Why the Need to Have Additional Legislation

Much of this Legislation is structured to meet IRS rules & guidelines. When IRS makes a change it may require a change in Alaska Statute to stay effective.

Other states are trying to improve their Trust Laws. If they come up with a better approach we need to adjust in Alaska to stay effective.

Fine tune legislation to make sure it is the best.

The Future Looks Very Bright for Alaska to Continue to Attract Business to the State. The Only Potential Problem Would Be the Implementation of an Income Tax on Trusts and Estates Set up by Non-Resident's.

The Implementation of Such a Tax Would Cause Alaska to Lose Within One Year 99% of the Business It Has Attracted. The Business Would Go to a State That Does Not Tax Non-Resident Trusts.

THE ALASKA ADVANTAGESM
HANDBOOK

Over the last four years, Alaska passed many unique pieces of trust and financial management legislation. We believe this makes Alaska the leading jurisdiction to setup and administer trusts and other wealth management techniques. This booklet provides a summary of each piece of legislation that has been passed. It is recommended that you read thoroughly each piece of legislation to fully appreciate and understand the flexibility and uniqueness of Alaska's legislation.

In summary, Alaska provides for:

- Perpetual Trusts - House Bill 101, effective April 2, 1997
 - Perpetual Trusts – Modification - Senate Bill 162, effective April 22, 2000

What Is a Trust?

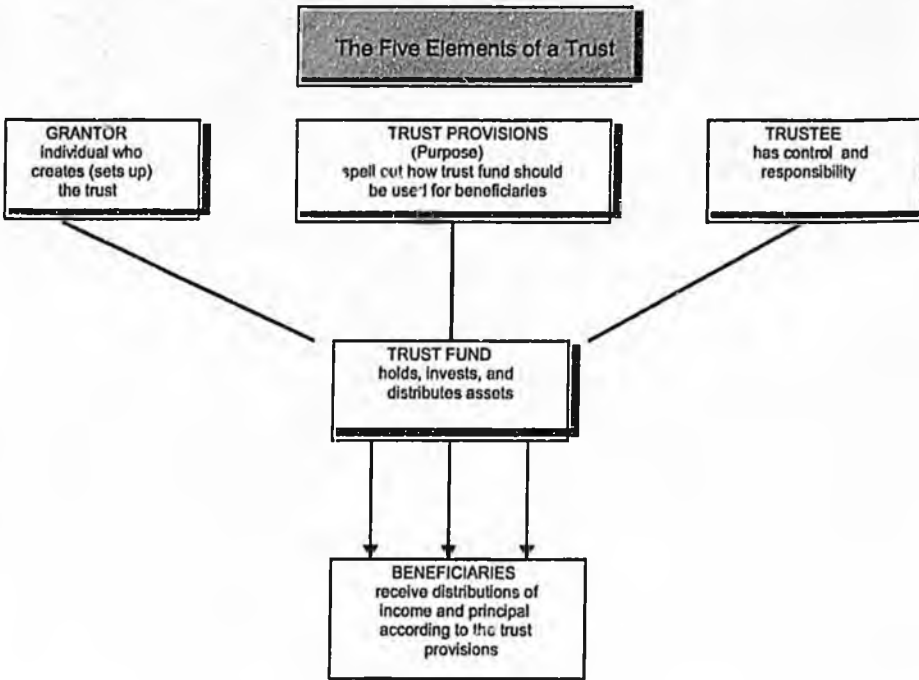

Most of this legislation effects trusts. Trusts are probably the most effective method to:

1. reduce, and in some cases, eliminate gift, estate and income taxes;
2. preserve assets for the family; and
3. accomplish the desires of the family;
4. provide asset protection;
5. improve quality of life by allowing use of trust assets by beneficiaries.

We have included a brief summary of what is a trust.

A trust is a legal arrangement where one person (called the trustee) holds property for the benefit of other persons (called the beneficiaries). There are many different kinds of trusts.

The personal trust is the most common form of trust, created for non-business reasons for the benefit and protection of individuals. The trustee in a personal trust acts in accordance with the law and the instructions set forth in the governing instrument by the person who created the trust. The primary responsibilities of the trustee are to manage and protect the assets in the trust for the best interests of the beneficiaries. The management and protection responsibilities include proper investment of assets, collection of income, maintenance of accurate books and records, filing of tax returns and other reports, and payment of income and trust property to the beneficiaries in accordance with the terms of the trust.

Summary of the Alaska Trust Act House Bill 101

On April 2, 1997, the Alaska Trust Act became effective. The Act makes two changes to Alaska law, both of which may be of significant interest to individuals throughout the United States. First, for Alaska trusts, the Act effectively eliminates the "rule against perpetuities." This rule limits the time a trust can last to approximately 90 years. Now, any American can create a trust in Alaska and provide for it to last forever. This means that the benefits that the trust can provide to the beneficiaries can last for as long as the family wants. Trust benefits can include protecting trust assets from claims of the creditors of the beneficiaries, including claims that may arise in a divorce of any beneficiary. Also, because Alaska has no income tax, an Alaska trust can be used to avoid state income tax on trust income that is not distributed currently to the trust beneficiaries. However, an Alaska trust cannot be used to avoid state income tax if the person who created the trust (called the "grantor" or "settlor") lives in a state that imposes an income tax and if the trust is a "grantor trust." A "grantor trust" is one that falls under a rule that causes the trust's income to be attributable to the grantor.

The second change, which results from the Act, relates to protecting trust assets from claims of creditors of the grantor of the trust. Throughout virtually all of the United States, creditors of the grantor of a trust can attach the assets if the trustee can distribute trust property back to the grantor. Alaska law now provides that the assets in such a trust are not subject to the claims of the grantor's creditors, unless the original transfer to the trust was intended to defraud known creditors of the grantor or rendered the grantor insolvent.

Hence, an individual can transfer assets to an irrevocable Alaska trust and be a beneficiary to whom the trustee can distribute trust property. Yet, the trust assets will no longer be subject under Alaska law to the claims of the grantor's creditors. (The protection does not apply if the trust must distribute assets to the grantor.) This protection from creditor claims applies even if the grantor is the only person to whom the trustee may distribute trust assets and income. If there are beneficiaries in addition to the grantor, this protection from claims of creditors also applies even if the grantor retains the right to veto distributions to other beneficiaries of the trust. The protection also applies even if the grantor retains the right to direct where the trust property is to pass upon his or her death. By retaining these veto and control powers, transfers to the trust will not be subject to gift tax when the trust is created. However, retaining either of these powers will cause the trust assets to be includible in the grantor's taxable estate at death.

Alternatively, an individual may create an Alaska trust but not retain any power to veto distributions to other beneficiaries or to control the disposition of the trust property when the grantor dies. This should make the transfer to the trust a completed gift for gift tax purposes and should result in the exclusion of the assets from the grantor's taxable estate.

This opens a new dimension in estate planning because an individual can make a completed gift to be excluded from his or her estate while remaining eligible to receive distributions from the trust.

As indicated, an Alaska trust can now be used to protect assets from claims of creditors but not if the grantor transfers the assets in fraud of his or her creditors or retains the power to revoke or terminate the trust. Generally, a transfer is made in fraud of creditors only if it either renders the grantor insolvent (e.g., unable to pay current obligations) or is intended to remove assets from the reach of specifically known creditors. A person may be a known creditor even if that person does not yet have a judgment against the grantor.

It is probably sensible for a grantor wishing to provide protection from claims of creditors to transfer significantly less than one-half of his or her net wealth to an Alaska trust. First, such a transfer is unlikely to render the grantor insolvent. Second, because the grantor cannot retain the right to trust distributions, but only to be a beneficiary to whom the trustee may but is not required to distribute assets or income, it would not be wise to place most of one's assets in such a trust and lose entitlement to their use or income. This is especially important if the grantor wishes to use an Alaska trust for estate tax planning purposes. Where the transfer to the trust is a completed gift, the grantor presumably will want to minimize distributions back to himself or herself because such distributions would erode the estate tax reduction benefits of having made a completed gift to the trust.

The new law specifies what makes the trust Alaskan. Some part of the trust assets must be held in Alaska. Also, an Alaskan permanent resident, bank or trust company (that is headquartered in Alaska) must serve as a trustee and hold certain duties including maintaining books and records of the trust and preparing or arranging for the preparation of the trust's income tax returns. Also, part of the administration of the trust must occur in Alaska.

Example of Tax Savings Using an Alaska Trust

Your transfer of assets to an Alaska Asset Preservation Trustsm can be a completed gift for Federal estate and gift tax purposes. You may decide to gift an amount equal to your annual gift tax exclusion of $10,000 per trust beneficiary, your gift tax exemption equivalent amount of $675,000¹, or your $1,030,000 generation-skipping tax exemption, or some other amount. The trust assets could be held for the benefit of your family members and descendants forever. Perhaps most important, you can be an eligible beneficiary of the trust. Upon your death, the trust could be excluded from your estate for Federal estate tax purposes. Furthermore, creditors who are unknown when the trust is setup and who have claims that arise after the trust is settled, should not be able to invade the trust to satisfy their claims.

The potential estate tax savings are significant. For example, if you have $675,000 of assets today, you would hope that over the next 20 years these assets would appreciate at 10% per year to over $4 million or more. If these assets worth $4 million were included in your estate at the time of your death, your estate could owe as much as $2,400,000 of Federal estate taxes. On the other hand, if you transferred this $675,000 in assets to an Alaska Asset Preservation Trustsm, using your gift tax exemption equivalent, to be held for the benefit of yourself and your family members, then upon your death (if this occurred in 20 years), the $4 million of assets could be excluded from your estate and your estate could save $2,400,000 in estate taxes. The trust can continue forever for the benefit of your descendants and can be structured so that the trust assets are not included in any of their estates as well.

If a family uses a $1 Million generation-skipping transfer tax exemption with the Alaska Perpetual (Dynasty)

¹ Effective 1998, these amounts will increase as set forth in The Taxpayer Relief Act of 1997

Trust after 120 years with an after-tax return of 10%, the trust would be worth almost $93 billion. If the Alaska Perpetual (Dynasty) Trust was not used; the value of the property would be less than $6 billion.

Leveraging the Alaska Perpetual (Dynasty) Trust with Life Insurance

Having the trust purchase life insurance with the trust contributions is an excellent strategy that can be used to leverage the $1 million generation-skipping transfer tax (GST) exemption that can dramatically increase trust assets. The proceeds from the insurance that will be paid to the trust will escape initial income and wealth transfer taxation in the estate and these proceeds will provide a large sum of money that can continue to benefit the beneficiaries for as long as the family desires.

Alternative to Foreign Asset Protection Trusts

The Alaska Trust is an alternative to foreign asset protection trusts and has many advantages. The Alaska Trust will have a trustee located in Alaska. Individuals should be more comfortable transferring assets to a trustee in a politically stable jurisdiction that is part of the United States. An Alaska Trust will not be subject to the new Internal Revenue Code foreign trust tax rules. In addition, Alaska occupies a central location on the globe. Alaska is mid-way from three of the largest financial centers of the world: London, New York, and Tokyo and its time zone is just one hour earlier than Pacific Time.

For some people there may be disadvantages to using an Alaska Trust. If an individual is looking for a way to hide taxable income or for a way to hide assets from existing creditors, he or she should look elsewhere. The trustee of an Alaska Trust will be subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of Alaska and will have to comply with the Internal Revenue Code. As such, the trustee will report all taxable income of the trust as required by the Internal Revenue Code. In addition, the trustee could be sued successfully under Alaska law if any transfers to the trust were fraudulent. Under new Alaska Statutes, a creditor who suspects that he or she has been defrauded has the longer of (1) four years from the date of the transfer to the trust or (2) one year after the transfer is discovered, or reasonably could have been discovered, to file a claim against the trustee to set aside a fraudulent transfer.

Many offshore jurisdictions have shorter statutes of limitations for filing fraudulent transfer claims. On the other hand, if an individual has no known or ascertainable creditors and is willing to report all taxable income, an Alaska Trust could be an important estate and asset protection-planning vehicle.

Perpetual Dynasty Trust Modification Senate Bill 162

Updates and Strengthened Alaska Perpetual (Dynasty) Trust Statutes

Alaska's new legislation expressly states that the common law rule against perpetuities does not apply in Alaska. Alaska then adopts a two-pronged approach to avoid the Delaware Tax Trap. The purpose of the first prong is to re-establish a rule against perpetuities for Alaska in the limited circumstances of property interests subject to a limited power of appointment which is exercised to create a new limited power of appointment. All such property interests are invalid unless within 1,000 years from the time of creation of the original instrument or conveyance creating the original limited power of appointment the property interests vest or terminate.

This provision applies to a trust instrument or conveyance executed on or after 4/2/97, if the instrument or conveyance creates a non-vested property interest subject to the exercise of a power of appointment that creates a new or successive power of appointment. The goal of this provision is to cure the Delaware Tax Trap problem for all trusts created under Alaska law after the initial abolition of the rule against perpetuities in 1997.

The second prong of the new legislation enacts a rule against suspension of the power of alienation of property. The statute provides that a trust is void if the trust terms suspend the power of alienation for a period of at least 30 years after the death of an individual alive at the time of the creation of the trust. However, the statute expressly states that a suspension of the power of alienation can be avoided by giving the trustee the express or implied power to sell the trust property.

This second prong of Alaska's approach to avoid the Delaware Tax Trap is based on the Tax Court's decision in Estate of Murphy. In that case, the court held that the Delaware Tax Trap was not violated in Wisconsin, which had a perpetuities statute expressed in terms of a rule against suspension of the power of alienation (rather than a rule based on remoteness of vesting). The IRS has acquiesced in Murphy.

Alaska Limited Partnership and Limited Liability Companies

House Bill 266 and House Bill 222

Alaska's amendments to its limited partnerships and limited liability company statutes, makes Alaska the preferred jurisdiction to form these entities. Alaska is the first state to take advantage of the simplified formation operation of limited partnership and limited liability companies as permitted under the new Treasury Department "check the box" regulations. In addition, under the new Alaska law a court will be able to order the dissolution of a partnership or limited liability company only if it determines that it is impossible for the enterprise to continue to operate. Unlike the default rules under most state laws, an Alaska limited partnership or limited liability company does not go out of existence upon the death of a general partner of a limited partnership or the member of a limited liability company. Alaska has eliminated any right to demand to be bought out on six months notice. In fact, under default state law, a partner is entitled to distributions only as provided under the governing document. For these and other reasons, the combination of the Alaska Trust Act and the changes to Alaska's limited partnerships and LLC statutes provide for unique estate planning opportunities.

House Bill 222 strengthened and improved Alaska's limited partnerships and limited liability companies by clarifying by statute the only remedy for a creditor is a "charging order."

Alaska's Voluntary Community Property Option House Bill 199 and Senate Bill 166

Income Tax Advantage of Community Property

A person who owns assets with his or her spouse as community property in one of the nine community property states (Louisiana, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, California, Nevada, Washington, Idaho and Wisconsin) has a major income tax advantage over a married person who owns assets with his or her spouse but that are not community property. This advantage results from the incongruous operation of the step-up in basis rule. This rule is one of the few, if only, income tax advantages that a person's estate receives upon his or her death.

The best way to explain the step-up in basis rule is to start with an example of a single person living in any state on her death bed who twenty years ago paid $10,000 for a homestead that is presently worth $110,000. If the person sold the homestead before she died, she would realize a long term capital gain of $100,000. The gain would be subject to a maximum capital gains tax of 20%, or $20,000. On the other hand, if the person decided not to sell the homestead and died the next day, the $100,000 profit would be forgiven. This means that her heirs could sell the homestead for $110,000 and pay no income taxes! This is because the original cost basis of $10,000 is "stepped-up" to $110,000, the fair market value of the homestead at death. If the homestead is sold for $110,000, there is no gain and no income taxes will be owed.

The step-up in basis rule gets more complicated when a married couple is involved. If we assume that a married couple in a non-community property state bought the homestead twenty years ago for $10,000 and held title as husband and wife, then each would own one-half of the homestead. If the husband was on his death bed and the couple sold the homestead before the husband died for its current fair market value of $110,000, the couple would realize a $100,000 long-term capital gain, just like the single person did. However, if the husband died and the wife inherited his half of the homestead and then sold it, she would only realize a $50,000 long-term capital gain. This is because the profit in the husband's half of the homestead would be forgiven by the step-up in basis rule. The husband's half of the homestead would get a "step-up" in basis to $55,000. When the husband's half was sold for $55,000 there would be no gain. However, the wife would have a gain on the sale of her half of the homestead. Her half of the homestead would have a basis of $5,000 (one-half of the original cost basis of $10,000). When this half was sold for $55,000, the wife would realize a $50,000 long-term capital gain and would pay a maximum of $10,000 of income taxes (20% of $50,000).

If, on the other hand, the couple lived in a community property state like Washington, the income tax savings would be even greater. If the homestead was community property under Washington law, for example, the wife would get a step-up in basis in both halves of the homestead to $110,000. After her husband's death when she sold the homestead for $110,000 she would pay no income taxes! In contrast, in the prior example of the married couple who owned the homestead that was not community property, the wife who sold the homestead after her husband died would pay $10,000 of income taxes. In this way the income tax laws favor spouses in community property states that own assets as community property over spouses in non-community property states whom, as a general rule, cannot own assets as community property.

Overview of House Bill 199

This Act (signed into law 5/23/98) will allow married Alaskans to execute a written agreement to recharacterize their assets as community property. Unlike other states which have a community property form of ownership for married persons, Alaskans would have their assets treated as community property, only to the extent they execute a written agreement and elect into a community property system under Alaska law. In contrast, community property states mandate the married couple's assets to be community property unless the spouses elect out.

This Act not only allows Alaskan couples to enter into an agreement to have some or all of their assets treated as community property, but it also permits married persons who do not reside in Alaska to have their assets treated as community property under Alaska law by executing an Alaska Community Property Trust. Such a trust must have an Alaska trustee. It is anticipated that many married persons who reside outside of Alaska will wish to label a portion, or all, of their assets as community property because they believe that it is a more appropriate method of owning their assets and they wish to obtain the income tax advantages which are available to community property upon the death of the first spouse.

Some believe that community property represents a more fair and rational system of sharing the ownership of benefit of the beneficiary. This power will be considered the exercise of a special Power of Appointment. property during marriage because it essentially treats the marriage like a partnership; as assets are earned during the marriage, they are treated as owned 50/50 by the two partners (the husband and wife). Others believe community property is not a fair or rational system. Regardless of one's beliefs, it seems appropriate to allow Alaskans, and residents of other states, the freedom to choose the arrangement that is most appropriate for them.

It should be emphasized that no asset would be labeled as community property under the Act. Rather, the Act merely authorizes married persons to execute a written agreement or trust in which they expressly elect to treat some or all of their assets as community property under Alaska law.

Overview of Senate Bill 166

Community property agreements and trusts strengthened

These amendments clarify ambiguities regarding the right to amend and revoke community property agreements and trusts. The amendments to Alaska Statutes 34.77.090 and .100 specify that if a community property agreement or trust provides for the non-testamentary disposition of property at the death of the second spouse, without probate, then at any time after the death of the first spouse the surviving spouse may amend the community property agreement or trust with respect to the surviving spouse's property to be disposed of at his or her death.

In addition, the amendment eliminates the prior statutory language that a community property agreement or trust may be amended only "on a particular date or on the occurrence of a particular event" set forth in the instrument. Rather, a community property agreement or trust may be amended or revoked at any time if the instrument generally authorizes amendment or revocation by the spouses. The amendments will apply to all community property agreements and trusts executed after the effective date of the Alaska Community Property Act.

Note: The Chapter for Alaska Community Property Agreements and Trusts has been changed to AS 34.77.010-.100 from AS 34.75.010-.100.

Innovative and Flexible Trust and Estate Revisions Senate Bill 354

This Act creates major changes to Alaska's Trust and Probate Laws making them, by far, the most effective and flexible while enhancing the use of Alaska Trusts. Outlined below is a summary of the key features of this Act.

Probate Jurisdiction - AS 13.06.068

This provision allows non-residents of Alaska to select to have their will probated under Alaska law. The advantages of this legislation are:

1. It should allow the estate to avoid state income tax during the probate administration.
2. It should avoid any statutory executor/personal representative fees and/or attorneys fees.
3. The probate process in Alaska is very simple and straightforward which should save time and money.
4. It seems that any trust that was created under the will would then have the ability to qualify as an Alaska perpetual trust and the other protective provisions of Alaska law.

Change of Trust Situs to Alaska - AS 13. 36.043

This provision makes it easier to move a trust to Alaska. It also clarifies that even though a trust was setup before Alaska changed its perpetual and asset protection provisions, a trust will still be valid under Alaska law. If someone has setup a trust in a foreign jurisdiction or in a U.S. jurisdiction and it either provides for asset protection and/or perpetual status, the trust can now be moved to Alaska and retain those advantages.

Trustees Special Power to Appoint to a Different Trust - AS 13. 36.157

This provision allows the trustee, without court approval, to appoint part or all of the trust principal to another trust if the trustee has the power to invade the principal of the trust for the

This can be done as long as the transfer does not reduce any fixed income interest of an income beneficiary of the trust and is in favor of the beneficiary of the trust and, as required by the generation-skipping transfer tax grandfathering regulations, does not exceed the common law rule against perpetuities measured from the original commencement of the trust. The advantage is that it allows the trustee to extend any grandfathering for generation-skipping taxation; and allows the benefits of the trust to continue for future beneficiaries.

Statute of Limitations Clarified - AS 34.40.110(d)

This provision clarifies that the four-year statute of limitations to commence a legal action that a transfer to a trust was fraudulent starts from the cause of action rather than just the remedy.

Challenges to Trusts - AS 13.36.310

This provision clarifies that unless the transfer to the trust was a fraudulent conveyance, the trust is not void, voidable, liable to be set aside, defective in any fashion or questionable as to the settlor's capacity, on the grounds that the trust or transfer avoids or defeats a right, claim or interest conferred by law on a person by reason of a personal or business relationship with the settlor by the way of a marital or similar right.

This new section also provides that even if the property in a trust is voided or set aside because it was considered a fraudulent conveyance, the trust can only be set aside to the extent necessary to satisfy the settlor's debt to the creditor and the cost and attorneys fees allowed.

Trustee has First Lien on Assets - AS 13.36.310

If the transfer to the trust is voided or set aside and the court is satisfied that the trustee has not acted in bad faith, in accepting or administering the trust, the trustee has the first and paramount lien against the property equal to the entire cost, including attorney's fees properly incurred by the trustee in defense of the trust. Also, the beneficiary, including the Grantor, may retain a distribution made prior to the commencement of an action to set aside the transfer.

Protection of Trustees and Others - AS 34.40.110(f)

This provision prohibits a creditor from asserting a cause of action against the trustee and others involved in the preparation or funding of the trust for conspiracy to commit fraudulent conveyance, aiding and abetting a fraudulent conveyance or participation in the trust transaction. This means that the trustee and the client's advisors cannot be held liable for this transaction. It further states that the creditor's only relief is limited to the trust assets and to those owned by the settlor.

Non-Alaska Co-Trustees - AS 13.36.320

This provision allows non-residents of Alaska and banks and trust companies who are not headquartered in Alaska to act as a co-trustee with a qualified Alaska Trustee and not be considered engaged in business in Alaska solely by reason as serving as co-trustee.

Limitation on Trustee Liability - AS 13.36.110

This provision clarifies that a trustee, who has not been given a responsibility under the document, can not be held liable to the beneficiaries or others for the actions of the trustee who had that power. This provides extreme flexibility for the trustees in that different trustees may be given different responsibilities and the co-trustees do not have to be concerned about the actions of the other co-trustees who hold other powers. In addition, AS 13.36.195 clarifies that the settlor of the trust can relieve the trustee from any duties, restrictions and liabilities or can restrict the trustees privileges and powers or add duties, restrictions and liabilities. AS 13.36.220 clarifies that a beneficiary who has full legal capacity and acts on full information and may relieve the trustee from any and all duties and restrictions and liabilities that would otherwise be imposed on trustees by Alaska Statutes.

Trust Incontestability Clause - AS 13.36.330

This provision clarifies that if an intervivos trust penalizes a beneficiary for contesting the trust or instituting other proceedings prohibited by the trust agreement, the penalty provision will be enforceable even if probable cause exists for instituting the proceeding.

Appreciation can be Considered as Income - AS 13.38.060

This provision allows Alaska to be a very favorable jurisdiction for Charitable Remainder Unitrusts that are income only with a make-up provision. Under most state laws, even though the trust may be an income only make-up provision Charitable Remainder Trust, it is not very effective because capital appreciation usually can not be converted into income. Alaska Statutes have been clarified to allow appreciation to be considered income making Alaska one of the best jurisdictions for Charitable Remainder Trusts.

Alaska Uniform Prudent Investor Act
House Bill 321

Alaska became the 17th state to adopt a version of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act. In essence, this Act brings trust investing up to the 21st Century by requiring the trustee to acknowledge the theory of efficient markets, more broadly known as the Modern Portfolio Theory. The trustee is required to consider, to the extent relevant, the following factors in formulating the investment portfolio:

- the size of the portfolio;
 - the nature and likely duration of the trust;
 - the liquidity and distribution requirements;

- the general economic conditions;
 - the possible effects of inflation or deflation;
 - the expected tax consequences of various investment and distribution decisions;
 - the roll of each investment in the overall portfolio;
 - the expected total return of the portfolio; and
 - the needs of the beneficiaries for present and future distributions.

This Act makes it clear that there are no investments, which are per se improper or imprudent, nor are there any which are per se proper or prudent. All investments must be reviewed and managed based upon the facts and circumstances of each trust situation, considering the above mentioned factors.

A trustee can no longer escape liability for embracing a very conservative investment approach such as purchasing treasury bills or CDs. If a trust is to last for a number of years and the trustee does not consider the effects of inflation on the purchasing power of the trust, it would be liable to the beneficiaries for not having a growth component in the portfolio. Diversification is generally regarded as a requirement under the Prudent Investor Act, unless circumstances require otherwise.

One significant change is that this Act allows the trustee to delegate investment management responsibility. For the majority of states that have not adopted a version of the Prudent Investor Act, delegation of investment responsibility by trustees is prohibited. The act also seems to indicate that if the trustee does not have investment management expertise it almost mandates that they do delegate their investment management responsibility. If a trustee delegates its management responsibility properly, it can be relieved of the liability and the liability would transfer to the organization or individual that has taken over the management duties. In order to properly delegate, the trustee must select the investment advisor in a prudent manner and must periodically review the managers performance and the assets held in the trust. The trustee also has a duty to control the costs of delegation.

Reduction in Alaska's Insurance Premium Tax House Bill 490

This new law makes Alaska the preferred jurisdiction to have large life insurance policies written. All states impose a tax on life insurance premiums, which ranges from three-quarters of one percent to three percent. When calculating the premium, the insurance company adds on the applicable state insurance premium tax.

Life insurance is the last true tax shelter. Except for the Roth IRA, it is the only vehicle where you can receive tax-free earnings. Qualified retirement plans, IRAs and annuity contracts only provide income tax deferral because when you withdraw those funds you have to pay an income tax. With the cash value that is built up in a life insurance policy, any imputed gain vanishes at death.

With the advent of variable life insurance policies, where the insured has access to a broad range of investment strategies, including growth portfolios, this tax-free earning feature has gained greater significance. Individuals are now using private placement insurance policies where they may in essence select a specific manager and investment style. With this flexibility, they are investing significant sums in these policies ranging from $1 million to $50 million or more. Alaska has reduced its premium tax for premiums over $100,000 to only 10 basis points or one-tenth of one percent. Therefore, individuals who are purchasing large insurance policies should consider Alaska the premiere jurisdiction. With Alaska's unique trust laws, it is the ideal place to establish an irrevocable life insurance trust.

"Safety Net" Estate Planning Legislation House Bill 275

All too frequently, estate planning documents fail to contain all the provisions necessary to maximize available federal gift, estate, and generation-skipping tax benefits. The documents may have been drafted long ago, and not appropriately updated. Alternatively, the drafter may have omitted necessary tax provisions.

To partially cure this problem, Alaska has enacted a "Safety Net" bill. This legislation supplements wills and trusts in the following areas: marital deduction trusts, funding, the family-owned business deduction, restriction of powers of a trustee-beneficiary, interest rate for pecuniary devises, conveyances of real property to and from trusts, and applicability to revocable trusts as well as to wills.

Trust Modification Rules; Modifying and Terminating Irrevocable Trusts Senate Bill 163

Trust Notification and accounting Rules

The general rules in Alaska are that within 30 days of acceptance of a trust, the trustee must inform all the current beneficiaries of the existence of the trust, and upon request, furnish them with an annual accounting. New legislation now allows a settlor to exempt the trustee from these duties. This exemption may not continue beyond the settlor's lifetime or a judicial determination of the settlor's incapacity.

Flexible Methods for Modifying and Terminating Irrevocable Trusts

The Alaska legislature has enacted flexible methods for the modification and termination of irrevocable trusts. A trustee, settlor, or beneficiary may initiate proceedings to modify or terminate a trust if, because of circumstances not anticipated by the settlor, modification or termination would substantially further the settlor's purposes in creating the trust. A court may also construe or modify the terms of a trust in order to achieve the settlor's tax objectives.

The legislation further provides that despite the settlor's purposes in creating the trust, the trust can nonetheless be modified by the court upon consent of all beneficiaries if the reasons for modifying or terminating the trust outweigh the interest in accomplishing the material purposes of the trust. The inclusion of a spendthrift clause may constitute a material purpose, but is not presumed to be so. This modification provision allows for the possibility of modification due to the changed circumstances of the beneficiaries, despite what might have been a material intention of the settlor in establishing the trust.

This new statute has particular relevancy for perpetual trusts because it provides a technique for future changes of a dispositive plan. Accordingly, this modification authority helps alleviate concern about control by a "dead hand." A virtual representation principle is included.

Conclusion

If you have the need for trust services, the Alaska Trust Company is the place to be. It was formed specifically to concentrate on investment management and trust services, the first independent trust company in our state. We also have the most knowledge and hands-on experience regarding trusts that can be setup under Alaska's special trust legislation. Our services extend beyond those traditionally associated with bank trust departments.

Alaska has always been the place for a new way to look at things. Let Alaska Trust Company show you how our state's new trust laws can help assure the most precious wealth of all – a solid and secure future for you and your loved ones. A New Direction In Estate Planning: North To Alaska

Two goals that often are sought to be achieved in estate planning are estate tax reduction and protection of assets from claims of creditors. Reducing taxes significantly may be a "sum zero" game if the assets are attached by creditors. Similarly, protecting assets from creditors' claims may not accomplish all goals sought unless taxes also are reduced. Fortunately, these two goals are not only compatible, they usually are complementary. That is, the steps to protect assets from claims of creditors may allow tax reduction to occur, as well. On the other hand, a transfer that fails to protect property from claims of the transferor's creditors is likely to fail to reduce taxes because, almost always, if a creditor of the transferor can attach the asset the transfer is regarded as incomplete for gift and estate tax purposes.¹ The Alaska Trust Act (Chapter No. 6, SLA 1997, effective April 2, 1997) offers a new tool in the United States to accomplish the dual goals of asset protection and tax reduction. The Act also effectively repeals the rule against perpetuities for a trust created under Alaska law. This article discusses the dual goals of asset protection and estate tax reduction and how the Alaska Trust Act can be used in the context of estate planning. It also compares some aspects of Alaska trusts with certain offshore trusts.

Alaska recently has enacted legislation similar to laws in certain foreign asset protection jurisdictions. As a consequence, an American in any state can create a trust for his or her own benefit which is protected from creditors provided, among other things, it is not a transfer intended to defraud known creditors. Perhaps of greater importance, Alaska trusts open a new dimension in estate planning. One of this article's co-authors, Jonathan Blattmachr, was the principle draftsman of this new Alaska legislation.

Steps To Reduce Estate Taxation

It seems well accepted that an effective, if not the most effective, estate tax reduction planning step is to make lifetime transfers. Lifetime transfers can avoid gift tax (and, by removing an asset from an estate, can avoid estate tax, as well) in ways that cannot be used at death to avoid estate taxation. However, lifetime transfers are effective for these purposes only if they are "complete" under the federal estate and gift tax rules.² The law appears well established that a transfer is complete for such tax purposes only if it is not (or when it no longer is) subject to the claims of the transferor's creditors.³

Fraudulent Transfers, Etc.

IN GENERAL, "fraudulent conveyances" with respect to creditors whose claims arise either before or after the transfer are transfers (a) that the debtor made with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud his or her creditors or (b) (i) for which the debtor received less than "a reasonably equivalent value" and (ii) after which the debtor had insufficient assets to meet future business needs or to pay debts. A transfer made by a debtor is fraudulent as to a creditor whose claim arose before the transfer if the debtor made the transfer without receiving "reasonably equivalent value" and the debtor was insolvent at the time of or as a result of the transfer.⁴ Proof of actual intent to defraud is not required. Most states have adopted these rules in the form of the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act. However, some states (including New York) still have in effect the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act. (See N.Y. Debtor and Creditor Law Secs. 273-281.) Alaska has adopted neither the Uniform Fraudulent Transfers Act nor the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act. [See Summers v. Hasen, 852 P.2d 1165, 1169 n.5 (Alaska 1993).] Its fraudulent transfer rules are contained in Alaska Statutes (AS) 34.40.010 et seq.

Similar rules are contained under the Bankruptcy Code, and in the case of bankruptcy, fraudulent conveyances may be defined with reference to the Bankruptcy Code or under applicable state law. The Bankruptcy Code permits such transfers to be set aside only if made within one year before filing of the petition, but many states permit reference to a much longer period, especially, in the case of transfers to family members. [See, e.g., FDIC v. Pappadio, 606 F. Supp. 631, 632 (S.D.N.Y. 1985) (under New York law a claim to set aside a fraudulent conveyance is governed by a six year statute of limitations).] Avoided fraudulent conveyances are "brought back" into the debtor's estate, usually for distribution to the debtor's creditors. In addition, some fraudulent conveyances may deprive a debtor of (1) homestead or other property exemptions⁵ and (2) a bankruptcy discharge.

As a general rule, a transfer is found to have been made with an actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors only if it was intended to remove assets from claims of specifically known or anticipated creditors. "If the debtor has particular creditors in mind and is trying to remove his assets from their reach, this would be grounds to deny the [bankruptcy] discharge [on the ground of a fraudulent conveyance]. If the debtor is merely looking to his future well-being, [the conveyance would not be fraudulent and as such] the discharge will be granted."⁷

An example will help illustrate this principle. A property owner makes a gift to a family member (whether outright or in trust) which does not result in the property owner being insolvent or unable to pay her debts as they mature. She has no known or specifically identifiable creditors. Nonetheless, she realizes that a claim against her could arise on account of unforeseen circumstances, such as being involved in a car accident, occurring in the future. This gift should not be regarded as a fraudulent conveyance, despite the fact that she is making it with the general intention to protect the property from claims that could arise against her in the future.

Although the fraudulent conveyance rules apply to creditors in bankruptcy, obviously they also have a broader application. For example, in a number of states a tort claimant is permitted to attack as fraudulent a transfer made after the time of the tort but prior to any judgment.⁸

Interests in Trusts

TWO SETS OF CONTRASTING rules must be considered to determine whether interests in trusts are subject to claims of creditors. First, as a general rule, a beneficial interest in trust that is subject to a restriction on transfer (called a "spendthrift provision") is not subject to the claims of a beneficiary's creditors.⁹ Thus, if the debtor is a beneficiary of a trust established for his or her benefit by another person (such as by a parent) which interest by its terms and/or applicable state law is not assignable, the trust assets should be protected.¹⁰ However, property transferred in trust for the beneficiary may be attached by the creditors of the grantor if the transfer to the trust was a fraudulent conveyance.¹¹

In virtually all states, property may be placed in trust for another and thereby be protected from the claims of most creditors of the beneficiaries (and of the grantor). The degree of "creditor proofing" usually varies depending on whether the trust gives the beneficiary the right to receive all of the income, is for the "support" of the beneficiary and/or restricts alienation of the beneficiary's interests.¹² It appears the maximum protection of trust property from the claims of the beneficiary's creditors may be achieved by placing property in a trust that gives the trustee complete discretion as to whether and when to distribute income and/or principal to the beneficiary or beneficiaries of the trust, and which also imposes spendthrift restrictions. The trustee, having control over distributions probably should not be one of the beneficiaries, both to secure the creditor protection and to avoid inclusion of the property in the estate of a beneficiary for tax purposes (which may be viewed as an additional form of credit protection). The beneficiary, however, may participate as a trustee in investment decisions and may have a non-general power of appointment over all or part of the trust corpus.¹³

Such a trust offers major advantages to the beneficiaries. First, the trust assets should be entirely protected from the claims of most creditors of the beneficiaries, including creditors in bankruptcy and spousal property, and in some cases, even support claims, in the event of divorce or upon death of the beneficiary.¹⁴ In order to maximize the creditor protection, the trustee may be given broad authority not only to distribute or accumulate income and principal, but also to purchase assets for the use of trust beneficiaries. For example, the trustee may be authorized to purchase a home for the use of the beneficiary, thereby preserving that asset in the trust protected from the claims of the beneficiary's creditors. (It seems that this use by a beneficiary should not cause any income to be imputed to the beneficiary.) The purchase of assets "inside" the trust as opposed to distributions also preserves the wealth transfer tax savings that may be achieved through the use of such a trust. Thus, the property owner can confer a substantial benefit on the chosen objects of his or her bounty by transferring during lifetime or bequeathing at death assets to such a "discretionary" trust.¹⁵

As noted above, however, a transfer for less than fair value¹⁶, including a gratuitous transfer in trust for the benefit of another, may be set aside if it constitutes a fraudulent conveyance. For example, a person could not defeat an outstanding liability by transferring while insolvent all of his or her assets into a trust for the benefit of his or her spouse. Thus, in the case of lifetime planning, it is best to have created trusts and make the transfers in advance of any financial difficulties in order to successfully avoid the challenge that such transfers were fraudulent conveyances.¹⁷

The second general rule relates to whether and to the extent of which the grantor of the trust has a beneficial interest in it. As to a trust created for one's own benefit, the "black letter" law is that a transfer in trust for the benefit of the transferor is void as against his or her creditors, whether their claims arise before or after the transfer.¹⁸ In other words, the general rule that has prevailed throughout the United States, at least until the enactment of the Alaska Trust Act¹⁹, has been that the assets in the trust may be claimed by the creditors of the grantor to the extent the grantor is entitled or eligible to receive assets from the trust, even if the transfer to it was not in default of creditors and even though the statute of limitations for a person to make a claim that the transfer to the trust was fraudulent has expired.²⁰ For example, an individual creates a trust in 1970 from which the individual is eligible, but not entitled, in the exercise of discretion of a third party as trustee, to receive distributions. A judgment is rendered against the grantor in 1997 on account of a car accident that occurred in 1996. To the extent the trustee has the capacity to make distributions of trust property to the grantor, the judgment against the grantor could be enforced according to the Restatement (2d) Trusts against the trust assets even though the grantor had no intention of defrauding that creditor, or any other creditor, when the trust was created in 1970. On the other hand, a judgment creditor of the grantor generally may not attach the assets in a trust of which the grantor is neither eligible nor entitled to receive distributions unless the transfer was in default of creditors.

The Tax Rule

THE TREATMENT OF self-settled domestic trusts has been explored in a series of federal tax cases that follow from the creditors' rights analysis. Specifically, if the grantor's creditors can reach the entire corpus of such a trust, the transfer to the trust is regarded as wholly incomplete and no gift tax is due upon creation of the trust. As a corollary, however, the entire trust is included in the creator's estate under Code Sec. 2036(a)(1).

Thus, in *Paolozzi v. Commissioner*²¹, the settlor transferred property to a trust under which the trustees had discretion to pay over the income to her during her lifetime. The Tax Court determined that under Massachusetts law, the settlor's creditors could reach the maximum amount that, under the trust terms, could be paid to the settlor — that is, the entire income interest. Accordingly, the gift was incomplete to the extent of that interest. In *Outwin v. Commissioner*²², also considering Massachusetts law, the Tax Court reached the same result where the trustee could distribute income and principal to the settlor in the trustee's discretion but only with the consent of the settlor's spouse. The spouse had an income interest following the settlor's death, could receive principal in the discretion of the trustee at that time, and had a limited testamentary power of appointment. However, the Tax Court concluded that the spouse's veto power was not sufficient to distinguish the situation from Paolozzi, regardless of the fact that the spouse might be an adverse party for gift-tax purposes.²³

More recently, in *Paxton v. Commissioner*²⁴, the Tax Court held that a trust was included in the settlor's estate where the trustee had discretion to apply income and principal among a class of persons including the settlor; the trustee was the settlor's son, who also had a beneficial interest in the trust. The Tax Court looked to Washington state law, but relied primarily on the Restatement rule, discussed earlier, to support its holding.²⁵

Offshore Trusts

IN THE PAST FEW YEARS, there has been considerable use of trusts created in those foreign jurisdictions that provide greater protection against claims of creditors than is available under American law. A so-called "asset protection trust" allows a grantor to protect assets from his or her creditors without requiring the settlor to relinquish all interest in the assets in the trust. In general, asset protection trusts are trusts established in foreign jurisdictions that have limited the recourse of creditors to trust assets.

The selection of the foreign jurisdiction in which the asset protection trust will be established requires great care because of the existence of the English "Statute of Elizabeth" (precursor to U.S. fraudulent conveyance law, discussed above), which makes it possible to set aside a transfer that is intended to defeat future, but currently unknown, creditors. Some offshore sites have enacted "Statute of Elizabeth override" statutes to circumvent any questions concerning the applicability of the Statute of Elizabeth. Some of the offshore sites that have passed such legislation are the Bahamas, Bermuda, the Cayman Islands, the Cook Islands (which appears to offer particularly strong protection against creditors) and Gibraltar.²⁶ Other concerns are political stability and the availability of adequate banking and other financial services in the chosen jurisdiction.

Asset protection trusts usually are designed so that the settlor, upon creation of the trust, will experience no tax consequences. In almost all cases, an asset protection trust will be a so-called "grantor trust" for federal income tax purposes, with the result that the creator will continue to be taxed on all the trust income in the same manner as if he or she continued to own the trust property outright.²⁷ In addition, the settlor typically retains certain powers or interests sufficient to render the transfer to the trust an incomplete gift, thereby avoiding gift tax and keeping the trust property within the settlor's gross estate for estate tax purposes. For example, in Private Letter Ruling 9536002 (May 12, 1995) (not precedent), the IRS ruled that a transfer to an offshore trust was incomplete because the grantors retained a limited power of appointment over the trust property.

The New Alaska Trust Law

Elimination of the Rule Against Perpetuities. Under the Alaska Trust Law, an interest in a trust will not fail to be valid because it is non-vested if all or part of the income or principal of the trust may be distributed, in the discretion of the trustee, to a person who is living when a trust is created.²⁸ As a practical matter, this means a trust can be of perpetual duration provided the Trustee has discretion to distribute trust income and principal to the beneficiaries, at least one of whom is living when the trust is created. (This might be contrasted with South Dakota law, which provides that a trust may be perpetual if the trustee is authorized to sell the trust assets and with Delaware law which has abolished the rule against perpetuities in its entirety, except with respect to real estate.) Thus, a perpetual trust now can be created under the law of Alaska which imposes no income tax. And if the trust is not a grantor trust (causing the income to be attributed directly to the grantor), state (and local) income tax can be avoided to the extent trust income is not currently distributed to beneficiaries who are tax residents of states (or localities) that impose income tax.

Spentbrift Provisions. Alaska law also was amended expressly to provide that a person who transfers property in trust may direct that the interest of a beneficiary of the trust may not be either voluntarily or involuntarily transferred before payment or delivery of the property to the beneficiary by the trustee. It further provides that if the trust contains such a transfer restriction, the restriction prevents a creditor existing when the trust is created, a subsequent creditor or any other person from seeking to satisfy a claim out of the beneficiary's interest in the trust, subject to four exceptions.

First, if the settlor retains the power to revoke or terminate the trust, his or her creditors may attach the trust property to the extent of the power of revocation or termination. However, a power to revoke or terminate does not include a power to veto distributions from the trust to another beneficiary, the retention of a special testamentary power of appointment, or the right to receive a distribution of income, corpus or both in the discretion of another person, including a trustee, other than the settlor of the trust. The veto power and power of appointment may be retained by the grantor to prevent the transfer to the trust from being complete for federal gift-tax purposes.³¹ By the same token, retention of such powers will cause the assets to be includable in the gross estate of the grantor at death.

Second, creditors of the settlor may also attach property in the trust to the extent that the trust income and principal must be distributed to the grantor.

Third, the transfer is void with respect to creditors if at the time of the transfer to the trust the settlor was in default by 30 or more days in making a payment due under a child support judgment or order.³¹

Fourth, the transfer is subject to attachment by the settlor's creditors if the transfer was intended, in whole or in part, to hinder, delay or defraud creditors under the Alaska fraudulent transfer law. (AS 34.40.010.) However, an action to claim the transfer was fraudulent may not be commenced unless (1) if the claimant was a creditor when the trust was created, the action is brought within the later of four years after the transfer to the trust was made or one year after the trust is or could have been reasonably discovered, or (2) if the claimant becomes a creditor after the transfer, the action is commenced within four years after the transfer to the trust.³²

The foregoing means that if the settlor is not in default by 30 or more days of making a child support payment, the transfer was not intended to defraud creditors and the grantor retains no power to revoke or terminate the trust or the mandatory right to receive income or principal but only retains the right to receive a distribution in the discretion of a trustee, creditors of the grantor cannot reach the assets contained in the Alaska trust. If the grantor retains the power to veto a distribution to other beneficiaries and a special testamentary power of appointment or similar right, the transfer to the trust will not be complete for gift and estate tax purposes even though it is not subject to the claims of the grantor's creditors. On the other hand, if the grantor retains no such power to veto or power of appointment or similar right, the transfer to the trust will be complete for estate and gift tax purposes. Thus, the Act offers flexibility to integrate creditor protection with the grantor's tax and other estate planning objectives.

The Rule for Making the Trust Alaskan

ALTHOUGH FOUR OTHER jurisdictions (Delaware, South Dakota, Idaho and Wisconsin) allow trusts to last perpetually in their jurisdictions, no statutory guidance is provided by their laws as to what connection or nexus is sufficient to cause their state's law to apply to the trust. The Alaska statute, however, provides an explicit rule as to what makes a trust an Alaskan trust for both the purpose of avoiding the rule against perpetuities and the purpose of creating a trust that will not be subject to claims of the settlor's creditors. First, some of the trust assets must be deposited in the state and be administered by a "qualified person." Deposited in Alaska means held in a checking account, time deposit, certificate of deposit, brokerage account, trust company fiduciary account or other similar account located in Alaska. A "qualified person" is an Alaskan domiciliary or an Alaskan trust company or bank. Second, the Alaskan trustee's duties must at least include an obligation to maintain records for the trust (on an exclusive or nonexclusive basis with other trustees) and the obligation to prepare or arrange for the preparation of income tax returns that must be filed by the trust (again on an exclusive basis or on a nonexclusive basis with other trustees). Third, part of the administration must occur in the state.

Some Contrasts to Foreign Asset Protection Trusts

ALTHOUGH AN AMERICAN now is able to create an Alaskan trust of which he or she is a discretionary beneficiary which will be protected from the claims of his or her creditors, an Alaska trust will not provide the same level of practical protection from claims of creditors which may be afforded to a trust created in one of the offshore jurisdictions, such as the Cook Islands or the Bahamas. The laws of such offshore jurisdictions typically have extremely short statutes of limitations before the period to commence an action claiming the transfer to the trust was fraudulent runs which, as a practical matter, cannot be met by a creditor especially if the trust is created and funded sufficiently in advance of the entry of a final judgment against the debtor in an American court.³³ Second, the jurisdiction may prohibit the enforcement of American judgments. That means the action must be re-tried in the offshore jurisdiction. As a practical matter, that may well be impossible. Because Alaska is one of the American states, its courts will be required to give full faith and credit to any judgment of a sister state although, as indicated, a judgment against the debtor will not be enforceable against the Alaska trust unless there is a finding that the transfer to the trust was a fraudulent transfer or some other reason for voiding the trust, such as the grantor having been in default by 30 or more days in child support payments at the time the trust was created. Third, at least some of these offshore jurisdictions explicitly exclude some claimants from contending a transfer was fraudulent. For instance, in some cases, a claim founded on a domestic right (such as an equitable distribution claim to property in the event of a divorce) cannot be brought against a trust situated in that jurisdiction.

In some ways, however, a foreign asset protection trust may be less desirable than an Alaska trust. Obviously, there is greater political risk in these offshore jurisdictions than there is in the United States. In addition, new "anti-foreign trust" provisions added to the Internal Revenue Code (see, e.g., Code Sec. 6048) will not apply to an Alaska trust. Also, it may be that a court would be more prone to view the creation of a foreign asset protection trust as an attempt to remove or secrete assets than it would the creation of an Alaska trust. In a recent bankruptcy court case, the court expressed considerable hostility to the creation of an offshore trust and ultimately applied New York law to determine whether the debtor had retained a property interest in the trust (which was established under Jersey law) for purposes of determining whether he should be denied a discharge in bankruptcy.³⁴ It appears, however, that this case may have turned on the rather extraordinary facts, which the court apparently perceived as involving a course of deception and concealment of assets by the debtor.

Options Under the Alaska Trust Act

A SIGNIFICANT OBSTACLE to the making of lifetime transfers is that the property owner is then cut off from the property. For example, some persons are willing to make a gift, and anticipate that they will be comfortable without the gifted asset and/or the income therefrom under the most likely scenarios, but are concerned about a "disaster" situation in which they might need access to the funds. They may not be at all concerned about protecting assets from creditors. In such a case, an offshore trust may be appropriate to consider. Precisely because the normal U.S. rule permitting creditors to reach the trust does not apply, the fact that the grantor is a permissible beneficiary of trust income and/or principal in the discretion of an independent trustee should not render the gift incomplete and includable in the estate under Code Sec. 2036 or 2038. Thus, the trust can be structured so that the transfer is a completed gift upon creation.³⁵ Gift tax would be paid (or unified credit applied). In that way, the "normal" estate planning benefits of removing gifted assets and the appreciation thereon from the estate are achieved. However, the Trustee can give the settlor access to the trust assets.

These same opportunities are now available to Americans using Alaska trusts. For example, an individual could create a so-called "Crummey trust"³⁶ in Alaska for the benefit of himself or herself as well as members of his or her family and protect transfers to the trust from gift tax using annual exclusions with respect to the other family members. For instance, a woman who is married and has two children could transfer up to $50,000 under the protection of the annual exclusion under Code Sec. 2503(c) granting her husband and each child the right, respectively, to withdraw $10,000 and $20,000 from the trust. The transfers to such a trust created under Alaska law would be complete and should be excludable from the grantor's estate at death even though the grantor is eligible, although not entitled, to receive distributions from the trust in the discretion of a trustee other than himself or herself. Of course, the beneficiaries may exercise the powers of withdrawal so that there is no property left in the trust from which the grantor could benefit. In addition, to the extent that the powers of withdrawal have not lapsed tax-free pursuant to Code Sec. 2514(e) and 2041(b)(2), the property subject to the powers of withdrawal will be includable under Code Sec. 2041(a) in the gross estates of the power-holders.

An individual also could create an Alaska trust and transfer the amount of his or her remaining gift tax exemption equivalent (which can be as great as $600,000) and remain a beneficiary eligible to receive distributions in the discretion of a trustee other than himself or herself and avoid having the property includable in his or her estate. This provides an opportunity to remove the income and appreciation earned on the property during the balance of his or her lifetime from his or her gross estate even though the grantor has retained the possibility of receiving assets back in the discretion of the trustee if appropriate circumstances arise. Similarly, an individual could make a transfer, which is complete for estate and gift tax purposes, to an Alaska trust, of which he or she is eligible to receive distributions, equal to his or her remaining GST exemption under Code Sec. 2631(a) which can be as great $1 million. This would allow the amount protected from generation-skipping transfer tax to increase by post-transfer income and appreciation during the balance of the transferor's lifetime even though the grantor is an eligible beneficiary of the trust.

The entitlement to payments from a grantor retained annuity trust (GRAT) described in Code Sec. 2702(b)(1) or grantor retained unitrust (GRUT) described in Code Sec. 2702(b)(2) must terminate prior to the death of the grantor or the trust assets will be includable, in whole or in part, in the grantor's estate.³⁷ However, if the GRAT or GRUT is created under Alaska law, the property may continue in trust after the grantor's annuity or uni-trust term ends, and the grantor thereafter could be eligible to receive distributions from the trust without causing the trust to be includable in his or her estate, provided the grantor survives the annuity or unitrust term.

Conclusions

THE DUAL GOALS OF asset protection and reduction in taxation are often compatible and complementary. The new Alaska Trust Act provides an opportunity for Americans in all states to create trusts in Alaska which may help achieve both goals. Although not providing all of the practical protection that may be available through similar trusts created in offshore jurisdictions, many Americans will prefer for their assets to remain in the United States. For them, Alaska trusts may be considered. Although not discussed in detail in this article, making the trust perpetual may offer additional financial, tax and estate planning benefits. ♦

19. Although apparently not widely known, a rule somewhat similar to that in Alaska is contained in Missouri Revised Statute Sec. 456.080.
20. However, it seems that not every retained interest will trigger the application of this rule. For example, a power to direct investments probably is not attachable by the grantor's creditors. A related issue is whether creditors can reach the assets of a trust over which the settlor retained a power of revocation (or a general power of appointment), and whether creditors can reach the assets of such a trust to satisfy the debts of the settlor/decedent. It appears that the trend is to allow assets in such a trust to be used to satisfy the debts of the settlor/decedent and toward extending the recourse of creditors (including creditors of a decedent) against such trusts, in some cases by statute. See, e.g., Cal. Prob. Code Ann. Secs. 18200 and 18201; State Street Bank & Trust Co. v. Reiser, 389 N.E.2d 768 (Mass. App. 1979).

However, the conclusion reached by the Federal courts in these cases may not be the same as those reached by state courts. Compare Vanderbilt Credit Corp. v. Chase Manhattan Bank, N.A., 100 AD2d 544, 473 NYS 2d 242 (2d Dep't 1984) with Herzog v. Comm'r, supra.
26. In general, it appears that asset protection trusts will be effective only against future, but currently unknown, creditors. The settlor, generally, cannot be insolvent at the time the trust is created or become insolvent as a result of the creation of the trust.
27. See Code Sec. 677(a) (a trust is a grantor trust if, among other situations, the trustee, without the consent of an "adverse party", can distribute the trust assets to the grantor.) Trusts & Estates 29 (May 1990) explaining how to structure such a trust to hold insurance policies on the grantor's life. Crumme trusts can hold other assets as well. It seems that the life insurance proceeds should not be includable in the grantor's estate under Code Sec. 2042 if the grantor is merely an eligible beneficiary of the trust which is not subject to the claims of his or her creditors, because the incidents of ownership (which is the "touchstone" for application of Code Sec. 2042) held by a trust are not automatically attributed to the beneficiary whose life is insured. Estate Planning on America's Last Frontier: Alaska Trusts, Limited Partnerships, and LLCs

by Jonathan G. Blattmachr, New York, New York*
George E. Goerig, Jr., Anchorage, Alaska; and
Richard S. Thwaites, Jr., Anchorage, Alaska

Two 1997 statutory changes to Alaska law provide new estate planning opportunities for clients throughout the country, as well as for some outside the United States. The Alaska Trust Act, Chapter No. 6, SLA 1997, which became effective in April, 1997, allows individuals to create "self-settled" trusts under Alaska law that are immunized under that state's laws from claims of the individual's creditors. Another act amended Alaska law relating to limited partnerships and limited liability companies formed in that state. Chapter No. 78, SLA 1997. This second change was designed to simplify the formation and operation of these entities as permitted under the new Treasury Department "check the box" regulations. These two statutory changes provide enhanced opportunities in the United States for asset protection. Perhaps of greater interest to Fellows, the two acts provide new opportunities in estate planning. Although using either act alone may be effective, estate planning may be more enhanced in many cases by using a combination of Alaska trusts and Alaska limited partnerships or limited liability companies.

Alaska Trusts

The principal changes made by the Alaska Trust Act are (1) effectively to repeal the rule against perpetuities for Alaska trusts, and (2) to permit an individual to create an Alaska trust of which he or she is an eligible beneficiary yet (unlike the law that prevails in virtually all other American states) which will not be subject to the claims of his or her creditors. This latter change not only provides asset protection, but also allows lifetime transfers to be complete for federal gift and estate tax purposes in ways not previously available under American law.¹

As a general matter, to the extent that a creditor can reach assets transferred by an individual to a trust, those transfers will not constitute completed gifts and will be includable in the gross estate of the transferor. However, it seems certain that if the trust is formed in "a state where the grantor's creditors cannot reach the trust assets, then the gift is complete for federal gift tax purposes...." Rev. Rul. 76-103, 1976-1 C.B. 293.

See also Rev. Rul. 77-378, 1977-2 C.B. 347; Estate of German v. U.S., 7 Ct. Cl. 641 (1985); Estate of Uhl v. Commissioner, 241 F.2d 867 (7th Cir. 1957); Estate of Wells v. Commissioner, T.C. Memo 1951-574. Both Rev. Rul. 76-103 and Rev. Rul. 77-378 specifically deal with completed gifts, and not with estate exclusion. These rulings make clear that if, under the law where the trust is created, creditors cannot reach the property transferred, the transfer is entirely complete for gift tax purposes.² If the grantor has retained an interest, as noted above, creditors can reach that interest and presumably the transfer would not be entirely complete. Although it is theoretically possible for a transfer to be entirely subject to gift tax (even though partially an incomplete gift) and still be included in the gross estate of the transferor, such circumstances are rare. However, the rulings state that the transfer is entirely complete for gift tax purposes, not just that it is entirely subject to gift tax. It is thus reasonable to conclude that the Internal Revenue Service has determined that no interest was retained by the transferor because if the grantor had retained an interest, the transfer would be partly incomplete.³

In contrast to the law of most American states, many jurisdictions outside the United States provide that the interest of a grantor in a trust he or she created is not subject to the claims of his or her creditors unless the transfer to the trust was a fraudulent transfer under that jurisdiction's rules. As a consequence, under U.S. law transfers to such a foreign trust can be complete for U.S. estate and gift tax purposes, even though the grantor is a beneficiary of the trust. Indeed, the German, Uhl, and Wells cases cited above so hold. In addition, the IRS has explicitly so ruled in private letter rulings. For instance, in PLR 9332006,⁴ the Service held that a transfer to an offshore trust of which the grantor and members of the grantor's family were eligible as beneficiaries in the discretion of a trustee (who was a person other than the grantor) was a completed gift and would not be in the grantor's gross estate for federal estate tax purposes because, under the law governing the trust, creditors of the grantor could not attach the trust assets. See also PLR 8037116. With the Alaska Trust Act, such a tax-advantaged trust can now be created under the law of Alaska.

Self-Settled Estate Planning Trusts

The Alaska Act opens a new dimension in estate planning for Americans. They can now make lifetime transfers, which are complete for federal gift and estate tax purposes, to an Alaska trust of which the grantor is eligible, but not entitled, to receive distributions in the discretion of a trustee (other than himself or herself).³ Such self-settled Alaska trusts could be used for virtually all lifetime estate planning transfers.

For instance, an individual may make transfers under the protection of the Internal Revenue Code §2503(b) gift tax annual exclusion by transferring property to an annual exclusion or so-called "Crummey" trust, which provides that certain individuals (such as a transferor's spouse, descendants, and perhaps others, but not the grantor) can withdraw property transferred to the trust up to the amount of annual exclusions not used elsewhere. With an Alaska trust, the grantor may remain eligible to receive distributions of trust property in the discretion of a trustee other than the grantor without causing the trust assets to be includable in his or her estate. From an estate planning perspective, the grantor will want distributions to him or her to be minimized, because such distributions diminish the estate tax planning benefits of having made completed transfers to the trust that otherwise would be excludable from his or her estate.

If an agreement that the grantor would receive the income from or the use of the assets held by the trust may be inferred from the circumstances, the assets almost certainly will be includable in the grantor's estate, under Code §2036(a)(1), even when coupled with the finding that the grantor had no legal entitlement to such income or use. See, e.g., Estate of Skinner v. U.S., 197 F. Supp. 726 (E.D. Pa. 1961), aff'd, 316 F.2d 517 (3rd Cir. 1963). On the other hand, only occasional use of trust assets or occasional receipt of trust income should avoid any such inference. See, e.g., Estate of Wells v. Commissioner, supra. Actual retention of the property or the income (that is, the failure actually to transfer the property or the income to another) may also result in estate tax inclusion. See, e.g., Lee v. United States, 86-1 U.S.T.C. ¶ 13,649 (CCH)(W.D. Ky. 1986).

Annual Exclusion Trusts

Not infrequently, a Crummey trust will acquire one or more life insurance contracts on the life of the grantor or on the lives of the grantor and the grantor's spouse. Ownership of the policies by the trust is an attempt to keep the proceeds paid at death from inclusion in the estate(s) of the insured(s). If the insured holds no "incident of ownership" in the policy at or within three years of death, and if the proceeds are not paid to the estate of the insured, the proceeds should not be included in the insured's gross estate. Code §2035, 2042.

If the terms of an annual exclusion (or another type) Alaska trust that acquires a cash value life insurance contract provide merely that the trustee may, in the exercise of its discretion, distribute trust assets to the grantor, the incidents of ownership in the contract should not be attributed to the insured grantor so as to cause the proceeds to be includable in his or her estate. See, e.g., PLR 9434028 (incidents of ownership held by a trust are not automatically attributed to the beneficiary whose life is insured if the beneficiary is not a trustee).

This provides an opportunity for the grantor, through the exercise of discretion of a trustee other than himself or herself, to be eligible to receive cash value in the policy without causing the proceeds paid at death to be includable in his or her estate.

Unified Credit, GST Exemption, and Other Trusts

One of the most effective lifetime planning techniques is to transfer as early as possible in life the amount protected from gift tax by reason of the unified credit allowable under Code Sec. 2010 or by reason of the amount of GST exemption under Code Sec. 2631. Use of the unified credit (which under the Taxpayer Relief Act of 1997 will increase commencing in 1998 and continuing through 2006) early in life can result in a very large amount being excludable from the transferor's estate. The early use of the $1 million GST exemption (which under the Taxpayer Relief Act of 1997 is indexed for inflation) can be even more effective from an estate planning perspective. In the long run, because the GST exemption can be used to avoid wealth transfer tax on property as it passes from one generation to the next without limit, the use of the GST exemption to avoid tax may be even more important than use of the unified credit. (As noted earlier, an Alaska trust can be structured so it can last perpetually. Also, Alaska has no income tax.)

The remainder following the grantor's retained interest term in a grantor retained annuity trust (GRAT), grantor retained unitrust (GRUT), or grantor retained income trust (GRIT), including a qualified personal residence trust, can pass outright to others or remain in trust. In most jurisdictions in the United States, the property will continue to be includable in the grantor's estate if the grantor is eligible to receive continuing distributions in the discretion of a trustee after the grantor's entitlement to payments ceases, because the grantor's creditors will be able to attach the trust assets. See Rev. Rul. 77-378, supra. However, if the GRAT, GRUT, or GRIT is an Alaska trust, the property should not be includable in the grantor's estate after the annuity, unitrust, income, or use term ends, even if the grantor remains eligible to receive distribution from the continuing trust for the balance of his or her lifetime in the discretion of the trustee other than the grantor.

If the Alaska trust holds real property outside of that state, it is possible that a court would apply the spendthrift trust rule of the state where the property is situated rather than the spendthrift trust rule of Alaska. If the real estate is located in a state where spendthrift trust provisions are not effective in protecting the grantor's interest in the trust from claims of his or her creditors, it may be appropriate to permit the trustee to distribute trust property to the grantor only if the real property outside of the state of Alaska is no longer held in the trust (e.g., the non-Alaska real estate has been sold by the trustee or distributed to other beneficiaries).

In most states, the grantor could not become a beneficiary to whom the trustee could distribute assets from any continuing trust after the charitable term of a charitable lead trust without causing the property to be includable in the grantor's estate due to the right of the grantor's creditors to attach the trust assets. See Rev. Rul. 77-378. If the charitable lead trust is created under Alaska law, however, the grantor may remain eligible to receive distributions from the continuing trust after the charitable term ends without causing the property to be includable in his or her estate. Estate of German v. U.S., supra, Estate of Wells v. Commissioner, supra, Estate of Uhl v. Commissioner, supra.

Use of Alaska Trusts by Non-U.S. Persons

Alaska trusts may also be effective vehicles for use by non-U.S. persons. For example, many individuals who are neither U.S. citizens nor U.S. domiciliaries ("foreigners") have American relatives or friends whom they wish to benefit. Except for U.S. real estate and tangible personal property, a foreigner may make lifetime gifts to or in trust for Americans without the imposition of U.S. gift tax. Similarly, a foreigner may make transfers at death to or in trust for Americans without the imposition of U.S. estate tax, except to the extent the transfer consists of U.S. real estate or tangibles, stock in U.S. corporations, and certain indebtedness of U.S. obligors. In addition to avoiding U.S. gift and estate tax, these transfers may be made free of generation-skipping transfer tax. Treas. Reg. §26.2663-2(b). A foreigner can thus transfer to or place in trust for Americans unlimited amounts of non-U.S. assets which will never be subject to U.S. wealth transfer tax. Such an opportunity suggests consideration of the creation of a very long-term or perpetual trust by a foreigner for American relatives or friends whom the foreigner wishes to benefit.

Six American states allow trusts to last perpetually: Alaska, Delaware, Idaho, South Dakota, and Wisconsin. Alaska may be the most preferable of all for several reasons. First, if the foreigner wishes, he or she could remain a beneficiary of an Alaska trust to whom the trustee could make distributions without causing the trust to be includable in his or her estate for federal estate tax purposes. This could be very important due to the major distinction in the taxation of foreigners for gift tax purposes on the one hand, and estate tax purposes on the other. Lifetime gifts by foreigners of U.S. securities are not subject to U.S. gift tax but those same securities, as a general rule, are subject to U.S. estate tax if includable in the foreigner's estate at death. Hence, a foreigner could transfer U.S. stock to an Alaska Trust free of U.S. tax, remain an eligible beneficiary for life and yet avoid U.S. estate tax on the trust assets at death. Also, only Alaska has a statutory rule of what makes a trust be treated as sited there: (i) there must be an Alaska trustee whose duties consist at least of maintaining a set of trust records and of preparing or arranging for the preparation of any trust tax returns, (ii) part of the trust assets must be maintained in Alaska, such as by maintenance of a bank or brokerage account there, and (iii) some part of the administration must occur in Alaska, such as holding some trustee meetings there or effecting some "trades" there.

In fact, even if a foreigner does not wish to benefit Americans but simply wants to create a trust for his or her own benefit that is protected from claims of his or her creditors, an Alaska trust may be preferable to one created in an "offshore" jurisdiction even if that jurisdiction provides for the trust assets to be protected from claims of the grantor's creditors. For several reasons, many foreigners acquire or maintain assets in the United States. Holding those assets through an Alaska trust may well provide an additional level of protection for them.

Alaska Limited Partnerships and Limited Liability Companies

Limited partnerships and limited liability companies have become a mainstay in business and personal planning. The adoption by the Treasury Department of the so-called "check the box" regulations effective January 1, 1997, vastly simplified the formation and administration of such entities. See Treas. Reg. §301.7701-1, 2, 3. Prior to the adoption of those regulations, four complex factors (known as "corporate characteristics factors") had to be analyzed to determine whether an entity other than a corporation would be taxed as a corporation or as a partnership. It is generally preferable for an entity to be taxed as a partnership rather than a corporation because profits are taxed once, losses are passed through to the owners of the entity, and adjustments to basis are usually more favorable. See, e.g.,

IRC § 754. Moreover, entities treated as partnerships for income tax purposes can be much more flexible in formation, operation and ownership than so-called S corporations. Subject to certain exceptions (such as for domestic (U.S.) corporations), an entity may elect on its first tax return filed after 1997 to be treated as a partnership (or, alternatively, as a corporation) for federal income tax purposes.

Entities treated as partnerships, in certain circumstances, can be used to enhance the protection of assets from claims of creditors. First, "buy-out" provisions contained in a partnership agreement (or other document) sometimes provide other owners or the entity itself the right to buy partnership interests (or comparable interests in a LLC) from a partner who becomes bankrupt. Although these "triggered by bankruptcy" provisions sometimes are not enforceable, they may be enforceable in certain other cases. In any event, their mere existence may chill a creditor from attempting to attach a partnership interest. Second, as a general matter, any creditor who does succeed to the economic interest of the bankrupt partner but does not become a partner (because, for example, state law or the partnership agreement so provides) nonetheless may be taxed apparently on a pro rata portion of the income, even if no distributions are made. See Rev. Rul. 77-137, 1977-1 C.B. 178. This may make the attached interest in the partnership a liability in the hands of the creditor (because it may generate an income tax liability without a concomitant distribution of cash or other assets,) which may cause the creditor to agree to disgorge the asset at a lower price or possibly to abandon it. Under the law of virtually all jurisdictions, however, a court having jurisdiction over the partnership may order its liquidation for any "equitable" reason. See, e.g., 8A N.Y. Cons. Law §121-802. In addition, under those state laws that otherwise permit a partner to demand to be bought out upon six month's notice (which is the default rule contained in the Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act), a creditor might convince a court that a creditor should be able to exercise that power to be liquidated out.

Under the new Alaska law, a court will be able to order the dissolution of a partnership or limited liability company only if it determines that it is impossible for the enterprise to continue to operate. Therefore, the court will be unable to order a liquidation merely for an "equitable" reason. In addition, unlike the default rules under most state laws, an Alaska limited partnership or limited liability company does not go out of existence upon the death of a general partner of a limited partnership or of a member of an LLC.

Limited partnerships and LLCs are widely used for estate planning. They can accomplish many goals, including providing a family unit with an opportunity to shift income more efficiently, share in lower brokerage and investment advisory fees, and centralize and harmonize the management of assets and investment decisions. Use of these entities changes the nature of what is owned. In other words, family members no longer own an interest in the assets owned by the partnership or LLC, but rather own interests in the partnership or LLC. Because the nature of the family's interest changes, so does its value. Often, the value is reduced. Lower value may mean lower gift, estate, or generation-skipping transfer tax when an interest is transferred. It can also mean a smaller "step-up" in income tax basis at death. See IRC §1014.

The Internal Revenue Service has shown a strong and growing inclination to disregard the existence of the partnership (or LLC) when disregarding its existence would result in a larger value for estate, gift, or generation-skipping transfer tax purposes, and thus, higher taxes. The Service's attack, to date, has revolved around four primary arguments. See, generally, Aucutt, "More on Deathbed FLPs," 9 Probate Practice Report 1 (August 1997), for a discussion of some of these arguments.

First, the IRS has contended that the taxpayer may be making a gift upon formation of the entity to other equity owners (e.g., partners) if the taxpayer receives back an interest worth less than what he or she contributed. The argument may not be sound. For example, upon termination any such "gift" to the other partners may be offset by a "gift" back from the others. If so, any transfer upon formation must be for full consideration and cannot be a gift. At least in some cases, the courts have not completely dismissed the argument that a gift can be made upon formation, thus this argument should not be disregarded in forming a limited partnership or LLC. Cf. Estate of Trenchard v. Commissioner, T.C. Memo 1995-232. See, also, Horn, "Limited Partnerships: Some Thoughts and Theories about Key Issues," 23 ACTEC Notes 37 (Summer 1997).

Second, the IRS has contended that the existence of the partnership should not be respected in those cases where the partnership was formed only for tax reduction reasons, at least if its existence has no other substantial economic impact. It appears more likely that there will have been a smaller non-tax impact if a transfer of partnership units occurs immediately after the formation of the entity. See, e.g., National Office Technical Advice Memorandum (NOTAM) 9719006 (formation of partnership by individual who was terminally ill and died two days after partnership was formed). See, also, NOTAM 9723009 (formation 54 days before death), and NOTAM 9725002 (formation two months before death).

Third, the Internal Revenue Service also has recently contended that the existence of the partnership should be ignored because it constitutes a restriction on the use of the assets of the partnership. See, e.g., NOTAM 9719006. IRC §2703 provides that, in certain circumstances, an option, agreement, or other right to acquire or use property at a price less than fair market value or any restriction on the right to sell or use the property is ignored for estate, gift, and generation-skipping transfer tax valuation purposes unless it is established by the taxpayer that the option, etc., is comparable to similar ones found in arms' length transactions.

Fourth, the IRS has attempted to attack partnership discounts under IRC §2704(b), on the basis that the partnership agreement (or LLC operating agreement) imposes one or more applicable restrictions. See, e.g., NOTAM 9724703 (provision of partnership agreement that eliminates the right under Massachusetts law of a limited partner to withdraw on six months' notice is disregarded). A restriction is disregarded for valuation purposes under Code Sec. 2704(b) only if the restriction will expire or if the family acting together without non-family members can remove it. It is understood that the Internal Revenue Service may contend that any applicable restriction in a partnership that contains a fixed term (such as terminating in the year 2039) means that the applicable restriction will expire by the terms of the partnership when the term of the partnership ends, and, therefore, any such restriction should be disregarded for valuation purposes. The Internal Revenue Service may also contend that the family can remove any applicable restriction (which under Treas. Reg. §25.2704-2(b) is to be determined under default state law, and not as limited by the terms of the partnership agreement) even in a circumstance where a non-family member (such as a niece or nephew) is also a partner. Under the partnership laws of many states, certain actions may not require unanimous consent of all the partners (unless the partnership agreement expressly so provides).

Alaska law was amended not only to permit simpler formation of limited partnerships and LLCs pursuant to the check-the-box regulations and to use them more effectively for asset protection and other non-tax reasons, but also to assist a taxpayer in resisting such IRS attacks on valuation of interests in partnerships and LLCs. First, Alaska law is now clear that a single member (one owner) LLC may be formed. Forming a limited partnership with only one real owner of equity (e.g., the same person owns all limited partnership interests and all of the stock of a corporation which owns a relatively small general partnership interest) or a single member LLC should avoid any argument by the Internal Revenue Service that a gift is made upon formation from one owner to another. (If a husband and wife, both of whom are United States residents, are the only partners or members, there also is no taxable gift because any gift from one to the other should qualify for the gift tax marital deduction under IRC §2523, barring some provision that would make it a so-called "terminable interest.") The Internal Revenue Service has essentially conceded that a subsequent gift of an interest even in a wholly owned enterprise is to be valued by looking at the interest transferred in isolation. Rev. Rul. 93-12, 1993-1 C.B. 202. Hence, the "depletion of the value of the estate" argument, which is essentially what the gift upon formation contention is, should not arise if the entity is formed by a single owner who thereafter makes gifts to others of interests in the entity.

One of the most effective ways to avoid the IRS contention that the partnership was formed only for tax reduction reasons and without any other substantial economic or other impact is to operate the partnership or LLC for substantial period of time prior to making gifts or sales of the units (and forming it as long before death as practicable if the interests in it will be held until then). As mentioned above, limited partnerships and limited liability companies often provide significant non-tax benefits, such as providing for asset protection and lower brokerage or investment advisory fees through the aggregation of wealth. By making gifts of relatively small interests in the enterprise, the others who receive these transfers can participate in such non-tax benefits attributable to the structure of the enterprise.

The IRS argument that the existence of the partnership should be ignored under IRC §2703 appears flawed. It is based on the Code section, regulations promulgated thereunder, and its legislative history, which indicate that the section applies only with respect to the property which is the subject of the gift or transfer at death. In the case of gifts or transfers at death of partnership interests, it is those interests (not the underlying partnerships assets) that must be restricted for the section to apply. As mentioned, the section does not apply where the taxpayer establishes that unrelated third parties have entered into similar arrangements. Presumably hundreds of such entities will be created under Alaska law, a majority of which probably will be created by unrelated third parties. In many cases, these agreements will contain no provisions other than those provided under default state law. This may help establish that any family partnership agreement or limited liability company, at least to the extent that the governing agreement does not provide additional restrictions, is the same as that entered into by unrelated third parties.

The new Alaska law should go far in combatting the IRS arguments under §2704(b). First, as a matter of default state law, Alaska limited partnerships and limited liability companies last indefinitely (just as corporations do). In addition, as a matter of default Alaska law, the terms of a partnership agreement (or governing documents of a limited liability company) can only be changed with the unanimous of all partners (or members of an LLC). Hence, if there is any partner who is not a family member (such as a niece or nephew), the family will not be able to remove the restriction and, accordingly, it should not constitute an applicable restriction the existence of which may be disregarded under IRC §2704(b).

Alaska has also eliminated any right of a limited partner or LLC member to demand to be bought out on six months' notice. In fact, under default state law, a partner or member is entitled to distributions only as provided in the governing documents. Moreover, unlike the default rules under the law of virtually all the other states, neither a limited partnership nor a limited liability company is dissolved under Alaska law upon the death of any general partner or member. Rather, a limited liability company continues for as long as there is one member. A limited partnership continues in existence as long as there is another general partner, or if there is none, it dissolves only if a majority-in-interest of the remaining partners fail to elect a new general partner within 90 days.

New Delaware Asset Protection Trust Legislation

Effective July 1, 1997, Delaware enacted a new law similar to and intended to produce the same estate planning and asset protection benefits that the Alaska Trust Act provides. The official synopsis of the new Delaware law states that the purpose of the Act is to facilitate the establishment of trusts in Delaware and is intended to be like the Alaska Trust Act. In fact, much of the language in the Delaware law is identical to the Alaska law.⁶

Unfortunately, it appears that the Delaware law will provide less asset protection than the Alaska law will. Perhaps of much greater significance, it may not be possible for a gift to a self-settled trust formed under Delaware law, as enacted, to be complete for federal tax purposes. See Dela. Stat. Ann. §357 Subsection §3573(a) appears to provide that the trust is permanently available to discharge the grantor obligation to pay alimony, child support, and proper settlement awards even if the obligation arises after the transfer to the trust occurs. As indicated above, the transfer is incomplete for Federal estate and gift tax purposes to the extent the grantor can relegate the grantor's creditors to the trust. Here, because the potential use of trust assets is limited and probably ascertainable, it seems the transfer might be only partially incomplete (i.e., to the extent potential use of trust assets for child support, etc. is ascertainable). See Treas. Reg. §20.2036-1(a)(ii).

Probably most troublesome is §3573(b), under which the grantor can certify in writing to any creditor (including apparently someone who becomes a creditor after the trust has been created) that the trust assets are available to satisfy the creditor's claim. That certification seems to make the trust assets available to that creditor. This virtually assures that the gift to the trust is incomplete, because the grantor can relegate his or her future creditors to the trust assets. This power of relegation is sufficient to render the gift incomplete. Rev. Rul. 77-378, supra.

Third, under §3573(c) the trust assets are permanently available to claimants who have suffered personal injury, death, or property damage that occurs prior to the transfer to the trust. It appears quite certain that these claimants continue for all time to have access to the property in the Delaware trust to satisfy their claims, even if the transfer to the trust was not a fraudulent conveyance. It seems that transfers to the Delaware trust are incomplete to the extent of any such pre-transfer claims, under Dela. Stat. Ann. §3573(c).

Nonetheless, supporters of the new Delaware trust act are likely to seek to have these potential problems with the legislation cured early in that state's 1998 legislative session. With certain changes, Delaware law will provide the same estate planning benefits currently available under Alaska law.

Notes

¹ The extent of asset protection is discussed in more detail in Hompesch, Rothschild and Blattmachr. "Does the New Alaska Trusts Act Provide an Alternative to the Foreign Trust?" The Journal of Asset Protection, 9 (July-August, 1997).

² For example, Rev. Rul. 77-378 states, in part:

There would be no doubt of his nonliability for gift tax upon the value of the income if he had reserved to himself the absolute right to the income for his life. But he made no such reservation. He transferred the entire property. Whether he would enjoy any of its income depended entirely on the trustee, who, in his uncontrolled discretion, could deprive him of it completely. It was only by virtue of the trustee's direction, which on this record must be regarded as entirely voluntary, that the donor received any of the income; and this direction might be terminated whenever the trustee deemed it proper that the wife should receive the income. Such a hope of passive expectancy is not a right. It is not enough to lessen the value of the property transferred.... Whether the grantor enjoy any of the trust's assets is dependent entirely on the uncontrolled discretion of the trustee. Such a hope or passive expectancy does not lessen the value of the property transferred.... Rev. Rul. 62-13 is hereby clarified to remove any implication an entirely voluntary power held by a trustee to distribute all of the trust's assets to the grantor is sufficient to render a gift incomplete either in whole or in part (emphasis added).

Section 2036(a)(1) requires that the decedent retain either 'the right to the principal or the right to the income or enjoyment' or 'the right to the income.' If he has the right to income, the 'income' phrase would not support inclusion under Section 2036. Perhaps it may be said he has the right to 'enjoyment.' However, if some meaning is to be accorded to the word 'retained,' some showing of an arrangement, more than the fact that income was paid to the decedent, should be shown. Since such transfers are treated as complete when they are made for gift tax purposes there is even less reason for the imposition of estate tax liability under Section 2036."

Stephens et al., Federal Estate and Gift Taxation, § 20.36(c) (footnote numbers and footnotes, other than a portion omitted).

Neither a private letter ruling nor a national office technical advice memorandum may be cited or used as precedent. IRC § 6110(j)(3). However, they often are indicative of the Internal Revenue Service's position.

¹ There are four exceptions (or limitations) to the new Alaska spendthrift rule: (i) to the extent the transfer is a fraudulent conveyance, (ii) to the extent that the grantor is in default by 30 or more days in child support, (iii) to the extent that the grantor retains the right to distributions, or (iv) to the extent that the grantor retains a power to revoke. A power to revoke does not include a power to veto distributions to others or to exercise a testamentary special power of appointment. These two powers (i.e., to veto or exercise a testamentary special power) can be used to prevent the transfer to the trust from being a completed gift, but the retention of either power will cause inclusion in the grantor's estate for federal estate tax purposes.

President's Message

My first President's Message, appearing in the Summer, 1997, issue of ACTEC Notes, signalled my long-held belief that the most important issue that confronts trusts and estates lawyers, and the most significant issue that I can address and can induce the College to address, is an economic and professional malaise that befalls the legal specialty in which we practice. I devote this President's Message to revisiting the theme.

As I view the essentials and state them directly, the issue is nothing less than whether our work is sufficiently valuable to generate the fees that will enable us to continue to perform our work in the manner in which we are prepared and inclined and in which our professional standards require. The economic and professional standards that I see at the margins of the market are not cause for encouragement.

The recent and vast increase in the number of lawyers arguably is having the greatest impact upon those types of

Alaska Consensual Community Property Law And Property Trust

THE STATE OF ALASKA has adopted a new community property law by which a married couple may elect to treat all of their assets or specific assets as community property. This article discusses the estate planning uses and implications of converting one's separate property to community property, and how non-Alaskans may use an Alaska Community Property Trust to obtain the tax and non-tax benefits of community property status for select assets.

In most community property states, many forms of property acquired by a married couple are automatically held as community property, unless the couple enter into a binding agreement to treat their assets as separate property. The Alaska Community Property Act (the Act) gives Alaska residents the option of conducting their marital finances within a community system, making it the first wholly consensual community property statute in nearly 60 years.¹ Of even greater importance to estate planners in other states, however, the Act allows both residents and non-residents to establish Alaska Community Property Trusts, by which specific assets can be held as community property under Alaska law.

Alaska Community Property

The Act, which became law on May 22, 1998, allows a husband and wife who are both domiciled in Alaska to enter into an agreement that converts any or all of their property into community property.² The Act draws many of its key provisions from the Uniform Marital Property Act, which has previously been adopted only in Wisconsin.³ The key elements of the Alaska community property rules for residents are that:

1. The couple may select which assets are to be community property and which are to be held in some other form of separate or joint ownership;⁴
2. Community property may be owned with rights of survivorship;⁵
3. Each spouse owns and may control a one-half interest in the community property,⁶ but the spouses may choose to grant management authority to one of them;⁷
4. Each spouse is required to act in good faith toward the other with respect to their community property.⁸
5. A spouse may "reclaim" community property given to a third party by one of them unless the
6. An Alaska court may equitably divide community property along with marital property in the event of divorce, except to the extent, if any, the spouses have provided otherwise in a community property agreement or trust;¹⁰
7. Community property is not subject to a claim by a surviving spouse to any minimum or elective share when the first spouse dies;¹¹
8. An Alaska Community Property Agreement may be set aside if it is found that it was unconscionable when made, was not voluntarily executed, or that he or she was not given and did not have fair and reasonable disclosure of the property and financial obligations of the other spouse and did not voluntarily waive such disclosure.¹²

The Alaska Community Property Trust

Both resident and nonresident married couples may classify property as community property by transferring it to a community property non-transferring spouse consents, except for gifts that do not exceed $1,000 in any calendar year or larger gifts which are reasonable, in light of the economic position of both spouses;⁹

trust and by providing in the trust agreement that the property is community property.¹³ The Act requires for a valid Alaska Community Property Trust that:

1. One or both spouses transfer property to a trust;

2. The trust expressly declares that some or all the property transferred is community property under Chapter 75 of Title 34 of the Laws of the State of Alaska;

3. At least one trustee of the trust is a "qualified person" whose powers include or are limited to a. maintaining records of the trust and b. preparing or arranging for the preparation of any income tax returns that must be filed by the trust. A "qualified person" is an individual Alaska domiciliary, Alaska trust company or Alaska bank as described in AS 34.75.100(a) (Michie 1998). The powers to maintain trust records and prepare or arrange for the preparation of trust income tax returns may be given either to the Alaska trustee alone or to the Alaska trustee and one or more other trustees;

4. The Trust must contain the following language (in capital letters) at the beginning of the trust agreement:

THE CONSEQUENCES OF THIS TRUST MAY BE VERY EXTENSIVE, INCLUDING, BUT NOT LIMITED TO, YOUR RIGHTS WITH RESPECT TO CREDITORS AND OTHER THIRD PARTIES, AND YOUR RIGHTS WITH YOUR SPOUSE BOTH DURING THE COURSE OF YOUR MARRIAGE AND AT THE TIME OF A DIVORCE. ACCORDINGLY, THIS AGREEMENT SHOULD ONLY BE SIGNED AFTER CAREFUL CONSIDERATION. IF YOU HAVE ANY QUESTIONS ABOUT THIS AGREEMENT, YOU SHOULD SEEK COMPETENT ADVICE.¹⁴

5. Both spouses must sign the trust, even if only one transfers property to the trust;

6. The trustees must maintain records that identify which property held by the trust is community property and which property held by the trust is not community property.

An Alaska Community Property Trust that meets these requirements will allow the conversion of the trust assets from separate or joint property into community property. Furthermore, it allows the spouses to enter into enforceable agreements regarding:

1. Their rights and obligations in the property transferred to the trust;

2. The management and control of the property transferred to the trust;

3. The disposition of the property transferred to the trust in the event of the dissolution of the marriage or of the trust, death of either or both spouses or the occurrence or nonoccurrence of another event;

4. The choice of law governing the interpretation of the trust; and

5. Any other matter that affects the property transferred to the trust and does not violate public policy or a statute imposing a criminal penalty.

An Alaska Community Property Trust may not be amended or revoked unless the agreement itself provides for revocation on a particular date or on the occurrence of a particular event or unless the agreement is amended or revoked by a later community property trust. To amend or revoke the trust, the later community property trust is not required to declare any property held by the trustee as community property. This means that the spouses may amend the trust to transmute property back from community property to separate property. Both an Alaska Community Property Trust and a later (amending) Community Property Trust are enforceable without consideration, although no such agreement is enforceable if unconscionable when made or the spouse against whom enforcement is sought was not given a fair and reasonable disclosure of the property and financial obligations of the other spouse, did not voluntarily sign a written consent expressly waiving the right to disclosure of the property and financial obligations of the other spouse beyond any disclosure made and did not have notice of the property or financial obligations of the other spouse.

Efficacy Of Alaska Community Property Trusts

An Alaska Community Property Trust for nonresidents of the State of Alaska should be valid for tax purposes if the trust can create enforceable property rights with respect to property contributed by persons who are not resident or domiciled within the State of Alaska. The law on point supports the use of a trust in one state to create beneficial and property rights for nonresident beneficiaries, but even in jurisdictions in which the law may be less supportive, good planning can help assure the desired result.

The rules by which the state that should assume jurisdiction over various aspects of trust administration, construction and the rights of beneficiaries, depend upon whether the trust corpus is real or personal property. Generally, the intent of the settlor determines the jurisdiction for a trust holding personal property, while the sites of the real property are determinative with respect to a trust on real property.

Issues of the administration of a trust holding personal property (whether tangible or intangible) are determined under the jurisdiction in which the trust is otherwise administered, which itself is determined on the basis of the intent of the settlor, as disclosed in the governing instrument. Absent an express declaration in the instrument as to the place of administration, the settlor's intent is usually assumed to be that the trustee shall administer the trust at the trustee's principal place of business or domicile. A settlor who names two or more trustees who are domiciled in different states may manifest an intention that the trust should be administered at the domicile or place of business of one of them. Therefore, if the settlor names one or more trustees situated in Alaska, as is required of an Alaska Community Property Trust, it may be assumed that the trust should be administered in Alaska and that it should be supervised by the courts of that state.

The requirements for an Alaska Community Property Trust include the designation of at least one Alaska trustee and refer repeatedly to the construction of the rights of the parties in the property under Alaska law. Under the general rule, therefore, Alaska courts should have jurisdiction over matters involving the administration of an Alaska Community Property Trust even though they might lack jurisdiction over some or all of the beneficiaries.¹⁵

Questions relating to the construction of an inter vivos trust holding personal property and the rights of the various beneficiaries will be based on the law of the state designated in the instrument, or in the absence of such a designation, the law of the place of administration, if the issue relates to trust administration, or otherwise the jurisdiction that the settlor would probably have desired to apply.¹⁶ A state need have no connection with the trust in order to use its law in construing the trust instrument, if the settlor has selected that particular state's law.¹⁷

A similar rule applies in determining the overall validity of a trust of personal property. The validity of the trust is determined under the law of the state designated by the settlor, as long as that state has a substantial relation to the trust and that the application of its law does not violate a strong public policy of the state with which the trust has its most significant relationship.¹⁸ A state has a substantial relation to a trust if the settlor designates that the trust is to be administered there, if any trustee has its principal place of business or domicile in that state when the trust is created, if the trust is administered in that state or if it is the domicile of the beneficiaries.

As to trusts of interests in land, however, the law of the situs of the land becomes more important. The administration and validity of a trust in land is determined according to the law of the state in which the land is situated, even if the trustees are situated elsewhere.¹⁹ A court of a state other than that in which the property is situated may still exercise jurisdiction over the administration of the trust, if this does not unduly interfere with the control by the courts of the situs.²⁰

Issues of construction of the trust instrument, however, have not always been construed according to the situs. Some courts apply the law of the situs,²¹ but a few others have applied the law designated by the settlor in construing a trust on real estate.²² The law of the situs almost certainly controls issues of construction only in the absence of a designation in the instrument of the governing law.

Therefore, it appears very likely that an Alaska Community Property Trust holding personal property will be respected in matters of administration, construction and trust validity, as long as it meets the basic rules set forth by Alaska law. On the other hand, it is quite possible that a court would view an Alaska Community Property Trust as not creating community property interests in real estate, the title to which is held by the trust but the location of which is in another state that has no community property rules, or that has significantly different rules from those adopted in Alaska. A practitioner who wishes to create an Alaska Community Property Trust to hold out-of-state real estate should, therefore, arrange for the transfer of the real estate to an Alaska corporation or partnership or limited liability company if that is otherwise compatible with the client's wishes, since stock, partnership interests and LLC interests are themselves personal property, even if the underlying assets are real property. The stock or partnership or LLC interests may then be transferred to an Alaska Community Property Trust, the terms of which would be governed more clearly by Alaska law.

Gift Tax Consequences Of Creating An Alaska Community Property Trust

Although an Alaska Community Property Trust could be irrevocable, the grantor or grantors should ensure that neither spouse will be deemed to make a completed gift for Federal gift tax purposes to any third party upon the transfer of property to the trust or thereafter unless that is what he, she or they wish. Because both spouses must sign the trust, even if only one of them transfers assets to it, one spouse cannot create the trust, make the assets community property and unilaterally control what the disposition of those assets will be. If the other spouse does not agree to the proposed disposition, he or she presumably will not sign the trust.

The gift tax marital deduction would appear to be a simple protection against adverse gift tax consequences on the creation of an Alaska Community Property Trust, but the law does not clearly establish that granting one's spouse the immediate, unilateral and continuing right until death to withdraw one-half of any property transferred to and which becomes a community property asset should qualify such one-half interest for the gift marital deduction. In other words, the fact that the donee-spouse's interest in the community property under the Alaska Community Property Trust will terminate at his or her death (if the right to withdraw that interest from the trust is not exercised) may mean it is a terminable interest.²³

With reasonable planning and drafting, a transfer to an Alaska Community Property Trust should be capable of qualifying for the marital deduction.²⁴ One way is to create an interest which constitutes an "estate trust," that terminates in favor of the donee-spouse's own probate estate, making it thereby disposable by that spouse's Will.²⁵ Alternatively, the transfer may be made to qualify by falling under the life estate general power of appointment exception.²⁶ The donee-spouse must be entitled to all of the income for life payable at least annually and be granted a lifetime and/or testamentary general power of appointment exercisable by the donee-spouse alone and in all events in favor of that spouse and/or his or her estate. These are known as general powers of appointment marital deduction trusts.

Although the statute relating to such general power of appointment marital deduction trusts states that the income must be payable to the spouse at least annually, the regulations promulgated under the gift tax regulations relating to such trusts clarify that the income does not, in fact, have to be paid to the donee-spouse but merely be subject to withdraw by that spouse.²⁷

The interest created for the donee-spouse in the Alaska Community Property Trust could be made to qualify alternatively for QTIP treatment under Code Sec. 2523(f) by structuring the donee-spouse's interest that way and by election on a timely filed United States Gift Tax Return. However, it nonetheless seems appropriate to grant the donee-spouse the immediate, unilateral and continuing right to withdraw his or her half of the assets transferred to the Alaska Community Property. The nature of community property is that each spouse owns and may control his or her one-half of the assets. Of course, the trust could provide that either or both spouses could relinquish his or her unilateral right to withdraw although, presumably, care should be taken to ensure that any such relinquishment is not a taxable gift, unless that result is intended.²⁸

Income Tax Treatment Of Alaska Community Property Trusts

If one spouse transfers property to the Alaska Community Trust, the trust presumably will be treated as a grantor trust in its entirety with respect to that spouse so that all the trust property, whether all or only part of it becomes community property under Alaska law, is treated as owned for income tax purposes by the grantor-spouse as long as the income and corpus may be distributed, without the consent of an adverse party, to or for the benefit of either or both spouses.²⁹ Even if the other spouse has the unilateral right to withdraw his or her half of the community property from the trust, powers held by the grantor's spouse are attributed under Code Sec. 672(e) to the grantor. As a result, the grantor-spouse will be treated as though he or she held that power to withdraw, presumably negating any possible application of Code Sec. 678, under which a beneficiary, who is not the trust's grantor but has a unilateral right to withdraw trust property, is treated as the owner of that property for income tax purposes. Moreover, the Internal Revenue Service has consistently held that the provisions of the grantor trust rules (Code Secs. 671-677) which cause the actual grantor to be treated as the owner of the trust assets supercede Code Sec. 678.³⁰

the trust property will no longer be treated as owned by that spouse for income tax purposes. To the extent that the surviving spouse has a unilateral power to withdraw such property from the trust that spouse will be treated as the owner under Code Sec. 678. Often, a joint revocable community property trust (that is, one created by both spouses with their community property, as well as, perhaps, separate property) provides, when the first spouse dies, that the survivor's half of the assets which had been community property as well as the survivor's separate property, if any, remains subject to that spouse's power of withdrawal. If that pattern is followed in an Alaska Community Property Trust, the surviving spouse will be considered the owner of such property for income tax purposes under the grantor trust rules. However, to the extent the surviving spouse's power unilaterally to withdraw one-half of the community property contributed by the other spouse expires at or before the death of the grantor spouse, the surviving spouse will not be treated as the owner of such property under the grantor trust rules.³¹

To the extent a spouse makes a contribution to the Alaska Community Property Trust that spouse presumably will continue to be treated as the owner of the property, as discussed above, for income tax purposes under the grantor trust rules even if the non-contributing spouse has a unilateral right to withdraw none, some (e.g., half) or all of property so contributed if the income from the property contributed or the property itself may be distributed, without the consent of an adverse party, to either or both spouse.³² As a result, during the spouses' joint lifetimes, each spouse will be treated as owning for income tax purposes the assets he or she contributed. That probably will be the case even if the spouses are treated as exchanging interests in assets contributed. For example, the wife contributes Asset X worth $2 million to the trust which became community property (and, therefore, treated as owned under Alaska law as one-half by the husband) and the husband contributes Asset Y worth $1 million which became community property (and, therefore, treated as owned under Alaska law as one-half by the wife). Even if the wife is treated as exchanging a 25 percent interest of Asset X for a 50 percent interest in Asset Y and the husband is treated as exchanging a 50 percent interest in Asset Y for a 25 percent interest in Asset X, the wife probably will be treated as owning all of Asset X and the husband probably will be treated as owning all of Asset Y for Federal income tax purposes. The reason is that for income tax purposes (of which the grantor trust rules are a part), that exchange normally would be treated as a gift rather than as an exchange.³³ Hence, the spouse who contributed the property presumably will be treated as the sole grantor of that asset for income tax purposes.

To the extent of the property contributed by him or her, the surviving spouse will continue to be treated as the property owner for income tax purposes under the grantor trust rules to the extent the property or its income may be distributed to that spouse, without the consent of any adverse party,³⁴ after (as well as before) the other spouse dies. In addition, the surviving spouse may become to be treated as the owner under Code Sec. 678 of property contributed by the first spouse to die upon that spouse's death to the extent the survivor has a unilateral right to withdraw the property after the death of the first spouse to die.

Basis Adjustment At Death

One major tax advantage of creating an Alaska Community Property Trust is that it enables residents of non-community property states to take advantage of Sec. 1014(b)(6), which states that, upon the death of either spouse, the basis of the entire community property asset (and not just one-half of the asset) becomes equal to the value of the asset at the death of that spouse (or, if applicable, on the alternate valuation date determined under Code Sec. 2032). Sec. 1014(b)(6) does not distinguish between property that is held as community property under automatic (opt out) state laws or under elective (opt in) state laws. Furthermore, significant authority strongly suggests that community property under an opt in law, such as that adopted in Alaska, would be eligible for the basis adjustment at death under Sec. 1014(b)(6).³⁵

However, it is appropriate to note that Code Sec. 1014(b)(6) only requires that the property is community property under the laws of any State (or possession or foreign country). If a non-Alaska married person or persons transfers property to an Alaska Community Property Trust, the property will be community property under the law of Alaska. Therefore, it seems literally to fall under the section.

Although it seems the asset which is community property under Alaska law is "community property ... under the community property laws of [a] State," it is possible the courts will hold otherwise.³⁶ Accordingly, married couples should elect into the Alaska community property system only if that form of ownership reflects their wishes regardless of whether the basis of the surviving spouse's interest in the property will be determined on the death of the first spouse to die under Code Sec. 1014(b)(6). Moreover, because the Alaska Community Property law's treatment under that section is untested, it may be preferable for the couple, if it is seeking a step-up in basis for all of their wealth when the first spouse dies, to place all of the assets in the name of the spouse who will die first. Unfortunately, that is not always predictable well before that death occurs. Under Code Sec. 1014(e), no change in basis occurs under Code Sec. 1014(a) for property which was given to the decedent within a year of his or her death and is reacquired, directly or indirectly, by the donor.³⁷

Conclusions

Under the Alaska Community Property Act, both married Alaskans and non-Alaskans may elect for some or all of their assets to be community property under Alaska law. To the extent the value of what one spouse converts to community property exceeds the value of what the other so converts, a gift will be made. That gift should usually qualify for the gift tax marital deduction unless the donee spouse is not a U.S. citizen and the gift, along with other gifts to the spouse, exceeds $100,000 in a calendar year.³⁸

Although converting assets to community property that may provide the surviving spouse a significant income tax benefit when the first spouse dies, the change in the nature of assets may have other far-reaching effects.³⁹ Each spouse, in fact, will have a 50 percent ownership interest in the community property. That means, for example, that the community assets will be subject to a 50 percent division in the event of divorce (except to the extent the court having jurisdiction over the divorce may and does order a different division under applicable equitable distribution or similar laws) and each spouse will be permitted to dispose of his or her one-half of the assets when he or she dies except to the extent agreed otherwise. As with other community property systems, spouses hold other rights with respect to their community property which do not exist with respect to other property they own. As a consequence, it is likely that only couples in long-term stable marriages, and perhaps only those who have descendants only of their common union, will elect to have their assets treated as community property under Alaska law.

Even if neither the Internal Revenue Service nor the courts rule that Alaska community property is community property under Code Sec. 1014(b)(6), it seems likely it will be treated as a "50-50" tenancy in common between the spouses or, if elected under the Alaska Act to be "survivorship" community property as the Act permits,⁴⁰ as a joint tenancy with rights of survivorship between the spouses. If so, that probably means one-half of the asset will be included in the estate of the first spouse to die.⁴¹

Thus, the Alaska Community Property Act and the Alaska Community Property Trust offer a rare opportunity for clients whose marriages are extremely sound, to convert those assets that they wish into community property, with possibly significant income tax advantages upon the first spouse's death. Furthermore, these new laws present this opportunity with remarkably few downside risks. ♦

End Notes

1. In other community property states, marital property agreements frequently convert some or all of the parties' non-community property assets into community property, filling the gaps left by state law. However, those agreements differ materially from the Alaska Community Property Agreements because the former add some assets to an extant stack of community property, while the latter starts from a situation in which no assets are community property prior to the agreement. On the non-Alaska form of agreement, see, e.g., Rasmussen, "Divorce Provisions in Opt-In Marital Property Agreements," 67 Wisc. Lawyer 15 (Apr. 1994).

39. Caution should be exercised in converting certain assets to community property, for instance, if one spouse owns a policy of insurance on the life of the other, the conversion presumably will cause the insured spouse to hold an incident of ownership in the policy potentially causing proceeds paid at death to be included in his or her estate. Cf. Estate of Cervon v. Commissioner, 111 F.3d 1252 (5th Cir. 1997). It may be inappropriate also for one spouse to convert qualified plan and similar interests into community property. Generally, such interests represent income in respect of a decedent under Code Sec. 691(a) which, under Code Sec. 1014(c), do not receive the income tax-free step-up in basis under Code Sec. 1014(a), but complications of such ownership can arise in the non-participant spouse dies first.
