Radiation Phobia

Shedding light on a little-understood subject

In the wake of the disaster at Chernobyl, a new offensive has been launched to eradicate nuclear energy from the United States. The anti-nuclear activists are preying upon the lack of knowledge of the public in order to gain support for their cause. The activists, combined with the mass media, rely on half truths and outright lies to spread fear about the dangers of nuclear power and radiation. A news report on any nuclear incident becomes a top story of the day, and the style in which it is covered is designed to instill terror in our hearts.

A favorite technique of these activists is to use radiation statistics to impress and frighten the average citizen. One example of this approach comes from the Public Citizen's Energy Journal, which reported in 1983 that a nuclear plant dumped 208,000 gallons of water containing 15 millicuries of radioactivity into a river. This may sound dangerous, but in reality the contaminated water was 20 times less radioactive than common salad oil, and 257 times less radioactive than beer.

Radiation In Perspective

There are many types of radiation, each with its own characteristics. Alpha, Beta, and Gamma radiation are forms of ionizing radiation. When ionizing radiation passes through a living cell, it may knock electrons out of their orbits around the nucleus of an atom, thereby ionizing the atom, potentially causing injury or disease to the tissue.

Alpha radiation is the least penetrating of the three and can be stopped by a sheet of paper. It poses a potential health threat only if the source is inhaled, ingested, or absorbed into the blood stream. Beta particles can penetrate the skin but will be absorbed by a thin sheet of aluminum. Gamma radiation can pass through the body but will be stopped by three feet of concrete.

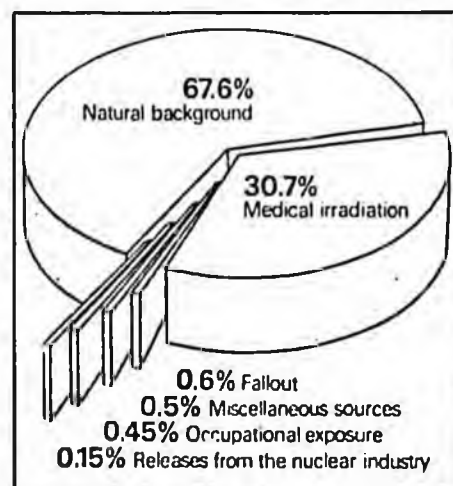

Radioactivity is measured several ways. The most common are known as the rem and the curie. Rem is the acronym for "Roentgen equivalent man" and is used to express the radiation dose to an individual. A curie is used to measure radiation at its source, as in contaminated water.

One of the properties of a radioactive substance is its half-life. This is simply the time it takes for the level of radioactivity to drop to one-half of the original amount. If a substance has a long half-life, then it must radiate at a very low level. Consequently, the longer the half-life, the smaller the level of radioactivity, and the less dangerous the substance. Some of the most dangerous radioactive substances have half-lives of mere fractions of a second. Nuclear opponents claim that radioactive wastes will be around for millions of years, which is true in a way, but after only 500 to 1,000 years the radioactivity of the waste material will be less than that of the naturally occurring ore from which it originally came. Plutonium, often touted by nuclear opponents as being the most dangerous substance known to mankind, has a half-life of almost 25,000 years and emits only alpha particles. Therefore, one can safely sit right next to it, for it only poses a threat if it is somehow brought into the body.

The average radiation that each American receives each year is about 150 millirems. (A millirem, abbreviated mrem, is a thousandth of a rem.) This dosage comes from various sources that we encounter every day. Cosmic rays account for 45 mrems; food, water, and air account for another 25 mrems. If you live in a brick house, you receive from 50 to 100 mrems per year due to the natural radioactive elements in the bricks. Even a wooden house emits more than 30 mrems per year. A chest X-ray delivers approximately 20 mrems. By comparison, nuclear power plants are the least offensive, adding one mrem per year to the background total if you live in the plant vicinity. The average radiation exposure for Americans due to nuclear power plants is 0.15 mrems.

The pie chart shows the breakdown of the different sources of radiation. In fact, natural background radiation is so much greater than that caused by nuclear power plants that, if Grand Central Station were regulated under the same standards as a nuclear power plant, it would be closed by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission because the radiation from the granite in the building exceeds government limits.

Radiation sources

The map of the U.S. (next page) shows different average background levels for each state. It is notable that Colorado, with almost twice the national background average, has a lower than average cancer mortality rate. This implies that these low levels of radiation have little to do with causing cancer.

Also, these facts indicate that the claim of many anti-nuclear activists that all radiation is harmful is ridiculous. They would be very hard pressed to avoid all exposure anyway, because even they are radioactive: Human blood contains a radioactive form of potassium.

How much radiation does cause injury or death? Dr. Petr Beckmann, in his monthly newsletter Access to Energy for June 1986, reports that "there are no early health effects below 100 rems [100,000 mrems] (except perhaps nausea). There will be some deaths at 200 rems [200,000 mrems], and the median lethal dose (where half of the exposed people die usually in 4 to 6 weeks) is about 450 rems [450,000 mrems]. Some cancers may appear at doses as low as 10 rems [10,000 mrems] (if delivered in a short time). . . ." Other lower doses can increase the likelihood of developing cancer and leukemia. Natural background radiation results in a very small fraction of cancer cases. This amount is insignificant when compared to cancers caused by other carcinogens such as asbestos, certain pesticides, and tobacco smoke.

How Safe Is Safe?

Many people are still unsure about nuclear safety. Media-inspired visions of the Three Mile Island cooling towers looming over children's playgrounds still linger in their minds, and the Chernobyl disaster only reinforced those fears.

The fact is, in the absolute sense, that there is no such thing as safe energy generation. In order for something to be energy, it must have the capacity to do work, and there is always the possibility that this "capacity" can get out of hand. The real question is then: How safe is one form of energy generation compared to others?

Nuclear energy's safety record is vastly better than that of any other form of large-scale energy production. Although there are now 100 nuclear power plants licensed in the United States — and there have been dozens running night and day for the last few decades — no death or proven injury to any member of clear explosion. A nuclear accident would most likely be precipitated by a loss of coolant in the reactor's core. This would cause the core to heat up to the point where the fuel melts, provided no steps are taken to avert this. The molten fuel could then melt through the steel pressure vessel which is several inches thick, and then work its way into the nine-foot-thick concrete floor. This whole process would take many hours, allowing plenty of time for corrective measures. The molten mass would soon dissipate its heat and solidify underground. Any significant radiation would be contained in the containment building, the massive domed structure made of steel reinforced concrete walls more than four feet thick. It is highly unlikely that any situation would ever reach this state, because several layers of automatic emergency cooling systems would have already turned on and halted the process before the fuel began to melt.

What Of Chernobyl?

What happened at Chernobyl could not physically happen in the United States. There are many factors that make such a disaster an impossibility. First, Chernobyl used graphite as a fission moderator and water as a coolant; U.S. plants use water as both the moderator and coolant. The worst part of the Chernobyl accident was not a meltdown, which most likely occurred, but the graphite fire that accompanied it. The fire was caused by the overheating of the core to the point of ignition for graphite, which is the only flammable substance in the reactor. The smoke from the fire was the vehicle which carried the lethal radiation into the surrounding environment, consequently causing the present and future deaths. The U.S. has one power reactor with a graphite core, but a fire there is physically impossible because the power density is 18 times less than at Chernobyl, and the graphite ignition temperature cannot be reached. The high Soviet power density made this accident possible. Also, Chernobyl, like most other Soviet power plants, had no containment building. This allowed for the unchecked flow of radiation into the environment.

The Soviet officials waited 36 hours before evacuating the people in the plant vicinity. This delay in protecting their own citizens from the radiation release, and the design of the Chernobyl plant, are indicative of the Soviets' contempt for human life.

For the nuclear opponents now to cry for a shutdown of all U.S. plants because of what happened at Chernobyl is absurd. It is analogous to having a chimpanzee test drive a new car and, when he crashes, decide that the car is unsafe and should be outlawed. The United States needs more electricity to meet future needs, and nuclear energy is the best method of generation presently available. It already provides us with 15 percent of our electricity, and to capitulate to the activists' demands would be an enormous setback to the economy and to our nation as a whole. ■ the public has resulted from the commercial operation of any U.S. nuclear power plant. Any death toll due to Three Mile Island was caused indirectly by the replacement power from non-nuclear sources that was needed to make up for the lost capacity. Just the emissions from coal and oil plants result in tens of thousands of deaths each year! Apparently deaths from black lung and other respiratory problems are fine, for the activists demand that only nuclear energy be 100 percent safe.

But what of meltdowns and graphite fires? The important thing to remember is that, contrary to anti-nuclear claims, it is physically impossible for a nuclear power plant to explode like a nuclear bomb, just as it is impossible for the chair in which you are sitting to undergo a nu-

Dear Senator Abood,

As a resident of Alaska I strongly urge you to support House Joint Resolution 4 making Alaska a nuclear free zone. I would like Alaska to join in encouraging our country to become a nuclear free and safer place to live.

Thank you for your support.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR
by Representative Niilo Koponen
APRIL 21, 1987

Last Wednesday, April 15, HJR 4, with its new title, "Relating to a nuclear weapons-free zone in the arctic, the subarctic, and the world" passed the House floor by a unanimous vote of 30 to 4. The resolution's previous title read, "Relating to a nuclear free arctic, subarctic and Alaska."

After a 2 year battle and 7 amendments later, many individuals and organizations statewide have succeeded in letting their representative know that they would like Alaska free of nuclear weapons. Additional support came with the successful passage of last August's Proposition 83-01, establishing a nuclear weapons freeze as the policy of the State of Alaska. This Ballot Proposition passed in every House District in the State by a 54% margin.

The main portion of the bill remains intact by establishing a nuclear weapons free zone in the arctic and subarctic. Though the deletion of Alaska was made and an addition of the "world" was put in its place, a new Whereas strengthens this resolution stating, " the ratification of a multi-lateral and verifiable nuclear-free arctic and subarctic treaty represents a creative and meaningful first step towards establishing a nuclear-weapons free world, which is the ultimate intent of this resolution."

This resolution aids in preventing nuclear war by initiating and promoting efforts to:

- 1) encourage verifiable bilateral and multilateral agreements and treaties between the United States, the Soviet Union, and other nations establishing the arctic and subarctic regions, and the entire world, as a nuclear weapons-free zone.
- 2) obtain verifiable bilateral and multilateral agreements and treaties between the United States, the Soviet Union and other nations to ban nuclear weapons from the arctic and subarctic regions, and the entire world

3) prevent all parties, including the military, from disposing of radioactive and nuclear wastes and materials in the arctic and subarctic regions;

4) obtain verifiable bilateral and multilateral agreements and treaties between the United States, the Soviet Union, and other nations to prevent nuclear weapons testing or the placement of nuclear weapons-related devices in the arctic and subarctic regions, and the entire world; (NEW SECTION)

5) promote and encourage the location of the next USA/USUR summit conference to be in Alaska so that world attention and concern might be drawn to the environmental concerns of arctic and subarctic areas (NEW SECTION)

The United States, The Soviet Union, and 24 other Nations have already ratified a treaty which makes the Antarctic into a Nuclear Free Zone. Now it is time for Alaska to enact a similar treaty which covers the Arctic and Subarctic.

Wednesday's vote was an overwhelming bipartisan gesture reflecting the sentiment of Alaska's people. The Inuit Circumpolar Conference, peace activists from SANE/Alaska and local people throughout the state organized an effective grassroots campaign. When state legislators hear more from constituents about arms control than normal state affairs, they even some of the most outspoken opponents of this resolution voted for it in the end.

The Fairbanks chapter of SANE/Alaska, stated, "A Nuclear Free Arctic agreement could be used to enhance the global security we will enjoy as Europe starts the process of denuclearization. We hope the Senate endorses the Resolution in time to send it to our leaders as they finalize the euromissile treaty." Shortly after this vote, Secretary of State George Schultz announced a new Soviet Proposal to remove intermediate range nuclear missiles from Europe.

According to Ed Davis, SANE/Alaska spokesman, "the chances of starting an accidental nuclear war increases as distances between the Superpower's land based arsenals decrease. "With the proposed agreement, we could have 100 missiles in Alaska and 100 warheads in Siberia aimed at each other. That is senseless and dangerous. Humanity would clearly be better off if our negotiators include the Nuclear Free Arctic concept in the Euromissile Treaty negotiations."

I want to thank all of you that have sent in public opinion messages or letters expressing your support for HJR 4. Your continued support will be needed as this resolution still is considered in the Senate.

Nuclear-free Alaska

To the editor:

We have the opportunity right now to express our commitment to a nuclear-free arctic and a missile-free Alaska.

The Alaska House of Representatives recently passed a resolution indicating that commitment, and the bill now resides in a Senate committee. Secretary of State Schultz was made aware of the resolution and he sent a letter to our Legislature asking such a message not be sent to President Reagan or Premier Gorbachev as it would be detrimental to U.S. negotiations with the Soviet Union for the removal of intermediate missiles from Europe. A legislative representative states he knows too little about negotiations and would prefer to leave such dealings to the "experts."

Many Europeans feel helpless and frustrated with the presence of nuclear missiles on their soil. Many Alaskans feel the same helplessness, being used as a bargaining chip in nuclear disarmament and the likely recipient of intermediate missiles as they are displaced from Europe.

For Alaskans who believe nations can coexist on levels beyond fear and nuclear threats, now is the time to speak up. Our children may also wish a say in the matter. The news reports indicate that the "nuclear-free arctic" bill will not likely leave the Senate because there is no interest or pressure from the constituency. But there is,

Resolution Concerning Nuclear Weapons

In 1987 the world is shocked by the proliferation of nuclear weapons. In a buildup that has taken place over the last 25 years the world is on the brink of a nuclear confrontation. If an exchange of these weapons takes place, the extinction of the human race, the threat of a nuclear winter in the atmosphere, the poisoning of the oceans, and the destruction of the ozone layer are all possible. From 1945 to 1991 the atomic bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki have killed over 200,000 people.

The United States, the Soviet Union, and the United Kingdom are the only three countries that possess nuclear weapons.

The United States has the largest number of nuclear weapons, followed by the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom.

The United States has a total of 22,000 nuclear weapons, the Soviet Union has 45,000, and the United Kingdom has 225.

The United States has a total of 10,000 nuclear weapons, the Soviet Union has 45,000, and the United Kingdom has 225. THE

Dear Senator,

Thank you for the opportunity to comment on HJR 4, relating to a nuclear-free zone in the arctic, subarctic, and the state of Alaska

For over four decades, the policy of deterrence has successfully prevented the outbreak of global war or armed conflict between nuclear powers. The integrity of the Western alliance system has been a central element in maintaining the credibility of deterrence against both nuclear and conventional attack. The United States has played a central role in this effort by maintaining the capability to project its military forces thousands of miles from its shores in order to meet the security commitments that lie at the heart of deterrence.

In the past the US has supported, on a case-by-case basis, certain international regional nuclear free zone proposals which advanced non-proliferation interests while not undermining existing security arrangements or our deterrent capabilities. Thus the U.S. supported the Treaty of Tlatelolco, the Antarctic Treaty and the Seabed Treaty, while opposing proposed Nordic and Central European nuclear free zones. With regard to the Treaty of Rarotonga, generally known as the South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone (SPNFZ), the U.S. decided recently that in view of its global security interests and responsibilities it is not, under current circumstances, in a position to sign the associated protocols to that treaty.

The US has a deep commitment to bringing about a safer strategic environment involving progressively less reliance on nuclear weapons. It shares the vision of a world freed from the incessant and pervasive fear of nuclear devastation. The US goal in arms control is to enhance stability and reduce the risk of war by reaching equitable and verifiable agreement on deep reductions in the nuclear arsenals of both sides.

The U.S. believes, however, that the growing number of proposals for regional nuclear free zones has the potential to undermine deterrence as the cornerstone of Western security. The proliferation of such zones, especially when unmatched by disarmament in the Soviet bloc, clearly would be detrimental to Western security and could also limit our future ability to meet security commitments world-wide.

In view of your concerns regarding national defense, I have taken the liberty of sharing your letter with the Department of Defense.

Dear Ms. Plank:

Regarding your letter to Senator Jan Faiks dated March 4, 1987, and circulated by her, I would like to clarify elements of HJR 4 that have been, apparently, misunderstood.

The letter states that nuclear free zones, "...when unmatched by disarmament in the Soviet bloc, clearly would be detrimental to Western security and could also limit our future ability to meet security commitments world-wide." I agree in concept with this statement and that is why HJR 4 seeks, in its resolves, to encourage and/or obtain "...verifiable bilateral and multilateral agreements and treaties between the United States, the Soviet Union, and other nations..."

This resolution seeks to support the Department's stated policy by ensuring any actions taken by the United States must be met with a commensurate commitment by the Soviet Union and other nations.

After reading this letter I find few areas of disagreement between HJR 4 and the Department of State's expressed position. In fact, the two positions appear to be mutually supportive.

I do not dispute our nation's role in maintaining its security commitments. I understand America's treaties and agreements are an essential element of that policy. Finally, I agree with your statement:

"The U.S. has a deep commitment to bringing about a safer strategic environment involving progressively less reliance on nuclear weapons. It shares the vision of a world freed from the incessant and pervasive fear of nuclear devastation. The U.S. goal in arms control is to enhance stability and reduce the risk of war by reaching equitable and verifiable agreement on deep reductions in the nuclear arsenals of both sides."

This is exactly what HJR 4 calls for. Thank you for your interest and for supporting the principles passed so overwhelmingly by Alaskan voters last year.

Sincerely, /

Representative Niilo Koponen

Fallout from the radioactive crash of '68

By Robin Epstein

IN 1987, AS IN 1968, EVENTS IN DENMARK MAY ONCE again prod the nuclear conscience of the U.S. Then, an American B-52 armed with four thermonuclear weapons crashed in Danish Greenland, provoking then-Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara to cancel the airborne alert program that had maintained nuclear armed bombers permanently in the air since 1961. Now, 19 years later, Danish Prime Minister Poul Schluter must deal with the fallout from the crash. Under pressure, he has promised that the 1,000-some Danes who were at the crash site will be examined mation until 1989, when the bombs, which were B-28s, will no longer be in use.

Of particular interest to the Danes is whether the bombs contained beryllium. A highly toxic substance that causes acute and chronic illnesses of the lungs and skin, weight loss and exhaustion, beryllium lessens the amount of plutonium necessary for a nuclear explosion. With beryllium present, four rather than 12.5 kilos of plutonium would have sufficed per bomb. In 1968 a kilo of plutonium ran around $300,000; a kilo of beryllium $150.

tundra was flown to the Savannah River plant in Aiken, S.C. The dirt was buried in a low-level waste disposal trench. The water underwent an ion exchange process and then joined other liquid waste for eventual release to the environment.

Bombers grounded: The Danish left was infuriated by the crash. One hundred and fifty NATO protesters gathered in Copenhagen to accuse the U.S. of violating the 1949 agreement that granted it air-base rights at Thule on the condition that no nuclear bombs be flown over Danish territory.

Within a day of the crash, then-Defense Secretary McNamara removed nuclear weapons from the bombers. Outcry from Danish officialdom shielded him from appearing to acquiesce to Soviet condemnation when he cancelled airborne alert together in February.

Untrustworthy urinalysis: In 1968 the Wright-Patterson Air Force radiological laboratory in Dayton, Ohio, analyzed 16 plutonium more than 20,000 urine specimens of the Americans who had been in Thule. Those test results influenced the 1977 joint U.S.-Danish report that called the cleanup "a classic example of international cooperation" in which no health dangers have been posed from the radioactivity.

Dr. Elliot Abbey of the Veterans Administration Hospital in St. Louis, Mo., told These Times that the urine tests may not have conclusively proved that the men were not exposed to significant amounts of plutonium. It is possible that as the flaming plane skidded across the ice, the plutonium was high-fired rather than air-oxidized. And if the plutonium dioxide particles were in high-fired state after the crash—and were therefore less soluble—they may have remained in the lungs. Consequently, excretion of radioactivity from the workers' bodies would have been delayed and urinalysis would not have indicated exposure.

Abbey first became interested in the Thule crash six years ago when he diagnosed a patient who had participated in the cleanup with a rare blood cancer called hairy cell leukemia. "If there's a single other person with this type of leukemia that was at Thule then the chances are extraordinarily high that it had to do with that exposure," Abbey said. He tried to locate other Americans involved, but with no success. And at that time he found the Danish ministry of health unresponsive to his suggestion that they conduct a study.

More recently a Danish woman named for radiation poisoning. It remains to be seen if the U.S. will follow suit and investigate the thousands of Americans involved in the crash cleanup for plutonium-related illnesses.

On Jan. 21, 1968, a B-52 carrying four 1.1 megaton hydrogen bombs took off from Plattsburgh, N.Y., to fly the "Chronicle Dome," a 24-hour Arctic Circle airborne alert route. Near the U.S. Air Base in Thule, Greenland, the cockpit of the plane filled with smoke. After failing to make an emergency landing, the seven-member crew ejected at 8,000 feet. Six of them survived.

The B-52 crashed onto the ice of North Star Bay seven miles southwest of Thule. The conventional explosive detonators in the outer covering of the hydrogen bombs blew up, spewing radioactive plutonium across the ice.

Late last year Prime Minister Schleuter ordered that the Danes who were at Thule be systematically identified and medically examined. Six of the 130 who participated directly in the cleanup are dead. "But all the people on the base were in contact with poisonous radioactive materials," says Lars Melgaard of OOA, a Danish nuclear information group. Everyone ignored signs prohibiting entry to dangerous areas, participants told Melgaard.

This February the Danish minister for internal affairs asked U.S. authorities which radioactive substances were used in the bombs aboard the crashed B-52. But Danish environmentalists harbor little hope that the U.S. will release this classified military infor-

More than 700 American soldiers were stationed at Thule when the plane went down. About 1,400 were flown in—some of them on their way home from Vietnam—to help mop up. But so far there are no U.S. plans to find out if they also are suffering due to radiation exposure.

The Broken Arrow Control Group mobilized immediately, sending Richard Hunziker, an Air Force major-general of inspection and safety, to Greenland to oversee the operation. Broken Arrow is a Pentagon euphemism for nuclear-weapons-related accidents, of which Thule was the 30th.

Hunziker was joined by U.S. Navy investigators who in 1966 had cleaned up a similar B-52 crash in Palomares, Spain, as well as the Air Force units flown to Greenland to share the grunt work with Danish civilians. Missing—11 kilos: More than 2,000 Americans—90 percent of whom were military personnel—and hundreds of Danes spent four winter months of 1968 on dogsleds in the arctic darkness retrieving cigarette-pack-sized pieces of radioactive bomber debris along with 237,000 cubic feet of contaminated ice. It took 10 days to locate the scattered bomb shards, which were sent back to where they came from—the AEC's Pantex plant in Amarillo, Texas. The search for the rest of the wreckage and radioactive material continued through March 15. According to OOA and Greenpeace Denmark, each bomb contained four kilos of plutonium. Only five kilos, rather than the full 16, were recovered.

In September 1968 a combination of ice and

Flirting with disaster

Denmark's current health crisis and the history behind it should be a warning signal to Congress, which is scheduled to vote soon on President Reagan's proposed legislation sanctioning bi-weekly commercial flights of 500 pounds of plutonium between Europe and Japan. The administration officials who drafted the proposed 30-year agreement hope to render Japan independent from foreign oil, but at what expense? If passed, the nuclear accord will cede the U.S. right—which does not expire until the year 2003—to veto Japanese plutonium transactions on a case-by-case basis for safety or security reasons.

"The agreement in its present form is ill-conceived, lacks foresight and is actually reckless," says Alan Kuperman of the Washington, D.C.-based Nuclear Control Institute, a non-partisan group that has issued a special report on Japan's planned air shipments of U.S. supplied spent nuclear fuel to Europe for reprocessing. None of the large casks needed to transport such quantities of plutonium have survived crash tests, France and England would reprocess 85 tons of plutonium—an amount equal to that of the U.S. nuclear arsenal—for use in Japanese reactors by the year 2000. It only takes 15 pounds for a terrorist to make a crude nuclear weapon.

Sally Markussen has had better luck. Her efforts, along with those of Danish environmental lobbyists and the subsequent press attention, forced the Danish government to act. Markussen's 49-year-old husband Ole, who was personnel manager at the Thule base in 1968, has trouble breathing. He vomits frequently, excretes blood and has lost 66 pounds. The Guardian of London reported that Markussen informally canvassed 800 Danish Thule workers. She found 500 share symptoms such as weight loss, exhaustion, loss of concentration and coordination, breathing problems and wounds on their limbs that won't heal. More than 90 of them have cancer.

But across the Atlantic sits the Pentagon, and it does not like to admit mistakes. Obtaining medical attention for the Americans who were at Thule might require a class-action suit similar to those filed by Vietnam veterans exposed to Agent Orange.

A Freedom of Information Act request may be the only way to find them. The Air Force's world-wide locator will forward letters to retired servicemen, but the Pentagon is not about to volunteer the names of the cleanup participants, let alone their whereabouts. *Thule alumni with any kind of blood disease contact Dr. Elliot Abbey at the St. Louis VA Medical Center, 111-JC, St. Louis, MO 63125, or call (314) 652-4100. March 31

Today the United States and the Soviet Union are equipping, planning and training for nuclear war. Each is expanding its nuclear forces in a mindless competition which is increasing the certainty of a nuclear showdown. Although arms reduction talks continue, the spirit of confrontation which dominates the deliberations provides little hope for progress toward a better relationship.

What is needed is new, imaginative -- even bold -- initiatives to move away from confrontation toward cooperation with the Soviets in ways which reduce the risk of nuclear war. Everyone understands that there is no panacea, no magic wand, which would soon rid the world of 50,000 nuclear weapons. But there are first steps which can be taken in the right direction as opposed to continuing a dangerous expansion of nuclear forces on both sides.

One such useful step is embodied in the provisions of Alaska's HJR-4 which would promote a nuclear free zone in the Arctic and sub-Arctic regions of the world. This proposal is similar in spirit and effect to the Antarctic Treaty of 1961 which has been a great success in preventing military competition in a sensitive zone.

The immediate benefits of the HJR-4 concept are apparent if one realizes that consideration is being given today to relocating U.S. Pershing II missiles from Europe to Alaska. Such action would inevitably result in Soviet intermediate range missiles in eastern Russia, only 10 minutes away from targets in Alaska. Although this is not much worse than 30 minutes away, the shortened time for warning and response clearly would increase the risk of war through accident or misunderstanding in time of military crisis. A nuclear free zone would preclude such missiles on both sides, could be verified with confidence and would increase the safety and security of Americans and Russians alike. Altogether, HJR-4 promotes a very useful, practical measure to take a first step away from nuclear war.

Adoption of HJR-4 by the Alaska Legislature would also reinforce the clear signal to Capitol Hill and the White House that the citizens of Alaska sent by their strong support of the Nuclear Freeze resolution last year. It would put Alaska in the vanguard of the states taking action to prevent nuclear war.
