leases to individuals. The lender needs to understand that under a lease, the lessee does not have the same obligation to pay with respect to the amount advanced by the bank as that same individual would have under a conditional sales contract assigned to the bank.

We have already pointed out that the major characteristics of a maintenance lease are the requirements that the lessor provide the vehicle and provide the maintenance agreed upon in the lease. The obligation of the lessee is to make the payments in accordance with the terms of the lease and to surrender the car at the conclusion of the lease in good condition, reasonable wear and tear expected. So it may be seen that maintenance leasing is available and is used by both companies and individuals, professional and otherwise.

In the case of automotive leasing of passenger cars, the lease usually runs 24 months but, in some instances, it may be set up on a 36-month basis. Automotive equipment other than passenger cars often has a longer maturity, five years being the most common, but in some of the larger units seven years may be used as the lease term.

Ordinarily the bank advances to the lessor the cost of the equipment. Repayment quite often is calculated on the basis of a percent per month of the amount advanced during the term in which the lease is in effect. In some areas, it is 3 percent per month, in others it has been decreased to lesser amounts such as 2½ percent per month. It is recommended that in determining the repayment requirement, the bank pay considerable attention to the type of automotive equipment involved, its resale value, and the usages to which it will be put.

Rates vary in this type of leasing, quite often determined by the financial stability and position of the lessor rather than that of the lessee. Generally speaking, rates range from a 6 percent simple interest rate to add-on rates of $6.00 per $100 per annum. Needless to say, the lower rates are commanded by the better companies particularly where large numbers of vehicles are involved.

Lease financing is generated through a number of different sources. Primarily, however, lease financing is generated through the leasing companies which apply to the bank for credit to finance their leasing activities, no matter what their nature may be. On the other hand, manufacturers are often a source of leasing business since they need a leasing plan and need it financed for the purpose of gaining wider distribution of the products they manufacture. Other sources are customers of the bank who come to the bank directly and ask that a lease be arranged for equipment which that customer wishes to lease. In other words, it seems that the sources of business are about the same as we might find in any other type of equipment sale and distribution.

INSURING COLLECTION

The fact that the credit of the lessee as well as that of the lessor is most important has already been mentioned in this chapter. It might be well to repeat that there is no magic in leasing, that basic credit principles must be applied in any application for credit. The same exhaustive investigation and appraisal must be made in lease financing that is made in any other type of financing. Collection policies and practices must be tailored to the type of lease, the amount advanced, the quality of the lessee, and the obligation of the lessor.

It is suggested that the bank in setting up a collection procedure use the techniques which have been successfully applied to instalment credit collection with whatever allowances need to be made in the way of number of notices, letters, and telephone calls, as the circumstances require. It must be borne in mind that in the instance of corporations, collection procedures should be established which recognize that the problems of collecting from corporations are different than the problems of collecting from individuals.

It is imperative that auditing procedures be established in the same manner required in any instalment financing. Safeguards against double financing are in order in this type of financing as well as in other instalment financing. Verification procedures should be established through which may be determined from time to time whether the collateral that is on hand is in fact what it purports to be. It may be well to summarize this aspect by a few do's and don'ts:

1. It is essential that the bank have a complete and protective document approved by bank counsel.
2. In the case of a maintenance leasing company especially, it is essential that the company have a net worth that will support any exposure due to the bank's advance being greater than the required repayment during the period in which the lease is in effect.

3. It is also imperative that the bank ascertain the ability and experience of the lessor, whether it be in maintenance leasing or finance leasing.

4. Be sure that the lessor knows how to figure his costs and expenses and to translate them into a profitable rate.

5. Review from time to time the progress that the lessor is making in his business.

6. Review his rates and costs from time to time also.

7. Make a thorough investigation of the lessee, both financially and performancewise.

8. It is safer to require the lessee to remit the lease payments directly to the bank, thus maintaining a better control of money.

9. Know your bank's costs in order to set a profitable rate for yourself.

10. Don't permit your competitor to dictate your bank's policies whether it be in rate, terms, advances, or otherwise.

11. Don't forget that the basic obligation of a lessee is not the same as the obligation of the maker of a note or the mortgagor on a chattel mortgage.

12. Don't permit the lessor to dictate your policies; control him, don't let him control you.

13. Finally, don't succumb to the feeling that there is magic in leasing and relax your basic credit requirements.

CONCLUSION

It would appear that leasing has had its greatest period of development in the last five years. On the other hand, there is every indication that it will continue to grow and that it will continue to find acceptance among the users of equipment of all kinds. It would therefore appear that there is room in the future for more participation by banks in the field of leasing, remembering that it is merely another method of financing the needs of the people of the community in which the bank does business.

Small Loans & Corporations

SUBJECT: Committee Substitute for H.B. 643

The purpose of this bill is to improve the competitive balance between state and national banks and encourage state chartered banks to expand services to customers. The bill amends the Alaska Banking Code so as to permit state banks to make loans and offer other services not authorized at the present time.

The following are brief summaries of each section of Committee Substitute for H.B. 643:

Sec. 1. AS.06.05.005 is amended by deleting certain language as it was originally adopted from the Model Banking Code. This section is known as the "wild-card" statute and its purpose is to ensure a competitive balance between state and national banks. However, as it now stands, it is not as useful as it might be since it requires that any banking powers authorized by the Department to maintain the competitive balance must be acted upon by the legislature by the close of the next session. It is suggested that the time limit represented in "until the close of the next regular session of the legislature" be deleted. Of the six states having this type of statute, three have no time limit.

Sec. 2. At the present time, the banking code fails to define bad debts and AS.06.05.015 would be amended by including a provision that loans which have run six months beyond their due date without principal or interest payment are considered bad debts. Loans adequately secured and those in process of collection are excluded.

Sec. 3. AS.06.05.035 is amended to enable the Department to charge and collect examination fees, sufficient to cover the cost incurred in conducting the examination. In order to cover the costs of the examiner's salary, per diem, and travel, the rate was established at $125 per day, per examiner. It is not the intention of the Department to duplicate FDIC examinations, but simply participate as a member of their examination team. We will, of course, conduct our own independent examinations of the non-insured banks and finance companies. (National banks are assessed semi-annually for examinations at the rate of $100 plus $40 per million of total assets. State insured banks are not charged examination fees by FDIC since these banks already pay a fee for deposit insurance.) This section provides for a maximum annual examination fee of $3,750 or two examiners for fifteen days.

Sec. 5. A new section covering leasehold and development loans is proposed. This section would permit banks to make loans secured by first lien leaseholds and within the limits prescribed for real estate loans in Sec. 207 of the banking code. A leasehold loan is a type of real estate loan in which the borrower (lessee) is the holder, or owner of a leasehold estate, which is of sufficient quality to warrant a lender accepting it as security for a loan. In other words, the borrower holds a long term lease which together with the improvements provides security to the lender. Leasehold loans normally apply to hotels, office buildings, warehouses, service stations, apartment houses, and other similar commercial development. This method of lending is now used extensively throughout the nation and should be made available to our state chartered banks. (See attached example of typical leasehold loans). National banks are permitted to make leasehold loans and the more modern state banking codes contain such a provision.

Also, included in this section is a provision allowing banks to make land development loans. In other words, a bank may make a loan on undeveloped real property, provided the proceeds of the loan are used to provide improvements, i.e., streets, water, sewer, fill, bulkheads, pilings, etc. The loans are made subject to the provisions of Sec. 207 in the banking code applying to other real estate loans. (Loan/Deposit ratio and amortization rate). The purpose of this provision is to encourage banks to become involved in developmental lending on industrial, commercial, and housing subdivisions. (National banks are permitted to make land development loans and the more modern state banking codes contain such a provision).

Sec. 6. This section appears rather lengthy due to the rearranging of existing language of Sec. 207 for clarification. However, nothing has been deleted or added except a provision covering second mortgages. AS.06.05.207 (Real Estate Loans) would be amended to permit our banks to serve customers who have a substantial equity in real property and avoid a rewrite of the first mortgage loan. The second mortgage loans are subject to the same loan/value ratio and amortization rates as prescribed for first mortgage loans. Due to the limitations established, we believe the concept is sound and will provide our state banks with a very useful tool in serving their customers.

Sec. 7. A new section is proposed, allowing state banks to make loans secured by forest tracts. We believe this is particularly important to banks and their customers located in areas where there is a significant and economically marketable timber resource. The total aggregate dollar amount of all such loans made by a bank may not exceed 50% of the bank's combined capital, surplus and undivided profits. National banks may make forest tract loans and the more modern state banking codes contain such a provision.

Sec. 8. A new section permitting a bank to join with one or more banks in a bank service corporation is proposed. The purpose of a bank service corporation is to provide banks with a joint method of acquiring larger computer equipment, capable of more sophisticated applications. A bank service corporation normally provides automated bookkeeping and record keeping services (payroll accounting, accounts receivable accounting, inventory records and etc.) to the bank's customers and to other banks. A bank's investment in a bank service corporation is limited to 10% of its total capital and surplus and together with its total investment in banking premises, furniture and fixtures, and investment under proposed Sec. 232 may not exceed the combined capital surplus and undivided profits. In other words, it is only stockholders equity invested in the bank service corporation. The bank service corporation would be subject to examination and regulation by the Department. Bank service corporations are quite common throughout the nation.

Sec. 9. A new section is proposed which would permit banks to acquire and lease at the request of the customer, both the real and personal property. This enables the bank to offer broader services to its customers, relieving them of capital investment and providing tax advantages. The bank's investment in real and personal property under lease arrangements, combined with other investments under Sec. 230 (Banking Premises and Equipment) and proposed Sec. 231 (Bank Service Corporations), is limited to an amount not to exceed the total capital, surplus and undivided profits of the bank. (In other words, the shareholders equity). Leasing agreements would also be subject to a bank's legal lending limit to one customer (15% of total capital, surplus and undivided profits, AS.06.05.205), i.e., a customer's lease agreement with the bank would be combined with his outstanding loans in order to determine the bank's legal lending limit to that customer.

National banks may engage in leasing and the more modern state banking codes contain such a provision. National bank leasing regulations and those of many other states are not as restrictive as the statute proposed here. In order to provide some idea of the volume of leasing now handled by banks, the Comptroller of The Currency has just reported that national banks alone are handling approximately $700 million in direct leases. This section contains a special provision prohibiting state banks from engaging in this activity until a national bank in the state has actually done so.

Sec. 10. Sec. 06.05.275 is a proposed new section covering various banking practices, including issuing letters of credit, investing in trade acceptances, issuing and investing in banker's acceptances, and the sale of data processing services.

Due to the increasing involvement of Alaska in foreign trade and the frequency of large commercial transactions between banks and their customers in this state, our own state banks should have such authorized capability.

Authorizing a bank to engage in the sale of computer time and the sale of data processing services, involving its own equipment, should not be confused with the proposed bank service corporation legislation (Sec. 231). This section permits a bank to offer the same service but does not involve an investment in a separate corporate subsidiary. This is an authorized activity for national banks and is a common practice by national banks in this state and by both state and national banks in other areas.

Sec. 11. AS.06.05.345 (a) is amended to reduce the par value of the capital stock from $10 to $1. It is believed reducing the par value to $1 will allow a broader distribution of the capital stock, thus, encouraging wider ownership of Alaska financial institutions.

Sec. 12. It is proposed that AS.06.05.365 be amended to provide that applications for new bank charters be accompanied by an application fee of $1,000. This is to ensure that new charters receive adequate feasibility study and investigation. It is imperative that new applications for financial institutions receive careful attention in order to prevent weak and unqualified entries into the financial system, and to determine that the needs and convenience of the public are actually served.

Sec. 13. AS.06.05.462 would be amended in order to provide the Department with adequate information in regard to bank conversions, mergers, consolidations, as well as provide standards by which these may be approved or disapproved.

Sec. 14. AS.06.15.220 of the Alaska Mutual Savings Bank Act is amended to clarify that a savings bank may pay interest at a stated rate and issue certificates of deposit. A careful reading of the Mutual Savings Bank Act, particularly Sec. 220, subsections (a) and (b), will reveal the confusion which exists in regard to the payment of interest and the issue of certificates of deposit. The current statute places our savings banks in an awkward position resulting in a competitive disadvantage in comparison with commercial banks and S&L associations.

In lending on a leasehold, a lender normally is lending on the value of the buildings subjectto the ground rent that belongs to the lessor or fee owner. A simple case in fact would be as follows:

"A" railroad owns a parcel of land and leases it to "B" for 20 years with probably two ten-year options of renewal by "B". In turn,"B" wants to build a warehouse costing $400,000. "B" goes to his bank and requests a 75% loan, 15 years, in the amount of $300,000, and agrees to pledge his leasehold interest in the land subject to the ground lease to "A". "B" may be a user for the warehouse or he may in turn lease it to a credited tenant called "C". In either event the test of this type of loan depends on the following:

(1) The term of the ground lease to "A" from "B" must be for a longer term than that requested for the mortgage - preferably by five years.

(2) The ground lease must be firm and not cancellable except for non-payment of rent.

(3) The ground lease should be a triple net lease with lessee paying all expenses including taxes.

(4) The mortgagee should get consent in writing from the fee owner, "A" stating that in the event "B" should default on the lease, the mortgagee be given notice to cure such default prior to commencement of foreclosure.

(5) Leasehold loans normally apply to hotels, office buildings, warehouses, service stations, banks, apartment houses, and other improvements where the tenant may have a top rating such as AAA1, or the location is such that there is little doubt that the improvements will sustain an income which will support its valuation and retire the mortgage in full.

(6) In the State of California, it is quite common to make leasehold loans on residential property, however in the State of Washington it is very seldom done and of little consequence except on second home sites where the land is owned by the Indians and one may lease from them and build a house. These sites are normally waterfront tracts where the Indians are precluded from selling their land.

TYPICAL LEASEHOLD LOAN

INTRODUCTION TO LEASING

THE HISTORICAL roots of leasing go deep in time. As long as man has had machinery, he has leased it to others. But the great expansion of leasing, its coming of age as an important industry, has taken place since World War II.

When the war ended, American industry was faced with a shortage of capital and at the same time struggled with soaring market demands. In many cases it turned to leasing as a means of conserving capital while simultaneously accumulating the equipment and facilities it needed to manufacture and distribute its products.

The boom in leasing has continued to this day, and conservation of capital continues to be a motivating factor. Other factors, however, have entered the picture within the past ten years. Conservation of labor, protection against obsolescence, tax advantages, and the very human desire to conform to a popular trend, have all become important reasons for leasing.

LEASING TODAY

Whatever the reasons may be, there is no question that leasing is on the increase. It is difficult to relate the accelerating pace of this increase to any other index or barometer of business activity. In general, this increase represents progress. There are, however, cases of companies going into leasing without real reasons, without awareness of the reasons why it may not be advantageous for them. One lessor has said, "In my years of leasing I have never been able to fully understand why a company leased or didn't lease. All I know is that once they decide they are going to lease, you can't talk them out of it; and once they have decided that they are not going to lease, the soundest arguments in the world won't convince them they should."

In this state of change, leasing stands today. The industry is booming, and the service it offers can greatly benefit a lessee. It can also be an unnecessary and expensive mistake. This manual is intended to help managers, and others in a position to consider leasing, to decide which situation fits their own organization. Should the decision be made to lease, there is information here to help them get the most for their leasing dollars.

LEASING AND LABOR COSTS

The United States Departments of Commerce and Labor recently released figures on what pay hikes would mean to the average employee's paycheck by the year 1971. Recent agreements between management and labor have pushed the national pattern of wage and "fringe" benefit increases up to around 6 per cent a year. The survey shows what has happened to pay levels in major industries in the past five years, and what they would be in 1971 with a rise of 6 per cent per year. The following are the figures:

What Pay Hikes of 6 Per Cent Would Mean

	AVERAGE WAGES AND "FRINGES" (per hour)
	1961	1966	1971
Autos	$4.04	$5.33	$7.13
Steel	$4.28	$4.94	$6.61
Oil refining	$4.99	$5.93	$7.93
Machinery	$3.36	$4.01	$5.37
Transportation equipment (except autos)	$3.71	$4.37	$5.85
Electrical equipment	$3.22	$3.69	$4.94
Printing, publishing	$3.23	$3.85	$5.15
Rubber	$3.04	$3.58	$4.79
Textiles	$1.99	$2.45	$3.28
Lumber, wood products	$2.07	$2.50	$3.35
Food products	$2.74	$3.50	$4.68

NOTE: Figures are averages for all employes, including salaried workers.

Higher wage scales for employees who help manufacture the products they in turn buy, will ultimately bring about a higher cost for the products, thereby taking a significant portion of the added buying power from the higher take-home pay.

In an industry which has responded to higher labor costs by raising product prices, a strike or lay-off or other loss of wages deprives employees of purchasing power. This is obvious. It happens frequently and the economy survives. More than just one industry is affected, however, for the industry producing one product is the consumer of many other products, and that industry's workers are consumers of another vast range of products.

Such a situation, then, is not a healthy one for the economy as a whole. Nor is it healthy for the leasing industry, which has its own labor costs and is itself a consumer of the products of industry. In one respect, however, the leasing industry is unique. It is in a position to help correct one of the major weaknesses of our capitalistic system, its "inability to control spending."

ECONOMY AND LEASING

In a most provocative article in the Harvard Business Review, Prof. Ferdinand F. Mauser of Wayne University discussed the role of leasing in the stabilization of the industrial economy through its potential influence on consumer and industrial spending.

"Stabilization," Prof. Mauser wrote, "involves getting at one symptom of business cycles, namely, fluctuation in the rates at which individuals, industry and government spend money. Fluctuations in spending reflect directly on production scheduling. Production must be steady, for this is the only means of assuring steady incomes for those who produce."

Prof. Mauser went on to point out that "Elimination of fluctuations in spending requires that businessmen must increasingly apply their marketing ingenuity to secure regularly committed amounts from each individual's income. The privilege of individuals doling out their incomes at any rate of speed or schedule they please will be a luxury which will have to be curtailed (not by fiat, but by persuasion) if we are to fully reap the material benefits of an automated world."

Relating leasing to this problem, Prof. Mauser's discussion is given to the change of attitude toward ownership of goods. He wrote, "In the new world of technological affluence, the principle of ownership of material possessions by individuals is fast becoming an anachronism," and "people in a busy, rapidly moving, affluent society increasingly realize that they are not interested in things per se, but rather in their use in a convenient and worry-free manner."

"If the goals of economic stability and full employment are to be achieved," Prof. Mauser continued, "marketing must be viewed as a social force. The public in general, and business leaders in particular, must better understand the place of marketing in the new society, for it is the force which will shape economic destiny by expanding and stabilizing consumption."

The situation lessors must face is a part of the larger problem of what Prof. Mauser called the "Age of Consumption." As he pointed out, "Methods for forcing consumption must be expanded and widely accepted as a permanent part of our social convention. The tempo of continuous consumption must be accelerated. Puritanical attitudes (mothered all these centuries by scarcity) that view excessive consumption as immoral must be discarded."

Changing attitudes is the challenge for the marketing profession. As attitudes change, and as consumers of all kinds move in the direction described by Prof. Mauser, the leasing industry — if it is ready — will have an opportunity unmatched in its history.

Just two or three years ago, any predictions that the American consumer would embrace leasing as a way of life would have been regarded as wildly futuristic. That was before the "credit card rush of 1967," which demonstrated that the middle class consumer was ready for bold changes in his style of living and buying.

Another trend that laid the ground work for a lease economy was the shift from goods to services. At the end of World War II, Americans spent 40% of their income for services, 60% for goods. Just ten years later, this had shifted to 50-50, and the proportion of income spent on services continues to rise.

Americans were also ignoring the precautions of their elders, who used a pay-as-you-go waste-not-want-not, policy to survive the depressions of the '30's. Between World War II and 1967, private debt doubled, rising to 1.3 trillion dollars. Americans are now in debt for 20% of every after-tax income dollar, three times the 1947 rate.

The new generation, obviously, has no doubt about its future earning power. It wants the good things of life, and it wants them now, paid for with tomorrow's dollars.

Fully half of all Americans are now under 26 years of age. A leased economy promises tomorrow's young married couples, who have an insatiable appetite for durable goods, the use of expensive household goods without the delay of accumulating down payments.

Have you gone to the apartment of a newly married young couple? They don't start out with a wedding gift cardtable and chair set to dine on. They have a beautiful "dinette suite," plus a complete line of appliances in the kitchen. Walk into their living room and you will find comfortable furniture, plus color TV. Walk into their bedroom and you will find another TV, plus beautiful bedroom furniture.

Parked outside or in the garage that comes with one of the rented apartments is a new car. The younger generation does not want to wait and save for the finer things in life, they want them now and they get them. How can they afford them? They charge everything with easy-to-obtain credit, and pay so much a month, because they want to enjoy it while they pay for it. This is really nothing but a leasing situation.

WHAT'S SO NEW ABOUT LEASING?

In recent years, leasing has found its way into many areas of the economy. In other areas, it was there all the time, under other disguises. In addition to using leased telephones, most businessmen have used nothing but leased help all their hiring lives. Except for some high priced ballplayers, employees aren't paid five or ten years' salary on their first day on the job. Instead, employers pay for their help as it is delivered, a week or two at a time. Some even go beyond this, leasing individual blocks of employee time through a part-time help agency that leases workers and then re-leases them to employers in need of temporary extra help.

Clearly, the American consumer, like American industry before him, has been gradually discarding his love affair with property ownership. Ahead lies a new, unheard-of level of convenience, the convenience of use rather than ownership.

The groundwork for a widespread consumers' switch from ownership to leasing has been done.

Leasing has acquired "class." The future "lease generation" has watched its heroes on TV as they leased a Mercedes in Switzerland and left it in Rome, leased a Riviera villa for the season, leased a hunting lodge in the Canadian wilds, or leased a full set of tableware and furniture for a society wedding.

A boardroom full of Madison Avenue advertising executives couldn't have prepared a more effective campaign to motivate the average consumer towards the acceptance of leasing as a way of obtaining today's goods with tomorrow's money.

It can easily be predicted that in the not too far distant future there is going to be a surge in consumer leasing. For a flat lease payment of, let us say, $48 a month over a five year period, our young people will receive a refrigerator, freezer, oven, range, color TV or some other comparable assortment of appliances. Their monthly payments will also include a maintenance man stopping by at regular intervals to make sure everything is in working order. At the end of the five year lease period, a truck will back up to their door and deliver the new appliances they will have arranged for, and the old appliances will be taken away. Every five years the old goes out and the new comes in. Our young married couple might even go so far as to include carpeting in the leasing package, as well as some fine furniture.

It could be projected that a good percentage of the younger generation will take advantage of some such lease arrangement, and probably quite a few of the older generation. What will this accomplish? It will accomplish what Professor Mauser said it would. The manufacturers of these appliances will be able to determine that a definite number of ovens, ranges, TV sets, freezers and so forth will be required at a particular date in the future. They can plan better than ever for wage demands, expenses, supplies, and hopefully profits.

As mentioned earlier, conservation of working capital is the prime reason why businesses, both large and small, lease. Members of the younger generation, in effect, are conserving or spreading out their "working capital," and in this way acquire more consumer goods. These same young people will soon be entering the business world and can very easily control trends and habits in acquiring equipment to run various industries.

In a recent survey of pre-college graduates, conducted by the Bank of America, young men were asked their preference as to employment after graduation. In 1963, 76% of those responding were interested in joining a large corporation for employment. In 1967, just four years later, the percentage preferring large companies went down to 55%, with an increase of 14% in preference for self-employment and 19% for partnerships.

Large businesses face the problem of limited working capital, and often can ease their financial burden through leasing. It can be assumed that the new one and two-man business enterprises favored by these young men will also turn to leasing, for working capital limitations will be just as severe for them, if not more severe, than for their larger counterparts.

We may never see the day when every businessman and every consumer will lease. However, if each of the manufacturers who serve these peoples needs could control 30% of his future production by leasing 30% of his products, it would be of tremendous help to him in charting the future.

Every industry which produces equipment used to make a profit or provide a service for another business could benefit through leasing its products. A lathe manufacturer, for example, may lease lathes to his customers on a monthly payment basis for the useful life of the equipment. His lease merchandising program may be set up by the manufacturer through his own leasing subsidiary, or by an independent lessor. At the end of the lease period, or sooner, new lathes or more efficient models would replace the currently leased lathes. As long as his product holds up and he provides good service, the manufacturer has a measure of control over his customers and his volume, giving his industry greater stability by being better able to program future production.

AUTO LEASING

In the October 23, 1967, issue of Newsweek magazine, appeared an advertisement for Volvo automobiles. Volvo contends that their cars will last longer. This may be true, but American consumers and especially auto fleet users are never going to buy only Volvo automobiles. The ad read, "YOU DON'T BUY A NEW CAR, THE BANK BUYS A NEW CAR, BY THE TIME YOU BUY YOUR CAR BACK FROM THE BANK IT'S OLD."

How true this is in today's automobile financing market. It is estimated that about 70 per cent of all new cars are financed in one way or another. This estimate may be low. The majority of automobiles are financed over a 24 to 36-month period. By the time the last payment comes due, or before, a new car is ordered and financing starts all over again with the hope that the traded-in car will pay off the indebtedness or unpaid balance on the old car. This type of automobile financing situation is nothing but a "leasing of money" arrangement, a definite leasing situation. True leasing is actually another way of financing.

If a portion of any manufacturer's production can be controlled, it will stabilize his future production, profits, and labor demands. The manufacturer can project what his future needs and commitments will be. Leasing of his products, such as automobiles, can help to give the manufacturer this stabilizing factor. Leasing will assure spending for replacement of the products at regular intervals, which results in repeat sales.

Does the automobile industry realize this? Major auto manufacturers are now offering to leasing companies a guaranteed trade-in value on leased automobiles. This means that the lessor, or leasing company, knows exactly what the value of an automobile will be in 18 or 24 months. If he trades it in at this prearranged time the lessor will know the exact residual value of the leased car. It would be foolhardy for him to speculate or to anticipate the unknown value of a trade-in. If he doesn't trade and "buy new" he risks losses at a later date.

This arrangement between lessors and the auto industry has taken the guesswork out of one of the most difficult problems faced by the lessors. "What to do with trade-ins and what will they be worth?" This guaranteed trade-in value of leased cars helps to stabilize the automotive leasing industry, as well as the automobile manufacturing industry itself. It will help the automobile manufacturer to project and plan for the future demands of labor and to know the model, the color, and even the cost of the automobiles he must produce. The automobile leasing industry is growing at the rate of 15 to 20 percent each year, while the number of vehicles registered in the country increases 4½ percent annually. The trend in leasing speaks for itself.

INDUSTRIAL TRENDS

Some of the factors that have made leasing more attractive to industry have originated within industry itself. These include programmed maintenance, absolescence of high priced equipment, and rapid changes in technology, that immediately require entirely new kinds of equipment.

Maintenance of industrial equipment, for example, has become a highly complex science in itself. The new technology of programmed maintenance, with periodic disassembly and inspection under the watchful eye of computers, beats old fashioned "wait until it breaks" maintenance costs by 15 to 75 percent. Such maintenance programs put the user in closer touch with the maker of the equipment, making leasing more feasible for both.

Material handling accounts for some 80% of all manufacturing cost today. As one way to cut this cost, mechanized material handling now approaches the "untouched by human hands" factory of science fiction. Computerized conveyor systems, heavy pallets floating on air cushions, and giant conveyor belts in place of interplant freight trains have successfully cut rising handling costs for many hard pressed manufacturers. The manufacturer must first acquire the equipment. The solution . . . leasing.

TRANSPORTATION USES LEASING

The transportation industry has used many types of leasing to prosper and to insure future growth. Some methods have been established by long tradition in the industry, others are new, imaginative and even daring. Union Tank Car Company, traditionally a lessor of tank cars, has been using new, specially engineered cars to diversify its business and get away from its dependency on oil companies as clients. The leasing device has helped Union Tank Car put into service expensive, specialized units to haul chemicals, liquified gases, dry cargo, and such other non-petroleum products as cement. The company leases its equipment out on long contracts, averaging 5 to 15 years, that help insulate the company against fluctuations in the business cycle. The practice is successful. The rate of growth of Union Tank Car has held at a fairly steady 8½ percent per year for the last twenty years.

In a transaction fairly typical of aircraft financing today, a group of banks recently purchased six DC-8 jets from Douglas Aircraft Corporation, and leased them to a major airline. The airline was not in a position to deduct from taxes the full amount of the 7 percent investment credit on the cost of these planes. The banks were, and shared their tax savings with the airline. The airline thus paid only 2 percent for its money, while the banks made 5.2% on their invested funds.

Aircraft lessors are using a new concept in private aircraft leasing called "block time." The customer contracts to use a minimum amount of mileage each month, in effect leasing time and mileage rather than the traditional "seats of the aircraft." For a minimum mileage contract of 5,000 miles, the lessor guarantees that a jet will be standing by at any airport in the United States ready to take-off to any other part of the country six hours after a telephone request.

A 50 YEAR DREAM

As leasing becomes more widespread, it will have a positive effect on the economy so far reaching as to be almost revolutionary. Businessmen will recall the old days when people bought equipment rather than leasing it, and the resulting instability of production caused wildly swinging cycles of depression and widespread unemployment. Economist Mauser calls unemployment "the perpetual erosion which undermines the foundations of capitalism." Leasing has the potential to be a bulwark against that erosion.

AN OLD AMERICAN CUSTOM

Leasing as a method for acquiring the use of goods goes back to the days of ancient Rome, when ship owners leased their vessels for trade in the Mediterranean. Leasing of real estate was a common practice in England centuries ago. Until just a few years ago, however, leasing of equipment by individuals, or by businessmen in most industries, was a rarity.

An outstanding exception has been the telephone. From its beginnings in 1877, Bell Telephone Company wisely decided to retain ownership rather than allow the phone to become a consumer-owned appliance. As a result, the company has always enjoyed all of the benefits accruing to a leasing company which are just now being discovered by American industry as a whole-production pegged to future use, assured full employment for its workers, and control of its markets.

It is surprising that leasing has taken so long to catch on in this country, because it could actually be described as a good old American custom. As far back as the early 1900's leaders in some key industries were using leasing to gain marketing advantages which most of them still retain.

WHY BUY A BALL PARK?

A large leasing company once advertised "you don't have to own the ball park to enjoy the game." This principle of "use without ownership" enables manufacturers to enjoy the benefits of the latest, most sophisticated eqiupment now, when it is needed, instead of waiting until they can afford to "buy the ball park."

It is ironic that today's typical businessman will take an arm's length look at equipment leasing, and many times not even consider it. This same businessman will lease an office, factory or warehouse. It is ironic because the equipment he buys to earn his profits will depreciate or become obsolete, yet the building that houses the purchased equipment will maintain or increase its value. It might be wise for this businessman to lease his equipment and own the building. The building is probably the better investment. Yet one out of every two businessmen buys equipment and leases buildings. Both equipment and building must be paid for somehow; why not own something that will retain its value, and lease something that won't.

BANKS JUMP IN THE WATER

Held back by rulings that kept them out of the leasing business until early 1963, national banks are now allowed to form their own leasing departments. On March 18, 1963, the Comptroller of Currency issued a directive that allowed national banks to lease equipment to customers under some conditions.

By October, 1965, direct lease financing by some of the larger national banks that had formed their own leasing companies had reached a volume of 235 million dollars. California banks, especially the Pioneering Bank of America, contributed 44 percent of this volume.

The primary reason banks enter the leasing business is profit. As banks have watched the decline in their net return per dollar of assets, leasing provided the service they could offer customers which might counteract this trend. The actual rate of return for the bank will be about the same as on regular equipment financing, but there is additional income recovered from the residual value of the leased equipment or from renewal options. Residual values can easily double the rate of return. Additional economic benefits may be realized through accelerated depreciation of the equipment, and through the investment credit if it is retained by the bank and not passed on to the lessee.

Another reason banks enter the leasing business is so that they may provide an additional service for customers. Leasing is one more way to finance equipment acquisition, and a bank feels that financing such acquisition is a service that should be kept under its own roof.

A third reason is that leasing does not count as a part of the banks legal lending limit. Most large banks have adequate limits, but for smaller banks, this fact may be an advantage in attempting to meet the needs of desirable customers.

Banks slowly entered the field of equipment financing, by means of conditional sales contracts, in the 1930's. When they became aware of profits earned by independent finance companies, banks entered this field and it is now one of their more profitable services.

MUNICIPAL LEASING

The days of pay-as-you-go are largely gone in City Hall, and many other public bodies have found themselves in the same situation. Many municipalities, indebted to their limit in long term obligations, are faced with pressing needs for more and better public facilities and equipment.

Some school boards, pioneering in a field where leasing has been slow to gain ground, have found they can get more for their money by leasing needed equipment. The needed equipment may vary from projectors, closed circuit television, food preparation appliances, and wood or metal-working machines, to typewriters or any other item necessary to carry on the daily activities of educating and serving their students. Schools find that when buying school buses, for example, they cannot purchase technical skill and help along with the equipment. If they lease the same buses, on the other hand, the lease contract covers the most highly professional maintenance available.

The lessor provides this service, which includes first-rate mechanics and maintenance facilities. Another factor is the cost that must be charged to administrative time. How much does it cost to own and administer a bus fleet? Does it involve one employee, or two, or three? At today's salary ranges, that can be $7,000, $14,000, or as much as $21,000 tied up in managing equipment, not education. This is a "cost of ownership" that may not appear on anyone's budget, but is nevertheless real.

CONCLUSION

This manual covers only a few cases, selected to show the many opportunities leasing offers to business, industry and anyone who uses equipment of any kind to render a service or produce a profit. The reasons for leasing, as one solution to equipment financing problems, are almost as numerous as the areas in which leasing is at work today solving these problems. Whatever phase of leasing the reader wishes to explore, he'll be able to chart a prudent and profitable course by following the basic principles outlined in this manual.

Equipment Leasing

Monroe R. Lazere

NATURE OF EQUIPMENT LEASING

Leasing is one of the oldest of legal relationships. Historically, it involved an arrangement in which an owner permitted another the right to use his property for a period of time pursuant to stipulated conditions. Familiarly, in real estate transactions it involves the granting of a right to use the realty for a period of months or years. Obviously such leases are for a substantially shorter term than the usable life of reality. However, in the case of ninety-nine year leases (or substantially equivalent terms) the realty becomes an integral part of the enterprise's operation. This discussion is limited to personal property and, even more specifically, to income-producing equipment for a business enterprise. Patently, such income-producing equipment has a usable life considerably less than that of realty. Obsolescence, depreciation, and ordinary wear and tear combine to reduce the usable life of the average piece of equipment to a limited number of years.

Indeed, this very fundamental fact gives rise to many of the unresolved problems concerning equipment leasing. The relationship between the usable life of the equipment, the dollar cost thereof, and the terms of the lease has been the major source of the debate on the legal and accounting treatment of leasing transactions.

The equipment leasing device really blossomed after World War II. In the 1950's it was in its infancy. In the 1960's the estimated annual volume of transactions was $600 million, and for the 1970's an annual volume of $7 billion appears to be a reasonable expectation

Terminology

The newness of the concept of equipment leasing has also contributed a multiplicity of overlapping terms. At the extreme ends of the leasing spectrum the terminology is clear. A business enterprise may lease trucks for the movement of its merchandise over a period of several weeks. This short-term use of relatively long-lived equipment is clearly a "pure" lease, or "true" lease, or "operating" lease. In common parlance it is frequently called a "rental." At the other end of the spectrum is the situation in which a piece of equipment with a usable life of perhaps ten years is leased by a business enterprise for five years at a rental that enables the lessor to recover the cost of the equipment plus his compensation for the use of the funds over that period. At the end of the lease period, the lessee has the option of purchasing the equipment for one dollar. Under such an arrangement, the lessee has effectively acquired the use and title to the equipment over a period of time. Such a lease appears to differ only in form and not in substance from a purchase under a purchase money security agreement (or, before the advent of the Uniform Commercial Code, a conditional sales contract). Such a lease has been described as a "finance" or "financial" lease. Between the extremes of the spectrum, of course, lies a large twilight area of transactions with many variables.

LEASES VS. INSTALLMENT PURCHASES

Understandably, the novelty of the device of equipment leasing has resulted in differences of opinion among financers regarding its proper function. To analyze leasing effectively one must recognize what it can and cannot do. Purchase money security agreements (in non-Code states, conditional sales contracts) are another means of acquiring equipment (as well as the use of the equipment) without an immediate full outlay of cash.

Several arguments favoring leasing over installment purchases appear in the literature. Since many of them almost fall of their own weight, their enumeration need not long detain us. Examples are: the formalities of leasing are less cumbersome, and leasing companies make decisions more rapidly than other lenders. The argument was also made that lessors know the equipment better than other lenders. While this last proposition may be accurate with respect to lessors specializing in particular equipment (e.g., automobiles or computers), it surely does not apply to a leasing company handling a fuller range of equipment. Surely such a lessor would be no more familiar with the equipment than would a similarly broad-gauged installment sales financer.

Obsolete Arguments for Leasing

Other arguments favoring leasing over installment sales financing were originally valid. The validity was lost, however, as the device became more familiar. In this category of arguments was one urging that in government cost-plus contracts the entire rental would be taken as "costs" even though the equipment would be retained by the contractor by exercising a nominal option at the end of the term. Government contracting officers have now eliminated this possibility. Also, it was urged that leasing could be utilized to avoid restrictions in departmental capital budgeting. Now such budgeting usually includes restrictions on finance leases as well. And finally, leasing was urged as a method of avoiding restrictions regarding capital expenditures found in long-term debt agreements. Such agreements are now usually broadened to apply the restrictions to finance leases.

Thus some early supporting arguments have been seriously diluted, even eliminated. Newer and perhaps more persuasive justifications have developed. It may therefore be appropriate to discuss some of the more serious theoretical arguments in close relationship to their chronological development. In such a chronology, 1962 represents a key year, for then the investment tax credit provisions became law. Thenceforth the theoretical and practical justifications for leasing underwent a profound change.

Size of Down Payment

In the 1950's, however, leasing salesmen offered leasing as virtually a panacea for the company short of operating cash. They urged that the required down payment was less than in installment purchasing. Initially, this was true. The usual lessor required prepayment of one month's rental for each year of the lease term or 8½% of the total dollars involved. Under the pressure of such competition, however, the financers of equipment installment sales generally reduced their requirements from 25% to 10% of the purchase price. Hence the differential on this score became less dramatic.

Size of Monthly Payments

Further, the lower monthly payments promised by the leasing salesmen seemed illusory. Where, as was usually the case, the lessor acquired the equipment for a particular lessee, he would obviously anticipate the full recovery of the cost of the equipment plus compensation for the use of funds during the lease period. Hence the lessee's option to purchase the equipment at the end of the lease period was usually nominal because the investment then remaining in the equipment was insubstantial. After 1962, as will later appear, it became economically feasible for the lessor to schedule monthly payments that would leave a more substantial investment in the residual portion at the end of the lease term.

Tax Deductions

Another argument pressed by proponents of leasing was that the lease payments were deductible as an operating expense, thereby effecting a considerable tax savings for the lessee. It must be noted, however, that a purchaser of equipment may take depreciation and interest as tax deductible expense. Studies of comparative tables of parallel transactions (utilizing the same depreciation formula, cost of equipment, and interest charge) have been made. The conclusions thus reached clearly indicate that leasing does not increase or decrease the total tax savings. Leasing, however, does enable the lessee to distribute his tax savings more evenly over the term of the lease. The installment purchaser has higher tax savings earlier in the purchase period and lower in the later period. Further, as the lease term or purchase period increases, the annual differential on tax savings seems to become less.

Creditworthiness of Lessee

A fourth argument utilized by the advocates of leasing was that leasing obligations were not required to be reflected on the lessee's balance sheet as debt. Hence leasing equipment (as opposed to purchasing it) would not affect existing credit lines with lenders and suppliers. Such lines are, of course, predicated in part upon the amount of debt incurred by the debtor. To the prospective user or lessee, this argument had great appeal. This is explored further on page 244. While the no-debt argument was advanced by the sales department, the credit department of the financer was usually more circumspect. In practice, no financer considered advancing the cost of a specified piece of equipment for the lessee without being reasonably certain of the capacity of that lessee to repay the advance. Or, in the alternative, the financer had to feel that the equipment itself had sufficient liquidation value so that in the event of lessee's default, the lessor could recapture his investment through a sale of the equipment.

Since the lessor expects to be repaid—as does the financer under an installment sales contract—the credit standards should be the same for both devices. This obviously contradicts the popular notion that an applicant who is too weak financially to qualify for installment sales financing can solve the problem by seeking a lease. Patently, if a prospect does not qualify for purchase money security interest financing with, for example, a 10% down payment, there is nothing in a lease that improves his credit. Conversely, if the credit factors warrant approval for lease financing, they would also qualify for installment sales contract financing. In short, in this context, leasing must be deemed just another form of equipment financing and the same credit standards should be applied. All facts about a company's financial condition should be examined—its operations and its ability to meet its obligations, including its lease obligations.

"TRUE" LEASE VS. DEBT

Effect of Filing

It has also been argued that additional recognition of a lease as debt is found in the filing by lessors of financing statements under the Uniform Commercial Code or the recording of the lease with the proper agency in non-Code states. The method of perfecting security interests in equipment is described in Chapter 7. That discussion is equally applicable to leases. Such filings make leasing transactions matters of public knowledge. By this action the lessor, it has been urged, puts future creditors on notice that such leases are debts. Hence the argument that a lease is not fixed debt became considerably weaker. Certainly this conclusion would be valid in a "finance" lease, and the filing would therefore be a vital protection to the lessor.

It should be stated, however, that some lessors argue that such filing merely constitutes an inexpensive safety play, for actually it does provide a simple notice of the lessor's interest. Indeed it is

"TRUE" LEASE VS. DEBT

Effect of Filing

It has also been argued that additional recognition of a lease as debt is found in the filing by lessors of financing statements under the Uniform Commercial Code or the recording of the lease with the proper agency in non-Code states. The method of perfecting security interests in equipment is described in Chapter 7. That discussion is equally applicable to leases. Such filings make leasing transactions matters of public knowledge. By this action the lessor, it has been urged, puts future creditors on notice that such leases are debts. Hence the argument that a lease is not fixed debt became considerably weaker. Certainly this conclusion would be valid in a "finance" lease, and the filing would therefore be a vital protection to the lessor.

It should be stated, however, that some lessors argue that such filing merely constitutes an inexpensive safety play, for actually it does provide a simple notice of the lessor's interest. Indeed it is a safer method than relying upon an identification plaque that can be removed from the equipment. It can therefore reduce some potential identification disputes with trustees in bankruptcy, receivers, etc. Conceivably, therefore, the lessor of a "true" lease with limited non-cancelable payments and large reversionary interest might also wish to file a financing statement. Such filing would also protect his security interest in the event that a referee in bankruptcy subsequently were to hold his agreement to constitute an installment sales contract. A filing without prejudice (i.e., with appropriate language describing the transaction as a "true" lease) would then constitute an insurance policy with nominal premium. Hence the filing per se of a financing statement does not resolve the problems of whether the lease obligations are debt and to what extent.

Legal Criteria

The legal criteria for classifying a lease run as follows: A true lease exists if the lessor's reversionary interest has a substantial economic value. On the other hand, if the exercise of a nominal monetary option enables the lessee to take title at the end of the lease term, then the lease may be considered a finance lease or quasi-purchase. Here the lessee would find it economically unsound to forego his option. In such case, the lessee has, during the lease term, virtually paid for the equipment plus the use of the funds employed in financing it.

The standards paraphrased above were set forth in many pre-Code statutes. In essence, they also represent the intent of Section 1-201(37) of the Uniform Commercial Code defining a "lease intended for security."

Obviously the determination of the facts and the development of conclusions making such standards operative will vary in each case. The relative novelty of the leasing format sometimes makes prediction of a court decision in a particular case uncertain. Because of a dearth of established authority, the decision may frequently turn on the predilections of the particular judge or referee and/or the matrix of circumstances from which the case arises. For example, if a large piece of leased equipment (with no financing statement filed therefor) lends an aura of affluence to the bankrupt, a persuasive creditor's attorney may convince the referee that the transaction is a purchase. Then the absence of a financing statement might throw the equipment into the general creditors' pot. This problem points up the advisability of filing a properly worded financing statement (without prejudice) covering a true lease. Lessee resistance to such a filing may develop because the possible balance sheet advantage (no debt) may then be lost.

Accounting Treatment

The problem of whether leasing obligations should be treated on the balance sheet of the lessee as fixed debt has been examined by the accounting profession.

A.I.C.P.A. Criteria. In 1964 an opinion of the Accounting Principles Board of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants set forth guidelines for the reporting of leases in the financial statements of lessees. In doing so it made no "distinctions between leases of real property and leases of personal property." It is not clear why such distinctions were not made. It is submitted that such distinctions can be made and probably would be very useful. In any event, Opinion No. 5 recommends that where a lease arrangement is in effect a purchase, then the accounting treatment should indicate the asset and liability involved. The Opinion is expressly applicable only to non-cancelable leases (or leases cancelable upon a remote contingency) and sets forth some criteria to determine whether the lease is actually a purchase. Any one of the following criteria would indicate that a lease is a purchase:

1. The property was especially acquired by the lessor for the lessee and is probably usable only by the lessee.
2. The lease term corresponds to the probable usable life of the property; and the lessee is obligated to pay costs such as taxes, insurance, and maintenance.
3. The lessee has guaranteed the lessor's obligations with respect to the property.
4. The lessee has treated the lease as a purchase for tax purposes.

The Opinion attempts to standardize the accounting treatment and apparently seeks to set more stringent standards than formerly prevailing. It is submitted, however, that many routine leasing transactions would fall outside the criteria established. For example, a lessor purchases a lathe having a ten-year life for a particular lessee and leases it to him for five years with a nominal purchase option at the end of the lease term. Although the property was purchased for the lessee it is usable by not only the lessee but others as well. The lease term does not correspond to the usable life of the property. The lessee has not guaranteed the lessor's obligations, nor has the lessee treated the lease as a purchase for tax purposes. Nevertheless, here the initial term is "materially" less than the useful life of the equipment. Hence, under paragraph 10 of the Opinion it should be reported as a purchase. However, if the useful life were six years and the initial term five years, a grey area obviously would develop. Further, if the total lease payments are small in relation to the lessee's net worth, accountants reasonably might differ on the proper treatment. Some accountants would feel justified in not reflecting such lease obligations on the liability side of the balance sheet.

Adequate Disclosure. To the layman some distortion of the lessee's financial position seems to result. Indeed, such a possible buildup of equipment leases, unreflected on the balance sheet, presently constitutes a major attraction for leasing deals. Where, however, the lease obligations appear to the lessee's accountant to be material (in relation to net worth, for example) he may feel compelled to footnote them. Assume now that the lessee's accountant feels compelled to report in the footnotes of the balance sheet the type of lease above described. It seems highly unlikely that the average reader of the statement would be able to absorb the full import of such information. It has seriously been questioned, therefore, whether footnoted information of this nature is properly presented, for such presentation resembles the raw materials of a financial statement, rather than a finished product. It is in this twilight area that a very real and significant, albeit intangible, advantage exists for leasing deals.

"Hell-or-High-Water" Clauses. It should be noted that most leasing agreements contain what have become popularly known as "hell-or-high-water" clauses. As indicated by the colorful description, these clauses require the lessees to make the agreed payments to the lessor notwithstanding operational difficulties encountered in the equipment. It therefore frees the lessor of any warranties relating to the equipment, for the lessee must make payments come "hell or high water." Such a lease seems to resemble very closely the installment sale contract in which the lender's security interest is free of the manufacturer's warranties. Nevertheless, as above indicated, the lease obligations may not necessarily appear as balance-sheet debt.

Lessee's Equity in Equipment. Another difficulty arises in the accounting treatment which revolves around the condition that lease obligations may be reflected as a liability, provided the lessee is developing an "equity" of some kind. Apparently this need not necessarily be an ownership equity. Presumably it can be a "use" equity. Understandably, accountants are reluctant to assign a value to this "equity" because such evaluation falls into the realm of economics rather than accounting. It may be asked why the total amount of the firm commitments for lease payments could not be capitalized as a "use equity." Here, the use of the cost figure appears reasonable. Whatever the merits of this issue may be, the net result of the present treatment is an absence of a reportable asset and corresponding liability. Consider the case of a ten-year, non-cancelable lease on equipment having a ten-year life. There are no options at the end of the lease term. Assume that it otherwise falls within the conditions of Opinion 5 described above. No equity seems to be accruing to the lessee, and therefore an accountant would feel justified in omitting the reporting of the lease liabilities. On the other hand, the same equipment on a ten-year installment sales contract would result in balance-sheet debt for the purchaser. The reason for the difference in treatment seems tenuous, but the lessee apparently gains an advantage over the purchaser. This advantage, however, could mislead the lessee's creditors. It could also encourage the lessee to over-extend himself.

BANK LESSORS AND THE INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

The year 1962 was pivotal for equipment leasing. In that year a ruling of the Comptroller of the Currency authorized national banks to purchase and lease capital assets. This, of course, encouraged national banks to enter the field and will probably also exert pressure on state banking authorities to grant similar powers to state banks. (This became an actuality for New York State in 1966.) The year 1962 brought another fundamental change to the leasing field. This was the amendment of the Internal Revenue Code to provide for the 7% investment tax credit. The tax credit could be taken by the lessor or passed on to the lessee. The accelerated depreciation (set forth in the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) could not be passed through to the lessee. The maximum of 7% (which constitutes an abatement of final tax otherwise computed) is available where the equipment has a usable life of eight years or more. It drops to 4.66% for an asset with a usable life of at least six but less than eight years and to 2.33% for an asset with a usable life of at least four but less than six years. These provisions were designed to encourage capital investment and thus stimulate the economy which was felt to be growing insufficiently at the time. The administration's desired result was soon realized, and the impact of the provisions was dramatic. Commitments for the acquisition of capital equipment burgeoned substantially. Leasing and other devices for financing these orders all blossomed.

Low-Profit, High-Investment Industries

For the equipment leasing field, two major new concepts resulted. The first centered around industries that were not particularly profitable and therefore could not take direct tax advantage of the investment tax credit and accelerated depreciation features. Among such industries were railroads, trucking operations, and some airlines. Lessors could utilize the new tax credit and the accelerated depreciation features of the old law and then pass on the saving to the lessees in the form of interest rates, reflected in very low down-payment requirements and low leasing payments. In this area leasing held a unique advantage as compared with other financing techniques. Since the equipment involved jet aircraft, railroad cars, trucks, etc., with large dollar value per unit, the total dollar volume of such transactions mounted rapidly and substantially. Since the leasing company effects substantial tax savings by these two tax devices, it can ease the burden on the lessee and still profit handsomely on its investment.

Non-payout Lease

Another leasing development fostered by the dual tax advantages was the non-payout lease. This form of lease provides for a firm commitment by the lessee for a total amount which will not recover for the lessor the full cost of the equipment. Options to renew the lease or purchase at the then fair market value may then be available to the lessee. This method of leasing covers very select types of equipment such as jet aircraft and computers where manufacturer support is available to the lessor. This support may consist of the manufacturer's guarantee to cover any loss on the final disposition of the equipment up to an agreed percentage of original cost. The lessor's ability to utilize the accelerated depreciation for its tax purposes is here clearly established by the very non-payout structure of the arrangement. In setting up its deal, the lessor relies upon expert opinion regarding the future value of the equipment at key points of time.

Large leasing companies engaged in this activity are optimistic regarding the future outcome of their arrangements. Predictably, the non-payout lease will flourish in the fields dealing with equipment that has developed or can very probably develop markets for second- and third-hand units. Such equipment would have some determinable market value for many years. The automobile is such an item of equipment, and the non-payout lease (including maintenance) developed early in that field, even before the advent of the investment tax credit. (It also flourished in the consumer area.) It seems quite likely that a parallel development is in the offing with respect to jet aircraft and computers. The anticipated wide demand for such equipment apparently has and will continue to create subsidiary markets for second- and third-hand units, thus assuring the lessor of their saleability. These markets eliminate the lessor's need for the above described manufacturers' support.

Effect of Government Regulation of Economy

Current economic thought includes the regulation of the economy by monetary, fiscal, and tax policies of the Federal government. As indicated above, this theory gave rise to the legislation regarding the investment tax credit and the earlier accelerated depreciation provisions in order to stimulate an economy then considered sluggish. Conversely, when a rapidly expanding economy exhibits inflationary tendencies, these regulators may be reversed. The economic valves that were opened may then in effect be closed. Such a possibility could readily result in a repeal or suspension of the favorable tax provisions, and in such event, some of the above described competitive advantages may be lost permanently or temporarily. The temporary suspension of the investment tax credit during the latter months of 1966 and early 1967 is a case in point.

The survival of one by-product of the investment tax credit seems assured. By and large, as discussed above, the non-payout lease technique probably will continue to be a viable device.

THE EQUIPMENT LEASE TRANSACTION

Let us follow through the practical application of a financial leasing transaction. XYZ Corporation is interested in a certain piece of equipment, perhaps a large piece of plastics machinery. The prospective lessee contacts a financer, giving it the specifications of the equipment, the vendor, the cost, and the length of time for which he wishes to lease it initially (see Fig. 11-1). In short, a commitment to lease is required from the prospective lessee before a commitment to purchase can be given by the prospective lessor. The prospect's purchase order is transposed to the leasing company's form of purchase order (see Fig. 11–4, page 260) and submitted to the particular manufacturer with instruction to bill the leasing company and ship to the lessee. Upon completion, the manufacturer ships the equipment.

Acceptance of Delivery

Upon receipt and installation satisfactory to him, the lessee notifies the lessor thereof via a delivery acceptance form (see Fig. 11-2). The lessor-financer then pays the manufacturer, puts the lease on its books, and proceeds to bill the lessee on a monthly or other pre-determined basis.

Expiration of Lease

At the end of the lease period, the lessee may elect to buy the equipment from the financer for a pre-determined percentage of the agreed cost or re-rent for an additional period at some other percentage. These percentages will vary, but they will usually be tailored to the desires of the lessee. He will normally have paid during the term of the lease the cost of the equipment purchased on his behalf plus the desired return on the lessor's investment. Hence, the usual lessor does not consider the options part of the necessary return on its investment. This can be left open in the initial stages of the transaction.

In sum, therefore, equipment leasing has several facets. Financers and leasing companies make the techniques available. As is so frequently true in other matters, a decision based on full consideration of related facts and problems constitutes the soundest and most successful course.

outlining the potential of service expansion to broadly define the bank's customers. A definition of markets might be as follows:

1. The general public—consumers. The "retail" market.
2. The business community.
3. The banking community.
4. Government, quasi-public, social, and institutional agencies.

While such a grouping may be a helpful beginning, it does not, by itself, supply us with ready knowledge of the present and changing needs of each group. It is only in terms of such knowledge that services are born. It is as true of rainy day umbrellas in bank lobbies as it is of computerized accounting services for small business.

THE USES OF DIVERSITY IN BANK SERVICES

Charting Changes and Establishing Marketing Programs for Them

In a rapidly moving society, the commercial banker must be a student of change. He must learn how and why needs change. He must understand the underlying social changes and the changing technologies as they relate to the demands for banking service. This kind of knowledge is perhaps banking's greatest challenge. In terms of the magnitude of many of our markets, it is no longer possible to simply guess at or generate a "feel" of things. New services are expensive to establish and promote. Industry has long ago proven that the risk of unprofitable products can be minimized by formal marketing approaches and techniques.

Commercial banks are more and more finding that the shortest route to this knowledge is the establishment of formal marketing programs, staffed where possible with professional personnel. Where this is not feasible, the bank may still establish such a program using outside professional services to refine specific services, define markets, and pretest market acceptance and pricing.

But establishing such a marketing program in the hands of an executive committee is no guarantee of success unless the bank executives themselves stand ready to translate such knowledge into programs and services. Too many banks in the past set up public relations departments because they didn't want to be "the only one on their block" without one. The main problem in marketing, as an American Bankers Association-sponsored study showed, is the failure of both management and department heads to understand and use it effectively.

The reason why banks should formalize their marketing programs is the same reason why the discount committee meets according to a regular schedule. It serves to commit the bank to a recognition of the place of such knowledge in its role as a service center as well as to regularly focus administrative attention on this area. innovator, or imitator (and even the best will be all three), the important point is to insure that good intentions are not mere paving blocks to inaction.

A good way to start, for instance, is to appoint at least two officers—or an officer and a senior employee—to develop a marketing approach. A schedule should be drawn to provide a definite length of time each week with a specific subject to be discussed and acted upon. As a beginning, a list should be drawn of all financial services offered in the area by all types of financial institutions. This would include automobile financing companies, for instance. While such an approach may sound elemental, it will go a long way to determining just how full a line of services the bank offers.

It will also serve to formalize the bank's own fledgling marketing move and direct attention to what services and rates the bank can offer. To the extent that other institutions are successfully offering financial services the bank itself might offer, this can lead to healthy questions regarding bank policy and operations. While the development of new services may sound exciting, the expansion, modification, and refinement of old ones should not be forgotten. In many cases, new services are only sophisticated extensions of old services.

THE CONSUMER PUBLIC

While primary market attention for most businesses is on the consuming aspect of individuals, commercial banks' interest is twofold: the general public is both a consumer of services and a saver. The broad rise in incomes following World War II has been followed by steady growth in savings of individuals. Indeed, it may well be that the effects of the past three recessions have been increasingly milder because of the cushion of savings which enables individuals to maintain spending levels even in the face of short-term unemployment.

This, in turn, has meant increased effectiveness in control of the business cycle through monetary and fiscal measures. If this assumption is borne out in the future, it will result in a still broader rise in income throughout the population as well as a rise in per capita income itself. As this happens and more reliance is placed on insurance and pension plans to safeguard against the circumstance of sickness, disability, unemployment, and old age, savings may not increase markedly from the present ratio of 8 percent of disposable income. In addition, discretionary income—that left over after cost of food, clothing, and shelter—may continue its long-term trend of rising faster than living expenses.

Based on a 1950 standard of living concept, discretionary income by 1975 may double what it was in 1964, rising from $234 billion to $462 billion. Living costs based on an increased population of 231 million will probably rise by only a fifth.

Discretionary income has been outpacing consumer credit in recent years and by all indications will be able to sustain an even greater expansion of consumer debt which reached $76.5 billion at the end of 1964.

Saving, spending, and borrowing—these are the aspects of the market. New savings will come from the heavy waves of new savers in the population, to a lesser extent from the increased dollar savings of existing savers as their incomes rise. The place of a school savings program becomes clearer seen in this light. It is one of the best investments any bank can make in its own future.

A growing population will be spending more, but individuals may not always be spending it on goods. The swing to buying services and leisure time pursuits has been noticeable. Consumer credit will expand, but what the character of the expansion will be, its magnitude, and what income levels it will touch are not entirely clear.

Identifying the Saver-Spender-Borrower

Too often the banker has seen the general public as a separate borrower, or saver, or spender. This would rarely be the case with commercial accounts whose borrowing makes them depositors as well. Even where recognition has been made of the frequent identification of saver and borrower as the same person, service promotion has too often taken the line of impersonal appeal of generalized statement-stuffers rather than concrete programs incorporating this identification.

It is often easy to overlook this simple fact while searching for new markets for services. There are literally thousands of dollars of profits to be mined from within the bank itself, if only the effort is made to reach the bank's own customers. After all, what better place to start to sell than with those who are already buying one or more services?

One doesn't need a computer to solicit checking account customers for automatic savings plans or savings certificates. No involved marketing study is needed to go after the bank's larger depositors to sell trust services. And if we expect our business borrowers to maintain a compensating balance with us, would it be totally unrewarding to suggest to smaller borrowers while they are at the bank that they might open a modest savings account with part of the proceeds? Some recent loan-savings plans are already a step in this direction.

One of the benefits of machine accounting systems is that they will enable bankers to analyze their own operations and customers more easily and discover the different aspects and needs of the same customer at different times. There is nothing mysterious in this. The rural banker who anticipates heavy spring borrowing from his agricultural customers is only utilizing marketing knowledge learned from experience.

The big difference from that simple example and what banks now face is the difficulty of acquiring that knowledge due to increase in numbers of bank users and the proliferation of services. That difficulty is now past us. From large city bank to small rural bank it can be quickly overcome with the use of sampling techniques and computer equipment, whether the bank's own, or nearby service center, or its correspondent.

New Services Offer Insight into Consumer Needs

A glance at some of the new services that have been offered by banks in recent years can give us some insight into the divergent needs of bank customers. A partial list would include:

Open end mortgages. Utilizing a single credit instrument to finance home improvements, education, medical bills, and even autos.
Limited credit line plans. So-called instant credit.
Condominium loans.
College tuition loans.
Merchant charge plans.
Marine, aircraft, and mobile home financing.
Small business term loans.
Common investment funds for pensions of self-employed persons.
Loan-savings plans.
Savings incentive programs. Split rate plans, savings certificates bearing differing rate of interest for long-term savings.

The use of the open end mortgage is a good example of combining long- and short-term needs of a borrower into a single credit instrument. The rise in home ownership following World War II has created a broad market for such an instrument. But the mobility of the population, the turnover of homes, and the need for a national mortgage market which may not be able to cope with the ability of the local borrower to repay his short-term credit needs indicate that the open end mortgage may only be a stepping-stone to what is a sketch of the future.

If the trends indicated by the 1960 Census of Population are any guide, over 30 percent of the banks' 1960 local and regional markets will have moved away by 1970. Perhaps 55 to 60 percent will have changed their residences. The limitation of a credit instrument tied to residence is clearly seen. Of more importance is the credit worthiness of the individual himself based on his experience.

Such an approach suggests that an automated credit exchange linked with others in a national network might be in a more advantageous position to handle consumer credit than an individual bank. Such a network, through a single credit card, for instance, could handle the transactions of department stores, merchants, gas stations, restaurants, auto dealers, and utilities.

The equipment for such centers is already here, and the feasibility of such a system can be demonstrated. New telephonic equipment, voice identification, memory units and on-line accounting equipment will require only supervisory personnel.

The question will not be whether such a system will evolve. Some such system will certainly evolve. It is already being suggested. The question is whether banks will operate it or whether they will be simply supplying funds to others.

Commercial banks now have a lead. According to Dr. Martin Greenberger of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology: "They already enjoy a confidential relationship with their customers. They have a good understanding of American industry and finance. They are knowledgeable in international affairs. They are accustomed to processing a large volume of information. And they are familiar with the ways of networks, through branch and correspondent banking and membership in the Federal Reserve System."

Such a system need no more eliminate competition or erase the identification of existing institutions than credit bureaus and clearing houses now operated by a group of banks

As a matter of fact, by reducing the time of bank personnel in record keeping, credit processing, and accounting, and expanding their own knowledge of credit and customer activities, it will place them in a better position to assume the role of financial advisor as well as to devise new means to meet changing needs and social conditions.

Widening the commercial banks' service role will also call for projecting a new image of banking through education of the public and business. Insurance companies, for example, have long since discovered this. They do not sell insurance. They offer themselves as financial counselors. They have devised a multitude of insurance plans so that a combination of them may fit the needs of individual families with varying circumstances. The image the insurance companies have succeeded in creating is that of guardian of the family hearth and security. The insurance agent is more and more achieving a role somewhere midway between the lawyer and family doctor.

Yet, banks have the broadest means of devising appropriate financial programs and the instruments needed to carry them out. They are in the best of all positions to offer valuable and neutral advice. Commercial banks will in the future have to learn to sell more than specific services. Oil companies not only sell gasoline. They sell car care, and courtesy, and weave an air of expertise about the station attendant designed to inspire faith on the part of the motorist.

Electronic data processing will make it possible for the bank to assemble profiles of its customers and to achieve greater selectivity in selling specific services. Banks will be able to select officers of corporations who do not have personal accounts with banks, or accounts of a certain level of dollar balances who may be prospects for the trust department.

Mass and Class

One need in the expansion of commercial bank services is a shifting from the mass market approach too frequently used, the one service for everybody concept. Consumer goods manufacturers long ago learned that markets are actually "fractured," composed of groups or segments of the public differing in their demands and needs by geography, incomes, and social backgrounds.

Retail distributors recognize this when they distribute their products according to line and price in those markets where the products are designed to appeal. To cite an obvious example, a distributor of Italian food products would not spend equal amounts of selling time in Italian and Chinese neighborhoods.

While this has been generally recognized in dealing with commercial and industrial customers and prospects, as well as in the trust department, the same techniques can be used in dealing with the general public, particularly in urban areas where most of the commercial banking business is concentrated. The following is only one example.

The Prestige Market

The general rise in income levels has resulted in an enormous increase in the upper group of the income range. By 1963, Sales Management magazine estimated that over 10 million households in the United States had incomes of $10,000 or more, a 70 percent increase since 1959. This was nearly 18 percent of the total of 56 million families.

It is this higher income group—centered in cities and suburbs—that has given rise to an increasing demand not for goods alone but for personal services and leisure activities of all kinds. It is within this group that urban banking may well find a receptive market for a development of a prestige banking service such as is found still in Europe today in which the bank functions as bookkeeper, accountant, and business manager for the personal financial affairs of individuals.

Equally valuable is the fact that many persons of means are also the same business leaders whose corporations the bank has been attempting to attract. What better way to demonstrate the ability of the bank to service the needs of companies than through the owners and chief executives themselves?

Payment for such services has traditionally been achieved through the return on balances maintained with the bank. Using automated accounting, the commercial bank may well find this kind of service not only profitable but the experience may also prepare the bank to expand the service on a straight fee basis where the widened market may not produce adequate compensating balances.

BANKING AND THE BUSINESS COMMUNITY

The business community is the bank's "natural" market. It is one that the commercial banker knows best and has lived with longest. With the technological breakthrough of the past decade, commercial banking stands at a point where knowledge and ability to perform are limited only by imagination.

The commercial banker enjoys a unique position. He sits in the center of the world of commerce and industry, and from time immemorial he has been regarded as a knowledgeable advisor. Unfortunately, since the end of World War II when industry here and abroad faced the tremendous challenge in rebuilding a civilian economy, this role has not brought with it the easy flow of demand deposits that banks had previously enjoyed. Companies were understandably pressed for cash and pressed for means of utilizing cash flow and the securities markets to finance their expansion. With commercial banks no longer able to engage in the securities business, their means of attracting compensating balances turned increasingly to generating new services and financing methods to enlarge their usefulness.

A sample list of new services developed by commercial banks over the past few years shows the trend:

Clearinghouse plans to settle interline freight bills.
Lease financing of chain store furnishings and equipment.
Construction equipment financing.
Merchant charge plans.
Establishment and investment in Small Business Investment Corporations to meet the capital needs of small business.
Mutual or common trust investment funds for small fiduciaries.
Accounts receivables financing.
Payroll accounting services.
Business and farm management trust services.

The Technological Breakthrough . . . and Break-even

There is no doubt that the new data-processing equipment and corresponding systems form the foundation of the revolution in business and industry, including banking. If more and more banks find that they cannot build without this foundation, they may also find that they have prepared themselves to move onto the wider stage of business service centers by selling computer services to their customers.

This is not to suggest that there is a clear, easy road to profits. But researched, and sold properly, banks will find that fees from such services will build a hedge against the increasing cost squeeze. The "but" is a big one because of the costliness of misjudgment. Markets and fees should be carefully evaluated. Banks should concentrate on broad markets where the same service can be sold to a number of customers. Services that have already been attempted by some banks are tenant billing for building owners, and professional billing for doctors and dentists.

Another new service that has been developed by banks is an automated payroll accounting system for business. Because volume and calculations are no obstacle to electronic data-processing equipment, the plan can be merchandised to a large number of companies both large and small. It virtually eliminates payroll accounting on their part, reducing routine operating expenses. And since it can provide firms with detailed cost reports by department, product line, or contract, it should prove useful in increasing their overall business efficiency.

From employee and payroll information transmitted by the employer, the plan provides these reports to the company:

1. Payroll register or journal with details of hours, earnings, automatic overtime computations, deductions, and total earnings and deductions to date.
2. Employee ledgers covering each employee, delivered to the company every six months, or more often, if required.
3. Payroll checks. The check portion can be substituted for a receipt for cash payment or for a deposit slip to be credited to the employee's account at any office of the bank. Alternatively, stuffed cash pay envelopes can be delivered to the company.
4. Summaries by department, product line, or contracts.
5. Automatically prepared federal and state quarterly reports on earnings and withheld taxes including FICA information. These reports can also be filed for employers.
6. Annual W-2 statements for each employee.

While there may be some payroll accounts that may prove too costly to handle except on a negotiated fee basis, nearly all firms will make up the market for this service. Payroll accounting is a good example of the kinds of services that will prove profitable to develop. Banks should be careful not to develop a service that is locked in to only one customer need—such as automated inventory control for a single department store. Or a service that does not really meet all the customer's needs.

It is also necessary to design the service in such a way that costly time-consuming steps are eliminated. This may even mean a change in the user's operational habits. In the payroll accounting system, for instance, the preparation of individual employee ledgers is done only once every six months, or no more than quarterly in order to reduce the machine time costs of the service.

The important factor is the fee. Services should not be tied to a compensating balance unless the bank has made a thorough analysis of the return on such balances and what the true costs of the services are.

In the long run, this is the ideal time to move away from compensating balances to a fee method of payment. As banks learn to utilize their electronic equipment to determine their true costs, they will be able to determine more adequately than at present the balances necessary to support the services they render and the fees to charge in the absence of such balances.

For Sale: EDP Services

Research has already indicated the kinds of markets that commercial banks can tap for computer services. Even smaller banks, for instance, can process payrolls for medium-sized companies and some local governmental agencies. They can also handle municipal, hospital, and central school accounting. In this field, banks should remember that they are selling a service: the customers come first, not their own internal bank processing.

More specialized services were outlined at a National Automation Conference of the American Bankers Association. The services range from ones designed for urban markets to those for rural areas.

1. Automobile Dealer Accounting. The monthly preparation of journals, general ledgers, and sales and expense reports.
2. Real Estate Multiple Listing. Providing data on homes and apartment buildings for sale in a metropolitan area to realty brokers. The bank would regularly print for participating realtors the location, style, selling price, number of rooms, taxes, plot size, and other facts on homes in an urban area.
3. Financial Planning Services. The market is primarily for small and medium-sized companies. Services would include: analysis of alternate financing plans; corporate portfolio analysis; calculation of minimum tax liability; pension plan development and fringe benefits cost.
4. Farmer Credit Plan. Farmers would be given a line of short-term credit at the bank. Merchants and wholesalers would sell goods based on the farmer's credit and be paid by the bank. One deterrent to this plan is that many merchants give free credit. Fee income would be negligible, with revenue realized from short-term interest rates.

Industrial Development

Commercial banks are certainly not new to industrial development in their areas. What is new is the intensive pursuit of this activity as a formal program within the bank with one or more persons assigned on a full-time basis, much as the railroads and utilities carry on this activity.

United States industry is still very much on the move. If a bank is located in an area where new development has taken place, the bank can accelerate and aid the process through cooperative efforts, dissemination of information, solicitation, and direct contact. Contact with realtors, for instance, may reveal advance information about the interest of a company. Information may come from a present customer, or a correspondent. A sign of welcome and an offer to obtain information on a confidential basis may go a long way not only toward creating a favorable attitude in locating a plant but also in securing the new account.

Industrial development is very much a part of business development and can be used to implement the sales efforts of branch managers or officers in a call program.

The collection of data pertinent to the area may or may not be necessary, depending on the availability and dissemination of local industrial development groups or the chamber of commerce. The bank may find it useful, however, to prepare periodic comments on business conditions and a simple index of business activity useful to prospective employers.

CORRESPONDENT BANKING

Correspondent relationships between banks were born out of the need to collect drafts and checks drawn on out-of-town banks which their business customers deposited with them. Out of that simple need has come the multitude of services—spurred on by par clearance and the Federal

FIG. 74–1. Hypothetical operating sketch for a network of regional credit exchanges.

Reserve System's free check collection service—that are now grouped under correspondent banking. Services which run from asset allocation studies through loan participation and personnel searches to year-end stockholder reporting.

The future will not diminish private banking's correspondent relationships. If anything, what has been sketched for the years ahead indicates a further drawing together and strengthening of those bonds. One of the most valuable things to be derived, for instance, will be, increasingly, the knowledge and experience of "lead" banks, whether they are large or small, in developing and extending new services to the various publics.

In the evolution of some such national credit exchange network, it is unlikely that, given the measure of competition between banks, any single system will be established. Undoubtedly, credit exchanges will be set up by one or more banks in a commercial center tied to banks in other cities throughout a state or a geographic region and linked to other regional or center exchanges for operational convenience. Debits arising from this operation could well be settled through the use of balances such as with the system already in use. As such, therefore, it will be a bold expansion of the correspondent banking system and should instill new vigor into a unique American institution.

Direct Lease Financing At NBs Up to $693.8 Mil.

WASHINGTON.—Direct lease financing operations of the country's national banks climbed to $693.8 million as of Dec. 31, 1969, compared with $646.7 million last June 30 and $541.9 million at the end of 1968, Comptroller of the Currency William B. Camp said.

During the first six months of 1969, the number of national banks engaged in direct lease financing increased from 303 to 341; by the end of the year the total stood at 353.

Direct lease financing involves bank purchase of equipment—such as computers, vehicles, machinery and the like—and its lease to other users on a fee basis. The dollar totals reported by the banks engaged in this service reflect the leasing contracts outstanding.

Fifteen California banks reported $276,598,000 in direct lease financing outstanding at the end of 1969, while 10 New York banks reported $113,547,000 and 27 Illinois banks reported $68,853,000 in outstanding leases. Various amounts of direct lease financing were reported by national banks in all but seven states in the country.

Totals disclosed reflect a continuation of the trend toward both increased volume of direct lease financing and a rising number of banks engaged in the service since the Comptroller first requested such information as part of call report data.

The Case for Bank Holding Companies

The arguments in support of bank holding companies may be classified into four broad categories: (1) improved operating results of individual banks; (2) strengthened capital structure of banks, thereby adding to depositor safety and reducing supervisory problems; (3) additional banking services to the communities served by subsidiaries of these companies; and (4) better allocation of bank credit. In the terminology of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 the first two arguments relate to the "banking factors," while the last two relate to the "convenience and needs" of the community. Each argument is considered below.

IMPROVED OPERATING RESULTS

In virtually all applications from bank holding companies for additional acquisitions, it is argued that the operating efficiency of the acquired bank will improve as a result of affiliation. Bank holding company groups, by their very nature, have more possibilities for organizing the production of banking services than independent banks. The latter must produce banking services themselves or "buy" them from correspondents. Banks in a holding company group, however, may produce their own services or may buy them from nonaffiliated correspondents, from the lead bank [12] of the holding company group, from the holding company, or from a nonbanking subsidiary of the holding company. This greater flexibility may enable bank holding companies to use more efficient operating techniques.

For example, it may be more efficient to have the lead bank of a holding company or a nonbanking subsidiary provide computer services to all banks in a bank group than to have the same number of independent banks purchase such services from correspondents or produce the services for themselves.[13] In other words, to the extent that economies of vertical integration exist in banking, a holding company can take advantage of them. Economies of scale are not the relevant consideration here, for if economies of scale exist in the production of banking services, they will exist for the large correspondent bank as well as for the lead bank

[12] Refers to the dominant bank in the group.

[13] The services that a bank might purchase from its holding company or another affiliate—or which a nonaffiliated bank might buy from its correspondent—include check clearing and collection services, investment advice, foreign banking services, purchases of equipment and supplies, employees benefit programs, and many others. For a comprehensive list of services offered by correspondent banks, see U.S. Congress, House, Banking and Currency Committee, 88th Cong., 2d sess., Correspondent Relations: A Survey of Banker Opinion (Oct. 21, 1964), pp. 25-26.

of a holding company or a nonbanking subsidiary.

Another potential source of differences in operating efficiency, which is closely related to basic organizational structure, is in the quality of management. One of the major arguments in support of the holding company arrangement is that the holding company can acquire and train, for its affiliates, managers who are superior to the managers of comparable independent banks. This argument may be valid even though large city banks offer training programs to the managements of their small correspondents, because, it is argued, bank holding company systems are able to attract more talented individuals to the banking industry. They are able to do this because such a system can presumably offer greater challenges and opportunities for advancement to capable young men than can the typical independent bank.

Bank holding companies may also contribute to greater labor mobility within the banking industry and thus foster a more efficient allocation of labor resources, particularly management resources. The holding company can allocate its labor resources in a way that maximizes its profits, although not necessarily the profits of a particular subsidiary bank. Thus, while an independent bank is unlikely to suggest the transfer of one of its capable officers to one of its correspondent banks in order to overcome a management problem at the latter, a holding company would effect such a transfer between subsidiaries if the holding company would benefit. Further, common pension plans within a holding company system can assist in overcoming some of the institutional barriers to labor mobility that currently exist in this country.

The above arguments support a position that subsidiary banks are able to operate more efficiently than comparable independent banks. However, improved operating results may also come from larger revenues. There are strong arguments to support a position that holding company subsidiaries are able to earn a greater return on assets. One is that the superior management capabilities of holding companies enable the subsidiary banks to earn a greater return on their investments through better investment management. Another is that subsidiary banks are able to commit a greater proportion of their assets to a high-yielding asset —loans. (This argument is examined in the discussion of bank credit, beginning on page 8.) Thus, the higher loans/assets ratio and the greater return on investments that subsidiaries can presumably achieve enable them to earn a larger return on assets than can comparable independent banks.

STRENGTHENED CAPITAL STRUCTURE

The second category of arguments in favor of bank holding companies is that they strengthen a bank's capital structure. A bank's capital may be increased by the sale of stock and/or the retention of earnings. Banking tradition and the pressures of bank examiners cause banks to maintain relatively conservative capital/deposits, capital/assets, and other capital ratios. Consequently, if a bank is to continue to meet the expanding credit and service demands of its community, it must continually increase its capital. The problem of maintaining capital ratios is particularly acute for banks located in rapidly growing areas.

For additions to capital, the independent bank must rely upon the sale of its own stock and/or upon its own retained earnings. Because no active market exists for the stock of small banks, these banks may have difficulty in securing sufficient capital from stock sales; and as a result, banking services in the community may suffer. Most independent banks are not able to import equity capital from other regions of the nation because, for all but the largest ones, the market for a bank's stock is largely confined to the bank's service area.

Economists who have analyzed bank holding companies have consistently concluded that the subsidiaries of bank holding companies have significant advantages over independent banks in acquiring new capital.[14] The reason is that the stocks of most bank holding companies are traded in active national or regional markets. Thus, if the subsidiary banks are in need of additional capital, the holding company can acquire it by selling its own stock in these markets. It can also be said that holding companies are able to achieve a better allocation of equity capital than independent banks. Through stock sales the holding company is better able to acquire capital from capital-surplus areas and transfer this capital to banks that are located in areas characterized by a shortage of capital.

In addition, holding companies are capable of achieving a more satisfactory distribution of the retained earnings of banks. Under independent banking one might find some banks, especially those in slow-growth areas, building their capital ratios to levels in excess of that which is considered necessary, while other banks in rapidly growing areas may find their capital positions impaired because retained earnings are currently inadequate. The holding company, however, has the ability to allocate the aggregate retained earnings of the bank group in accordance with the needs of the individual banks.[15]

ADDITIONAL BANKING SERVICES TO THE COMMUNITY

The quantity and quality of banking services are somewhat related to the operating results of banks. A more efficient banking organization can offer banking services at a lower price or can offer additional or better services at the same price. However, holding companies also assert that they can provide some services to a community through their subsidiaries that a comparable independent bank cannot provide —services such specialized business loans, special checking accounts, trust services, consumer credit, and so forth, that require highly specialized knowledge. A holding company subsidiary has the advantage of being able to draw upon specialized managerial talents from any of the banks in its bank group. While correspondent banks can assist in the provision of specialized services, it is argued that the holding company arrangement results in closer cooperation among affiliated banks than would be the case with independent correspondent banks. Moreover, the ability to supply specialized banking services still depends to a large extent upon the capabilities of management at the individual bank; and holding companies declare that they are able, for reasons cited above, to supply their banks with better management.

[14] See for example, W. Ralph Lamb, Group Banking (1961), pp. 148–51.

[15] The extent to which a bank holding company can achieve a more rational allocation of equity capital is dependent upon the degree of autonomy possessed by the directors and managements of the subsidiary banks. In order to achieve the optimum distribution of equity capital (or of bank credit), the managements of the subsidiary banks must desire to maximize the profits of the holding company, not necessarily their own bank's profits. The "carrot approach" to instilling this desire is to grant options on the stock of the holding company to the managements of the subsidiary banks.

BETTER ALLOCATION OF BANK CREDIT

The potential supply of bank credit available to a given community depends in large part upon the income and the wealth of economic units in the community. The availability of bank loans to economic units in the community, however, is largely determined by the types of assets bankers choose to hold. If a bank has relatively large amounts of U.S. Government securities and "due from" balances in its asset structure, it is clear that large amounts of potential bank credit are being transferred away from this community. If there is little loan demand, this is desirable in terms of the optimum allocation of bank credit; but if potential bank credit is being transferred out of the community because the bank's management lacks the ability to make some specialized types of loans or because of restrictions imposed by the bank's lending limit, then the best allocation of bank credit is not being achieved. Holding companies assert that because they can provide management with the requisite skills and can overcome at least some of the limitations imposed by lending limits at individual banks, their banks can more adequately meet the credit needs of the community.

Benefits to the Community

The basic nature of the holding company form of banking organization permits component banks to commit a greater proportion of potential bank credit to the communities in which the subsidiary banks are located. Bank holding companies are generally comprised of banks located in different communities or in different sections of large metropolitan areas. Consequently, the combined portfolios of all of the subsidiaries of the holding company are more diversified than the portfolio of a single bank and, therefore, less risk would be associated with the holding company portfolio. Moreover, each individual subsidiary bank can assume that, should difficulties arise, assistance would be available from its coaffiliates. For these reasons, the risk associated with a given level of loans would be less for a subsidiary bank than it would for a comparable independent bank; hence, with risk preference being equal, a subsidiary bank would have a higher loans/assets ratio than a comparable independent bank.

Correspondent banking operations in the United States supplement to some extent the capacity of unit banks or limited-branch banks to adequately meet the credit needs of their communities. Traditional banking practices call for the maintenance of deposit balances by small outlying banks (country banks) in large banks located in metropolitan areas (city banks). Part of the balance is maintained in order to facilitate the performance of the check-clearing service that the city bank renders to the country bank. The remaining or excess balance is maintained to compensate the city bank for other services that it renders to the country bank. Hence, the "cost" of these correspondent services to the country bank is the return that would have been earned on the excess balance if these funds had been used to purchase earning assets. This excess balance may be reasonably assumed to be required by the city bank and, therefore, should not be considered excess reserves. Were these excess balances not required, a high percentage of such funds would likely be channeled into local loans and into the purchase of local municipal bonds. Consequently, the "cost" to the outlying community of this correspondent banking arrangement is the loss of potential local bank credit.[16]

[16] If country banks paid fees for correspondent services, the outlying community would gain. The country bank's profit would be unaffected, because the fee paid for the correspondent services is presumably equal to the income that the bank could derive by shifting its excess correspondent balances into earning assets. But the community served by the country bank would have additional credit resources available to it. For a discussion of the fee system and banker reaction to it, see U.S. Congress, House, Banking and Currency Committee, 88th Cong., 2d sess., Correspondent Relations: A Survey of Banker Opinion (Oct. 21, 1964), especially p. 63.

How would bank credit be allocated under the holding company form of banking organization? One of the long-standing arguments against bank holding companies is that they drain money capital from rural and suburban areas, the beneficiary being the big city.[17] In rebuttal, the supporters of bank holding companies stress the independence of the directors of the subsidiary banks.[18] Presumably these directors are local leaders who strive to and are able to protect their community's interests. A good case can be developed to support both arguments. However, if the holding company acts to maximize its profits, the loanable funds would be channeled into those areas where the highest net return (after allowance for risk) is available. Such an allocation of bank loans means that potential bank credit would be transferred from communities with relatively little loan demand to communities with high loan demand.

Greater Credit Mobility

Credit mobility is required to meet the credit needs of many communities because (1) some communities will be capital-surplus areas while others will be capital-deficit areas; and (2) some borrowers in a given community will have credit needs that exceed the lending limits of the local banks. Two important arrangements that the banking system in the United States has used to achieve mobility are participation loans and the sale of loan paper from one bank to another and from banks to other financial intermediaries. These arrangements have not been fully available to the subsidiaries of a bank holding company because of certain provisions in the original 1956 Act. Under the original Act the sale of loan paper and the granting of a loan by one banking subsidiary to another bank in the same holding company were prohibited. Because of these restrictions, loan participations between banks in the same group had to be arranged at the time the loan was made. Such restrictions did not, however, apply to transactions between an independent country bank and its city correspondent. Critics of the original Act argued that these restrictions prevented, in some degree, the realization of one of the significant advantages of bank holding companies—greater interregional mobility of bank credit.

Though the provisions of the original Act appeared to place subsidiaries of bank holding companies at a disadvantage to independent banks in terms of making loan participations and of buying and selling loan paper,[19] strong arguments remained in support of a position that greater credit mobility could be achieved via a holding company arrangement than via independent banks linked by conventional correspondent relationships.[20]

The extent to which loan participations are employed clearly depends upon the willingness of small banks to request participation by their city correspondent and upon the willingness of the latter to do so. Small independent banks are often reluctant to seek participations from the large correspondent banks for fear that the customer will be lost to the large bank. This fear is apparently often justified, for in a survey of city correspondents, the large banks

[17] See for example, Governor J. L. Robertson's dissent in the Denver U.S. Bancorporation case. Federal Reserve Bulletin, Nov. 1963, p. 1529.

[18] Marcus Nadler and Jules I. Bogen, The Bank Holding Company (1959), p. 22.

[19] The restrictions were not so damaging to holding companies as it may at first appear. Although it was not legal for, say, Subsidiary Bank A to purchase loan paper from Subsidiary Bank B (if A and B are subsidiaries of the same holding company), Bank A could increase Bank B's liquidity by making a direct loan to one of Bank B's customers. This loan would enable the customer to repay his loan at Bank B. The final result would be the same as if Bank A had purchased an equivalent amount of loan paper directly from Bank B.

[20] The superiority of the holding company arrangement in providing for credit mobility was one of the major arguments used in the application of Morgan New York State Corporation to become a bank holding company. See Federal Reserve Bulletin, May 1962, pp. 567-82.

In a separate statement accompanying the Board's denial of the application, Governor G. W. Mitchell questioned the Applicant's assertions that the proposed holding company could allocate credit more efficiently than would be the case under the existing correspondent banking network (see p. 582).

were asked how many times they would carry overlines of the same borrower before expecting the borrower to establish a direct relationship with them. Typical replies were "2 or 3 years" and "no set number of times, but we do feel that the local bank should assist us in obtaining a direct relationship if the borrower has permanently outgrown the lending limit of his local bank."[21]

A holding company subsidiary is less likely to be reluctant to seek loan participation from the lead bank of its group because the holding company would probably prohibit one of its banks from pirating the account of a customer of another of its subsidiary banks. Also, in securing loan participation the small independent bank is in a relatively poor bargaining position with respect to, say, the large money-market banks. A subsidiary of a bank group, given that the banks in the group have substantial interbank balances with a money-market bank, would be in a much better position to bargain for loan participations.

In addition to arranging loan participations, local banks can meet the excess credit demand of the community by selling their existing loan paper to other commercial banks or other financial intermediaries. Despite the prohibition that was placed on the sale of loans to holding company subsidiaries, the holding company arrangement probably enabled a subsidiary bank to dispose of loan paper more easily than a comparable independent bank because the latter could not generate the volume of loans needed to interest institutional buyers of loan paper, such as, life insurance companies and savings and loan associations. The bank holding company, however, can make arrangements with these institutions to purchase the loan paper of all of the subsidiaries in the bank group and thus assure the institution of a steady flow in reasonably large volume. The ability of the holding company to standardize credit procedures further aids in facilitating such transactions.

[21] "Participation Loans," Banking, Jan. 1958, p. 49.

Effects of the Amended Act

The restrictions upon loan participations and upon the sale of loan paper between banking subsidiaries of the same holding company were based on section 6 of the original Bank Holding Company Act. This section was repealed by the 1966 amendment; but section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act was amended so that its restrictions on banking affiliates were also applied to the subsidiaries of bank holding companies.[22] These restrictions state that a banking affiliate may not loan or otherwise extend credit to another affiliate or to the holding company if the total amount of loans or extensions of credit to the other affiliate exceeds 10 per cent of the lending affiliate's capital and surplus or if the total amount of loans or extensions of credit to all affiliates (including the holding company) exceeds 20 per cent of the lending affiliate's capital and surplus. (Under the original Act, loans from one banking subsidiary to another or to the holding company, that is, "cross-stream" and "upstream" loans, were prohibited.) However, because the purchase of loan paper without recourse is not considered an extension of credit, it appears that no significant restrictions now exist on the purchase of loan paper by one subsidiary from another or on loan participations between subsidiaries.

The extent to which the restrictions of the original Act prevented holding companies from achieving their desired allocation of bank credit is not known; but whatever the extent, these barriers now appear to have been substantially eliminated.

[22] Under section 23A, a banking affiliate includes any corporation of which a member bank owns or controls more than 50 per cent of the voting shares. In the amended section 23A, affiliate now includes, with respect to any insured bank, any bank holding company of which such bank is a subsidiary as defined by the 1956 Bank Holding Company Act, and any other subsidiary of this bank holding company.

The Case for Bank Holding Companies

The arguments in support of bank holding companies may be classified into four broad categories: (1) improved operating results of individual banks; (2) strengthened capital structure of banks, thereby adding to depositor safety and reducing supervisory problems; (3) additional banking services to the communities served by subsidiaries of these companies; and (4) better allocation of bank credit. In the terminology of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 the first two arguments relate to the "banking factors," while the last two relate to the "convenience and needs" of the community. Each argument is considered below.

IMPROVED OPERATING RESULTS

In virtually all applications from bank holding companies for additional acquisitions, it is argued that the operating efficiency of the acquired bank will improve as a result of affiliation. Bank holding company groups, by their very nature, have more possibilities for organizing the production of banking services than independent banks. The latter must produce banking services themselves or "buy" them from correspondents. Banks in a holding company group, however, may produce their own services or may buy them from nonaffiliated correspondents, from the lead bank [12] of the holding company group, from the holding company, or from a nonbanking subsidiary of the holding company. This greater flexibility may enable bank holding companies to use more efficient operating techniques.

For example, it may be more efficient to have the lead bank of a holding company or a nonbanking subsidiary provide computer services to all banks in a bank group than to have the same number of independent banks purchase such services from correspondents or produce the services for themselves.[13] In other words, to the extent that economies of vertical integration exist in banking, a holding company can take advantage of them. Economies of scale are not the relevant consideration here, for if economies of scale exist in the production of banking services, they will exist for the large correspondent bank as well as for the lead bank

[12] Refers to the dominant bank in the group.

[13] The services that a bank might purchase from its holding company or another affiliate—or which a nonaffiliated bank might buy from its correspondent—include check clearing and collection services, investment advice, foreign banking services, purchases of equipment and supplies, employees benefit programs, and many others. For a comprehensive list of services offered by correspondent banks, see U.S. Congress, House, Banking and Currency Committee, 88th Cong., 2d sess., Correspondent Relations: A Survey of Banker Opinion (Oct. 21, 1964), pp. 25-26.

of a holding company or a nonbanking subsidiary.

Another potential source of differences in operating efficiency, which is closely related to basic organizational structure, is in the quality of management. One of the major arguments in support of the holding company arrangement is that the holding company can acquire and train, for its affiliates, managers who are superior to the managers of comparable independent banks. This argument may be valid even though large city banks offer training programs to the managements of their small correspondents, because, it is argued, bank holding company systems are able to attract more talented individuals to the banking industry. They are able to do this because such a system can presumably offer greater challenges and opportunities for advancement to capable young men than can the typical independent bank.

Bank holding companies may also contribute to greater labor mobility within the banking industry and thus foster a more efficient allocation of labor resources, particularly management resources. The holding company can allocate its labor resources in a way that maximizes its profits, although not necessarily the profits of a particular subsidiary bank. Thus, while an independent bank is unlikely to suggest the transfer of one of its capable officers to one of its correspondent banks in order to overcome a management problem at the latter, a holding company would effect such a transfer between subsidiaries if the holding company would benefit. Further, common pension plans within a holding company system can assist in overcoming some of the institutional barriers to labor mobility that currently exist in this country.

The above arguments support a position that subsidiary banks are able to operate more efficiently than comparable independent banks. However, improved operating results may also come from larger revenues. There are strong arguments to support a position that holding company subsidiaries are able to earn a greater return on assets. One is that the superior management capabilities of holding companies enable the subsidiary banks to earn a greater return on their investments through better investment management. Another is that subsidiary banks are able to commit a greater proportion of their assets to a high-yielding asset —loans. (This argument is examined in the discussion of bank credit, beginning on page 8.) Thus, the higher loans/assets ratio and the greater return on investments that subsidiaries can presumably achieve enable them to earn a larger return on assets than can comparable independent banks.

STRENGTHENED CAPITAL STRUCTURE

The second category of arguments in favor of bank holding companies is that they strengthen a bank's capital structure. A bank's capital may be increased by the sale of stock and/or the retention of earnings. Banking tradition and the pressures of bank examiners cause banks to maintain relatively conservative capital/deposits, capital/assets, and other capital ratios. Consequently, if a bank is to continue to meet the expanding credit and service demands of its community, it must continually increase its capital. The problem of maintaining capital ratios is particularly acute for banks located in rapidly growing areas.

For additions to capital, the independent bank must rely upon the sale of its own stock and/or upon its own retained earnings. Because no active market exists for the stock of small banks, these banks may have difficulty in securing sufficient capital from stock sales; and as a result, banking services in the community may suffer. Most independent banks are not able to import quity capital from other regions of the nation because, for all but the largest ones, the market for a bank's stock is largely confined to the bank's service area.

Economists who have analyzed bank holding companies have consistently concluded that the subsidiaries of bank holding companies have significant advantages over independent banks in acquiring new capital.[14] The reason is that the stocks of most bank holding companies are traded in active national or regional markets. Thus, if the subsidiary banks are in need of additional capital, the holding company can acquire it by selling its own stock in these markets. It can also be said that holding companies are able to achieve a better allocation of equity capital than independent banks. Through stock sales the holding company is better able to acquire capital from capital-surplus areas and transfer this capital to banks that are located in areas characterized by a shortage of capital.

In addition, holding companies are capable of achieving a more satisfactory distribution of the retained earnings of banks. Under independent banking one might find some banks, especially those in slow-growth areas, building their capital ratios to levels in excess of that which is considered necessary, while other banks in rapidly growing areas may find their capital positions impaired because retained earnings are currently inadequate. The holding company, however, has the ability to allocate the aggregate retained earnings of the bank group in accordance with the needs of the individual banks.[15]

ADDITIONAL BANKING SERVICES TO THE COMMUNITY

The quantity and quality of banking services are somewhat related to the operating results of banks. A more efficient banking organization can offer banking services at a lower price or can offer additional or better services at the same price. However, holding companies also assert that they can provide some services to a community through their subsidiaries that a comparable independent bank cannot provide —services such as specialized business loans, special checking accounts, trust services, consumer credit, and so forth, that require highly specialized knowledge. A holding company subsidiary has the advantage of being able to draw upon specialized managerial talents from any of the banks in its bank group. While correspondent banks can assist in the provision of specialized services, it is argued that the holding company arrangement results in closer cooperation among affiliated banks than would be the case with independent correspondent banks. Moreover, the ability to supply specialized banking services still depends to a large extent upon the capabilities of management at the individual bank; and holding companies declare that they are able, for reasons cited above, to supply their banks with better management.

[14] See for example, W. Ralph Lamb, Group Banking (1961), pp. 148–51.

[15] The extent to which a bank holding company can achieve a more rational allocation of equity capital is dependent upon the degree of autonomy possessed by the directors and managements of the subsidiary banks. In order to achieve the optimum distribution of equity capital (or of bank credit), the managements of the subsidiary banks must desire to maximize the profits of the holding company, not necessarily their own bank's profits. The "carrot approach" to instilling this desire is to grant options on the stock of the holding company to the managements of the subsidiary banks.

BETTER ALLOCATION OF BANK CREDIT

The potential supply of bank credit available to a given community depends in large part upon the income and the wealth of economic units in the community. The availability of bank loans to economic units in the community, however, is largely determined by the types of assets bankers choose to hold. If a bank has relatively large amounts of U.S. Government securities and "due from" balances in its asset structure, it is clear that large amounts of potential bank credit are being transferred away from this community. If there is little loan demand, this is desirable in terms of the optimum allocation of bank credit; but if potential bank credit is being transferred out of the community because the bank's management lacks the ability to make some specialized types of loans or because of restrictions imposed by the bank's lending limit, then the best allocation of bank credit is not being achieved. Holding companies assert that because they can provide management with the requisite skills and can overcome at least some of the limitations imposed by lending limits at individual banks, their banks can more adequately meet the credit needs of the community.

Benefits to the Community

The basic nature of the holding company form of banking organization permits component banks to commit a greater proportion of potential bank credit to the communities in which the subsidiary banks are located. Bank holding companies are generally comprised of banks located in different communities or in different sections of large metropolitan areas. Consequently, the combined portfolios of all of the subsidiaries of the holding company are more diversified than the portfolio of a single bank and, therefore, less risk would be associated with the holding company portfolio. Moreover, each individual subsidiary bank can assume that, should difficulties arise, assistance would be available from its coaffiliates. For these reasons, the risk associated with a given level of loans would be less for a subsidiary bank than it would for a comparable independent bank; hence, with risk preference being equal, a subsidiary bank would have a higher loans/assets ratio than a comparable independent bank.

Correspondent banking operations in the United States supplement to some extent the capacity of unit banks or limited-branch banks to adequately meet the credit needs of their communities. Traditional banking practices call for the maintenance of deposit balances by small outlying banks (country banks) in large banks located in metropolitan areas (city banks). Part of the balance is maintained in order to facilitate the performance of the check-clearing service that the city bank renders to the country bank. The remaining or excess balance is maintained to compensate the city bank for other services that it renders to the country bank. Hence, the "cost" of these correspondent services to the country bank is the return that would have been earned on the excess balance if these funds had been used to purchase earning assets. This excess balance may be reasonably assumed to be required by the city bank and, therefore, should not be considered excess reserves. Were these excess balances not required, a high percentage of such funds would likely be channeled into local loans and into the purchase of local municipal bonds. Consequently, the "cost" to the outlying community of this correspondent banking arrangement is the loss of potential local bank credit.[10]

[10] If country banks paid fees for correspondent services, the outlying community would gain. The country bank's profit would be unaffected, because the fee paid for the correspondent services is presumably equal to the income that the bank could derive by shifting its excess correspondent balances into earning assets. But the community served by the country bank would have additional credit resources available to it. How would bank credit be allocated under the holding company form of banking organization? One of the long-standing arguments against bank holding companies is that they drain money capital from rural and suburban areas, the beneficiary being the big city.[17] In rebuttal, the supporters of bank holding companies stress the independence of the directors of the subsidiary banks.[18] Presumably these directors are local leaders who strive to and are able to protect their community's interests. Effects of the Amended Act

The restrictions upon loan participations and upon the sale of loan paper between banking subsidiaries of the same holding company were based on section 6 of the original Bank Holding Company Act. This section was repealed by the 1966 amendment; but section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act was amended so that its restrictions on banking affiliates were also applied to the subsidiaries of bank holding companies.[22] These restrictions state that a banking affiliate may not loan or otherwise extend credit to another affiliate or to the holding company if the total amount of loans or extensions of credit to the other affiliate exceeds 10 per cent of the lending affiliate's capital and surplus or if the total amount of loans or extensions of credit to all affiliates (including the holding company) exceeds 20 per cent of the lending affiliate's capital and surplus. (Under the original Act, loans from one banking subsidiary to another or to the holding company, that is, "cross-stream" and "upstream" loans, were prohibited.) However, because the purchase of loan paper without recourse is not considered an extension of credit, it appears that no significant restrictions now exist on the purchase of loan paper by one subsidiary from another or on loan participations between subsidiaries.

The extent to which the restrictions of the original Act prevented holding companies from achieving their desired allocation of bank credit is not known; but whatever the extent, these barriers now appear to have been substantially eliminated.

[22] Under section 23A, a banking affiliate includes any corporation of which a member bank owns or controls more than 50 per cent of the voting shares. In the amended section 23A, affiliate now includes, with respect to any insured bank, any bank holding company of which such bank is a subsidiary as defined by the 1956 Bank Holding Company Act, and any other subsidiary of this bank holding company.

Sec. 10. AS 06.05.235 is repealed and AS 06. is amended by adding a new chapter 06 Bank Holding Companies to read:

06.06.005 - DEFINITIONS. (a) "Bank holding company" means any company (1) that directly or indirectly owns, controls, or holds with power to vote 10 per centum or more of the voting shares of any bank or of a company that is or becomes a bank holding company by virtue of this chapter or (2) that controls in any manner the election of a majority of the directors of any bank; and, for the purposes of this chapter, any successor to any such company shall be deemed to be a bank holding company from the date as of which such predecessor company became a bank holding company. Notwithstanding the foregoing, (A) no bank and no company owning or controlling voting shares of a bank shall be a bank holding company by virtue of such bank's ownership or control of shares in a fiduciary capacity, except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (g) of this section, (B) no company shall be a bank holding company by virtue of its ownership or control of shares acquired by it in connection with its underwriting of securities if such shares are held only for such period of time as will permit the sale thereof on a reasonable basis, and (C) no company formed for the sole purpose of participating in a proxy solicitation shall be a bank holding company by virtue of its control of voting rights of shares acquired in the course of such solicitation.

(b) "Company" means any corporation, general or limited partnership, joint adventure, business trust or any other trust unless by its terms it must terminate within twenty-five years or not later than twenty-one years and ten months after the death of individuals living on the effective date of the trust, but shall not include any corporation the majority of the shares of which are owned by the United States or by the State of Alaska.

(c) "Bank" means any financial institution in this state that accepts deposits that the depositors have a legal right to withdraw on demand.

(d) "Subsidiary", with respect to a specified bank holding company, means (1) any company 10 per centum or more of whose voting shares is directly or indirectly owned or controlled by such bank holding company, or is held by it with power to vote; or (2) any company the election of a majority of whose directors is controlled in any manner by such bank holding company.

(e) The term "successor" shall include any company which acquires directly or indirectly from a bank holding company shares of any bank, when and if the relationship between such company and the bank holding company is such that the transaction effects no substantial change in the control of the bank or beneficial ownership of such shares of such bank.

(f) "Commissioner" means the commissioner of commerce.

(g) For the purposes of this chapter

(1) shares owned or controlled by any subsidiary of a bank holding company shall be deemed to be indirectly owned or controlled by such bank holding company;

(2) shares held or controlled directly or indirectly by trustees for the benefit of (A) a company, (B) the shareholders or members of a company, or (C) the employees (whether exclusively or not) of a company, shall be deemed to be controlled by such company; and shares

(3)/transferred after the effective date of this act by any bank holding company (or by any company which, but for such transfer, would be a bank holding company) directly or indirectly to any transferee that is indebted to the transferor, or has one or more officers, directors, trustees, or beneficiaries in common with or subject to control by the transferor, shall be deemed to be indirectly owned or controlled by the transferor unless the Commissioner, after opportunity for hearing, determines that the transferor is not in fact capable of controlling the transferee.

06.06.010 - ACQUISITION OF BANK INTERESTS. (a) It shall be unlawful, except with the prior approval of the Commissioner, (1) for any action to be taken that causes any company to become a bank holding company; (2) for any action to be taken that causes a bank to become a subsidiary of a bank holding company; (3) for any bank holding company to acquire direct or indirect ownership or control of any voting shares of any bank if, after such acquisition, such company will directly or indirectly own or control more than 5 per centum of the voting shares of such bank; (4) for any bank holding company or subsidiary thereof, other than a bank, to acquire all or substantially all of the assets of a bank: or (5) for any bank holding company to merge or consolidate with any other bank holding company. Notwithstanding the foregoing this prohibition shall not apply to (A) shares acquired by a bank, (i) in good faith in a fiduciary capacity, except where such shares are held under a trust that constitutes a company as defined in section 5(b) and except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3) of section (5) g, or (ii) in the regular course of securing or collecting a debt previously contracted in good faith, but any shares acquired after the effective date of this act in securing or collecting any such previously contracted debt shall be disposed of within a period of two years from the date on which they were acquired; or (B) additional shares acquired by a bank holding company in a bank in which such bank holding company owned or controlled a majority of the voting shares prior to such acquisition.

(b) The Commissioner shall not approve

(1) any acquisition or merger or consolidation under this section which would result in a monopoly, or which would be in furtherance of any combination or conspiracy to monopolize or to attempt to monopolize the business of banking, or

(2) any other proposed acquisition or merger or consolidation under this section whose effect may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly, or which in any other manner would be in restraint of trade, unless the Commissioner finds that the anticompetitive effects of the proposed transaction are clearly outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

(c) In every case, the Commissioner shall take into consideration the financial and managerial resources and future prospects of the company or companies and the banks concerned, and the convenience and needs of the community to be served.

(d) No application under this section shall be approved unless the resulting bank holding company or bank holding companies maintains its principal office and conducts its principal operations in Alaska.

06.06.015 - ACQUISITION OF NONBANK INTERESTS. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, no bank holding company shall

(1) after the effective date of this Act acquire direct or indirect ownership or control of any voting shares of any company which is not a bank, or

(2) after two years from the effective date of this Act or the date it becomes a bank holding company, whichever is later, retain direct or indirect ownership or control of any voting shares of any company which is not a bank or a bank holding company or engage in any business other than that of banking or of managing or controlling banks or of furnishing services to or performing services for any bank of which it owns or controls 10 per centum or more of the voting shares.

The Commissioner may, upon application by a bank holding company, extend the period referred to in paragraph (2) above from time to time as to such bank holding company for not more than one year at a time, if, in his judgment, such an extension would not be detrimental to the public interest, but no such extensions shall in the aggregate exceed three years.

(b) The prohibitions in this section shall not apply to

(1) shares of any company engaged or to be engaged solely in one or more of the following activities: (A) holding or operating properties used wholly or substantially by any banking subsidiary of such bank holding company in the operations of such banking subsidiary or acquired for such future use; or (B) conducting a safe deposit business; or (C) furnishing services to or performing services for such bank holding company or its banking subsidiaries; or (D) liquidating assets acquired from such bank holding company or its banking subsidiaries or acquired from any other source prior to the effective date of this Act, or the date on which such company became a bank holding company, whichever is later;

(2) shares acquired by a bank in satisfaction of a debt previously contracted in good faith, but such bank shall dispose of such shares within a period of two years from the date on which they were acquired, except that the Commissioner may upon application by such bank holding company extend such period of two years from time to time as to such holding company for not more than one year at a time if, in his judgment, such an extension would not be detrimental to the public interest, but no such extensions shall extend beyond a date five years after the date on which such shares were acquired;

(3) shares acquired by such bank holding company from any of its subsidiaries which subsidiary has been requested to dispose of such shares by any Federal or State authority having statutory power to examine such subsidiary, but such bank holding company shall dispose of such shares within a period of two years from the date on which they were acquired;

(4) shares held or acquired by a bank in good faith in a fiduciary capacity, except where such shares are held under a trust that constitutes a company as defined in section 5(b) and except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 5(g);

(5) shares which are of the kinds and amounts eligible for investment by national banking associations under federal law;

(6) shares of any company which do not include more than 5 per centum of the outstanding voting shares of such company;

(7) shares of an investment company which is not a bank holding company and which is not engaged in any business other than investing in securities, which securities do not include more than 5 per centum of the outstanding voting shares of any company;

(8) shares retained or acquired with the approval of the Commissioner in any company performing any activity that the Commissioner has determined, after notice and opportunity for hearing, is functionally related to banking in such a way that its performance by a subsidiary of a bank holding company can reasonably be expected to produce benefits to the public that outweigh possible adverse effects;

(9) shares lawfully acquired and owned prior to the effective date of this Act by a bank which is a bank holding company, or by any of its wholly owned subsidiaries.

06.06.020 - LIABILITY OF BANK HOLDING COMPANIES. A bank holding company is primarily liable for the payment of the debts of its subsidiaries which are banks.

06.06.025 - ADMINISTRATION. (a) Within one hundred and eighty days after the effective date of this Act, or within one hundred and eighty days after becoming a bank holding company, whichever is later, each bank holding company shall register with the Commissioner on forms prescribed by the Commissioner, which shall include such information with respect to the financial condition and operations, management, and intercompany relationships of the bank holding company and its subsidiaries, and related matters, as the Commissioner may deem necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of this chapter. The Commissioner may, in its discretion, extend the time within which a bank holding company shall register and file the requisite information.

(b) The Commissioner is authorized to issue such regulations and orders as may be necessary to enable it to administer and carry out the purposes of this chapter and prevent evasions thereof.

(c) The Commissioner from time to time may require reports to keep him informed as to whether the provisions of this chapter and such regulations and orders issued thereunder have been complied with; and the Commissioner may make examinations of each bank holding company and each subsidiary thereof, the cost of which shall be assessed against, and paid by, such holding company. The Commissioner shall use available reports of examinations by federal and state supervisory authorities for the purposes of this section.

(d) All administrative proceedings under this chapter shall be conducted in accordance with AS 44.62.330 - 630.

06.06.030 - EXEMPTIONS. This chapter does not apply to bank holding companies which are registered under the Federal Bank Holding Company Act of 1956.

06.06.035 - INJUNCTIONS AND PROSECUTION OF OFFENSES. (a) Whenever it shall appear to the Commissioner, either upon complaint or otherwise, that the provisions of this chapter, or of any regulation prescribed under its authority, have been or are about to be violated, he may, in his discretion, either require or permit any person or company to file with him a statement in writing as to all the facts and circumstances concerning the subject matter which the Commissioner believes to be in the public interest to investigate, and may investigate such facts.

(b) Whenever it shall appear to the Commissioner that any person or company is engaged or about to engage in any acts or practices which constitute or will constitute a violation of the provisions of this chapter, or of any regulation prescribed under its authority, he may in his discretion, bring an action in the Superior Court for the State of Alaska, to enjoin such acts or practices, and upon a proper showing temporary or permanent injunctive relief shall be granted. The Commissioner may transmit such evidence as may be available concerning such acts or practices to the Attorney General who may, in his discretion, institute appropriate criminal proceedings.

06.06.040 - PENALTIES. Any company which willfully violates any provision of this chapter, or any regulation or order issued by the Commissioner pursuant thereto, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $1,000 for each day during which the violation continues. Any individual who willfully participates in a violation of any provision of this chapter, or any regulation or order issued by the Commissioner pursuant thereto, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both. Every officer, director, agent and employee of a bank holding company or a subsidiary who willfully makes false entries in any book, report, or statement of such bank holding company shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

06.06.045 - JUDICIAL REVIEW. Any party aggrieved by an order of the Commissioner under this chapter may obtain judicial review in accordance with AS 44.62.560 - 570.

POSITION PAPER

OF

ALASKA TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION

STATE OF ALASKA

The official position of the Alaska Transportation Commission (ATC) in this proceeding, the ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION, can be summarized as follows:

1. That this investigation of primarily-intra-Alaska service should have been initiated by the Civil Aeronautics Board (CAB) as a joint board proceeding (as provided for in 49 USC 1324) thereby combining the regulatory efforts of both the CAB and this Commission in this matter. However, having failed to initiate it as a joint proceeding, the investigation should, nevertheless, be concluded in that vein with a joint decision.

2. That the Alaska Transportation Commission is a state regulatory agency with responsibilities on the state level similar to the responsibilities of the CAB on the federal level; that the limited role of "party" relegated to the Commission, notwithstanding its major function as a decision making body, is highly inappropriate in this proceeding; that this Commission cannot and should not develop recommendations as to specific route authorities, realignments, competitive service, subsidies, mail service, etc., without first having before it all evidence, briefs, etc., of all parties; that further, this Commission cannot and should not make any such specific recommendations without close coordination of its policies and conclusions with the policies and conclusions of the CAB; and that this review and close coordination can only be accomplished at the decisional level of this proceeding.

3. That the standards of performance and adequacy of service being provided by CAB certificated carriers in Alaska bear directly and forcibly upon the issues in this proceeding; that the importance of these questions pervades the entire spectrum of issues; and that fact-finding, public hearings as provided for in CAB regulations [302.14 and 399.61(c)], are an essential ingredient of this proceeding if an informed decision on the issues is to evolve.

4. That the CAB is completely out of touch with the real operational conduct of its carriers in this State; that that conduct as measured in terms of service, effort, concern, public interest and operational integrity is deplorable; and that these conditions must weigh heavily in the CAB's determination of its future course of action in the exercise of its jurisdiction.

5. That the recent mergers and purchases of CAB-regulated carriers engaged in Alaska air transportation appear to have led to a substantial deterioration of intrastate service to virtually all communities and areas except those major cities where competition exists in fact.

6. That a formal and thorough investigation into matters of rate levels, rate discrimination, other discriminatory practices, accounting practices relating to separation of scheduled air transportation activities from other activities, efficiency, claims and refund practices and other matters of similar nature of Wien Consolidated Airlines and Alaska Airlines should be initiated by the CAB on its own motion as a logical outgrowth of this Service Investigation.

7. That approximately 95 percent of the scheduled intrastate air service in Alaska is being provided directly or indirectly by carriers certificated by the CAB over routes authorized thereto by the CAB and thus far regulated exclusively by the CAB. This situation has outlived its justification and has become a substantial burden on the public of Alaska.

8. That the exercise of regulatory authority by the State of Alaska should be substantially extended (preferably in cooperation with the CAB) over intrastate routes and over all carriers serving such routes. Over those routes where it remains essential or otherwise desirable for the CAB to exercise primary jurisdiction, the machinery should be established for joint regulation by the CAB and the ATC, or in the alternative, regulation by the CAB upon consultation with the ATC.

9. That the practice whereby CAB-certificated carriers subcontract the scheduled performance of segments of their routes to local state-regulated carriers is not in the public interest. It is the position of this Commission that such subcontracts are unlawful and constitute a usurpation by the CAB carrier of the regulatory jurisdiction of this Commission.

10. That the contractual arrangements for the intrastate transportation of mail are outdated, inadequate and inappropriate. This matter needs a complete review toward the end of providing better service and adequate compensation to the carrier actually performing that service.

11. That matters relating to subsidy needs of, and payments to, carriers engaged in intrastate air service (including mail service) and the use to which such subsidies are put in competitive practices are of major concern to this Commission as well as to the CAB. A realistic and imaginative review should be made of the basis and need for subsidy and the qualifications for and the formulas under which subsidies should be paid.

12. That all carriers which serve Alaska and are regulated by the CAB, including those providing on-line interstate gateway service, should be required by the CAB to file concurrently with the ATC copies of all applications for routes, exemptions, tariff changes, transfers, and all other such documents which relate to Alaskan air commerce and which are filed with the CAB. It is essential that the State of Alaska be adequately and fully apprised of those matters affecting air commerce to and within the State.

13. That there is a serious need for closer cooperation and consultation between the CAB and the ATC. This Commission recognizes that the actions taken by each agency can, and frequently do, have a significant effect on those carriers regulated by the counterpart agency. The expertise, long experience and competent staff of the CAB could be of great benefit to this Commission. Similarly, this Commission could materially assist the CAB with its need for local information, surveillance and general local contact.

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

The foregoing summary delineates those matters upon which the Commission takes a position at this time. The body of this Position Paper elaborates on the points raised in the summary. It provides in greater specificity some of the more important reasons for stressing those points, and it develops in greater depth some rather compelling considerations involving jurisdiction and cooperation between the CAB and the ATC.

Submitted also are a number of exhibits in three separate series groups. The "100" series is composed of ATC requested or prepared exhibits presented primarily in an informational context. The "200" series contains published economic studies relating to the economy of individual communities or areas. The "300" series consists of statements, etc., pertaining primarily to sufficiency and standard of service.

So as not to unnecessarily burden this proceeding with repetitious evidence pertaining to sufficiency and standard of service, the Commission determined to present rather extensively the views of a single community as representative of prevailing views throughout the State. This approach presupposes, of course, that a substantial identity of view exists among people throughout the State as to compatibility of evidence. Indeed, after an extensive survey, the Commission found that such an identity or view does exist to a substantial degree.

The rather extensive written expressions received from the Bethel area (Exhibits ATC-300-312) are accordingly submitted as representative of views not only throughout the Wien Consolidated route system, but (to a slightly lesser degree) throughout Alaska Airlines' system as well. 1/

These expressions from Bethel form a major part of the ATC-300 series; the remainder of that series consists of a few typical written expressions from various other communities throughout the State. The Common elements in all these expressions will easily be noted.

1/ Views of the people of Anchorage and Fairbanks and their immediate environs were not surveyed and have not been considered in arriving at these conclusions.

The official position of this Commission is expressed in this Paper and comparison of that position with the community expressions in the ATC-300 series will indicate substantial identi y of view. In fact, this Paper will refer hereafter to some of those exhibits as supporting basis for various aspects of the Commission's position. The Commission does not necessarily concur in all of the community and individual views expressed in the ATC-200 and 300 series of exhibits.

THE ALASKA TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION, REGULATORY ARM OF THE STATE

The Alaska Transportation Commission was created as a separate and distinct State regulatory agency in 1966 (Chapter 139 SLA 1966, establishing Chapter AS 42.07). Prior to that time, the Alaska Air Commerce Act of 1960 was administered by the Alaska Public Service Commission. The ATC was substantially reorganized by Chapter 104 SLA 1969 in which a three-man Commission was provided in place of the previous two-man Commission.

The Commission is responsible for the administration and enforcement of the Alaska Air Commerce Act of 1960. As a general proposition, that Act provides for the regulation of air commerce within the State of Alaska in the public interest.

Three general classifications of air carrier are established by the State Air Commerce Act. They are the scheduled carrier, air taxi carrier, and the contract carrier. The Alaska law provides that for a carrier to engage in intrastate air commerce within the State, it must first be certificated by the Alaska Transportation Commission within one of these three general classifications.

In addition to certification, the Commission also regulates in varying degrees (depending upon the classification) the routes, rates, tariffs, safety of operations of aircraft, base of operations, etc., of intrastate air carriers.

The Commission also has the authority to grant exemptions to the certification requirements under specified conditions and for a limited period of time. In all cases, applications for new or revised authority must meet public convenience and necessity tests.

MORE THAN 75 PERCENT OF TOTAL PASSENGER TRAFFIC CARRIED BY CAB CARRIERS BETWEEN ALASKAN POINTS IS INTRASTATE -- THE SUBJECT OF STATE REGULATION

A review of the informational responses of Alaska Airlines and Wien Consolidated Airlines discloses that the vast majority of passengers carried between Alaskan points by CAB carriers is actually moving in intrastate commerce only.

Wien's Exhibit (WC-IR-201) containing O & D information for the month of October, 1969, shows that slightly over 90 percent of all of Wien's passenger load (including on-line and inter-line traffic) was intrastate only. And, if the number of interstate passengers who did not move intrastate beyond the points of entry into Alaska (other than between Juneau and Fairbanks) is subtracted, it can be seen that approximately 96 percent of the passenger movement over Wien's intrastate interior system was in no way involved in interstate commerce.

Similar information is not so easily developed for Alaska Airlines. However, a close examination of the Southeast Alaska network of Alaska Airlines reveals that at least as to that part of its system, the vast majority of the passenger movement between Southeast Alaska communities is strictly intrastate.

With some exceptions, Alaska Airlines did not disclose October, 1969, O & D information for most of its Southeast Alaska bush route system. However, from the information that was provided as well as other information available to this Commission including special O & D information requested by this Commission of Southeast Alaska air taxi subcontractors and other operators, it appears that over 90 percent of the scheduled inter-community passenger movement in Southeast Alaska in October, 1969, was intrastate.

Summer tourist traffic substantially increases the volume of interstate passengers moving between Alaskan points both in the Southeast Alaska system of Alaska Airlines and over the system of Wien Consolidated Airlines. The air tours offered by tour operators and the airlines bring a substantial influx of visitors to the State. The through-intrastate movement of these tourists, however, is generally limited to only the very few points covered in the tours.

It is also true that the summer movement of purely intrastate passengers increases very substantially. It can be seen, for example, in Exhibit ATC-105 that the Third Quarter Air Taxi passenger movement is more than twice that of the Second and Fourth Quarters, and more than three times that of the First Quarter. O & D information submitted by the carriers (to the extent that it can be so broken down) also indicates a much larger intrastate movement in the summer.

Thus the ratio of intrastate to interstate passenger traffic in the summer would probably be not less than 70 percent for the route systems discussed above.

ALL INTRA-ALASKA ROUTES REGULATED BY THE CAB REFLECT A MAJOR CAB-ATC JURISDICTIONAL OVERLAP

In most respects, the responsibilities and objectives of the Alaska Transportation Commission in intrastate air commerce matters are similar to those of the CAB in interstate air commerce matters.

Due to the long-standing and intimate involvement of the CAB in Alaska's air commerce, it would be impossible to draw a fine line between the jurisdiction of the CAB and the jurisdiction of this Commission. This ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION itself epitomizes the jurisdictional overlap in integration of federal and state regulatory practices and policies.

Excluding the Seattle/Portland gateway services, virtually all point to point service and routes being considered in this proceeding are intrastate in nature. With respect to much of this service, interstate commerce is incidental or insignificant compared with intrastate service requirements. It is estimated that carriers regulated primarily by the CAB provide in excess of 95 percent of the scheduled intrastate air service within Alaska. This appears to be a most unusual situation, as well as one of questionable validity, if the CAB jurisdiction is exercised unilaterally.

It follows that in Alaska where air transportation is one of the most important transportation modes and a basic necessity to the entire economy of the State, it is essential that the State exercise major, if not primary, regulatory jurisdiction.

EXCLUSIVE CAB REGULATION OF SPECIFIC INTRASTATE AIR ROUTES AND CARRIERS HAS PROVEN TO BE NON-RESPONSIVE TO THE NEEDS OF LARGE SEGMENTS OF THE STATE

The matter of the exercise of so broad a jurisdiction by the CAB over intrastate routes is not in and of itself the major problem. What is unfortunate, however, is the unresponsiveness of this arrangement to the needs and complaints of the people who are presumably being served. It appears that the remoteness of the CAB from the area of operations of its regulated carriers substantially influences the objectives of the CAB in its regulatory policy as applied to intra-Alaskan services. This remoteness tends to insulate the CAB from operational and service matters (other than those which may be called to its attention by the carriers), the result being that the Board primarily concerns itself about only those problems, such as subsidy payments, which are its direct and exclusive responsibility. It appears that with respect to Alaskan carriers the overriding objective of the CAB is, and has for some time been, the elimination of subsidies with all possible dispatch.

There is little doubt that this primary objective is being achieved. However, it is also quite apparent to anyone familiar with Alaskan air transportation services that this primary objective is being achieved at great sacrifice in public service.

The CAB cannot be totally unaware of the vast deterioration in intra-Alaska air service over the past three or four years. But, it seems certain that the Board does not fully recognize or appreciate the magnitude and implications of these conditions.

THE DOMINANT OBJECTIVE IN THIS PROCEEDING -- REASONABLE ADEQUACY AND PERFORMANCE OF CARRIER SERVICE; THE APPROACH TO ACHIEVING THAT OBJECTIVE -- JOINT INVESTIGATION AND REGULATION

The instigation of the ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION is unquestionably an important and commendable undertaking by the CAB. However, the issues which have been delineated by the Board reflect a continuing and virtually exclusive preoccupation with the subsidy issue and a most unfortunate lack of appreciation for the standards and adequacy of service.

It is the position of this Commission, however, that the adequacy and standards of service dominate as issues and the Board should and must consider them in this proceeding. Assuming the accuracy of this contention, it becomes at once apparent that there are major deficiencies in the procedures adopted by the CAB in this Service Investigation.

We call the Board's attention to the provisions of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 USC 1324), titled Cooperation With State Aeronautical Agencies:

> "(b) The Board is empowered to confer with or to hold joint hearings with any State aeronautical agency, or other State agency, in connection with any matter arising under this chapter within its jurisdiction, and to avail itself of the cooperation, services, records, and facilities of such State agencies as fully as may be practicable in the administration and the enforcement of this chapter."

We cannot conceive of a more appropriate occasion for the Board to have implemented the above quoted statute than the instant proceeding. The fact that it did not do so strongly suggests that the Board considered this Service Investigation to be little more than a fairly routine route proceeding. And, perhaps having little more to go on than the carriers' side of the story, the Board could justify that conclusion. However, even if it were routine, the fact that so great a proportion of the routes under investigation are primarily intrastate in nature, should have been sufficient for the Board to have proposed a joint board proceeding. It is elementary that the role of this Commission as simply a party in this proceeding effectively precludes participation by the State in the decisions affecting nearly all scheduled service in intrastate air commerce.

The Commission recognizes that the CAB has not specifically made an issue of the bush route services to those communities listed in Appendix C, but not shown in Appendices A and B, of CAB Order 69-3-68. Nor has the CAB determined to take up the issue of the relative jurisdiction of the CAB and this Commission. However, these issues are necessarily an integral part of this proceeding and, as previously stated, the issue of adequacy and standards of service over the bush route segments of the CAB carriers' authority is one of the dominant issues to be considered. It can be seen that these issues are interrelated. The exclusive regulatory jurisdiction heretofore exercised by the CAB over the Alaska routes has not resulted in reasonably satisfactory or adequate service to most of the communities in the State.

Additionally, the broad assumption of regulatory jurisdiction on an exclusive basis by the CAB seriously subverts effective local regulation. It encourages CAB regulated carriers to avoid state regulation and to look only to the CAB for route changes, tariff changes, etc. (See, for example, Exhibit ATC 104). The State seldom receives timely notice of such requests.

HEARING PROCEDURES ADOPTED BY THE CAB IN THIS INVESTIGATION PRECLUDE AN ADEQUATE EVIDENTIARY RECORD ON DOMINANT ISSUES -- ATC PUBLIC HEARINGS MAY PARTIALLY REMEDY THIS PROBLEM

In a proceeding such as this ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION, where historical carrier performance is a matter of major significance, it is imperative that the consumer public be liberally afforded an opportunity to speak its piece.

Unfortunately, the restriction to a formal hearing process sans less formal public participation effectively thwarts this objective. It is well known that a good cross section of public opinion cannot be obtained in a matter of this sort without holding public, forum-type hearings.

To partially remedy the public participation problem, this Commission belatedly requested and was granted (with concurrence of all other parties) an extension of time in which to conduct open public hearings on its own and outside the CAB record.

During the latter part of February and early March, 1969, the ATC held open, public, forum-type hearings throughout the State and made numerous personal contacts with people throughout the State for the purpose of determining (1) the major concerns and views of the community in regard to air transportation and (2) the manner in which the people of this State may be better served in air commerce.

Hearings were held at the following places: Barrow, Kotzebue, Nome, Unalakleet, Andreafski (St. Mary's), Bethel, Dillingham, King Salmon, Kodiak, Kenai, Cordova, Valdez, Tok, Fort Yukon, Haines, Sitka, Juneau, Petersburg, Wrangell, and Ketchikan. Each of these hearings was conducted by one or more of the three Commissioners. The time, place and nature of these hearings was noticed in advance by public media and individual correspondence although notice was necessarily very short. There were in attendance from a handful to forty or more people at each hearing. Anyone who desired to speak was permitted to do so. All testimony was recorded and most of these recordings were subsequently reviewed by the Commissioners. Portions thereof were transcribed for further, more detailed review.

People attending these hearings were encouraged to submit their views in writing and a fair representation did so.

Based upon these hearings, letters and numerous other contacts with people throughout the State, the Commission has determined that there are major and inexcusable deficiencies in the service provided by those CAB carriers serving intra-Alaska routes. This is poignantly clear in the so-called bush route areas. Such matters as extreme delays in mail and freight deliveries; inexcusable schedule delays or cancellations; inability to have claims and refunds settled within several months of filing; frequent and unannounced schedule changes; untrained personnel; discriminatory rates and improper charges; commonplace misinformation on flight arrivals and departures; frequent frustration in attempting to make interline connections; substantial failure to meet published departure and arrival times; inability of local people to obtain space on flights to and from tourist centers because all seats booked solid for several days at a time by tour passengers; the frequent unavailability of scheduled flights theoretically being performed by subcontractors, etc., were common complaints throughout the State. Most of these problems are presented in varying forms in Exhibit 300 series statements.

THE ALASKA TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION RECOMMENDS THAT THE ALASKA HEARINGS TO BE CONDUCTED BY THE CAB EXAMINER BE BROADENED IN SCOPE TO INCLUDE A PUBLIC EXPRESSION MISSION

It is the conviction of this Commission that the service conditions previously enumerated do predominate in most areas of the State. However, we do not presume complete agreement by the carriers involved.

Therefore, the ATC strongly urges that the forthcoming hearings to be held by the CAB in Alaska should likewise be of a nature that would allow general public participation and oral testimony.

CARRIER MERGERS AND CONSOLIDATIONS APPEAR TO HAVE LED TO MAJOR DETERIORATION OF INTRASTATE SERVICE THROUGHOUT THE STATE

Within the last three years there have been several mergers and purchases of CAB certificated carriers serving Alaska. In very brief summary, these mergers and consolidations were:

1. Wien Airlines and Northern Consolidated Airlines to form Wien Consolidated Airlines, Inc., April, 1968.

2. Western Airlines purchased Pacific Northern Airlines, July, 1967.

3. Alaska Airlines with Cordova Airlines, and with Alaska Coastal Ellis Airlines, surviving as Alaska Airlines, Inc., February and March, 1968.

There appears to be a direct correlation between the merger of the larger CAB carriers serving Alaska and the deterioration in air service to outlying communities and areas.

Western Airlines, for example, has been systematically ridding itself of what might be properly termed "local service obligations." It has suspended its service to King Salmon, Cordova, and Yakutat. It seeks to rid itself of its route between Anchorage, Kenai, Homer and Kodiak. In essence, it appears that Western's real objective in absorbing Pacific Northern Airlines was to acquire only the high-traffic-density, Seattle/Portland gateway routes to Alaska, and to succeed to the favored position of PNA in its application for Anchorage-Hawaii authority as consolidated in the Trans-Pacific Route Investigation.

Having accomplished these objectives, Western Airlines now shows no interest in the air service needs of the remainder of those communities previously served by PNA.

Alaska Airlines, in its two mergers, has gained access to the Anchorage-Juneau-Sitka-Seattle-Portland market. Ketchikan has not yet been added to this service route by the CAB, but the result of this omission has been the creation of some abnormal and unsatisfactory scheduling and service conditions in the Ketchikan, Juneau, Sitka feeder service from other Southeastern Alaska communities.

In essence, what the CAB has done in Southeast Alaska over the last five years is to substitute in substantial part Alaska Airlines and Wien Consolidated Airlines for Pan American World Airways in the interstate service to Southeast Alaska. This substitution has never met the approval of the people of this area.

Alaska Airlines inherited by its merger a multiplicity of intra-Southeast Alaska routes. Many of the services previously provided by Alaska Coastal Ellis Airlines have been discontinued by Alaska Airlines entirely. A large number of the remaining point to point routes which Alaska purportedly continues to serve are in fact served by air taxi operators under subcontract with Alaska Airlines (Exhibit ATC-103).

It was anticipated that the merger of Wien Airlines and Northern Consolidated Airlines would provide a materially strengthened carrier which would result in a better service to the public than either carrier was capable of providing individually.

Unfortunately, the emerged carrier, while providing more sophisticated equipment and service to the large competitive markets, has retracted its service to the outlying communities. In markets where Wien Consolidated is not competing with another carrier, its service and performance have deteriorated markedly.

Between 1957 (the first year Northern Consolidated subcontracted out part of its route) and November 1, 1967, Northern Consolidated and Wien Alaska subcontracted a total of 34 points on their routes. Since May 1, 1969, Wien Consolidated has subcontracted thirty additional points (Exhibit ATC-103).

The inverse relationship between mergers and deteriorating service to outlying communities appears to be a very real one. Apparently when a carrier reaches substantial size, gains access to major markets, and places into operation sophisticated jet equipment, it loses its interest and perhaps capability to provide adequate service over marginal routes.

Unfortunately, the bush-level scheduled carriers, which develop from these circumstances, do not inherit any of the better traffic markets because those markets are already occupied by the large carriers.

CAB CARRIER SUBCONTRACTS ARE UNLAWFUL AND CONTRARY TO PUBLIC INTEREST

Wien and Alaska have submitted into the record copies of their agreements with air taxis under which the latter provide local scheduled service. Exhibit ATC-103 graphically portrays the networks of such service routes. In each case, the subcontractor is a State-certificated air taxi operator. However, only two of the fifteen subcontractors are certificated by the State as scheduled carriers. And, even in those instances where the subcontractor is certificated to provide scheduled service, many of the points listed in his State route authority are different from those he serves under subcontract.

Further investigation also reveals that the subcontractor generally serves the contract points both as a scheduled carrier and as an air taxi operator. In many instances, the volume of traffic carried as an air taxi to such points substantially exceeds the volume carried as the subcontractor. It may be that in many such cases traffic which the subcontractor is carrying under the contract limited to multiple coupon, involving travel over more than one ice leg.

Air taxi operators are required by State law to charge only those rates which have filed with this Commission. It is immaterial whether service is being provided on a trip by trip basis or under a long-term contract.

Thus, for such an operator to comply with the laws of the State of Alaska as to the charges which he may make, he cannot charge the rates and the tariffs of the CAB contracting carrier, unless such rates happen to coincide with those of the air taxi operator which are on file.

Under some of the contracts the operator is paid a flat hourly rate by the mainline carrier irrespective of the number of passengers, volume of freight, etc. The mainline carrier then collects its tariff rates from the sub's passengers and shippers.

Other subcontractors apparently collect and keep as their compensation the published CAB tariff rates of the mainline carrier.

The air taxi operator's tariff normally reflects hourly rates. The cost per passenger would depend on the number of passengers travelling between two given points on the same flight. Thus it would appear that there is only one point in the passenger-time relationship at which the air taxi rate per passenger could be the same as the passenger rate of the scheduled CAB carrier.

This subcontract approach is even further clandestine in that the CAB carrier, rather than this Commission, makes the determination as to which, if any, local Alaska certificated carriers will become scheduled carriers and will be allowed to carry mail for compensation. This leads to an unhealthy control by a major airline of the independent operations of locally-certificated carriers. It also leads to a reduction in competition and service through a mutual arrangement not to compete. Although the CAB regulated carrier remains ultimately responsible for the actions and performance of the subcontractor, they in fact exercise no supervision over the sub, do not know what the sub is doing or not doing, and apparently couldn't care less. With many of the subcontractors, the only scheduled service provided occurs on mail flights (if there is room) and mail is delivered sporadically.

One further point should be made before leaving the matter of subcontracts. There is no assurance that a contract will not be terminated on short notice; or that it will be renewed upon expiration; or that it will not be given to a different local operator; or that the CAB carrier itself will not terminate the contract and initiate the service itself. Thus, the State-certificated operator builds his operation and his capability with no assurance that he may continue to provide that service for any length of time.

The CAB carrier is neither qualified nor authorized to designate local carriers upon which it will bestow operating privileges within this State.

There have been numerous complaints to the effect that some subcontractors of CAB carriers are providing poor, sporadic, inadequate and unsatisfactory service to the people they supposedly serve. These conditions add emphasis to the impropriety of the route subcontracts.

IT APPEARS THAT THE AIR TAXI OPERATORS, PARTICULARLY IN SOUTHEAST ALASKA, NOW PROVIDE THE ONLY DEPENDABLE BUSH ROUTE SERVICE

The Commission has requested confidential O & D information of Southeast Alaska air taxi operators for the months of August and October, 1969. The response to this request was sufficient to indicate that the air taxi operators are now carrying a very substantial percentage of the passenger traffic between communities presumably being served by Alaska Airlines.

The response to the Commission's request represents about one-third of the total volume of passenger movement by air taxi operators. The information submitted shows a weighted average of approximately 60 percent of the passenger load carried by the responding air taxi operators in the Third Quarter of 1969 as passengers moving between points on Alaska Airlines' scheduled route. It is believed that this average may be somewhat high as a reflection of the total Southeast Alaska air taxi movement. However, even if the percentage was reduced to 44 percent (the lowest of the reporting operators) it would mean that in the Third Quarter of 1969 air taxi operators in Southeast Alaska transported approximately 26,000 passengers between points listed on Alaska Airlines' scheduled route. This matter is well highlighted by the fact that Alaska Airlines in its informational response (IR-AS-1) shows the number of O & D coupon passengers carried by it between Juneau and Hoonah in the month of August, 1969, as 184. However, one air taxi operator alone shows a total of 840 passengers transported between Juneau and Hoonah during the same month.

It is the Commission's belief that these circumstances vividly reflect a virtually-complete abandonment by Alaska Airlines of its responsibilities under its CAB certificate to provide a dependable scheduled service to these outlying communities. In essence, the people of Southeast Alaska must look to the air taxi operator if they are going to receive a modicum of dependable service between the communities of Southeast Alaska.

The extent to which the results of the Commission's survey in Southeastern Alaska can be translated to other areas of the State is not known. However, the Commission has received considerable indication that the ratios may be similar in the Northwest, Southwest, and Interior areas as shown in Exhibit ATC 105.

UNILATERAL DECISION BY THE CAB WOULD BE IMPROPER IN THIS PROCEEDING

As procedural matters now stand, the decision in this Service Investigation is to be made unilaterally by the CAB.

This approach places the Alaska Transportation Commission in a rather unique position (since it is the regulatory body on the State level). As pointed out earlier in the text of this Paper, the regulatory jurisdiction of the State is at least as substantial as that of the CAB.

Therefore, what the Commission is apparently being asked to do is decide for itself the issues in this proceeding without benefit of the evidentiary record and briefs and thereupon make its recommendations to the CAB as would any other party.

Such an approach, even if it were practical, would serve little purpose. It is essential that the jurisdictional questions be squarely faced and the utmost in cooperative effort be pursued by both the CAB and the ATC. This Commission currently has in its files a substantial number of applications for intrastate scheduled authority. The Commission has deferred consideration of all such applications (upon which hearings have not been held in the past six months) pending the outcome of this ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION. Even where hearings had been held previous to this policy decision, the granting of authority where warranted by the public convenience and necessity has been limited to a one-year period.

It is intended by the Commission to systematically review the scheduled service requirements of limited geographical areas in a series of State area service investigations and to provide for the certificated service so badly needed in many areas of the State.

It would be a complete frustration of regulatory responsibility if the CAB and the ATC failed to integrate their efforts in these matters which so vitally affect the public interest.

This letter was sent to applicant air carriers representing 13 docketed applications for intrastate scheduled carrier authority.

SUBJECT: Your Application for Scheduled Carrier Authority -- Docket No. _____.

Dear Mr.

The purpose of this letter is to inform you as to the status of your subject Docketed Application for Scheduled Air Carrier authority.

As you may already know the Commission is a party in the ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION of the Civil Aeronautics Board, Docket No. 20826. Upon a close investigation, we believe that the issues in the CAB proceeding touch upon all existing or proposed scheduled service between all points within the State. We have, therefore, taken the position that neither the CAB nor this Commission should act wholly unilaterally in developing an adequate, efficient, feasible and statewide intrastate network of scheduled service

In keeping with this policy the Commission has for the last several months deferred final consideration of all new applications for scheduled service not previously acted upon unless such deferral would create a serious public hardship in a particular case or the application may otherwise be non-controversial. We intend to continue this policy of deferral over the next few months, at least until the direction the AIASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION is going to take has been demonstrated.

It is the contention of this Commission that much of the intrastate service such as that for which you have applied is and should be regulated by the State. At the same time, the Commission recognizes that a proliferation of numerous intrastate scheduled carriers could significantly affect the operations of the carriers heretofore regulated exclusively by the CAB. We believe the public interest demands that the regulatory efforts of the Federal and State governments be substantially coordinated to avoid duplication of effort, conflicting decisions and objectives, adverse effects on the carriers and the public, etc.

This Commission has therefore placed itself in a posture whereby such coordination and joint effort can be accomplished. We are assuming, of course, that the CAB is similarly interested in such cooperation and coordination.

At such time as these applications for scheduled service are again considered (hopefully within the next few months) we propose to initiate local area service investigations for the purpose of developing an adequate, viable, feasible network of local carriers. This program will be preceded by a rule-making proceeding for the purpose of adopting guideline regulations and to give the industry and public an opportunity to be heard on the procedure, problems and objectives.

We appreciate your continued patience and understanding in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

George Benesch

An examination by the staff of the Alaska Transportation Commission as of May 4, 1970, shows that the matters set forth below are pending before the Commission.

There follows hereinafter an analysis of these pending matters. The analysis attempts to group the matters so as to reflect the type of issues and problems involved. It further attempts to explain the general nature of each group and seeks to explain the responsibility of the Commission in deciding these matters so that reasonable time factors can be applied to the determination of each group of matters.

1. Contested Matters: This class of cases involves applications for permanent authority to operate air taxi, scheduled carrier, and contract carrier in air commerce; applications for temporary and emergency temporary authority for operation as an air taxi, scheduled carrier, and contract carrier in air commerce; applications for permanent and temporary authority for what are known as common carriers - freight, common carriers - passenger, and contract carrier - freight, in motor carrier commerce. Other classes of cases involve authority to operate air cushion vehicles and water carrier (ferry) vessels. Each of these cases has been protested by one or more individuals or companys and each application will require public hearing estimated to average from 4 to 5 days.

   Contested cases requiring hearing 87

2. Uncontested Matters: This class of cases involves matters in which there have been no formal protests but in which either an informal or formal hearing will be required by the Commission in order to determine whether it is in the public interest to authorize either air, surface, air cushion, or water (ferry) carriage. This class of cases also includes those matters in which formal oral argument is required by the Commission on either or both contested cases (which have been heard) or uncontested cases.

   Hearings on uncontested cases or cases which require argument and Commission decision 66

3. Other Matters: This class of cases involves matters which require Commission study and perhaps additional hearings (not included above). These cases involve such matters as complaints alleging violations of the transportation law, requests for interpretations of the law, review of policy determinations made by prior Commissions, review of the operation and practices of operating carriers in which the public interest is involved.

Cases involving so-called Other Matters 13

4. Pending Decisions: This class of cases involves matters that have been heard by the Commission and cases which have not required a public hearing but which require the study, examination and exercise of judgment and discretion of the Commission. In all cases formally or informally heard by the Commission under the present law it is necessary for each Commissioner to fully study and analyse the record and all exhibits presented before entering into conference for decision.

Cases involving Pending Decisions 6

5. Special Matters:

(a) The Commission during the past several months has held over 20 hearings throughout the state in connection with the Civil Aeronautics Board's Alaska Service Investigation (Air Route Investigation). These hearings have averaged from 2 to 4 days per hearing (including travel time). Upcoming are six hearings within Alaska and at least two hearings in Washington, D.C. (Please see explanation of the nature and scope of these hearings, supra). These hearings are policy making in nature and hearing officers would not be able to attend to these matters nor exercise the discretion and judgment required.

Estimated time for CAB hearings	30 days
Estimated time for briefing and argument	30 days

(b) The transportation industry of Alaska has changed dramatically during the last few years. The industry is no longer a 'small-time' matter. Regulations of the Transporation Commission as they now exist were based on a much smaller and less complicated industry. The regulations have proven to be grossly inadequate and incomplete to meet the needs of our modern and growing industry. This fact is widely known throughout the industry particularly among attorneys practicing within this field. The regulations must be completely revised. Revision of regulations of the transportation industry is a vast and major task. There is no provision under the law for this task to be accomplished by other than the Commission itself. The revision necessary of regulations governing air, motor carrier (freight and passenger), air cushion vehicles and water (ferry) carriers will require extensive research and study and may take as long as one year. This work must be performed by the Commission because these regulations involve many involved issues of policy, practice and procedure. Work on this revision of regulations which is very immediately necessary will require time that is now devoted to the hearing of cases.

Estimated time for revision of regulations 1 year

(c) In addition to revision of the transportation regulations there is an urgent need for a reclassification of carriers within each of the groups, i.e., air, surface, air cushion and water. The Commission now has planned at least three reclassification hearings. These hearings will involve the taking of testimony from all interested members of the industry, and the public.

Estimated time for reclassification hearings 30 days

BEFORE THE

CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD

WASHINGTON, D. C.

ALASKA SERVICE INVESTIGATION DOCKET 20826

PETITION BY ALASKA TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION FOR JOINT BOARD PROCEEDING

COMES NOW the ALASKA TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION (ATC) and petitions the Civil Aeronautics Board to implement the provisions of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 USC 1324) which authorize the C.A.B. to hold joint hearings and otherwise perform such acts, to issue such orders and to make such procedure as necessary to carry out the provisions of the Act relating to cooperation with State regulatory agencies; and in keeping with the objectives of such provisions, the ATC petitions the C.A.B. to reconstitute the Alaska Service Investigation as a Joint Board proceeding to be conducted and decided jointly by the C.A.B. and the ATC.

In support of its petition, the ATC respectfully states as follows:

I

The ATC is the duly constituted regulatory agency of the State of Alaska as provided by law (Chapter AS 42.07); and as such, is the agency responsible for the regulation of intrastate air commerce under the Alaska Air Commerce Act, Chapter AS 02.05.

II

The ATC is presently a party intervenor in the Alaska Service Investigation and as such is limited to participation on the evidence-producing level and to making recommendations to the C.A.B. without first having benefit of a complete record.

III

Approximately 95 percent of all scheduled intrastate air service in Alaska is provided by air carriers regulated exclusively by the C.A.B.; and between approximately 75 and 95 percent of all traffic moving between points in Alaska is intrastate rather than interstate movement and subject to regulation by the State.

IV

The ATC has conducted informal public hearings throughout Alaska in connection with the Alaska Service Investigation. It has done this as a response to numerous requests of the public for such hearings and by virtue of the commendable understanding of the Board's Hearing Examiner in the Alaska Service Investigation who granted an extension of time to the Commission for this purpose. (All parties concurred in an extension of time substantially as requested by this Commission.) As a result of such hearings, and the Commission's additional investigations and familiarity with the intrastate air commerce needs of Alaska, the Commission has submitted, as a direct exhibit, a Position Paper directed primarily to the matters of CAB-ATC jurisdiction, regulatory objectives, and essentiality of substantially closer cooperation between the C.A.B. and this Commission. The summary of this Position Paper is attached to this petition and by reference made a part of this petition in support thereof.

V

It is essential that the jurisdictional questions be squarely faced and the utmost in cooperative effort be pursued by both the C.A.B and the ATC. This Commission currently has in its files a substantial number of applications for intrastate scheduled authority. The Commission has deferred consideration of all such applications (upon which hearings have not been held in the past six months) pending the outcome of this Alaska Service Investigation. Even where hearings had been held previous to this policy decision, the granting of authority where warranted by the public convenience and necessity has been limited to a one-year period.

It is presently intended by the Commission to systematically review the scheduled service requirements of limited geographical areas in a series of State regional service investigations and to provide for certificated service as needed in the many areas of the State.

If the C.A.B. and the ATC failed to integrate their efforts in these matters which so vitally affect the public interest, effective regulation would be very substantially frustrated.

The ATC recognizes that these matters and this petition should have been submitted to the C.A.B. at a much earlier stage in the Alaska Service Investigation proceeding (ideally at its inception or at least prior to the prehearing conference).

Unfortunately, this was not possible. The Commission was completely reorganized by repeal and reenactment of the Alaska Transportation Commission Act in May 1969 (Chapter 104, SLA 1969).

The policy developed herein is that of the new three-man Commission which Commission was not complete until January 1970. (Only one of the present three Commissioners was appointed to office prior to the prehearing conference in September 1969.)

It is the Commission's belief, however, that the Alaska Service Investigation proceeding can still be restructured as a Joint Board proceeding even at this less timely stage particularly since no new issues will be added to delay the present proceeding schedule.

WHEREFORE, the Alaska Transportation Commission respectfully requests the Civil Aeronautics Board to reconsider the unilateral nature of the Alaska Service Investigation and to more appropriately in the overall interest of the public, reconstitute it as a Joint Board proceeding by the C.A.B. and the ATC.

Respectfully submitted,

G. KENT EDWARDS

PREFACE

The discussions contained in this publication were presented in a Conference on Challenges to Collective Bargaining held in Honolulu, Hawaii on August 11, 1967. The Conference was held under the auspices of the Labor-Management Education Program of the University of Hawaii. Both the Conference and this publication were made possible by funds allotted under Title I of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

The basic theme to which the discussions were directed was that changes are required in our attitudes, our concepts, and our laws, in order to deal effectively with new problems arising in labor-management relations in both the public and private sectors. The material in this volume makes a useful contribution to public understanding of many of the complex issues involved.

A New Approach to Strikes in Public Employment

Jack Stieber

The U. S. Department of Labor reported 142 work stoppages in public employment last year, involving 105,000 workers who were idled for 455,000 days. This made 1966 the biggest year, by far, for strikes in Government. There were more than three times as many strikes as in 1965 and more than twice as many as in the previous peak year of 1952 during the Korean War. All but nine of the strikes in 1966 were in local government, with schools, sanitation, protection services, and hospitals and other health services, in that order, accounting for close to 90 percent of the total. There were only two stoppages in public transportation, including the celebrated New York City transit strike in January, but they caused more than half of all time lost due to government strikes in 1966. In addition to reported stoppages, which include only those involving six or more workers and lasting at least one day or shift, there were undoubtedly others of a few hours duration, not to mention mass resignations by teachers and nurses, "reporting sick," "work-ins" and other strike substitutes. This article will deal primarily with the strike problem at the local level where it is most pressing.

While still insignificant in number of strikes, workers involved, and days lost, as compared with any other industry, strikes in public employment pose a major problem in labor-management relations in the United States today. There are several reasons why so few strikes should occasion so much concern.

First, all strikes in government are in violation of the law. They are specifically prohibited by the Taft-Hartley Act, by all states which have public employment relations laws, and by numerous court decisions. The willingness of so many otherwise law-abiding citizens to violate and defy the law poses a moral issue as well as a practical problem of how to deal with such stoppages.

Second, many government services are vital to the normal functioning of the community. Strikes by policemen, fire fighters, and prison guards are intolerable and even the organizations to which these employees belong do not assert the right to strike. Strikes in hospitals, sanitation, and public utilities may present a threat to health or safety if they last more than a few days. Public transit, especially in a few large cities, is so important to the convenience and economic well-being of the people that many would classify it as an essential service. And, strikes which close schools disrupt the social, economic and emotional lives of more people than almost any other kind of work stoppage.

Third, strikes in public employment are bound to increase because government is the largest and fastest-growing industry in the United States and public employees are joining unions at a rapid rate. In October 1966 there were 11½ million government employees--2.9 million Federal, 2.2 million state and 6.4 million local. This total is expected to grow to 15 million by 1975 when one out of every five employees will be working in government. In the AFL-CIO, almost the only unions which are growing rapidly are those operating in government. The American Federation of Government Employees, which organizes Federal employees, claims 250,000 members; the State, County and Municipal Employees, 350,000; and the Teachers' Union, 132,000; increases of 300 to 500 percent for each union over the last decade. Equally important are professional associations which, under pressure from union competition, act more and more like unions. The largest and most powerful of these is the million member National Education Association and its state and local affiliates. To most people, employee organization and strike go together and there is nothing in the record of recent years to dissuade them of this belief.

Actually, concern over the strike issue has overshadowed the great progress that has been made in public employee-management relations in the last few years. The 1960's have already earned a place in labor relations history as the decade of the public employee. Executive Order 10988 signed by President Kennedy in 1962; comprehensive state laws in Wisconsin, Michigan, New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Delaware and Minnesota and more limited laws in other states; and municipal ordinances in a number of the largest cities, including New York, Philadelphia and Cincinnati, have finally given government employees rights accorded to private employees thirty years ago: the right to join unions, to have their organizations recognized by employers, and to negotiate over wages, hours and conditions of employment. All the state laws have been passed or substantially liberalized since 1960 and every year finds additional states added to the roster of those with public employment relations laws. However, most states still have no statutes dealing specifically with public employees and a number of others expressly prohibit collective bargaining in government or have declared negotiated agreements to be unenforceable.

Because strikes are prohibited, the states with public employment relations laws have recognized a special responsibility to develop procedures to resolve impasses in negotiations. The principal methods used are mediation and, if that fails, fact-finding with public recommendations. Wisconsin has had the most experience with fact-finding. Between 1962 and 1966, fact-finders were appointed in 38 disputes and their recommendations served as the basis for settlement in 70 percent of the cases. Michigan, whose law was passed in 1965, has resorted to fact-finding in some 50 disputes, with salutary results. Arbitration is provided in most states only at the request of the parties, although a few prescribe compulsory arbitration for disputes involving policemen, fire fighters and public utilities.

Most negotiations in public as in private employment are resolved by the parties with or without the assistance of government mediators. The use of fact-finding--a procedure which is reserved for emergency disputes in private industry but is available in even the smallest and most inconsequential public dispute under most state laws--will result in settlement of all but a few really hard-core disputes. But what about impasses after all efforts to resolve the dispute have failed? Should public employee organizations be denied the ultimate weapon which is available to unions in private industry? What should be done about employees who strike in violation of the law? These questions have aroused great passions among some public employee unions and have led to considerable disagreement among impartial experts in the industrial relations field.

With respect to the second question, the trend is away from laws calling for automatic dismissal or other severe penalties, including re-employment only under extremely harsh conditions, for striking public employees. Experience has shown such laws to be ineffective because elected public officials will almost never invoke them. This was the case in New York under the Condon-Wadlin Act and in Michigan under the old Hutchinson Act. Most states with statutes governing labor relations in public employment do not specify automatic penalties for employees who violate the law by striking. However, the 1965 Michigan law states that a public employer may discipline a striking employee up to and including discharge, and the New York State law, passed in 1967 over bitter union opposition, provides penalties against unions rather than employees. The New York law calls for injunctions to halt public employee strikes and prescribes fines against unions that disobey such court orders, equal to one week's membership dues or $10,000, whichever is less, for each day that the strike continues.

Some of those who oppose a blanket prohibition on strikes in government argue that there cannot be genuine collective bargaining without the right to strike. Take away the strike threat and employers, public and private alike, will realize that they have the upper hand and not engage in real collective bargaining. Unions can cite case after case in which a government employer contended he could not negotiate certain issues but changed his tune quickly when a strike was threatened or actually called. Then, apparently, unsurmountable obstacles to negotiation seemed to fade away and an agreement was reached in short order.

Others consider it illogical and inequitable to deny the right to strike to government employees when it is not denied to employees in private industry doing the same work. Thus, the government, at one level or another, owns and operates printing plants, electric utilities, transit facilities, hospitals, cafeterias, liquor stores and other establishments which are indistinguishable in almost every way from similar facilities in the private sector. In some cases, direct public employment shades over into government-owned but privately-operated enterprises. In atomic installations, for example, collective bargaining modeled on the private sector has been permitted, including strikes, although the operation is wholly financed with public funds. Looking at the problem in another way, one may ask why clerks and office workers in the state capitol or in the highway authority should be prohibited from striking, while electric utility, transit or even hospital employees may strike as long as they work for private employers. Surely, the services supplied by the first group of public employees are less essential to the community than those furnished by the second group of private employees.

Those who support the prohibition against all government strikes do so primarily on three grounds: (1) fear that the principle of sovereignty will be imperilled by legalizing any strikes in government, (2) difficulty in differentiating between essential and non-essential activities, and (3) belief that the strike is an economic weapon which, in government, is not matched by countervailing power normally available in private industry.

The sovereignty doctrine holds that any strike of public employees is an attack upon the state and a challenge to government authority. It has been used for many years and is still cited in some states to deny government employees the right to bargain collectively. However meaningful state sovereignty may be to political scientists, it carries little weight with government employees when it comes to their relationship to the state as employer. Secretary of Labor Wirtz put it succinctly when he said: "This doctrine is wrong in theory; what's more, it won't work." It is interesting to note that other countries do not regard all strikes by government employees as a threat to state sovereignty. Most West European countries limit but do not prohibit all public employee strikes and, in 1966, Canada passed a law which expressly permits Federal employees to strike. The Canadian statute gives unions of government employees a choice between compulsory arbitration or strike action in the event of an impasse in negotiations. The union must indicate which course it will follow at the beginning of each negotiation and may not alter its choice throughout that negotiation.

The essential versus non-essential services approach to government employee stoppages has usually been rejected because of the difficulty of classifying activities in each category. Furthermore, this approach would have to take into account the distribution of employment at the local level, where most all government strikes have occurred. Of the 6.4 million local government employees, more than 3½ million are employed in schools--2.3 million as teachers and 1.2 million in non-instructional activities. An additional 1.6 million are employed in police and fire protection, public welfare, hospitals and health, sanitation, correctional institutions and public utilities. Only 1.3 million are engaged in activities that are clearly non-essential in the sense that interruption of service could be endured for an extended period without posing a threat to the health, safety or welfare of the populace. The employment distribution will, of course, vary from one community to another. It is clear from these statistics that, if it is to be meaningful, any law which limits the prohibition of strikes to essential government services would have to be narrowly construed and would certainly have to exclude schools, where more than half of all local government employees are concentrated. A law which extended the right to strike only to a small minority of all public employees, most of then unorganized and without the power to carry out a successful strike, would be a hoax.

While the classification of essential and non-essential services would be difficult, I am not convinced that it represents an insurmountable obstacle to legislation which would distinguish between prohibited and permissible stoppages in government employment. This is an administrative problem no more difficult than many others handled by government agencies, and particularly by the National Labor Relations Board in its day-to-day administration of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The third argument against relaxing the prohibition on government strikes is that public employers cannot long withstand stoppages which victimize the community. It is argued that private employers may resort to a variety of weapons to combat strikes: they may lock out their employees; try to operate with other workers; suspend operations, secure in the knowledge that pent-up demand or strike insurance will mitigate economic losses; or even go out of business entirely. The knowledge that potent weapons are available to the opposing sides exerts reciprocal pressures upon the parties to modify their positions to the extent necessary to bring about a settlement. Both unions and employers know from experience that jobs can and have been lost and markets seriously depleted as a result of strikes or settlements leading to non-competitive price increases.

The government employer is in an entirely different position. He cannot lock out his employees or decide to go out of business. Extended suspension of government services is not politically feasible. While government may, in an emergency, call upon the National Guard or the Army to perform certain essential services, this solution does not lend itself, even on a temporary basis, to such public services as education and hospital care. Besides, such action involves political risks which elected officials would be reluctant to take.

The economic and market pressures which operate upon unions and private employers do not usually exist in the public sector. Competitors will not teach children, write relief checks or provide case work services to welfare clients; consumers will not find ready substitutes or learn to do without garbage collection or medical care; excessive settlements will not price most government services out of the market, although the resulting tax increase may drive elected officials out of office.

Certainly there are important differences between strikes in government and work stoppages in private industry. At the same time, strikes by public and private employees have the same economic objectives--the improvement of wages, hours and working conditions. Given the low salaries and poor conditions which often characterize employment in our schools, hospitals, social agencies and other public services, one is loathe to deprive these employees of any legitimate weapon to improve their situation, unless it is clear that irreparable injury may result to the community at large.

The United States has come a long way in dealing with public employee-management relations during the last few years. Future progress will depend, in part, upon how we handle the difficult problem of public employee strikes. What are the lessons of past experience for future policy on this issue?

1. The right to join employee organizations and to negotiate with their employers through representatives of their own choosing should be guaranteed to all public employees at all levels of government, by Federal legislation, if necessary. Government employees in backward states should not be denied these fundamental rights.

2. Governments have a responsibility to promote settlements without interruption of public services. This includes provision for mediation and fact-finding with recommendations in all disputes in which an impasse has been reached in negotiations.

3. Employee organizations and public employers in all government services should be encouraged to develop their own procedures to resolve disputes without interruption of work, including the use of voluntary arbitration. Long experience in private industry has demonstrated that the parties are usually better satisfied with their own solutions than with those imposed from the outside.

4. Regardless of preventive measures or prohibitions and penalties provided by law, strikes in government will occur. Government policy towards such stoppages should take into account the nature of the service provided and the impact upon the public. There is no more reason to treat all strikes in government alike than there is to apply the same yardstick to all stoppages in private industry. Just as a work stoppage on the railroads or waterfront is handled differently from a strike in a widget factory, so should a strike of policemen or fire fighters be regarded differently from an interruption of service in state liquor stores.

5. Public services should be classified into three categories: those which cannot be given up for even the shortest period of time, those which can be interrupted for a limited period but not indefinitely, and those services in which work stoppages can be sustained for extended periods without serious effects on the community.

   –With respect to the first category, which in my opinion would include only police and fire protection and prisons, compulsory arbitration should be used to resolve negotiation impasses but only after all other methods have failed.

   –Strikes in the second group of services, which would include hospitals, public utilities, sanitation and schools, should not be prohibited but should be made subject to injunctive relief through the courts when they begin to threaten the health, safety, or welfare of the community. The courts, in deciding whether or not to issue injunctions, should consider the total equities in the particular case and should utilize their traditional right to adapt sanctions against those violating injunctions to the particular situation, as recommended in the report of the Advisory Committee on Public Employee Relations to Michigan Governor George Romney. The term "total equities" includes not only the impact of a strike on the public but also the extent to which employee organizations and public employers have met their statutory obligations.

   –Work stoppages in government activities which do not fall into either of the above classifications should be permitted on the same basis as in private industry.

These changes in public policy will come slowly, if at all. Experimentation with different approaches in the states is desirable and should be encouraged. Eventually, however, I believe that laws dealing with employee-management relations in government will tend towards greater uniformity because the nature of public employment differs little among states, and employee organizations, which are national in scope, will insist on equality of treatment for all government employees.

Can Collective Bargaining Deal Effectively with Problems Created by Automation?

Theodore W. Kheel

If anyone in the audience is kind enough to say that he is disappointed that I cannot be with you today, I assure you his distress in no way compares with my own. I looked forward to this conference with great expectations and planned to come early and leave late. I was last in Hawaii 49 years ago and I still have a vivid recollection of its loveliness. I wanted to return to verify the memories I have carried with me all these years.

The beginning of the end of my revisit occurred at 4 a.m. Tuesday, July 18, while I was fast asleep in a hotel in Paris, France. It was 11 p.m., Monday, July 17, in Washington at that hour and President Johnson had just signed the bill ending the railroad strike. I was awakened by the phone ringing in my room and, believe me, had no idea that I would as a result not be able to come to Hawaii. I will leave for reminiscing in smaller groups a description of my first reaction when a man's voice at the other end of the Atlantic Ocean announced that the President was calling. I do not know if I can converse easily with a President under any circumstances. I do know I did not at 4 a.m. on July 18. Of course I said "yes" when the President asked me to serve on the Board to settle the railroad dispute.

I returned the next day, but actually I was on my way back from a conference in Rome on Automation, Full Employment and a Balanced Economy, co-sponsored by the American Foundation on Automation and Employment, Inc., its counterpart in Great Britain, the British Foundation, and the Federations of Swedish Employers and Trade Unions. The American Foundation was formed by labor and management in 1962 to encourage the use of automation by solving the employment problems it creates. The work of the Foundation and the subject matter of the conference are both relevant to the topic assigned to me today.

Full employment is an objective everyone favors, like peace and prosperity. Its attainment was designated a national objective in legislation passed nearly 20 years ago, but it is doubtful if we are any closer to it than we were when that law was passed. Yes, there have been statistical improvements. But we have been measuring our distance from this goal with an index which was, at least until recently, as comparable in precision to our needs, as Galileo's telescope is to modern day radar for measuring the earth's distance from the moon. We now know, for example, that unemployment affects different people in different ways. There are age, sex, color, area, and skill differences, to name merely the obvious. Statistics alone do not and cannot tell the full story.

Until fairly recently, the main drive against unemployment came almost entirely from the labor movement. At the least the riots of this summer have underscored the need for national concern.

Labor's apprehension was most acute in 1963 when the unemployment rate soared over six percent. It has diminished now that shortages have developed, particularly among skilled employees, in many areas of the country. But it still becomes heated when, for example, automation threatens drastically to eliminate jobs in a particular industry.

Collective bargaining can and does help cope with such situations, perhaps not as fast as employers and others might wish but more significantly than most realize. Adjustments are constantly being made. Moreover, even if labor were disposed to stop automation, it could not succeed. American businessmen have a unique ability to compete. If they are stopped from moving in one way, they invariably devise another. Nor is the labor movement blind to the realities of change, for that is what automation means–dynamic change. Individual leaders may interpose roadblocks at particular times and if they failed to, other leaders would replace them who would. But I find a willingness to explore alternatives, to accept change if its immediate impact can be eased, and to seek to bring the rank and file along on the need for and inevitability of, change. But it doesn't do any good at all if union leadership gets so far ahead of the membership that it cannot help develop and shape worker attitudes.

This is basically the philosophy of the Foundation and it is subscribed to by many unions as well as employers. We not only accept automation as inevitable but welcome it for the benefits it can bring. But we do not shut our eyes to the vast changes it imposes on employees. By seeking to ameliorate those changes, we think automation will encounter less resistance and advance more rapidly.

Most people view automation merely as affecting the blue collar workers and some of the less skilled white collar ones. It is true that they are most obviously affected. But our Foundation made a study of automation's impact on middle management. This study attracted such wide attention that we are now bringing out a second printing. The title is Automation and the Middle Manager–What Has Happened and What the Future Holds. I would like to quote to you some of the many conclusions:

> "The computer has already cut deeply into the need for middle managers. But, as a result of our booming economy, there is no evidence of widespread unemployment among middle managers, to date, resulting from installation of computer systems in American Industry. Those displaced have gotten other jobs. Normal attrition thus far has been enough. Nor has there been, as yet, any marked change in the job content of middle management. The job reduction has stemmed mainly from the elimination of clerical functions and the assumption of minor decision-making by the computer.
> "The storm signals as well as the potential for the future cannot safely be ignored or overlooked, either by top or middle management or by government planners and manpower specialists. An impressive number of participants in this study have marshalled a persuasive case: The middle manager's job stability in terms of the number and kind of jobs there will be is subject to a far more serious threat and open to greater possibilities than past experience and expected trends in the immediate future would suggest.
>
> 1. While the decisions now being made by computers are characteristically those of employees of lesser rank than middle managers, there are vast areas of middle-management decision-making within the existing capabilities of the computer which are not being realized.
>
> 2. It is not the inherent limitations of computer technology that have prevented a further intrusion by the machines into the traditional preserves of the manager, but the following human deficiencies:
>
>   a. Top management's resistance to change; its skepticism or lack of orientation to the potentialities of computer systems; and improper use when installed

b. Middle-management hostility to change and conflicts between computer specialists and traditional managers

c. Lack of personnel trained in the programming and operations of computers

d. Failure to structure the work situations of management in ways adaptable to the machine

e. High cost of computer installations.

3. When these difficulties are overcome–and it is a matter of when, not if–it seems clear that the social implications of displacement of managers will not serve as a deterrent to computerization; and that existing industry programs for retraining and early retirement are woefully inadequate to meet the displacement patterns arising as computers approach their maximum utility. Because of the time span involved in removing the human limitations on full computer development, however, there is still the opportunity to (a) recognize the full capability of the machine and (b) plan intelligently for the necessary adjustments in manpower utilization.

"Although there is dissenting opinion as to the foregoing propositions, there is near-unanimous agreement among the company spokesmen interviewed that:

1. There will be a drastic change in the job content of the middle manager: The repetitive tasks will vanish and he will be confronted with a greater variety of information, requiring more rigorous analysis in decision-making. Although his job will be more intellectually demanding, he will find more freedom, more flexibility, and more creativity in it.

2. Middle managers of the future will not be chosen solely from the ranks of computer specialists; among those who remain, there will be a premium on the traditional virtues of leadership, ability to make critical judgments, courage and vision.

3. The corporate structure will contain fewer levels of management responsibility. There will be a greater degree of centralization in the information-gathering, but not necessarily in the decision-making process.

4. Resistance to change by middle managers and hostility between them and computer specialists, though a frequent and sometimes frustrating component of the installation of machine systems, can be minimized by careful top-management planning.

5. There is as yet no radical change in the hiring patterns of middle management; the business administration graduate is still favored over the pure technician, although business-oriented trainees now have had more exposure to scientific disciplines than in the past.

6. The companies surveyed have not introduced, in connection with computerization, programs to retain and upgrade the skills of their middle managers despite their obvious need. Employers and the individual middle manager have a joint responsibility for remedying potential skill deficiencies through company training programs and self-improvement.

7. American colleges and universities must update and broaden their curricula to meet the future managerial needs of industry. Business schools are under heavy attack for failing to offer either (1)sufficient computer technology or (2) insight into the practical problems of operating an enterprise. But companies are hardly in a position to complain in view of their own training deficiencies.

"The fact is that most managements are not yet prepared for the computer and, in part as a result, the computer has not advanced significantly in the area of middle management. Now is the time for intelligent preparation for the human problems which have delayed the use of the computer and will undoubtedly intensify in the future, for surely the computer will move relentlessly forward as competition and new technology forces its use."

So much for the middle managers.

Let us now examine the impact of automation on collective bargaining, and how collective bargaining is attempting to deal with the problem.

Automation has already profoundly influenced collective bargaining. It has brought the most difficult of bargaining issues--the clash of productivity with job protection--into the forefront of most negotiations. It has contributed materially to the decline in the size of unions and it has placed two expanding groups seemingly beyond the present reach of organized labor: the unemployed and white-collar and technical employees. It has also weakened labor's bargaining strength in certain industries.

All of this has led some observers to conclude that collective bargaining is on the decline or already on the way out. Actually, collective bargaining is working better today than it ever has. There are fewer strikes and more negotiated settlements. Arbitration is being used effectively in settling in-plant grievances. Procedures for inter-union conflicts are being refined. Around-the-year bargaining in joint study committees, such as the Human Relations Research Committee in basic steel, is providing labor and management with new insights and keys to the solutions of their most difficult problems.

Yet the impact of automation on jobs has posed the most critical challenge collective bargaining has ever faced. Because the problems of automation and technological change cannot be solved solely by private parties in collective bargaining, the steps toward constructive answers thus far developed constitute a tribute to the viability of this remarkable institution of voluntary adjustment. I intend to underscore the need for extending rather than contracting the bargaining process as an indispensable adjunct to the mechanics of change.

Organized labor is in effec[illegible]ommitted by policy to the machine and is unwilling as a body to resist industrial progress. Indeed, some unions openly encourage automation. Besides, organized labor knows too well how violently the general public is opposed to "featherbedding" to make this the cornerstone of its policy on automation even if it were inclined to do so. Obviously, there are exceptions. This is not, however, the public view of labor's attitude toward automation. Unfavourable publicity about featherbedding and widespread reporting of a few special situations involving manpower changes have led many to believe that labor is opposed to automation. Thus when George Meany referred to automation as a "curse" at the biennial convention of the AFL-CIO, in November 1963, his remarks were incorrectly interpreted as opposing automation. But they were more an expression of fear about what automation was going to do and were, in that way, a call for action to cure its consequences. He did not urge, nor has he ever suggested, that automation should be stopped or slowed as a means of avoiding this "catastrophe."

The basic approach of organized labor was best expressed by A. J. Hayes, Co-chairman of the American Foundation on Automation and Employment, in a speech delivered at the University of Portland:

> Properly absorbed and applied, automation can improve the life of workers both on and off the job. It can release millions of human beings from heavy, hazardous, dirty, and monotonous jobs.
>
> More importantly, automation is a means of releasing mankind from the grip of historic scarcity and building a world without want.
> Despite our concern, American labor has not reacted to technological change as did the Luddites who roamed the English countryside in the early 19th Century smashing the textile looms that were destroying their jobs. We know that it will not serve society to smash the machines that are today destroying jobs.

Despite the clash of productivity and job security, labor-management relations are maturing and improving. Difficult problems are being solved through collective bargaining, and labor and management are evolving adjustments to the manpower challenge.

The principal methods which private parties have employed to facilitate the adjustment of employees who have been displaced through automation or technological change were listed by Derek Bok. They are:

1. Advanced Notice of Layoff or Shutdown
2. Methods of Avoiding Layoff
   (1) Attrition
   (2) Early retirement
   (3) Retraining
   (4) Transfer
   (5) Relocation allowances
3. Methods of Easing the Burden of Unemployment
   (1) Severance pay
   (2) Supplemental unemployment benefits
   (3) Vesting of pension rights
4. Methods of Facilitating New Employment
   (1) Placement and referral services
   (2) Training for jobs outside the plant
   (3) Union-sponsored training programmes
   (4) Apprenticeship
   (5) Other forms of training
   (6) Antidiscrimination policies

There have been a variety of agreements, many very inventive, designed to reduce the impact of automation. The Kaiser Steel Company–United Steelworkers Long Range Sharing Plan relies on sharing of actual savings in production costs on a month-to-month basis resulting from improvements in technology and work methods, and also offers several types of employment and income security. The Pacific Coast shipping industry, under an agreement with the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, has put up a sum of money to protect employment in West Coast ports.

Basic Ingredient

Intrinsic to these solutions is the use of attrition as the primary ingredient: spare the worker but not the job. As workers leave for one reason or another, or are encouraged to leave through early retirement plans, the existing work force, or as much of it as can be saved, is protected in exchange for the right to introduce new machinery and/or work methods which eliminate jobs. This method of adjustment, of course, does nothing for the unemployed or the new entrant into the job market. Unions naturally concern themselves with the members at hand. They are the dues payers, the ones who attend meetings, who seek job protection from their leaders–with the implied threat of getting other leaders if they do not succeed. The use of attrition has furthered the trend toward reduced employment in unionized industries, and has other consequences as well, such as a constant rise in the average age of the work force. But, whatever its limitations, it is likely to continue.

The reliance on attrition is adversely affecting bargaining by decreasing the number of employees subject to it. This is unfortunate, since experience has shown that collective bargaining is the most effective and efficient method of adjustment employer-employee relations in a democratic society.

Collective bargaining can legally embrace the wages, hours and working conditions of workers represented by a union.

It cannot help those who have not been hired or those who have been let go without reinstatement rights. Obviously, a union's main concern is going to be with the workers on hand who pay dues for representation. But there are some activities which can help those outside the organization who are now in such desperate need. We have not nearly begun to explore the possibilities of labor-management assistance in job training for the unskilled and untrained, constituting so large a portion of the Negro unemployed in ghetto areas.

I like to believe, in addition, that a labor-management organization like our Foundation can also make a substantial contribution. We have recently purchased permanent headquarters in New York City which we call Automation House. We intend to establish there, among other labor-management activities, a Center for Job Training Information. We have found that there is throughout the United States a burgeoning industry of teaching machines, devices, and programs which can materially speed up the learning process for the unskilled and uneducated, especially in equipping them for work. We intend to have on hand there detailed information about these developments with motion pictures, video and audio tapes, slides and brochures to demonstrate how they can be used. Unique devices will be on display and trained experts will explain their use. We will also conduct lectures and seminars and provide anyone from industry, labor, government or the public generally with information about the latest techniques in job training.

Labor and management will always be antagonists at the bargaining table, and there is nothing wrong with that. But they have many areas of mutual interest. These can be encouraged without diminishing the vigor of the bargaining process. Indeed, it can help. That is what we are trying to do at Automation House through the Foundation.

I regret more than I can say that I could not enjoy the opportunity of telling you of these activities in person. At least I believe I have a valid excuse for not attending. Please accept my very best wishes for a most successful conference.

Thank you.

Labor Relations Law: An Assessment

Benjamin Aaron

Any survey of the present state of labor relations law in the United States must take account, at the outset, of at least four major characteristics which, in this particular combination, distinguish it from that of other industrialized countries. First, despite its common-law origins, in almost all significant details it has been created by statute rather than by the gradual accretion of judicial decisions. Second, it is of relatively recent origin, the oldest significant statute presently on the books being the Norris-LaGuardia Act, which was adopted in 1932. Third, those labor relations laws of the greatest importance are federal laws, and the authority of the several states over labor-management relations has been almost completely eroded by the doctrine of federal preemption. Fourth, although the single most important principle underlying what we choose to call our "national labor policy" is the commitment to "free" collective bargaining in the private sector, the United States has a more comprehensive and bewildering array of restrictive laws regulating the relations between employers and unions than does any other industrialized country.

There are several other significant features of American labor relations law which, if not as unique as those already mentioned, nevertheless have a substantial impact upon collective bargaining in this country. In typically pragmatic fashion each of the several federal statutes was enacted to deal with one or more specific problems; but, unfortunately, almost none of these has taken sufficient account, if any, of the need to accommodate the new law with the policies and procedures of those already on the books. As a result, we have built up, not an integrated and internally consistent body of federal labor relations law, but a collection of individual statutes that are mutually inconsistent in some important particulars, that overlap in others, and that manage, nevertheless, to leave some vital areas of labor-management relations totally uncovered or covered inadequately.

Partly as a consequence of these developments, Congress has assigned much of the task of administering the various labor relations laws to a number of administrative tribunals, independent agencies, and executive departments. The Supreme Court has added to the decentralization of decision-making by construing some statutes as requiring judicial deference to awards rendered by private arbitrators.

In my talk I shall illustrate with appropriate examples the impact of American labor law on collective bargaining. My thesis is that the time has come to review the entire body of this law: to enunciate or redefine policies in certain critical areas, to repeal unnecessary legislation, to reconsider questionable judicial and administrative doctrines, and at least to begin thinking about the possibility of drafting a comprehensive, internally consistent labor code

Federalism and Labor Relations Law

Within the past 30 years, Congress and the Supreme Court have gone a long way toward establishing federal law as the supreme and exclusive instrument for dealing with all but the most minor labor disputes. The constitutionality of that arrangement is now beyond challenge: it rests upon the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution and upon the indisputable power of Congress to legislate in respect to conduct "affecting commerce." The manner in which Congress has exercised that power, however, as well as the construction placed upon its enactments by the Supreme Court, have created serious doubts in the minds of many persons about the wisdom of the resulting policy.

The passage of the Wagner Act in 1935 heralded the end of diverse local controls of labor-management relations and the beginning of a national labor policy uniformly applicable throughout the nation. Whatever doubts may originally have existed concerning the necessity or desirability of a national policy inevitably gave way before the increasing evidence of the impact of local labor disputes on enterprises and activities far removed from the scene of actual conflict. But the extent to which the states are precluded from passing supplementary legislation covering labor-management relations, or to which their courts are barred from affording remedies neither specifically permitted nor prohibited by federal law, has been a subject of continuing debate.

Thus far, however, Congress has refused to abolish an exception to the uniform national policy that it incorporated with the 1947 Taft-Hartley amendments to the NLRA. Section 8(a)(3) of the amended Act permits the voluntary execution of union-shop agreements, with certain safeguards. Section 14(b) provides, however, that states or territories may prohibit the execution or application of agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment. The constitutionality of this provision has been sustained against attacks by labor unions, and the rather mild endorsement by the present Administration of a proposal to repeal Section 14(b) has been insufficient thus far to secure congressional adoption of that amendment.

Apart from the emotional and irrational reactions that public debate of union security clauses invariably engenders, the basic case against Section 14(b) is that it is illogical, untidy, and unnecessary. If a uniform national policy of labor-management relations is desirable, then it makes no sense to exempt from that policy one of the most explosive of all collective-bargaining issues. Moreover, the present rule produces uneven results: a national agreement between a union and a large corporation with plants in many states provides the same basic benefits to bargaining-unit employees in all plants, but denies the union the benefit of a negotiated union-shop and checkoff provision in those states with right-to-work laws. To add to this inequality of treatment, the Railway Labor Act, amended in 1951 to authorize union-security clauses similar to those permitted under the NLRA, contains no provision corresponding to Section 14(b) and supersedes all contradictory state laws applicable to railroad and airline employees. Finally, Section 14(b) provides no real protection to individual workers against abuse of power by their bargaining representative. All it can do is make the union less effective in dealing with the employer.

Equally inconsistent with a national labor policy for rail transportation are state "full-crew" laws requiring interstate carriers to employ a minimum-size engine and train crews operating within their borders. These laws were all enacted many years ago, and have repeatedly been sustained by the Supreme Court against charges that they violated the Fourteenth Amendment and the Commerce Clause. The national interest is not well served, however, by allowing a minority of states to prevent ad hoc adjustments to technological change by Procrustean rules laid down in archaic statutes.

Other reservations of state power in the labor relations field governed by the LMRA are more easily defended. As the Court pointed out in San Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon (1959), states have been permitted "to grant compensation for the consequences, as defined by the traditional law of torts, of conduct [growing out of a labor dispute] marked by violence and imminent threats to the public order." They have also been permitted to enjoin this type of conduct. This is "because the compelling state interest, in the scheme of our federalism, in the maintenance of domestic peace is not overridden in the absence of clearly expressed congressional direction." Similarly, power to regulate has not been withdrawn from the states "where the activity regulated was a merely peripheral concern" of the LMRA, or "where the regulated conduct touched interests so deeply rooted in local feeling and responsibility that, in the absence of compelling congressional direction," an inference that Congress had deprived the states of power to act would not be warranted.

However, as Justice Frankfurter observed in International Association of Machinists v. Gonzales (1958), "the statutory implications concerning what has been taken from the States and what has been left to them are of a Delphic nature, to be translated into concreteness by the process of litigating elucidation." This process is a continuing one, and it has not always been easy to understand why the Court has permitted the states to act in some areas after having broadly prohibited exercise of state power in others. In the Garmon case, in which the doctrine of federal preemption achieved its most luxuriant growth, the Court declared that "when an activity is arguably subject to Sec. 7 or Sec. 8 of the Act, the States as well as the federal courts must defer to the exclusive competence of the National Labor Relations Board if the danger of state interference with national policy is to be averted." Yet the Court has recently ruled–in Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers (1966)–that a state court does not lack authority to entertain an action for defamation arising out of a labor dispute nor to award damages when the complainant can show that the defamatory statements were circulated with malice and caused him damage.

In two other kinds of disputes that are "arguably subject to Sec. 7 or Sec. 8 of the Act," and hence presumably within the primary jurisdiction of the NLRB, the Supreme Court has decided that neither state nor federal courts, nor private arbitrators, "must defer to the exclusive competence" of the Board. Section 301(a) of the LMRA provides that suits for violation of contracts between employees and unions in industries affecting commerce may be brought in an appropriate federal district court without respect to the amount in controversy or to the citizenship of the parties. Some suits based on an alleged breach of contract involve conduct that is also arguably or admittedly an unfair labor practice; for example, the breach may consist of a violation of a contractual provision not to discriminate against employees for privileged union activity. If the accusation of contract violation is also an arbitrable grievance, the aggrieved party may submit the issue to arbitration, rather than file a charge of unfair labor practice with the Board. If the complaint is not arbitrable, the aggrieved party may sidestep the Board and exercise his federal right under Section 301 to sue his opponent in court.

However, as held in Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills (1957), disposition of the dispute by arbitration, or its adjudication by a federal or state court, results from the application of a new body of federal substantive law, fashioned by the federal courts, under the guidance of the Supreme Court, in obedience to the congressional mandate inferred from Section 301 of the LMRA. Thus, preexisting state laws that would have left to the state courts the discretion to refuse either to order arbitration of a grievance or to enforce an arbitrator's award, are no longer effective to the extent that they conflict with substantive federal law. By the same token, although state courts may assert jurisdiction over suits for breach of contract brought under Section 301, they must apply federal law.

The statutory scheme under the Railway Labor Act is substantially different. The law creates rights and imposes duties similar to those established by the NLRA, but it does not denominate any conduct by employers or unions as an "unfair labor practice," and neither the National Labor Adjustment Board (NRAB) nor the National Mediation Board (NMB) has functions or powers similar to those of the NLRB in unfair labor practice cases.

Unsettled controversies growing out of the interpretation or application of collective agreements (commonly known as "minor disputes") are referred to the NRAB, which has the powers of a compulsory arbitration board. The parties may, however, establish by mutual agreement their own private arbitration machinery (called a system board of adjustment) as a substitute for the NRAB. With few exceptions, state and federal courts are precluded from entertaining actions for declaratory judgments to construe collective agreements under the RLA.

Still a different arrangement is applicable to airline employees. In 1936 the RLA was extended to include the air transport industry. The one section of the Act not made applicable was that dealing with the NRAB. Instead, Section 204 of the amended Act requires carriers and unions representing their employees to establish boards of adjustment for the settlement of grievances.

The Supreme Court has held in International Associations of Machinists v. Central Airlines, Inc. (1963) that a contract executed under Section 204 is to be interpreted and enforced according to federal law; "for it would be fatal to the goals of the Act if a contractual provision contrary to the federal command were nevertheless enforced under state law, or if a contract were struck down though in furtherance of the federal scheme."

In the present state of labor relations law, three questions concerning federal-state relations are paramount: First, is it desirable or possible to develop a broad statutory policy applicable to all the situations previously discussed, that will dispose of most of the line-drawing problems created by preemption doctrine? Second, whether Congress promulgates such a policy or, as is more likely, continues to abdicate its authority in this area in favor of the courts, should the states be accorded more or less power than they presently have to apply their own procedural and substantive laws to labor disputes occurring within their boundaries? Third, is there any justification for differing degrees of federal control over labor-management relations under the LMRA and the RLA? Is there, indeed, a continuing need for two separate statutes?

Meanwhile, it has become increasingly apparent that Congress lacks both the talent and the will to deal with the "formidable intellectual and political difficulties" of allocating power between state and federal governments, and the courts have necessarily had to fill in the gaps and reconcile conflicts in statutory policies on a case-by-case basis. The result is a patchwork quilt of decisional law, with some parts notably out of harmony with others.

Rights of Individual Employees

At common law the individual employee's rights amounted to little more than his largely illusory right of "freedom of contract." Modern statutes have guaranteed him protection against hostile discrimination for union activity or on grounds of race, creed, color, sex, national origin, and age. Even these protections are not uniformly provided, and may be limited or entirely absent in certain industries, occupations, establishments or localities.

The more fundamental protections against arbitrary or unfair treatment in the matter of promotions, remuneration, dismissal, and retirement are provided, however, if at all, by a collective agreement negotiated between the union, as exclusive bargaining representative of all employees in the appropriate unit, and the employer. Section 301 of the LMRA treats these agreements as contracts that may be enforced by the principal parties-- the employer and the union–against each other. But what, if any, rights established by a collective agreement become vested in each individual employee and can be asserted and enforced by him, irrespective of the union's approval or opposition? This question, with its many ramifications, has given rise to some of the most perplexing problems in contemporary labor relations law.

The question also raises a fundamental issue of policy. As we shall see, rights of individual employees have been treated quite differently under the RLA than under the LMRA. It is important to inquire whether these differences are necessary or desirable.

All that can be said with certainty about individual employee rights under either statute is that the law is still far from settled. Starting with the premise that a labor organization which derives from federal law its right of exclusive representation of all employees in the appropriate bargaining unit (NLRA) or craft or class (RLA), and thus owes a duty fairly to represent all employees in the unit, the Supreme Court has enforced that duty in appropriate cases, the majority of which have involved racial discrimination by unions covered by either the NLRA or the RLA. And despite the provisions in both statutes for the referral of disputes arising thereunder to administrative agencies (i.e., the NLRB, the NMB, and the NRAB), the Court has ruled that when these agencies have been unable or have failed to provide the necessary protection against illegal discrimination by unions, or by unions and employers acting in collusion, the affected employees may obtain redress in the form of an injunction or damages directly from the courts.

At the same time, the Court has recognized that in bargaining on behalf of large numbers of employees, many of whom have differing long-term interests and immediate objectives, a union must be allowed to make compromises which, in its judgment, are in the best interests of the majority and which, equally importantly, strengthen its own institutional position. Thus, in Ford Motor Co. v. Huffman (1953)the Court has unanimously held that "a wide range of reasonableness must be allowed a statutory bargaining representative in serving the unit it represents, subject always to complete good faith and honesty of purpose in the exercise of its discretion."

In the day-to-day administration of the collective agreement, however, and especially in the handling of individual grievances, questions concerning the propriety of union conduct and the rights of employees to the benefits of the agreement assume a baffling subtlety and complexity. Underlying these questions is the still-unresolved issue of the nature of the collective agreement itself. To say that it is, among other things, an enforceable contract does not entirely dispose of the problem. Clearly, the union and the employer have the right to enforce the terms of the agreement against each other; but what of the rights of individual employees? Is it true, as contended by Professor Summers, that "the individual employee has rights under the collective agreement, the enforcement of which are not subject to the union's exclusive control," and that "the union and the employer cannot block the enforcement of these rights by agreeing between themselves that those rights can be compromised or ignored without the individual's consent or authorization"? Is Professor Cox more persuasive in arguing that the union should be given a free hand to evaluate the individual's claim in the collective interest, and therefore must be allowed to refuse to process the grievance, so long as it acts in good faith? Or is it possible to adopt a middle course, as urged by Professor Blumrosen, and permit individual employees to compel unions to process grievances involving only the "critical job interests" of discharge, compensation, and seniority?

Adoption of one of these theories, or perhaps of another, is only the first step in dealing with the practical problems arising under the collective agreement. To illustrate the nature of these problems, let us consider two hypothetical cases. In the first, suppose that an individual grievance arising out of an allegedly unfair dismissal is rejected by the union, after investigation, on the ground that the discharge was for just cause. Suppose further that the grievant suspects that the union has not represented him in good faith, but has colluded with the employer to secure his discharge for some reason unconnected with union membership or nonmembership. In the second, suppose that the grievant's wage or seniority claim is processed by the union but is dropped or compromised without the grievant's consent and against his wishes, or is handled in an allegedly inept or negligent fashion. What channels of relief, if any, are open to the grievant in each of these situations?

To this question administrative agencies and courts have provided a bewildering array of answers, many of them based on mutual y exclusive theories. Moreover, the law which has developed under the Railway Labor Act is again in some respects entirely different from that which has evolved under the Labor-Management Relations Act.

Let us first consider the situation under the RLA.

Exclusive of claims of unlawful discharge or discipline, the majority of "minor disputes" submitted to the NRAB involve "time claims"–demands for money under the complicated wage payment rules that prevail in the industry. It has long been the practice of the parties to compromise these claims without the prior knowledge or consent of the employees involved. In Elgin, Joliet & E. Ry. v. Burley (1945) the Supreme Court held that the bargaining agent must be authorized to act on behalf of an employee "in some legally sufficient way" before it can compromise his claim without his knowledge or permission.

A very high percentage of railroad workers are union members, and most, if not all, railroad unions have authorization provisions in their constitutions and bylaws; thus, in practice, time claims by individual employees are regularly compromised without their prior knowledge or express approval. Accordingly, an employee's chances of upsetting a settlement of a time claim on the ground that his union represented him incompetently or unfairly are virtually nonexistent.

In the discharge case which the union refuses to handle the grievant has a theoretical but wholly illusory right to carry his grievance to the NRAB for final disposition. In practice, however, the grievance is invariably rejected on procedural grounds by the NRAB, because the union and employer representatives on the Board simply reiterate the positions of the employer who discharged the grievant and of the labor organization that refused to handle the grievance. Consequently, the grievant has only one practical course to follow: he may abandon the attempt to secure reinstatement with or without back pay and, instead, sue the employer for damages for wrongful discharge.

In the case of wrongful discharge, the Supreme Court has recognized an exception to rule that the NRAB has exclusive jurisdiction over "minor disputes." In Moore v. Illinois Central R. R. (1941) it explained the reason as follows:

> A common-law or statutory action for wrongful discharge differs from any remedy which the [Adjustment] Board has power to provide, and does not involve questions of future relations between the railroad and its other employees. If a court handling such a case must consider some provisions of a collective-bargaining agreement, its interpretation would of course have no binding effect on future interpretation by the Board.

Even under this reasoning, however, the grievant's chances of securing a court determination of the merits of his case are not certain. The cause of action for wrongful discharge is created by state law, not by the Railway Labor Act. If the state law requires an employee to exhaust his remedies under the contract grievance procedure and the RLA before bringing suit for wrongful discharge, he must comply; and this process might take years. State laws on this question are far from uniform: some do not require exhaustion; others do not; and in at least one an employee may not maintain a cause of action for damages for wrongful discharge under any circumstances.

A final and often insurmountable obstacle in the grievant's path to relief is the doctrine of election of remedies, which holds, in effect, that he may proceed either under the RLA for reinstatement or under state law for damages, but may not do both. Thus, if a state law governing the damage action requires the prior exhaustion of contract-statutory remedies under the RLA, the grievant will automatically be precluded by the election-of-remedies doctrine from bringing the action for damages after he has exhausted the contract-statutory procedures for securing reinstatement.

The law governing these types of cases under the Labor-Management Relations Act has developed differently. Section 9(a) of the NLRA, as amended by the LMRA, provides that a union designated or selected as collective bargaining representative by a majority of employees in the appropriate bargaining unit shall be "the exclusive representative of all employees . . . for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment." This plenary authority is limited in the following manner:

> Provided, that any individual employee or group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer and to have such grievances adjusted, without the intervention of the bargaining representative, as long as the adjustment is not inconsistent with the terms of the collective-bargaining contract or agreement then in effect: Provided further, that the bargaining representative has been given opportunity to be present at such adjustment.

The NLRB did not, until quite recently, assert jurisdiction over the employee's complaint unless it involved activity protected by Section 7, in which case the employee could file an unfair labor practice charge against the union, the employer, or both. The relief available to the employee would then be limited to reinstatement with back pay in accordance with the Board's rules. Assuming the Board to be without jurisdiction, the employee could sue the employer for damages for wrongful discharge; sue the union for breach of its duty of fair representation; or sue for an injunction either to compel the employer to arbitrate his grievance or to compel the union itself to appeal the grievance to arbitration.

Here, again, court decisions lack uniformity and are based on conflicting theories. Although individual plaintiffs have been successful in a minority of cases, judgment has generally been in favor of the defendant employer or union. In some instances the employee has relied upon the proviso to Section 9(a) of the NLRA. According to the majority view, however, as expressed by the Second Circuit in Black-Clawson Co. v. International Association of Machinists (1962), this proviso does not confer "an indefeasible right upon the individual employee to compel compliance with the grievance procedure up to and including . . . arbitration"; rather, it merely sets up "a buffer between the employee and his union 'permitting' the employee to take his grievances to the employer, and 'authorizing' the employer to hear and adjust them without running afoul of the 'exclusive bargaining representative' language of the operative portion of section 9(a)."

If the employee relies upon the grievance and arbitration procedure of the collective agreement, rather than on the Section 9(a) proviso, he is likely to be rebuffed in his efforts to compel arbitration on the theory that these procedures usually state that only the union may demand arbitration. Suppose, then, that the employee sues the employer under state law for damages for wrongful discharge. Under the prevailing state laws, employees have also usually been unsuccessful either in suing the employer for wrongful discharge or in bringing an action against the union for breach of its fiduciary duty of fair representation.

These state court decisions have been substantially affected, however, if not rendered completely irrelevant, by recent developments. The first and most important is the rapid growth of case law under Section 301 of the LMRA, which provided the basis for a new body of substantive federal law governing the enforcement of collective agreements. In Humphrey v. Moore (1964) the Supreme Court held that an employee may sue his union under Section 301 for violation of his contractual rights. The case was a class action by employees for injunctive relief against implementation of the decision of a union-employer grievance committee, made pursuant to contractual procedure, which deprived the employees of their seniority rights and threatened to result in their discharges. In ruling against the plaintiffs on the merits, however, the Court majority reaffirmed the principle first enunciated in the Huffman case and added: "Conflict between employees represented by the same union is a recurring fact. To remove or gag the union in these cases would surely weaken the collective bargaining and grievance processes."

In Smith v. Evening News Association (1962) the Supreme Court decided that a suit for breach of contract may be brought under Section 301, even though the act complained of is arguably or admittedly an unfair labor practice; but so far as the individual employee is concerned, the barriers to such a suit are as formidable as ever, and perhaps more unyielding than before. In Republic Steel Corp. v. Maddox (1965) the Court held that an employee who brought suit for severance pay allegedly due him under a collective agreement, without first exhausting the contract grievance and arbitration procedures, was barred from maintaining the court action. The Court's opinion stated the prevailing rule to be that "unless the contract provides otherwise . . . the employee must afford the union the opportunity to act on his behalf."

Although the Court strongly hinted that the same principle should apply to discharge cases arising under the RLA, it has so far declined to overrule contrary precedents.

A second development that may affect the rights of employees covered by the NLRA, who are discharged or discriminated against for reasons unconnected with union activity, is the doctrine adopted by a majority of the NLRB in Miranda Fuel Co. (1962) and explained by them as follows:

> Section 7 [of the NLRA] . . . gives employees the right to be free from unfair or irrelevant or invidious treatment by their exclusive bargaining agent in matters affecting employment. This right of employees is a statutory limitation on statutory bargaining representatives, and we conclude that . . . labor organizations, when acting in a statutory representative capacity, [are prohibited] from taking action against any employee upon considerations or classifications which are irrelevant, invidious, or unfair.

The case in which this doctrine was first enunciated did not involve racial discrimination, but there is some reason to suppose that the Board majority had that problem uppermost in its mind. Historically, the Board has avoided or temporized with problems of racial discrimination by unions and employers, and Congress has repeatedly refused to proscribe that form of discrimination in labor legislation. Increasing pressure has been put on the Board in recent years to change its policies in this regard, and it has responded affirmatively in a variety of ways. Not long after announcing its decision in the Miranda case, the Board in Hughes Tool Co. (1964) applied the same doctrine for the first time to a situation involving racial discrimination.

If the Miranda doctrine were to become established, it would obviously have a profound effect upon rights of individual employees, as well as on the liabilities of employers and unions, under the NLRA. An employee claiming that his bargaining representative had, for any reason, not represented him fairly in the administration of the collective agreement could file an unfair labor practice charge against the union with the NLRB. Not only would the number of cases coming within the Board's jurisdiction be greatly increased, but the prevailing concept of the union's control of the grievance procedure would almost certainly be revised.

At first it seemed doubtful that the Miranda doctrine would prevail. Enforcement of the Board's order in that case was denied by the influential Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. In United Rubber Workers, Local 12 v. NLRB (1966) the Fifth Circuit held, however, contrary to the Second Circuit's ruling in Miranda, that a union's failure to represent bargaining-unit employees fairly, by refusing to process grievances based on well-founded charges of racial discrimination, restrained the grievants in the exercise of their Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the NLRA. The court also concluded that if an employee's complaint of unfair treatment at the hands of the union is made independently of a charge of contract violation, the issue thus raised falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the NLRB.

This latter proposition was expressly rejected, however, by the Supreme Court in Vaca v. Sipes (1967), which dealt with the question of an employee's remedy after his attempt to exhaust the grievance procedure had been frustrated by the union's decision not to carry the grievance to arbitration. Without approving or disapproving Miranda, the Court held that the NLRB does not have exclusive jurisdiction over questions of fair representation; that both state and federal courts have jurisdiction over such cases; but that federal law must be applied. Under that law, the employee must exhaust the contractual grievance procedure, if any, before bringing suit against his employer for breach of contract? and in order to recover damages he must first prove that the union has violated its duty of fair representation.

Individual reactions to all the developments reviewed in this section are apt to depend upon the kinds of assumptions one makes about cases. In some instances the union appears to have exercised its control over the grievance procedure in an almost unbelievably arbitrary way; in others, the employee's claim of unfair treatment seems to have been too flimsy to warrant serious attention. But in most of the cases the relative merits of the competing equities are more evenly balanced, and we are left with a direct and often irreconcilable conflict between the union's institutional objectives and the rights and interests of its individual members or constituents. Despite the desirability of developing a general principle applicable to all situations of this type, none of those yet suggested is entirely satisfactory.

Employer Responses to Economic Strikes

The typical "economic strike"–so called because it is not provoked by an employer's unfair labor practice–occurs when the parties have bargained to an impasse over the terms of a collective agreement. Traditionally, the battle has not begun until the union has called the employees out on strike; thus, unions have held the initiative, and therefore the advantage in at least the initial phases of economic conflict. They have controlled the timing and, less frequently, the duration of work stoppages; employers, on the other hand, have been limited for the most part to defensive responses. These have usually consisted in simply remaining closed and seeking to outlast the union in a test of economic strength, or in continuing to operate with temporary or permanent replacements. Prior to and in anticipation of a strike, employers have sometimes stockpiled production inventory.

None of these defensive weapons has proved generally satisfactory to employers. Remaining closed for the duration of the strike may impose greater costs on the employer than he can sustain. Hiring replacements may exacerbate the dispute and make settlement more difficult; moreover, replacements may be hard to find and expensive to train. The value of stockpiling depends on a variety of factors, including the nature of the product, the constancy of production and of demand, and the duration of the strike.

In recent years some employers have sought to seize the initiative from unions by locking out employees before the union could call them out on strike. Others have resorted to mutual aid pacts to enhance their financial staying power. Each of these tactics merits some attention.

With few exceptions, the Board has usually held lockouts by individual employers to be unfair labor practices. Recent developments, however, have brought significant changes in the applicable law.

The most common form of lockout today is the multi-employer lockout, which occurs when nonstruck members of the bargaining group lock out their employees in response to a "whipsaw" strike against a single member. In NLRB v. Truck Drivers Local 449 (1957) the Supreme Court held that in these circumstances the lockout is not an unfair labor practice under the NLRA. The Court reasoned that inasmuch as multiemployer bargaining is lawful under the NLRA, multiemployer lockouts must be permitted to preserve the stability of the unit. Recognizing that "conflict may arise . . . between the right to strike and the interest of small employers in preserving multiemployer bargaining as a means of bargaining on an equal basis with a large union and avoiding the competitive disadvantages resulting from nonuniform contractual terms," the Court declared that "the ultimate problem is the balancing of the conflicting legitimate interests."

In NLRB v. Brown (1965) the Court reaffirmed the validity of multiemployer lockouts; but in so doing it appears to have broadened considerably the range of circumstances under which these lockouts were previously thought to be permitted by the Buffalo Linen decision. In the Brown case the multiemployer bargaining unit consisted of retail food stores. After an impasse had been reached between the employers' group and the union over the terms of a new agreement, the union struck one store and all of the others locked out their employees, on the ground that a strike against one was a strike against all. The unusual feature of the case was that the nonstruck stores continued to operate, through the use of managerial personnel, their relatives, and a few temporary employees. After a new agreement had been executed and all employees had returned to work, the union charged the employer group with having violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the NLRA.

The NLRB held that the employers had violated the NLRA, not because they had acted either out of hostility toward the union or in reprisal for the whipsaw strike, but because their conduct "carried its own indicia of unlawful intent, thereby establishing, without more, that the conduct constituted an unfair labor practice." A majority of the Supreme Court disagreed, observing that "where, as here, the tendency to discourage union membership is comparatively slight, and the employer's conduct is reasonably adapted to achieve legitimate business ends or to deal with business exigencies, we enter into an area where the improper motivation of the employer must be established by independent evidence. . . ." The Court majority concluded that such evidence was lacking in this case.

The majority approached the problem as a "judgment as to the proper balance to be struck between conflicting interests." Starting from the premise that a single struck employer may lawfully continue operations with temporary or permanent replacements, it reasoned that nonstruck employers will not lock out unless they too may continue to operate; otherwise, they will lose business and patronage to the struck employer. But if the integrity of the multiemployer unit is to be preserved, the nonstruck employers must lock out their employees when any member is struck; therefore, continued operation with temporary replacements becomes a necessity.

It is apparent that the Court will now find justification for a lockout that is not in defense of the integrity of a multiemployer unit. American Ship Building Co. v. NLRB (1965), decided the same day as the Brown case, involved a single employer, who shut down his shipyard following a bargaining impasse over a new contract, claiming this action was necessitated by lack of work due to customers' fears of a work stoppage. The union, which had given assurance that there would be no strike and had offered to extend the existing contract, charged the company with unfair labor practices designed to force the union to abandon its contract demands. The NLRB found, by a divided vote, that the employer had no reasonable fear of a strike, and that his use of the lockout as an "offensive" economic weapon violated the statute. The Supreme Court unanimously reversed, although three justices concurred with the decision for different reasons than those relied upon in the court's opinion. The latter accepted the Board's factual conclusion, but held that "the employer's use of a lockout solely in support of a legitimate bargaining position is [not] . . . inconsistent with the [employees'] right to bargain collectively or with the right to strike," and that a violation of Section 8(a)(3) cannot be predicated on an "intention merely to bring about a settlement of a labor dispute on favorable terms."

The Brown and American Ship Building cases raise several interesting questions. First, how realistic a balance can be struck between the conflicting legitimate interests involved in lockout cases? If the union must show that the employer lacked both a "legitimate bargaining position" and "an intention merely to bring about a settlement . . . on favorable terms" before the balance is struck in its favor, the act of balancing will be pure formality and the lockout will almost invariably be permitted. If, however, as is suggested in the Brown case, the employer's resort to a lockout must be "reasonably adapted to achieve legitimate business ends," there is more leeway for balancing. Finally, if the tendency of the lockout to discourage union membership is also thrown into the balance, and in other cases is regarded more seriously than it was by the Court in the Brown case, the balancing of conflicting legitimate interests is likely to be an exercise of considerable delicacy.

Second, who is to do the balancing: the Board or the courts? In the American Ship Building case the Court found that the NLRB had "in essence, denied the use of the bargaining lockout to the employer because of its conviction that use of this device would give the employer 'too much power.'" The Court held in this case and in Brown, as it has held before, that the Board lacks "a general authority to assess the relative economic power of the adversaries in the bargaining process and to deny weapons to one party or the other because of its assessment of that party's bargaining power." These precedents, plus the Board's proclivity for developing "per se rules," which have not generally been well received by the courts, suggest that the latter will continue to exercise an independent judgment on these matters.

Finally, to what extent, if any, is the decision in the Brown case applicable to concerted activities by employers who are not members of a multiemployer bargaining unit? The problem is illustrated by the case of Detroit Newspaper Publishers Association v. NLRB (1965). Two Detroit newspapers, the Free Press and the News, began separate bargaining sessions with the same union. The News obtained a promise from the Free Press that it would not yield on three specific issues; in return, the News agreed to lock out its employees if the Free Press were struck. The Free Press was struck, and the News suspended publication, even though it was still bargaining with the union.

The Board held, prior to the Supreme Court's decisions in the Brown and American Ship Building cases, that the News had committed an unfair labor practice because the two newspapers did not constitute a multiemployer unit. The Sixth Circuit, acting on the case after the two Supreme Court decisions had been announced, found no proof of unlawful motivation in the form of antiunion animus or avoidance of collective bargaining, and vacated the Board's order. The Supreme Court vacated the judgments of both the Board and the court of appeals, and instructed the latter to remand the case to the Board for further consideration in light of the American Ship Building case. What this action by the Court portends nobody knows; but the Court may have felt that the multiemployer lockout doctrine was inapposite in this context.

Historically, the lockout was a classic device to punish employees for concerted activities and to crush unions. In the contemporary context, however, it clearly has its legitimate uses. Of course, any lockout is likely to have a dampening effect on the ardor of some employees in the exercise of their right to engage in concerted activities; but surely this is only one element, and not a very substantial one, to be weighed in the balance of conflicting legitimate interests. Neither the Brown nor the American Ship Building decisions have dealt crippling blows to unions; rather, they seem to have restored to some employers a limited freedom of action too long denied them.

The Detroit Newspaper Publishers case, however, seems clearly distinguishable, even if one ignores the absence of a multiemployer bargaining unit. The secrecy of the pact between the two employers raises a serious issue; for it is highly desirable, if not an essential, aspect of good-faith bargaining, that each party advise the other of what it may do in the event of strike or lockout. Also, the attempt by one employer to affect the wage structure in another bargaining unit raises the possibility of antitrust violations, for reasons to be discussed in the following section. Finally, it appears from the record in this case that no bargaining impasse had been reached in the negotiations between the union and the News when the latter initiated the lockout. Permitting either party to resort to economic force prior to impasse is inimical to the public interest in the peaceful settlement of labor disputes through collective bargaining.

Employer mutual-aid pacts, although serving the same objectives as multiemployer lockouts, not only constitute a completely different tactical device, but also, because they have so far been confined to the railroad and airlines industries, offer an illuminating comparison between the public policies served by the Railway Labor Act and by the LMRA.

In general, the mutual-aid pacts provide for economic assistance to the struck carrier by nonstruck carriers. Under the airlines agreement, the nonstruck members are obligated to turn over to the struck carrier increased revenues, less increased costs, derived from carrying the struck carrier's traffic. Under the railroad agreement, each member contributes to an insurance fund. When a member is struck, it is paid amounts sufficient to cover its fixed costs and daily expenses. Each nonstruck member must contribute its proportionate share of the cost of indemnifying the struck carrier.

Neither agreement automatically provides for financial assistance when a member is struck; instead, each prescribes the conditions under which the right to subsidy may be invoked. Under the railroad agreement, the right arises when the strike is contrary to the RLA; or is to enforce demands contrary to recommendations of an Emergency Board convened pursuant to Section 10 of the RLA; or is in resistance to the application of Emergency Board recommendations. The airlines agreement provides for financial assistance to a carrier under the second condition specified in the railroad agreement or when a strike is called before the pre-strike procedures of the RLA have been exhausted, or is otherwise "unlawful." Both types of agreement have been upheld by administrative agencies and the courts.

Despite the judicial and administrative approval accorded mutual-aid pacts, the decisions were in each instance narrowly circumscribed and cannot be taken as a broad license for concerted economic action by employers in the railroad and airlines industries. The aid agreements are rather ingenious devices to provide protection for carriers without widening the area of open economic conflict and interrupting operations throughout the industry. This objective is hardly consistent, however, with the tendency in the railroad industry in recent years to convert every local dispute into a national issue requiring the invocation of emergency board procedures.

The RLA obviously places greater importance on the avoidance of any work stoppages than does the LMRA. The emergency disputes procedures of the latter statute have a more restricted coverage, and it does not require the compulsory arbitration of grievances. Given the differing emphases of the two statutes on preventing interruptions of work, the protective devices approved for employers under each–aid pacts under the RLA, multiemployer lockouts under the LMRA–have a logical validity. However, the premise that any threatened halt in rail transportation is inevitably as dangerous to the economy as a "national emergency" under the LMRA deserves far more critical examination than it has yet received. There is an urgent need for a detailed review of bargaining procedures in the railroad industry; in the opinion of some observers those procedures breed emergencies instead of forestalling them.

Summary and Recommendations

The United States has a variety of labor relations laws, each enacted to deal with specific problems, and none designed for accommodation with all of the others. Consequently, the growth of these laws has been excessive and unorganized, frequently creating new problems as it purported to solve others. The most serious inconsistencies exist between the LMRA and the RLA. These inconsistencies are not merely reflections of unique problems and practices in the railroad and air transport industries? rather, they reflect substantially different policies for which there is no longer a reasonable justification.

The various segments of the American economy are now so mutually interdependent that, so far as labor-management relations are concerned, it is no longer possible dependent that, so far as labor-management relations are concerned, it is no longer possible to speak of "social experiments within the insulated chambers afforded by the several states." There are no "insulated chambers." The extent to which the demands of a truly national labor policy can be reconciled with historical states rights in a federal republic is a question of great complexity that requires for its solution a statecraft of the highest order. Congress has shown neither the willingness nor the ability to face the problem squarely, much less to deal with it effectively.

The continuing prospect of rising levels of wages and prices and the growth of industry-wide or multiemployer collective agreements having at least an indirect effect on product markets reveal the inadequacy of present antitrust laws to provide even a conceptual framework for analysis of these problems. In this area the decisions of the Supreme Court have obfuscated and confused rather than clarified. Congress has neglected its own obvious responsibility to establish a new policy adapted to contemporary needs.

It would be unrealistic to assume that Congress will act on any of these problems unless it is virtually compelled by circumstances to do so, or that it could without guidance and a conviction that it was reflecting consensus of organized labor and management, accomplish substantial legislative reforms. In sort, Congress needs help.

Offers of "help" abound; but, quite naturally, most come from partisans seeking special benefits. The basic job to be done--a detailed review of the principal labor laws in action--should be undertaken by a neutral commission, preferably with, but if necessary without, specific authorization from Congress. The commission should issue findings and recommendations, which should then be reviewed and criticized by labor, management, and consumer groups. The recommendations should concentrate on possibilities of repealing unnecessary laws or specific statutory provisions, eliminating conflicts and inconsistencies in present laws, and developing new policies if they are required.

Whether from such an effort would emerge a consensus that would encourage Congress to act is unlikely but not impossible. Scholars and practitioners alike would learn much from the undertaking, regardless of its legislative consequences. Finally, if the reach of this proposal appears to exceed by a considerable margin the probable grasp of accomplishment, we have at least, as Thomas Reed Powell once remarked, the poet's authority in favor of the differential.

Harold S. Roberts, Moderator

DR. ROBERTS: Our procedure this afternoon will be to get the reactions of the individual panel members to the presentations of the other panel members. I'm going to ask each of them to speak briefly and answer any of the questions raised, with the exception of the paper by Ted Kheel. After we have a go around on the panel, we'll take a look at some of the questions that have come in from the floor. So to start we'll have Ben Aaron.

DR. AARON: I'll just make a couple of comments about Jack Stieber's analysis this morning with which mainly I agree. The difference between us is really a matter of detail and of emphasis. I liked very much his notion that it would be a good idea if we could divide the kinds of stoppages by public employees into categories of extreme, moderate, and relatively no severity, and govern our policies accordingly. I do not agree with him that it is just about as simple as the kinds of decisions that the National Labor Relations Board makes, nor do I think that most state legislatures will be willing to delegate their authority to an administrative body within the state. I think there is a kind of inconsistency between the notion that we should have a federal law uniformly applicable throughout the states with respect to the right of public employees to organize and bargain collectively and with the notion that we should allow experimentation within the states. That is to say, Jack is for limited experimentation within the certain guidelines. I'm inclined to think that we ought to have a federal law, but I'm wondering how much experimentation will be feasible. I like the idea of experimentation, but I'm not sure that it would work out quite as helpfully as Jack seems to think. But generally speaking, I myself feel with Jack and with Nate that it does no good to simply pass a law saying that there will be no strike. I'm more inclined to emphasize those procedures that make strikes unnecessary. And there are two states, Michigan and Wisconsin, and a few others, where we've seen some major emphasis on fact-finding and mediation for the first time in a long time. I don't myself feel that we've had anywhere near the ingenuity and hard work done on these aspects of dispute settlement procedures than we've had with respect to others that are so well suited to the public sphere.

DR. STIEBER: With regard to Aaron's talk, there was one thing that I liked very much and I think it is very important. As he put it, there is an utter lack of protection for unorganized employees in the United States. This came home to me in doing some work in Western European countries. While we have a great many labor laws, perhaps more than any other country, we do not have laws with respect to certain basic conditions of employment that other countries, who do not have as much labor relations law as we do, do provide through their own legislation. For example, we do have the laws in the United States regarding hours of work and hours of overtime, and this insures reasonable likelihood that even in unorganized plants where there are no contracts, these employees also will have a certain maximum hours and after that they will receive overtime. Most European countries go beyond this with regard to these fundamental necessities that are guaranteed to employees. For example, most countries guarantee certain number of weeks of vacation to all employees regardless of contract, so that in addition to hours law they provide that all employees are entitled to, let us say, a week or two weeks' vacation.

Now unions and employers are at liberty to negotiate for more liberal provisions, but at least we know in those countries that in an unorganized sector (and there are unorganized sectors in all of the countries that I am talking about), those employees will also have vacations. In the United States we really do very well with regard to fringe benefits where there are contracts, especially where unions are reasonably strong. But I dare say that there are plenty of people who work year in and year out without any vacation because they either are not organized or they are not in a position to bargain for a decent vacation period.

Another illustration of where the individual unorganized employee is at a disadvantage in the United States is with regard to dismissal notice. In the United States you can dismiss such an employee without any notice. Most employers who follow good personnel practices will try to give some notice. However, there is no requirement for this except where there are labor-management agreements which spell out a grievance procedure, and a discharge procedure, and a right to arbitration, and so forth. It seems to me that this is really a basic right that every individual ought to have, so that even if he is working in an unorganized plant, if he is no longer needed, or even if he is going to be discharged for cause, there ought to be some period of time during which he would receive notice, whether it be two weeks, or one week, or even a month. Generally, this is spelled out by law in most European countries. Let alone an opportunity to appeal a discharge through some kind of a procedure which would take the place of a grievance procedure with final and binding arbitration. I think this is what Ben meant when he was talking about the lack of protection for unorganized employees, and this is an area which we ought to explore. We take it for granted that where there are unions, they are going to negotiate rights and privileges for their members, tending to forget that there is a very large number of people who not only are not members of unions, but who do not work under union contracts even if they are members, and are not covered by any agreement.

As to Ted Kheel's paper, there is a matter that was not mentioned which is related to the subject of technological change and automation. Again it is a difference between American practice and West European practice. There is legislation in a number of European countries providing that before employers make collective dismissals for economic reasons--which means relatively large numbers of employees, in the range of 5 percent or more of the work force of a given employer--they must give notice to the employment service before they start laying off employees. This is especially true where the layoffs are due to technological change, and according to some of the people from Sweden particularly, this has worked out quite well. Most employers have not found that giving two months notice of their intention to make large scale layoffs creates any hardship for them.

I have found that employers in the United States generally feel that it would be almost impossible in certain lines of businesses to be able to tell even as little as a month in advance whether they will have to make a layoff of a substantial number of people because of technological change or for economic reasons. It may be interesting to discuss whether it would be feasible in the United States to have some kind of requirement that employers give a certain period of notice before making what I have referred to here as collective dismissals.

Finally, with regard to some of the things that Mr. Aaron mentioned on the public employee strikes question. There is of course an inconsistency, as he says, in asking on the one hand for more federal regulation, and on the other hand, asking for state experimentation. But I resolve it by saying that just as we have certain constitutional rights which are laid down by the U. S. Constitution which apply to everybody, there is still room for experimentation in other areas once you are within the overall constitutional guarantees. Similarly, I would say that the right of organization and the right to negotiation would be made a right that is guaranteed to all public employees. But then we would go further and recognize that there are different ways of dealing with some difficult problems, one of them being public employee strikes, that nobody knows the answer, and that, therefore, this would be an appropriate area for state experimentation. They must still keep in mind, however, that they cannot experiment to the degree of denying the basic rights of organization and collective negotiations.

DR. ROBERTS: Would you care to distinguish between collective negotiations and collective bargaining? The courts seem to have some difficulty on this.

DR. STIEBER: I think it's an artificial distinction. Perhaps some of my colleagues will disagree on this, but as far as I can see, it is an artificial distinction which has been made between public employment negotiation and private employment bargaining. These distinctions are said to arise because there are problems, for example, as to who is the employer when you are dealing with an agency of a municipality which in itself does not have complete freedom to bargain because it must rely on somebody else for its budget--the board of estimate or city council? Also other problems exist, civil service regulations and so forth, that distinguish public employment from private employment. Consequently, some people have insisted that we should not use the term "collective bargaining" in talking about negotiations in the public sector because there are these differences, and they have, therefore, coined the phrase "collective negotiations" which would distinguish it from "collective bargaining." Perhaps there are more solid reasons for the use of the two terms, but I don't know them.

DR. ROBERTS: In this connection I would like to pose a question to Nate Feinsinger, because it involves Wisconsin and he is a great protector of the State of Wisconsin. At the meeting yesterday of State Labor Relations officials, two lawyers talked about the rights that should be available to public employees. They argued that they should have the same rights in collective bargaining as private employees do--the equal right to strike, and to inconvenience the public by withdrawing their services. One of the speakers said that the Wisconsin statute is a good one and requires collective bargaining. And then he said that the Wisconsin statute does not cover wages, hours, and working conditions. Could you explain this?

DR. FEINSINGER: No, I don't think so. In Wisconsin we have a single board known as the Wisconsin Public Relations Board. It mediates, it arbitrates, it decides unfair labor practice complaints. In my opinion, you cannot have mediation and arbitration vested in the same agency, because if the union knows that it has another step to go, it would turn down the best deal that it could get through mediation and go to arbitration. What the mediator got them while they are at that stage they have in their pockets, and they believe they can't get less when they go to arbitration. There is no other Board that I know that has more than a single function. In New York you have a mediation board, and also a State Labor Relations Board.

DR. STIEBER: In Michigan, the State Labor Mediation Board does have both the functions of mediation and fact-finding and unfair labor practices, and so forth. However, the statute with regard to public employment specifically states that these two functions should be handled by different departments or divisions of the State Mediation Board. The legislature neglected to give it enough money to actually provide for two separate divisions, so what actually happened is they have taken some of the employees who were formerly involved in processing representation elections and unfair labor practices and have assigned them to mediation functions. But there is this dual function within one board which has been criticized, and I would not be surprised if at some point the feeling became strong enough to result in putting them in separate agencies.

DR. FEINSINGER: Let me tell you a story related to this. Our Wisconsin

Supreme Court had said that policemen had no right to bargain; they had no right to strike; they had a right to fact-finding. In the fact-finding process, they had a right to appoint an outside organization, but they cannot join it as their bargaining representative. It seems to me this shows the height of ignorance and unreality itself. You can't join a union; you can't bargain, but you can have a union represent you in fact-finding! How do you account for that? A new judge, that's all.

DR. ROBERTS: I have a question from the floor. Does not the strong potential block voting power which rests in government workers' unions give them a dominant position in any negotiation with their employers, who are usually elected officials? Therefore, wouldn't giving them the ad led power--the strike--tip the scale too much in favor of the government workers?

DR. STIEBER: This might especially be true at the local level where you have a strong union city, and the elected officials may be in position where they are not free to act in the way that they would want to because they believe that these actions will have some impact in the ballot box perhaps in a very short period of time. Now this is just a fact of life. I don't see that you can stop union officials from trying to get their members and even non-members to vote a certain way. This is a right that all citizens and all organizations have. One might say these unions don t need the right to strike. They are so strong that perhaps through the legislative process and their power in the elections they can influence the economic benefits that they get. I think in a way this is true. There are some unions who weren't terribly happy about the changes which introduced collective bargaining into the public sector. For example, I suppose over the years the post office employees have influenced their own pay and benefits through lobbying activities and have done so very effectively. I don't know whether they are likely to do any better through collective bargaining. However, on the other hand, there are many cities in which unions are not all that powerful, and even in those cities where unions are important we all know that union leaders have not always or even frequently controlled the votes of their members when they go into a secret booth to vote. So that I think that the question of whether or not the unions are powerful enough actually to get what they want is debatable and will vary from one community to another. But apart from that, there are those organizations which do not have the power of numbers but are entitled to collective bargaining negotiation to influence the conditions of their employment. And these certainly must depend on some introduction of organization and collective bargaining in the public sector.

DR. FEINSINGER: We are in a transitional period. Here is the Chairman of the County Board of "X" town, who has been running the show; he has never had any discussion with a union, and suddenly he is told by the Legislature he has to bargain collectively. And he says, What's that? He says I don't have to bargain with anybody because I am the sovereign: the sovereign state, the sovereign city, the sovereign county. I cannot share my responsibility with a union. I think the unions will make a mistake if they insist on getting the whole cake right away. You've got to bide your time union, there is a new generation of county chairmen.

One of the newer devices to bridge the gap is known as advisory arbitration. This is a contradiction in terms. It is just like compulsory arbitration but with a different name. It is like saying the Iliad was not written by Homer but by another man with the same name.

DR. ROBERTS: In this connection, I asked the question before about this collective negotiation. The same thing applies to "advisory arbitration" and "mediation to finality." Is it because we're trying to run away from terms which have become objectionable and come up with something which would be acceptable to people as long as they don't recognize the objectionable thing?

DR. FEINSINGER: No, I think the argument against public bargaining is generally nothing better than the old shop-worn argument about the closed shop and the union shop and the agency shop. Those terms are devised for industrial negotiations, not for public negotiations. The "fair-share agreement," I think, is a term that I invented to distinguish the union security problem in public employment from the problem in private employment. It's as simple as that. Besides, it's got a better chance to pass in the Legislature.

DR. ROBERTS: Executive Order 10988 provides for "advisory arbitration." This is a contradiction in terms but perhaps it was the only way to get a form of arbitration into the Executive Order and make it acceptable to government agencies—even though it was not final and binding arbitration. The agencies said that they would not accept a decision by somebody who is not in authority; that the department head has to make the final decision. Although these terms may be classed as gimmicks for those of us who are accustomed to using simple, straight talk, yet, some feel that if you come up with something which gets you over the language obstacle and you can accept it, or get the legislature to pass it, or get the President to sign it, or get the Congress to go along, that it makes good sense. Maybe what we need is a new language in the public sector.

DR. STIEBER: Actually, Harry, the term advisory arbitration is different from final and binding arbitration, and the best evidence of that is that the unions in the Federal sector are not happy with advisory arbitration and they have cited illustrations where the advice of the arbitrator has not been taken. Therefore, one of the changes that they are asking for in Executive Order 10988 is to substitute final and binding arbitration for advisory arbitration so that here it is really not just a matter of semantics. It is actually a difference in the outcome and the way in which the arbitration award is treated.

DR. AARON: I think you missed a point on that, Jack. I think it is a euphemism, not for arbitration, but for fact-finding recommendations and the term advisory arbitration is designed to create the illusion that there is something final and binding when obviously there is not. So it is not a distinction between final and binding arbitration and something else. What it is is the old recommendation procedure clothed in language which was intended to give people the feeling that they were really going to get a final and binding decision. But obviously there was no way that the Executive Order could accomplish that, at that particular time.

DR. ROBERTS: How can you support that old canard that civil servants both state and federal are paid lower wage rates than employees in the private sector? Here in Hawaii private employers are continually losing employees to the federal and to the state agencies.

DR. STIEBER: I suppose I will have to say that this is my first visit to Hawaii, and I am not acquainted with the pay scales either of the private sector or the public sector. I would say that if private employers are losing employees to government organizations then this is evidence that perhaps their rates are not competitive. Generally speaking in most states and the federal government this is not the case. In the federal government, I think that certain employees may start at a higher level, but in terms of the progression that prevails, they do not as a rule pay more, and usually pay less than comparable workers receive in the private sector. I am sure that there are illustrations, not only here in Hawaii but also in some states, where the federal government, because of the importance of the installation and the necessity of attracting workers, especially in blue collar jobs, ordinance and naval installations and so on, where they have flexibility to a point where they are pricing labor away from the private employers. I am sure this is true on some instances.

DR. ROBERTS: I think perhaps you might add too that the shifts in employment from private to public vary in different types of occupations–that you might get a loss in some and a gain in others. I think there are some factors other than wage rates, which determine whether the employee will move from the private to the public sector.

Here's a question which deals with police strikes. Do any of you want to comment on the experience of police strikes? Have they resulted in increased crime waves?

DR. STIEBER: The most interesting recent development that I know of in this area–it was not responsive to this question–but I think it does illustrate the attitude of unions toward strikes by policemen and perhaps firemen. The State, County, and Municipal Employees recently withdrew the charter that they had issued to a police local because the police local did call a strike that lasted something like two hours. And immediately after that happened, the President of the State, County, and Municipal Employees appointed a board to investigate, and apparently the board's finding was that in fact there had been an actual withholding of labor for a short period of time and since it is the policy of State, County, and Municipal Employees that they do not sanction strikes in these three areas, namely, police, firemen and prison, they withdrew their charter from that organization. But there really are very few illustrations of actual police strikes where we could get enough evidence to answer that question.

DR. ROBERTS: I'd like to note that in a recent visit I made to Canada, one of the things that interested me a great deal were the collective bargaining agreements between public employee organizations and government agencies. The agreements covering police and fire departments had specific provisions which required collective bargaining. If collective bargaining fails, a mediator is assigned by the National Agency or the regional agency. If mediation fails there is a proviso for a tripartite board to meet to make recommendations to the parties. The recommendations, however, were final and binding so that in effect you have compulsory arbitration for firemen and police. Other public employees in the country are free to take economic action, including the use of the strike.

There is a question as to how extensive public employee organizations are in Hawaii. I'd better get somebody from the audience active in the public employee area to answer that. Briefly on the state and local levels, we have four major organizations: the Hawaiian Government Employees' Association, the United Public Workers, the Hawaii Education Association, and the American Federation of Teachers, a total of almost 25,000. The largest of these is the Hawaiian Government Employees' Association. On the federal level I guess the major ones are primarily in the military installations–Pearl Harbor Naval Shipyard being the largest. They have a contract with the Hawaii Metal Trades Council. Any comment from the floor?

COMMENT: The shipyards are saying that approximately one-third of the employees belong to some employee organization. In this State there are some 6,000 federal employees who belong to one organization or another.

DR. ROBERTS: Here is a question addressed to Ben Aaron. Aside from your suggestions for overhauling of the federal labor laws, do you suggest any specific changes in the existing labor laws?

DR. AARON: Well, my particular suggestion for a death warrant is Railway Labor Act, which I think was a great piece of legislation when it was enacted and provided most valuable experience for us, but which I think now is obsolete, and I would strongly favor its repeal and the subsuming of those employees under the National Labor Relations Act with appropriate modifications to deal with particular problems. So far as I know, I am alone in that recommendation and I don't expect it to come to pass. But I have spent a number of years of my life studying the Act and being tangled up in one way or another in its administration, and my conviction remains the same in that regard even though I don't have many supporters.

I think there are a number of provisions in other laws that might very well be repealed. There are a lot of very foolish provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act relating to national emergency disputes, but they're minor except in the context of a thorough reform. I don't think it is worthwhile mounting a crusade to repeal the ridiculous vote on the employer's last offer, or the procedure for getting a report from an emergency board to a person who has already made up his mind what he wants to do, and which is told to get a report in in a certain time so the Attorney General can get an injunction, although the purpose of the report is to advise him as to whether or not there is a national emergency. That's all very ridiculous but it's not terribly harmful. But if we were going to revise our national emergency disputes procedures, then it seems to be quite clear we ought to get rid of those really quite undignified and ridiculous provisions.

To suggest other aspects of labor reform would require, I am afraid, much more technical discussion on the problems than would be appropriate here. I would mention that I think another very grave aspect of the whole Railway Labor Act situation, and one which isn't known so much, is the whole question of elections. I think their election procedure is vastly inferior to that of the National Labor Relations Board. For one thing it does not permit any choice on the ballot for a no union vote which I think is absolutely essential in any kind of democratic procedure, and I think the whole procedure before the National Railroad Adjustment Board is an outstanding scandal and I strongly favor the elimination of all that.

When we get into the more detailed aspects of the National Labor Relations Act, as we do particularly in boycotts and that sort of thing, I think we are just tearing the seam as well. I think we have too much legislation. That is my basic point, we could do with much less of such legislation.

DR. ROBERTS: Here is a question addressed to Nate Feinsinger. Are you saying in effect that compulsory arbitration in public employment is inevitable?

DR. FEINSINGER: No, on the contrary, I don't think compulsory arbitration is ever inevitable, but I would say in this respect I disagree with Michigan. There's always time for a State Legislature or Congress to adopt the compulsory arbitration system. Therefore, we can try voluntary arbitration.

DR. ROBERTS: Question to Dr. Stieber. In Hawaii we are concerned largely with relations between unions and the federal government, not the State. What has been the attitude of the armed services toward the federal directives on collective bargaining?

DR. STIEBER: I'm really not well enough informed on the Department of Defense and the various armed services and their experience under Executive Order 10988. However, I do read regularly a government employee labor relations letter put out by BNA, and my general impression is that the Navy Department particularly, which seems to be one having considerable organization of their employees, has generally lived reasonably well under the Order. I think that they have had some advisory arbitration. I think that they have accepted the procedure. I have the impression that there is not any strong difference in the acceptance by the armed services with respect to their civilian employees as compared with let us say some other agency. Of course, there are some agencies that are outstanding in the degree of acceptance. The Labor Department, where one I think might reasonably expect that there would be a strong acceptance of the Executive Order, has gone further than most in the degree to which they have established relations and consultation and negotiations with their employees. The Interior Department has had relations for many years. The TVA, of course, long before Executive Order 10988 had contractual relations with their employees, and was the prime example of a government employer which was negotiating and in every way treating their employees more or less like private employers. I don't have any particular information with regard to any defense services having any significant difficulty under that Order.

Let me mention two other things. When Nate Feinsinger referred to his difference with the Michigan procedure with regard to compulsory arbitration, I know he's clear on it but I want to be sure the rest of you are. He was not referring to the current Michigan law which does not provide for compulsory arbitration for any disputes in public employment. He was referring to the report of a commission established by the Governor which was asked to examine the law and to make recommendations for its improvement, and it was this commission which, among other things, recommended that for a period of three years–every three years–there be some experimentation with compulsory arbitration only for police and fire fighters. They did not go beyond this. The legislature has not acted on any of those recommendations, and therefore, in Michigan our law is no different than it is in Wisconsin.

Just one last point. I don't know why, in trying to answer the question with regard to police, I did not draw on the illustration closest to home. Actually, we have perhaps the best illustration of a non-strike among the policemen in Detroit but one which had a very significant impact, only a month or two ago. The policemen are still very unhappy about a recommendation for their wage increase for next year. They have not called a strike. However, for a period of perhaps two weeks they were calling in sick in large numbers, so that on some days there were as many as 600 policemen reporting sick. It's just a problem of money with regard to the police. They tried to combat this one day by insisting that all policemen who had called in sick report in and have doctors examine them. Well, they were a little unlucky, because one of the men who reported in keeled over when he got there because he obviously was sick. In a police force of several thousand you always will have a percentage of people who are sick. This has not been resolved. It is a case in which a very substantial number of policemen have stopped short of a strike, but they have exercised other alternatives. Among the other things that they did on one or two days was to stop writing traffic tickets. This had quite an impact on the municipal budget. These and other things only illustrate that you don't need to have the right to strike to be able to exert power.

QUESTION: What are the basic differences between collective bargaining in the private sector and collective bargaining in the public sector?

DR. AARON: In the first place, when you're dealing in a private sector, within certain limits the union has the right to withhold its services, to go on strike. The employer has certain limited responses he can make to that–he can just try to wait out the union or he can try to operate during the strike and there are various federal and state agencies which would assist the parties to reach an agreement. The employer makes his own decision. He doesn't have to go somewhere else to decide what kind of an arrangement he can take in settlement of the strike.

If you're dealing with the federal or state government, in the first place you've got limitations on the right to strike, legal limitations at any rate. And secondly–and I think this goes to the heart of the problem of public bargaining–very frequently the agency with which the union and public employees have bargained doesn't have the final say. The union maybe asking for more money from the school board whose budget has already been determined, and even if the board wanted to grant the union's demands it may find it impossible to do so. That's one of the reasons why in the Taylor Report in New York the commission recommended very strongly that bargaining precede the final determination of what monies would be available for the year, so that when the parties got to bargain the people representing the government would be able to go to their principals and say, "Look, we think this is a fair arrangement and you've got to provide the money." Limitations on bargaining of the government are very, very much more stringent, particularly when the federal agency budget has already been determined by Congress or will be determined by Congress. I don't know if that gets to the heart of the question.

DR. STIEBER: I think in this respect there is much more room and scope for negotiation at the local level than there is at the state or the federal level. For example, you cannot as a classified civil service employee bargain over wages, because wages for civil service employees are set by Congress. I have read some very learned articles which make a very good case for the view that really as long as you cannot negotiate over wages and salaries you really cannot call it collective bargaining.

This is exactly the situation in which I was involved in just before coming out here. I was appointed fact-finder in a school district where they happened to reach an impasse. I went and held a hearing and found that the basic issue was over the salary schedule. The school board had already gone to the voters and gotten authorization for two and a half million tax increase. The main beef of the teachers was that really they had no business asking for only two and one-half million, because the teachers had told the Board that they would need at least five million in order to give the teachers what they wanted. The superintendent of schools said the Board felt that based on the fact that this city had just voted an income tax and the State of Michigan was just about to vote an income tax, they felt that anything above two and one-half million would be voted down, and he cited some very apt illustrations about neighboring communities where they had gone in for a higher millage and had been voted down.

Here was a situation where the teachers were asking for a certain amount of money which the school board was in effect saying we don't say that you're not worth it and that you're not entitled to it, but the fact of the matter is that our budget for next year has been set, and there they were. Now, private situations like that would never occur, because there is nothing in the last analysis to prevent the employer, if he is faced with a situation where the union is demanding more, from making a decision. He might make a decision (1) to raise the price of his product, (2) to close down certain unprofitable operations, or (3) to take a strike or other possibilities. But this is only one illustration of the great difference between bargaining in the public and private sectors.

DR. ROBERTS: Was there a question back there, Art?

QUESTION: What would you do about a strike in a hospital?

DR. AARON: I think one of the big problems in hospital situations is that first of all you've faced with the undeniable fact that while they are beginning very slowly to catch up, most hospital employees all around the country are very, very badly underpaid and over worked, and their general working conditions are pretty bad. The reason I think in part is that in the typical private, non-profit hospital the Board of Trustees usually are wealthy people who are very concerned about providing hospital care and are very cost-conscious. They say we're giving all our time and energy without compensation and we think everybody ought to do the same, you know. They expect their employees to work and make their livelihood under clearly substandard conditions and when the employees want to bargain, they are told how can you do anything to interfere with providing health services for sick people.

I think we have to bring hospital administrations into the 20th century in terms of their duty to provide for their employees as well as for their patients. The problem is sky rocketing hospital costs. We all know the kind of hospital care and medical care that we want. Everybody wants to go first-class, but none of us can afford it really, and everytime we get increases in benefits for patients or increases in pay and improved working conditions for people who work in the hospitals, we get increased costs to the patients, and we just have to reach some kind of an agreement in our society about how far we are going to go with providing good medical care. We certainly should not ask the hospital workers to subsidize the rest of us. For a long time we've been exploiting the nurses and the nurses finally just got sick of it. Now the nurses are about as militant a group of employees as you will find anywhere. And it's just a matter of time before all the other people who work in the hospitals are going to react the same way. We can't deal with that problem by telling them that they don't have the right to strike.

DR. FEINSINGER: Mr. Chairman, with your permission. I'd like to spend a minute or two to discuss the problem on a broader spectrum.

I started with the assumption that the world of force is gone and to determine disputes of any kind by means of military force, diplomatic, political, and even the judicial–that leaves the question as to how the disputes are to be decided other than by force. The newly emerging nations are saying to us, "Give us back our burdens, Mr. White Man; we will carry it ourselves."

Now mediation in a broader sense includes any kind of voluntary action. With that thought in mind we have established in the past three years at the University of Wisconsin Law School what we call a Center for Teaching and Research in Dispute Settlements with heavy emphasis obviously on civil rights disputes. But it's not limited to civil rights disputes. They cover the war area. They have labor-management disputes; I think some of you are born with just labor-management. I know I am. And the question is, how do you make the mediator? Does he have to be born this? Do you teach a man to become a mediator? That's one thing. The second thing is to take a successful mediator in the labor-management field. Like the rest of us who has made a name for himself, can he transfer those skills from the labor-management field to other fields such as civil rights disputes and international disputes? Then we have a whole host of other terms. Let me give you an example of what we're trying to do.

There is a law suit by the Frank Lloyd Wright Foundation against the City of Madison over a little item of $350,000. The case has gone up to the State Supreme Court, back down. They appointed an Arbitration Board. They have two members of the Senate office, one is their arbitrator, and the other is going to present the case. What a nuisance I admit. Same thing on the other side and with a great deal of difficulty getting a man who would be willing to serve in this group. First one they got died and I agreed to serve and, of course, we have a problem explaining to other people that this isn't a fatal assignment. They finally got him and by this time each side had spent $150,000 with fees of one kind or another and they haven't even got the show off the ground and on the road. What do you get off the ground?

At any rate, the Mayor asked me if I would mediate with a little more preparation than that. Well, the point of it is the city had offered to pay $25,000. But the real difference of opinion is $50,000 as the Foundation had offered to settle for $75,000, not $350,000.

I said, "This is very interesting. I am going to call the newspapers for a press conference. Since each of you has already spent $150,000, the real difference between you is only $50,000. That is not fair because we did intend to get the case all cleared up."

Later a friend of mine who is a very prominent lawyer in Los Angeles told me, "You better stay out of Los Angeles. Your name is mud with the lawyers," and I said, "What's the matter now?" "Oh," he said, "they heard about that settlement you forced on the Frank L. Wright Foundation and they don't like it."

If you use the word mediation to a civil rights man, he'll kill you, not literally. You won't like him because he says mediation means compromise. We are talking here of God-given and Constitutional protected rights and there is no room for compromise. I can understand that, but you see the assumption of mediation is always compromise is not a fair assumption. A lot of times one side or another is out on the limb. It doesn't have a case at all. It's very, very embarrassing to come along with somebody else and save face for him. And now in any case if anybody wants to know something about the mediation settlement, you write me at the Law School. It's just--life is a seamless web--you can't slice it into a labor-management dispute, civil rights dispute, international dispute. It's all one ball of wax. For purposes of this kind and for instruction, you have to divide the world up into slices, this whole industrial relations. I say you should consider labor-management relations as the total concept of the society in which we are living including this whole business of civil rights in the nation.

QUESTION: Is the traditional type of bargaining becoming obsolete? Is there a trend toward bargaining on the real issues from the beginning, instead of waiting for the end of negotiations?

DR. AARON: I think that this is one of the areas where it is very hard to generalize, because we don't have any uniform structure of bargaining throughout industry or in the public sector. There is certainly a marked trend away from so-called crisis bargaining in the sense that nothing can be done until just shortly before the agreement is due to expire. In some of the big industries informal bargaining goes on more or less continuously and parties are constantly working at it the year around. There is a good deal of informal exploration and by the time the parties meet for formal negotiations they pretty well have an idea of what has to be settled. But I think you have to allow for a certain amount of just formal ritual. People expect it. The membership of the union and the stockholders of the corporation would be, I think, a little disconcerted if the parties simply announced that they have reached an understanding.

And of course, as the bargaining continues on a more and more sophisticated level, the problems become much more difficult, so that there really is genuine disagreement. I was interested in a statement reported in the press about the use of computers in collective bargaining, indicating that some day the computer could take over a good part of the bargaining. The implication being that people are really just not sure about the facts, and that's what takes time and causes the trouble, and the computer could run through various proposals and come out with the facts and the parties would be bound by that.

Actually, I think more and more what the parties are arguing about is something far more fundamental; that is, the whole question of what proportionate share of the total income of the corporation should go in the way of profits to the enterprise, to greater benefits to the employees, lower prices to the consumer and so forth. And there is also in negotiations, like this year's auto negotiation, fundamental questions of what should be the nature of the employment relationship. Should all wage earners be switched to salaries for example? Now these are points that, even with careful background preparation, are going to require very hard bargaining and undoubtedly will have to go to some kind of a crisis point before a resolution can be reached.

Well, I think the millenium is far from here, but I do think that there is a great deal of important ground work and careful preparation for bargaining that has never existed before in some of the major industries, but it will not in my judgment fully supplant the last mile or so of tough bargaining, the long hours, sometimes, of bargaining to mutual exhaustion and so forth.

QUESTION: Was the joint resolution of Congress on the railway disputes mediation, fact-finding, or compulsory arbitration?

DR. AARON: What it is is an attempt to reach some settlement, but with the added sword of Damocles over the heads of the parties indicating that if they cannot reach an agreement then the recommendationsmade by the Commission or Board will become in effect a compulsory arbitration award. I'd like to say just one cool word about that. I was a member of the first compulsory arbitration board that was established in 1963 by Congress to settle the last railroad dispute with the operating brotherhoods. You recall that there were a number of issues that were referred for mediation, but two of them having to do with whether firemen should continue to be employed on diesel engines in freight service, and what should be the size of the train crew. Those two were to be settled by final and binding arbitration.

For some 20 years or more, I've been telling my students that compulsory arbitration is not a good means of settling labor disputes. But every once in a while I doubt the validity of that advice. Having served on this arbitration board I'm happy to report that I think I was telling them the truth all those 20 years. This board met pursuant to a statute that was a model of ambiguity, that had all kinds of restrictions built into it so that the public members, although there were three of them as opposed to two representing the union and two representing management, didn't really have the whip hand at all.

We spent nine weeks in hearings, hearing things that were totally irrelevant to the dispute, that merely rehashed what the parties had done in the preceding 18 months and with the Commission appointed by President Eisenhower, and then we had to make a decision. We were told that that decision would last for two years. Our decision was greeting with ill-concealed joy by the carriers, and with outrage by the brotherhoods who, however, had refused to give us any help in trying to get an equitable solution.

Then we sat back and watched what would happen. Well we knew, first of all, that the decision would be appealed to the courts, which it was. It went all the way up to the Supreme Court of the United States and it turned out that the law was constitutional, which was obvious, and that the decision met the terms of the statute, which I think was equally obvious, but they had just begun to fight. Under the Railway Labor Act any arbitration board can be reconvened at the request of either of the parties to interpret the award. So for the next two years, our arbitration board was reconvened sixteen times, each time for about three days at a time, always on weekends, in almost as many cities. We handed down over 300 separate interpretations of the award. And a great many of those in turn were taken to the courts. Many of the decisions critical to the whole operation of the award are still pending in the courts. At the end of the two years it was not certain as indeed isn't certain yet what the status of the award is.

In short we've settled nothing; absolutely nothing. But in the meantime some 18,000 firemen were put off the railroads. They got for the most part very substantial benefits but a great deal of human misery resulted, and Congress has been investigating it ever since. It's just a terrible way to handle anything, and it seems to me that if ever we needed proof that compulsory arbitration simply will not do what it is supposed to do, which is, to take something and settle it finally, this case is a perfect example of it. Now whether present law will do something better remains to be seen, but at least there the Board has the option of mediating, which we didn't have, and trying to reach a settlement, and the parties have a little more leeway in which to operate. I hope very strongly and I hope Ted Kheel's absence today help them do some good in this dispute. Maybe they can work out a settlement which will prevent the necessity for compulsory arbitration, but if those compulsory arbitration men were back in the same old muddle we had before, I don't think we will solve any problems at all.

DR. ROBERTS: Well, the word this morning wasn't very good from Senator Morse in the Senate. The law itself provides for a 30-day mediation which ends on the 16th and then there's 30 days of fact-finding. But the series of criteria which they don't have for the third time which I think deal with the guidelines. If that doesn't work, then they make their recommendations and then they have 30 days in which to file and these will last for two years for the effectiveness from January 1, 1967 to 1969.

Our time limit is up and I want to see if any of the members have any comments before we close our discussion.

ORGANIZATION AND COLLECTIVE BARGAINING IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR

by

Jack Stieber*

Each decade since the 1930s has had at least one major law dealing with labor relations: the Wagner Act of 1935, the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, and the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959. All have excluded government employers and employees from their purview. The 1960s, barely half over, have already earned the right to go down in labor relations history as the decade of the public employee. At the Federal, state and local levels of government, public employees are organizing, engaging in negotiations, and giving voice to grievances against their employers; in short, they are beginning to act like all other employees. Equally important, legislatures are passing laws according public employees most of the rights won by workers in private industry thirty years ago.

This paper discusses the growth of public employee organization and collective bargaining, analyses different approaches to some basic issues, and points up implications of this significant development for the future.

*I should like to acknowledge the assistance of Michael Masternak, research assistant in the School of Labor and Industrial Relations, Michigan State University, in the preparation of this paper.

Organization of Government Employees

Government is the largest and fastest-growing industry in the United States. In 1965 one out of every six nonagricultural wage and salary employees was on the public payroll which totaled 10 million, 3 million more than in 1955. By 1975 government employment is expected to increase to about 15 million and comprise one out of every five employees in the country.

Almost all of the increase in government employment since 1955 has occurred at the state and local level. At 2.4 million, Federal civilian employment in 1965 had risen by only 200,000, or 13 percent, over 1955; during the same period the nation's population increased by 17 percent and state and local government employees increased from 4.7 million to 7.7 million, about 65 percent. By 1975, the Bureau of Labor Statistics projects an increase in Federal civilian manpower requirements of less than 10 percent, while state and local government needs will rise by 60 percent, a far greater increase than anticipated for any other industry.[1] Population is expected to rise by about 16 percent during the next decade.

The major reason for this phenomenal growth in government employment is the increased demand for services that are supplied by government, the most important by far being education. One out of every two state and local employees is employed in education. Other government growth industries include the supplying of health and hospital services, highway construction and maintenance, natural resource conservation, national defense and related activities.

Given the tremendous growth in government employment, trade union membership among government employees might also be expected to have increased. This has indeed happened. The BLS reports that union membership in government rose from 915,000 in 1956 to 1,453,000 in 1964, an increase of almost 60 percent.[2] More than 40 percent of the increase occurred between 1962 and 1964, and 70 percent after 1960. During the same eight-year period, 1956 - 1964, trade union membership in the private sector of the economy decreased by more than 700,000 or 4 percent.

As a result of these contrasting trends, government employees comprised 8.1 percent of total trade union membership in 1964 as compared with 5.1 percent in 1956. Furthermore, while the proportion of union members in the entire labor force declined from 25 percent to 22 percent and the ratio to nonagricultural workers dropped from 33 percent to 29 percent, the percentage among government employees rose from 12 percent in 1956 to 16 percent in 1964. This membership was rather unevenly distributed as between the Federal level and state and local governments. In 1964, 900,000 or 38 percent of all Federal employees belonged to unions, while only 550, 000 or 7.5 percent of all state and local government employees were union members.

The rise of public employee unions has been spectacular. In September 1965, the AFL-CIO reported that three of the fastest growing unions during the preceding decade were exclusively in the public employee field: the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) which had 99,000 members in 1955 and 237,000 in 1965; the American Federation of Government Employees (AFGE) which increased its membership from 47,000 to 132,000; and the American Federation of Teachers which rose from 40,000 to 97,000 members.[3] In early 1966 the AFSCME claimed 288,000 members, the AFGE 180,000 members and the Teachers Union 115,000 members.[4]

Organization of government employees is not a recent development. Craftsmen in naval instellations have been organized since the early part of the nineteenth century. Unions currently affiliated with the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Department have a long history of organization in Federal employment. The most important of these, the International Association of Machinists, established its District 44 in 1904 to work solely in Federal employment and in 1966 reported 44,000 public employee members.

The earliest union composed entirely of Federal postal employees, the National Association of Letter Carriers, was organized in the late 19th century and was one of the first affiliates of the AFL. Today more than a half million postal workers belong to some dozen unions, most of which have existed for many years, frequently in the face of pronounced hostility.

Unions have been far less active in the classified service, which makes up about half of all Federal employment and accounts for almost all Federal white-collar employees. Less than ten percent of these employees are union members. Most of them belong to the AFGE, chartered by the AFL in 1933 and affiliated with the AFL-CIO, and to a large number of independent unions. Thus the history of union organization in the Federal Government parallels that of private industry. The President's Task Force on Employee-Management Relations in the Federal Service noted that "the more similar a government activity is to that of a private activity in which workers are normally organized, the more often it will be found that the government workers are also organized and the relations with management officials approach the pattern of such relations in private industry."[5]

At the state and local level the oldest and strongest national union is the International Association of Fire Fighters affiliated with the AFL-CIO. This union, which had its origins in the local firemen's benefit societies and social clubs of the late 1800s, claimed 115,000 members in 1964, 90 percent of all eligible employees. More recent arrivals on the scene are the State, County and Municipal Workers and the Teachers Union, mentioned earlier. Other national unions active at the local level include the Teamsters, Building Service Employees, Transport Workers and various building trades.

Important as the gains in union membership have been at all levels of public employment, the predominant form of organization among public employees is still the independent association. By far the largest and most important organization is the National Education Association with about one million national members and a total membership in excess of 1.5 million including state associations. Some 90 percent of the nation's teachers are estimated to be enrolled in the national organization or its state and local affiliates. In many states, associations of civil service employees represent the prevalent form of membership. In California, more than half of all state and local employees belong to some 260 independent associations. In New York, the Governor's Committee on Public Employee Relations reported that there were 650 association-type local employee organizations-- more than twice the number of union locals in the state. In Michigan, the Michigan State Employees Association claims 15,000 members and is the principal rival of the AFSCME in organizing state civil service employees. This picture is duplicated in many other states.

At the Federal level, Executive Order 10988 issued in January 1962 has resulted in a proliferation of organizations representing employees in various agencies. In addition to the 29 affiliates of the AFL-CIO Government Employees Council and IAM District 44 which left the Council in 1966, one finds such organizations as the following competing in representation elections: the National Association of Government Employees (Independent), Organization of Professional Employees of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, Patent Office Society, National Association of Internal Revenue Employees, Federal Tobacco Inspectors Mutual Association, Air Traffic Controllers Association, Federal Plant Quarantine Inspectors Mutual Association, National Association of Federal Veterinarians, and many others.

The increased organization of Federal employees can be largely ascribed to E.O. 10988. But what accounts for the upsurge of organization at the state and local level?

To some extent unions and associations in the states and municipalities also benefited from E.O. 10988. President Kennedy's espousal of collective bargaining for Federal employees encouraged some states to follow suit and provided an impetus to employee organizations at the state and local level. Several states passed laws providing for recognition of and negotiations with employee organizations. A number of other jurisdictions provided for union recognition through resolutions, ordinances, civil service rules, charter amendments, executive orders, and departmental codes.

These official actions were important. But there were other factors. Labor unions devoted more energy and resources to the task of organizing government employees. They became more militant, they organized demonstrations, picketed, talked tough to public officials and on occasion called strikes to back up their demands, even though they knew such action was prohibited. A few dramatic breakthrough agreements, such as the 1961 contract covering 44,000 New York City teachers, helped union organization in other cities and states. Associations of teachers nurses, and civil service employees reacted to the union challenge by acting more like unions themselves, while at the same time insisting on their basic professional orientation.

The U. S. Supreme Court's reapportionment decisions in 1962 and 1964 helped the tide along. Reconstituted legislatures, more representative of urban centers, were more friendly to labor and sympathetic to collective bargaining for public employees. Michigan provides a dramatic example of the effect of reapportionment. The first legislature in 20 years controlled by Democrats, drawn heavily from the populated urban areas of the state, passed the Public Employee Relations Act of 1965, amending the punitive Hutchison Act which had provided for automatic discharge of any government employee engaging in a strike but made no provision for recognition of public employee organizations and collective bargaining. The amended Act continued to prohibit strikes but also included provisions governing certification of employee representatives, unfair labor practices, mediation of disputes and fact-finding. In Delaware, a reapportioned legislature also passed a new labor relations law for public employees. Since the impact of reapportionment on state legislatures has only begun, we may find other states changing their laws on organization and bargaining for public employees as the composition of their membership changes.

The relatively unfavorable earnings and fringe benefits of government employees in many states as compared with private industry provide a fertile field for cultivation by unions. Tighter labor markets and rising prices have already boosted negotiated settlements in private industry, possibly widening the gap between employees in industry and government. In addition, personnel management in the public service has not kept pace with the Professionalization and advances made in private industry since the 1930s, under the impetus of the Wagner and Taft-Hartley Acts and the pressures exerted by unions. These factors, taken together, have improved the environment for the growth of unions and other employee organizations in public employment.

Experience Under Executive Order 10988

As of June 1965 there were some 2,473,000 Federal government employees distributed as follows among three basic categories: 1,260,000 classified employees, 621,000 wage board employees and 592,000 postal employees.[6] Salaries of the classified and postal employees are established by Congressional action. Wage board employees consist largely of blue-collar workers whose wage scales are determined by periodic surveys of prevailing wage rates for similar occupations in the labor market area in which they are employed.

Several months after his inauguration President Kennedy kept his campaign pledge to promote collective bargaining in the Federal service. In June 1961 he appointed a Task Force, chaired by Secretary of Labor Goldberg and made up of high administration officials, to review and advise him on employee-management relations in the Federal Service. Prior to this time the only existing legislation governing relations between Federal employees and agencies was the Lloyd-LaFollette Act of 1912 which provided protection for the right of postal employees to join unions and petition Congress. It was, in effect, Congress's response to the "gag order" first imposed by President Theodore Roosevelt in 1902 and made more restrictive by President Taft in 1909. The order prohibited any Federal employee or official from responding to any request for information from any committee or member of Congress "except through and as authorised by the head of his department."[7]

The Task Force report noted that although 33 percent of all Federal employees belonged to national employee organizations, membership varied greatly among agencies, from the Post Office in which 84 percent of employees belonged to unions to the Department of State where "a careful search uncovered a total of 11 members."[8] There existed within the Executive Branch no policy on employee-management relations. The result was wide variation among agencies in their dealings with employee organizations. Of 57 departments and agencies studied by the Task Force, 22 had no stated labor relations policies; 11 had the "barest minimum of policy" giving employees the right to join or not to join employee organizations; 21 engaged in discussion with employee organizations on limited local problems. Only the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Interior Department had extensive relations with unions and other employee organizations including mediation and arbitration, and written agreements on pay scales, classifications, hours of work, grievances and fringe benefits.

The Task Force report, submitted in November 1961, served as the basis for Executive Order 10988 which was signed by President Kennedy on January 17, 1962. The Order gave all Federal employees the right to join or not to join organizations of their own choosing, and granted exclusive recognition and the right to enter into agreement with an agency to any organization which represents a majority of the employees in an appropriate unit. In order to attain exclusive recognition, an organization must receive a majority of all votes cast in an election participated in by at least 60 percent of the employees eligible to vote and present at the installation on election day. The latter requirement goes beyond the Taft-Hartley Act, which requires a simple majority of those voting.

A new feature was introduced by the provision of two lower levels of recognition: formal recognition for organizations with at least 10 percent of the employees in a unit where no other organization has been granted exclusive recognition; and informal recognition for any organization with less than 10 percent membership. Formal recognition carries with it the right to be consulted in the formulation and implementation of personnel policies and practices and on matters affecting working condition. Informal recognition gives an organization the right to be heard on matters of interest to its members.

The Order provided that a dispute over the scope of an appropriate unit be resolved by the Secretary of Labor, who could resort to advisory arbitration. As of April 1966, 43 advisory arbitration decisions had been rendered and all had been accepted by the agency and organization involved.[9]

A Code of Fair Labor Practices, promulgated by the President in May 1963, is roughly equivalent to the unfair labor practices contained in the Taft-Hartley Act, with two important additions: strikes and picketing are prohibited and employee organizations may not discriminate against any employee with regard to terms and conditions of membership because of race, colow, creed or national origin.

During its first four years of operation the program showed the following results:[10]

1. About one-third (835,000) of all civilian employees were represented in 800 exclusive bargaining units.

However, deducting postal employees, this figure decreases to 16 percent or 320,000 employees. For a more meaningful picture we must look at each of the three main types of employment: about 87 percent of all postal employees were in exclusive units and worked under collective bargaining agreements; one-third of all wage-board employees were in exclusive units but only about one-fourth (170,000 out of 621,000) worked under agreements; only 7 percent of all classified employees were in exclusive units and only 4 percent (52,000 out of 1,260,000) were covered by agreements.[10a] Of the three groups, only wage-board employees have shown a significant increase in exclusive unit coverage since 1963 -- from 16 percent to 33 percent of the total.

2. Nine out of ten employees in exclusive units worked in the Post Office Department.

3. AFL-CIO unions represented 87 percent of all employees in exclusive units and 80 percent of employees outside of the post office. Ninety percent of the employees in the AFL-CIO are represented by a postal union, the AFGE, or a Metal Trades Council. In units belonging to independent associations, 90 percent of the employees are represented by an independent postal union, the National Association of Internal Revenue Employees (NAIRE) or the National Association of Government Employees (NAGE).

4. More than half of the 429 agreements negotiated have been in the Defense Department and about 85 percent are with AFL-CIO unions. Outside of the Post Office and the Defense Departments, only a little more than one-half of the employees in exclusive units work under negotiated agreements, most of them with AFL-CIO unions.

5. In 1965, 262 additional exclusive units covering almost 118,000 employees were recognized, and 217 additional agreements covering 158,000 employees were negotiated.

Bargainable issues were severely circumscribed by Section 7 of Executive Order 10988 which enumerated "certain matters" reserved for management decision. These include the right to direct employees, to hire, promote, transfer; to assign employees and to suspend, demote, discharge or discipline employees; to relieve employees from duties because of lack of work or for other legitimate reasons; and to determine the methods, means and personnel by which operations are to be conducted. Section 6(b) of the Order further notes that the obligation to negotiate "shall not be construed to extend to such areas of discretion and policy as the mission of an agency, its budget, its organization and the assignment of its personnel, or the technology of performing its work." These restrictions are in addition to such important conditions of employment as salaries of classified employees, pensions, insurance and other fringe benefits, which are established by Congress.

The strong "management rights" clause which is included in every agreement goes beyond what is usually found in agreements in private industry. The kind of subjects included in agreements negotiated between Federal agencies and employee organizations is illustrated by a 1964 BLS report which listed 44 types of provisions found in such contracts including: hours of work and overtime, holiday pay, rest periods, working and/or cleanup provisions, special clothing, work by supervisors, subcontracting, safety, leave ppolicies, jury duty, craft jurisdiction, wage surveys, promotions and demotions, reductions in force, job descriptions and ratings, apprenticeship and training, check-off of dues, mediation and advisory arbitration of grievances.[11]

Despite the acknowledged success of the Executive Order in promoting union membership and collective bargaining, employee organizations would like to see some changes made in the Order and more particularly in its administration by individual agencies. Their complaints focus on the following issues:[12]

1. Bilateral collective bargaining versus unilateral regulations: Except for the agency-wide agreements in the Post Office and the Railroad Retirement Board, all agreements are negotiated at the local level and must be approved by the agency head. But personnel managers at the agency level have been too restrictive in delegating authority to local managers to permit meaningful negotiations. Too often they issue rules and regulations on matters that should be subject to negotiation.

2. The grievance procedure: There are too many exclusions from the grievance procedure in most agreements, and agencies have rarely been willing to agree to advisory arbitration in adverse action proceedings. These include position and classification cases, disciplinary cases, and disputes as to the interpretation and application of the agreement if not based on an individual grievance. There have been instances in which management has refused to comply with an advisory arbitration award. This has lead to demands that arbitration be made final and binding.

3. The scope of collective bargaining: Despite necessary limitations on matters subject to negotiations, there is far more room for bargaining than most agencies permit. Wage and salary determination is a good example. While Civil Service determines the content and coverage for grades, an agency can permit union participation in developing policies for determining grades and steps for its employees. But only a few agencies follow this practice. Furthermore, for wage board employees, and under the comparability principle of the Federal Salary Reform Act of 1962, there should be bilateral procedures for selecting comparable firms, key jobs and geographical areas to be surveyed for determining rates of pay.

4. Collective bargaining impasses: Only 10 percent of all agreements provide for outside mediation and 25 percent for fact-finding and referral to higher authority in the agency when an impasse occurs in collective bargaining. Without the strike weapon, these procedures take on added importance to a union which is already bargaining from a very weak position.

5. Unfair practice charges: Hearing officers, selected from employees of the agency involved, merely rubberstamp the action of supervisors and management officials. A few agencies have offered to use outside arbitrators as hearing officers and the Labor Department has encouraged this practice. Some unions favor turning over administration of the Order to an impartial agency or board similar to the NLRB. Others would like to see the Department of Labor given more responsibility and the Civil Service Commission less in administering the Executive Order.

Agencies too have had complaints, particularly over the amount of time consumed in collective bargaining and handling of grievances. Their major problem however has involved the training of thousands of management officials to carry out their responsibilities under the order. Unions have also faced this problem with respect to training of representatives and stewards. Both have embarked on extensive training programs, making use of universities which have labor and management education programs.

Experience in the States[13]

Legislation governing organization and collective bargaining in public employment ranges from several states with comprehensive laws, to some with laws for particular groups of employees, such as police and firemen, transit workers and teachers. Most states, however, have no labor relations statues dealing specifically with public employees. There have also been numerous court decisions and opinions by state attorneys general relating to labor-management relations in the public service.

Our definition of a "comprehensive" law is one which applies to a substantial proportion of all public employees and not only contains provisions regarding the right to organize and bargain collectively, but also establishes machinery for determining bargaining representatives, dealing with unfair labor practice charges where they are included in the law, and mediating disputes. The laws in at least six states -- Connecticut, Delaware, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin -- met these criteria as of June 1966, all but Wisconsin's having been passed or substantially revised within the last two years. Oregon's law gives all public employees the right to organize and bargain collectively, but only classified state employees have a procedure established by the Civil Service Commission for certification of representatives. In addition, California, Connecticut, Oregon, Rhode Island and Washington have separate statutes regulating teacher-school board relations which are administered by state education agencies.[14]

Even the comprehensive state laws do not apply to all public employees and employers: The Connecticut law covers only municipal employees but specifically excludes certified teachers who are dealt with in another law; Delaware includes state and county employees, but a municipality is covered only upon affirmative legislative action by its common council or other governing body and teachers are specifically excluded from coverage; the Massachusetts law does not apply to policemen; state civil service employees are excluded from coverage in Michigan by the 1963 Constitution; the Minnesota law does not apply to teachers; the Wisconsin statute does not apply to employees of the state government who are covered by a separate law which becomes effective January 1, 1967.

The right of public employees to organize is recognized in almost all states. Ironically, right-to-work laws have been the vehicle for protecting this right in a few states. In Arkansas, a statute prohibiting police officers from belonging to a union was invalidated under the state's right-to-work law which gives employees the right to join or refuse to join unions; and, in Texas, the courts have overturned city ordinances banning union membership by public employees as violations of the right-to-work amendment to the state constitution. In North Carolina, public employees are prohibited from belonging to any labor organization which is affiliated with any national or international union.[15]

The right of employees and the duty of public employers to bargain collectively is less widely recognized. In addition to the states mentioned above, a number of others, including Alaska, California, Idaho, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, New Hampshire, Oregon and Wyoming, have authorized collective bargaining for public employees generally or for specific groups such as transit workers or fire fighters. Some states, however, have expressly prohibited collective bargaining by public employees or declared any agreements reached to be unenforceable. Included in this group are: Alabama, Colorado, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, North Carolina, Texas and Virginia. A few states, including New York, permit employees to organize and bargain collectively but do not impose a correlative duty upon employers to bargain.

On one issue, all states, the courts, and opinions of attorneys-general are in agreement: public employees are prohibited from stroking. It is interesting to note that five of the six states with comprehensive laws, although expressly prohibiting strikes by public employees do not spell out penalties for striking employees. Only Minnesota specifies such penalties, including termination of employment, and if reappointed, employees may not be paid more than before the strike, must wait at least one year for any increase in compensation, serve a two-year probation period and lose tenure rights. These penalties are similar to those contained in the Conlin-Wadlin law of New York State and in other states which detail penalties for strikers.

Laws recognizing the right to organize and bargain collectively are of limited value unless machinery is set up to implement and administer them. The Michigan Act, which is fairly typical, gives the Labor Mediation Board authority to determine the unit appropriate for collective bargaining, and to hold elections and certify and decertify exclusive bargaining representatives. The Act lists "unlawful" employer practices which parallel the unfair labor practices in Section 8(a) of the National Labor Relations Act: interfering, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights; dominating or interfering with any labor organization; discriminating against employees in order to encourage or discourage membership in a labor organization; discriminating against employees for giving testimony or instituting proceedings under the Act; refusing to bargain collectively. The Michigan law differs from Laws in Wisconsin, Massachusetts and Connecticut in that it does not specify "unlawful" acts on the part of labor organizations. The Chairman of the Labor Mediation Board has stated that the legislature considered a listing of unfair practices for employees unnecessary on the theory that a public employer may discipline or discharge a striking public employee.[16]

The Michigan statute requires that the Board's mediation and labor relations functions be administered separately. The Board also has authority to conduct fact-finding when there is an impasse in collective bargaining. Either the employer or the employee representative may petition to have a Hearing Officer, usually a member of the Board's staff, assigned by the Board, who will hear testimony and submit his report and recommendations to the Board and the parties. The Board then reviews the entire record, including any comments from the parties, and issues its report which may "affirm, modify or reverse" the Hearing Officer's report. This final report is made public but is not binding on the parties. Other states with fact-finding procedures, including Connecticut, Massachusetts, Minnesota and Wisconsin, usually appoint outsiders rather than staff members and publish the fact-finders' report without modification. A few states permit the fact-finder(s) to try to mediate the dispute before issuing a report.

In Michigan and in most other states, arbitration is provided only upon request of the parties. A few states, however, provide for compulsory arbitration of disputes affecting specific groups of employees: Rhode Island for firemen and policemen; Wyoming for fire fighters; Nebraska for disputes involving "government service in a proprietary capacity or service of a public utility"; Maine requires all agreements involving fire fighters to contain a no-strike provision and an alternative method of settling disputes by arbitration.

Of the six states with comprehensive laws, only Delaware does not provide for fact-finding. Wisconsin has had the most experience with fact-finding in public employee disputes, although a number of other states have utilized this procedure for emergency disputes in private industry. During the first four years of experience under Wisconsin's law, 108 petitions for fact-finding were filed. Fact-finders were appointed in 38 of these cases; 49 were resolved by mediation prior to appointment of a fact-finder; 10 were withdrawn or consolidated with other cases; and 11 cases were pending as of June 30, 1966.[17] Professor James Stern has analyzed the first three years of experience with fact-finding in Wisconsin and concluded that "the law has made a substantial contribution to the improvement of collective bargaining among public employees ..."[18] Over 70 percent of the fact-finding awards have served as the basis for settlement of disputes. Stern specifically noted that the Wisconsin Act has served to avoid the strife experienced in some other states in disputes involving teachers.

No discussion of state laws regulating labor relations in the public sector would be complete without reference to the 1966 experience in New York State which illustrates some of the political obstacles to legislating in this area.

New York City had the first thorough-going code of labor relations for municipal employees anywhere in the country.[19] The program grew out of an Executive Order of 1958, issued by Mayor Wagner, providing for exclusive recognition on the basis of majority rule, procedures for unit determination and certification, and machinery for resolving bargaining impasses. But at the state level there was no statute governing labor relations in public employment, except for the punitive and ineffective Conlin-Wadlin law. The New York City transit strike of January 1966 put added pressure behind efforts to replace this law with a more realistic and comprehensive statute.

Governor Rockefeller appointed a Committee on Public Employee Relations consisting of five public members and chaired by Professor George Taylor "to make legislative proposals for protecting the public against the disruption of vital public services by illegal strokes, while at the same time protecting the rights of public employees."[20] In New York City, a tripartite panel, originally set up under Mayor Wagner to review the experience under the 1958 Order and to develop "improved collective bargaining procedures", was continued by Mayor Lindsay.[21] Both groups submitted their reports on March 31, 1966.

The Governor's Committee make the following major recommendations:

1. The Conlin-Wadlin Law should be repealed and replaced by a statute which would grant public employees the right to organization and representation; empower the State, local governments and other political subdivisions to recognize, negotiate with, and enter into written agreements with employee organization; and create a Public Employment Relations Board (PERB) to assist in resolving disputes with respect to the representative status of employee organizations in State departments and in local governments.

2. To resolve disputes which reach an impasse in the course of collective negotiations, all written agreements should include procedures, developed by the parties, to invoke in the event of such an impasse in advance of budget submission. Should the impasse persist, the PERB is empowered to mediate the dispute, and if no settlement is reached, to appoint a fact-finding board of public members with power to make public recommendations.

If the fact-finders' recommendations are rejected by either party, the appropriate State or local legislative body should hold a "form of 'show cause hearing'" at which the parties would review their positions prior to final legislative action.

3. Strikes or threats of strikes by public employees should be subject to court injunction. Any organization violating the injunction could be fined in an amount left to the discretion of the court. Individual employees participating in strikes would be subject to reprimand, fine, demotion, suspension, or dismissal, depending on the extent of their misconduct.

The report of the tripartite New York City panel was directed at the specific problems of the largest and most complex city in the nation, in which unions had achieved a much higher degree of economic and political power than elsewhere in the state and where public officials had had considerable experience in collective bargaining. This report was not proposed as an alternative to the report of the Governor's Committee. Nevertheless, coming at the same time as the State report and diverging from that report's recommendations in some important respects, it was inevitable that the differences between the two would be highlighted and become important in the political maneuvering in the State legislature.

The New York City report was in the form of a memorandum signed by the Deputy Mayor and Corporation Counsel for the City and by nine leaders of employee organizations, and endorsed by the four public members. It provided:

1. A declaration of policy that the City will engage in collective bargaining and enter into written agreements with employee organizations holding certification to represent employees in designated bargaining units.

2. A detailed exposition of the subjects coming within the scope of collective bargaining and those excluded, a management rights clause, and procedures to be followed in negotiations and implementation of agreements under various circumstances.

3. Establishment of an Office of Collective Bargaining (OCB) to be administered by a tripartite board, including a full-time impartial Chairman. The OCB was empowered to make certain that each party complies with its obligations; to oversee adherence to collective bargaining procedures; to administer procedures for resolving deadlocks; to determine bargaining units, and certify and decertify bargaining agents; and to recommend changes and improvements.

4. The Chairman of the OCB was given authority to appoint mediators and, if authorized by a majority of the Board, a disputes panel with power to mediate, hold hearings, subpoena witnesses and records, and formulate recommendations to be released to the parties and the public.

5. Unilateral changes by the City in wages, hours, or working conditions, and strikes, slowdowns, work stoppages or mass absenteeism by employees, were prohibited during negotiations and for 30 days after a Disputes Panel filed its report.

6. All agreements would contain no-strike clauses for the term of the contract and provisions for grievance procedures terminating with final and binding arbitration, to the extent permitted by law.

The four public members of the panel, in a statement accompanying the memorandum, said: "Our professional judgment and national experience, generally, with fact-finding procedures convince us that these agreed-upon procedures will result in the peaceful settlement of disputes and make strikes unnecessary." But, they added, "strikes continue to be barred by existing state laws. We are aware that changes in these laws are under consideration. The problem of strikes of public employees is a matter for legislative policy. We have sought by agreement to develop procedures designed to make strikes unnecessary and have left to other forums the problem of dealing with other contingencies." Subsequently, the public members indicated that they were evenly divided on the question of prohibiting strikes in public employment.[21]

The major differences between the recommendations of the Governor's and the Mayor's Committees were: the use of an appointed all-public board as opposed to the tripartite Office of Collective Bargaining to administer the collective bargaining procedures; the final resort in the State report, to the legislature or other appropriate governmental body if either party rejects a fact-finding report; and the prohibition of strikes and prescription of penalties on unions and employee violators in the State report. The inability of the Republican-controlled Senate and the Democratic-controlled Assembly to agree on the handling of strikes led to the failure of any law to be enacted in the 1966 session of the Legislature. New York City is expected to put the tripartite panel's recommendations into effect by Executive Order or by a local ordinance. This action had not yet been taken as of the end of July 1966.

Comparison of Public and Private Employment

The foregoing analysis of state legislation in the public employment field indicates that the developing trend follows existing laws governing labor-management relations in private industry, except for the prohibition of strikes and the provision of alternative settlement procedures. Most unions favor this approach because they see little difference between employment in the private and public sectors. They focus upon the individual employee, his economic needs, his job and his fundamental rights as a citizen in a democratic society. Since public employees do not differ from those in private industry in terms of their economic requirements and desire to have a voice in determining their conditions of employment; since almost every job in public employment has its counterpart in private industry; and since management behaves the same was vis-a vis employees, union leaders see no reason why we should have different laws, procedures and institutions governing labor-management relations in the public and private sectors of the economy. They sum it up by calling for "first class citizenship" for public employees. The more militant unions, such as the State, County and Municipal Employees and the Teachers assert the right to strike and not infrequently practice it.

Some students of industrial relations have questioned the desirability of transferring, with little or no modification, the legal framework, concepts and institutions which have become well established in private industry to the public sector.[22] They prefer an approach which would take account of the important differences between public and private employment, both with regard to the unique characteristics of the state as employer and the indigenous development of organizations representing public employees.

The proponents of this view believe that public employees are entitled to the same basic rights as private industry employees: the right to organize, to be represented by organizations of their choice, and to engage in collective bargaining (or collective negotiations as some prefer to call it) with agreements reduced to writing. But, they point out, there are certain constraints operating in the public sector which make the complete transfer of private industry laws, practices and institutions either illegal, inappropriate or undesirable in the public sector. Among these they include the following:

1. Many of the terms and conditions of employment are mandated by legislative bodies or prescribed by civil service regulations. This acts as an important limitation on the scope of negotiations.

2. There is diffusion of decision-making authority to a much greater extent than in private industry. Private employer representatives have broad discretion to negotiate and commit the organization on almost all matters. The negotiators and top management constitute a closely knit "team." This is not true in the public sector. An agency head may have authority to negotiate on some issues but not on others which are state- or city-wide. Even the chief executive does not have the final say on the distribution of funds and can only submit recommendations to the legislative body, which has responsibility for the overall budget and levying of taxes to balance income and expenditures. And if the negotiated items include matters mandated by state law or civil service provisions, there is still an additional layer of decision-makers to go through. This has important implications for determining the appropriate unit and the appropriate scope of negotiations within a given unit of government.

3. The legal framework, procedures and institutions in private industry were developed as a response to certain characteristics, economic and social factors and historical events. To mention only a few: the strong antagonism and use of force by a large segment of private industry to prevent employees from organizing; the helplessness of the individual employee in the face of market forces and the complete and unilateral authority of the employer to hire and fire, set wages, hours and other conditions of employment; the existence of a labor movement dominated by one federation (except for the period 1935-1955) with a strong tradition of exclusive jurisdiction.

To the extent that these factors exist in the public sector and some of them are present though not to the same degree as was true in private industry before the Wagner act - transference of private industry laws and procedures may be appropriate. But we should be wary of transplating the complete system of private industrial relations into the unnatural and unreceptive environment of public employer-employee relations.

4. Cognizance must be taken of the two types of employee organizations existing in the public sector: the "association-type" and "union-type" of organizations. The former includes not only professional associations of teachers and school administrators, nurses and other employees, but also such unions as the fire fighters and the postal employees. Associations tend to prefer broader groupings of employees rather than the narrower bargaining units favored by unions, whose limits have been set with a view to winning elections. They normally include supervisors, while unions are limited to employees below the supervisory level. The association-type organizations have been less interested (at least until recently) in formal recognition, exclusive representation and written agreements than have unions, and have rejected the strike in favor of political pressure and lobbying for favorable laws and local ordinances.

It is too early to say which of these types is the "wave of the future" in the public sector. It is more likely that they will continue to co-exist and compete with one another. Indeed, one cannot rule out the possibility of merger, amalgamation or some form of loose affiliation among the two types of organization in some fields. But the issue should not be foreclosed by legislation or adoption of arrangements which pre-ordain the outcome by favoring one or the other type of organization. A period of competition and experimentation might have salutary results if carried on within certain ground rules, and if not permitted to hold back legislation and the development of constructive employer-employee relations in public employment.

5. Finally, the strike is unlawful in public employment and should be excluded from any system of industrial relations in the public service. (This will be discussed in the next section)

In addition to these constraints, there are doubts whether certain long-standing arrangements in private industry are suitable for dealing with the wide range of complex problems and issues facing employers and unions today. For example, Professor John Dunlop questions whether the concept of exclusive representation is as well suited to dealing with pensions and health and welfare benefits, which might better be negotiated on an industry basis, as it is for handling grievances and work rules which are best determined at the plant or enterprise level. Perhaps it would be better to have different units to deal with different issues. This is only one of a number of practices in private industry which might be re-examined. It happens to have particular relevance for public employment because of the many levels of decision-making found in government. Those engaged in labor relations in government have found that the "appropriate unit" problem is one of the most difficult to resolve.

The argument between the approaches outlined above has two facets. On the one hand, there is the question whether the differences between private and public employment are so great as to warrant significant modifications in the laws, procedures and institutions which have become engrained in American labor-management relations over the past thirty years. This question lends itself to research, discussion and negotiation, as well as to experimentation at the state and local level. Another question is the extent to which practices which have worked imperfectly in the private sector can be improved upon in public employment, and whether such improvements might serve as the basis for changes in the industrial relations system in private industry.

The idea that the states should serve as laboratories for social experimentation is one of the alleged advantages of the federal system of government. In the labor-management relations field the process has been the other way around, with the states patterning their laws on the Federal government. This has been true even in public employment where Executive Order 10988 helped to stimulate action at the state level. We doubt that Congress will follow the lead of the states in labor legislation. But this should not deter the states from rejecting those practices which have been found wanting in our Federal law and fashioning improvements to meet the peculiar problems of public employer-employee relations at the state and local level.

The Strike Issue

In private industry the strike is the ultimate weapon of employees in collective bargaining. In some cases - disputes affecting the national health and safety under the Taft-Hartley Act and those subject to the Railway Labor Act - strikes may be delayed for several months. But eventually, the union is free to use economic power, subject only to action by Congress.

Not so in the public sector. The strike is prohibited by Federal law, by a number of state statutes and court decisions. Presidents, Governors, Mayors and public officials -- liberal and conservative alike -- have generally supported the view that strikes by government employees cannot be tolerated. Calvin Coolidge, Governor of Massachusetts during the Boston police strike of 1919, said, "there is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, at any time." Franklin D. Roosevelt, while recognizing the right of government employees to organize, wrote, in a letter to the President of the National Federation of Federal Employees in 1937, ". . . A strike of public employees manifests nothing less than an attempt . . . to prevent or obstruct the operations of government until their demands are satisfied. Such actions looking toward the paralysis of government by those who have sworn to support it is (sic) unthinkable and intolerable."[23] Similar statements have been made by other public officials.

But, strikes of government employees have occurred. David Ziskind decumented such strikes in his book One Thousand Strikes of Government Employees published in 1940. BLS statistics indicate that there were at least 883 strikes of public employees during the period 1942-1965.[24] Strikes in government occurred most frequently during the period 1942-1953. There followed a relatively quiescent period until 1964 when there were 41 public employee strikes followed by 42 in 1965 and at least 30 during the first six months of 1966.[25] However, even the increased strike activity of the last few years among public employees does not exceed that of the post-World War II and Korean War years. Strikes in government have been concentrated at the local level, occurring only occasionally at the state level, and very rarely in the Federal government. These stoppages are typically of short duration, rarely lasting more than a few days. However, the average duration of public employee strikes increased in 1965 and, so far in 1966, there have been several fairly long strikes.

There has been a long-term decline in the use of the strike in the United States and in other industrialized countries.[26] In recent years, unions in the United States have found the strike increasingly costly and decreasingly effective as a method of resolving disputes. In public employment, on the other hand, unions and even associations, which in principle reject the strike weapon, have found that it often brings quick and rewarding results. Furthermore, they have learned that the risks are not great, despite the severe penalties which may be legally imposed on strikers. This, coupled with the belief that some public employers are unwilling to engage in genuine collective bargaining except under the threat or actuality of a strike, and the absence of alternative methods of resolving disputes, has undoubtedly contributed to the growing incidence of government strikes in recent years and will continue to do so as long as the situation remains unchanged.

Too often the strike in public employment has been treated as an unmitigated evil to be exorcised rather than the symptom of a malady which needs treatment. At the other extreme, some unions have utilized the strike as if it were the first rather than the last resort in collective bargaining. Mediation and fact-finding are being used increasingly in public employment and the record based on limited experience is promising. But there still remains the thorny question of what to do when these procedures have been exhausted and the impasse has not been resolved. Should the strike be permitted? And if not, why not?

The "sovereignty doctrine" which holds that a strike of public employees, whatever their occupation or the nature of their activity, is an attack upon the state and a challenge to government authority will no longer suffice. Secretary of Labor Wirtz put it succinctly when he said: "This doctrine is wrong in theory; what's more, it won't work."[27]

He was referring to the broad use of the sovereignty doctrine to deny rights of collective bargaining to government employees. But, the New York Governor's Committee also rejected the "rights of sovereignty" as a justification for barring strikes of public employees, stating that "this is scarcely an apt term to apply to a system of representative democratic government . . . which is responsive to the electorate."[28] Other countries, including Canada which is presently (July 1966) considering a bill giving Federal civil servants the right to strike, apparently do not regard strikes by government employees as a threat to the sovereignty of the state.[29]

Few would dispute, and the courts have upheld, the right of governments to prohibit strikes of public employees. Presumably a legislative body can also permit strikes, either for all public employees or for certain groups of employees. The question is whether a blanket prohibition on public employee strikes is necessary, wise or desirable in the context of present day industrial relations.

Most supporters of the view that public employee strikes should continue to be prohibited do so on one or both of the following grounds: the essentiality of many government services to the health, safety and welfare of the community and the belief that the strike is an economic weapon which is inappropriate in public employment.

The "essential services" argument is indisputable with respect to policemen, firemen and prison guards. Although isolated strikes among such employees have occurred, few would defend them and the organizations with which they are affiliated do not assert the right to strike. But one quickly runs into differences of opinion in trying to decide what other services are "essential" to a community.

School teachers? Professor Myron Lieberman points out that "schools are closed for summer, Christmas, Easter and Thanksgiving vacations, for football games, basketball tournaments, harvesting, teachers' conventions, inclement weather, presidential visits, and for a host of other reasons without anyone getting excited over the harm done to the children."[30] Why not for strikes to protest teacher grievances or to achieve legitimate demands in collective bargaining? But how many parents would agree with Mr. Lieberman?

Transit employees? Few people would question Norman Thomas's dedication to the cause of the working man. But after the New York transit strike of January 1966 Mr. Thomas said: " . . . there are services whose continuous operation is so important to society that strikes should not be thinkable. . . . Transit in a city like New York should be so recognized." But would the transit workers agree?[31]

Similar differences of opinion would be found to exist with regard to garbage collection, water works, public utilities, hospitals and other government services. This led the New York Governor's Committee to conclude that "a differentiation between essential and non-essential governmental services would be a subject of such intense and never-ending controversy as to be administratively impossible."[32]

Perhaps the Committee was right. Still, one of the most frequent and effective arguments against a blanket prohibition on public employee strikes is that people doing the same work in private industry are free to strike. Besides, there are innumerable government services which can by no stretch of the imagination be considered so essential that they cannot be interrupted even for short periods: state-owned liquor stores, city botanical gardens, recreation centers, government cafeterias, automobile license bureaus; the list is almost endless. The best way to put this argument to rest would be for a few states to prohibit strikes in certain specified "essential" services but not in others. Given the increasing trend towad state regulation of public employer-employee relations, we may yet have an opportunity to see how such a law would work. Of course, public employees engaged in non-essential services also have less bargaining and political power than those in essential pursuits. Given a choice between being treated like private employees in all respects, including the right to strike, and being barred from striking but with access to mediation and fact-finding procedures, most of them would probably prefer the latter alternative.

The second, and in our view the more fundamental, argument against lifting the prohibition on the strike in public employment holds that the work stoppage does not serve the same purpose in public employment that it does in private industry. It is argued that in private industry employers have countervailing rights to the strike: they may lock out their employees, try to break the strike by operating with other employees, suspend operations for months without regard to the effect on those not directly involved in the dispute; they may even choose to go out of business entirely. The threat or actual use of these economic weapons is supposed to perform a useful function by exerting reciprocal pressures upon the parties to modify their positions to the extent necessary to bring about an agreement. Throughout the dispute both parties are subject to market pressures where the consumer's power of choice is exercised (except for certain monopoly industries e.g. telephones). Jobs can and have been lost and markets seriously depleted by long strikes or settlements leading to non-competitive price increases.[33]

These considerations are not normally present in government. The countervailing right of the lockout or the possibility of going out of business do not exist. Extended suspension of operations depriving the community of needed or even desired non-essential services is not politically feasible, even when possible from an economic viewpoint. While a government can try to break a strike and may even call upon the National Guard or the Army to perform essential services during an emergency, this is hardly a permanent solution; nor does it lend itself, even on a temporary basis, to such government services as education and hospital care. Besides, such action would be political suicide in most cities.

The economic and market pressures which operate in private industry do not usually exist in the public sector. Competitors will not teach a community's children or provide checks and case work services to welfare clients; consumers will not find ready substitutes or learn to do without garbage collection or health services; too high a settlement will not price most government services out of the market, though it may affect the number of passengers on public transport in some cities.

This does not mean that there are no constraints upon the public official when he engages in negotiations with a union; nor even that he is not as influenced as his private counterpart by the cost of settlement. The difference is that the threat is political rather than economic: the public official may not be concerned over market competition and substitute products; instead, he worries over "continuance in office, political survival and future political aspirations."[34]

In this context some groups stand to gain much more than others by resorting to the strike weapon. A recent instructive example is the New York City transit strike and the resulting settlement and exemption from prosecution under state law for transit employees, as compared with the experience of the welfare department employees in the same city. The basic question is whether the strike, which in the United States has been viewed primarily as an economic weapon, is equally appropriate when used as a political weapon.

Finally, there is a feeling on the part of some students in the industrial relations field that the strike should not be sanctioned in public employment at a time when its use is being questioned in private industry. Public opinion has become less tolerant of work stoppages, and demands for Presidential and Congressional action to force settlements of strikes which significantly affect the economy or result in great inconvenience to large numbers of people are heard with increasing frequency. The public is particularly intolerant of strikes which deprive them of government services. To sanction the strike in public employment at this time, these people argue, would take attention away from the constructive alternatives of mediation and fact-finding and focus it on the strategy and techniques of conducting or countering work stoppages.

One of the most persuasive arguments in support of permitting the strike in government is that it is the only way to get some public officials to take collective bargaining seriously. Union representatives cite case after case in which a government employer contended he could not bargain over certain issues but changed his attitude quickly when a strike was threatened or actually started. Then, insurmountable obstacles to negotiation seemed to fade away and an agreement was reached in short order. There is no question but that some public officials have used the strike prohibition to evade their responsibility to negotiate in good faith, even in states with laws providing for collective bargaining in government employment. Union representatives have also sometimes resorted to a strike vote, strike threat, or actual stoppage before exhausting the grievance procedure or making use of mediation. Both sides are often inexperienced in collective bargaining and ignorant of the law or the most elementary knowledge of industrial relations.

Management and labor must take their responsibilities more seriously if collective bargaining in the public sector is to make progress. Government and universities too have a responsibility to make collective bargaining work. They can make an important contribution by helping the parties improve their knowledge and skill in the industrial relations field. An example is provided by the Michigan Board of Education which contracted with the School of Labor and Industrial Relations of Michigan State University to conduct courses, workshops, institutes and conferences for teachers and other school employees, school administrators and school board members. In the long run, the answer lies in building effective organizations for collective bargaining in government and unions, developing expertise, improving the amount and quality of data and information for use in negotiations, and in broadening the areas of communications. This has happened in private industry during the last 30 years. It will have to happen in the public sector before there can be real collective bargaining.

A Look to the Future

During the next decade we can look for the extension of legislation governing public employer-employee relations to more states. While existing laws will serve to show the way, there should be more variation then is found in state laws applicable to the private sector because of the absence of a definitive Federal statute similar to the National Labor-Management Relations Act. History will probably repeat itself in the lag of the Southern states, both with regard to legislation and the ability of unions to organize public employees. In August 1965, the AFSCME reported only 6 signed agreements in the South out of a total of 302.[35] However, the existence of professional associations with substantial membership in Southern states may speed up the development of employer-employee relations in certain areas of public employment. An extensive survey of school districts by the University of Chicago found that the National Education Association had local affiliates in close to 90 percent of the districts in Southern states, and that 121, or 13 percent, were carrying on negotiations with school superintendents or boards.[36]

Employee organizations can be expected to press for agreements which will more closely resemble those found in private industry. Among their objectives will be: broadening the scope of negotiable issues, union security in the form of the union shop, and final and binding arbitration of grievances.

As employee organizations become stronger they will become less willing to accept unilateral determination of matters which presently are considered sovereign prerogatives of the state. They will whittle away at these in much the same way as unions in private industry have narrowed the range of management prerogatives. A particularly sensitive issue is the virtual exclusion of employee organizations from having any say in wage determination for classified civil service employees in the Federal Government and in the states. In 1966, Federal employee wage and salary adjustments were held within the administration's 3.2 percent guidepost.

President Johnson, in signing the Federal Salary and Fringe Benefits Act, urged labor and management to follow the example set "in our own house."[37]

In hearings on the bill, some Congressmen reminded the administration that it had "perfect control" over wages of Federal employees but not over the rest of the economy. Senator Hartke of Indiana chided the administration for violating the comparability principle established in the 1962 Federal Salary Act, providing that salaries of Federal employees were to be related to pay for the same levels of work in private industry. He charged that because of the guidepost limitation "all bargaining power and rights to negotiation have already been taken away. Now it becomes an intriguing question as to just how long these various union and Government representatives will submit to this kind of treatment."[38] Union representatives testified against the bill but were unsuccessful in getting the administration of Congress to raise the ante.

It is reasonable to assume that legislatures and government officials probably have adhered more closely to the guideposts than have private employers whose wage rates are set in collective bargaining. If the labor market remains relatively tight and inflationary pressures continue to mount, public employee organizations may be expected to press more vigorously for inclusion of pay scales as a negotiable item.

Union security in the form of the union shop is generally held to be inconflict with the civil service concept and contrary to the principle of equality of opportunity for appointment and promotion in government service. However, it has been argued, that "if collective bargaining through an exclusive representative is recognized as advancing the public interest . . . then reasonable practices that will promote a fruitful and responsible bargaining relationship should also be acceptable."[39]

In actual practice there are many union shop provisions and lesser forms of union security in agreements involving governmental units, In 1965, the AFSCME reported that it had at least 51 union shop agreements, and an additional 56 with a modified union shop or maintenance of membership.[40] Other unions have also negotiated union shop provisions. The checkoff of union dues is much more common in both the Federal service and at the state and local level. Union shop provisions and lesser forms of union security, including the agency shop, will probably become more widespread. However, they will face a major obstacle in areas where there is strong competition between unions and employee associations.

The sovereignty doctrine holds that Government must possess the right of final determination in all relations with its employees. Final and binding arbitration would appear to be ruled out by this principle. There is a long line of court decisions holding that general arbitration clauses in public employment represent an unlawful delegation of authority. However, in 1951 the Connecticut Supreme Court ruled that "arbitration may be a permissible method as to specific, arbitrable disputes."[41]

Despite the questionable legal status of general arbitration in the public service, the AFSCME has reported at least 133 agreements negotiated in 23 states providing for final and binding arbitration.[42] In 1966, the New York City Mayor's tripartite panel recommended final and binding arbitration of grievances "to the extent permitted by law,"

It would appear that the sovereignty doctrine is far from impregnable in the area of grievance arbitration. Unions at the Federal level want to replace advisory arbitration with final and binding decisions which would not be subject to veto by the agency involved. Some public officials may actually welcome the use of neutrals to free them from the touchy job of deciding disputes between lower level supervisors and employees. We expect that in time the same pragmatic approach which resulted in grievance arbitration becoming widespread in private industry (95 percent of all agreements) will spread to public employment.

Arbitration to resolve impasses over terms of new agreements is another matter. In addition to the sovereignty obstacle, arbitration of contract terms is neither accepted in private industry nor does it have the support of unions and employers generally. Supporters of compulsory arbitration, whether in public or private employment, have yet to devise a system which will not at the same time lead to a breakdown of collective bargaining.

Conclusion

The advent of employee organizations and collective bargaining to the public sector is the most significant development in the industrial relations field of the last 30 years. In addition to the more obvious implications for employees, public officials and the art of government, it may have important effects on the labor movement and on labor-management relations in the private sector.

Trade union membership in the United States has not been keeping pace with the growth in the labor force. This has been due largely to the relative decline in employment in industries where unions have been strongest, and the failure of trade unions to appeal to the growing technical and white collar segment of the labor force. Equally important, is the tendency of young people to view the labor movement as just another pressure group out for itself, like big business, the farm lobby and other self-serving organizations.

The opening up of public employment to trade unions may change all this. As the fastest growing industry, government could provide a source of enough new recruits to reverse the decline in trade union membership.

Government employees who join unions could change the image of the labor movement to make it more acceptable to white collar employees and technicians in private industry. Finally, if the teachers of the United States join unions in large numbers, youngsters may reevaluate the role of labor in society.

If public employees show a preference for association-type organizations rather than unions, the effects may be different but nonetheless significant. Employee associations have already taken on some of the characteristics of unions; the reverse has also been true as unions try to compete for the allegiance of professional employees. This drawing together of the two types will continue. In time, some unions and associations may merge or agree not to raid one another; some associations may even affiliate with the AFL-CIO. In any event, whether employees are represented by unions or associations, the total strength of organized employees will be louder and more influential in the labor markets as well as in the legislatures of the country. The effect on students will still be great, whether their teachers are members of unions or associations which act a lot like unions.

In the collective bargaining arena, we are witnessing something that students of labor-management relations have for a long time held (and many continue to hold) could not exist, namely "no-strike bargaining." If the recent trend in state legislation continues, mediation, fact-finding and other methods of settling disputes will be used more extensively than ever before. To the extent that these approaches are successful, they may have some application to disputes in private industry. If they fail, it will provide additional ammunition to those who contend that collective bargaining without the right to strike is meaningless. Whatever the result, the experience should be instructive.

BY REQUEST

HOUSE BILL NO. 796

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

SIXTH LEGISLATURE - SECOND SESSION

A BILL

For an Act entitled: "An Act relating to a public employment labor relations Act."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

* Section 1. AS 23.40 is amended by adding new sections to read:

ARTICLE 2. PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT LABOR RELATIONS ACT.

Sec. 23.40.070. DECLARATION OF POLICY. The public policy of the state regarding labor relations and collective bargaining in public employment is as follows:

(1) There are three major interests involved, namely: that of the public, the public employee and the public employer. These interests are to a considerable extent interrelated and therefore, it is the policy of this state to protect and promote each of these interests with due regard to the situation and to the rights of the others.

(2) Orderly and constructive employment relations for public employees and the efficient administration of government in the state serve to promote these interests. They are largely dependent upon the maintenance of fair, friendly and mutually satisfactory employee-management relations in public employment, and the availability of suitable machinery for fair and peaceful adjustment of whatever controversies may arise. It is recognized that whatever may be the rights of disputants with respect to each other in a controversy regarding public employment relations, neither party has the right to engage in acts or practices which jeopardize the public safety and interest and interfere with the effective conduct of public business.

Put in hands of an independent agency? No

(3) Where permitted by secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter, negotiations of terms and conditions of public employment should result from voluntary agreement between the public employer and its agents, as an employer, and its employees. For that purpose a public employee has the right, if he desires, to associate with others in organizing and in bargaining collectively through representation of his own choosing, without intimidation or coercion from any source.

(4) It is the policy of this state, in order to preserve and promote the interests of the public, the public employee and the public employer, to encourage the practices and procedure of collective bargaining in public employment subject to the public employee and related laws, regulations and policies governing public employment, by establishing standards of fair conduct in public employment relations.

Sec. 23.40.080. RIGHTS OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES. Public employees shall have, and be protected in the exercise of, the right of self-organization and the right to form, join or assist any labor or employee organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in lawful, concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

Sec. 23.40.090. COLLECTIVE BARGAINING UNIT. (a) The department may determine, in order to insure a clear and identifiable community of interest among employees affected, an appropriate bargaining unit and whether the employees employed in a single or several departments, divisions, institutions, crafts, professions, or occupational groupings, constitute an appropriate collective bargaining unit. No collective bargaining unit may include both professional and nonprofessional employees unless a majority of the professional employees and a majority of the nonprofessional employees vote for inclusion in the unit. No unit may include employees whose positions are in one of the classes in sec. 260 of this chapter with employees whose positions are in another one of the classes under the same section. The department may determine a collective bargaining unit with or without providing the employees involved an opportunity to determine for themselves whether they desire to establish themselves as an appropriate collective bargaining unit.

(b) When the department permits employees to determine for themselves whether they will constitute a separate bargaining unit, the determination shall be by secret ballot, and the department shall provide, by regulation, for voting procedure to be employed in making the determination.

(c) In determining, modifying or combining collective bargaining units, the department shall consider the duties, skills and working conditions of the public employees, the history of collective bargaining by the public employees and their bargaining representatives, the extent of organization among the employees, and the desire of the public employees.

Sec. 23.40.100. REPRESENTATIVES AND ELECTIONS. (a) Representatives chosen for the purposes of collective bargaining by a majority of the public employees voting in a collective bargaining unit shall be the exclusive representative of all the employees in the unit for the purposes of collective bargaining. An individual employee, or a minority group of employees in a collective bargaining unit, may present grievances to the public employer in person, or through representatives of their own choosing, and the public employer shall confer with the employee regarding the grievances, provided that the majority representative has been afforded the opportunity to be present in the conference and that any adjustment resulting from the conference is not inconsistent with the conditions of employment established by the majority representative and the public employer.

(b) When a question arises concerning the representation of public employees in a collective bargaining unit, the department shall determine the representative of the unit by taking a secret ballot of the employees and certifying in writing the results of the election to the interested parties and to the public employer. There shall be included on a ballot for the election of representatives the names of all persons, having an interest in representing public employees, submitted by a public employee or group of public employees participating in the election, except that the department may exclude from the ballot one who, at the time of the election, stands deprived of his rights under secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter by reason of a prior adjudication of his having engaged in a prohibited practice. The ballot shall be prepared to permit a vote against representation by anyone named on the ballot. The department's certification of the results of an election shall be conclusive.

(c) When an election has been conducted under (b) of this section, in which the name of more than one proposed representative appears on the ballot and results in no conclusion, the department may if requested by any party to the proceeding within 30 days from the date of the certification of the results of the election, conduct a runoff election. In the runoff election, the department may drop from the ballot the name of the representative that received the least number of votes at the original election, or the department shall drop from the ballot the privilege of voting against any representative when the least number of votes cast at the first election was against representation by any named representative.

(d) Questions concerning the determination of collective bargaining units or representation of public employees may be raised by petition of any public employee or the public employer, or the require 30%?

see p 3 of HB368

representative of either of them. When it appears by the petition that an emergency exists requiring prompt action, the department shall act on the petition immediately and hold the election requested within a time that will meet the requirements of the emergency presented. The fact that one election has been held within the preceding year may not prevent the holding of another election among the same group of public employees, if it appears to the department that sufficient reason exists.

Sec. 23.40.110. PROHIBITED PRACTICES. (a) It is a prohibited practice for a public employer individually or in concert with others to:

(1) interfere with, restrain or coerce public employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in sec. 80 of this chapter,

(2) initiate, create, dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of a labor or employee organization or contribute financial support to it, but the public employer is not prohibited from reimbursing public employees at their prevailing wage rate for the time spent conferring with its officers or agents; it is not a prohibited practice for an officer or supervisor of the public employer to remain or become a member of the same labor or employee organization of which its employees are members, when they perform the same work or are engaged in the same profession; however, a supervisor may not participate as an active member or officer of the organization,

(3) encourage or discourage membership in a labor or employee organization, employee agency, committee, association or representation plan by discrimination in regard to hiring, tenure or other terms or conditions of employment;

(4) refuse to bargain collectively on those matters provided for in sec. 250 of this chapter with the representative of a majority of its employees in an appropriate collective bargaining unit;

however, when the public employer files with the ~~board~~ department a petition requesting a determination as to majority representation, it may not be considered to have refused to bargain until an election has been held and the result has been certified to it by the department. A refusal to bargain shall include, but not be limited to, the refusal to execute a collective bargaining agreement previously agreed upon;

(5) violate the provisions of a written agreement concerning terms and conditions of employment affecting public employees, including an agreement to arbitrate, or to accept the terms of an arbitration award, when previously the parties agreed to accept an arbitration award as final and binding upon them;

(6) deduct labor or employee organization dues or assessments from a public employee's earnings, unless the public employer has been presented with an individual order for the deduction, signed by the public employee, and terminable at the end of any year of its life by the public employee giving at least 30 days' written notice of the termination to the public employer and to the representative organization.

(b) It is an unfair labor practice for a public employee individually or in concert with others to:

(1) coerce or intimidate a public employee in the exercise of his legal rights, including those guaranteed in sec. 80 of this chapter;

(2) coerce, intimidate or induce an officer or agent of the public employer to interfere with any of its employees in the exercise of their legal rights, including those guaranteed in sec. 80 of this chapter, or to engage in a practice with regard to its employees which would be a prohibited practice if undertaken by him on his own initiative;

(3) refuse to bargain collectively on those matters provided for in sec. 250 of this chapter with the authorized officer or agent of the public employer, provided it is the recognized or certified exclusive collective bargaining representative of employees in an appropriate collective bargaining unit; a refusal to bargain includes, but is not limited to, the refusal to execute a collective bargaining agreement previously agreed upon;

(4) violate the provisions of a written agreement concerning terms and conditions of employment affecting public employees, including an agreement to arbitrate or to accept the terms of an arbitration award, where previously the parties agreed to accept an arbitration award as final and binding upon them;

(5) coerce or intimidate a supervisory employee, officer or agent of the public employer, working at the same trade or profession as its employees, to induce him to become a member of or act in concert with the labor organization of which they are members.

OK amend.

(c) It is a prohibited practice for a labor or employee organization or any other person to do or cause to be done in the interest of public employers or public employees, or in connection with a controversy over employment relations, any act prohibited by (a) and (b) of this section.

Sec. 23.40.120. INVESTIGATION AND CONCILIATION OF COMPLAINTS. If a verified written complaint is filed by or for a person claiming to be aggrieved by a prohibited practice, or a written accusation that a person subject to secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter has engaged in a prohibited practice is filed with the department, the department shall investigate the complaint or accusation. If it determines after the preliminary investigation that probable cause exists in support of the complaint or accusation, it shall try to eliminate the prohibited practice by informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion. Nothing said or done during this endeavor may be used as evidence in a subsequent proceeding.

Sec. 23.40.130. ~~FORM AND SERVICE OF~~ COMPLAINT AND ACCUSATION. If the department fails to eliminate the prohibited practice by conciliation and to obtain voluntary compliance with secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter, or if, before it attempts conciliation, it considers that the circumstances warrant, it shall serve a copy of the complaint or accusation upon the respondent. The form of the complaint or accusation and the subsequent procedures shall be conducted in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act (AS 44.62), ~~and the department shall have the powers granted therein.~~

Sec. 23.40.140. ORDERS AND DECISIONS. If the department finds that a person named in the written complaint or accusation has engaged in a prohibited practice, the department shall issue and serve on the person an order or decision requiring him to cease and desist from the prohibited practice and to take affirmative action which will carry out the policies of secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter. If the department finds that no person named in the complaint or accusation has engaged or is engaging in a prohibited practice, the department shall state its findings of fact and issue an order dismissing the complaint or accusation.

Sec. 23.40.150. ENFORCEMENT BY INJUNCTION. The department may apply to the superior court of the judicial district ~~or division~~ in which the prohibited practice occurred for an order enjoining the prohibited acts specified in the order or decision of the department. Upon a showing by the department that the person has engaged or is about to engage in the practices, an injunction, restraining order, or other order which may be appropriate shall be granted by the court without bond.

Sec. 23.40.160. POWER TO INVESTIGATE AND COMPEL TESTIMONY. (a) For the purpose of the investigations, proceedings, or hearings which the department considers necessary for the enforcement of secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter, the department may issue subpoenas requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of relevant evidence.

(b) The department may administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

(c) The attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence may be required from any place in the state at any designated place of hearing.

(d) If a person refuses to obey a subpoena issued under secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter, any superior court for the district in which the contumacious person resides or is found may, upon application by the department, issue an order requiring him to comply with the subpoena.

Sec. 23.40.170. REGULATIONS. The department may ~~from time to time~~ issue, amend, or ~~rescind~~ regulations under the Administrative Procedure Act (AS 44.62) to carry out the provisions of secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter.

Sec. 23.40.180. PENALTY FOR VIOLATION OF ORDER OR DECISION. A person who violates a provision of an order or decision of the department is guilty of a misdemeanor and is punishable by a fine of not more than $500.

Sec. 23.40.190. PENALTY FOR OBSTRUCTING ENFORCEMENT. A person who forcibly obstructs, intimidates or interferes with an authorized representative of the department while the representative performs duties under secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter or because the representative performs those duties, is punishable by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both.

Sec. 23.40.200. ARBITRATION. (a) Parties to a labor dispute arising from the interpretation or application of a collective bargaining agreement affecting terms and conditions of public employment may agree in writing to have the department name arbitrators in all or any part of the dispute. The department shall appoint as arbitrators only competent, impartial and disinterested persons. Proceedings in arbitration shall be conducted in accordance with the Uniform Arbitration Act (AS 09.43.010 - 09.43.180) where applicable.

(b) The parties to a collective bargaining agreement may provide in the agreement a contract for arbitration to be conducted solely according to the Uniform Arbitration Act (09.43.010 - 09.43.180) if the Act is incorporated into the agreement or contract by reference.

Sec. 23.40.210. MEDIATION. The department may appoint a competent, impartial, disinterested person to act as mediator in any labor dispute either on its own initiative or on the request of one of the parties to the dispute; or the parties may select a mediator by agreement or mutual consent. It is the function of the mediator to bring the parties together voluntarily under such favorable auspices as will tend to effectuate settlement of the dispute, but neither the mediator nor the board have any power of compulsion in mediation proceedings.

Sec. 23.40.220. FACT FINDING. (a) If, after a reasonable period of negotiation over the terms of a collective bargaining agreement, a deadlock exists between a public employer and a labor or employee organization, either party or the parties jointly may request the department in writing to initate fact finding in order to make recommendations to resolve the existing deadlock.

(b) Upon receipt of a request to initiate fact finding, the department shall make an investigation, either informally or by a formal hearing, to determine whether the parties are, after a reasonable period of negotiations, deadlocked with respect to a dispute.

After its investigation the department shall certify the results of the investigation. If the certification requires that fact finding be initiated, the department shall appoint from a list established by the department a qualified disinterested person or three-member panel, when jointly requested by the parties, to function as a fact finder.

(c) The fact finder shall establish times and place of hearings and shall conduct the hearings under rules established by the department. Upon request, the department shall issue subpoenas for hearings conducted by the fact finder. The fact finder may administer oaths. Upon completion of the hearing, the fact finder shall make written findings of fact and recommendations for solution of the dispute and submit them to the parties and to the department. In making its findings and recommendations, the fact finder shall take into consideration among other pertinent factors the logical and traditional concept of public personnel and merit system administration concepts and principles vital to the public interest in efficient and economical governmental administration. Cost of fact finding proceedings shall be divded equally between the parties.

(d) Nothing in this section may be construed as prohibiting a fact finder from mediating the dispute, in which he is involved, at any time prior to the issuance of his recommendations.

(e) Within 30 days of the receipt of the fact finder's recommendations or within a time period agreed upon by the parties, both parties shall advise each other, in writing, as to their acceptance or rejection, in whole or in part, of the fact finder's recommendations and, at the same time, send a copy of the notification to the department. Failure to comply with the requirements of this section by the employer or employee representative is a violation of sec. 110(a)(4) and (b)(3) of this chapter.

Sec. 23.40.230. AGREEMENTS. Upon the completion of negotiations between a labor or employee organization representing a majority of employees in a collective bargaining unit and a public employer, if a settlement is reached, the employer shall reduce it to writing in the form of an agreement. The agreement may include a term for which it will remain in effect, not to exceed three years. Either party to the agreement has a right of action to enforce the agreement by petition to the department.

Sec. 23.40.240. MANAGEMENT RIGHTS. (a) Nothing in secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter shall interfere with the right of the public employer, in accordance with applicable law and regulations to

(1) carry out the statutory mandate and goals assigned to the department or agency utilizing personnel, methods and means in the most appropriate and efficient manner possible;

(2) manage the employees of the department or agency; to hire, promote, transfer, assign or retain employees in positions within the department or agency and in that regard to establish reasonable work rules,

(3) suspend, demote, discharge or take other appropriate disciplinary action against an employee for cause, or to lay off employees in the event of lack of work or funds or under conditions where continuation of work would be inefficient and nonproductive.

Sec. 23.40.250. SUBJECTS OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING. (a) Matters subject to collective bargaining are the following conditions of employment:

(1) grievance procedures;

(2) application of seniority rights as affecting the matters contained herein,

(3) work schedules relating to assigned hours and days of

does not include wages

the week and shift assignments;

(4) scheduling of vacations and other time off;

(5) use of sick leave;

(6) application and interpretation of established work rules,

(7) health and safety practices;

(8) intradepartmental transfers; and

(9) other matters consistent with this section and the statutes, rules and regulations of the public employer.

(b) Nothing in this section shall require the employer to bargain in regard to ~~statutory and regulation provided~~ prerogatives of promotion, layoff, position classification, compensation and fringe benefits, examinations, discipline, merit salary determination policy and other actions provided for by law, and regulations ~~governing civil service~~.

Sec. 23.40.260. STRIKES. (a) For purposes of this section, public employees are employed to perform services in one of the three following classes:

(1) those services which may not be given up for even the shortest period of time;

(2) those services which may be interrupted for a limited period but not for an indefinite period of time; and

(3) those services in which work stoppages may be sustained for extended periods without serious effects on the public.

(b) Class (1) includes police and fire protection employees and jail, prison and other correctional institution employees. Strikes by employees in this class are prohibited. Upon a showing by a public employer of the department that employees in this class are engaging or about to engage in a strike, an injunction, restraining order, or other order which may be appropriate shall be granted by the superior court of the judicial district ~~or division~~ in which the strike is occurring or is about to occur. If an impasse or deadlock is reached in collective bargaining between the public employer and employees in this class, and mediation and fact-finding have been utilized without resolving the deadlock, the parties shall submit to arbitration to be carried out under the provisions of the Uniform Arbitration Act (09.43.010 - 09.43.-180).

(c) Class (2) includes hospital, public utility, sanitation and public school and other educational institution employees. Employees in this class may engage in a strike, subject to the voting requirement of (d) of this section, for a limited time. The limit is determined by the interests of the health, safety or welfare of the public. The public employer or the department may apply to the superior court of the judicial district ~~or division~~ in which the strike is occurring for an order enjoining the strike. A strike may not be enjoined unless it can be shown that it has begun to threaten the health, safety or welfare of the public. A court, in deciding whether or not to enjoin the strike, shall consider the total equities in the particular case. Total equities includes not only the impact of a strike on the public but also the extent to which employee organizations and public employers have met their statutory obligations.

(d) Class (3) includes all other public employees who are not included in classes (1) or (2). Employees in this class may engage in a strike if a majority of the employees in a collective bargaining unit vote by secret ballot to do so.

Sec. 23.40.270. DEFINITIONS. In secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter, unless the context otherwise requires,

(1) "collective bargaining" means the negotiating by the public employer, by its officers and agents, and a majority of its employees, by their representatives in an appropriate collective bargaining unit, concerning terms and conditions of employment of all employees in the unit in a mutual effort to reach an agreement with reference to the subject under negotiation;

(2) "department" means the Department of Labor;

(3) "election" means a proceeding conducted by the department in which the employees in a collective bargaining unit cast a secret ballot for collective bargaining representatives, or for any other purpose specified in secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter;

(4) "professional employee" means

(A) an employee engaged in work:

(i) predominantly intellectual and varied in character as opposed to routine mental, manual, mechanical or physical work;

(ii) involving the consistent exercise of discretion and judgment in its performance,

(iii) of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time,

(iv) requiring knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study in an institution of higher learning or a hospital, as distinguished from a general academic education or from an apprenticeship or from training in the performance of routine mental, manual or physical processes; or

(B) an employee who:

(i) has completed the courses of specialized intellectual instruction and study described in (4)(A)(iv) of this section; and

(ii) is performing related work under the supervision of a professional person to qualify himself to become a professional employee as defined in (4)(A) of this section;

(5) "public employee" means an employee of a public employer, except a person elected by popular vote, appointed to office by the governor; or a member of a board or commission, or a person who is employed by the public employer for less than 20 hours a week;

(6) "public employer" means:

(A) the State of Alaska;

(B) an organized borough,

(C) a city of any class, whether home rule or otherwise;

(7) "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the public employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward or discipline other employees, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the exercise of the foregoing the exercise of the authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

Sec. 23.40.280. SHORT TITLE. Secs. 70 - 280 of this chapter may be cited as the Public Employment Labor Relations Act.

* Sec. 2. AS 23.40.010 is repealed.

* Sec. 3. AS 23.40.040 is repealed.

CS FOR HOUSE BILL NO. 796

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

SIXTH LEGISLATURE - SECOND SESSION

A BILL

For an Act entitled: "An Act relating to a Public Employment Labor Relations Act."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

* Section 1. AS 23.40 is amended by adding new sections to read:

ARTICLE 2. PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT LABOR RELATIONS ACT.

Sec. 23.40.070. DECLARATION OF POLICY. The public policy of the state regarding labor relations and collective bargaining in public employment is as follows:

(1) There are three major interests involved: that of the public, the public employee and the public employer. These interests are to a considerable extent interrelated, and therefore it is the policy of this state to protect and promote each of these interests with due regard to the situation and to the rights of the others.

(2) Orderly and constructive employment relations for public employees and the efficient administration of government in the state serve to promote these interests. They are largely dependent upon the maintenance of fair, friendly and mutually satisfactory employee-management relations in public employment, and the availability of suitable machinery for fair and peaceful adjustment of whatever controversies may arise. It is recognized that whatever may be the rights of disputants with respect to each other in a controversy regarding public employment relations, neither party has the right to engage in acts or practices which jeopardize the public safety and interest and interfere with the effective conduct of public business.

ALASKA has enjoyed relative peace in the labor relations of the public sector, however there is a general feeling that this will not last for the following reasons:

1. The STATE and local Governments have, in most cases, responded to the need for capital improvements with such a high percentage of the tax dollar that the wage and working conditions of the public employee has suffered and have not kept pace with the private sector.

2. The public employee, in an effort to better his wages and working conditions, has made demands to be recognized as a unit for collective bargaining. Because the Alaska law is permissive regarding collective bargaining for public employees, the demands has been rejected in many areas. Such refusal leaves the employee group no alternative but to take strike action to attain their goals as they are denied the give and take of collective bargaining.

H.B. 796 is a well thought out, progressive piece of legislation in that it provides the working man his right to organize and bargain with his employer, yet at the same time protects the public safety and interest.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER

BOX 1149 — JUNEAU 99801

The Honorable Tom Fink
House of Representatives
Alaska State Legislature
State Capitol
Juneau

Dear Tom:

I apologize for the delay in replying to your request to submit my comments on HB 796. My opinion on this bill is as follows:

On April 1, 1970, I testified before the House Judiciary Committee regarding the above bill. I stated that the bill was technically excellent, but that I did have some recommendations for improvement.

The committee clarified for me the terminology in line 9, page 4, of the bill. I had misread that section and thought that violation of one of the unfair labor practices, as included in this bill, precluded an individual from voting in an election. The committee pointed out to me that it merely precluded the placing of the name of an individual on the ballot.

Although this was the committee's opinion, it is not compatible with page 6 of the bill, (6) (b) which states that it is unfair labor practice for a public employee, individually or in concert to engage in unfair labor practices. The terminology does not include labor organizations. Thus, page 4 only precludes an individual from having his name placed on a ballot, but an individual is not a labor organization.

Next I discussed the language on page 4 and on page 5; lines 27 through 30, and 1 through 7 respectively. I stated that a time lag should be imposed between elections. I based this on my experience with the National Labor Relations Board, where there is a time lag of one year between elections. This election bar precludes too frequent elections which, of course, are costly and time-consuming. The committee discussed a shorter time period and I agreed that a one-year bar is an arbitrary selection. I further stated that a sufficient showing of interest must be present before petitions should be entertained for a election. The NLRB uses a criteria of 30 percent of the employees in the alleged unit as a sufficient basis for the holding of elections.

If there is no criteria for showing of interest before an election is held, one employee in a unit could petition for such an election. Again, the procedure is costly and time-consuming.

I stated a personal opinion on page 5, lines 17 through 22, that I did not believe an officer or supervisor of a public employee should be permitted to remain a member of a labor organization, even though they are precluded from participating as an active member. I based my opinion on the concept that there is countervailing interest between management and labor organizations on occasion, and that this could result in a conflict of interest. Since that time it has been pointed out to me that such a bar may be appropriate in certain types of units, but in construction-oriented units rank and file members become supervisors. To preclude them from membership would also preclude them from union benefits, such as Health & Welfare or pension rights. I have no strong feelings on this particular issue and believe that preclusion from membership of supervisors could result in serious damage to the individual.

On page six, (6) (b), I thought that a labor organization should be included as one which may commit an unfair labor practice. Under the existing wording of that section, only a public employee, individually or in concert with others, may commit an unfair labor practice. A labor organization is not a public employee, but its agents may commit unfair labor practices under this act. Under the existing language, there would be no sanction.

On page eight, section 23.40.140, entitled "Orders and Decisions", there is provided an administrative procedure whereby unfair labor practice can be determined by the Department of Labor. I discussed, in general, the remedies available, such as reinstatement of, and back-pay for, discharged employees, etc. This subject is probably adequately covered in AS 23.40.150 which provides for enforcement by injunction of the Department's orders. As long as an order is reasonable and is supported by evidence, the Department can apply to the Superior Court for enforcement of said order.

I further discussed page 12, section 23.40.250, entitled "Subjects of Collective Bargaining". I pointed out that the "Subjects of Collective Bargaining" does not include wages which, I think, is a deficiency in the law.

In earlier testimony, Dwayne Carlson, lobbyist for AFL-CIO stated that he thought compulsory arbitration should be provided for Class II employees, as set forth on page 14 (c). He stated that after an injunction is obtained, the matter should be solved by compulsory arbitration. I spoke generally that I did not believe that compulsory arbitration is a good approach to labor relations. I believe that the parties have to hammer at their own agreement, and that through compulsory arbitration there is a tendency for both parties to take extreme positions and hope that the arbitrator will split the difference. I said the alternative to this was not particularly satisfactory either and that I would recommend a continuous bargaining process. In short, if an injunction is granted, it would not be retained indefinitely. The union would be allowed to strike again, and the pressure on the employer would continue. There is no truly adequate solution to this problem.

I told the committee that I had just reviewed a committee report by the Advisory Commission on Inter-government Relations, covering labor management policies for state and local government. This commission includes private citizens, members of the United States Senate, members of the U.S. House of Representatives, officers of the executive branch of the federal government, governors, mayors, members of state legislative bodies, and elected county officials. The commission had come up with some 16 recommendations, most of which were included in this piece of legislation. The commission did state that it was opposed to the striking of public employees. The commission recommended mediation and fact-finding as alternatives to the strike, and although it mentioned compulsory arbitration, it did not positively suggest this as a solution.

I went on to tell the committee that I believe there is no truly complete solution in the public sector, and that there is no magic formula that can be applied. I pointed out that although no state permits strikes by public employees, some 250 work stoppages occurred in 1968. I stated that it is the legislature's responsibility to consider all aspects of this legislation, and that one of the aspects of the legislation is timing. I stated that I did not believe that the legislature could legislate maturity on the public employer or on the public employee group. The main problem in the public employee sector is that in the private sector there has been 35 years, or more, of collective bargaining experience, but that this is absent in the public sector. I stated that I thought that both parties had to gain a great deal of maturity and that legislation such as HB 796, may bring that maturity about.

April 8, 1970

After I concluded my testimony, Mr. Lewis Dischner, lobbyist for the Teamster's Union, stated that he disagreed with 90 percent of what I had said, and that he was in favor of the bill where I was opposed to it. He went on to say that he did not favor a "little" labor relations act, and the rest of his testimony was somewhat incomprehensible to me. After Mr. Dischner concluded his testimony, I made some additional comments.

One of my comments was that the committee should consider administration of this act by an independent agency, rather than by the executive branch of the government. I stated that since the Department of Labor is an executive agency, conflicts could result. I further pointed out that the Department of Labor could be organized and would determine the appropriate units as well as determine unfair labor practices, if any. This, to me, would not be very desirable.

I further stated that I disagree with Mr. Dischner in that HB 796 is based on the Labor Management Relations Act. I further stated that the most satisfactory thing about the National Labor Relations Board is its election procedures. I stated that these procedures are excellent and that they do afford employees the opportunity to express their free will as to selection or non-selection of their bargaining representatives.

Other people testifying at the committee hearing were Ferrell Campbell of the Operating Engineers Union, and Tom Brown, a lobbyist representing himself.

If you have any questions on the above, don't hesitate to give me a call.

Sincerely,

Bill

WILLIAM K. JERMAIN

CONSUMER PROTECTION

COMMERCE COMMITTEE

PUBLIC HEARING: SB 188, CSSB 352 AMENDED, HB 411, HB 444, HB 446

FEBRUARY 25, 1970

The following is an excerpt from this hearing, testimony from Mr. Randolph Aires, of Sear, Roebuck, and Co.

MR. AIRES: We do believe that the honest and legitimate merchants in your communities have a lot to gain from good and reasonable consumer legislation, and thus we do support and will continue to support good, reasonable consumer protection legislation. So, we are not fighting the consumer protections, persay. And you know, we are all consumers, I'm still young enough to remember painfully, an experiance I had as a young, newly married person, before I went to law school by the way, and a door-to-door salesman came around and very glibbly with a lot of pressure, sold us something I later didn't want. The next morning I got up and I really regretted having signed that contract and I wish at that time for example we would have had this door-to-door solicitation bill that you have before you. That's a separate matter, I'm not talking on that bill now, but I might that as an example what I think is good legislation. It would protect a lot of young married people who find themselves in that position with door-to-door salesman coming around. So, we're all consumers, and I think this is great and we should support good legislation and just another example, your door-to-door solicitation law is just one of twenty major parts of consumer protection features in the Uniform Consumer Critic Code which is before your Legislature at the present time. I understand it is not going anywhere this session, but we hope that there will be a study committee after the session is over and we get into this bill because we feel it is a good bill, it makes sense, we support it, and we hope it will really be studied seriously. Now let's get down to these three consumer protection acts, these are dealing with deceptive trade practices.

Deceptive trade practices, we're not getting into things like Federal Truth and Lending and so forth. And there are twelve enumerated deceptive trade practices in SB 352, the other two bills add a couple, and we don't agree with several of them. But the twelve that we ha ve in SB 352, we feel are practices that should be rightly attacked, with proper legislation. You'll note, the federal level, the FTC, is doing a pretty adequate job, considering. We believe that a customer who feels he's been defrauded and who cannot obtain satisfaction through the normal complaint procedure is entitled to a remedy. President Nixon's special assistant for consumer affairs, Mrs. Virginia Knauer who is receiving all sorts of publicity, has pointed out that the remedy in her words, should be, "Convenient, expeditous, and effective". Convenient, expeditous, and effective...and we submit that the consumer class action provision contained in SB 352 as amended, and HB 446, the Governor's bill, would not provide that type of remedy to the consumer. We think that indiscriminate class action legislation like this will create more evils than it will remedy. Class actions do not result in speedy and efficient determinations of claims, ask any lawyer who has ever been involved with one, he'll tell you. On the contrary, notice requirements on pre-trial procedures, required when there are numerous litigants, protracted trials, difficult damages determinations, and a heavy burden of management which is placed on the court system, all lead to excessively long and complex proceedings before benefiting and they really only benefit the lawyers when you come right down to it. These things go on for years...three, four, five years and the ones that have come up in the traditional class action arena. Up to now, the courts all over the country are reluctant to permit the traditional class actions and these come under the existing restrictive rules of civil procedure and the court rules which we have in all the states. And these allow class actions, and they are restrictive because these actions are likely to benefit practically nobody other than the lawyers who bring them, and they create lawsuits without merit where none would have previously existed.

MR. SWEET: Mr. Chairman, he has used the word class action a couple of times could we have that defined before we go on?

MR. BRONSON: We'll pause for a moment, I think it would be a good idea, would you define class action?

MR. AIRES: Class action as I was using it, they have traditionally grown not by statute, but through our rules of civil proceedure in our court action, and it's been largely handled by the courts, by the judges making decisions by case law what the various restrictions will be in bringing a class action and the basic idea is one person can sue on behalf of a whole class of people in a somewhat similar situation. And here's where the rub comes, traditionally, the courts have been very restrictive in saying, how do you fit in this class? In other words, you must be in an almost identical position as your brethren over there in a similar situation. So that is you're, for an example, subject to one of these deceptive trade practices which are listed here, your treatment by this defendant, this given store let's say, must have been given under the same circumstances, the same type of refridgerator was sold for example, in the same store etc. etc.. I can give you an example of how some states approach this, normally the courts use very vague, broad legal terminolgy on these restrictions, just to quote you some of the traditional approaches, and then they get down to specific cases, but here is one example, they list four requirements. The class is so numerous that it is impracticable to bring all members of the class before the court, this is one condition that must exist. Well, that's not too hard to meet because you can say there are many people involved, what's many? Maybe fifteen, twenty people. Number two, another restriction would be, that the questions of law in fact come into the class are substantially similiar and predominate over the questions effecting the individual members. There are cases upon cases on what this means, what are common questions of law in fact? And you just go on a case by case method but generally speaking, the courts have been very restrictive. They want to really be sure that Mr. A here and Mr. B really fall in the same type situations. The third requirement under this typical line of cases, would be that the claims or defenses of the representative plaintiffs are typical, another one of these broad, legal terms, are typical of the claims or defenses of th e class and fourth, the representative plaintiffs will fairly and adequately protect th e interests of the class. This is one of the chief concerns of the court, they feel somebody is going to start a lawsuit of behalf of everybody else, namely the world maybe, that by golly, they ought to be adequately representing all these other people out there, because what if he just decides in the middle of the lawsuit, "Well, I don't think we have a good case, we'll just drop it now," maybe somebody over there does have a good valid claim and he's left out hanging. The courts are very concerned with that factor, that they don't want to allow this class to get so big that somebody will be left out in the cold because the guy who brought the suit just didn't do a good job in promoting the lawsuit, and really getting adequate representation. It's a nebulous thing, what's a class action? You have a class against one defendant or in some cases if you can get defendants who are interlocked in some way maybe two companies that have interlocking boards of directors or something you could bring two defendants together, but the class is the group of plaintiffs, in other words. Traditionally, as I say, this is not by the statutes which we are now getting into, it's by the rules of civil proceedure that have been developed by the courts over the years.

MR. ORBECK: Take the pipeline for instance, it's going through quite a bit of Alaska, could people all along that pipeline, if one person decides that this pipeline ruins his view or does damage to his property because this unsightly pipeline goes by, could VISTA or somebody file a suit for everybody along that pipeline?

MR. AIRES: I think under the traditional class action provisions we have they would have difficulty in joining together. I think for example that the clerk would say, "Well, your property is quite different from your neighbor's property, it may go through at a different angle, there's a different circumstance, you've got a mountain and he doesn't have a mountain there, lots of different things are involved." So I think in this example for example, you wouldn't have a very successful class action. I think the court would say, no...we're not going to allow that; now, that is under the traditional approach. When we get under these consumer class actions, it's a whole other ball game, and that's what I'm going to get into here. All of a sudden by statute we just say if everybody's similiarly situated, whatever that means, go at it boys! You're all together in one big class, that's what it amounts to, it's an entirely new ball game. This is a new animal which has appeared on the scene, this is a so called consumer class action. It's not just a regular class action, it' a consumer class action. It first came on the scene last year in the federal Congress with people such as Senator Tidings championing it and now this year we are seeing it at the state legislature level for the first time. We've had bills similiar to this in the past, dea ling with deceptive trade practices and they have been passed in some states. This is the first time we have had this consumer class actio" bill stuck into it; and it's not just in Alaska, it's all over. To my knowledge no state legislature has passed it yet, this year but it is difficult to keep up with this from day to day I cover nine states and it is certainly not in any of ours. But it's being considered. One of the dangers as we see them, with the consumer class actions, this statutory creature that you are considering here, well, it's relatively simple for an enterprising lawyer, and there are many of them, to marshall an expansive list of plantiffs, through the class action notice provision you can develop hundreds of thousands of unknown clients just like that, you get your brother-in-law, o.k., you're going to bring a class action, now we're going to sue for everybody. Get the phone book out. You could check and make sure that they were customers at that store though, I think that would be a good precaution. The potential high legal fees, and this is my real concern , the potential high legal fees will cause many lawyers to bring unwerranted class actions relating to technical violations of law and against in many cases, innocent businessmen. The class actions could be brought against businessmen who would be willing to resolve on an informal basis a valid claim with a consumer. Maybe one guy would have a valid claim, and maybe it's ten dollars or twenty dollars, it could all be taken care of, the businessman would be glad to take care of this situation, but if he is faced with a situation where this one guy who has a valid claim and nine-hundred and ninety-nine who don't they were just brought in as a class without any merit, and he is dealing with a lawyer who is covering the whole class he is not going to be in the position to ever settle, or even attempt to settle with the one guy who has the valid claim, it just doesn't work. So, this is another aspect of it, when you add to that, to the fact that in your bills before you and I think we covered this in your question a while ago, that each of these so called injured persons recover at least two hundred dollars that's the floor. That's for certain on the individual actions, as I mentioned this question of interpretation as to whether that would apply in the class action part of this, but I think that would have to be cleared up, course we are against that whole feature anyway.

Even though for example, some guy may only have actual damages of say, two dollars, some very trivial thing and there are many very trivial things that come up. in our field, as you can understand. And yet this person would have two hundred dollars just like that. It doesn't take much of an imagination to see the potential for a severe harrassment in our judgement against the legitimate retailer under these conditions, you're talking about lawsuits in one millions of dollars particularly in the larger states, if you get into something like this, where they could be taken care of in a very sensible way. In class actions it's the lawyer that becomes less counsel and more the participating litigant and the real party in interest because the financial interest of the attorney as you can see, for the class may be for more substantial than the interest of any member of the class. We feel class actions could impose grave economic consequences for the defendant. A class action even if completely unwarranted necessitates substantial time and expense in the preparation of the defense, take a company like ours, we could be put to an awful lot of expense in defending one of these types of suits, whether it was warranted or not. This type of harrassment could drive some completely honest small businessman right out of business, it really could. The cost of doing business on these conditions would make it awfully difficult for any business, large or small, to keep from increasing prices of its' goods or services. It would be an added factor in the cost of doing business. Also the astute lawyer will obviously search for defendants who can be subjected to large damage recoveries rather than the judgement proof fly-by-night operator who preys upon the unsophisticated. And that, in my estimation is the tradegy of this whole approach, it's a misguided concept of this consumer class action. It's supposed to hit the guy who is abusing the consumer but he's the fly-by-night operator that the plaintiffs lawyer isn't even going to try to attack because he knows his judgement if he'll attach the legitimate large operator for some trivial matter. There's been, in our judgement, no demonstrative need for donsumer class actions, especiaaly here in Alaska, as distinquished from your other forms of remedies presently available. And before dropping into this type of legislation we feel that at lease some experimentation in pilot programs involving other methods could be pursued. You have the small claims court here in Alaska and you can sue up to $500 in damages. The individual can go into the court without the expense and need of an attorney. One of the arguments the proponnents have always given us, well, the poor little guy...he can't go to an attorney because the attorney will say to him, well I can't take your case it's not worth it, but he can go to small claims court by himself and if he has anything on the ball he can say his case to the judge, the judges are very understanding in the small claims courts, so you have that remedy available right now. Also in this bill, CSSB 352, Section 45.50.511, which gives the Attorney General his basic powers, it provides that the court may make any order or judgement necessary to restore to the individual money or property acquired because of the deceptive trade practices. In other words, the provision is right there, for the court to take care of the individual by giving him whatever damages he is out. Now the Federal Trade Commission in the Attorney General's office should be available to the consumer who has been defrauded and there is increased emphasis being placed in this direction. The State of Washington for example, they have a consumer protection division in the Attorney General's office where they have three or four attorneys who are actively engaged only in consumer protection affairs and I know they are quite active and they do a good job, I've seen them work. We approve of this kind of strict enforcement, I think this is the proper place, the Attorney General should be serving the public interest in helping the consumer.

That's why we have no objection to the Attorney General having adequate funds and doing a proper job in this area. The whole point of this is this, we feel that much more study must be made of this whole area of how to give the consumer a fast and judicious remedy to take of his small greivances and we feel that it would be quite unwise to jump into this area right now it has just come on to the scene and from what I have indicated consumer class action is just not the fast, judicious way to go. It would hurt the consumer, it really would. We respectfully submit that if the Alaska State Legislature is prepared and determined to deal with this complex subject at this time and you are going to go ahead anyway, we feel that the best approach then would be to at least follow the Nixon Administration approach at the federal level, and that approach at the state level would be this; your Attorney General and his staff would effectively prosecute the violators of these deceptive trade practices. If he is successful then, give the individual his right, his private right under this kind of a condition. That way you at least get rid of the harrassment aspect. You won't have the plaintiffs lawyer just bringing a class actions without any merit at all. At least then you know if the Attorney General went through a case and he successfully prosecuted this guy, there it is laid right out for the individual he can go in and practically use that case and he has a legitimate reason to be there fighting the defendant. We would be willing to go along that as a compromise provision, however as I say, I don't think it is even needed, particularly here in Alaska. We have given you a suggested amendment to this effect and Dean has of course alluded to this, if this is the way you have to go in this area we feel this is a compromised version at least which we could live with. That is not our suggestion, it is just a last ditch alternative. If the Legislature felt that this was really the way to go we feel we could live with it. The approach we submit would prevent the harrassment and at the same time the consumer would take care of his valid greivances. This is my whole emphasis with this class action thing I have six things ready to talk about but that's the big one and the rest I'll be very short about. The second thing which Dean gave to you as this matter of the proposed amendment which deals with the rule making powers of the Attorney General under a law such as this CSSB 352. Our concern in this area is that we don't feel the merchants should be subject to separate and possibly conflicting interpretations and rulings on what constitutes deceptive trade practices in any related matters. The deceptive trade practives listed in your bills, particularly CSSB 352 are keyed into the Federal Trade Commission Act dealing with deceptive trade practices. We propose that it should be made clear that it is the intent of the Alaska Legislature, if you're going with this type of legislation that the construction of your act will depend in good part upon the interpretations of the FTC and federal courts who have operated in this area for many years. Further we think it should be an absolute defense to an action brought under this act, if it can be shown conclusively that the conduct complained of was authorized by the FTC or any rules, regulations or decisions interpretating the FTC Act, this is only fair. In other words, we don't want to be subjected to going with entirely different rule making decisions on the very same area of law. There might be the very same deceptive trade practice involved and yet the Attorney General in state A will come up with an entirely different rule or interpretation of what this law is about, as opposed to the FTC and how could a businessman operate with this kind of dual regulation? So that is our concern. Four other little ones; to start with you have these twelve enumerated deceptive trade practices in CSSB 352, seven of those defined deceptive trade practices have a requirement for intent or knowledge on the part of the person or company peretrating the practice. Just seven of the twelve, the other five don't for some reason. It's difficult to know this distinction is made, we feel that all twelve defined practices should have this knowledge or intent requirement. What if somebody innocently does something? We feel that in any good legal case you always have to show what we call the scienter, in legal terms, the intent that the guy really intented to do this. That he had a knowledge of what he was doing, I feel that is important in all twelve and it is only in seven of the twelve. Some of those definitions by the way, are so open in interpretation that you really have to have a requirement like this, to show some intent. We would suggest as another possible amendment if your legislature goes for this type of legislation, we suggest that the exception provided in Section 45.50.491 paragraph 2 of CSSB 352 as amended, should be extended to any person who merely uses some advertising matter supplied to him by his supplier That exception goes just to the newspaper, radio and television people, we feel it should apply to anyone else in the same situation. If material is supplied to him and he had nothing to do with it he should be treated the same way, it looks like it's just kind of a vested interest thing for the communications people. We feel it should be any person instead of the communication people, also as Dean has already mentioned, we feel that in fairness in this type of law there should be some statutory limitations and there are different ways you can go into this, you could say you could have a certain given time after the perpetration of the deceptive trade practices, or you can say give a certain time after the discovery of it. We feel in fairness to the consumer it should be after the discovery, in other words, what if that consumer doesn't know what happened to him until after a year and a half later. He should have should have some time and after he discovers what happened, to sue. Our suggesttion is one year after the discovery, we feel that is plenty of time for a consumer to act. After one year his records get stale and it can become very difficult for a defendant to have to answer and get involved with a lawsuit of that nature. We feel that is a lot fairer than just the one year after it happened. We would suggest that as an amendment, one year statue of limitation after the discovery. And the last thing I would like to respectively submit as an amendment would be this liability for actions for employees under Section 45.50.550 of the CSSB 352. This is very broad, I can see the intent, this was an amendment by the way, that was slipped in at the last minute in the Senate side, it wasn't in the original bill, somebody put it in at the very end. It's on the liability for actions of employees, what I am suggesting is that we add a clause like this: after the word deceptive trade practices, in the course of; in the scope of employment with said person. The way this reads now your employee could go out and on his own in a moonlighting situation for example, or in his own business if he wanted, and maybe do something along this line the way this reads, the employer would be subject to liability. Maybe when he wasn't working for his employer or maybe he did something without the authority of his employer, he was doing something completely outside the scope of his duties for his employer intentionally wanting to screw up the operation. We feel if you put in this: in the course of; in the scope of employment, which is good law, then it would cover the situation. Corporations should be responsible for what their employees do but in the course of; in the scope of their employment, that's the point. WEll, I think I've said enough, maybe too much but this is a general summary we think with these six amendments particularly the two major ones which we have given to you we could support CSSB 352, with some modifications we could support HB 444 we think that probably the original version is the best of the three in our judgement. HB 446, the Governor's bill, would have to be drastically changed before we could support it. And you are considering two other bills tonight and I would just like to throw that in that we are in favor of HB 411 and SB 188, one sets up the consumer protection division in the Governor's office and again we are in favor of supporting the consumer and helping him out. This door-to-door solicitation bill I think is a good piece of legislation, we are not fighting good consumer legislation, that's our story. But we think it should be reasonable and that it should not harrass the reasonable businessman.

Dear Mr. Bronson:

It has come to the attention of this office that several clerical errors appear in HB 446, the governor's bill relating to consumer protection. These errors should be corrected to avoid confusion in reading the bill.

Page 1, line 21; "of" should be "or"

In several places throughout the bill section 10 and section 30 appear and have no apparent cross reference in the bill. These section numbers were used in an earlier draft of the proposal and were inadvertently retained in a number of places. Section 10 corresponds to section 470 in the bill and section 30 refers to the present section 500. Thus on Page 3, line 11; "sec. 10" should be "sec. 470"

Page 4, line 5; "sec. 30" should be "sec. 500"
Page 4, line 10; "sec. 10" should be "sec. 470"
Page 5, line 9; "sec. 10" should be "sec. 470"
Page 6, line 3; "sec. 30" should be "sec. 500"
Page 6, line 5; "sec. 10" should be "sec. 470"
Page 7 line 8; "sec. 10" should be "sec. 470"

Please accept the apologies of this office for this oversight. It is hoped that its correction will not cause undue inconvenience.

Sincerely,

G. KENT EDWARDS

STATE OF ALASKA

KEITH H. MILLER, GOVERNOR

DEPARTMENT OF LAW

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

POUCH K, STATE CAPITOL — JUNEAU 99801

February 9, 1970

The Honorable Tom Fink, Chairman
Subcommittee on Consumer Fraud
House Commerce Committee
Sixth State Legislature
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Dear Representative Fink:

This is in response to your request for a comparison of HB 444, the proposed consumer fraud bill of the Legislative Council, and HB 446, the Governor's bill on the same subject.

For your information, also included in the analysis is SB 352, the only other comprehensive consumer fraud bill now pending before the legislature, and which was introduced by Senator Terry Miller.

For convenience, the bills have been broken down into several particular areas so that the parallel features of the bills may be scrutinized separately.

I. Prohibited Acts.

(HB 446, pages 1 and 2 to line 22, page 6, lines 7-26)
(HB 444, pages 1, 2 and 3 to line 19)
(SB 352, pages 1 and 2 to line 28)

All of the bills in question are quite similar in their coverage of consumer fraud down to the ninth and tenth subsections, though there are a few minor changes. Subsection (1) of HB 446 contains language which was felt to be more specific than the term "pass off" used in the other bills, though all the subsections (1) contain language which specifically outlaws the age-old fraud of passing off consumer goods. Subsection (3) of the Governor's bill is essentially a combination of subsections (2) and (3) of the other two bills. [Note: The "of" in line 21 is a typographical error and should have been "or". This subsection must be amended accordingly in order to make sense.] Subsections 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 of HB 446 are all included in HB 444 and SB 352. The latter two bills contain a subsection (11) which is not included in the Governor's bill. This section sets out a specific fraud which, though not covered specifically in HB 446 would be actionable under its subsections (11) and (12).

Subsections (11) and (12) of HB 446 are not included in either of the other bills nor are there similar provisions in the other proposals. Subsection (11) requires that one be damaged by the fraud but does not require intent while subsection (12) states that the deception would be actionable "whether or not" damage has occurred but requires intent. Combined with the power to make regulations (see below) these sections are potentially very valuable and would enable the enforcement official (the Attorney General in all bills) to reach all forms of practice which are unfair or deceptive consumers. As such, it is felt these subsections provide more complete and comprehensive protection to the public against all of the various trade practices which unfairly injure or are calculated to injure consumers.

An important difference between the prohibitions in the Governor's bill and those in the other bills is the lack in most sections, of an intent, or knowledge requirement to constitute a violation. It would appear that a few of the prohibitive acts in the other two bills do not require the element of intent either. For an instance, subsection of both HB 444 and SB 352 does not refer to intent or knowledge. Likewise, subsection (12) of both bills appears not to require the element of scienter. The position that the element of intent not be required to constitute a violation in the Governor's bill is similar to that taken by several states (for instance Texas) and recognizes the essential nature of the activity sought to be prohibited as a fact accomplished, i.e. that someone has been damaged. This is especially true in a civil action where intent or knowledge has no part in such litigation for the salient point here is whether or not a person has been damaged. It is the position of this office therefore, that the element of intent should not be included in the prohibited acts but if it is so included in the final bill intent should not be required in any civil action and that in a criminal action there should be an evidentiary presumption, rebuttable by the defendant, that the act was done with intent.

HB 444 contains several subsections which are not in either the Governor's bill or the Senate bill. To-wit, subsections (13), (14) and (15) are unique to the council proposal. In inverse order, (15) would appear to be covered at least by (6) of the same section, (6) of SB 352 and (5), (11) and (12) of the Governor's bill. Likewise, the prohibition against 'bait and switch' advertising in (14) of HB 444 would probably be covered by (9) of the same section, (9) of the Senate bill and (8), (11) and (12) of the Governor's bill. This section includes the advantage of clear, specific prohibitions but may prove to contain loopholes or allow their creation by the imaginative and ever alert mind of the swindler. Subsection (13) of HB 444 again sets out a specific prohibition which is not included in either of the other bills. It is not precisely clear on the face of the subsection as to what transactions it might cover but may prove to be a useful addition to the prohibited acts section.

Both HB 444 and SB 352 contain identical subsections (b) and (c) which are not included in HB 446. It is not apparent what the specific purpose of subsection (b) is. It is probable that this subsection is aimed at giving an evidentiary advantage where there has been consumer fraud, to one either prosecuting or seeking damages in an anti-trust action, as it refers to injuring competition and competitors. Since, at the time the bill was drafted Alaska had no anti-trust provisions or proposed bills, it was not included in HB 446. However, the intent of the subsection may have been to aid in litigation begun under the several federal anti-trust laws, and may have value as such in the final bill. Subsection (c) was not considered necessary in HB 446 in light of AS 01.10.010 which makes the common law applicable in Alaska where it is not contrary to the State or Federal Constitutions.

A major provision which appears in the Governor's bill, but which does not appear in either of the other proposed bills, is the section on the non-negotiability of certain consumer paper found on page 6, line 7 of HB 446. A similar provision is still pending before the legislature in HB 362, though the technical statutory approach is somewhat different because that bill actually amends the Uniform Commercial Code. The Uniform Commercial Code presently permits a waiver of defense clauses in commercial transactions and the execution of a negotiable instrument is made equivalent thereto, but, in effect, cedes to each state the power to set its own policies with respect to their use. Thus, in AS 45.05.726(a) the code permits the waiver of defenses "Subject to a statute or decision. . . . " The section of HB 446 presently under discussion would constitute the statute to which this section would refer. This section is intended to reach only paper which is described as negotiable for the purposes of AS 45.05.726(a) for it is this section that automatically forces a waiver of defenses agreement on a buyer signing a negotiable instrument. Thus, it is clear that many types of paper transactions in the consumer market would not be covered by this provision.

Present Alaskan law works a genuine hardship and great injustice on consumers in the state when it permits the transferee of consumer paper to cut off the consumer's defenses. When one buys goods it is his reasonable expectation that if the vendor does not live up to his end of the bargain, he, the consumer, may refuse to pay. In actual fact, however, he very often finds that the note has been assigned away to a third party with whom he has not dealt and of whom he may have never heard, and he is left only with a cause of action against the seller which, assuming the presence and solvency of the seller, means an expensive and time consuming law suit.

There is a considerable and increasing use of the holder of the due-course-doctrine in Alaska for fraudulent purposes. Very often a group moves in, makes a fantastic offer to consumers which is never intended to be fulfilled, takes a note for the products or services, negotiates it, and skips the jurisdiction before anyone even realizes they have been taken. As a practical matter, the consumer has no recourse, least of all against the holder of his note to whom he is legally liable. Very often it is impossible for law enforcement officers to stop the dishonest or sharp dealer before the damage is done. However, an essential part of any such scheme is the sale of the paper taken. If the institutions who close their eyes to the people with whom they are dealing realize that it is they, not the consumer, who will be left holding the bag, the incidence of consumer fraud of this nature will decrease markedly.

It may be noted that the Uniform Consumer Credit Code (U3C) also takes a dim view of negotiable consumer paper, and offers the legislature another alternative in accomplishing the objective sought in the present section, as the U3C has been introduced as SB 211. One of the stated aims of the U3C in deciding what credit or practices to prohibit or limit, was to insure that there were very real and corresponding benefits to the consumer because of the recognition that restrictions on rights of creditors could lead to higher credit costs and interest rates (see N. Butler, Summary of the Uniform Consumer Credit Code 3, 1968). One of the very first practices outlawed by the U3C was the use of negotiable promissory notes and consumer sales (see 4.850 UCC4, in SB 211, page 46, line 29). The code also contains two alternative proposals as to the question of defenses and their waiver by the buyer as to an assignee of a consumer contract.

Obviously, the thrust of all these proposals is to curtail the abuse of the holder-in-due-course doctrine presently provided under the UCC, as noted above. The purpose of this doctrine is, of course, to insure, as far as it can, the free flow of commercial paper and to encourage investment. The supposition of the typical holder-in-due-course incident is that there are two innocent parties: the obligor who has been wronged by the obligee, and the assignee who took the note from the obligee without notice of the defense. The law, by favoring the holder of the note, seeks to keep the paper moving and relieve the anxieties of prospective transferors. However, the code, as noted, recognizes the difference between consumer paper and other loans, though it allows the local law to determine what the consequences of the distinction, if any, shall be. (It is interesting to note that the UCC originally sought to deny third party freedom from defenses in the case of consumer goods [Uniform Commercial Code § 9-2061 (1952 version)] which version was originally adopted in Pennsylvania.)

One question to be asked and answered, therefore, is whether the holder-in-due-course doctrine, as applied to consumer paper, is really having this classic effect on the money market. It is submitted that it does not. Consumer paper passes from dealer to financer as readily in states that subject the assignee to defenses as in states that do not. The possibility of consumer defenses is merely one of several risks taken by the assignee and the price he pays for the paper and the recourse or reserve arrangement he makes with the dealer are considered at the time the paper is negotiated. Consumer paper is not typically sold between financial institutions (saving perhaps some bulk transfers in which the second assignee is probably indifferent to the defenses of individual consumers) but if bought directly from the dealers, and it is here that the crux of the situation may be seen most clearly.

Without question the financial institution who is in the consistent practice of buying paper from particular dealers is in the best position to police his retail activities; presently, however, he has no reason to do so. By making the financial institution subject to the defenses of buyers, however, the effect will be to make those institutions put pressure on retailers to improve shoddy or dishonest dealings and force them to examine more carefully the paper sought to be sold by fly-by-night businesses. Moreover, what is the social or economic policy of allowing a financial institution to deal with a disreputable dealer and then stand free of liability while the consumer bears the loss?

There is the possibility that the increased protection afforded by requiring buyers of paper to be a bit more selective in their purchases and by making them subject to the defenses of consumer notes will result in some increased credit costs. However, the small increase, if any, is justified by the amount of lost consumer dollars in personal financial difficulties that may be avoided by this legislation. Moreover, there are aspects of this section which may actually decrease the cost of credit which cannot be ignored; notably the reduction in personal bankruptcies and increased percentages of collections from satisfied customers.

II. Exemptions and Exceptions.

All three bills contain common exceptions and exemptions in subsections (1) and (2), HB 446 and SB 352 being almost identical. These two exceptions are almost always provided in the similar state laws regarding consumer fraud and are considered necessary to protect the parties concerned. It must be noted that HB 444 does not repeal, as do the other two bills, the present sections on false or misleading advertising which contain a provision (AS 45.50.490(b)) similar to all the subsections (2). The retention of this exception in HB 444 presumably is to insure that it will apply to both the civil actions it provides and the criminal actions in the present law.

HB 444 also contains a third exception dealing with a pending action and appeals, and a fourth dealing with trademarks and tradenames used prior to the effective date of the statute.

III. Investigatory, Regulatory, and Subpoena Powers of the Attorney General.

One of the most marked differences between the Governor's bill and the other bills is the inclusion in the latter of very broad powers of investigation centering in the office of the Attorney General. Most of the states enacting this type of legislation have included these powers and they have apparently proven to be a useful enforcement aid primarily in states where court calendars are very crowded and immediate judicial action is difficult or impossible to obtain. It was felt, at the time 446 was drafted, that these extraordinary powers were not necessary to the enforcement of the act for several reasons. At this time, court calendars are not generally so overcrowded in Alaska as to make it difficult to hear motions for restraining orders or injunctions nor are the offices of the Attorney General so far distant from the court rooms that it would be impossible or inconvenient to act quickly in the necessary case. In addition, the relative isolation of the state combined with the relatively small population tends to discourage the fly-by-night or fast moving operator for whom most of these extraordinary powers are required from using Alaskans as his 'dupes'.

It must be noted that the powers granted by these two bills are both exceptional and substantial. The Attorney General, if these provisions are understood correctly, may upon his belief that some deceptive practice is or has taken place, (1) make the person in question file a detailed report in writing and under oath, (2) examine and cross-examine the person, (3) examine the property, records, books, and documents, (4) make copies of any of the above. The only investigation over which a court has any authority apparently is where the Attorney General wants to impound a sample of the property. In addition to these powers the Attorney General may issue subpoenas on his own power. These powers are reinforced by remedies against those refusing to cooperate in the investigation.

Should the legislature decide to include these powers in the final bill, the following general comments are offered for your consideration. SB 352 has identical powers to HB 444. However, it does not contain the safeguards against their abuse as does the latter bill (see HB 444, page 7, lines 5 to line 28). HB 444 recognizes the constitutional problems of self-incrimination which would be inherent in using material directly or indirectly uncovered as a result of an investigation conducted with these powers in any criminal action. (Though it must be noted that HB 444 provides for no criminal sanction.) The powers would, of course, be invaluable in opening up a violator to civil damages or injunction but their aid in convicting a person of a crime is doubtful. This distinction should be made where the broad investigatory powers are provided.

Likewise, HB 444 recognizes the possible abuse of the powers in question by requiring discovered material to be kept confidential. This protection will prevent persons from being pilloried in newspapers, stigmatized, or otherwise attacked unless the Attorney General, in his investigation has found evidence substantial enough to justify litigation. In this line of thought, some consideration might be given to the protection of trade secrets, secret trade information, or other privileged matter. Some states (Massachusetts notably) require that the demand for information shall not contain any requirements which would be unreasonable or improper if contained in a subpoena duces tecum issued by a court. Further court control could be obtained by providing for a motion by the person of whom the information is requested to extend the period of time or even satisfy the demand for good cause. In addition, some consideration should be given to the time and place that such information could be demanded (regular business hours, regular place of business, etc.).

It should be noted here that all three bills allow for regulatory power in the office of the Attorney General. This provision will enable the Attorney General to pinpoint specific schemes and rackets by regulation so that there can be no mistake as to what acts are prohibited. It is an important and useful tool in insuring that comprehensive and effective protection is afforded the public in consumer matters and the provision which will allow in the long run greater fairness to the business man by outlining prescribed conduct with precision.

IV. Restraining Orders, Injunctions, Voluntary Compliance.

Any law seeking to regulate such a sensitive area as consumer fraud requires that a broad spectrum of ways to deal with violators, whose activities may range from borderline to flagrant, be available to the authority charged with enforcement. Though the development of a body of effective regulations as to what specific acts are prohibited will go a long way toward putting the business man on notice as to what activity is prohibited, the use of assurances of discontinuance or voluntary compliances are particularly useful in cases where an honest business man unwittingly may have used a practice that could be considered deceptive. As a practical matter, long standing usages by businesses or industry which would be illegal under a new law may continue unnoticed and such cases should not necessarily be brought into court though something beyond a specific warning may be needed. Also, the use of this device will aid the enforcement officers and courts by giving an alternative to actual litigation for every use of deception. The provisions for voluntary compliance in HB 444 and SB 352 are substantially the same except that the latter adds a subsection (c) (page 6, line 8) which would seek to make a violation of the assurance prima facie (rebuttable) evidence of the violation of the law in civil actions by the Attorney General. This provision attempts to overcome the shortcoming of the voluntary assurance that if it is violated the Attorney General must proceed as if it had never been made.

The Governor's bill does not include it, as do the other bills, the provision for the voluntary payment by the alleged violator of investigative costs or damages on a stipulation to the assurance. This section does not appear to add a great deal to the bill because unless such an agreement were specifically prohibited by statute it could always be entered into regardless of its mention in the consumer fraud bill. Moreover, the Governor's bill does contain substantial provisions for private recourse, and in no way would prohibit this payment which is stated to be voluntary.

The power of the Attorney General to seek injunctions, whether permanent or temporary is common to all three bills and is a valuable and traditional tool of enforcement and one which we believe is essential to effective enforcement of a deceptive trade practice act.

V. Penalties.

SB 352 and the Governor's bill both provide for criminal sanctions for a violation of the act. HB 444 in marked contrast does not provide for any criminal sanctions. It is submitted that criminal sanctions are often the only way to deal with the purveyors of consumer fraud and that any bill without them would be of little help in actually curbing the incidents of consumer fraud in Alaska. A bill providing only civil penalties seems to assume that the victims of fraud are intelligent middle class individuals who are all aware of their rights, are familiar with and at ease in the courts, and are willing to bring actions to enforce their rights. Many times the persons hardest hit by these frauds are the poor, the illiterate, the feeble, the old, immigrants, the unaware, the unintelligent, and others who need to be protected from the unscrupulous. We are rarely concerned in these laws with the brilliant confidence artist who executes a multi-million dollar stock swindle against the financial wizards of Wall Street; we are talking here about individuals who take advantage of people who are already disadvantaged and prey upon the weakest members of our society. This is criminal activity and should be treated as such.

It is the apparent theory of HB 444 that the present criminal law is sufficient to protect the general public. The only additional public protection afforded by this proposal is the ability of the Attorney General to seek an injunction, which, if broken, could result in a civil penalty of up to $10,000. In other words, the purveyor of fraud has nothing to lose by engaging in fraudulent acts. Even if the Attorney General identifies him, seeks and obtains an injunction, (or assurance of discontinuance) the defrauder has lost nothing. He is free then to find another racket in which to engage so long as the court's order is not violated. The only fear under HB 444 would be from civil suits of those who are aware of the fraud, can prove damage, and are willing to prosecute their cases. However, as noted below, these civil claimants are given no evidentiary advantage and no specific provision for punitive or treble damages. Moreover, it is difficult to imagine a defrauder entering into an assurance of discontinuance with the Attorney General if the most than can be done is to get an injunction against him. The lack of criminal sanctions negates the use of this manpower saving tool. In short, the bill contains no real deterrent to fraudulent practices and next to no way to punish those who do engage in fraud. HB 444, despite its extensive and carefully drawn provisions prohibiting acts, providing for investigations, etc., will, in fact, change very little the present law which is inadequate to deal with the mounting incidence of consumer fraud in Alaska.

In comparing HB 446 and SB 352, it is notable that upper limit of the fine in the latter is $1,000, while in the former it is $10,000. Both provide for one year imprisonment. It is submitted that the fine will be used much more extensively by the courts than the jail sentence and that a $1,000 fine is an insufficient deterrent to the crimes set out in these bills. Consumer fraud is big business and $1,000 to many of these organizations would be a mere slap on the wrist, and easily written off as a 'business expense'. In addition the civil penalty limit for violation of a court order in SB 352 is only $10,000 as compared with $25,000 in the Governor's bill. Obviously these upper limits are not aimed at small operators but at the large, nation-wide organizations who may be well heeled and may retain 'house counsel' or other advantages.

All of the bills provide for private civil actions but again HB 444 is considerably less helpful than the other two bills. It provides only for actual damages where, in the proper case, the other bills would allow punitive damages (SB 352) or treble damages (HB 446). It does not specifically provide for class actions; nor does it give the evidentiary edge (prima facie) to private litigants where there has been a permanent injunction or final judgment as does the Governor's bill in subsection (e) of 45.50.540 (page 6, line 2). This point is not a minor one for in consumer fraud cases the main difficulty in getting a judgment is the investigation and accumulation of evidence which can be prohibitively expensive. Neither HB 444 or SB 352 provide for this feature. The deletion of this evidentiary advantage is particularly damaging to HB 444 which relies only on the Attorney General's ability to get an injunction and the possibility of private civil recovery for sanctions.

Allowing for private civil actions in a consumer fraud law is extremely helpful to the enforcement agent because it has the effect of making the law 'self-enforcing' to a degree, and especially with regard to the smaller or occasional claims. As a general rule, every such case which is brought by a private party means one less that must be prosecuted by the state. The enforcement officer is thus freer to investigate the professional or organized operations which are of important public concern and which may be prevented before they begin. In addition, it must be noted that the civil action gives the injured party a chance to recover his damages.

In our opinion the Governor's bill and, to the extent applicable, SB 352 are more sensitive than HB 444 to the need for a wide range of alternatives for enforcement. It includes higher limits for violation of orders or injunctions; it provides for a civil action by the state and class actions by injured groups; it provides for revocation of a corporate franchise as a proper case; it provides for a receivership where the court deems such extreme action necessary; and it recognizes the ability of private actions to aid in enforcement.

VI. Definitions.

(HB 446, page 7, line 21 to end)
(HB 444, page 8, line 15 to end)
(SB 352, page 7, line 10 to end)

In HB 444 "person" seems unnecessary in light of AS 01.10.060(7). ✓

I hope these observations have been of help to you in your study of this important legislation. If you have questions concerning it, please do not hesitate to contact this office.

The Honorable Tom Fink
Alaska House of Representatives
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Dear Mr. Fink:

On February 9, 1970 you were sent a letter in which the three consumer fraud bills now pending before the legislature were compared in some detail. Since that time one of the bills, SB 352, has been altered in several important points and this letter is to insure that you understand that the previous letter from this office was concerned with the original bill and not the substitute CSSB 352.

Though the substitute bill incorporates some of the features of the governor's bill (HB 446) it now appears to bear more relation to the Legislative Council proposal (HB 444) than to the former bill. Like HB 446, the substantial investigatory powers of the Attorney General are deleted. However, CSSB 352 goes even further in that it also has removed the power of the Attorney General to make regulations. The importance of this feature was expressed in our previous letter and its absence in a final law would be detrimental to the enforcement branch and the legitimate businessman as well.

The signal change in the substitute bill is the removal of any criminal sanctions from the bill which places it in the same category with HB 444 and leaves the governor's proposal the only bill providing for criminal actions. It is felt that the effectiveness of a consumer fraud law not containing provisions for criminal proceedings would be drastically reduced and would be far out of line with other state provisions and practices. In addition to removal of criminal penalties, it must be noted that the substitute reduces the civil sanctions and no longer provides for punitive damages. In short the substituted bill has had its teeth almost entirely drawn.

CSSB 352, you will note, has added the sections with which your subcommittee was most interested, dealing with consumer paper. This addition, identical to the governor's bill, seems to be a recognition of the importance of taking consumer paper out of the holder-in-due-course doctrine presently provided by the UCC.

Thank you for your patience in this matter. I hope that these supplemental comments will be of help to you.

Sincerely,

G. KENT EDWARDS

STATE OF ALASKA

KEITH H. MILLER, GOVERNOR

DEPARTMENT OF LAW

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

POUCH K, STATE CAPITOL — JUNEAU 99801

March 10, 1970

The Honorable Barry W. Jackson
Chairman, House Judiciary Committee
House of Representatives
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Dear Representative Jackson:

This is in response to the request of the Vice-Chairman of your committee, Mr. Fink, for clarification of certain issues raised with regard to the sections of HB 446 and CSSB 352 which would have the effect of suspending the holder-in-due-course doctrine, now provided for in the Uniform Commercial Code, where consumer paper is sought to be negotiated.

Section 45.50.550 of proposed House Bill 446 makes any instrument entered into between a retail buyer and seller a non-negotiable instrument within the meaning of the UCC (AS 45.05). Paragraph (b) provides that an assignee of the seller is subject to all claims and defenses of the buyer and the buyer may not agree to limit his rights.

This section is intended to modify AS 45.05.726 which provides:

> Subject to a statute or decision which establishes a different rule for buyers of consumer goods, an agreement by a buyer that he will not assert against an assignee a claim or defense which he may have against the seller is enforceable by an assignee who takes his assignment for value, in good faith, and without notice of a claim or defense, except as to defenses of a type which may be asserted against a holder in due course of a negotiable instrument under §§ 246 - 402 of this chapter. A buyer who as part of one transaction signs both a negotiable instrument and a security agreement makes such an agreement.

Under the current practice, when a negotiable instrument and a security agreement are executed by a retail buyer, under the provisions of AS 45.05.726, the buyer by executing the negotiable instrument agrees not to assert any defenses against an assignee of the paper except defenses which could be asserted against a holder in due course. In effect, the assignee becomes a holder in due course and the buyer may not assert against the assignee defenses which he would have available in an action by the seller. Proposed AS 45.50.550 removes the holder in due course protection of the assignee thus allowing the buyer to assert any defenses against an assignee which he could assert against the seller of the merchandise.

Under trade practices an assignee among others could consist of finance companies, small loan companies and state and national banks. There is no statutory conflict under state law which proposed AS 45.50.550 would affect as to any of the various types of assignees. Nor is there any statutory conflict under Federal Law, which would adversely affect national banks in the event proposed House Bill 446 was adopted.

National banks are authorized to purchase installment consumer paper. 12 U.S.C.A. § 84 sets forth the limits of liability of any person to a national bank. Paragraph 13 provides that as to full recourse negotiable or non-negotiable installment consumer paper the bank is subject to a limitation of 25% of its capital and surplus. However, this section goes on to provide if the bank certifies it has evaluated the responsibility of the purchaser of merchandise and is relying primarily on him for payment the 25% limitation is transferred from the seller of the paper to the maker.

For example, if a bank were purchasing negotiable or non-negotiable recourse consumer paper from an automobile dealer it would be limited in the amount that it could purchase to 25% of its capital and surplus. However, if the bank evaluates the responsibility of the buyer of the automobile and certifies that it is relying primarily upon him for payment that paper is not considered in the 25% limitation applicable to the dealer.

The section refers to both negotiable and non-negotiable consumer paper. The provision for certification is not limited to negotiable paper but also includes non-negotiable paper. Therefore, a statute which made all such paper non-negotiable would not change the authorization or the practice which national banks have been following.

It does, of course, because it removes a bank from the protection of a holder in due course, requires it to be a little more circumspect in purchasing paper because of the requirement of evaluating the responsibility of the buyer and certifying that the bank is relying primarily on him for payment. Or in the words of the comptroller of national banks: "What is required essentially is the responsible exercise of prudent banking judgment supported by a reasonably adequate record." (Comptroller's Manual for National Banks, May 1968, Sec. 1620(e).

Several states including California and Massachusetts have adopted legislation such as HB 446 without any noticeable effect on banks. Congress in 1959 when considering 12 U.S.C.A. § 84(13) acknowledged the necessity of including non-negotiable paper in paragraph (13) because various state laws had been enacted limiting the negotiability of consumer paper. Thus it was stated in Senate Report (No. 731) on the amendment:

> Furthermore, there has been a trend in recent years for the varous States to protect consumers by adopting retail installment sales acts which specify the form which obligations covering consumer installment purchases shall take. The form prescribed is almost always nonnegotiable, and in at least some of these States the law prevents the seller of goods from taking a negotiable note in addition to the form of obligation prescribed by statute. In these States banks engaged in this type of financing must take nonnegotiable paper. (U.S. Code Congressional and Administrative News, Vol. 2, 86 Congress, First Session, page 2305.)

For the foregoing reasons, it is the opinion of this office that enactment of the sections on non-negotiability of consumer paper will not have any noticeable effect upon legitimate and good faith commercial transactions. On the other hand, passage of the measure will accomplish a substantial benefit to Alaska's consumers as was explained in our previous memorandum, (See letter to Hon. Tom Fink, Feb. 9, 1970 pp. 3-6) by requiring the purchasers of consumer paper to be more selective in choosing businesses from whom they purchase paper and in policing the activities of the businesses with whom they do choose to deal.

It may be appropriate here to discuss one further point concerning the various approaches to the provision in question. The language of the provisions in HB 446 and CSSB 352 are quite similar to the draft developed by the Committee on State Legislation. (See Suggested State Legislation 1970, The Council of State Governments.) In drafting the provisions both alternatives of the UCCC (SB 211) on the subject were considered but found to be less acceptable than the language of the present bills. SB 211 chose alternative "A" of the UCCC which provides that the rights of the consumer can only be asserted as a matter of defense to or set-off against a claim by the holder of the paper. Under that provision then the consumer has no rights unless the holder sues the consumer. In the commentary on the language here it was stated:

> This would allow continuation of threats to, and impairment of, a consumer's credit rating which result from harassing collection tactics sometimes used without any actual litigation being undertaken against the consumer. (p. 5 of Reprint)

Thus it is felt that though the effect of either approach is aimed at the same problem the legislation under consideration here is superior to that of the UCCC.

I hope these remarks have been of help to you in your study of this provision.

Very truly yours,

G. KENT EDWARDS

MEMORANDUM

February 20, 1970

1970 Alaska Legislation
S.B. 352, H.B. 444 and
H.B. 446

Each of these similar bills would prohibit numerous "deceptive" or "unfair" trade practices in the name of "consumer protection." In brief summary, they would seek to prevent various defined deceptive or unfair trade practices, principally by providing injunctive and damage sanctions. For reasons detailed below, legislation of this kind would be unsound in any state and is unnecessary in Alaska. S.B. 352[1] will be used for illustrative purposes, with appropriate references to variations in the other two bills.

Section 471.[2] This section forbids any trade practice "defined in this chapter as, or determined under this chapter to be, a deceptive trade practice." Section 461 then sets out twelve categories of deceptive trade practices varying in specificity from the relatively clear "(6) represents that a property is original or new if he knows or should know that it is deteriorated, altered, reconditioned, reclaimed, used or secondhand"; to such amorphous standards as "(8) disparages the property, services or business of another by false or misleading representation of fact," and "(12) makes false or misleading statements of fact concerning the price of property or services, or the reasons for, existence of,

1. Considered herein is "CSSB 352 am." which is an amended version of original S.B. 352 and which was passed by the Senate on February 11, 1970 and thereupon assigned to the House ~~Consumer~~ COMMERCE and Judiciary committees.
2. The provisions of the bill would constitute Article 4 of Title 45, Chapter 50.

or the amounts of price reductions" (emphasis added).[3] It is then provided that the foregoing deceptive trade practices "are in addition to and do not limit the various types of unfair trade practices actionable at common law or under the laws of this state."[4] This last provision really subverts the ostensible purpose of this kind of legislation, i.e., to notify businessmen of definite wrongs, because in effect it says that if we have forgotten anything it nonetheless may be redressed under

3. In addition to its generally similar definitions of "unlawful acts and practices" H.B. 446 prohibits engaging "in any other conduct creating a likelihood of confusion or misunderstanding and which misleads, deceives, or damages any person in connection with the sale or advertisement of any goods or services," and using or employing "any deception, fraud, false pretense, false promise, misrepresentation, or knowingly conceal, suppress or omit any material fact with intent that others rely upon such concealment, suppression or omission in connection with the sale or advertisement of any goods or services whether or not any person has in fact been misled, deceived or damaged."

   H.B. 444's "deceptive trade practices" add to those of CSSB 352am certain restrictions on installment sales, "bait and switch" advertising and the sale of flood or water damaged goods.

4. H.B. 446 does not contain a comparable provision. H.B. 444 contains the same provision and also provides that "Evidence that a person has engaged in a deceptive trade practice is prima facie evidence of intent to injure competitors and to destroy or substantially lessen competition." Apparently this provision is intended to help sellers prove that any loss of profits coincidently sustained by them resulted from the "deceptive" practice, which would be redressable in damages as provided in other provisions of the bill.

the common law or under other statutes.[5]

These categories of deceptive practices would seem to add nothing of importance to Alaska's existing legislation. Present section 45.50.40 forbids all "false, deceptive or misleading advertising with actual knowledge of the facts which make the advertising false, deceptive or misleading, for a business, trade or commercial purpose or for the purpose of inducing, or which is likely to induce, directly or indirectly, the public to purchase, consume, lease, dispose of, utilize or sell a property or service, or to enter into an obligation or transaction relating to a property or service." Related provisions authorize injunctive relief and make violations of the statute a misdemeanor punishable by ninety days imprisonment or a $5000 fine, or both (Alaska Statutes, Title 45, Ch. 50, §§ 470-510).[6]

Indeed, the superfluity of this bill is indicated by the speech of Mr. Gale P. Gotschall, FTC Counsel for Federal-State Cooperation, given on September 26, 1969 to an Arkansas legislative committee. On page 5 of the transcript of that speech Mr. Gotschall includes Alaska as one of 23 states now having laws "which achieve approximately the same results" for consumer protection as the Federal Trade Commission Act.

5. Indeed, H.B. 444 provides that the Attorney General may "promulgate the rules necessary to administer the provisions of this chapter" (§ 45.90.040), and under H.B. 446 he may "make regulations interpreting" what is and what is not an unlawful act or practice under the statute (§ 45.50.090). Considering the breadth and vagueness of many of the descriptions in the bill, this power is legislative in nature. Such comparable legislation as the FTC may enact is limited to a case-by-case development and is based on the Commission's assumed expertise supported by an extensive staff of lawyers, accountants and economists able to make the detailed economic studies necessary for any intelligent regulation of interstate business. There is no basis for delegating like legislative powers to a state attorney general, and this effort to do so would raise a serious constitutional question.

6. CSSB 352am and H.B. 446 would repeal this legislation.

Section 501. Whenever the Attorney General has "cause" to believe that section 481 is being violated he may sue for temporary and permanent injunctive relief.[7] In contrast, the Federal Trade Commission's repeated requests for a preliminary injunctive remedy have always been denied by Congress, and soundly so. To the extent that the FTC may particularize the broad wording of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act on a case-by-case basis, it is acting essentially like a legislature. To a significant degree the same would be true of courts entertaining cases under section 481 of this bill. No legislature has the power to obtain injunctions pending consideration of proposed laws, and neither the FTC nor a court should have it in similar circumstances.

This section also provides that the court may make any further order "necessary to restore to any other person money or property which may have been acquired by means of a deceptive trade practice." Apparently this contemplates broadening state injunctive proceedings to include damage claims in behalf of the general public. Wholly apart from the unnecessary administrative burdens this would impose on the Attorney General, a damage remedy is inappropriate to enforce a statute of such breadth that proceedings under it would often perforce be announcing new rules which would be applied ex post facto in awarding damages.[8] This point is noted further below.

7. H.B. 444 adds provisions making the Attorney General a one-man grand jury with power to issue subpoenae and t require written reports and oral testimony under oath, as well as the production of documents. Disobedience may be redressed by court orders not only requiring compliance but restraining the "sale or advertisement of property by a person," which, so far as appears, could be done without notice to and an opportunity to be heard by the respondent (see §§ 45.90.030-45.90.050, incl.).

8. H.B. 444 and H.B. 446 have comparable provisions, those of the latter bill contemplating even the appointment of a receiver and the dissolution of the company and the forfeiture of its right to do business in the state. Such drastic relief is plainly disproportionate to the offenses involved, and even if it were not there are no criteria to guide the court in dispensing such punishment.

Section 511 contemplates the negotiation of "an assurance of discontinuance of a deceptive trade practice" in lieu of litigation. Such a stipulation may provide, among other things, for the payment of "any amount necessary to restore to a person the money or property which may have been acquired by the alleged violator by means of the deceptive trade practice." This provision also would create substantial administrative burden for the Attorney General and would in effect provide for a damage remedy to enforce a statute that, unless made far more specific, would be in many instances too vague to support such relief.[9]

Section 520. Anyone who violates a court order or injunction obtained under this bill is subject to a "penalty" of up to $10,000. This seems excessive in view of the $5000 maximum penalty imposed for violations of cease and desist orders issued by the Federal Trade Commission.[10]

---

9. The other bills have comparable provisions. Section 530(d) of CSSB 352am states that a final judgment in state proceedings shall be "prima facie evidence that the person engaged in a deceptive trade practice" as defined in section 461, but there is nothing to indicate whether the subsequent action must involve the same conduct. H.B. 444 states that any violation of such an assurance is "prima facie evidence of a deceptive trade practice for the purposes of civil action or proceeding thereafter by the attorney general, whether a new action or a subsequent motion or petition in a pending action or proceeding" (45.90.000(b)). This sort of once-guilty-always-guilty approach is untenable and presumably unconstitutional since the first conduct may have no sufficient probative connection with the later conduct.

10. H.B. 446 would impose up to $25,000 for each violation of an injunction obtained under the bill (45.50.500).

    H.B. 446 would also impose a "civil penalty" of up to $5000 for each unlawful act or practice and a fine of up to $10,000 and imprisonment for up to one year for "a course of conduct declared unlawful" by the bill (ibid.). There are no civil or criminal penalties for violations of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, and presumably criminal sanctions could not lawfully be imposed for "crimes" so vaguely defined as many of these "unlawful" or "deceptive" practices.

Section 530. "Any person" may sue for himself and for "numerous persons similarly situated" to recover damages. An individual suing solely for himself may recover his actual damages or $200, whichever is greater. But apparently in class actions each member of the class may recover only his "actual" damages. In each type of action, however, the court in its discretion may award "additional" damages.[11]

There is no private right to damages for a violation of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, and there should be none for substantive state provisions of comparable vagueness. This is because prohibitions of acts described so vaguely as those that may "mislead" are so broad that it is inappropriate and unfair to impose damages, ex post facto, for a violation which would not be established with certainty until the end of a trial. "Additional damages" in such cases would be even more unfair, especially in the absence of any criteria to govern when they would be awarded. Moreover, the bill would improperly provide what in the usual case would be an unreasonable escalation of actual damages to a minimum of $200. Large and prosperous companies could possibly withstand the financial exposure created by this provision, which would typically result in punitive damages multiplied by the total number of consumers who sue or join in suits brought by others. But the statute is not so limited and it therefore threatens smaller companies with bankruptcy for relatively trivial offenses that may even be inadvertent. In sum, the damage provisions are unnecessary and repressive in the context of legislation this vague, especially when considered with the other remedies provided by the bill.

11. HB. 446 gives the court discretionary power to award up to threefold the actual damages sustained. H.B. 444 contemplates only actual damages, and does not provide for class actions. All three bills would permit the court to award costs and reasonable attorney's fees.

    Section 45.50.550 states that notes and evidence of indebtedness given for the purchase of consumer goods and services shall be nonnegotiable. This seems unnecessary and will serve to make it more difficult to obtain credit for such purchases. CSSB 352am has the same provisions.

CONCERNING CONSUMER PROTECTION; DEFINING DECEPTIVE TRADE PRACTICES; AND PROVIDING ENFORCEMENT BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado:

Section 1. Definitions.—(1) As used in this act, unless the context otherwise requires:

(2) "Article" means a product as distinguished from a trademark, label, or distinctive dress in packaging.

(3) "Certification mark" means a mark used in connection with the goods or services of a person other than the certifier to indicate geographic origin, material, mode of manufacture, quality, accuracy, or other characteristics of the goods or services or to indicate that the work or labor on the goods or services was performed by members of a union or other organization.

(4) "Collective mark" means a mark used by members of a cooperative, association, or other collective group or organization to identify goods or services and distinguish them from those of others, or to indicate membership in the collective group or organization.

(5) "Mark" means a word, name, symbol, device, or any combination of the foregoing in any form or arrangement.

(6) "Person" means an individual, corporation, business trust, estate, trust, partnership, unincorporated association, two or more of any of the foregoing having a joint or common interest, or any other legal or commercial entity.

(7) "Service mark" means a mark used by a person to identify services and to distinguish them from the services of others.

(8) "Trademark" means a mark used by a person to identify goods and to distinguish them from the goods of others.

TRADE

(9) "Trade name" means a word, name, symbol, device, or any combination of the foregoing in any form or arrangement used by a person to identify his business, vocation, or occupation, and to distinguish it from the business, vocation, or occupation of others.

(10) "Advertisement" includes the attempt by publication, dissemination, solicitation, or circulation, visual, oral, or written, to induce directly or indirectly any person to enter into any obligation or to acquire any title or interest in any property.

(11) "Property" means any real or personal property, or both real and personal property, intangible property, or services.

(12) "Sale" means any sale, offer for sale, or attempt to sell any property for any consideration.

Section 2. Deceptive trade practices.—(1) (a) A person engages in a deceptive trade practice when in the course of his business, vocation, or occupation, he:

(b) Knowingly passes off goods or services as those of another;

(c) Knowingly makes a false representation as to the source, sponsorship, approval, or certification of goods or services;

(d) Knowingly makes a false representation as to affiliation, connection, association with, or certification by another;

(e) Uses deceptive representations or designations of geographic origin in connection with goods or services;

(f) Knowingly makes a false representation as to the characteristics, ingredients, uses, benefits, alterations, or quantities of goods or services or a false representation as to the sponsorship, approval, status, affiliation, or connection of a person therewith;

(g) Represents that goods are original or new if he knows or should know that they are deteriorated, altered, reconditioned, reclaimed, used, or secondhand;

(h) Represents that goods or services are of a particular standard, quality, or grade, or that goods are of a particular style or model, if he knows or should know that they are of another;

(i) Disparages the goods, services, or business of another by false or misleading representation of fact;

(j) Advertises goods or services with intent not to sell them as advertised;

(k) Advertises goods or services with intent not to supply reasonably expectable public demand, unless the advertisement discloses a limitation of quantity;

(l) Advertises under the guise of obtaining sales personnel when in fact the purpose is to first sell a product or service to the sales personnel applicant;

(m) Makes false or misleading statements of fact concerning the price of goods or services, or the reasons for, existence of, or amounts of price reductions;

(n) Fails to deliver to the customer at the time of an installment sale of goods or services, a written order, contract, or receipt setting forth the name and address of the seller and the name and address of the organization which he represents, and all of the terms and conditions of the sale, including a description of the goods or services, which shall be stated in readable, clear, and unambiguous language;

(n) (i) Employs "bait and switch" advertising, which consists of an attractive but insincere offer to sell a product or service which the seller in truth does not intend or desire to sell, which advertising is accompanied by one or more of the following practices:

(ii) Refusal to show the product advertised;

(iii) Disparagement in any respect of the advertised product or the terms of sale;

(iv) Requires tie-in sales or other undisclosed conditions to be met prior to selling the advertised product or service;

(v) Refusal to take orders for the product advertised for delivery within a reasonable time;

(vi) Showing or demonstrating a defective product which is unusable or impractical for the purposes set forth in the advertisement;

(vii) Accepting a deposit for the product and subsequently switching the purchase order to a higher priced item; or (viii) Failure to make deliveries of the product within a reasonable time or to make a refund therefor.

(p) Knowingly fails to identify flood damaged or water damaged goods as to such damages.

(2) Evidence that a person has engaged in a deceptive trade practice shall be prima facie evidence of intent to injure competitors and to destroy or substantially lessen competition.

(3) The deceptive trade practices listed in this section are in addition to and do not limit the types of unfair trade practices actionable at common law or under other statutes of this state.

Section 3. Exclusions.—(1) (a) This act does not apply to:

(b) Conduct in compliance with the orders or rules of, or a statute administered by, a federal, state, or local governmental agency;

(c) Publishers, including outdoor advertising media, advertising agencies, broadcasters, or printers engaged in the dissemination of information or reproduction of printed or pictorial matter who publish, broadcast, or reproduce material without knowledge of its deceptive character; or

(d) Actions or appeals pending on the date that this act becomes effective.

(2) This act shall not be interpreted to apply to the use by a person of any service mark, trademark, certification mark, collective mark, trade name, or other trade identification which was used and not abandoned prior to the effective date of this act, if the use was in good faith and is otherwise lawful except for the provisions of this act.

Section 4. Powers of attorney general.—(1) (a) When the attorney general has cause to believe that any person has engaged in or is engaging in any deceptive trade practice listed in section 2 of this act, he may:

(b) Request such person to file a statement or report in writing under oath or otherwise, on such forms as shall be prescribed by him, as to all facts and circumstances concerning the sale or advertisement of property by such person, and such other data and information as he may deem necessary;

(c) Examine under oath any person in connection with the sale or advertisement of any property;

(d) Examine any property or sample thereof, record, book, document, account, or paper as he may deem necessary;

(e) Make true copies, at the expense of the attorney general, of any record, book, document, account, or paper examined pursuant to paragraph (d) of this subsection (1), which copies may be offered into evidence in lieu of the originals thereof in actions brought pursuant to sections 6 and 7 of this act; and

(f) Pursuant to any order of any district court, impound any sample of property which is material to such practice and retain the same in his possession until completion of all proceedings undertaken under this act. An order shall not be issued pursuant to this paragraph (f) without full opportunity given to the accused to be heard and unless the attorney general has proved by clear and convincing evidence that the business activities of the person or persons to whom such order will be directed will not be impaired thereby.

Section 5. Subpoenas—hearings—rules.—(1) The attorney general, in addition to other powers conferred upon him by this act, may issue subpoenas to require the attendance of witnesses or the production of documents, administer oaths, conduct hearings in aid of any investigation or inquiry, and prescribe such forms and promulgate such rules as may be necessary to administer the provisions of this act.

(2) Service of any notice or subpoena may be made in the manner prescribed by law or the Colorado rules of civil procedure.

Section 6. Remedies.—(1) (a) If any person shall fail to cooperate with any investigation pursuant to section 4 hereof or if any person shall fail to obey any subpoena pursuant to section 5 hereof, the attorney general may apply to any district court for an appropriate order to effect the purposes of this act. Such application shall state that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the order applied for is necessary to terminate or prevent a deceptive trade practice as defined in this act. If the court shall be satisfied of such reasonable grounds the court, in its order, may:

(b) Grant injunctive relief restraining the sale or advertisement of any property by such person;

(c) Require the attendance of or the production of documents by such person, or both;

(d) Grant such other or further relief as may be necessary to obtain compliance by such person.

Section 7. Restraining orders—injunctions—assurances of discontinuance.—(1) Whenever the attorney general has cause to believe that a person has engaged in or is engaging in any deceptive trade practice listed in section 2 of this act, he may apply for and obtain, in an action in any district court of this state, a temporary restraining order, or injunction, or both, pursuant to the Colorado rules of civil procedure, prohibiting such person from continuing such practices, or engaging therein, or doing any act in furtherance thereof. The court may make such orders or judgments as may be necessary to prevent the use or employment by such person of any such deceptive trade practice, or which may be necessary to restore to any other person any moneys, or real or personal property which may have been acquired by means of any such practice.

(2) Where the attorney general has authority to institute a civil action or other proceeding pursuant to the provisions of this act, in lieu thereof or as a part thereof, he may accept an assurance of discontinuance of any deceptive trade practice listed in section 2 of this act. Such assurance may include a stipulation for the voluntary payment by the alleged violator of the costs of investigation and any such action or proceeding by the attorney general, and any amount or amounts necessary to restore to any person any money or property which may have been acquired by such alleged violator by means of any such practice. Any such assurance of discontinuance accepted by the attorney general and any such stipulation filed w i the court as a part of any such action or proceeding shall be confidential to the parties to such action or proceeding and to the court and its employees, but upon final judgment by the court that (a) a temporary restraining order or injunction obtained pursuant to subsection (1) of this section has been violated, or (b) an assurance of discontinuance accepted pursuant to this subsection has been violated, or (c) a person has engaged in the same deceptive trade practice as had theretofore been enjoined pursuant to a final permanent injunction obtained pursuant to subsection (1) of this section, or (d) a person has engaged in the same deceptive trade practice which he theretofore had agreed to discontinue by acceptance of an assurance of discontinuance under this subsection, said assurance of discontinuance or stipulation shall thereupon be deemed a public record and open to inspection by any person. Proof by a preponderance of evidence of a violation of such an assurance shall constitute prima facie evidence of a deceptive trade practice for the purposes of any civil action or proceeding brought thereafter by the attorney general, whether a new action or a subsequent motion or petition in any pending action or proceeding.

Section 8. Information and evidence confidential and non-admissible—when.—(1) The attorney general shall not release any information or evidence, obtained by him pursuant to the provisions of this act, to any district attorney or his investigator or to any law enforcement officer for use in any criminal prosecution. Any such information or evidence produced by the attorney general under this act shall not be admissible in evidence in any such prosecution. The provisions of this subsection (1) shall not be construed to prevent the attorney general from disclosing to any district attorney or law enforcement officer the fact of the commission of a crime by any person, nor shall the same be construed to prevent any district attorney or his investigator or any law enforcement officer from independently producing or obtaining the same or similar facts, information, or evidence for use in any criminal prosecution.

(2) Subject to the provisions of section 7 (2) of this act, the attorney general shall not make public the name of any person alleged to have committed a deceptive trade practice during any investigation conducted by him under this act, nor shall the records of investigations or intelligence information of the attorney general obtained under this act be deemed public records available for inspection by the general public; but this shall not be construed to prevent the attorney general from issuing public statements describing or warning of any course of conduct or any conspiracy which constitutes or will constitute a deceptive trade practice, whether on a local, state-wide, regional, or nation-wide basis.

Section 9. Civil penalties.—Any person who violates any court order or injunction issued pursuant to this act shall forfeit and pay to the general fund of this state a civil penalty of not more than ten thousand dollars. For the purposes of this section, the court issuing any such order or injunction shall retain jurisdiction and the cause shall be continued. In any such case of violation, the attorney general may petition the court for the recovery of such civil penalty. Such civil penalties shall be in addition to any other penalty or remedy available for the enforcement of the provisions of this act and of any such court order or injunction.

Section 10. District attorneys to receive and transmit complaints.—(1) The district attorneys of the several judicial districts of this state, their assistants and deputies, are hereby appointed agents of the attorney general, to serve without additional compensation, for the limited purposes described in subsection (2) of this section.

(2) (a) The agents appointed in subsection (1) of this section shall have the following duties:

(b) To receive, on forms provided by the attorney general, complaints from persons concerning deceptive trade practices listed in section 2 of this act; and

(c) To transmit such complaints to the attorney general.

Section 11. Enforcement.—In order to promote the uniform administration of this act in this state, the attorney general shall be responsible for its enforcement, but he may direct any district attorney in this state to enforce the provisions of this act, in which case the district attorney shall have the powers of the attorney general prescribed in this act.

Section 12. Damages.—The provisions of this act shall be available to any person in a civil action for any claim against any person who has acquired any moneys or real or personal property by means of any deceptive trade practice listed in section 2 of this act. Costs shall be allowed to the prevailing party unless the court otherwise directs. The court may award attorneys' fees to the prevailing party.

Section 13. Citation.—This act may be cited as the "Colorado Consumer Protection Act".

Section 14. Severability clause.—If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, such invalidity shall not affect other provisions or applications of the act which can be given effect without the invalid provision or application, and to this end the provisions of this act are declared to be severable.

Section 15. Effective date.—This act shall take effect July 1, 1969.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

Washington, D.C. 20580

OFFICE OF INFORMATION 393-6800 Ext. 197

For RELEASE: IMMEDIATE, Wednesday, August 13, 1969

FTC URGES STATES TO ENACT "UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES AND CONSUMER PROTECTION LAW"

The Federal Trade Commission has renewed its recommendation, originally made in 1966, that the states enact laws to protect the public from deceptive and unfair trade practices. The FTC-recommended legislation would enable the attorney general or other designated state official to investigate and obtain court injunctions with respect to "unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in trade or commerce." This is similar to language contained in Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (Title 15, Section 45, U. S. Code). The Commission also included in its draft alternative language which would prohibit practices which are misleading or deceptive to the public.

Chairman Paul Rand Dixon in discussing the current proposal stated that co-operation between the Commission and state and local agencies is needed if the public is to be afforded adequate protection against practices which cheat consumers and unfairly injure honest businessmen. Chairman Dixon said, "To the extent that the states correct such practices occurring locally, the Commission will be enabled to giv quicker and more effective attention to problems of national significance."

The FTC-recommended legislation is designated "Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law." It embodies language not only from the Federal Trade Commission Act but from existing laws of several states, including Washington, Hawaii, North Carolina, Vermont and Massachusetts, as well as Arizona, California, Connecticut Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas and Wisconsin.

This year's draft contains a provision authorizing the court to decree restituti of money or property to anyone who suffers damage from unlawful acts or practices, to appoint a receiver, or revoke a license or certificate for doing business. Provision is also made for injured parties to initiate suits for the recovery of their own damages as well as losses sustained by others who have been similarly damaged, and for payment of attorney's fees and court costs. Ordinarily the amount involved in a consu transaction is not sufficient to warrant bringing private suit, with the result that thousands of consumers suffer small losses without any remedy being available, Chairma Dixon explained. Minimum relief of $200 is authorized, and the court may, in its discretion, award up to three times the actual damages.

Another new section added to the model law this year provides that a consumer's promissory note or other evidence of debt is different from ordinary commercial paper and, if it is transferred to a finance company or other third party, the consumer may assert all the defenses against the note holder that he could have asserted against the original seller or lessor of the goods or services. Under the laws of most states, such transferees are treated as "holders-in-due-course" and are not subject to these defenses with the result that if the seller fails to perform the services or to deliver the merchandise as ordered, the buyer may nonetheless be required to pay his note. The Commission feels that eliminating the holder-in-due course doctrine for consumer installment transactions will help to eliminate consumer deception and the hardships which consumers suffer as a result of high-pressure selling methods. Retailers will no longer be able to secure what amounts to virtual immunity from their illegal practices by assigning the installment contracts to third parties. At the same time, more finance companies will be encouraged to investigate the business practices of concerns from whom they buy consumer paper, which may dry up the sources of financing of those fly-by-night operators which engage in deceptive and fraudulent sales practices.

Another new section of the model law recommended by the Commission would authorize assessment of civil penalties of up to $2,000 per violation for initial violations when the violator acted willfully, that is, when he knew or should have known that his conduct violated the law. Criminal penalties of up to $5,000 fine and one year's imprisonment are authorized to be imposed, in the discretion of the court, to deal with violations which entail fraudulent conduct. The Commission felt that these additions were necessary to eradicate the hard-core frauds and predators who victimize aged and low-income consumers, especially in the inner cities.

Participation in enforcement actions by county and city attorneys within the state, subject to approval of the state attorney general, is also authorized under the proposed law. This, it was felt, would promote the development of coordinated enforcement action at state, county and city levels.

In addition to the specific legislative proposal contained in the recommended "Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law," the Commission urged that agencies of state and local government take action designed to stimulate competition in low-income areas of their inner cities. The Commission believes that the restoration of competition among merchants who serve these areas is an effective means of assuring that the customer has the opportunity to purchase quality goods and services at fair prices.

The proposals were unanimously adopted by the Commission except that Commissioner MacIntyre did not concur in the recommendation regarding limitation of the holder-in-due-course doctrine. He reserved judgment on this subject pending completion of his analysis and study of the National Consumer Protection Hearing held by the Commission in November-December 1968.

The Council of State Governments has endorsed the draft recommended by the Commission with three changes:

(1) in the prefatory explanation regarding the limitation of the holder-in-due-course doctrine, the Council added a footnote reminding state legislatures to consider this change in conjunction with the Uniform Consumer Credit Code;

(2) in the civil damage section, the Council changed treble damages to punitive damages; and

(3) the Council deleted the section which would have provided criminal penalties. This was done on the motion of a member who expressed the view that their inclusion would unduly complicate and delay investigation under the law, and that state criminal fraud laws are already more or less adequate, the great need being for a law which provides civil procedure and remedies.

The Commission's proposal regarding improvement of competition was consolidated for consideration with related proposals received from the Small Business Administration and the Department of Housing and Urban Development which the Council is also considering.

The official report of the Council's action will be published about September 1, 1969 in Suggested State Legislation for 1970.

The full text of the Commission's proposals may be obtained from Office of the General Counsel, Division of Legislation and Federal-State Corporation, Federal Trade Commission, Washington, D. C. 20580.

Re: Proposals for State Legislation

Dear Mr. Hughes:

This is in response to your letter of December 20, 1968, conveying invitation from the Council of State Governments and the National Governors' Conference for submittal of legislative proposals to be considered by the Committee of State Officials on Suggested State Legislation.

The enclosed proposal No. 1 is a revision and bringing up to date of the model "Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law" which was initially recommended by the Federal Trade Commission in 1966 and published by the Council of State Governments in Suggested State Legislation for 1967. This proposal incorporates changes which were published in Suggested State Legislation for 1969 and additional changes which are discussed in the prefatory statement.

The enclosed proposal No. 2 is designed to stimulate competition by encouraging new entry and improving efficiency of business concerns in low-income areas of America's inner cities, for the purpose of providing residents of those areas with better quality merchandise at lower prices.

The Commission is pleased to note that its proposal to license hearing aid fitters and dealers, as adopted by the Council of State Governments in Suggested State Legislation for 1967, has been followed in Indiana, Tennessee, Florida, Kansas, South Dakota, Louisiana, and Arkansas. They, along with Oregon and Michigan, which were first to act, now comprise nine States having such laws.

The Commission is still interested in seeing that model legislation be developed to provide for better regulation of correspondence and vocational schools and their salesmen, as mentioned in our proposals of 1966-68.

The cooperation of the Council of State Governments and the National Governors' Conference in making this opportunity available to us is appreciated.

By direction of the Commission, with Commissioner MacIntyre reserving judgment as to the proposal involving holder-in-due-course doctrine. His separate statement in that regard is attached.

UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES AND CONSUMER PROTECTION LAW (Revised for 1970)

This is a revision and bringing up to date of the model Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act as initially published in Suggested State Legislation for 1967. This draft incorporates the changes which were published in Suggested State Legislation for 1969, and additional changes discussed below.

The 1967 proposal has been highly successful, in that ten States subsequently adopted such legislation. They are Arizona, Kansas, Maryland, Massachusetts, Missouri, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, and Vermont.

To meet differing requirements in the several States, slightly different language has been adopted for Section 2 which declares what acts and practices are unlawful. Three alternative forms of language have evolved for this section. Alternative Form No. 1 prohibits use of those "unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices" which if used in interstate commerce are prohibited by Section 5(a)(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. 45(a)(1)). This form has been adopted in Washington, Hawaii, Vermont and Massachusetts, and is the form preferred by the Federal Trade Commission. It enables the enforcement official to reach not only deceptive practices which prey upon consumers, but also unfair methods which injure competition. This form will reach price-fixing arrangements, boycotts by suppliers, coercion of retailers, and other trade restraints which tend to create monopoly and enhance prices. However, in some States such anticompetitive practices are already covered by other legislation. For those States, Alternative Form No. 2 is suggested.

Alternative Form No. 2 enables the enforcement official to enjoin all types of deceptive trade practice. In this draft the language used is that proposed by Howard H. Bell, President of the American Advertising Federation, before the Federal Trade Commission at its National Consumer Protection Hearing on November 13, 1968. Mr. Bell suggested that the model act declare unlawful "false, misleading, or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce." This language is acceptable to, and recommended by, the Federal Trade Commission. Similar language is used in the laws of Arizona, Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, and North Dakota.

Alternative Form No. 3 would, like the 1967 draft, prohibit the twelve specific types of deceptive practice enumerated in the Uniform Deceptive Trade Practices Act as promulgated by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform Laws in 1964. The latter Act provides a remedy only for a private person injured by a deceptive practice. In the draft set forth below, there has been added a subsection (13) to prohibit "any other act or practice which is unfair or deceptive to the consumer." This language was adopted by Council of State Governments in Suggested State Legislation for 1969, and is acceptable to the Federal Trade Commission. It is somewhat narrower in scope than the language of either Alternative No. 1 or Alternative No. 2.

The common feature of these laws is that they enable an enforcement official, usually the attorney general, to investigate alleged or suspected deceptive and unfair trade practices, and to obtain court injunction when violation exists. The enforcement official is given power to accept an assurance of voluntary compliance, when he considers that method of disposition appropriate. This along with the authority to proceed when "in the public interest" protects him from contentious complainants and from the necessity of pursuing every matter, regardless of its relative importance, to formal litigation.

Broad prohibition of unfair and deceptive practices is essential to cope with the novel practices and variations on old practices that sharp operators constantly are inventing to deceive the public and divert trade from honest competitors.

The provision in Section 3(a) that the administering official shall give due consideration and great weight to interpretations rendered by the Federal Trade Commission and the courts, in their administration of similar language of the Federal Trade Commission Act, was adopted by the Council of State Governments in Suggested State Legislation for 1969. This language is from the Rhode Island Consumer Protection Law.

The provision in Section 3(b) for the administering official to issue rules and regulations interpreting the Act is taken from the law of Massachusetts. This provision will reduce costs of administration by allowing the administering official to carry on an educational program among businessmen and consumers, to acquaint them with the requirements and protections of the act, and will encourage self-regulatory effort among the businessmen to attain a high level of compliance at minimum cost.

Section 4(a) continues the exemption for acts done pursuant to other laws of the State or the United States, as in the 1967 draft.

To this draft has been added, in Section 4(b), an exemption for acts done by newspaper and magazine publishers and radio and television broadcasters, and their agents and employees, in the publication or dissemination of advertising, when they do not have knowledge of the false, misleading or deceptive character of the advertisement. The language used is similar to that found in the New York False Advertising Law, and the Consumer Protection Laws of Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Vermont, and Washington. It is also similar to Section 145 of the Consumer Credit Protection Act (the Federal Truth in Lending Law)(P.L. 90-321) which provides that there is no liability under the chapter relating to credit advertising on the part of any owner or personnel, as such, of any medium in which an advertisement appears or through which it is disseminated. Such exemption is appropriate because media generally would not have the expertise or facilities needed to determine the truth or falsity of advertisements presented to them for publication. However, in this draft they would be held responsible if they prepared the advertisement, or had a financial interest in the sale or distribution of the product being advertised. Thus the exemption will extend only to acts done in their capacity as publishers and broadcasters on behalf of other advertisers, and will not permit them to misrepresent their own goods or services, or goods or services in which they have a direct financial interest, or to prepare false advertisements for others.

Section 5 has been amended by adding the words "has used" in the phrase which authorizes the attorney general to proceed when he has reason to believe that any person "is using, has used, or is about to use" any method, etc., which is unlawful. This corrects an oversight which occurred in drafting the 1967 model. Addition of these words will obviate the problem which might occur if a defendant contends that he discontinued the alleged practice some days before trial, and that the prosecutor has failed to show continuance of the unlawful practice up to and through the day of trial. This deficiency in the model law was pointed out by Robert L. Meade, Assistant Attorney General of Massachusetts.

Sections 6 and 7 provide additional relief, by authorizing the court to decree restitution of money or property to anyone who suffered damage from the unlawful acts or practices, and to appoint a receiver or revoke a license or certificate for doing business. This is similar to the laws of Arizona, Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, and several other States.

Z

Section 8 provides for private and class actions, and for payment of attorney's fees and costs, in order that the private bar may be brought into the consumer protection picture. Ordinarily the amount involved in a consumer transaction is not sufficient to interest a private practitioner, with the result that thousands of consumers suffer small losses, without remedy or relief being available. This section incorporates language and ideas suggested by David A. Rice, Assistant Professor of Law, Boston University, in an article entitled "Consumer Transaction Problems" (Boston Univ. Law Review, Fall 1968, p. 560).

Section 9 limiting the holder-in-due-course doctrine in the case of consumer paper is proposed on the basis of information and experience as reflected in F.T.C. Economic Report on Installment Credit and Retail Sales Practices of District of Columbia Retailers (March 1968), the F.T.C. Report on District of Columbia Consumer Protection Program (June 1968), and the Record of F.T.C. National Consumer Protection Hearing (November-December 1968). The Commission is aware of the importance and desirability of providing for the negotiability of commercial paper to the fullest extent practicable. But very often the finance company which purchases consumer paper knows, or should reasonably have known, of the existing defenses, such as non-performance of the seller or defect in the merchandise, and it places an unreasonable burden on the consumer to prove that the finance company had knowledge. The Commission believes that the consumer should be given the benefit of doubt in such cases, by enabling him to assert all defenses against the finance company that he could have asserted against the original vendor or lessor of the goods or services. This provision will, it is believed, go a long way toward eliminating consumer deception, and the hardships which consumers suffer as a result of high-pressure selling methods. A main advantage of the proposal is the built-in self-regulatory feature by which finance companies will be encouraged to investigate more carefully the business practices of retailers with whom they deal. It should dry up the sources of financing which enable fly-by-night operators to fleece aged, low-income and other unsuspecting consumers.

In selecting the language of Section 9, the Commission considered "Alternative A" and "Alternative B" in Section 2.404 of the Uniform Consumer Credit Code promulgated in August 1968 by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. Alternative A is considered less acceptable than the language of Section 9 recommended herein because Alternative A provides that rights of the buyer or lessee (the consumer) can only be asserted as a matter of defense to or set-off against a claim by the assignee (holder of the paper). Thus unless the consumer is sued by the holder, he has no rights against the holder. This would allow continuation of threats to and impairment of a consumer's credit rating which result from harassing collection tactics sometimes used without any actual litigation being undertaken against the consumer. Alternative B which requires 90 days' notice to the holder by a debtor to preserve defenses is deemed clearly unacceptable, because it is unrealistic to expect low-income consumers or others not versed in the law to be apprised of their rights under the law and to defend themselves against the holder-in-due-course doctrine. The Commission accordingly has selected for inclusion in Section 9 what it considers to be the most desirable features of Alternative A of the Uniform Consumer Credit Code, coupled with the existing laws of Vermont and Massachusetts which abolish the holder-in-due-course doctrine for consumer paper (Section 2455 of the Vermont Consumer Fraud Act, approved April 17, 1967; and Section 12C, Chapter 255, General Laws of Massachusetts, approved May 31, 1961).

Section 10, providing for Assurances of Voluntary Compliance, is not changed from the 1967 version.

Sections 11 through 14 provide authority for the attorney general to require the filing of reports, to issue subpoenas, to interrogate persons under oath, to examine merchandise and to obtain relevant documentary material, in investigations to determine whether violation of the statute has occurred, similar to authority contained in the Consumer Protection Laws of Arizona, Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, and other States. Woven into these Sections are pertinent provisions adapted from the Federal law applicable to issuance of civil investigative demands, similar to the 1967 draft.

Under Section 15 civil penalties of up to $2,000 per violation may be assessed by the court for initial violations of the Act when the violator acted willfully, that is, when he knew or should have known that his conduct violated the Act. Criminal penalties of up to $5,000 fine and one year's imprisonment are also provided for use in the discretion of the court to deal with violations which entail fraudulent conduct. These additions are needed to eradicate the hard-core frauds and predators who victimize aged and low-income consumers, especially in the inner cities.

For violation of an injunction issued under the Act, civil penalties of up to $25,000 are provided, along with revocation of corporate charter, as in the 1967 draft.

Section 17 is new, to authorize participation in enforcement actions by County and City attorneys within the State, subject to approval of the attorney general. This should promote the development of coordinated enforcement action at State, County and City level.

Suggested Legislation

(Title should conform to state requirements. The following are some suggestions: "An Act to prohibit unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce"; "Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law"; or "Buyer Protection Act".)

(Be it enacted, etc.)

Section 1. Definitions.

As used in this Act,

(a) "Person" means natural persons, corporations, trusts, partnerships, incorporated or unincorporated associations, and any other legal entity.

(b) "Trade" and "commerce" mean the advertising, offering for sale, sale, or distribution of any services and any property, tangible or intangible, real, personal or mixed, and any other article, commodity, or thing of value wherever situate, and shall include any trade or commerce directly or indirectly affecting the people of this State.

(c) "Documentary material" means the original or a copy of any book, record, report, memorandum, paper, communication, tabulation, map, chart, photograph, mechanical transcription, or other tangible document or recording, wherever situate.

(d) "Examination" of documentary material shall include the inspection, study, or copying of any such material, and the taking of testimony under oath or acknowledgment in respect of any such documentary material or copy thereof.

Section 2. Unlawful acts or practices.

Alternative Form No. 1:

Unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce are hereby declared unlawful.

Alternative Form No. 2:

False, misleading, or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce are hereby declared unlawful.

1f

Alternative Form No. 3:

The following unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce are hereby declared to be unlawful:

(1) passing off goods or services as those of another;

(2) causing likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding as to the source, sponsorship, approval, or certification of goods or services;

(3) causing likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding as to affiliation, connection, or association with, or certification by, another;

(4) using deceptive representations or designations of geographic origin in connection with goods or services;

(5) representing that goods or services have sponsorship, approval, characteristics, ingredients, uses, benefits, or quantities that they do not have or that a person has a sponsorship, approval, status, affiliation, or connection that he does not have;

(6) representing that goods are original or new if they are deteriorated, altered, reconditioned, reclaimed, used, or secondhand;

(7) representing that goods or services are of a particular standard, quality, or grade, or that goods are of a particular style or model, if they are of another;

(8) disparaging the goods, services, or business of another by false or misleading representation of fact;

(9) advertising goods or services with intent not to sell them as advertised;

(10) advertising goods or services with intent not to supply reasonably expectable public demand, unless the advertisement discloses a limitation of quantity;

(11) making false or misleading statements of fact concerning the reasons for, existence of, or amounts of price reductions;

(12) engaging in any other conduct which similarly creates a likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding; or

(13) engaging in any act or practice which is unfair or deceptive to the consumer.

Section 3. Interpretation.

(a) It is the intent of the legislature that in construing Section 2 of this Act due consideration and great weight shall be given to the interpretations of the Federal Trade Commission and the federal courts relating to Section 5(a)(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. 45(a)(1)), as from time to time amended; and

(b) The attorney general may make rules and regulations interpreting the provisions of Section 2 of this Act. Such rules and regulations shall not be inconsistent with the rules, regulations and decisions of the Federal Trade Commission and the federal courts in interpreting the provisions of Section 5(a)(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C., 45(a)(1)), as from time to time amended.

Section 4. Exemptions.

Nothing in this Act shall apply to:

(a) Actions or transactions permitted under laws administered by the state public service commission or other regulatory body or officer acting under statutory authority of this State or the United States (or the state fair trade law).

(b) Acts done by the publisher, owner, agent, or employee of a newspaper, periodical or radio or television station in the publication or dissemination of an advertisement, when the owner, agent or employee did not have knowledge of the false, misleading or deceptive character of the advertisement, did not prepare the advertisement, and did not have a direct financial interest in the sale or distribution of the advertised product or service.

Section 5. Restraining prohibited acts.

Whenever the attorney general has reason to believe that any person is using, has used, or is about to use any method, act or practice declared by Section 2 of this Act to be unlawful, and that proceedings would be in the public interest, he may bring an action in the name of the State against such person to restrain by temporary or permanent injunction the use of such method, act or practice, upon the giving of appropriate notice to that person. The notice must state generally the relief sought and be served in accordance with Section 13 of this Act and at least three (3) days before the hearing of the action. The action may be brought in the (trial court of general jurisdiction of the county or judicial district) in which such person resides or has his principal place of business, or, with consent of the parties, may be brought in the (trial court of general jurisdiction of the county or judicial district) in which the State Capitol is located. The said courts are authorized to issue temporary or permanent injunctions to restrain and prevent violations of this Act, and such injunctions shall be issued without bond.

Section 6. Additional public relief.

The court may make such additional orders or judgments as may be necessary to restore to any person in interest any moneys or property, real or personal, which may have been acquired by means of any practice in this Act declared to be unlawful, including the appointment of a receiver or the revocation of a license or certificate authorizing that person to engage in business in this state, or both.

Section 7. Powers of receiver.

When a receiver is appointed by the court pursuant to this Act, he shall have the power to sue for, collect, receive and take into his possession all the goods and chattels, rights and credits, moneys and effects, lands and tenements, books, records, documents, papers, choses in action, bills, notes and property of every description, derived by means of any practice declared to be illegal and prohibited by this Act, including property with which such property has been mingled if it cannot be identified in kind because of such commingling, and to sell, convey, and assign the same and hold and dispose of the proceeds thereof under the direction of the court. Any person who has suffered damages as a result of the use of employment of any unlawful practices and submits proof to the satisfaction of the court that he has in fact been damaged, may participate with general creditors in the distribution of the assets to the extent he has sustained out-of-pocket losses. In the case of a partnership or business entity, the receiver shall settle the estate and distribute the assets under the direction of the court. The court shall have jurisdiction of all questions arising in such proceedings and may make such orders and judgments therein as may be required.

Section 8. Private and class actions.

(a) Any person who purchases or leases goods or services primarily for personal, family or household purposes and thereby suffers any ascertainable loss of money or property, real or personal, as a result of the use or employment by another person of a method, act or practice declared unlawful by Section 2 of this Act, may bring an action under rules of civil procedure in the (trial court of general jurisdiction of the county or judicial district) in which the seller or lessor resides or has his principal place of business or is doing business, to recover actual damages or $200 whichever is greater. The court may, in its discretion, award up to three times the actual damages sustained and may provide such equitable relief as it deems necessary or proper.

(b) Persons entitled to bring an action under subsection (a) of this Section may, if the unlawful method, act or practice has caused similar injury to numerous other persons similarly situated and if they adequately represent such similarly situated persons, bring an action on behalf of themselves and other similarly injured and situated persons to recover damages as provided for in subsection (a) of this Section. In any action brought under this Section, the court may in its discretion order, in addition to damages, injunctive or other equitable relief.

(c) Upon commencement of any action brought under subsection (a) of this Section the clerk of court shall mail a copy of the complaint or other initial pleading to the attorney general and, upon entry of any judgment or decree in the action, shall mail a copy of such judgment or decree to the attorney general.

(d) In any action brought by a person under this Section, the court may award, in addition to the relief provided in this Section, reasonable attorney's fees and costs.

(e) Any permanent injunction, judgment or order of the court made under Section five of this Act shall be prima facie evidence in an action brought under Section eight of this Act that the respondent used or employed a method, act or practice declared unlawful by Section two of this Act.

Section 9. Non-negotiability of consumer paper.

(a) If any contract for sale or lease of consumer goods or services on credit entered into between a retail seller and a retail buyer requires or involves the execution of a promissory note or instrument or other evidence of indebtedness of the buyer, such note, instrument or evidence of indebtedness shall have printed on the face thereof the words "consumer paper," and such note, instrument or evidence of indebtedness with the words "consumer paper" printed thereon shall not be a negotiable instrument within the meaning of the Uniform Commercial Code -- Commercial Paper.

(b) Notwithstanding the absence of such notice on a note, instrument or evidence of indebtedness arising out of a consumer credit sale or consumer lease as described in this Section, an assignee of the rights of the seller or lessor is subject to all claims and defenses of the buyer or lessee against the seller or lessor arising out of the sale or lease. Any agreement to the contrary shall be of no force or effect in limiting the rights of a consumer under this Section. The assignee's liability under this Section may not exceed the amount owing to the assignee at the time the claim or defense is asserted against the assignee. Failure to imprint the words "consumer paper" on such note, instrument or evidence of indebtedness shall subject the seller or other responsible person to appropriate civil and criminal sanctions as provided in this Act.

Section 10. Assurances of voluntary compliance.

In the administration of this Act, the attorney general may accept an assurance of voluntary compliance with respect to any method, act or practice deemed to be violative of the Act from any person who has engaged or was about to engage in such method, act or practice. Any such assurance shall be in writing and be filed with and subject to the approval of (trial court of general jurisdiction of the county or judicial district) in which the alleged violator resides or has his principal place of business, or the (trial court of general jurisdiction of the county or judicial district) in which the State Capitol is located. Such assurance of voluntary compliance shall not be considered an admission of violation for any purpose. Matters thus closed may at any time be reopened by the attorney general for further proceedings in the public interest, pursuant to Section 5.

Section 11. Investigation.

(a) When it appears to the attorney general that a person has engaged in, is engaging in, or is about to engage in any act or practice declared to be unlawful by this Act, or when he believes it to be in the public interest that an investigation should be made to ascertain whether a person in fact has engaged in, is engaging in or is about to engage in, any act or practice declared to be unlawful by this Act, he may execute in writing and cause to be served upon any person who is believed to have information, documentary material or physical evidence relevant to the alleged or suspected violation, an investigative demand requiring such person to furnish, under oath or otherwise, a report in writing setting forth the relevant facts and circumstances of which he has knowledge, or to appear and testify or to produce relevant documentary material or physical evidence for examination, at such reasonable time and place as may be stated in the investigative demand, concerning the advertisement, sale or offering for sale of any goods or services or the conduct of any trade or commerce that is the subject matter of the investigation.

(b) At any time before the return date specified in an investigative demand, or within twenty days after the demand has been served, whichever period is shorter, a petition to extend the return date, or to modify or set aside the demand, stating good cause, may be filed in the (trial court of general jurisdiction of the county or judicial district) where the person served with the demand resides or has his principal place of business or in the (trial court of general jurisdiction of the county or judicial district) where the State Capitol is located.

Section 12. Subpoenas, hearings, rules and regulations.

To accomplish the objectives and to carry out the duties prescribed by this Act, the attorney general, in addition to other powers conferred upon him by this Act, may issue subpoenas to any person, administer an oath or affirmation to any person, conduct hearings in aid of any investigation or inquiry, prescribe such forms and promulgate such rules and regulations as may be necessary, which rules and regulations shall have the force of law; provided that none of the powers conferred by this Act shall be used for the purpose of compelling any natural person to furnish testimony or evidence which might tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; and provided further that information obtained pursuant to the powers conferred by this Act shall not be made public or disclosed by the attorney general or his employees beyond the extent necessary for law enforcement purposes in the public interest.

Section 13. Service of notice, demand or subpoena.

Service of any notice, demand or subpoena under this Act shall be made personally within this State, but if such cannot be obtained, substituted service therefor may be made in the following manner:

(a) Personal service thereof without this State; or

(b) The mailing thereof by registered or certified mail to the last known place of business, residence or abode within or without this State of such person for whom the same is intended; or

(c) As to any person other than a natural person, in the manner provided in the (rules of civil procedure) as if a (complaint or other pleading which institutes a civil proceeding) had been filed; or

(d) Such service as a (trial court of general jurisdiction of the county or judicial district) may direct in lieu of personal service within this State.

Section 14. Enforcement of investigative demands.

If any person fails or refuses to file any statement or report, or obey any subpoena or investigative demand issued by the attorney general, the attorney general may, after notice, apply to a (trial court of general jurisdiction of the county or judicial district) and, after hearing thereon, request an order:

(a) Granting injunctive relief to restrain the person from engaging in the advertising or sale of any merchandise or the conduct of any trade or commerce that is involved in the alleged or suspected violation;

(b) Vacating, annulling, or suspending the corporate charter of a corporation created by or under the laws of this State or revoking or suspending the certificate of authority to do business in this State of a foreign corporation or revoking or suspending any other licenses, permits or certificates issued pursuant to law to such person which are used to further the allegedly unlawful practice; and

(c) Granting such other relief as may be required, until the person files the statement or report, or obeys the subpoena or investigative demand.

Any disobedience of any final order entered under this Section by any court shall be punished as a contempt thereof.

Section 15. Civil and criminal penalties.

(a) Any person who violates the terms of an injunction issued under Section 5 of this Act shall forfeit and pay to the State a civil penalty of not more than twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000.00) per violation. For the purposes of this Section, the (trial court of general jurisdiction of a county or judicial district) issuing an injunction shall retain jurisdiction, and the cause shall be continued, and in such cases the attorney general acting in the name of the State may petition for recovery of civil penalties.

(b) In any action brought under Section 5 of this Act, if the court finds that a person is willfully using or has willfully used a method, act or practice declared unlawful by Section 2 of this Act, the attorney general, upon petition to the court, may recover, on behalf of the State, a civil penalty of not exceeding two thousand dollars ($2,000.00) per violation.

(c) Any person who engages in a fraudulent course of conduct declared unlawful by Section 2 of this Act shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than five thousand dollars ($5,000.00), imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court; provided that nothing in this subsection shall limit any other provision of this Act.

(d) For purposes of this Section, a willful violation occurs when the party committing the violation knew or should have known that his conduct was a violation of Section 2 of this Act.

Section 16. Forfeiture of corporate franchise.

Upon petition by the attorney general, the (trial court of general jurisdiction of a county or judicial district) may, in its discretion, order the dissolution or suspension or forfeiture of franchise of any corporation which violates the terms of any injunction issued under Section 5 of this Act.

Section 17. Duties of County and City attorneys.

It shall be the duty of the County and City attorneys to lend to the attorney general such assistance as the attorney general may request in the commencement and prosecution of actions pursuant to this Act, or, the County or City attorney with prior approval of the attorney general may institute and prosecute actions hereunder in the same manner as provided for the attorney general; provided that if an action is prosecuted by a County or City attorney alone, he shall make a full report thereon to the attorney general, including the final disposition of the matter.

Section 18. Severability.

If any provision of this Act is declared unconstitutional, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the constitutionality of the remainder of the Act and the applicability thereof to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Section 19. Effective date.

(Insert effective date.)

Section 45.50.550 - PRIVATE AND CLASS ACTIONS

When any person in any action brought by the attorney general under section 45.50.520 of this title, has been enjoined from committing any act or practice, whether after final adjudication or by consent decree; any person claiming to have been adversely affected by the act or practice giving rise to such injunction may bring suit and recover actual damages, and the costs of suit, including reasonable attorneys' fees, and when appropriate additional damages, restitution, reformation, rescission and other equitable relief.

Testimony on

ALASKA CONSUMER PROTECTION ACT

The retail industry favors having a consumer protection bill which defines and prohibits deceptive trade practices. We know this helps the legitimate businessman, as well as the consumer. In fact, we have made this statement both before the Senate Judiciary Committee and, more recently, before the House Commerce Committee. Most of our previous testimony has been in regard to SB 352 which has passed the Senate and is being considered by you today, along with HB 444 and HB 446.

We have had only two major suggested amendments to the Senate Judiciary Committee substitute of SB 352; those were the elimination or modification of the "class action provisions" contained in Section 45.50.530 and an amendment to Section 45.50.501 which would bring this measure into line with existing Federal laws and regulations. Copies of those suggested amendments have been supplied to each member of this Committee.

I am certain that many of you wonder why our industry is so opposed to the "class action" method of enforcing this type of law. We have, we think, valid ground for our opposition.

First of all, let's define "class action." This is an action where one or more members of a class sue, either for themselves or for themselves and other members of a class. Any judgment entered for the plaintiffs in such an action would, of course, be conclusive for all members of the class represented. It is true that class actions are presently permitted under Alaskan Law; however, inclusion of a statutory provision in a law such as SB 352 would, in all probability, make entry of this type of suit much easier than is presently the case.

On the surface, it might seem that the inclusion of class action provisions in a consumer protection law might help to make it "self enforcing." However, if we explore the possibilities, we will see that the wide use, by consumer, of class action in cases of an alleged deceptive trade practice might create more problems than they would solve.

The possible amounts of recovery against a defendant under a class action are enormous and, on the surface, it would seem to be a fine way to rid ourselves of dishonest businessmen. It is an unfortunate fact, however, that attorneys initiating such an action would not be unduly interested in filing against the "fly-by-night" operator or against marginal businesses skirting the fringes of legality; these businesses would be judgment proof -- or unable to pay large amounts in damages. A class action lawyer and his multiple clients would, instead, be encouraged to bring actions against reputable, financially-sound enterprises who may have been trapped through an inadvertent violation.

A business could be nearly ruined in a situation where a responsible public official would only require an assurance of more care in the future, or, at most, a minor penalty.

Consumers, in cases where they have been victimized by a deceptive trade practice, are entitled to fast and equitable relief. The "class action" theory would not accomplish this purpose because of the intricate and complicated pre-trial procedures required in determining, first of all, the actual "make-up" of the class. There would also be the requirement of notices to all parties (or members of the class); complicated pre-trial procedures and extensive hearings. All of this would serve to cause delay to the consumer in receiving the relief he seeks. Another point to consider is the fact that, if class action suits become the usual method by which this law is enforced, it could place a fantastically heavy burden on our Court System which is already over-loaded.

The retail industry sincerely feels that the consumer, the State, and the businessman would not benefit under a class action suit. We feel that the inclusion of such provisions in a law of this nature would encourage the filing of frivolous actions by attorneys interested only in the large contingent fees possible or by persons solely interested in "harassment" of reputable businessmen.

We would suggest that the consumer, the State and the honest businessman would be much better served if, instead of class actions, a consumer protection law included provisions to give the Attorney General's Office broad and realistic powers to enforce the Alaska Consumer Protection Act, along with providing for reasonable penalties. In this manner, the honest victim of a deceptive trade practice would be protected. Additionally, the legitimate businessman would not be subjected to unfair private actions that, even though unfounded, could still cost a lot of money to defend.

If this Committee and the legislature still feel that class actions would be a necessary part of this law, we would suggest the inclusion of language which would allow private and class actions after a vendor has been enjoined from committing any act or practice prohibited by this measure either through final adjudication or by consent decree, through an action brought by the Attorney General. A provision of this nature would help to discourage the filing of frivolous, harassment type actions. I have previously distributed copies of a suggested amendment that would accomplish this.

Our other principal suggested change is the inclusion of language in Section 45.50.501 which would bring this law in line with Federal laws and regulations presently in existence. This suggestion is only to preclude the possibility that a business might find itself in the position of having to comply with two separate laws on the same general subject. Copies of our suggested amendment have been made available.

We have several other suggested changes that are minor, copies of which have been also supplied to you. I'll review a few of these briefly. Sec. 45.50.481 - Deceptive trade practices defined: We suggest that it should be made clear that a person must have knowingly engaged in a deceptive trade practice (INTENT); Section 45.50.491 - Exceptions to the prohibited trade practices - Language should be added to insure that when a person uses, for example, advertising furnished by a supplier which turns out to be false or misleading and he has no knowledge of its misleading character, he will not be penalized; Section 45.50.550 - Liability for actions of employee - The addition of language specifying that the employer shall be liable for an employee's action only in the course and scope of his employment; A new section establishing a statute of limitations, which we suggest, should be one year after the discovery of a deceptive trade practice.

We have mainly discussed SB 352 and have not touched greatly on the other two similar bills. However, I would like to make brief comments on two sections in HB 446 which contain provisions not covered in either HB 444 or SB 352, or in our suggested amendments. First of all, under Section 45.50.560 - Penalties - We feel that a penalty of $25,000 is excessive, particularly when a violation could be through inadvertence. Secondly - in Section 45.50.570 - Forfeiture of Corporate Franchise - This section is extremely harsh. The loss of one's business, which apparently is possible under this section for one violation, seems unduly drastic; we would suggest the complete elimination of this provision.

To sum up -- we favor the passage of SB 352 if our suggested amendments are included. We think a law along these liner would be beneficial to all concerned. HB 446 seems to be, in general, an extremely harsh measure, particularly in view of the fact that there appears to be no pressing problem in Alaska at this time in reference to deceptive trade practices. HB 444, in its original form appears to be the most fair and realistic law and could be supported by the retail industry, subject to a few very minor technical changes or classification of certain portions.

Testimony on SB 352

Alaska Consumer Protection Act

I am Dean Ehrich, Executive Director of the Alaska Retail Association. With me is Mr. Randolph Aires, an attorney from Sears Roebuck & Co. in Los Angeles, who will gladly answer any questions regarding the legal aspects of SB 352, which is being considered at this hearing.

We have examined the Committee Substitute for SB 352, relating to consumer protection in some detail and find that its intended purpose is substantially in accordance with our own views regarding the need to protect consumers and legitimate merchants from unfair and deceptive trade practices. There are, however, at least two major areas in the bill before us which need complete revision. First, and most important, we feel, is elimination of the class action provisions. Second, would be the addition of language in Section 45.50.501 to bring the measure in compliance with existing Federal laws. We also feel, incidently, that a reasonable statute of limitations should be included. We suggest that one year would be a reasonable length of time for a consumer to determine whether or not he had been a victim of a deceptive trade practice.

We would now like to relate our reasons for our suggested changes in more detail. CLASS ACTIONS: On the surface, the provisions in this measure allowing the right of private or class action suits in matters of deceptive trade practices might appear to be reasonable and justified. However, if we explore all the ramifications possible in this type of provision, we soon find that we have indeed opened up a "fine can of worms"; a can of worms that negatively affects not only the retail industry but also our court system and the consumer its designed to protect.

Let's first define "Class Actions". This is an action in which one or more members of a class sue, either for themselves or for themselves and other members of a class. Where members of a class sue on behalf of other membems, judgement is conclusive for those memb rs of the class thus represented. As you will note, the class action provision in SB 352 would allow for a multiplicity of plaintiffs, all bringing action against a defendant. The possible amounts of recovery against a defendant under a class action are enormous and, on the surface, it would seem a fine way to rid ourselves of dishonest businessmen. However, it is an unfortunate fact that class action lawyers would not be unduly interested in filing an action against the "fly-by-night" operator or marginal businesses skirting the fringes of legality. Such businesses would generally be judgement proof or, at best, incapable of paying substantial damages. Accordingly, class action suits would be least effective in reference to the very type of business against whom they are allegedly designed to protect the consumer. The class action lawyer, with a view toward garnering large fees, would, quite naturally, initiate actions against reputable, financially sound enterprises who would be capable of paying large judgements. He would have little or no interest in "righting a wrong". We can see from this that a legitimate operator could easily become a victim, through honest ignorance or employee neglect, of an action that could quite possible ruin him. He could be ruined, under a class action suit, in circumstances that a responsible public official would only require an assurance from the businessman of greater care in the future or, at most, a minor penalty.

We feel that the consumer is entitled to fast, equitable redress in cases where he has been the victim, either through design or through inadvertance, of a deceptive trade practice. The class action provisions of SB 352 would not accomplish this worthwhile goal. In fact, because of the time consuming, cumbersome procedures involved in such an action, the consumer may never receive the relief deserved. Litigation in a class action would involve questions including the actual "make-up" of the class; would require intricate notices to all members of the class; and would require complicated pre-trial procedures and extensive hearings.

This leads us to our third point against the class action theory. Should this type of action become the usual vehicle for redress of consumer wrongs, a fantastically heavy burden will be placed on or already over-loaded Alaskan Court system. This is inefficient, both from the stand-point of the State and that of the consumer.

We believe that the proper, most efficient method to accomplish the purpose of rapid remedy of consumer abuses is to give the Attorney General's office broad and realistic powers to enforce the provisions of the Alaska Consumer Protection Act. Class actions would only serve to cause confusion and delay to the consumer, burden our courts and perform an injustice to the honest businessman. Class action would be more a form of mob rule rather than rule by law and justice.

If, after due consideration, the committee still feels that class action should be retained in this law, we would suggest the inclusion of a provision which would provide, in brief, that private and class actions would be allowed after a vendor or supplier has been enjoined from committing any act or practice prohibited by this measure, either through final adjudication or by consent decree, through an action brought by the Attorney General. This would, to a large degree, help to prevent the filing of frivolous, harassment type actions.

Our second major suggested change would be the addition of language in Section 45.50.501 which would serve to bring this measure in line with existing Federal laws and regulations. To accomplish this, we suggest the following: "This act is to be construed uniformly with Federal law and regulations. In any action instituted under this act, it shall be an absolute defense to show that challanged parties are subject to and comply with statutes administered by the Federal Trade Commission, or any rules, regulations, or decisions interpreting such statutes." We feel the inclusion of such language would serve to prevent possible confusion and mis-interpretations from developing in the State's administration of this law.

Mr. Chairman, we wish to thank you and the members of your committee for hearing our views on SB 352. We would be happy to answer any questions you might have of Mr. Aires or myself at this time.

STATEMENT OF RANDOLF H. AIRES BEFORE
ALASKA HOUSE COMMERCE COMMITTEE
CONCERNING S.B. 352 AND RELATED BILLS

I am Randolf H. Aires, an attorney in the Pacific Coast Legal Department of Sears, Roebuck and Co. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before your Committee, both on behalf of my company and on behalf of the Alaska Retail Association, to express the retailing industry's concerns with all three consumer protection bills before your Committee and with CSSB 352 in particular.

The retail industry, which acts as the purchasing agent for the consumer, believes that the interests of its customers are paramount. The words "consumer protection" are magic words these days, and we believe that the honest and legitimate merchants in your communities have a lot to gain from good consumer legislation. Thus we support and will continue to support good and reasonable consumer legislation.

You know, we are all consumers, and I am still young enough to remember painfully how I was taken advantage of as a young newly married person, before going to law school, by a door-to-door salesman with a glib line and plenty of high pressure. The misrepresentations he made really hit me the morning after we signed the contract, and I wish that a law such as your door-to-door solicitation bill being considered here tonight would have been available to me then, so that I could have rescinded that sale.

Your proposed door-to-door solicitation law is just one of twenty significant consumer protection features contained in the Uniform Consumer Credit Code, presently before the Alaska Legislature. We support the UCCC and we hope that it will be studied seriously some time later in the year.

Now, in these three consumer protection acts before you, we're dealing with deceptive trade practices. The twelve enumerated practices in CSSB 352 are practices which we feel should be dealt with in proper legislation.

We believe that a customer who feels he has been defrauded, and who cannot obtain satisfaction through the normal complaint procedure is entitled to a remedy. President Nixon's Special Assistant for Consumer Affairs, Mrs. Virginia Knauer, who has received so much publicity recently, has pointed out that the remedy should be "convenient, expeditious, and effective."

We submit that the consumer class action provision contained in CSSB 352 and H.B. 446 would not provide that type of remedy to the consumer. We believe that indiscriminate class action legislation will create more evils than it will remedy.

Class actions do not result in a speedy and efficient determination of claims. Ask any attorney who has been involved with one. On the contrary, notice requirements, unwieldly pre-trial procedures required when there are numerous litigants, protracted trials, difficult damages determinations, and a heavy burden of management which is placed on the courts, all lead to excessively long and complex proceedings benefitting only the lawyers. I know that you are attempting to deal with the problem of overburdened courts in Alaska this year.

Up to now, courts all over the country have been reluctant to permit traditional class actions, under the existing restrictive rules of civil procedure and court rules allowing class actions, because these actions are likely to benefit practically nobody other than the lawyers who bring them and because they often create lawsuits without merit where none would have previously existed.

Now we have this new approach which has appeared on the scene - the proposed statutory consumer class action. It first came on the scene last year in the Federal Congress with people such as Senator Tidings championing it. This year we are seeing it at the state legislative level. To my knowledge no state has passed a consumer class action law so far this session.

What are the dangers as we see them with the consumer class action? It is relatively simple for an enterprising attorney (there are many) to marshall an expansive list of plaintiffs through the class action notice provision. You can develop hundreds and thousands of unknown clients just like that. The potential of high legal fees will cause many attorneys to bring unwarranted class actions relating to technical violations of law and against innocent businessmen. The class action might be brought against a businessman who would be willing to resolve, on an informal basis, a valid claim of a consumer. But when maybe only one out of the hundreds or thousands who might be in the so called "class" has a valid claim and the others don't, how could you possibly settle with the lawyer representing the amorphous class?

Add to this the fact that in your bills before you, each so called "injured person" will recover at least two hundred dollars. There is no certainty concerning this provision, but there is the possible interpretation that the two hundred dollar minimum for each person applies to the consumer class action as well as to the private individual action. If this is true, even the people with valid claims may be damaged only in the amount of several dollars, and yet each person in the class would be asking for two hundred dollars or more, whether they have a valid claim or not. It doesn't take much imagination to see the potential for severe harassment against the legitimate retailer under these conditions.

In class actions such as these, the lawyer becomes less counsel and more the participating litigant and real party in interest, because the financial interest of the attorney for the class may be far more substantial than the interest of any member of the class.

We believe that consumer class actions could impose great economic consequences for the defendant. A class action, even if completely unwarranted, necessitates substantial time and expense in the preparation of a defense. This type of harassment could drive some completely honest small businessmen right out of business.

The astute lawyer will obviously search for defendants who can be subjected to large damage recoveries rather than the judgment proof "fly-by-night" operators who prey upon the unsophisticated. Thats the tradgedy of this whole misguided concept of consumer class actions in bills such as are before you.

Here are some examples of technical violations which could be used against a legitimate enterprise in a consumer class action: an unintentional omission of an address in a guaranty form; a mistake in using the term "regular price" when an article was actually "originally" rather than "regularly" offered at such price; the designation of a product as "imported" but with the omission of the specific country of origin, even though such country produces goods of desirability to the consumers; the advertising of a television picture tube as "23 inch" without referring to it as a "diagonal measurement."

There has been no demonstrated need for a consumer class action statute, especially here in Alaska, as distinguished from other forms of remedies presently available. Before jumping into this type of legislation, we believe that experimentation and pilot programs involving other methods could be pursued.

Section 45.50.511 of CSSB 352, which gives the Attorney General basic powers, provides that the court may make any order or judgment necessary to restore to the individual money or property acquired because of a deceptive trade practice. So the court would be equipped to take care of the individual without the necessity of the individual bringing his own lawsuit.

Furthermore, small claims courts are available in Alaska for amounts up to $500.00 in damages, where the individual can go into court without the expense and need of an attorney.

The Federal Trade Commission and the Attorney General's office should be available to a consumer who has been defrauded. There is increased emphasis being placed in this direction. In the State of Washington, there are presently three or four attorneys in the Consumer Protection Division of the Attorney General's office, doing their thing for the consumers, and they are quite active. We have no objection to this kind of strick enforcement at the governmental level.

The whole point of all of this is that much more study should be made of this whole area of how to give the consumer a fast and judicious remedy to take care of his small grievances, and it would be quite unwise, in our judgment, to pass this kind of legislation at this time.

We respectfully submit that if the Alaska Legislature is prepared and determined, however, to deal with this complex subject at this time, the best approach is that being followed by the Nixon Administration at the Federal level. That approach, put into effect at the state level, would involve your Attorney General and his staff, who would effectively prosecute violators of these deceptive trade practices, and if successful, the individual could bring his lawsuit based on the violation and get all the relief necessary from the court. We have given you a suggested amendment to this effect. This approach, we submit, would prevent the harassment from unwarranted private and class actions, and at the same time give the consumer who has a valid grievance his day in court.

Another proposed amendment which we have given to you deals with the rule making powers of the Attorney General under such a law as CSSB 352. Our concern in this area is that we don't feel that merchants should be subject to separate and possibly conflicting interpretations and rulings on what constitutes a deceptive trade practice and on any related matters. Deceptive trade practices listed in your bills, particularly in CSSB 352, are keyed into the Federal Trade Commission Act dealing with deceptive trade practices. We propose that it should be made clear that it is the intent of the Alaska Legislature that the construction of your act will depend in large part upon the interpretation of the Federal Trade Commission and the federal courts who have operated in this area for many years.

Further, we think it should be an absolute defense to an action brought under this act if it can be shown conclusively that the conduct complained of was authorized by the Federal Trade Commission or any rules, regulations or decisions interpreting the Federal Trade Commission Act. This is only fair.

We suggest that four other amendments be considered for CSSB 352.

Seven of the twelve defined deceptive trade practices have a requirement for intent or knowledge on the part of the person or company perpetrating the practice. It is difficult to know why this distinction has been made. We feel that all twelve defined practices should have this knowledge or intent requirement. The requirement is particularly necessary because some of those definitions are so broad and open to interpretation.

We suggest that the exception provided in Section 45.50.491 (2) should be extended to any person who merely uses some advertising matter which is supplied to him by his supplier, and not just to the newspaper, radio and television people.

We feel that it is only reasonable that a statute of limitations be placed in this bill or any other bill of this nature, granting a one year statute of limitations after the discovery of the unlawful conduct involved.

We recommend that Section 45.50.550 of CSSB 352, dealing with the liability for actions of employees, be clarified to state that the deceptive trade practice perpetrated by the employee would have to arise in the course of and in the scope of his employment with the employer. Otherwise, broadly read, this could apply to something the employee did when he wasn't working for his employer, such as on a moonlighting situation, or it could apply to something which the employee did without any authority, or in connection with some type of activity not in the scope of his assigned duties.

With the adoption of the amendments which we have recommended and given to you, we could support CSSB 352. If H.B. 444 and H.B. 446 are considered by the House, our comments concerning CSSB 352 will apply with equal force to those bills. Further, we would want some other minor modifications to H.B. 444, and we feel that H.B. 446 would have to be drastically changed before we could support it. In particular, I refer to the sections in H.B. 446 dealing with the Attorney General's regulations, the powers of receivership, the forfeiture of the corporate franchise, and the civil and criminal penalties provided therein.

Since you are also considering tonight H.B. 411 and S.B. 188, I would like to state that we are in favor of both of these consumer bills.

Thank you. I will be glad to try to answer any questions you may have.
