"An Act relating to harassment of persons engaged in hunting, fishing, or trapping."

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS

Section .925 would make it illegal to interfere with a person who is lawfully engaged in hunting, fishing or trapping; to disturb fish or game with the intent to interfere with their taking; or to enter or remain upon public or private land with intent to do one or the other of the above. A violation would be punishable by a fine of up to $500 or 30 days in jail, or by both.

Section .926 mandates that a wildlife protection agent shall order a person to desist from a violation of section .925, if he has observed the violation, or has probable cause to believe the person has engaged in or intends to engage in such activities. The officer shall inform the violator of penalties applicable to failure to desist - a fine of up to $1000 or 90 days in jail, or both.

Section .927 provides civil remedies allowing: a court injunction to stop the harassment; the aggrieved party to recover general damages for expenses rendered futile by the harassment; and the court to award punitive damages.

HB 47
January 24, 1983

Representative Dick Schultz
State Capitol Building
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Dear Dick:

On January 5, 1983 the Tok Cutoff-Nabesna Road Advisory Committee met in a general meeting to discuss hunting regulations. There were several things discussed with two of them pertaining to you.

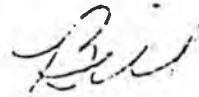

#1 We would like to see legislation written and passed that would control or rather stop harrassment of hunters, trappers, and fishermen. We would be able to carry on our life-style without harrassment from the "greenies".

#2 We would like to see legislation written and passed that would eliminate the $25 trophy tag for resident grizzly/brown bear hunters. We believe the State is rich enough without charging its residents a $25 fee.

Our committee will be meeting within a few weeks and correspondence from you would be appreciated. I would like to be able to tell the folks something about these two items.

Good luck and if there is anything I or this committee can do to help, please let me know.

Sincerely,

Bill Ellis, Chairman

TIPS FOR HUNT SABOTEURS

Fourteen million Americans will be shouldering their rifles and shotguns within the next few months, marching off to their annual offensive against our wildlife. These legions, which are more numerous, and generally better equipped than the entire Nazi armies of the Second World War, will take a bloody toll before the season ends. They will kill deer and rabbits, ducks, dogs, cats, a few children, and even a few hunters.

It is time for friends of animals to start organizing a defense that will serve to at least temper the wanton destruction. There are many ways that a friend of animals can become a forest partisan on behalf of our wildlife, and we offer here a few suggestions that range in effort, depending upon a person's abilities and commitment:

1. Deny the hunter the land to hunt on. Much hunting is done on private lands. To protect these animals, encourage your neighbors, especially those who own large tracts such as farms and ranches, to post their land and forbid hunting. Try to convince them that hunters invariably cause more damage to agriculture than the wild animals do.
2. Many areas have hunting restricted to a specified number of hunters who have special permits. Commonly, these permits allow the hunter to use a particular blind or hunt less common species, such as bear. Apply for these permits yourself. The permits are usually awarded by a simple lottery selection. If you're lucky, you'll win a permit and deny a hunter his kill.
3. Get into the woods yourself the day before the hunting season. If you're familiar with the most commonly hunted areas, try to drive wildlife away. A stroll through the forest with a nice loud radio and a dog on a leash, will serve to make wildlife more wary of humans. This is particularly important for younger animals that have not yet had the traumatizing experience of being hunted.
4. Certain substances, such as rotten eggs, when rubbed into hunting blinds, make these enclosures even more uncomfortable for the hunters. Uncomfortable hunters are irritable, and are also poorer shots. Plastering the floor of a hunting blind with cow dung is another good idea.
5. If you're familiar with wildlife habits in your neighborhood, try to encourage them to break these habits shortly before hunting season. For instance, many hunters like to stalk along deer tracks which are pretty well defined to a good woodsman. Placing deer repellent (available at many feed and hardware stores) along these tracks will encourage the deer to move away and leave the hunter with a route devoid of the species. If you want to save money, just scoop up a bag of human hair from a local barber shop and hang handfuls of it in little bags about two or three feet from the ground, along the deer track. The deer will soon get the message that there are humans in the area and will drift away.
6. If there is much hunting with dogs in your area, try to get hold of a female dog in heat and lead her, on a leash, through an area that is heavily hunted. Male dogs in the hunter's pack will "get wind" of the female and lose their enthusiasm for chasing rabbits or deer.

7. Hunters frequently like to ambush their prey by setting out food and then hiding in blinds. Commonly, bushels of apples are set out a few days before hunting season to encourage deer to browse in this area. When hunting season comes, the hunter merely comes to the site, climbs into a blind, and waits for the deer to come to him. To disrupt this, there are two alternatives. First, remove all apple piles immediately on finding them during the days preceding hunting season. Second, if there are just too many apples to carry away, give them a good spraying with deer repellent and spread barber shop hair clippings all over the area.

8. Encourage your municipality to pass an ordinance that bans, in the interest of public safety, the use of all weapons within its limits. Rifles, shotguns, bows and arrows have been known to kill people too.

9. If you have a portable tape recorder, get a cassette recording of wolf howls. Play this in the woods a few times in the days before hunting season. It will make wildlife wary.

10. Try to develop strong anti-hunting sentiment in your community by writing letters to the editor of your local newspapers, meeting with neighbors, getting on talk shows. Creating public awareness of the problem is a vital point. Let your neighbors know that the law recognizes wildlife as belonging to all people, and they are not the exclusive property of hunters until after they have been murdered.

11. Work on a project to get your State to pass a law that would require all hunters to carry written permission from the landowners of the places they hunt. This further curbs the hunter's battlegrounds because many farmers are reluctant to sign permits that would allow people to hunt on their lands. Also, much land is owned by summer residents, corporations, etc. that are nearly impossible to get hold of.

12. Approach your Congressperson and Senators with demands that hunting and trapping be prohibited on national wildlife refuges and all public land.

13. If you have any old, stuffed animal toys, set these around commonly hunted areas. Hunters often don't take the time to check if an animal is real. Better to have a hole in a cotton rabbit than a real one - and the noise of the gun going off might serve to scare away other wildlife.

14. We will be trying to put together a better activist's guide for next hunting season, so if you have any ideas or procedures you've found effective, please let us know. Mail them in to Bill Clark, Friends of Animals, 11 West 60th Street, New York, NY 10023.

Use your imagination. There are plenty of ways to frustrate the hunt, depending on your own abilities and enthusiasm. The main point here is to do something. By your work, you will be helping animals in two ways. First, you will be protecting them from the hunters and second, you will be letting the hunters know that friends of animals are in the woods. This serves to anger them, and angry hunters do not stalk so quietly, their aim is not so precise. Emotions can play heavily in the success of a hunt, and the most effective killers are cool and methodical. Disrupt!

ANTI-HUNTERS VS. HUNTERS: WAR IN THE WOODS

Greenpeace fanatics are harassing hunters in the field. It's a vicious and very dangerous movement, and you could be the next victim. Here's what to expect plus some very good advice on what not to do about it.

By Richard Starnes, Editor-at-Large

The lush alpine valleys and rugged highlands of northeastern British Columbia have witnessed the opening skirmishes in what threatens to become all-out war between big-game hunters and anti-hunting zealots who have sought to stop them by harassment, abuse, intimidation and—it is charged—physical violence.

How much violence has occurred to date is in dispute, but there have been several angry confrontations involving hunters and anti-hunting activists, one beating has already taken place, and feeling is running so high that Canadian provincial authorities are alarmed at the prospect of more violence when the big-game season opens this fall.

"It's only a question of time before some hothead loses his composure and someone gets hurt," said one hunter who was victimized by the anti-hunters.

Arrayed against each other in the conflict are the hunters, outfitters, and game-management officials of British Columbia, and a dedicated, well-financed, implacable organization of anti-hunters who call themselves Greenpeace.

Greenpeace is no collection of saloon conspirators content to crank out mimeographed anti-hunting diatribes and picket sporting-goods stores. It is slick, professional, worldwide, and growing rapidly. Its Vancouver chapter alone budgets nearly $500,000 a year for anti-hunting activities. Its tools are $1,000-a-day helicopters, expensive sound cameras, and self-confessed expertise at manipulating the press and television. Its tactics are harassment, confrontation, and attempts physically to restrain hunters. Its leader, Dr. Patrick Moore of Vancouver, made it clear in an interview with OUTDOOR LIFE that episodes of harassment and intimidation that took place in the rich hunting grounds of British Columbia in 1979 and 1980 were only the opening salvos in the conflict.

"We'll be back this year," he said. "They can't stop us. We intend to stop trophy hunting, first in British Columbia, ultimately all over the world."

How Greenpeace seeks to frustrate hunters is perhaps best told in the words of Richard A. Mielke, a 50-year-old Pontiac, Michigan, fire fighter who last year took a 21-day hunt-of-a-lifetime in the rugged, 1.6-million acre Spatsizi Wilderness Park in British Columbia. He and his partner, Darryl Hastings, 40, a computer broker from Rochester, Michigan, encountered the Greenpeaceers on the first day of the hunt.

"They barged right into our camp," Mielke said. "They stuck sound cameras right in our faces. They harangued and abused us. One of them screamed at me, 'Is there something wrong with your sex life? Is that why you're up here killing animals?' When we tried to ride out of camp they locked arms across the trail to stop us. One of them grabbed the bridle of my horse. That was dangerous. That's rough country up there. If the horse had shied and fallen I could have been badly hurt."

Eventually the hunters and their guide broke free and continued the hunt, but on nearly every day of the hunt the harassment continued. On one day Mielke took his rifle—unloaded—to a dock on tiny Bug Lake to scope a wolf that had been howling near the camp.

"One of these Greenpeace guys crowded up against me, bumped me, and yelled, 'You're not going to shoot that animal while I'm here!' He grabbed my rifle, and then he fell into the lake."

"They would hunt you in every way they could," Hastings added. "You couldn't even go to the john without one of them sticking a camera in. It's hard to keep your cool under those circumstances, yet I couldn't give them the satisfaction of bothering me."

Although the Greenpeacers scornfully characterize hunters such as Mielke and Hastings as "jet-set headhunters," both are men of modest means.

"I scrimped and saved and worked at odd jobs for two years to get the money for that hunt," Mielke said. "By the time I'd paid air fares, outfitters' fees, and license and trophy fees it cost me around $10,000."

Hastings put the cost of his hunt at near $12,500, and noted it would be a long time, if ever, before he could afford another hunt of that magnitude.

Both hunters report that attempts to reason with the anti-hunters were futile.

"We were after Stone sheep, principally," Hastings said. "But they kept alluding to them as 'bighorns.' I told one of them, 'You're such a phony; you don't even know what species you're talking about.'"

Both men got trophy sheep as well as other trophy specimens, but the Greenpeace activists succeeded in blighting what would otherwise have been an idyllic hunt.

"There were several days when I didn't hunt because of them," Hastings said.

Complaints to provincial wildlife authorities were to no avail. "Early in the hunt a park ranger came into our camp," Hastings said. "We asked him why he wouldn't protect our right to carry on a lawful activity. I'd paid around $1,000 for licenses and tags, and these people were trying to deprive me of my right to hunt. The ranger replied that there was nothing he could do. 'It's a public park,' he told me. 'They can go anywhere they please.'"

Later, after the anti-hunter fell (Greenpeacer Moore says he was pushed) into the lake, four Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers and two B.C. Fish and Wildlife Department officials arrived at the Mielke-Hastings camp by helicopter. Again the two hunters repeated their plea for protection, again the officials said there was nothing they could do.

"They told us they were trying to figure out how to resolve the issue," Hastings told OUTDOOR LIFE. "But all they did was to tell us, 'We want you fellows to be patient and keep the peace.' " (There are indications, however, which we will come to later, that B.C. officials are preparing to abandon their policy of noninterference when the 1981 season opens.)

Even after Mielke and Hastings quit their camp to return home, the Greenpeace contingent pursued them. After alerting press and television, the anti-hunters continued their tactics of harassment. They followed the two hunters into the airport at Vancouver, taunting them, haranguing and vilifying them, and waving professionally-made anti-hunting placards for the benefit of news and television cameras. Several wore animal costumes, including horns or antlers. The Greenpeacers drove the two hunters to take refuge in the airport lounge, where the bartender did what the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and game department officials had been unable or unwilling to do. He chased the anti-hunters out of the place.

Illustration by Domenick D'Andrea

What was possibly an even uglier incident took place during the 1979 season in Spatsizi. Gary Zechel, an engineer with the Ford Motor Company, who lives in the Detroit area, was hunting Ranger Creek with his wife Jo-Carole, who is a hunter, but wasn't hunting on this occasion. Accompanied only by an Indian guide, the Zechels were traversing one of the wildest, most primitive areas in North America.

"We were six or eight hours by horseback from our base camp, staying in a spike camp," Zechel recalled, "when these Greenpeace people showed up. There were seven men and one woman. There was lots of taunting, harassment, and intimidation. They said they would do whatever they could to stop us. They said if they couldn't persuade us to abandon our hunt they would restrain us physically. When we rode out for a day of hunting, they locked arms in front of us. When I tried to go to my wife's aid, one of them grabbed my horse's reins. Eventually our guide broke through, and my wife and I got away from them. They chased us several hundred yards up the trail, and our guide's horse fell into a bog. That was very dangerous. Even a minor injury is serious in that remote wilderness."

Like Mielke and Hastings, Zechel is an experienced hunter and outdoorsman, clearly able to take care of himself. But some insight into the psychological impact of the Greenpeace tactics can be won when Zechel says, "One of those guys had an ice ax he kept waving in my face. I felt more fear than I have felt in a long time."

WAR IN THE WOODS

Zechel's wife seems to have been singled out for particular attention by the Greenpeaceers.

"They ran raving and yelling at her," he reported. "It was like a riot. They came within five or ten feet of her."

Exercising what can only be described as saintly restraint, the Zechels and their guide did their best to ignore the anti-hunters.

"This drove them into a frenzy," Zechel said. "They acted nearly hysterical, obviously looking to cause some action or incident." Not surprisingly, the Greenpeace tactics finally wore down Jo-Carole's emotional reserves. "She was terrified and finally broke down crying and screaming for them to leave us alone. They refused and she ran into the tent, sobbing 'They're crazy—I'm afraid of them.' She spent the final days of the hunt in her tent."

When the Zechels broke camp and returned to Smithers, he filed an assault charge against the Greenpeace anti-hunters. Although technically the charge is still pending, it has been "stayed" and provincial authorities made it clear they have no plans to prosecute it.

Ralph Aldrich, chief conservation officer of the British Columbia fish and wildlife agency, undertook to explain why.

"From an enforcement point of view we can only follow the law," he said in an interview. "There is no law against yelling. It's just like picketing. Of course, if they threaten assault and take some overt action, that may be assault."

Is it illegal to impede hunters' horses? Aldrich's reply was something less than definitive. "It depends," he said. Thereupon he passed the buck to Peter Ewart, crown counsel (prosecuting attorney) for the Spatsizi district. From Prince George, B.C., Ewart indicated that, while still open, the charges laid by Gary Zechel against the Greenpeaceers would likely never be prosecuted.

"We took a look at the evidence and the probable outcome of a trial and put a 'stay' on the case," Ewart said. But then, plainly choosing his words carefully, Ewart laid out what may be provincial officials' plan to end the threat to one of British Columbia's prime industries. "I would have been much happier," he said, "if the charge had been intimidation instead of assault." British Columbia, he said, has a statute making it illegal to "impede or attempt to impede any person from carrying out a lawful activity" by threats, harassment, or coercion.

"What he says is a crock," bluntly charged Ray Collingwood, whose firm outfitted both the Zechel and Mielke-Hasting parties. "They didn't prosecute because of the expense of getting witnesses back up here to testify. I've lost all respect for the government."

Collingwood revealed what apparently is not known by provincial authorities—real violence has already broken out.

"One of these, [Greenpeace] guys tried to stop one of our pilots from taking off from an airstrip we maintain in the park," he told OUTDOOR LIFE. "He grabbed a wing strut of the Beaver and tried to force our pilot to abort his take-off. The plane got off anyway and later the pilot returned, landed the aircraft, and punched the guy out. He knocked him down and slapped him around some. He just hung a little licking on him."

Despite the degree of restraint exercised by Mielke, Hastings and Zechel, provincial authorities are acutely aware of the potential for violence. Like the hunters themselves, provincial officials see the tactics of Greenpeace as calculated provocations designed to spark violent reaction. All agree that would be counterproductive and, as one put it, "would give Greenpeace 'proof' that all hunters are thugs and violence-prone killers." Chief conservation officer Aldrich pointedly noted that there will be combined Royal Canadian Mounted Police and game department patrols in Spatsizi during the 1981 season.

Greenpeace's Moore airily dismissed the prospect of being prosecuted under the intimidation statute.

"The attorney general (of British Columbia) hired a man last summer especially to research the question," he said. "He concluded there was no law that could stop us. Our activities are as legal as the hunters'. All we're doing is occupying nonconsumptive space, competing for resources with the hunters. They can't say we're interfering with their rights. Those [game] animals don't belong to anyone until they're actually taken into possession."

It is clear that Patrick Moore is the architect, principal voice, and presiding genius of Greenpeace. He conceived and created the organization while a graduate student at the University of British Columbia (he is now a doctor of ecology) five years ago. His title is Canadian director of Greenpeace International, but plainly his sway extends to the worldwide branches of the organization. He is one of 12 salaried, full-time employees of Canadian Greenpeace, and he is paid $1,200 a month. There are offices in Vancouver,

"We intend to shut down trophy hunting in Spatsizi to show that it can be done."

---

Victoria, Toronto, and Montreal, as well as branches in the United States, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, France, New Zealand, and Australia. A Greenpeace "secretariat" in Washington coordinates the activities of the international branches, and it has an annual budget of $120,000.

"Our forte," Moore said in an interview, "is organizing expeditions into remote areas in order to confront in a nonviolent manner acts that we consider environmentally detrimental. Our funding is entirely private—donations from individuals that are generally less than $50. We have no foundation or government grants. Our methods are too controversial to attract money from conservative quarters."

Greenpeace's first confrontation took place when Moore and others chartered an 85-foot vessel and sailed to the Aleutian island of Amchitka in an attempt to halt the testing of nuclear bombs. "We lost that battle but we won the war," he said. "They've stopped testing now and Amchitka is a wildlife preserve."

Later Greenpeace made expeditions to the South Seas in an attempt to stop nuclear testing by France (they failed), and they have conducted offensives against whalers and seal hunters.

"But we cut our teeth on nuclear testing," Moore said. "From it we learned how to deal with the media and how to understand international politics. We're fortunate in having people who understand the media—that's how you communicate with people in the modern world, knowing what sort of images appeal to the media."

Although Canadian authorities are tippy-toeing around the Greenpeace campaign of intimidation in Spatsizi, the government ended similar tactics that were attempted against commercial hunters of harp seals in Newfoundland.

"They enacted what they called 'seal protection regulations'," Moore said, "just to keep us out. It's ironic, and very undemocratic."

Moore insists that ending all hunting is not his goal. "Hunting can be part of a harmonious relationship with nature," he said. "Indian bowhunters lived in a balanced state with nature for 10,000 years. But what we're saying is that the relationship between man and animals has changed dramatically. These hunters are an extension of the Detroit urban-industrial ecosystem. They have no place in Spatsizi. In a park set aside for protecting these animals, we must stop thinking of them as a natural resource and think of them as a national treasure."

Moore's disclaimer notwithstanding, Greenpeace's program would effectively end hunting. It would totally rule out all trophy hunting, even under the rigidly controlled conditions prevailing in Spatsizi. It would prohibit hunting by all outsiders, insisting that only food hunters "that are part of the (local) environment be permitted to hunt." It would, in short, permit only subsistence hunting, and then only if the cessation of hunting would "dramatically affect" the life-style of the hunter, and only if subsistence hunting remained in "balance" with the environment.

Moore repeatedly insisted that the hunters who were assailed by the Greenpeaceers were unthinking trophy freaks who habitually left the meat of their animals to spoil after removing horns, antlers, and capes. All three hunters heatedly denied the charge, noting that they had painstakingly packed all usable meat back to camp, either for shipment home or for use by the outfitter's crew. The outfitters confirmed this. In fact, British Columbia law requires that the meat of game animals be removed and used for food, and in its exhaustive investigation of the incidents, the provincial game department found no violations of the law by the hunters.

For the record, Moore denies any of the Greenpeace activists at Spatsizi committed assault by grabbing anyone's arm. He denies that Mielke's rifle was pushed, but he insists that either Mielke or his companion shoved one of the Greenpeaceers into the icy waters of

"They're crazy—I'm afraid of them," Gary Zechel's wife said. She spent the final days of the hunt in her tent.

---

Bug Lake. He concedes that they tried to block progress of the hunters' horses, but denies any member of his group seized them by the bridles. "They ran their horses at us," he insisted.

"Our intention is to be there again this year. We intend to shut down trophy hunting in Spatsizi to show that it can be done. They say we are interfering with them. We deny that. We're competing, as is our right, and they can't stop us."

Perhaps more philosophical than many hunters would be, Richard Mielke warns future hunters of Spatsizi that the Greenpeace anti-hunters "are trying to provoke you into taking a poke at them. And that's the last thing anyone should do. It's exactly what they want."

Unfortunately, however, it isn't the last thing that's likely to happen—unless British Columbia takes a page from Newfoundland's book and contrives a way to keep the Greenpeace people away from the hunters. There are some indications B.C. officialdom, perhaps belatedly, is now working hard to find a way to end the harassment of hunters. In reply to a letter of complaint from Mielke, B.C. Minister of Environment Stephen Rogers wrote:

"I wish to extend my personal apologies for the harassment you suffered (and) I also want to congratulate you and your hunting partner for the restraint you both showed under trying circumstances. The hunters in Spatsizi by their good behavior, as opposed to the conduct of Greenpeace, gained in general public stature while Greenpeace suffered.

"We are working with the Parks Branch to see what can be done to prevent situations such as you experienced from recurring."

The Force Behind Friends of Animals

Alice Herrington Raises the Hackles of Sportsmen in Her War on Hunting

By K. J. NELSON
Orlando Staff Writer

Alice Herrington

Whether Alice Herrington is right or wrong, she is anything but a bore. As founder and president of Friends of Animals (FOA), Herrington arouses strong feelings among sportsmen and others in her crusade against hunting.

Herrington, who lives with eight cats in Little Silver, N.J., founded FOA in 1957 to try to reduce the numbers of stray dogs and cats. And that is still the major purpose of the organization, she said.

But the group's chief claim to fame is Herrington's verbal bouts with hunters and trappers.

"To call this a sport is just pure nonsense," she said about hunting. "It's a real cruelty. It can't be justified."

IN HERRINGTON'S view, the only people worse than hunters are trappers.

"Deer hunters are not nearly as bad as trappers," she said. "I can't imagine how hunters, who pride themselves on fine shooting, ally themselves with trappers, who practice sadism. Deer hunters are due a little credit for at least the speed of their kill."

Despite the fireworks that FOA ignites with its "full program of hunting and trapping disruption," Herrington wants to convince the public that there "are two cruelties."

Besides the killing of "free animals, which are called wildlife," she explained, she's concerned about man's treatment of all domesticated animals—including pets and livestock.

"It's an American syndrome to love kittens and puppies but then throw out dogs and cats," she said, adding that millions of dogs are killed "in American municipal dog pounds, but they were loved as puppies."

In 1970, Herrington organized low-cost spaying programs for 20,000 animals. By 1980, the number had risen to 60,000.

Last September in Neptune, N.J., she opened a low-cost spaying clinic, said to be "a model of its kind with room for 80 animals and two veterinarians." Across the nation, her group pays for part of the cost of spaying in cooperation with 750 participating veterinarians.

ONE OF the prime targets of Herrington and the FOA is the food business.

"Cruelty to animals is practiced on a larger scale by the food industry than by any other single sector of human activity," an FOA publication asserts.

And Herrington adds:

"If people want to support an industry that is destroying the land, then they can continue to eat these creatures. But if not they can eat vegetables."

Other institutions also are criticized by

FOA, including zoos.

"Zoos must be phased out," said an FOA publication.

Herrington's concern for animals was heightened when she returned to the United States in 1954. Working as a War Department statistician, she had seen relatively few animals running loose in Europe.

In the United States, she said, "I was shocked to find stray animals everywhere."

HERRINGTON, a graduate of the University of Wisconsin in Madison, put her statistical talents to work calculating the rate of increase of dogs and cats. She said she realized that cutting the prolific birthrate was the only long-range solution.

This realization led to the founding of FOA, which worked with volunteers until 1967. Now the group has 12 full-time employees.

Herrington was asked whether she would advise FOA members to take traps that were legally set.

"Yes! Why not? Certainly," she said. But wouldn't the "solution" be stealing?

"You could say that it's stealing if you like," she replied, "but the Robin Hood approach to life is still a very nice way to go."

Humane Group To Seize Animal Leghold Traps

By STEVE GRANT

Friends of Animals Inc. said Friday it is going to trip up trappers by setting off their leghold traps when the season opens next week.

The organization said it will ask its 4,500 members in Connecticut to look for the traps, touch them off with a stick and remove them, because it believes the traps are inhumane.

"We can't as an organization advise people to remove legally set leghold traps. It wouldn't be a smart thing to do. What we're asking them to do is remove illegally set traps. Our guess is most of them are illegal," said Priscilla Feral, the organization's Connecticut director.

Game laws require all leghold traps to have the owner's name on them and they must be placed underwater or in an animal's burrow.

A spokesman for trappers questioned the new campaign, which will begin next Saturday, when the season opens.

"They're setting up a vigilante group. Vigilantes in any situation are not good. They don't know enough and they tend to break the law themselves," said Robert Crook of Madison, a member and former president of the Connecticut Trappers Association, which has about 800 members.

"I wouldn't object to anybody coming out and checking my traps, as long as they had the permission of the landowner, and as long as they didn't steal them, set them off or take animals out. But I really don't think that's their responsibility," Crook added.

He said the state Department of Environmental Protection is responsible for seeing that trapping is conducted legally and that he understood the group was told by DEP not to remove illegal traps but instead to report them to a game warden.

Ms. Feral said a trapper's name legally can be placed anywhere on a trap, so members would have to trip them to check. She said members would not be advised to reset legal traps.

"DEP can read the riot act to me if it wishes. But no way will we aid the trapper. Our object is to get rid of the leghold trap," she said.

The organization has argued that the trap, which has two steel jaws that slam shut when an animal touches a piece of bait, is barbaric because some animals die slowly or are left crippled. Ms. Feral said domestic animals also have been caught in the traps. There are other traps available that are more humane, she said.

Crook estimated that there are 8,000 trappers in Connecticut, with the average trapper placing 50 or 100 traps in the wild.

The most commonly trapped animal in the state is the muskrat, which can yield a pelt that will fetch up to $8. Raccoon, fox, mink, opossum, weasel, skunk and beaver also can be trapped legally, though the season for some of those animals does not begin until later.

Friends of Animals, which is based in New York, has waged other campaigns against hunters. Some members went into the Connecticut woods recently to play recorded wolf howls to alert animals of danger when the deer hunting season opened.

BACKGROUND IN SUPPORT OF HOUSE BILL 2291

During the past several years certain groups and individuals have appeared in hunting areas each fall with the expressed objective of disrupting a hunt. While their efforts were not notably successful, they did generate a lot of hostile reaction from hunters. Incidents of this kind have been increasing. They will likely produce a serious confrontation some day, and this situation poses a threat to the safety of all concerned, including state peace officers.

An example of this problem is the sheep hunt conducted annually in Unit 33, a portion of the Catalina Mountains near Tucson. What began a few years ago as a one-man protest against the hunt has recently drawn as many as 8-10 active participants who march through the area firing guns, blowing whistles and following hunters to frustrate their purpose of taking a sheep. Tempers run high; Arizona sheep hunting is often a once-in-a-lifetime experience which is the culmination of years of planning and can involve the expenditure of several thousand dollars. Someone is going to get injured if this interference continues.

The buffalo hunt conducted at Raymond Ranch near Flagstaff also has drawn protesters during past seasons. One year, a group of emotionally charged persons, apparently aroused by a television movie, actually threatened to stand in front of a buffalo herd in range of the gunners. The threat was not carried out but the hunt proceeded with assistance from a large contingent of DPS officers called in to keep the peace.

Now, one clear purpose of these demonstrators is attracting publicity to their cause. And though many of us deplore the irrationality we see in the anti-hunting crusade, we do not dispute the right of all persons to be heard. In fact, public forums abound where anti-hunting views can be expressed. Each year, for example, the buffalo and sheep seasons are discussed and then established in open, well publicized meetings of the Game and Fish Commission. The Commissioners themselves are citizens from all areas of the state who are readily accessible to anyone wanting to influence Game and Fish policy. For that matter, demonstrations could be conducted in the field without harassing others and would be appropriate.

The proposed legislation is designed only to prevent actual interference with hunters or disturbance of game in public hunting areas. It will apply in certain, defined places where the Game and Fish Commission has found, after public hearing, that a hunt disruption is likely to occur. The law includes specific language excepting ranchers, miners and others on public lands who might inadvertently disturb a hunt. But it will allow the removal or arrest of demonstrators who do interfere, intentionally, with hunters. Moreover, such persons may be liable to the hunter for civil damages.

The law answers the problems experienced repeatedly on sheep and buffalo hunts. Should these incidents continue to happen, and recent history suggest that they will, the law can be used to preserve the peace before a serious incident does occur. But aside from the state's concern for order and safety, the law serves clear notice that the right of protest is not unlimited and that it ceases to exist when protesting citizens purposely interfere with the lawful activities of other citizens in a public place.
