The Alaska Division of Retirement & Benefits is pleased to provide you with this personalized benefit statement highlighting the financial security you are building for the future. It also summarizes the protection you and your family have against financial losses that may occur because of your disability or death. This statement is produced using data as of 6/30/2009. Please review the statement carefully, verifying total years of service and personal data such as birth date, marital status, etc.

Your benefits are a significant portion of your compensation package. The value of your benefits will continue to increase over time and you will want to compare this statement with those you receive in the future to measure your progress. Most financial planners suggest you need 80% to 85% of your current monthly income to maintain your standard of living at retirement. When you are two years away from retirement, visit our website or contact the Division of Retirement and Benefits to enroll in a retirement planning seminar.

Your current PERS status means that you must be 55 years old and be vested or have 30 years of service to be eligible for normal retirement.

Monthly plan benefits shown on this statement were estimated under the normal retirement option, which provides you with a monthly income for your lifetime. Surviving beneficiaries are eligible to receive money from the PERS. If a retiree was eligible for health insurance benefits at the time of death, their surviving spouse may continue to be eligible for the same health insurance benefits.

Senator Hollis French
Chair, Judiciary Committee
State Capitol, Room 417
Juneau AK 99801

Dear Senator French:

RE: Confirmation Hearings – Public Members of the Legislative Ethics Committee

On January 22, 2010, Chief Justice Walter Carpeneti nominated H. Conner Thomas and Gary J. Turner for another term on the ethics committee (see attached letter). Attached are their resumes and 2010 Legislative Financial Disclosures.

Senate President Stevens referred their names to your committee for confirmation hearings. Both individuals will be in Juneau on Wednesday, February 17, for an ethics committee meeting and would be available to meet with the Senate Judiciary committee on that date. They have not scheduled any appointments or meetings between 1 p.m. and 3 p.m. I have also notified the House Judiciary chair, Representative Ramras, of the public members' schedule. Is it possible to hold a joint Judiciary committee meeting with the House?

The chief justice has not appointed the third public member to the ethics committee as of today but it is my hope that an appointment will be made and referred to your committee prior to the 17th.

Please let me know if this date and timeframe works for the committee.

Sincerely,

Joyce Anderson

SB 19

Alaska State Legislature

SB 19 - Complaints Against Peace Officers/VPSOs

Senate Bill 19 establishes a framework that allows the Department of Public Safety to provide investigation status updates to complainants about grievances they file against peace officers. The legislation protects personnel information and the confidentiality of investigative processes while also allowing the department to provide evidence that a complaint is being taken seriously and getting reviewed for potential disciplinary action.

When a citizen files a complaint against a peace officer, the law must balance the confidentiality of the process with the legitimate need to inform the complainant about the status of the department's investigation. In instances where wrong doing has actually occurred, silence by the department may result in greater mistrust of the system, particularly if it lasts for months.

This legislation provides citizens with more information about how their government responds to their concerns, without reducing protections on confidential personnel files or hindering the objective of completing unbiased investigation processes. I ask for your support on this important piece of legislation.

Relevant Statutes:

Sec. 39.25.080. Personnel records confidential; exceptions.

(a) State personnel records, including employment applications and examination and other assessment materials, are confidential and are not open to public inspection except as provided in this section.

(b) The following information is available for public inspection, subject to reasonable regulations on the time and manner of inspection:

(1) the names and position titles of all state employees;

(2) the position held by a state employee;

(3) prior positions held by a state employee;

(4) whether a state employee is in the classified, partially exempt, or exempt service;

(5) the dates of appointment and separation of a state employee;

(6) the compensation authorized for a state employee; and

(7) whether a state employee has been dismissed or disciplined for a violation of AS 39.25.160 (l) (interference or failure to cooperate with the Legislative Budget and Audit Committee).

(c) A state employee has the right to examine the employee's own personnel files and may authorize others to examine those files.

(d) An applicant for state employment who appeals an examination score may review written examination questions relating to the examination unless the questions are to be used in future examinations.

(e) In addition to any access to state personnel records authorized under (b) of this section, state personnel records shall promptly be made available to the child support services agency created in AS 25.27.010 or the child support enforcement agency of another state. If the record is prepared or maintained in an electronic data base, it may be supplied by providing the requesting agency with access to the data base or a copy of the information in the data base and a statement certifying its contents. The agency receiving information under this subsection may use the information only for child support purposes authorized under law.

(c) The division may not assemble, or provide information respecting, individual records for commercial purposes that are outside the scope of this chapter. [Emphasis added].

It appears that this statute is inartfully drafted because it does not require a "governmental agency" that wishes to obtain an employee's medical records to establish any showing of necessity for the records. This issue arose in the present case when it was thought that someone in Governor Palin's office may have obtained copies of Trooper Michael Wooten's workers' compensation file. As drafted, any state governmental agency may obtain medical records of an injured employee by simply making the request. No showing of necessity is required. The problem is compounded because AS 23.30.395, the statute that defines terms of use for Chapter 30, does not define the term "governmental agency."

For this reason, the legislature should consider amending AS 23.30.107 (b)(1) to require that a "governmental agency" that seeks to acquire medical or rehabilitation records of an employee first establish a reasonable relationship between the request for the records and the purpose for obtaining the records.

THE SECOND RECOMMENDATION

The legislature should consider amending AS 39.25.080 to permit those who file complaints against peace officers to receive some feedback about the status and outcome of their complaint.

Sec. 39.25.080 Personnel records confidential; exceptions.
(a) State personnel records, including employment applications and examination and other assessment materials, are confidential and are not open to public inspection except as provided in this section.
(b) The following information is available for public inspection, subject to reasonable regulations on the time and manner of inspection:
(1) the names and position titles of all state employees;
(2) the position held by a state employee;
(3) prior positions held by a state employee;
(4) whether a state employee is in the classified, partially exempt, or exempt service;
(5) the dates of appointment and separation of a state employee;
(6) the compensation authorized for a state employee; and
(7) whether a state employee has been dismissed or disciplined for a violation of AS 39.25.160 (l) (interference or failure to cooperate with the Legislative Budget and Audit Committee).

(c) A state employee has the right to examine the employee's own personnel files and may authorize others to examine those files.

(d) An applicant for state employment who appeals an examination score may review written examination questions relating to the examination unless the questions are to be used in future examinations.

(e) In addition to any access to state personnel records authorized under (b) of this section, state personnel records shall promptly be made available to the child support services agency created in AS 25.27.010 or the child support enforcement agency of another state. If the record is prepared or maintained in an electronic data base, it may be supplied by providing the requesting agency with access to the data base or a copy of the information in the data base and a statement certifying its contents. The agency receiving information under this subsection may use the information only for child support purposes authorized under law.

AS 39.25.900. is captioned "Penalties" and provides as follows:

(a) A person who wilfully violates a provision of this chapter or of the personnel rules adopted under this chapter is guilty of a misdemeanor.

(b) A state employee who is convicted of a misdemeanor under this chapter or the personnel rules adopted under this chapter immediately forfeits the employee's office or position.

Discussion

In this case, there has been much said about the level of frustration that existed on the part of Sarah Palin's father Chuck Heath who filed the original complaint against Trooper Michael Wooten, and on the part of Sarah and Todd Palin, who attempted to learn the status of the investigation only to be told by Colonel Grimes that the matter was confidential by reason of AS 39.25.080. I believe their frustration was real as was their skepticism about whether their complaints were being zealously investigated. The irony is that the complaints were taken very seriously, and a thorough investigation was underway. However, the law prevented the Troopers from giving them any feedback whatsoever.

When a citizen files a complaint against a peace officer, there should be a balance in our law that on the one hand seeks to protect the confidentiality of the investigative process, but on the other recognizes that someone may have been aggrieved. At the very least, the law should provide for the release of some information to the complainant regarding the status of the case. When citizens are told no information can be released, it has the potential of engendering skepticism about whether the complaint was taken seriously. There is likewise a great potential that the confidence we need to have in our law enforcement agencies will be undermined, and respect for those institutions will be eroded. This is especially so because in most instances, as was the case here, the officer is an employee of the very same agency that was conducts the investigation.

In sum, AS 39.25.080 should be studied to determine whether some relaxation of the law is possible to allow some feedback to a person who files a complaint against a law enforcement officer.

Dear Senator French:

On behalf of the Alaska Peace Officers Association (APOA), I would like to thank you for introducing Senate Bill 19, an act relating to complaints concerning peace officers and village public safety officers and to notification to persons filing complaints.

The APOA State Board and Legislative Committee reviewed this proposed legislation and unanimously support this bill.

Thank you for addressing this issue. Please contact the APOA office in Anchorage at 277-0515 if there is anything our organization can do to assist in the passage of this bill.

Sincerely,

Angella Long

CS FOR SENATE BILL NO. 46( )

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE - SECOND SESSION

BY

Offered:
Referred:

Sponsor(s): SENATOR KOOKESH

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to child support awards; and repealing Rule 90.3, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 25 is amended by adding a new chapter to read:

Chapter 28. Child Support Awards.

Sec. 25.28.010. Guidelines; primary physical custody. (a) A tribunal shall calculate a child support award in a case in which one parent is awarded primary physical custody as an amount equal to the adjusted annual income of the noncustodial parent multiplied by a percentage specified in (b) of this section.

(b) To calculate the child support award, the tribunal shall multiply the noncustodial parent's adjusted annual income by the following percentages:

(1) 20 percent for one child;

(2) 27 percent for two children;

(3) 33 percent for three children; and

(4) an additional three percent for each additional child.

(c) The tribunal may allow the obligor parent to reduce child support payments by up to 75 percent for a period in which the obligor parent has extended visitation of more than 27 consecutive days. The order must specify the amount of the reduction that is allowable if the extended visitation is exercised.

(d) The tribunal may calculate child support based on a determination of the potential income of a parent who voluntarily and unreasonably is unemployed or underemployed. A determination of potential income may not be made for a parent who is physically or mentally incapacitated, or who is caring for a child under two years of age to whom the parents owe a joint legal responsibility. Potential income shall be based on the parent's work history, qualifications, and job opportunities. The tribunal also may impute potential income for nonincome producing or low income producing assets.

(e) In this section, "adjusted annual income" means the parent's total income from all sources less

(1) mandatory deductions, including

(A) federal, state, and local income tax;

(B) social security tax or the equivalent contribution to an alternate plan established by a public employer, and self-employment tax;

(C) Medicare tax;

(D) mandatory union dues;

(E) mandatory contributions to a retirement or pension plan;

(2) voluntary contributions to a retirement or pension plan or account in which the earnings are tax-free or tax-deferred, except that the total amount of these voluntary contributions plus any mandatory contributions under (1)(E) of this subsection may not exceed 7.5 percent of the parent's gross wages and self-employment income;

(3) child support and alimony payments arising from previous relationships that are required by another tribunal and actually paid;

(4) child support for children from prior relationships living with the parent, calculated by using the formula under this chapter; and

(5) work-related child care expenses for the child who is the subject of the child support order.

Sec. 25.28.020. Guidelines; shared, divided, and hybrid custody awards. (a) The tribunal shall calculate shared, divided, and hybrid physical custody awards as provided in this section.

(b) The tribunal shall calculate a child support award in a case in which the parents are awarded shared physical custody by

(1) calculating the annual amount each parent would pay to the other parent under AS 25.28.010 assuming the other parent had primary custody; in this calculation, the income limit in AS 25.28.030(c) and the minimum support amount in AS 25.28.030(d) apply;

(2) multiplying the amount determined under (1) of this subsection for each parent by the percentage of time the other parent has physical custody of the child; however, if the tribunal finds that the percentage of time each parent will have physical custody does not accurately reflect the ratio of funds each parent will directly spend on supporting the child, the tribunal shall vary this percentage to reflect its findings;

(3) determining which parent has the greater amount under (2) of this subsection; the parent with the greater amount under (2) of this subsection is the obligor parent, and the annual award is equal to the difference between the two amounts under (2) of this subsection multiplied by 1.5; however, if this amount is greater than the amount of support calculated under AS 25.28.010 assuming the obligor parent has primary custody, the annual support is the amount calculated under AS 25.28.010.

(c) The child support award for shared custody under (b) of this section must be paid in 12 equal monthly installments, except that if

(1) shared custody is based on the obligor parent's having physical custody for periods of 30 consecutive days or more, the total annual award may be paid in equal installments over those months in which the obligor parent does not have physical custody; or

(2) the obligor parent's income is seasonal, the tribunal may order unequal monthly support payments as provided in AS 25.28.030(g) and (h).

(d) The child support order must state that failure to exercise sufficient physical custody to qualify for shared physical custody under (b) or (c) of this section is grounds for modification of the child support order. Denial of visitation by the custodial parent is not cause to increase a child support award.

(e) The tribunal shall

(1) calculate a child support award in a case in which the parents are awarded divided custody by determining the amount each parent would pay to the other parent for support of a child for whom that parent has primary physical custody under AS 25.28.010, taking into account the income limit in AS 25.28.030(c) and the minimum support amount in AS 25.28.030(d), and offsetting those amounts; and

(2) consider whether the amount determined under (1) of this subsection should be varied under AS 25.28.030(b).

(f) The tribunal shall

(1) calculate a child support award in a case in which the parents are awarded hybrid custody by

(A) applying AS 25.28.010, taking into account the income limit in AS 25.28.030(c) and the minimum support amount in AS 25.28.030(d), to determine support for a child in the primary physical custody of each parent;

(B) applying (b) of this section to determine support for a child in the shared physical custody of the parents;

(C) adjusting pro rata the percentages provided in AS 25.28.010(b) based on the number of children to which each type of custody applies; and

(D) combining the amounts to determine the net obligation; and

(2) consider whether the amount determined under (1) of this subsection should be varied under AS 25.28.030(b).

Sec. 25.28.030. Exceptions to support awards. (a) Notwithstanding the requirements in AS 25.28.010 and 25.28.020, the tribunal may vary the award for the reasons stated in this section.

(b) The tribunal may vary the child support award as calculated under the other provisions of this chapter for good cause on proof by clear and convincing evidence that manifest injustice would result if the support award were not varied. The tribunal shall specify in writing the reason for the variation, the amount of support that would have been required but for the variation, and the estimated value of any property conveyed instead of support calculated under the other provisions of this chapter. Good cause may include a finding that unusual circumstances exist that require variation of the award in order to award an amount of support that is just and proper for the parties to contribute toward the nurture and education of their children. The tribunal shall consider the custodial parent's income in this determination.

(c) The calculation for primary physical custody under AS 25.28.010 does not apply to the extent that the parent has an adjusted annual income of more than $105,000. The tribunal may make an additional award only if it is just and proper, taking into account the needs of the child, the standard of living of the child, and the extent to which that standard should reflect the supporting parent's ability to pay.

(d) Except as provided in AS 25.28.010(c) and 25.28.020, the minimum child support amount that may be ordered is $50 a month or $600 a year.

(e) In addition to ordering a parent to pay child support as calculated under this chapter, the tribunal may, in appropriate circumstances and when the parents are minors as described in (f) of this section, order one or more grandparents of a child to pay child support to an appropriate person in an amount determined by the tribunal to serve the best interests of the child; however, the amount may not exceed the lesser of

(1) a proportionate share of the amount required to provide care in a supervised setting to the grandchild, as determined by the tribunal; or

(2) the amount that would have been awarded if the child's parents had the incomes of the child's grandparents and AS 25.28.010 and 25.28.020 were applied.

(f) An order under (e) of this section may be issued only with respect to a child whose parents are both minors, and the order terminates when either parent becomes 18 years of age. The tribunal shall specify in writing the reasons it considers it to be appropriate to order a grandparent to pay child support under this subsection and the factors considered in setting the amount of the child support award. In this subsection, "grandparent" means the natural or adoptive parent of the minor parent.

(g) If the noncustodial parent's income is seasonal, the tribunal may order that the annual support amount be paid in unequal monthly payments, with higher payments during the months the parent expects to receive higher income and lower payments in other months; the tribunal may not make an unequal payment order unless

(1) the tribunal finds that the burden of budgeting for periods of unequal income should be placed on the obligee rather than the obligor; and

(2) the obligee agrees.

(h) An order of the tribunal for unequal payments under (g) of this section must specify the annual support amount, the average monthly support amount, and the amount due for each month. The order must provide that variations from the average monthly amount begin with monthly payments in excess of the average monthly amount so that a deficit situation cannot occur. Until the excess payments begin, the tribunal shall order payment of the average monthly amount.

Sec. 25.28.040. Health care expenses. (a) The tribunal shall include in the order coverage of the child's health care needs and require health insurance for the child if insurance is available to either parent or both parents at a reasonable cost. The tribunal shall consider whether the child is eligible for services through the Indian Health Service, any other entity, or other insurance coverage before ordering either parent or both parents to provide health care coverage through insurance, cash medical support, or other means. A court shall find that health insurance is available only if the dependent child has reasonable geographic access to the covered services or the insurance includes the coverage of transportation needed for the services.

(b) The tribunal shall allocate equally the cost of insurance between the parents unless the tribunal orders otherwise for good cause. An obligor's child support obligation shall be decreased by the amount of the obligee's portion of health insurance payments ordered by the tribunal and actually paid by the obligor. The tribunal shall increase a child support award by the obligor's portion of health insurance if the obligee is ordered to, and actually does, obtain and pay for insurance.

(c) The cost of insurance is the cost attributable to the child for whom support is paid. If the cost to the employee of covering the employee alone is the same as the cost to the employee of covering the employee and dependents, then there is no additional cost to the employee for adding the child and no portion of the cost of coverage may be allocated to the child. If dependent coverage can be added for a single cost, rather than for each dependent, and the dependent coverage covers dependents in addition to the child subject to the order, the cost of the dependent coverage shall be allocated equally among the dependents covered. If there is reason to believe that there is an incremental cost to the employee for insuring dependents but evidence of that incremental cost is unavailable, the cost of insurance is determined by dividing the total cost of coverage by the number of family members covered and multiplying that amount by the number of children subject to the order.

(d) The tribunal shall allocate equally between the parties the cost of reasonable health care expenses not covered by insurance unless the tribunal orders otherwise for good cause. A party shall reimburse the other party for the party's share of the uncovered health care expenses within 30 days after receipt of the bill for the health care, payment verification, and, if applicable, a health insurance statement indicating what portion of the cost is uncovered. The tribunal shall allocate the reasonable, uncovered health care expenses exceeding $5,000 in a calendar year based on the parties' relative financial circumstances when the expenses occur.

(e) For the purpose of establishing a monthly support obligation for health care expenses, a court shall find that the cost of cash medical support or private health insurance is reasonable under this section if the cost to the responsible parent does not exceed five percent of the responsible parent's gross income. In calculating the percentage for purposes of health insurance coverage, the cost is the cost of adding the dependent child to the existing insurance coverage or the difference between self-only and family coverage.

(f) In this section,

(1) "cash medical support" means an amount ordered to be paid toward the cost of health insurance provided by a public entity or by another parent through employment or otherwise, or for other health care expenses not covered by insurance;

(2) "health care expenses" includes medical, dental, vision, and mental health counseling expenses.

Sec. 25.28.050. Child support affidavit and documentation. (a) Subject to the confidentiality requirements of Rule 90.1(f), Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure, each parent in a proceeding of a tribunal at which child support is involved shall file a statement under oath, accompanied by documentation verifying the statement, that states the parent's adjusted annual income and the components of adjusted annual income as described in AS 25.28.010(e). This statement and documentation must be filed with a party's initial pleading in superior court, including the dissolution petition, divorce complaint or answer, motion to modify, and any response to a motion to modify. The documents must be redacted to delete social security numbers and to provide only partial financial account information as provided in Rule 90.1(f), Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure. The statement must state whether the parent has access to health insurance for the children and, if so, the additional cost to the parent of the children's health insurance.

(b) While there is an ongoing monthly support obligation, each party shall provide to the other party, within 30 days after a written request, documents such as tax returns and pay stubs showing the party's income for the prior calendar year. The party making the request shall provide documentation of the party's annual income for the same period at the time the request is made. A request under this section may not be made more than once a year. This section does not preclude discovery under the Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure.

(c) Unless the information has already been provided to the tribunal under Rule 90.1(f), Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure, a statement under (a) of this section must be accompanied by a confidential information sheet as described in Rule 90.1, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure. Once a complete confidential information sheet has been submitted to the tribunal listing names, dates of birth, and social security numbers as required, the parties shall omit or redact social security numbers from documents subsequently filed in the action unless otherwise ordered by the tribunal.

(d) The tribunal may withhold or assess costs or attorney fees for a violation of this section as the circumstances and discouragement of like conduct in the future may require. Costs and attorney fees may be imposed on offending attorneys or parties.

Sec. 25.28.060. Travel expenses. After determining an award of child support under this chapter, the court shall allocate between the parties reasonable travel expenses that are necessary to exercise visitation as may be just and proper for the parties to contribute.

Sec. 25.28.070. Modification; defense against arrearages. (a) A tribunal may modify a final child support award on a showing of a material change of circumstances as provided by state law. A material change of circumstances shall be presumed if support as calculated under this chapter is more than 15 percent greater or less than the outstanding support order. An award may be modified to require cash medical support regardless of whether insurance is available to either parent if neither parent has purchased health insurance. In this subsection, support includes health insurance payments or cash medical support made under AS 25.28.040.

(b) A tribunal may not modify a child support arrearage retroactively, except as authorized by AS 25.27.166(d). A modification that is effective on or after the date that a motion for modification, or a notice of petition for modification by the child support services agency, is served on the opposing party is not considered a retroactive modification.

(c) The tribunal may find that a parent and a parent's assignee are precluded from collecting arrearages for support of a child that accumulated during a time period exceeding nine months for which the parent agreed or acquiesced to the obligor exercising primary custody of the child. A finding that preclusion is a defense must be based on clear and convincing evidence.

Sec. 25.28.080. Third-party custody. (a) When the state, or another third party entitled to child support, has custody of all children of a parent, the parent's support obligation to the third party is an amount equal to the adjusted annual income of the parent multiplied by the percentage specified in AS 25.28.010(b). If the third party has custody of some but not all children, the parent's support obligation to the third party is an amount equal to the adjusted annual income of the parent, multiplied by the percentage specified in AS 25.28.010(b) for the total number of the parent's children, multiplied by the number of the parent's children in third-party custody, divided by the total number of the parent's children. In this subsection, the number of the parent's children includes only children of the parent who live with the parent, are substantially supported by the parent, or are in custody of the third party entitled to support.

(b) If, in addition to a support obligation to a third party, one or both parents retain primary or shared physical custody of at least one of their children, the support obligation between the parents is calculated under the other provisions of this chapter, without consideration of the third-party custodian or any children in the custody of the third-party custodian, except that the percentage in AS 25.28.010(b) must be adjusted pro rata for the number of children in the primary custody of a parent, or shared custody of the parents, compared to the total number of children. After that calculation is completed, any support owed may be offset with support owed to a third-party custodian under (a) of this section in order to minimize transactions.

Sec. 25.28.090. Support order forms. All court orders for payment or modification of child support shall be entered on a form developed by the administrative director of the court. A party may lodge a duplicate of the tribunal form produced by a laser printer or similar device. A device may also print, in a contrasting typestyle equivalent to that produced by a typewriter, text that otherwise would have been entered by a typewriter or word processor. A party or attorney who lodges a duplicate certifies by lodging the duplicate that it is identical to the current version of the court form.

Sec. 25.28.100. Dependent tax deduction. The court may allocate the dependent tax deduction for each child between the parties as is just and proper and in the child's best interests. The allocation must be consistent with AS 25.24.152 and federal law.

Sec. 25.28.300. Definitions. In this chapter,

(1) "child support" and "child support obligation" have the meaning given "duty of support" in AS 25.27.900;

(2) "divided custody" means that one parent has primary physical custody of one or more children of the relationship and the other parent has primary custody of one or more other children of the relationship, and the parents do not share physical custody of any of their children;

(3) "hybrid custody" means that at least one parent has primary physical custody of one or more children of the relationship, and the parents have shared physical custody of at least one child of the relationship;

(4) "primary physical custody" or "primary custody" means that a child resides with the other parent for a period, specified in the custody order, of less than 30 percent of the year;

(5) "shared physical custody" or "shared custody" means that a child resides with one parent for a period, specified in writing in the custody order, of at least 30 percent but not more than 70 percent of the year, regardless of the status of legal custody;

(6) "tribunal" means the superior court or the child support services agency created in AS 25.27.010.

 Sec. 2. AS 47.10.120(a) is amended to read:

(a) When a child in need of aid is committed under this chapter, the court or the child support services agency created in AS 25.27.010 shall, after giving the parent a reasonable opportunity to be heard, require that the parent pay to the department in a manner that the court or the child support services agency directs a sum to cover in full or in part the maintenance and care of the child. The support obligation shall be calculated under AS 25.28 [RULE 90.3(i) OF THE ALASKA RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE].

 Sec. 3. AS 47.12.230(a) is amended to read:

(a) When a delinquent minor is committed under this chapter, the court or the child support services agency created in AS 25.27.010 shall, after giving the parent a reasonable opportunity to be heard, require that the parent pay to the department in a manner that the court or the child support services agency directs a sum to cover in full or in part the maintenance and care of the minor. The support obligation shall be calculated under AS 25.28 [RULE 90.3(i) OF THE ALASKA RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE].

 Sec. 4. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

REPEAL OF COURT RULE. Rule 90.3, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure, is repealed.

 Sec. 5. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

NONAPPLICABILITY OF TWO-THIRDS VOTE REQUIREMENT. Because the rule repealed in sec. 4 of this Act is a substantive rule rather than a rule of practice or procedure, the repeal of the rule takes effect even if sec. 4 of this Act does not receive the two-thirds majority vote of each house required by art. RE: Child Support Awards
CS SB 46

Dear Senator Kookesh:

Thank you for the opportunity to provide comments about CS SB 46 Child Support Awards (CS SB 46 26-LS0279\P). This bill moves the child support guidelines from the court rule (Civil Rule 90.3) to statute. The committee substitute resolves some of the legal issues with the prior version, but raises some new issues. Attached is a page and line number summary of the small changes to the bill (Attachment 1). The main area of concern is section 25.28.040 addressing health care expenses.

The prior version of SB 46 did not include the 2008 federally mandated provisions addressing medical support. CS SB 46 cures two previously deficient areas: defining the reasonable cost of health insurance and defining the accessibility of health insurance. The third area is cash medical support. CS SB 46 now includes cash medical support (page 7, lines 27-29) and the reasonable cost of cash medical support (Page 7, lines 20-25), but these additions now make the section internally inconsistent and subject to several different interpretations. Here are some examples:

- Paragragh (b) provides cash medical support (i.e. uncovered medical costs) will be equally allocated between the parents which conflicts with section (d) that provides that uncovered health care expenses will be allocated equally between the parents unless the cost exceeds $5,000 in a calendar year, then the costs are allocated based on the parents' relative financial circumstances.
- Paragraph (b) provides the obligor can decrease his/her support obligation by the amount of "cash medical support" paid. As currently defined, the obligor can deduct 50% of all medical expenses he/she pays. This could result in no child support payment to the custodian or possibly the custodian paying the non-custodial parent. Also, as written, the custodian would effectively pay 75% of the child's uncovered expenses.

- Paragraph (e) defines the reasonable cost of private health insurance or cash medical support. It limits cash medical support to 5% of the responsible parent's gross income. The paragraph does not address circumstances when the uncovered medical costs exceed the 5% standard—who pays the health care provider if the bill exceeds each parent's 5% of gross income. As written, the custodian may be burdened with all bills that exceed 5% the obligor's gross income. This paragraph also conflicts with paragraph (d).
- Cash medical support as defined only includes uncovered "medical costs"; Health care expenses are defined broadly including not only "medical" expenses, but also dental, vision, and mental health counseling expenses.

I have included an example to reflect these issues and application of the health care section. (See attachment 2).

Also, the health care expense section does not require the court to order cash medical support if health insurance is not available to either parent at a reasonable cost or accessible to the child.

The federal requirements for medical support are complicated and many states have struggled with complying with the new federal mandates. The discussion in the Federal Register anticipates that a tribunal would order a cash medical support payment when accessible health insurance is not available to the child at a reasonable cost. Thus, a parent would either pay for health insurance each month (and receive a corresponding 50% adjustment in health insurance) or pay the other parent a set cash sum each month.

If you have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me. I will also be available for questions at the Senate Judiciary committee hearing scheduled for March 24 at 1:30 pm. I will be participating from the Legislative Information Office in Anchorage.

Senator Hollis French, Chair
Senate Judiciary Committee
State Capitol Bldg., Rm. 417
Juneau, AK 99801

Dear Senator French, Hollis

I respectfully request a hearing for Senate Bill 46 "An act relating to child support awards; and repealing Rule 90.3, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure." This bill simply puts the rule into statute. In 1987, the Alaska Supreme Court enacted Civil Rule 90.3. The court frankly admitted that this was a substantive law and recognized the courts are not supposed to pass substantive laws that are the Legislature's job. In the 23 years since then, the Legislature has not replaced Civil Rule 90.3 with an actual law. This bill proposes to correct this long standing deficiency.

Thank you for your consideration and if you have any questions don't hesitate in contacting me personally or my staff Dorothy Shockley at 465-3018.

Respectfully,

Albert

Senator Albert Kookesh

§ 302.56 Guidelines for setting child support awards.

(a) Effective October 13, 1989, as a condition of approval of its State plan, the State shall establish one set of guidelines by law or by judicial or administrative action for setting and modifying child support award amounts within the State.

(b) The State shall have procedures for making the guidelines available to all persons in the State whose duty it is to set child support award amounts.

(c) The guidelines established under paragraph (a) of this section must at a minimum:

(1) Take into consideration all earnings and income of the noncustodial parent;

(2) Be based on specific descriptive and numeric criteria and result in a computation of the support obligation; and

(3) Address how the parents will provide for the child(ren)'s health care needs through health insurance coverage and/or through cash medical support in accordance with § 303.31 of this chapter.

(d) The State must include a copy of the guidelines in its State plan.

(e) The State must review, and revise, if appropriate, the guidelines established under paragraph (a) of this section at least once every four years to ensure that their application results in the determination of appropriate child support award amounts.

(f) Effective October 13, 1989, the State must provide that there shall be a rebuttable presumption, in any judicial or administrative proceeding for the award of child support, that the amount of the award which would result from the application of the guidelines established under paragraph (a) of this section is the correct amount of child support to be awarded.

(g) A written finding or specific finding on the record of a judicial or administrative proceeding for the award of child support that the application of the guidelines established under paragraph (a) of this section would be unjust or inappropriate in a particular case shall be sufficient to rebut the presumption in that case, as determined under criteria established by the State. Such criteria must take into consideration the best interests of the child. Findings that rebut the guidelines shall state the amount of support that would have been required under the guidelines and include a justification of why the order varies from the guidelines.

(h) As part of the review of a State's guidelines required under paragraph (e) of this section, a State must consider economic data on the cost of raising children and analyze case data, gathered through sampling or other methods, on the application of, and deviations from, the guidelines. The analysis of the data must be used in the State's review of the guidelines to ensure that deviations from the guidelines are limited.

SB 46 puts the Child Support Civil Rule 90.3 guidelines into statute. In 1987, the Alaska Supreme Court enacted Civil Rule 90.3. The Supreme Court admitted that this was a substantive law that the Legislature could replace at anytime. In the 23 years since then, the Legislature has not replaced civil rule 90.3 with an actual law. This bill proposes to correct that long-standing deficiency.

One of the major problems with having the child support guidelines set by a court rule is the people affected by the current guidelines never have the chance to speak to the individuals who have the power to make changes. Instead every four years they are encouraged to write letters or testify before a review committee made up of lawyers and judges who then submit their recommendations to the Supreme Court Justices who make the final decisions. With the rule in statute, individuals can talk to the law makers directly.

The bill proposes enactment of the current rule, into statute. Under this model of child support guidelines, the non-custodial parent's support obligation is based solely on his or her income, without regard to what the other parent makes. The current rule works reasonably well, and with a statue in place, proposals to amend it can be made in the future, through the legislative process.

CSSB 46 changes the word court to tribunal in some cases back to court and adds number (6) to definition in Sec. 25.28.300 (page 11) to read "tribunal" means the superior court or the child support services agency created in AS 25.27.010. It also includes changes made by SB 96 addressing medical support.

The Child Support Services Division has no objections to the bill. I would appreciate your prompt and favorable action on this bill.

Re: SB 46

Dear Senator:

I am writing to express my support for the proposed SB 46, which, if passed, would finally enact a child support guideline into statute.

The lack of a child support guideline has been a blot on our constitutional system for over 20 years. In 1987 the Alaska Supreme Court adopted Civil Rule 90.3, which I am sure they intended to be only a short-term solution to avoid loss of federal benefits until the legislature replaced the rule with an actual statute. Unfortunately the justices, who predictably do not have a very good collective ear for political realities, did not realize that when you take a hot potato away from the legislature, you tend to get stuck with the hot potato for life. And so in 23 years, no legislator (until now) has even introduced a bill to enact a specific guideline. In the meantime the Supreme Court, with its typical inability to admit when it is wrong, has whitewashed the fact that this is a substantive law enacted by the judiciary, by trying to claim that it is "merely a guideline" even though its own cases require that the guideline be followed.

The Alaska Constitution gives the judiciary the authority to enact administrative and procedural rules, and to decide individual cases. It has no right or ability to enact substantive laws. For the judiciary to enact a substantive law, is a terrible precedent which threatens the structure of separation of powers. And so I implore you to remedy this embarrassment by enacting a substantive child-support law to replace 90.3.

That said, if this bill gets a committee hearing you will be provided with a lot of options, some of them probably better than what you have here. SB 46 essentially adopts the present system of child support guidelines, which is generally referred to as a "percentage of income" system. It does have the advantage of being consistent with the way we have done this in Alaska for the past 23 years, so that the many people who have to apply these rules (judges, attorneys, and CSSD workers) do not have to start all over again. On the other hand most states have adopted the "income shares" system, under which both parents' incomes are taken into account. Our system takes into account, in most cases, only the income of the noncustodial parent. There are good arguments on both sides, and you may want to consider using the income shares system instead. Likewise, there are many desirable changes which could be made to the guidelines, even if the basic structure is kept intact.

Please consider the many changes which are likely to be presented, and keep an open mind to them, but at the end of the day please pass something. Under the current system, the people who are affected by this substantive law can never talk to the people who can change it, because the justices who actually decide on changes do not talk to people. Every four years, the justices appointed a review committee, a group of lawyers who then solicit comments for change, and hold public hearings. However the review committee does not make the final decision, and the justices have been anything but a rubber stamp for the committee's recommendations. I have been on two of the review committees over the years, and many of the changes we proposed were either rejected, or dramatically revised, by the Supreme Court.

The current system is undemocratic. You have the option of changing it into a system which is democratic, in which people can petition their legislators if they believe further changes should be made. Please take some such action. The exact details of how child support is calculated, is less important than that our system of democratic government is able to continue operating the way it should.

Please feel free to contact me if there are any other questions you, or any of your fellow legislators, have for me.

Sincerely,

Kenneth Kirk

SB 47

Joelle Casteix
18 Starfish Ct.
(949) 322-7434

My name is Joelle Casteix. I am 38 and live in southern California. I am a victim of childhood sexual abuse and the Southwest Regional Director of SNAP, the Survivors' Network of those Abused by Priests. In that role, I have worked with hundreds of sex abuse victims, including many in the villages of western Alaksa. Most importantly, I am a mother of a 2-and-a-half-year-old son, whose beauty, light and innocence make my goal here the most important of my life.

Carolyn Jessup, wrote the book "Escape," which chronicles her flight from the FLDS compound in Colorado City. In her words: "Child sexual abuse is not about religion. It is about crime." Criminals seek environments where they will not be caught and where a child's fear, naivete, lack of education and fear of punishment and retribution will not only keep them quiet, but keep them in the dark about the crimes against them.

Unfortunately, religions like the Roman Catholic Church provide the best haven for a predator to hone his skills.

Why? Because the predator will not be punished.

I am here today because

- I am an example of why Senate Bill 47 is essential to the safety of Alaska' children TODAY.
- I can show you how similar California and Delaware laws have saved thousands of children from abuse, exposed predators across the state and the country, aided law enforcement and prosecutors in numerous states to put molesters behind bars and unearthed a cover-up that shocked and disgusted the nation.
- I can show how this law will protect thousands of Alaska's vulnerable children RIGHT NOW who will still be at risk if these predators are not been exposed, and
- how, because of a bill such as this, I was able to publicly expose my predator, expose the men and women who covered up his criminal activities, unearth thousands of pages of document about my perpetrator and at least a dozen other predators at my high school, and do my best to make sure that these men never hurt another child.

I have to be here … for the children of Alaska, my soul and for my son, I have to be here.

My Story

Allow me to briefly tell my story.

Like many of the survivors you have heard and will hear today, I was a vulnerable child. I came from an alcoholic home and suffered from severe emotional disturbances because of the home life I had to endure.

My high school and the church were my sanctuaries.

I attended Mater Dei High School, a diocesan high school in Santa Ana, California.

What my parents and I didn't know at the time was that the school was a den of sexual abuse. Eleven men at my high school, including the principal, a vice principal, two choir directors and cross country coach were credibly accused and/or sued for abuse. Documents were released for all of them.

My Perpetrator

I was molested by choir director Thomas Hodgman. The prior director had informed Hodgman of my home life, and told him that I was vulnerable. Hodgman seized the opportunity and had complete control and power over me.

He asked my parents if I could go to his house with some other kids to help him move. When I arrived, I was the only child there. He told me that he couldn't wait to have me all to himself. I had never been more than kissed by a boy before then, so when he cornered me in his bedroom and tore off my shirt, I was scared, lost and alone. When he was done, I was bruised and bloody. And I had nowhere to turn.

"If you tell anyone, I'll kill you," he told me. "No one will believe you, anyway."

I was repeatedly raped during a two-year period – from when I was 15 until I was 17 years old.

Like many survivors, I couldn't go to my parents, even when my panties were bloody and my body bruised. I couldn't go to my friends, who, after learning of the abuse said that I wanted it.

So I went to school officials.

The vice principal told me "Gee, Joelle, isn't it wonderful to be in love?" I was told to keep my secret, because most people wouldn't understand. She said that I might be sent to a psychiatric facility. Or perhaps the police would blame me and I would have to go to juvenile hall – she had seen it all and she knew. And I believed her. I was indoctrinated.

I had no idea that Hodgman was also molesting my friend, Kristin. But the administrator knew.

Right before graduation, I found out I was pregnant.

I had nowhere to go, and nowhere to turn. So, using a fake name, I walked to an abortion clinic, alone, and ended my pregnancy.

After the procedure, a nurse told me that I had a sexually transmitted disease, vaginal warts, that could lead to cervical cancer and sterility. I spent the next three months having growths burned off of my genitalia.

No one called the police and no one told my parents until I did a few years later. And when I told, the pain only increased.

I was completely alienated from my friends and family who all blamed me – a 15-year-old innocent child – for "seducing" a man in his 30s. I was told that even though I didn't even know what sex was before I met Tom Hodgman, that I was an evil person who sinned and hurt a good man because I was "loose."

I was told that I was going to hell. But what these people didn't know was that I was already in hell.

Like most victims of childhood sexual abuse, I suffered endlessly for the next ten years. I watched my mother kill herself with alcohol over the pain and shame of what had happened to me. I trusted no one. I suffered from bad relationships, intimacy issues, suicidal thoughts, and an overwhelming shame. I hated who I was, and it seemed that there was no solution and no way out. I only knew pain, abuse and betrayal.

One day, I made a decision – I could die and let my abuser win, or heal and be the person that I had always wanted to be.

I chose to live.

I got help, forgave and forgot my issues with my family and tried to move on. But somehow I knew that there was still something horribly wrong with a place that told kids to be quiet about sexual abuse. But I just couldn't prove it.

In 2001, a boy who had been abused by my high school principal sued the Diocese of Orange and won a $5.2 million settlement. I was enraged when I heard the news.

I couldn't believe they allowed it to happen to another child.

So I wrote a letter to my high school and offered to help. In response, an attorney for the diocese invited me to lunch. And didn't tell me she was a lawyer. Had I been more naive, who knows what she could have done to me?

She said she had no records of my allegations, and that school officials had no idea that I had been abused. She even doubted my claims.

But, she said, I could serve on the diocese lay review board. I could help the bishop and show the county that there is no other abuse in the Diocese of Orange.

I seized the opportunity. I honestly thought that I could make a difference.

During the six months I was on the committee, we did not review a single case. We were told to ignore press reports. Instead, we sat around a table and discussed how horrible the clergy abuse scandal was for priests.

They used religion and their power to impress us, shame us, and silence us. In fact, during the time I was on the board, at least 30 people came forward to report abuse. But we were never told. I had to learn from press reports.

Church "reforms" were yet another sham to ensure that victims never reported to law enforcement. And many didn't.

What a sad day it was for me to learn that the only way to get the truth was to use our landmark civil window to sue the church. I wanted them to do the right thing, but they wouldn't. Instead, it took a state law to shine a bright light on a past and present of sin, crime and corruption that would have continued were it not for brave lawmakers and the civil courts.

Again, they called me a liar … but this time in the media. They used political connections to attempt to silence and discredit me.

Fortunately, I didn't care, and the truth was on my side.

After two years of mediation, stalling, and mudslinging, 87 cases against the Diocese of Orange were settled. But the financial settlement was simply a slap on the wrist for the church. The diocese was debt free less than a year after the settlements. The true punishment and the true justice lay in the 10,000 pages of files that exposed the scope and scale of abuse across the diocese.

Not only did documents show that the church knew about abuse, but showed that church officials didn't care about kids. Or me. Or anyone but themselves. Priests, clergy, volunteers and employees were transferred, asked to resign, and quietly hidden. And the kids had to pay the price.

An entire generation of children was destroyed to protect a few men from scandal.

Dozens of men were exposed – exposed working in schools, day care centers, and volunteering with youths. They were exposed grooming their target populations, lying to parents and trying to infiltrate other organizations.

And most importantly, California's, Arizona's, Mexico's and Nevada's children are safer because we exposed the predators who were allowed to go free to abuse and rape and destroy.

The most important part: girls will now be safer from Hodgman. The church didn't care enough to protect them, but I did. And I did it through a law like SB 47.

No one can call me a liar anymore.

The Documents

But let's get back to the immediate danger here in Alaska.

In the files for my case there were quite a few interesting documents that I provide for you today.

There was the signed confession where Hodgman admits to raping me and my friend Kristin. It's also signed by the principal, who never called the police.

There is the back-dated document, signed by the vice principal and Hodgman, that says that she knew about the abuse a year earlier, and did nothing.

There is the letter, written by the principal, Fr. John Weling, to the superintendent of schools. He said he reported to child services, but my parents were never called and child services has no record.

Where is the compassion? Where is the law?

Only the truth will protect children.

SB 47 and its one-year window is that window to the truth - righ tnow, there is no other way possible to force organizations to do the right thing

We were able to expose 150 perpetrators that the church had tried to hide from public disclosure. We exposed "rings" of priest shuffling between California, Idaho, Arizona, and Nevada – all the way to Mexico.

Last year in Delaware, a similar law – a two-year window - has done the same thing. We have exposed dozens of men still working in schools, exposed a multi-state conspiracy to protect men from prosecution, and aided law enforcement in three states to help put predators behind bars.

Now, let me address the three perceived challenges in bill:

1) Opponents say that the bill will encourage false allegations

False allegations can happen. But false allegations against clergy are extremely rare. Don't take my word on it. Patrick Schiltz of Minnesota is the Catholic church's No. #1 expert in this field. For 20 years, he's defended accused priests as a lawyer. By his own count, he's handled more than 500 cases.

On August 28, 2002, he was asked by Sam Dillon of the New York Times about false allegations. Guess what he said? Of the more than 500 alleged child molesting priests Schiltz represented, he admitted, in print, that less than three were false allegations.

Don't believe me. Look it up. August 28, 2002, New York Times.

Finally, this law does not change the burden of proof. Victims will be required to meet the standards that any civil lawsuit of this type requires

2) Opponents say that the bill is unconstitutional:

But according to Marci A. Hamilton, the Paul R. Verkuil Chair in Public Law and the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, the law is constitutional.

3) Opponents say that the law will force more organizations into bankruptcy.

If the only organizations declaring bankruptcy due to this law are the ones like the Jesuits and the Diocese of Fairbanks who acknowledge that they allowed scores of men to rape hundreds of children, they refused to stop it, and that they expect the state of Alaska to clean up the mess and pay for services for their victims, I think that bankruptcy reorganization is pretty close to a "free pass."

Opponents may say that the lawsuits will take money away from other services – vital services that they provide. But I ask, does that give them permission to "pass the trash" and not be held accountable for crimes they have acknowledged committing? A murderer may be the world's greatest soup kitchen director, but that doesn't mean that he doesn't have to pay his debt to society.

Now, let me tell you what this law WILL do:

1) This bill will expose predators and those who have covered up for them

In California and Delaware, we have exposed more than 150 predators. These were men and women who escaped the criminal and civil statues of limitations. Civil windows allowed victims to use the court system to name their abuser, warn communities and give younger victims the strength to come forward and report WITHIN the criminal statute.

2) This bill will help law enforcement put serial molesters behind bars

Former priests Michael Baker and Michael Wempe are two of the worst pedophiles in California. Both men escaped criminal prosecution because their victims were abused too long ago.

But because of the civil window, victims of both of these men were able to pursue their cases in civil court.

And something interesting happened – younger victims – victims who never would have had the bravery to come forward before – reported their abuse to law enforcement. They also had solid evidence that has led to the arrest of both of these men.

And now, these men and many others like them are behind bars. That never would have happened without the window.

In Delaware, law enforcement in numerous OTHER states, including Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Florida and Wisconsin, have used documents and depositions in DELAWARE'S civil window cases to investigate and prosecute predators, including Robert Yugel and Paul Daleo.

Without the civil suits, these men never would have been exposed. If their victims named them publicly – without the backing of the courts - the abusers could have sued them for slander. The media would have ignored their claims, and more kids would have been hurt and forced to suffer in silence.

3) This bill will help pay for services that before have fallen onto the lap of Alaska's taxpayers.

The state of Alaska is grappling with the aftereffects of child sexual abuse every day. I have seen the human wreckage in the Villages. You pay for police, jails, court costs, counseling, parole, probation, poverty assistance, anger management, physical abuse, substance abuse, mental health care, hospitals, foster homes, child services, life skills education, nutrition assistance, unemployment, travel to essential services, death benefits and other needs that aid entire villages of adults who were sexually abused as children. Why? Because groups such as the Jesuits, the Diocese of Fairbanks and other organizations refuse to be accountable and take responsibility for what they have done. Because they claim that they run other essential services? Why are you paying for this? Why are other victims and the state the only people will to help? What is more essential than the list I just read?

Now, at no cost to the state, those responsible can provide services and care to the people that they knowingly and willingly destroyed. Victims can help themselves.

And finally, if even one known molester – even one man who allowed a predator to rape children - is exposed – at no expense to taxpayers, isn't it worth it?

As lawmakers, it seems you have only one option:

Open the courthouse doors to sex crime victims and let them access the time-tested civil justice system to expose molesters, warn communities about the danger these men pose, get them removed from jobs in teaching and coaching and the ministry, and punish those who helped them - all with little or virtually no cost to Alaska's taxpayers.

So at the end of the day, who wins with the one-year window?

- Men and women like me - Victims who feel suicidal, who'll never get married, who'll never have children, who desperately need in-patient drug and alcohol rehab. . .they'll get what they need.
- Men and women like me - Victims who can't sleep, who obsess over where their perpetrator is now, who he's molesting now, and how they can warn unsuspecting moms and dads and neighbors about this dangerous man. . .they'll get what they need.
- Parents like me - Citizens who desperately want to know if there's a child molester in their school or church or youth group. . . they'll get what they need.
- Law enforcement officials, who know lots of sexual predators escape detection and prosecution, and whose hearts ache for victims left out in the cold - they'll see victims exposing molesters and warning parents and getting better.

Carolyn Jessop in her book "Escape" says that it took her until she was 35 to escape religious indoctrination and realize and understand that plural marriage, wife beating and a life of imprisonment was wrong, illegal and against her rights.

If it took her that long, can you imagine how long it takes a victim of childhood sexual abuse to come to terms with the pain and the shame – only to find out that they have no recourse to make sure that their predator never hurts another child?

Please, please don't let what happened to me happen to another child. But please give Alaska's children the power that the civil window gave me.

I will be leaving you with documents to help you in your decision-making. They include the documents I have referenced in my case, as well as the list of the coalition behind the Delaware civil window, including the Delaware State Attorney, Governor, the State Academy of Pediatrics, the Delaware Ecumenical Council, and a former director of the FBI. These folks believe in a TWO-year window. You should too. It simply makes sense.

I also recommend two books, including William Lobdell's Memoir, "Losing My Religion: How I lost my faith reporting on religion in America, and found peace," and Carolyn Jessop's "Escape," both of which can be found at any bookstore. William is a close friend of mine, and dedicates his book to victims of child sexual abuse, whose stories changed his life.

November 7, 1989

Official documentation - November 3, 1989 meeting.

Attending: Mr. Thomas Hodgman, [redacted] (1988 graduate), [redacted] (1988 graduate) and Mrs. Lucretia Dominguez

Chaired by Mrs. Lucretia Dominguez, Assistant Principal

A meeting was arranged on Friday afternoon, November 3, 1989 in my office.

Mr. Hodgman showed me an article written by Joelie Casteix in the October 18, 1989 issue of the Daily Nexus about an abortion she had in July of 1988. This was the first time Mr. Hodgman had any knowledge of her pregnancy and abortion. Concern was warranted because the father of the child was not stated but certainly reference was made to Mr. Hodgman.

[redacted] stated that this was the first time she ever discussed this matter openly and directly with Mr. Hodgman. She was aware of the dating because her friend, Joelie, had kept her informed. When asked why she waited so long to discuss this matter she said she did not know what to do. She was angry and confused.

She wanted to meet with me to find out what action the school had taken. My reply was that I did not know that there was a serious issue yet to be dealt with. The only information I had ever received was from Mr. Hodgman in June of 1988 regarding dating a student. I have never received any complaint or charge filed against Mr. Hodgman by any student, staff or parent. We simply discussed his behavior, and I was assured that it would never happen again. This article and additional information, not factual, have not come to our attention before this date.

I was aware that [redacted] were going to meet with Fr. Weling on Saturday and no attempts on Mr. Hodgman's or my part were made to prevent them from doing so.

I also told Mr. Hodgman that I was quite sure that Fr. Weling would want to meet with him to discuss this matter. Mr. Hodgman stated that he feels it would be important for Fr. Weling to hear his side of the story.

Official documentation - June 1988 meeting with Mr. Thomas Hodgman.

This statement is to document a meeting initiated by Mr. Tom Hodgman with me in June, 1988.

At this meeting Mr. Hodgman stated that since he decided not to resign that he would like me to know of a situation in which he was involved during the last semester of the 1987-88 school year.

Foolishly he dated a senior girl, Joelle Casteix. Her parents called him and asked him to stop dating their daughter. They also requested that he keep the matter quiet because they did not want the school to be aware of the situation. They would prefer that their daughter not be dragged into any kind of a situation at school.

Mr. Hodgman stated that he kept his promise to the Casteix family by not calling, seeing, dating or discussing the matter with anyone.

He stated he was in counseling to help him with this and other problems he was experiencing at the time. He recognized what a big mistake it was and vowed that it would never happen again.

No record of this meeting was placed in his personnel file, and it is only at the request of the Principal that it is now being documented.

Official documentation - November 7, 1989 meeting with Mr. Tom Hodgman

This is to document my meeting with Mr. Tom Hodgman on Tuesday, November 7, 1989.

I met with Mr. Hodgman to discuss allegations made by four Mater Dei graduates (Class of 1988), [redacted] These former students met with me on Saturday, November 4, 1989, to share their concern about past relationships Mr. Hodgman allegedly had had with two of their classmates. The first situation involved Joelle Casteix during the semester before she graduated. [redacted] the summer after graduation. They brought a copy of an article written by Joelle Casteix published in the UCSB student newspaper, Daily Nexus, on Wednesday, October 18, 1989. This article states that Joelle not only entered into a close relationship with one of her high school teachers, but became pregnant by that relationship and subsequently decided to have an abortion.

The students stated that they knew about the sexual relationships Mr. Hodgman had with these two former students because of direct information they were given by Joelle and [redacted]

In my meeting with Mr. Hodgman, he admitted to not only dating these two students [redacted] but having sexual intercourse with them. He had not been aware of the possibility of the abortion until he read the article.

Mr. Hodgman reassured me that he had undergone extensive counseling and had taken many steps in his personal and professional life to ensure that he would never make this terrible mistake again. He swore that this sort of problem has not occurred again with any students.

To: The Administrative Board
Mater Dei High School

From: Thomas M. Hodgman
Director of Choral Music, MDHS

Dear Friends:

It is with great regret that I must inform you of my resignation as director of choral music at Mater Dei High School. I have greatly enjoyed my work here, and I shall miss it tremendously.

I feel I am leaving the program in good standing and in excellent hands with my accompanist, Mr. Pro Mojica and my replacement, Mr. Tom Flannery. They are both fine musicians and are familiar with the demands and expectations of this job.

I look forward to hearing beautiful music from this program in the future. The school is to be commended for its incredible support of the choir program over the past four years, and I am confident that this enthusiasm will continue into the future.

Good luck in all that you do, and thank you for the many wonderful gifts and opportunities which you gave to me during my time here. I will miss you all very much. Thank you.

Sincerely,

Thomas M. Hodgman

The following information should be paraphrased to the students (and, if possible, the parents) of the Mater Dei Choral Program:

--- Mr. Hodgman has resigned as director of choral music music at Mater Dei High School.

--- He has chosen to do so for personal reasons. (Rumors of physical, mental or emotional illness are incorrect and need to be discouraged).

--- Mr. Hodgman is planning to continue his Graduate Studies in the Spring of 1990.

--- Mr. Hodgman is confident that the students and parents of the Mater Dei Choral Program have the strength and ability to carry out the years' pl plans under the guidance of the new director and present accompanist.

--- Mr. Hodgman will always be with the members of the Mater Dei Choirs in their music. Music is the world which the students and Mr Hodgman shared together, and will continue to share for the rest of their lives.

--- Mr. Hodgman loves you; he misses you; and most of all, he expects you to carry on the tradition of musical excellence which you have established yourselves, over the past four years.

Good luck.

Re: Personnel Changes

This is to inform you that Mr. Tom Hodgman has resigned from his position of Choir Director. He has chosen to do so for personal reasons. He is planning to continue his graduate studies.

In his three years at Mater Dei, Tom's enthusiasm, dedication and far-reaching talent has taken the choir program to new heights. He will be sorely missed by all of us.

Please welcome his interim replacement, Mr. Tom Flannery, who comes to us highly recommended by Tom Hodgman. Mr. Flannery has a degree in music from Chapman College. Prior to joining the Mater Dei family he worked for the Anaheim School District. He is also Music Director at St. George's Episcopal Church, Laguna Hills and Music Director at the Phoenix Club, Anaheim. He was president of the Chapman College Choral Organization for two years. Tom also speaks German fluently.

We especially appreciate Mr. Flannery's willingness to take over the program on such short notice.

Dear Sister Celine:

This is to inform you about two personnel matters we have been dealing with recently. In case you are ever contacted about these situations the enclosed information might be of assistance.

1. [redacted]

2. A past situation involving our choir director, Tom Hodgman, and one of our senior girls at the time was brought to my attention by four of our graduates. They gave me the enclosed copy of an article this student wrote in her UCSB school paper. At this time we have no evidence that she was pregnant and had an abortion. We are aware of her past history of serious emotional problems. When confronted with this alleged situation, Mr. Hodgman admitted to me that he did have a relationship with this student, prior to her graduation, which included sexual intercourse. The student was under eighteen at the time which necessitated my report to the Child Abuse Registry. Mr. Hodgman subsequently resigned and has no further association with our choir program or students.

Both cases have been handled with the advise from [redacted] office.

As you can see, there is never a dull moment at the corner of Bristol and Edinger! If you wish to discuss either of these matters further, please let me know.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

Alaska State Legislature

Senator Hollis French

SB 47 - Statute of Limitations for Sexual Offenses

Senate Bill 47 creates a one year period in which civil action may be brought in felony sexual assault cases that have been time barred by the formerly restrictive statute of limitation laws in Alaska. During the 2001 legislative session, both the House and Senate voted unanimously to remove the statute of limitations for felony sexual offenses that were still open to prosecution at that time. For instances of felony sexual assault where the statute of limitations had expired, no recourse was given to the victims of the crime.

SB 47 allows the victims of felony sexual assault to have their day in court. Experts have found there are several reasons that a victim, especially a child, will not report sexual abuse for years after it occurred. Multiple studies have shown:

- Victims of childhood sexual assault are often extremely embarrassed by the abuse, and may not disclose the crime against them until adulthood.
- Children who are victims will often fail to report sexual abuse due to fear of the consequences; a child may also feel guilty for reporting the perpetrator or fear retaliation from his or her abuser.
- It can take years for a victim to understand the connection between the problems they are experiencing as an adult and the abuse they experienced as a child.
- Among victims of sexual assault, an inability to trust is common. This inability can prevent many victims from disclosing abuse.
- Many victims of childhood sexual abuse have repressed all memory of the abuse for years; it is often only under the guidance of professional counseling or therapy that the victim may come to realize that a crime against them took place.

SB 47 allows past victims of sexual abuse the same rights they would have under today's law - the right to file charges against their perpetrators no matter when the abuse occurred. I urge your support for this important bill that provides closure for victims of sexual assault, while holding the perpetrators for these crimes accountable.

Cited and amended in the bill:

Sec. 09.10.065. Commencement of actions for acts constituting sexual offenses.

(a) A person may bring an action at any time for conduct that would have, at the time the conduct occurred, violated provisions of any of the following offenses:

(1) felony sexual abuse of a minor;

(2) felony sexual assault; or

(3) unlawful exploitation of a minor.

(b) Unless the action is commenced within three years of the accrual of the claim for relief, a person may not bring an action for conduct that would have, at the time the conduct occurred, violated the provisions of any of the following offenses:

(1) misdemeanor sexual abuse of a minor;

(2) misdemeanor sexual assault;

(3) incest; or

(4) felony indecent exposure.

Cited in the bill:

Sec. 09.10.140. Disabilities of minority and incompetency.

(a) Except as provided under (c) of this section, if a person entitled to bring an action mentioned in this chapter is at the time the cause of action accrues either (1) under the age of majority, or (2) incompetent by reason of mental illness or mental disability, the time of a disability identified in (1) or (2) of this subsection is not a part of the time limit for the commencement of the action. Except as provided in (b) of this section, the period within which the action may be brought is not extended in any case longer than two years after the disability ceases.

(b) An action based on a claim of sexual abuse under AS 09.55.650 that is subject to AS 09.10.065 (b) may be brought more than three years after the plaintiff reaches the age of majority if it is brought under the following circumstances:

(1) if the claim asserts that the defendant committed one act of sexual abuse on the plaintiff, the plaintiff shall commence the action within three years after the plaintiff discovered or through use of reasonable diligence should have discovered that the act caused the injury or condition;

(2) if the claim asserts that the defendant committed more than one act of sexual abuse on the plaintiff, the plaintiff shall commence the action within three years after the plaintiff discovered or through use of reasonable diligence should have discovered the effect of the injury or condition attributable to the series of acts; a claim based on an assertion of more than one act of sexual abuse is not limited to plaintiff's first discovery of the relationship between any one of those acts and the injury or condition, but may be based on plaintiff's discovery of the effect of the series of acts.

(c) In an action for personal injury of a person who was under the age of eight years at the time of the injury, the time period before the person's eighth birthday is not a part of the time limit imposed under AS 09.10.070 (a) for commencing the civil action.

Sec. 09.10.150. Death of a party before expiration of limitation period. [Repealed, Sec. 5 ch 78 SLA 1972].

December 5, 1995, Decided

PRIOR HISTORY: [1] Superior Court of Shasta County, No. 120206, Richard A McEachen, Judge.

DISPOSITION: The judgment is reversed. The matter is remanded to the trial court with directions to overrule defendant's demurrer and reinstate plaintiff's complaint. Plaintiff is to recover costs on appeal.

SUMMARY: CALIFORNIA OFFICIAL REPORTS SUMMARY

A person who alleged that he was sexually abused by his uncle over a 3-year period beginning when he was 12 sued the uncle for personal injury and negligent infliction of emotional distress in January 1994 when he was 31 years old. Defendant demurred, arguing that the complaint on its face disclosed the action was barred by the statute of limitations. The trial court rejected plaintiff's theory of delayed discovery, sustained defendant's demurrer without leave to amend, and entered judgment of dismissal. (Superior Court of Shasta County, No. 120206, Richard A McEachen, Judge.)

The Court of Appeal reversed and remanded with directions to overrule defendant's demurrer and reinstate plaintiff's complaint. The court held that Code Civ. Proc., § 340.1 (action for childhood sexual abuse to be commenced within eight years of date plaintiff attains age of majority or within three years of date plaintiff discovers or reasonably should have discovered that psychological injury or illness occurring after age of majority was caused by sexual abuse, whichever period expires later), as amended in 1994 to apply to any action filed on or after Jan. 1, 1991, and to include any action otherwise barred by the prior period of limitations, revived plaintiff's previously time-barred action. Also, the Court of Appeal was not required to affirm the trial court's ruling upholding defendant's demurrer, even though the ruling was prior to the effective date of the statutory amendments. The court further held that the action was timely filed under Code Civ. Proc., § 340.1, since it was commenced within three years of the date plaintiff discovered or reasonably should have discovered that psychological injury or illness occurring after the age of majority was caused by the sexual abuse. Although plaintiff alleged that he had suffered actual and appreciable injury at the time of the abuse, that was not relevant, since, under Code Civ. Proc., § 340.1, subd. (a), the delayed discovery provisions of the statute relate to injuries occurring after the age of majority. Also, that plaintiff did not repress the memories of the abuse inflicted on him did not mean that he could not take advantage of the delayed discovery provisions of the statute, since nothing in the statute requires that memories of abuse be repressed as a prerequisite to a delayed discovery claim. Plaintiff adequately pleaded facts supporting delayed discovery by alleging that notwithstanding the psychological injury and illness he suffered as an adult resulting from defendant's sexual misconduct, he did not discover the connection between such illness and the acts of misconduct until he began counseling 27 months before filing the action, and by alleging numerous facts establishing the reasonableness of the delay in discovering the connection between his adult illness or injury and the childhood sexual abuse. (Opinion by Puglia, P. J., with Nicholson and Raye, JJ., concurring.)

HEADNOTES: CALIFORNIA OFFICIAL REPORTS HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports

(1) Limitation of Actions § 43--Torts--Action for Childhood Sexual Abuse--Extension of Limitations Period Until Discovery of Injury--Purpose of Statute. --The obvious goal of the amendment to Code Civ. Proc., § 340.1, which extended the limitations period for an action based on childhood sexual abuse to within eight years of the date the plaintiff attains the age of majority or within three years of the date plaintiff discovers or reasonably should have discovered that psychological injury or illness occurring after the age of majority was caused by the sexual abuse, whichever occurs later, is to allow sexual abuse victims a longer time period in which to become aware of their psychological injuries and remain eligible to bring suit against their abusers.

(2) Limitation of Actions § 12--Construction--Retroactive Effect--Revival of Time-barred Cause of Action--Power of Legislature. --The Legislature has the power to make a statute of limitations retroactive so as to revive a civil cause of action time-barred under the former statute of limitations. There is no constitutional impediment to revival in the case of a traditional common law cause of action where the Legislature makes express its intent that the law be given retrospective application. This is consistent with the niche in our civil law occupied by statutes of limitations. The principle is well established that statutorily imposed limitations on actions are technical defenses which should be strictly construed to avoid the forfeiture of a plaintiff's rights. There is a strong public policy that litigation be disposed of on the merits wherever possible.

(3) Limitation of Actions § 12--Construction--Retroactive Effect--Action Pending on Appeal at Time Statute Becomes Effective. --In an action based on childhood sexual abuse, the Court of Appeal was not required to affirm the trial court's ruling upholding defendant's demurrer on the ground that the statute of limitations had run, even though the ruling was prior to the effective date of amendments to Code Civ. Proc., § 340.1, reviving the previously time-barred action. Statutes of limitations in civil actions are procedural, not substantive, and are not subject to the general rule against statutory retroactivity. While the amendments to § 340.1 were not in effect at the time the trial court ruled on the demurrer, the amended statute applied to the proceeding in the Court of Appeal because it was pending on appeal at the time the legislative enactment became effective.

(4) Limitation of Actions § 43--Torts--Action for Childhood Sexual Abuse--Extension of Limitations Period Until Discovery of Injury--Sufficiency of Allegations to Support Delayed Discovery Claim: Lewdness, Indecency, and Obscenity § 20--Lewd Acts With Children. --An action which was based on the sexual abuse of plaintiff over a 3-year period beginning when he was 12, and which was commenced when he was 31, was timely filed under Code Civ. Proc., § 340.1, allowing such an action if commenced within three years of the date the plaintiff discovers or reasonably should have discovered that psychological injury or illness occurring after the age of majority was caused by the sexual abuse. Although plaintiff alleged that he had suffered actual and appreciable injury at the time of the abuse, that was not relevant, since, under Code Civ. Proc., § 340.1, subd. (a), the delayed discovery provisions of the statute relate to injuries occurring after the age of majority. Also, that plaintiff did not repress the memories of the abuse inflicted on him did not mean that he could not take advantage of the delayed discovery provisions of the statute, since nothing in the statute requires that memories of abuse be repressed as a prerequisite to a delayed discovery claim. Plaintiff adequately pleaded facts supporting delayed discovery by alleging that notwithstanding the psychological injury and illness he suffered as an adult resulting from defendant's sexual misconduct, he did not discover the connection between such illness and the acts of misconduct until he began counseling 27 months before filing the action, and by alleging numerous facts establishing the reasonableness of the delay in discovering the connection between his adult illness or injury and the childhood sexual abuse.

I

In his complaint, plaintiff Michael Lent alleges he was sexually abused by his uncle, defendant Doe, over a three-year period beginning when plaintiff was twelve. Plaintiff filed his action in January 1994 when he was 31 years old. Defendant demurred, arguing the complaint on its face disclosed the action is barred by the statute of limitations. The trial court rejected plaintiff's theory of delayed discovery, sustained defendant's demurrer without leave to amend and entered judgment of dismissal. [2] We shall reverse.

The period of limitations for an action based on childhood sexual abuse is set forth in Code of Civil Procedure section 340.1 (hereafter statutory references to sections of an undesignated code are to the Code of Civil Procedure). It requires an action for childhood sexual abuse to be commenced "within eight years of the date the plaintiff attains the age of majority or within three years of the date the plaintiff discovers or reasonably should have discovered that psychological injury or illness occurring after the age of majority was caused by the sexual abuse, whichever period expires later." (§ 340.1, subd. (a)) These time limits were first enacted in 1990 and were made applicable to any action commenced on or after January 1, 1991. (§ 340.1, subd. (k) as enacted by Stats. 1990, ch. 1578, § 1, p. 7550.) n1 n1 The 1990 statute specified the period of limitations would expire at the end of either eight years or three years depending upon "whichever occurs later." (§ 340.1, former subd. (a).) In 1994, this phrase was changed to "whichever period expires later." (Stats. 1994, ch. 288, § 1.)

Section 340.1 was amended in 1994, effective January 1, 1995 (hereafter the 1994 amendments). The 1994 amendments, inter alia, expressly applied [*1181] the periods of limitations in section 340.1, subdivision (a) to "any action otherwise barred by the period of limitations in effect prior to January 1, 1991, thereby reviving those causes of action which had lapsed or technically expired under the law existing prior to January 1, 1991." (§ 340.1, subd. (o) added by Stats. 1994, ch. 288, § 1, italics added.)

It has been held the Legislature has the power retroactively to extend the period of limitations for civil causes of action arising from childhood sexual abuse, thus reviving causes of action such as plaintiff's which theretofore were time barred under the former statute. (Liebig v. Superior Court (1989) 209 Cal. App. 3d 828, 831-834 [257 Cal. Rptr. 574].)

We shall conclude that plaintiff's complaint is sufficient to withstand demurrer in that it [391] adequately alleges that plaintiff commenced his action within three years of the date he discovered or reasonably should have discovered "that psychological injury or illness occurring after the age of majority [4] was caused by the [childhood] sexual abuse." (§ 340.1, subd. (a).)

II

Plaintiff was born in March 1962. He commenced this action in January 1994. The complaint contains two counts: personal injury, i.e., sexual molestation, and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff alleges he was sexually abused by defendant over a three-year period beginning when plaintiff was twelve. n2 The incidents occurred during the summer months when plaintiff stayed with his uncle and aunt for extended periods of time. The acts of molestation, which continued until approximately 1975, consisted primarily of defendant fondling plaintiff's genitals, including one incident in which plaintiff ejaculated. As a result of defendant's acts, plaintiff developed feelings of "deep shame, self-blame and self-loathing[.]" Although plaintiff never repressed his memories of the abuse, he "buried [his memories] as far as he could out of [his] conscious mind. [He] used alcohol and drugs increasingly, dropped out of high school at age seventeen, became addicted to cocaine and speed, and became an angry, alienated and sometimes suicidal person."

n2 In the trial court defendant moved to enjoin plaintiff from substituting defendant's real name for the "Doe" designation contained in the complaint. In opposition, plaintiff submitted a declaration further detailing his allegations of sexual abuse. Later, both parties joined in requesting the court to take judicial notice of plaintiff's declaration in ruling on the demurrer and the court did so. (See generally, Del E. Webb Corp. v. Structural Materials Co. (1981) 123 Cal. App. 3d 593, 604 [176 Cal. Rptr. 824].) We likewise take judicial notice of plaintiff's declaration in evaluating the sufficiency of the complaint to withstand demurrer. (Evid. Code, § 459, subd. (a).)

Plaintiff further alleges that as a result of defendant's actions, he became subject to psychological mechanisms of denial and dissociation, "which by [*1182] their natural operation reasonably and justifiably prevented plaintiff from being able to know the psychological and emotional injuries which were occurring and would in the future continue to occur and develop in him . . . . Said mechanisms naturally and reasonably prevented plaintiff from being able to discover that psychological injuries occurring in his adult life were causally connected to the sexual abuse, and from being able to discover the wrongfulness of defendant's conduct, until on or after approximately September 1, 1991," when plaintiff underwent counseling.

In sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend, the trial court ruled that delayed discovery did not apply given plaintiff's allegations suggesting he knew of the wrongfulness of defendant's conduct when it occurred and that he suffered appreciable injury at that time. The trial court concluded the limitations period expired on plaintiff's 19th birthday in March 1981.

III

Prior to 1987, the period of limitations applicable to claims of personal [6] injury, including sexual abuse, was prescribed by section 340, subdivision (3), which provides a one-year period of limitations. (DeRose v. Carswell (1987) 196 Cal. App. 3d 1011, 1015 [242 Cal. Rptr. 368]; Trube v. Katz (1923) 60 Cal. App. 474, 476 [213 P. 264].) However, if the plaintiff was a minor when the one-year period would otherwise expire, the statute was tolled until the plaintiff reached the age of majority. (§ 340, subd. (3), 352; Debbie Reynolds Prof. Rehearsal Studios v. Superior Court (1994) 25 Cal. App. 4th 222, 229 [30 Cal. Rptr. 2d 514] (Debbie Reynolds); David A. v. Superior Court (1993) 20 Cal. App. 4th 281, 283 [24 Cal. Rptr. 2d 537].) Under section 340, subdivision (3), plaintiff's cause of action would have expired in March 1981 when he turned 19. (See David A. v. Superior Court, supra, 20 Cal. App. 4th at p. 283.)

In 1986, the Legislature added section 340.1, which prescribed a threeyear limitations period for sexual abuse against a child under the age of fourteen where such abuse was committed by a member of the child's household or family. (Stats. 1986, ch. 914, § 1, pp. 3165-3166.)

[392] In 1990, [7] section 340.1 was amended to apply to all civil causes of action arising from childhood sexual abuse--not just those involving household or family members. The 1990 amendments extended the limitations period to within eight years of the date the plaintiff attains the age of majority or within three years of the date plaintiff discovers or reasonably should have discovered that psychological injury or illness occurring after the age of majority was caused by the sexual abuse, "whichever occurs later." (Stats. [*1183] 1990, ch. 1578, § 1, p. 7550.) The 1990 amendments apply to any action commenced on or after January 1, 1991. (1) "The obvious goal of amended section 340.1 is to allow sexual abuse victims a longer time period in which to become aware of their psychological injuries and remain eligible to bring suit against their abusers." (Debbie Reynolds, supra, 25 Cal. App. 4th at p. 232.)

Plaintiff's action was commenced in 1994. The 1990 amendments were specifically made applicable to any action commenced on or after January 1, 1991. However, if section 340.1 as amended in 1990 were still the law, it would arguably have availed plaintiff nothing. His action might well [8] have remained time-barred under section 340, subdivision (3) as of his 19th birthday in 1981 because it does not unambiguously appear the Legislature intended by the 1990 amendments to revive time-barred claims.

The 1994 amendments to section 340.1, effective January 1, 1995, reenacted the limitations periods set forth in the 1990 amendments, continued their appplicability to any action filed on or after January 1, 1991, and expanded that category of actions to include "any action otherwise barred by the period of limitations in effect prior to January 1, 1991," thereby reviving those causes of action which had lapsed or technically expired under the law existing prior to January 1, 1991. (§ 340.1, subd. (o).) To dispell any possible remaining uncertainty, the Legislature added subdivision (p) to section 340.1, which states: "The Legislature declares that it is the intent of the Legislature, in enacting the amendments to this section exacted at the 1994 portion of the 1993-94 Regular Session that the express language of revival added to this section by [these] amendments shall apply to any action commenced on or after January 1, 1991."

The legislative intent is clear. (2) The question [9] remains whether the Legislature has the power retroactively to revive a civil cause of action time-barred under the former statute of limitations.

The federal rule has long been established. In Campbell v. Holt (1885) 115 U.S. 620, 627-628 [29 L. Ed. 483, 486-487, 6 S. Ct. 209], the court held the retroactive revival of time-barred claims is constitutionally permissible as long as it does not interfere with vested title to real or personal property. (See also Chase Securities Corp. v. Donaldson (1944) 325 U.S. 304, 314 [89 L. Ed. 1628, 1635-1636, 65 S. Ct. 1137] [reaffirming Campbell and holding that revival of a personal cause of action which does not involve the creation of title does not offend notions of due process: "[The] shelter [of the statute of limitations] has never been regarded as . . . a 'fundamental' right . . . ."].) [*1184]

In 1985, Witkin described the state of the law in California as "unsettled." (3 Witkin, Cal. Procedure (3d ed. 1985) Actions, § 332, p. 362, and authorities cited therein; see also Gallo v. Superior Court (1988) 200 Cal. App. 3d 1375, 1378 [246 Cal. Rptr. 587] ["California law is unsettled regarding whether [10] the Legislature may make a statute of limitations retroactive in the sense that it revives a claim which is already time-barred." (Italics in original.)].) That issue has since been addressed in Liebig v. Superior Court, supra, 209 Cal. App. 3d 828 which considered the language of revival contained in the original version of section 340.1 which was enacted in 1986 and applied only to causes of action arising from childhood sexual abuse by a household or family member. n3 The Liebig court found no constitutional impediment to revival in the [393] case of a traditional common law cause of action where, as here, the Legislature makes express its intent the law be given retrospective application: "We adopt the distinction . . . between statutory and common law causes of action, and . . . hold that the Legislature has the power to expressly revive time-barred civil common law causes of action. This holding is consistent with the niche in our civil law occupied by statutes of limitations. 'The principle is . . . well established that "[s]tatutorily imposed limitations on actions are technical defenses which should be strictly construed to avoid the forfeiture of [11] a plaintiff's rights. . . ." [Citation.] [T]here is a "strong public policy that litigation be disposed of on the merits wherever possible." ' [Citations.]" (209 Cal. App. 3d at p. 835.)

n3 Subdivision (e) of the 1986 version of section 340.1 provided that the new three-year period of limitations would apply not only to actions pending as of its effective date, January 1, 1987, but to "[a]ny action commenced on or after January 1, 1987, including any action which would be barred by application of the period of limitation applicable prior to January 1, 1987."

Defendant argues Liebig was wrongly decided, claiming it misconstrued earlier California decisions in which the issue of extending the statute of limitations to lapsed claims was considered. We have reviewed those decisions, as well as other authorities cited in Liebig and by defendant, and find the Liebig court's conclusions regarding the power of the Legislature to revive lapsed claims are clearly supported by the authorities cited [12] in that decision. (See also Nelson v. Flintkote Co. (1985) 172 Cal. App. 3d 727, 733-734 [218 Cal. Rptr. 562].) It would serve no useful purpose to engage in a duplicative analysis. Suffice it to say defendant fails to persuade us that Liebig was wrongly decided and should not be followed.

(3) In a related claim, defendant argues that because the trial court ruled on the demurrer prior to the effective date of the 1994 amendments to section 340.1, the trial court's order must be affirmed. We disagree. Statutes of limitations in civil actions are procedural, not substantive (3 Witkin, Cal. [*1185] Procedure, op. cit. supra, § 308, p. 337; Talei v. Pan American World Airways (1982) 132 Cal. App. 3d 904, 909 [183 Cal. Rptr. 532]), and are not subject to the general rule against statutory retroactivity. (See Nelson v. Flintkote Co., supra, 172 Cal. App. 3d 727, 733; Republic Corp. v. Superior Court (1984) 160 Cal. App. 3d 1253, 1257 [207 Cal. Rptr. 241].) While the 1994 amendments to section 340.1 were not in effect at the time the trial court ruled on the demurrer, the amended statute applies to this proceeding because it "was pending on appeal [13] at the time the legislative enactment became effective." (Woodland Hills Residents Assn., Inc. v. City Council (1979) 23 Cal. 3d 917, 931 [154 Cal. Rptr. 503, 593 P.2d 200] and see authorities cited therein; Nelson v. Flintkote Co., supra, 172 Cal. App. 3d 727, 733; Manquero v. Turlock etc. School Dist. (1964) 227 Cal. App. 2d 131, 135-137 [38 Cal. Rptr. 470].)

IV

(4) Defendant argues that even if the 1994 amendments to section 340.1 are applicable, this action is barred by those limitation provisions. As amended in 1994, section 340.1 allows an action to be commenced "within eight years of the date the plaintiff attains the age of majority or within three years of the date the plaintiff discovers or reasonably should have discovered that psychological injury or illness occurring after the age of majority was caused by the sexual abuse, whichever period expires later." Plaintiff commenced this action when he was 31 years of age, i.e., more than 8 years after the date he attained the age of majority. (§ 340.1, subd. (a).)

Nonetheless, plaintiff's action is timely if it falls within the three-year delayed discovery provisions of section 340.1. Defendant argues [14] there can be no claim of delayed discovery given plaintiff's allegations that he suffered actual and appreciable injury at the time of the abuse, coupled with plaintiff's admission he never repressed his memory of the events. n4 We disagree.

n4 In his declaration, plaintiff admits he never repressed his memory of the abuse, although he does claim he buried such memories "as far as [he] could out of [his] conscious mind." Plaintiff also states that after the incident wherein he ejaculated, he suffered emotionally, and was so distraught over the incident that he left defendant's residence and hitchhiked home.

First, whether plaintiff suffered an actual or appreciable injury at the time of the abuse is not relevant to delayed discovery claims made under the present version of [394] section 340.1. (See Marsha V. v. Gardner (1991) 231 Cal. App. 3d 265, 280-282 [281 Cal. Rptr. 473] (dis. opn. of Johnson, J.); cf. DeRose v. Carswell, supra, 196 Cal. App. 3d at pp. 1017-1019) Subdivision [15] (a) of section 340.1 could not be more clear: the delayed discovery provisions of section 340.1 relate to injuries occurring after the age of majority. [*1186] (§ 340.1, subd. (a); see generally, Delaney v. Superior Court (1990) 50 Cal. 3d 785, 798 [268 Cal. Rptr. 753, 789 P.2d 934] [In determining the intent of the lawmakers, we look first to the words of the statute; if the language is clear and unambiguous, there is no need for construction.].)

Second, that plaintiff did not repress the memories of the abuse inflicted upon him does not mean he cannot take advantage of the delayed discovery provisions of section 340.1. Nothing in section 340.1 requires that memories of abuse be repressed as a prerequisite to a delayed discovery claim.

To the contrary, to satisfy delayed discovery plaintiff need only allege the onset of psychological injury or illness after the age of majority and that he commenced his action within three years of the time he discovered or reasonably should have discovered such psychological injury or illness was caused by the childhood sexual abuse. (§ 340.1, subd. (a).)

Plaintiff has adequately pleaded facts supporting delayed discovery. [16] Plaintiff alleges that notwithstanding the psychological injury and illness he suffered as an adult resulting from defendant's sexual misconduct, plaintiff did not discover the connection between such illness and the acts of misconduct until he began counseling in September 1991. Moreover, plaintiff has alleged numerous facts establishing the reasonableness of the delay in discovering the connection between his adult illness or injury and the childhood sexual abuse i.e. his age and relationship to defendant at the time of the abuse, the ways in which defendant used his familial relationship of trust to manipulate plaintiff into allowing the sexual touching, and how, as a result of defendant's conduct, plaintiff internalized feelings of shame and self-blame while blocking out and dissociating from those feelings, rendering him unable to perceive the injurious nature of defendant's conduct. For purposes of withstanding demurrer, such allegations are sufficient. (See Dujardin v. Ventura County Gen. Hosp. (1977) 69 Cal. App. 3d 350, 356 [138 Cal. Rptr. 20].)

We are not unsympathetic to the plight of defendants who find themselves forced to defend an action years, possibly even [17] decades, after the alleged acts of abuse are said to have occurred. The potentially devastating impact of accusations of sexual molestation cannot be minimized, particularly when coupled with the obvious difficulty in defending an action where evidence has been lost, memories have faded, and witnesses have long since disappeared. (See generally, Prudential-LMI Com. Insurance v. Superior Court (1990) 51 Cal. 3d 674, 684 [274 Cal. Rptr. 387, 798 P.2d 1230]; Duty v. Abex Corp. (1989) 214 Cal. App. 3d 742, 748-749 [263 Cal. Rptr. 13].)

It is not for this court, however, to strike the appropriate balance between the policies implemented by statutes of limitation granting repose from stale [*1187] claims, and the policies favoring a remedy for victims of childhood sexual abuse the consequences of which, due to the tender age of the victims and the lingering psychological effect of the injury, will sometimes remain unredressed unless the reality of delayed discovery of its cause is recognized. The Legislature, whose prerogative it is, has resolved these competing policy considerations through the present version of section 340.1. (See Marsha V. v. Gardner, supra [18] , 231 Cal. App. 3d at pp. 283-284 (dis. opn. of Johnson, J.)) "[T]he Legislature [has] struck the balance in favor of allowing recovery of late-discovered causes of action in child sex abuse cases . . . ." (Id., at p. 284.) In light thereof, it is the function of this court simply to apply the statute as written. (Blakey v. Superior Court (1984) 153 Cal. App. 3d 101, 107 [200 Cal. Rptr. 52].) n5 n5 Plaintiff's request that we take judicial notice of the legislative history surrounding the 1994 amendments to section 340.1 is denied. Because section 340.1 is clear on its face, there is no need to consider extraneous materials. (Delaney v. Superior Court, supra, 50 Cal. 3d at p. 798.)

[395] The judgment is reversed. The matter is remanded to the trial court with directions to overrule defendant's demurrer and reinstate plaintiff's complaint. Plaintiff is to recover costs on appeal.

Nicholson, J., and Raye, J., concurred.

Respondent's petition for review by the Supreme Court was [19] denied February 22, 1996.

Dear Senator French:

The Council on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault thanks you for introducing SB 47: Statute of Limitation for Sexual Offenses. We fully support this legislation to permit victims of felony sexual offenses a time period in which to seek civil action against the perpetrators of these heinous crimes.

As you know, victims of sexual assault, both children and adults, often do not disclose the abuse for years because of the shame and trauma they feel. It is important that individuals who were victimized prior to the lifting of Alaska's statute of limitations on these crimes be provided an avenue to pursue truth and justice. We applaud your efforts to create a way for them to do so.

This legislation is also important to victims because the ability to have the abuse recognized and condemned is a key to healing. Many victims who have not seen their assailants held accountable by the criminal justice system and seek justice through civil legal action speak to the healing effects the process affords them. We thank you for sponsoring SB 47; for your support of those victims who want their stories told in the civil justice system; and, for providing another tool to use in holding sex offenders responsible for their crimes.

Sincerely,

Chris Ashenbrenner

Re: Opportunity to present on the state of legal services for victims of domestic violence and sexual assault in Alaska

The Network's Legal Advocacy Project (LAP), the Alaska Immigration Justice Project (AIJP) and Alaska Legal Services (ALSC) provide vital assistance to alleviate the crisis of domestic violence and sexual assault affecting too many Alaskan families. We would like to share information with the Legislature of our activities and of the continuing need for victims to have access to legal services.

As you know only too well, domestic violence and sexual assault are overwhelming problems in our state. Alaska has the highest sexual assault rates in the nation with rates twice the national average. In 2007, Alaska had the nation's seventh-highest rate of violence, according to the FBI's new Uniform Crime Report.

Legal assistance is a vital component of the protection victims need to pursue safe and healthy lives. ALSC, the state's general-purpose legal aid agency since 1966 with its focus on low-income Alaskans, has long recognized domestic violence as one of the most pressing problems in the array of legal issues faced by our state's indigent families. The LAP, since its inception in 1996, has provided victims with attorneys specializing in representation of domestic violence victims, as well as training and mentoring volunteer attorneys especially for these cases. AIJP, since its creation in 2005, has focused on provided protecting the human rights of low income immigrants and refugees, serving victims of violence, unaccompanied abused and neglected children, victims of human trafficking and persons fleeing torture in their home countries. Unfortunately, the demand for legal services for victims of domestic violence is greater than the existing resources of these three agencies.

The ability of the LAP, AIJP and ALSC are able to assist victims in crisis helps ensure a healthy future for Alaskan families by breaking the cycle of violence and creating safe custody and visitation situations. Preventing future violence and keeping families safe is a wise investment in Alaska's future.

We would appreciate the opportunity to present our work to your committees in the near future. Please contact Ms. Robinson to arrange a meeting time at your convenience.

Letter of Support
SB 47: Statute of Limitations for Sexual Offenses

The Alaska Women's Lobby, a statewide group defending and advancing the rights and needs of women, children and families, supports SB 47. It gives an important window of time to certain victims of felony sexual assault.

The statute of limitations for felony sexual assault was eliminated in 2001 for cases that were open at the time and for sexual assault that occurred after the passage of the bill. Unfortunately, the limitation was not lifted for those victims who were assaulted and the statute of limitations had already run. We applaud Senator French for introducing SB 47 which allows a one year period of time in which those victims may bring a civil action against the perpetrators who committed the sexual assault.

Sometimes civil actions are the only legal means to recover some measure of personal loss caused by the trauma of sexual assault and its emotional effects. The perpetrator or those responsible for an assault can be held accountable. The victim has a chance to tell her/his story and confront the perpetrator. The case can put the community on notice about the perpetrator. Having the perpetrator formally held accountable for his/her actions may provide relief to the victim and restore a sense of balance that has been missing for too long.

Creating this window of opportunity for justice and closure is the least we can do for those who continue to suffer in silence without a recourse that is available to anyone who has been assaulted since 2001. Please pass SB 47 this session.

POSITION STATEMENT IN OPPOSITION TO SB 47

The Society of Jesus, Oregon Province

Senate Bill 47 seeks to make a retroactive change to the statute of limitations for certain civil claims alleging felony sexual abuse. Sexual abuse is a serious crime which must be eradicated from our society. SB 47, however, does not assist with that goal. SB 47 does not deter or prevent sexual abuse. Instead, it seeks to create a retroactive suspension of the statute of limitations to allow lawsuits to be filed to collect monetary damages for acts that took place many decades ago on claims which have already expired under existing law.

The Society of Jesus, Oregon Province ("Province") has been dealing with claims arising out of alleged sexual abuse of minors; claims date back to the 1940s and continue through the early 1990s. The vast majority of the claims are from 30-40 years ago. Alaska law has a series of statutes of limitations which have been interpreted by our courts so as to strike a balance between insuring claimants have enough time to file a claim and protecting persons from due process concerns that arise when subjected to stale claims.

Courts (and common sense) long have recognized that adjudications become less reliable with the passage of time; both our Alaska Supreme Court and the United States Supreme Court have said so. Over time, the risk grows that evidence may be lost or that key witnesses may disappear or die. The testimony of available witnesses also becomes less reliable over time as memories fade and recollections of events are colored by intervening experiences.

What SB 47 does is create a one year period of time where no statute of limitations whatsoever would apply. If this bill were to become law, it would pose serious problems for the State of Alaska, as well as public and private organizations within the state. The problems generally are as follows:

- Retroactively suspending the statute of limitations would impair the integrity of Alaska's judicial system for dispute resolution. Retroactive suspension would allow plaintiffs to make allegations of past wrongdoing without any consideration to how long ago the alleged wrongdoing occurred. As a result, the State of Alaska, public entities (such as, schools, correctional facilities foster care programs, municipalities—any government program where adults work with minors under age 18) and non-profit entities that work with children (such as the Boy and Girl Scouts, Boys and Girls Clubs, sports and religious organizations) will be subjected to defending claims alleging misconduct many decades ago.

- SB 47 would significantly increase the risk of inaccurate adjudications or potentially fraudulent claims. Although a plaintiff making an allegation necessarily would be alive and available to testify, the passage of time makes it likely that other key witnesses and evidence would be unavailable to disprove plaintiff's allegations. Documents about supervision and attendance (or potential insurance) are regularly discarded over time. Our system of justice works only when witnesses on both sides can be heard and one party is not deprived of important evidence. Reviving decades-old claims where an important witness or party has died or is unable to testify as to the allegations is inherently unfair.

- Strong arguments exist that SB 47 is unconstitutional. Due process and other constitutional considerations weigh against, and sometimes prohibit, retroactive revival of time-barred claims.

The primary beneficiaries of SB 47 are not necessarily real victims of abuse. It is public knowledge that in the 2008 settlement the Province made with more than 100 plaintiffs in Northern Alaska, $20 million of the $50 million settlement went to two private law firms. Moreover, in testimony before the Alaska Senate Judiciary Committee in 2007, the Executive Director of a victim's advocacy group testified that the normal recovery to victims of sexual abuse is approximately 30% on every dollar.

The Alaska legislature previously modified the statute of limitations to allow claims for felony sexual abuse to be initiated at any time for any claim arising after October 1, 2001. In addition, under the current state of the law (and as the Province is well aware), access to the courts for child sexual abuse is still possible with the understanding that claimants are required to demonstrate why their claims are timely under the law as it presently exists.

While the Province has recently filed for protection under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, the fact remains that numerous claims are outstanding and remain to be decided and ultimately handled through the legal processes available under the law. The full impact of SB 47 is being evaluated, but at this point in time, the Province believes, as it did in years past, that SB 47 does not serve the public good of state, private and public institutions, as well as religious institutions. Thus, the Province believes that SB 47 is a bill that should not be passed into law.

Total Estimated Cost of Child Abuse and Neglect in the United States

Ching-Tung Wang, Ph.D. and John Holton, Ph.D.

Child abuse and neglect are preventable, yet each year in the United States, close to one million children are confirmed victims of child maltreatment. An extensive body of research provides promising and best practices on what works to improve child safety and well-being outcomes and reduce the occurrence of child abuse and neglect. These efforts are essential as child abuse and neglect have pervasive and long-lasting effects on children, their families, and the society. Adverse consequences for children's development often are evident immediately, encompassing multiple domains including physical, emotional, social, and cognitive. For many children, these effects extend far beyond childhood into adolescence and adulthood, potentially compromising the lifetime productivity of maltreatment victims (Daro, 1988).

It is well documented that children who have been abused or neglected are more likely to experience adverse outcomes throughout their life span in a number of areas:

- Poor physical health (e.g., chronic fatigue, altered immune function, hypertension, sexually transmitted diseases, obesity);
- Poor emotional and mental health (e.g., depression, anxiety, eating disorders, suicidal thoughts and attempts, post-traumatic stress disorder);
- Social difficulties (e.g., insecure attachments with caregivers, which may lead to difficulties in developing trusting relationships with peers and adults later in life);
- Cognitive dysfunction (e.g., deficits in attention, abstract reasoning, language development, and problem-solving skills, which ultimately affect academic achievement and school performance);
- High-risk health behaviors (e.g., a higher number of lifetime sexual partners, younger age at first voluntary intercourse, teen pregnancy, alcohol and substance abuse); and
- Behavioral problems (e.g., aggression, juvenile delinquency, adult criminality, abusive or violent behavior) (Child Welfare Information Gateway, 2006; Goldman, Salus, Wolcott, & Kennedy, 2003; Hagele, 2005).

The costs of responding to the impact of child abuse and neglect are borne by the victims and their families but also by society. This brief updates an earlier publication documenting the nationwide costs as a result of child abuse and neglect (Fromm, 2001). Similar to the earlier document, this brief places costs in two categories: direct costs, that is, those costs associated with the immediate needs of children who are abused or neglected; and indirect costs, that is, those costs associated with the long-term and/or secondary effects of child abuse and neglect. All estimated costs are presented in 2007 dollars. Adjustments for inflation have been conducted using the price indexes for gross domestic product published by the Bureau of Economic Analysis (http://www.bea.gov).

Based on data drawn from a variety of sources, the estimated annual cost of child abuse and neglect is $103.8 billion in 2007 value. This figure represents a conservative estimate as a result of the methods used for the calculation. First, only children who could be classified as being abused or neglected according to the Harm Standard in the Third National Incidence Study of Child Abuse and Neglect (NIS-3) are included in the analysis. The Harm Standard requirements, compared to the Endangerment Standard requirements used in NIS-3, are more stringent (Sedlak & Broadhurst, 1996). Second, only those costs related to victims are included. We have not attempted to quantify other costs associated with abuse and neglect, such as the costs of intervention or treatment services for the perpetrators or other members of the victim's family. Third, the categories of costs included in this analysis are by no means exhaustive. As examples, a large number of child victims require medical examinations or outpatient treatment for injuries not serious enough to require hospitalization; maltreated children are at greater risk of engaging in substance abuse and require alcohol and drug treatment services; and youth with histories of child abuse and neglect may be at greater risk of engaging in risky behaviors such as unprotected sexual activities as well as greater risk of teen pregnancy. We were not able to estimate these types of costs as data are not readily available.

Although the economic costs associated with child abuse and neglect are substantial, it is essential to recognize that it is impossible to calculate the impact of the pain, suffering, and reduced quality of life that victims of child abuse and neglect experience. These "intangible losses", though difficult to quantify in monetary terms, are real and should not be overlooked. Intangible losses, in fact, may represent the largest cost component of violence against children and should be taken into account when allocating resources (Miller, 1993).

Total Annual Cost of Child Abuse and Neglect in the United States
DIRECT COSTS

Direct Costs	Estimated Annual Cost (in 2007 dollars)
Hospitalization Rationale: 565,000 maltreated children suffered serious injuries in 1993[1]. Assume that 50% of seriously injured victims require hospitalization[2]. The average cost of treating one hospitalized victim of abuse and neglect was $19,266 in 1999[3]. Calculation: 565,000 x 0.50 x $19,266 = $5,442,645,000	$6,625,959,263
Mental Health Care System Rationale: 25% to 50% of child maltreatment victims need some form of mental health treatment[4]. For a conservative estimate, 25% is used. Mental health care cost per victim by type of maltreatment is: physical abuse ($2,700); sexual abuse ($5,800); emotional abuse ($2,700) and educational neglect ($910)[4]. Cross referenced against NIS-3 statistics on number of each incident occurring in 1993[1]. Calculations: Physical Abuse – 381,700 x 0.25 x $2,700 = $257,647,500; Sexual Abuse – 217,700 x 0.25 x $5,800 = $315,665,000; Emotional Abuse – 204,500 x 0.25 x $2,700 = $138,037,500; and Educational Neglect – 397,300 x 0.25 x $910 = $90,385,750; Total = $801,735,750.	$1,080,706,049
Child Welfare Services System Rationale: The Urban Institute conducted a study estimating the child welfare expenditures associated with child abuse and neglect by state and local public child welfare agencies to be $23.3 billion in 2004[5].	$25,361,329,051
Law Enforcement Rationale: The National Institute of Justice estimated the following costs of police services for each of the following interventions: physical abuse ($20); sexual abuse ($56); emotional abuse ($20) and educational neglect ($2)[4]. Cross referenced against NIS-3 statistics on number of each incident occurring in 1993[1]. Calculations: Physical Abuse – 381,700 x $20 = $7,634,000; Sexual Abuse – 217,700 x $56 = $12,191,200; Emotional Abuse – 204,500 x $20 = $4,090,000; and Educational Neglect – 397,300 x $2 = $794,600; Total = $24,709,800	$33,307,770

INDIRECT COSTS

Indirect Costs	Estimated Annual Cost (in 2007 dollars)
Special Education Rationale: 1,553,800 children experienced some form of maltreatment in 1993[1]. 22% of maltreated children have learning disorders requiring special education[6]. The additional expenditure attributable to special education services for students with disabilities was $5,918 per pupil in 2000[7]. Calculation: 1,553,800 x 0.22 x $5,918 = $2,022,985,448	$2,410,306,242
Juvenile Delinquency Rationale: 1,553,800 children experienced some form of maltreatment in 1993[1]. 27% of children who are abused or neglected become delinquents, compared to 17% of children in the general population[8], for a difference of 10%. The annual cost of caring for a juvenile offender in a residential facility was $30,450 in 1989[9]. Calculation: 1,553,800 x 0.10 x $30,450 = $4,731,321,000	$7,174,814,134
Mental Health and Health Care Rationale: 1,553,800 children experienced some form of maltreatment in 1993[1]. 30% of maltreated children suffer chronic health problems[6]. Increased mental health and health care costs for women with a history of childhood abuse and neglect, compared to women without childhood maltreatment histories, were estimated to be $8,175,816 for a population of 163,844 women, of whom 42.8% experienced childhood abuse and neglect[10]. This is equivalent to $117 [$8,175,816 / (163,844 x 0 .428)] additional health care costs associated with child maltreatment per woman per year. Assume that the additional health care costs attributable to childhood maltreatment are similar for men who experienced maltreatment as a child. Calculation: 1,553,800 x 0.30 x $117 = $54,346,699	$67,863,457
Adult Criminal Justice System Rationale: The direct expenditure for operating the nation's criminal justice system (including police protection, judicial and legal services, and corrections) was $204,136,015,000 in 2005[11]. According to the National Institute of Justice, 13% of all violence can be linked to earlier child maltreatment[4]. Calculations: $204,136,015,000 x 0.13 = $26,537,681,950	$27,979,811,982
Lost Productivity to Society Rationale: The median annual earning for a full-time worker was $33,634 in 2006[12]. Assume that only children who suffer serious injuries due to maltreatment (565,000[1]) experience losses in potential lifetime earnings and that such impairments are limited to 5% of the child's total potential earnings[2]. The average length of participation in the labor force is 39.1 years for men and 29.3 years for women[13]; the overall average 34 years is used. Calculation: $33,634 x 565,000 x 0.05 x 34 = $32,305,457,000	$33,019,919,544
Total Indirect Costs	$70,652,715,359
TOTAL COST	$ 103,754,017,492

Religious Leaders Battle Abuse Bill in New York

By PAUL VITELLO

Roman Catholic and Orthodox Jewish officials in New York are mounting an intense lobbying effort to block a bill before the State Legislature that would temporarily lift the statute of limitations for lawsuits alleging the sexual abuse of children.

A perennial proposal that has been quashed in past years by Republicans who controlled the State Senate, the bill is now widely supported by the new Democratic majority in that chamber, and for the first time is given a good chance of passing.

If signed by Gov. David A. Paterson, a longtime supporter, the bill would at minimum revive hundreds of claims filed in recent years against Catholic priests and dioceses in New York, but dismissed because they were made after the current time limit, which is five years after the accuser turns 18. Similar legislation has passed in Delaware and in California, where a 2003 law led to claims that have cost the church an estimated $800 million to $1 billion in damages and settlements.

The rekindled prospects of the New York bill, known as the Child Victims Act, come at a delicate juncture for the Archdiocese of New York, the nation's flagship see, where Cardinal Edward M. Egan is scheduled to hand over the reins in April. His successor, Archbishop Timothy M. Dolan of Milwaukee, was so hard hit by settlements for past abuse by priests in that archdiocese that he was forced to put its headquarters up for sale.

"We believe this bill is designed to bankrupt the Catholic Church," said Dennis Poust, spokesman for the New York State Catholic Conference, a group representing the bishops of the state's eight dioceses. He said that Cardinal Egan and Bishop Nicholas A. DiMarzio of Brooklyn visited Albany this week to voice their opposition, and that a statewide network of Catholic parishioners had bombarded lawmakers via e-mail.

But while the Catholic Church is leading the opposition, in recent months a loose coalition of disparate groups has also joined the effort. They include leaders of the Hasidic and Sephardic Jewish institutions in Brooklyn, which could face equally costly abuse claims. The New York Civil Liberties Union and the criminal defense bar oppose lifting statutes of limitation as unfair to the accused, who must defend themselves against claims of transgressions decades old.

Under the Albany measure, which Assemblywoman Margaret M. Markey, a Queens Democrat, has shepherded to Assembly approval in each of the last three sessions, people claiming they were sexually abused as children would be given a one-year exemption from the statute of limitations. Regardless of how long ago the alleged abuse occurred, they could file suit in civil court.

At the year's end, time limits on such claims would be restored, but with a wider window: Instead of a five-year period after turning 18, victims would have 10 years to file claims.

The bill would not lift the statute of limitations for criminal prosecutions of child abuse, which in most cases are the same as for civil complaints. For violent assaults like rape, there are no time limits on prosecution.

Many children's advocates say guilt, shame and fear of the emotional toll on family members have often deterred victims from reporting sexual abuse until well into adulthood. The revelations of past abuse by priests that became a national scandal starting in 2002 prompted some to seek redress, only to discover they were barred by the statutes of limitation.

Marci A. Hamilton, a professor at the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law at Yeshiva University who has argued that states should remove all statutes of limitation on child sex abuse claims, said the principle is comparable to the way industrial pollution is treated under the law. "The consequences of toxic pollution may not be known or felt for years after the fact," she said. "The same is often true for children who are sexually abused."

But opponents of such unlimited time frames of liability contend that decades-old memories of childhood events are not reliable.

Foes of Assemblywoman Markey's bill also say it unfairly singles out religious and private institutions, while leaving public schools virtually immune to the same potential liability.

The disparity is built into the legal protections granted under existing state law to all public workers and agencies: to sue a public employee or agency for damages of any kind, a person is required to file a claim within 90 days of the alleged injury. A victim of childhood sex abuse by a public school teacher, for instance, has 90 days after turning 18 to file notice of a claim.

Since the Markey bill would not extend that window, opponents claim that it discriminates. The Rev. Kieran E. Harrington, spokesman for Bishop DiMarzio, said that "a fair piece of legislation would treat all victims equally, and this bill does not do that."

In response to those objections, Assemblyman Vito J. Lopez, a Brooklyn Democrat, introduced an alternative bill last month that would eliminate the proposed one-year suspension of the statute of limitations. Under his measure, the window for filing claims would be extended to seven years after the accuser turns 18, rather than the 10 years in Assemblywoman Markey's bill.

Though he voted for her bill twice in past sessions, he said he had not realized the inequities in the new law until after a series of meetings he held in recent months. They included face-to-face talks with Bishop DiMarzio, he said, as well discussions with civil liberties advocates, members of the Legal Aid Society, and representatives of the Sephardic Community Federation and the United Jewish Organizations of Williamsburg, Brooklyn, which is in his district.

"You have three or four times as many kids in the public schools as in the Catholic schools," Mr. Lopez said. "How is it fair if the law only penalizes these religious and private schools?"

Senator Eric T. Schneiderman of Manhattan, chairman of the Senate Codes Committee, which is scheduled to take up the bill as early as next week, said the disparity might be addressed in future legislation. But he added, "Just because it does not broaden the rights of victims 100 percent does not mean we should not try to broaden their rights somewhat."

In past years, Assemblywoman Markey's bill was never scheduled for discussion in any Senate committee, reflecting the unwavering opposition of the longtime Senate Republican majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno. He did not seek re-election in November, when Democrats won control of the Senate; the new majority leader, Malcolm A. Smith, supports the bill.

Asked for Archbishop Dolan's view of the bill, and its potential impact on his tenure in New York, a spokesman for the New York Archdiocese said Wednesday that the archbishop was not immediately available to comment. Archbishop Dolan spoke out last year against similar legislation in Wisconsin. But at a news conference last month, he said he had not had time to study the New York bill.

Calls to representatives of the United Jewish Organizations of Williamsburg and the Sephardic Community Federation on Wednesday were not returned.

Senator Thomas K. Duane, a Manhattan Democrat and the bill's lead sponsor in the Senate, said he was "extremely optimistic" about its chances.

He said that opponents' claims of unfairness were not compelling, and that warnings of bankruptcy for religious institutions, which he dismissed as unlikely, missed the point.

"It's not about money," he said. "It's about giving people the right to seek justice."

CS FOR SENATE BILL NO. 48( )

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE - FIRST SESSION

BY

Offered:
Referred:

Sponsor(s): SENATORS THERRIAULT, Thomas

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act exempting municipal service area boards from the requirements of conducting meetings open to the public when a meeting is administrative or managerial in nature; and amending the definition of 'meeting' as it relates to public governmental meetings."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 44.62.310(d) is amended to read:

(d) This section does not apply to

(1) a governmental body performing a judicial or quasi-judicial function when holding a meeting solely to make a decision in an adjudicatory proceeding;

(2) juries;

(3) parole or pardon boards;

(4) meetings of a hospital medical staff;

(5) meetings of the governmental body or any committee of a hospital when holding a meeting solely to act upon matters of professional qualifications, privileges, or discipline;

Sec. 2. AS 44.62.310(h)(2) is amended to read:

~~(h) In this section,~~

~~(1) "governmental body" means an assembly, council, board, commission, committee, or other similar body of a public entity with the authority to establish policies or make decisions for the public entity or with the authority to advise or make recommendations to the public entity; "governmental body" includes the members of a subcommittee or other subordinate unit of a governmental body if the subordinate unit consists of two or more members;~~

(2) "meeting" means a gathering of members of a governmental body when

(B) more than three members or a majority of the members, whichever is less, are present, the gathering is prearranged for the purpose of considering a matter upon which the governmental body is empowered to act, and the governmental body has only authority to advise or make recommendations for a public entity but has no authority to establish policies or make decisions for the public entity;

~~(3) "public entity" means an entity of the state or of a political subdivision of the state including an agency, a board or commission, the University of Alaska, a public authority or corporation, a municipality, a school district, and other governmental units of the state or a political subdivision of the state; it does not include the court system or the legislative branch of state government.~~

Purpose: The legislature's legal department has determined that the struck language above is not needed in the bill. Deleting these two definitions is a technical change that would make this bill identical to the House version, HB153.

Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 48 (CRA)

"An Act exempting municipal boards, committees, commissions, or other similar bodies for the requirements of conducting meetings open to the public when a meeting is administrative or managerial in nature; and amending the definition of 'meeting' as it relates to public governmental meetings."

Established under Article X Section 5 of the Alaska State Constitution and AS 29.35.450-490, service area districts provide essential road maintenance, fire protection, and park and recreation services to residents living within established cities and boroughs. In keeping with America's federalist foundations, service area boards and commissions promote local governance by encouraging residents to join together and take responsibility for providing basic community services.

AS 44.62.310(d) prevents a service area from efficiently responding to time sensitive issues such as adverse weather related road conditions without first complying with the Open Meetings Act's requirement of a noticed and held public hearing.

Senate Bill 48 was originally introduced to exempt road service districts from the open meetings requirement so they could quickly respond to unforeseen weather events without having to hold public hearings. Following multiple communications with the Fairbanks North Star Borough, Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 48 {CSSB 48 (CRA)}was introduced to expand the open meetings exemption to all municipal boards, committees, commissions, and other similar bodies meeting solely to conduct administrative or managerial business.

CSSB 48 (CRA) also streamlines the definition of "meeting" as defined in AS 44.62.310(h)(2). Under current statutory language, meeting requirements for advisory bodies are more stringent than those for policy setting bodies. By requiring the same open meetings requirements for advisory bodies as are required for government agencies authorized to establish public policy, members will be able to conduct public meetings in a more clear and uniform manner.

Short Title: Meetings of Road Service Area Boards

Summary:

- CSSB 48 (CRA) expands SB 48's original exemption of road service areas from the Alaska's open meetings act (AS 44.62.310-312) to now include all municipal boards, committees, commissions, and other similar bodies meeting solely for the purpose to conduct administrative or managerial business.
- Establishes a uniform definition of "meeting" under AS 44.62.310(h)(2) for both policy setting and advisory government bodies.

Benefits:

- Grants municipal bodies the legal authority to efficiently carry out in a timely manner such administrative duties as responding quickly to unforeseen road conditions that may cause damage to a road system and subsequent danger.
- Preserves the spirit of an informed and involved citizenry when formulating local public policy. Municipal bodies will still be required to schedule and hold public meetings when discussing policy issues such as contract negotiations and local tax rates.

Background:

- Established under Article X Section 5 of the Alaska State Constitution and AS 29.35.450-490, municipal service areas districts provide essential road maintenance, fire protection, and park and recreation services. In keeping with America's federalist foundations, service districts promote local governance through residents joining together and taking responsibility for providing basic community services.
- AS 44.62.310-312 limits a road service area's ability to efficiently respond to road conditions caused by adverse weather. Unless a public meeting is first scheduled and held, board members cannot discuss and act upon time sensitive issues.
- Under AS 44.62.310(h)(2), meeting requirements for advisory bodies are more stringent than those for policy setting bodies. CSSB 48 (CRA) places the same open meetings requirements on advisory bodies as are on government agencies authorized to establish public policy.

Explanation: CSSB 48 (CRA) expands SB 48's original road conditions exemption to now include administrative and managerial duties which fall within a municipality's purview.

(B) "...more than three members or a majority of the members, whichever is less, are present,..."

Explanation: AS 44.62.310(2) defines the constitution of an "open public meeting" between members of a governmental body. AS 44.62.310(2)(A) mandates that "...more than three members or a majority of the members, whichever is less..." constitutes a meeting for governmental bodies responsible for formulating and establishing public policy. However, AS 44.62.310(2)(B) does not require this same prerequisite for advisory-only bodies; the meeting needs only to be pre-arranged. Consequentially, meeting requirements for advisory bodies (e.g.: local service district) are more stringent than those for policy making bodies (e.g.: borough assembly). CSSB 48 (CRA) establishes a uniform public meetings requirement by placing the same open meetings requirements on advisory bodies as are on government agencies authorized to establish public policy.

FAIRBANKS NORTH STAR BOROUGH

RESOLUTION NO. 2008-34

A RESOLUTION URGING THE ALASKA STATE LEGISLATURE TO REQUEST A STATE LAW CHANGE TO THE OPEN MEETINGS ACT WITH REGARDS TO ROAD SERVICE AREA COMMISSIONS

WHEREAS, there are a variety of rules, regulations, and procedures in Alaska State Law governing the conduct of public meetings, which are intended to ensure that decisions made and actions taken are public knowledge and represent the will of the public that the governing body serves. One of these is the state's Open Meetings Act; and

WHEREAS, the Open Meetings Act requires that all meetings of public bodies are open to the public and that the public body must provide reasonable notice of its meetings. In essence, the Open Meetings Act protects the public's right to know. To accomplish this, the act requires that:

- All deliberations and action taken by a public entity must be done in public view, with limited exceptions;
- The public must be provided prior knowledge of all steps occurring in the decision making process, with limited exceptions; and
- Individual actions of an official are made known.

WHEREAS, in order for these requirements to have full effect, meetings must occur as provided in the notice; and, with few exceptions, the public must be allowed to involve itself in the meeting; the public must also have access to materials being considered during the meeting; and

WHEREAS, with regard to advisory only bodies such as the Fairbanks North Star Borough Road Service Area Commissions, current law dictates that a meeting is:

- a gathering
- of any number of members of the body
- prearranged
- for the purpose of considering any matter upon which the body is empowered to act; and

WHEREAS, Service Area Commissions have management and maintenance duties to perform, requiring some discussion between commissioners thus making compliance with current state law difficult to comply with; and

WHEREAS, exemption from and/or amendments to the following areas of the Act are requested:

- Specify the number of members of an advisory body required for action to constitute a meeting as defined in AS 44.62.310(h)(2)(B);
- Include an exemption in AS 44.62.310(d) when governmental bodies such as Service Area Commissions meet to act on behalf of the borough to supervise and manage the affairs of the service area, to implement policies and programs to protect the safety of the public and preserve the service area's capital assets in a fiscally prudent manner, and other duties considered managerial in nature;

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED by the Fairbanks North Star Borough Assembly requests that a recommendation be made to the Alaska State Legislature to amend state law to change the Open Meetings Act to allow Road Service Area Commissions to effectively conduct business within their areas.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that the FNSB Assembly Road Service Area Committee supports a change to the Open Meetings Act.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that a copy of this resolution shall be forwarded to the Alaska Interior Delegation.

Request for Legislation

AMEND THE OPEN MEETINGS ACT FOR MUNICIPAL ADVISORY BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS WHILE PRESERVING THE INTENT AND PURPOSE OF THE ACT

The proposed legislation attempts to solve two typical problems encountered by volunteer advisory boards and commissions when attempting to comply with the Open Meetings Act. The proposed changes make the law more workable while maintaining the intent and purposes of the Act.

1. The first issue arises because some municipal volunteer boards and commissions perform managerial and administrative functions. Examples include both fire and road service area commissioners who are responsible, once the assembly approves the service area budget, to supervise and manage the affairs of the service area. These include decisions concerning when to plow the streets, whether a pothole needs to be fixed, etc. In implementing these duties commissioners are really fulfilling the role of municipal employees.

Current state law exempts most administrative and managerial activities by exempting staff meetings and gatherings. This exemption recognizes that it would be impossible to apply the Act to the everyday transactions of governmental employees confronting day-to-day issues and problems. This exemption, however, does not currently extend to members of governmental bodies that also have administrative and managerial responsibilities. Thus, volunteer boards and commissions that try to supervise and manage the affairs of a governmental entity, like a service area, often find that they must choose between complying with the Act or providing delayed and unresponsive services.

Exempting these boards and commissions when they meet only to fulfill their administrative and managerial functions allows them to effectively conduct business without harming any of the purposes or intent of the Open Meetings Act. These advisory bodies are still required to comply with the Act whenever they meet to make or discuss legislative or policy decisions, including recommending their annual budget and tax levy, adopting strategic plans, or discussing any other legislative policies.

2. The second issue arises due to an anomaly in state law. Although state law prescribes a minimum number of members necessary to constitute a meeting for policy-making bodies, this exception does not exist for advisory-only bodies. All that is required for a meeting of an advisory body is that the meeting be prearranged. Accordingly, a meeting exists under the Act if only two of a 12 member advisory body decide to meet to discuss to consider the business of the body. In this circumstance the rule for advisory bodies is more stringent than the rule governing actual policy-making bodies. The proposed change removes this anomaly by allowing two members of an advisory board to have a prearranged meeting as long as it does not result in a violation of the "three or a majority" rule applicable to policy-making bodies.

Article 06. OPEN MEETINGS OF GOVERNMENTAL BODIES

AS 44.62.310. Government meetings public

(d) This section does not apply to

(1) a governmental body performing a judicial or quasi-judicial function when holding a meeting solely to make a decision in an adjudicatory proceeding;

(2) juries;

(3) parole or pardon boards;

(4) meetings of a hospital medical staff;

(5) meetings of the governmental body or any committee of a hospital when holding a meeting solely to act upon matters of professional qualifications, privileges or discipline;

(6) staff meetings or other gatherings of the employees of a public entity, including meetings of an employee group established by policy of the Board of Regents of the University of Alaska or held while acting in an advisory capacity to the Board of Regents; or

(7) meetings held for the purpose of participating in or attending a gathering of a national, state, or regional organization of which the public entity, governmental body, or member of the governmental body is a member, but only if no action is taken and no business of the governmental body is conducted at the meetings.

(8) meetings by boards, committees, commissions or other similar bodies when meeting solely to act upon matters that are administrative or managerial in nature.

(h) In this section,

(1) "governmental body" means an assembly, council, board, commission, committee, or other similar body of a public entity with the authority to establish policies or make decisions for the public entity or with the authority to advise or make recommendations to the public entity; "governmental body" includes the members of a subcommittee or other subordinate unit of a governmental body if the subordinate unit consists of two or more members;

(2) "meeting" means a gathering of members of a governmental body when

(B) the gathering is either (i) prearranged by more than two members, or (ii) more than three members or a majority of the members, whichever is less, are present for the purpose of considering a matter upon which the governmental body is empowered to act and the governmental body has only authority to advise or make recommendations for a public entity but has no authority to establish policies or make decisions for the public entity;

(3) "public entity" means an entity of the state or of a political subdivision of the state including an agency, a board or commission, the University of Alaska, a public authority or corporation, a municipality, a school district, and other governmental units of the state or a political subdivision of the state; it does not include the court system or the legislative branch of state government.

Open and effective

Published September 3, 2008

A request by some local road service area commissioners for greater leeway under the state open meetings law seems worthy of consideration. Newspapers usually opine in favor of greater openness in government and tighter rules to make it happen. Strict application of the current law, though, causes nearly impossible problems for the small, volunteer commissions that keep many of our borough roads passable.

Wet summers, such as the one just concluding, can make a mess of the roads, especially those with gravel surfaces. Potholes are unavoidable. Washouts and soft spots are common.
Some of these problems must be fixed rapidly to avoid accidents and damage to vehicles.
Legally, commissioners must discuss and make decisions at quarterly meetings that are open to the public and announced in advance. That's reasonable and advisable.

However, Mother Nature doesn't play by the same rules. Rain clouds don't advertise in the newspaper.
Those clouds can cause damage that requires immediate work. That work may be too expensive to fit within the agreed-upon plan. Commissioners cannot legally talk with each other to reach a consensus about what to do in such situations, though, without holding a public meeting.

The Fairbanks North Star Borough's guidelines for service area commissioners explain the rules: 'If you need to speak to each other, you have enough business for a public meeting. To discuss work and make decisions about what will be done in the service area outside of a public meeting is a violation of the Open Meetings Act.'
Perhaps the problem could be solved by giving the commissions authority to delegate some actions. If not, the law may need some tweaking, because the current situation obviously doesn't provide the kind of flexibility that road service commissions need to do their jobs.
The revisions should be limited in scope, though. Not all road service areas are informal little neighborhood operations. Some spend large amounts of money. For those reasons, their actions should be not only effective but open to public scrutiny.

Re: CSSB 48 (CRA) Hearing Request

CSSB 48 (CRA) amends AS 44.62.310(d) by adding a new section to exempt municipal boards, commissions, and other similar bodies from Alaska's Open Meetings Act when meeting solely to conduct administrative and managerial business. The legislation also clarifies an abnormality in state statute regarding the definition of a "meeting." Meeting requirements for advisory bodies are currently more stringent than those for policy setting bodies. CSSB 48 (CRA) places the same open meetings requirements on advisory bodies as are on government agencies authorized to establish public policy.

AS 44.62.310-312 prevents municipal government bodies from conducting administrative duties such as responding to unforeseen road conditions without first triggering the open meetings act. Unless a public meeting is first scheduled and held, board members may not discuss and act upon time sensitive issues. CSSB 48 (CRA) will grant service area boards and commissions the necessary legal authority to more efficiently implement their duties and responsibilities and respond quickly to unforeseen local events like heavy snowfall or flooding.

CSSB 48 (CRA) also resolves an unintended consequence caused by the definition of "meeting." Under the current language, meeting requirements for advisory bodies are more stringent than those for policy setting bodies. The committee substitute places the same open meetings requirements on advisory bodies as are on government agencies authorized to establish public policy.

I respectfully request you schedule CSSB 48 (CRA) for a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing.

SB 51 - Motor Vehicle Window Tinting

Sponsor Statement

Illegally tinted motor vehicle windows create numerous safety concerns in Alaskan communities across the state. For peace officers, dark tints can completely block an outside view of a driver and passengers, hiding potential threats and essentially 'blindfolding' officers conducting traffic stops. For pedestrians, bikers and motorcyclists, illegal window tinting prevents eye contact with a driver, which is the most effective way to confirm that a driver has seen them as they share the roads.

Alaska law, like all other states in the country, currently limits how dark window tinting can be on vehicles operated on roads in the state. Alaska differs from some other states, however, in that it doesn't currently penalize the professional businesses that make a profit installing illegal window tinting. This bill makes it an infraction to install illegal window tinting.

On top of posing a safety hazard to pedestrians and peace officers, tinting windows illegally can also be a costly endeavor for consumers. After paying hundreds of dollars for a custom tint job, a citation for driving with illegal window tinting runs at $150. While a first citation is often a correctible offense, removing professional window tinting requires a second visit to a tinting business, since the product is difficult to pull off windows. While the consumer is out hundreds of dollars, a tinting business makes even more money.

In Anchorage alone, over 1,200 citations were given out for illegal tinting during 2006. Senate Bill 51 is an act that will protect peace officers, pedestrians and consumers, and I urge your support.

REPORT NUMBER 07.150

PUNISHMENT FOR ILLEGAL AUTOMOBILE WINDOW TINTING IN OTHER STATES

PREPARED FOR SENATOR HOLLIS FRENCH

BY CHUCK BURNHAM, LEGISLATIVE ANALYST

You asked about other states' laws regarding automobile window tinting. Specifically, you wanted to know what punishments other states impose on individuals or businesses that illegally install window tinting.[1]

Our review of the applicable laws of ten western states found that the punishment for illegal installation of window tinting ranged from a fixed fine of $57 in Idaho to a maximum fine of $1,000 and up to one year in jail in California and Nevada.[2] It is important to note, however, that eight of the states whose laws we reviewed allow courts the discretion to set penalties at any level below the maximum amounts prescribed in statute. The following table shows statutory citations, crime classifications, and the associated penalties for illegal installation of window tinting for the ten states we reviewed.

[1] The term "window tinting" is used in this report to describe transparent material that is applied to automobile windows to reduce or filter the amount of light coming through the windows. This material is variously described in other states' laws as "sunscreen" or "sun-shade."

[2] We reviewed the laws of Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Utah, and Washington. We include copies of the applicable laws of these states as Attachment A.

OPINION

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - April 6, 2007
Author: Staff
Too dark

Why is it legal to sell this product?

In Alaska, it is illegal to drive a car with tinted front windows that screen out more than 30 percent of the light. Back windows can screen out no more than 60 percent of the light.

However, it is not illegal for an Alaska business to install window tinting that violates the law.

This makes no sense. It's like saying, "It's illegal to smoke marijuana, but if you want to sell it to somebody -- sure, go ahead. You're not breaking the law. Your customers are."

There are good reasons for limiting how dark a vehicle's front windows can be. At about sunrise and sunset, dark tinting makes it harder for drivers to see potential hazards. In many situations, safety requires pedestrians, bicyclists and other motorists to make eye contact with another driver.

Heavily tinted windows are also a threat to police officers when they need to stop a vehicle. Officers can't see whether the motorist is going to be cooperative or draw a weapon.

Anchorage Sen. Hollis French wants to close the loophole that allows window - tinting businesses to profit from selling an illegal product. His measure, Senate Bill 78, would stop the problem at the source, instead of requiring police to chase down customers who might not know they had spent their hard-earned money to break the law.

Sen. French's original proposal made it a misdemeanor to sell illegally tinted window installations. That was probably too harsh, and it would have been too cumbersome to enforce. The latest version of his bill fixes that flaw by letting police issue a ticket to the business doing the installing.

After police write a few tickets, businesses should get the message: There's no profit in selling a product that violates the law.

BOTTOM LINE: Tinted car windows are illegal and businesses shouldn't profit from installing them.

Opera Fairbanks ready to add new voices to local arts scene

By Dermot Cole
Published March 13, 2007

NEW GROUP: The opera arrives in Fairbanks this weekend with the inaugural production of Opera Fairbanks, "A Touch of Opera."

Assisted by members of the Fairbanks Youth Symphony, the new company will perform arias and ensembles from favorite operas. The performances are Friday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 3 p.m. in the Pioneer Park civic center.

The show is to feature Fairbanks singers Morgan Reed, Brandon Michael and Cassandra Tilly, along with Anchorage performers Anastasia Jamieson and Marlene Bateman and visiting bass singer Michael Douglas Jones.

Tickets are $25 for adults, $20 for senior citizens and military and $12 for students.

As part of his visit, Jones is to present "Opera Outside the Box," a workshop Saturday at Pioneer Park from 1 to 4 p.m. The workshop is open to 15 participants for a $35 fee or $10 for those who attend the production.

For more information and registration, go to www.operafairbanks.org or call 456-7573.

Tickets are available at New Horizons Gallery, the Artworks and Holm Town Nursery.

TINTED WINDOWS: For about 13 years, we've had a state law that limits tinted windows in automobiles. But many drivers ignore this law, as you can tell by walking through a crowded parking lot.

Going overboard on tinted windows creates hazards for pedestrians, bicyclists and other drivers who can't tell if the driver with illegal windows is watching the road, blabbing on a cell phone or looking the other way.

Anchorage Sen. Hollis French has proposed a bill that would close a loophole by making it illegal for businesses to install tinted windows in excess of the legal limits.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a teleconference hearing on SB 78 Wednesday at 1:30 p.m.

French said at an earlier hearing that many after-market businesses where window tints are applied are not aware of the state laws and this new requirement will go a long way toward preventing the problem from getting worse.

In 2006, Anchorage police issued 1,201 citations for drivers with illegal windows. In Fairbanks, there were 174 citations.

OIL TAXES: An oil industry representative took me to task for writing Sunday that there have been "a couple" of tax increases on the oil industry in the past 26 years. I took issue with Exxon's claim that the state has raised taxes 13 times in 20 years.

Thinking some more about this, perhaps I should have written that there have been three or four major increases in oil taxes in the past 26 years.

This includes the change to the ELF statute in 1989, the nickel-a-barrel fee after the Exxon Valdez disaster, the move by former Gov. Frank Murkowski to aggregate North Slope fields in 2005 and the new oil tax system approved by the Legislature last year.

That's hardly a track record of fiscal instability.

WALK ON: Karl Bushby plans to leave Fairbanks and resume his walk around the world in Russia by Thursday, accompanied by Dmitry Keiffer, he told the Moscow Times. He has ambition, but not a lot of money.

"When we hit the ground in Russia, we're basically broke," he told the paper.

WATER EXPO: We may still be surrounded by water in a solid form, but the 2007 Water Expo is on the way.

The two-day event, March 24-25, is set for Hamme Pool, featuring a variety of activities geared to events that take place when the water is free flowing.

For more information and registration, drop by Hamme Pool on Monday through Friday from 1 to 9 p.m.

MEETING: The Filipino American Society of Fairbanks is to hold its annual meeting and elect new officers during a potluck March 24 at 6 p.m. at Pioneer Park.

MUSIC: Four UAF music students won awards at the National Association of Teachers of Singing competition in Anchorage.

They are: Janene Mickel, Vanessa Cox, Gwendolyn Brazier and Walter Fourie.

Title: TEEN CHARGED IN DEATH OF PEDESTRIAN - DRIVER'S VISION PARTLY BLOCKED BY TINTING ON WINDOWS, POLICE SAY
Date: September 20, 2006

A Mooresville teenager who struck and killed a pedestrian earlier this month was charged Tuesday with misdemeanor death by vehicle, said Mooresville Police Chief John Crone.

Lake Norman High School student Kristina Lawson, 17, has told police she didn't see Janet Bush, 56, walking in the Morrison Plantation subdivision before she struck her.

Crone said Lawson's vision was obstructed because of tinting on her front and side car windows. Lawson had been previously cited for her window tinting and had it removed before the car was inspected in June, Crone said.

Some time after the inspection and before the Sept. 5 wreck, she put the tinting back on, Crone said.

The tinting and Lawson's failure to yield to the pedestrian's right-of-way in a crosswalk contributed to Bush's death, Crone said.

The impact of the crash hurled Bush 110 feet down Morrison Plantation Parkway.

If convicted, Lawson could face up to one year in prison, Crone said.

Lawson faces an unrelated charge of underage alcohol possession in Mecklenburg County, records show. A previous charge of reckless driving to endanger had been dismissed in Iredell County.

Morrison Plantation residents have been pushing for a traffic signal at the intersection where Bush died. It links the residential and retail sides of the development, which includes about 500 homes, Lowe's YMCA, a Harris Teeter and other businesses.

But town officials and the developers of Morrison Plantation have disagreed about who's responsible for improvements at the intersection. The parkway is a private road that belongs to the developers, but motorists use it as a cut-through between Brawley School Road and N.C. 150

A memorial service for Bush is planned for Friday at St. Therese Catholic Church, 217 Brawley School Road.

Title: SHOOT.SIDE Premonition prompted patrolman to go home, get bulletproof vest
Date: May 19, 1992

San Antonio Patrolman Gilbert Tovar routinely wears his bulletproof vest only on high-crime weekend nights, but an eerie sense of foreboding prompted him to don the protective shield early Monday.

He called it a life-saving premonition.

Three hours into his overnight shift, Tovar stopped a motorist who fired a bullet through the tinted driver's window and into Tovar's chest.

The slug dented Tovar's metal nameplate before its deadly path was deflected by the officer's vest.

"I might not be alive right now if I hadn't worn my vest," the 29-year-old officer said Monday afternoon from his home, where he was recovering from the shooting.

Other than feeling "kind of sore" from the impact of the .38-caliber bullet slamming into his body at close-range and nursing superficial neck wounds caused by glass shards and bullet fragments, Tovar was in good health and in good spirits.

"I thank the Lord I'm still alive," said the San Antonio native, whose two-year police career is the realization of a dream that began his freshman year in high school.

With his parents at his side, Tovar spent Monday "just trying to rest up," adding that he planned to take his first shooting "as a learning experience."

One thing he has learned, he said, is that every night is a potentially dangerous night for a police officer.

"I only wore my vest on Friday and Saturdays. That was wrong," Tovar said. "It could happen anytime. Last night proved that's right."

The officer can't explain his death-defying forewarning.

"Last night, something didn't feel right," he said. "I just didn't feel right about the night."

So two hours after he began patrolling downtown streets, Tovar returned home to get his vest.

"It just so happens it saved my life," he said.

Authorities said Tovar pulled over a car that was driving erratically about 2 a.m. on the West Side. Tovar, unaware the motorist was a suspect in the slaying of a San Antonio College professor, walked up to the car and was shot.

"He caught me totally off guard," Tovar said. "He shot right through the window. He didn't roll the window down."

As the car sped sped away, the injured officer fired at it and then radioed for help. Police said the motorist, whom they arrested after a brief pursuit, suffered a minor graze wound in the thigh from the round fired by Tovar.

"I thank God that nothing happened to my son, and I'm grateful to God that that young man is OK, too," said Tovar's mother, Olga Tovar.

Mrs. Tovar said her son called from the ambulance to say he was injured, but all right.

"He told me not to be scared," she said.

Despite his close call, Tovar who became a police officer for the "challenge" and opportunity to help people will continue to proudly wear the blue uniform.

He added: "I'm going to wear my vest every night from now on, too."

Title: Motorist Killed by Train
Date: February 7, 1995

Excessive window tinting may have been a factor in the death of a teen motorist Monday morning who apparently tried to beat a train at a railroad crossing, an Oklahoma Highway Patrol trooper said.

Eric Sean Dearinger, 19, of Sand Springs was crossing a railroad intersection at South 154th West Avenue and Oklahoma 51 at about 8 a.m. when his 1991 LX Ford Mustang was struck by a train, said trooper Toby McClellan

"From all indications it looks like the driver tried to beat the train," McClellan said.

The train was travelling about 48 mph.

The windows on the car were tinted darker than the law allows, McClellan said.

"When tinting is too dark on the windows, this can effect the depth perception of the driver," McClellan said.

Witnesses told troopers that after the 36-car Burlington Northern freight train hit the car, the car was airborne for about 50 feet. The driver was ejected when the car landed, witnesses said

Information Regarding SB52

To the members of the Senate Judiciary committee,

Contained in this 20 page packet is a summary of information about Salvia divinorum to help you make a more informed decision regarding SB52. I find that Senator Therriault and his aid seem to make arguments referencing news articles and correlations as evidence. As a student of many different scientific fields I find that actual, documented, scientific evidence proves much more valuable when seeking the truth about a subject. This bill threatens religious freedom as well as personal privacy and liberty. Our state has not experienced any ill effects from the legal status of this plant.

SALVIA TRUTH: The Regulation of Salvia divinorum

It is with great consideration that we give the recommendation to regulate instead of criminalizing Salvia divinorum.

This would not only be sensible and cost-effective, but would generate tax revenues and allow our already thinly stretched Law Enforcement and Judicial Agencies to concentrate on combating drugs that have actually been proven to be very harmful (Meth, Crack, Heroine, Cocaine, etc). Online public opinion polls have also shown that more than 75% of citizens oppose the scheduling of Salvia divinorum, supporting instead to regulate it.

We have created a short executive summary that dispels the grossly inaccurate information used to pass several bills in other states. We also have detailed the medicinal properties, effects of criminalization, and the solution of regulating and taxing Salvia divinorum.

Salvia divinorum has been available in the US for over 40 years, and used by millions of Americans. This, in and of itself, is a testament to the amazing safety of this medicinal plant. Many scientific studies have also shown Salvia divinorum to be a remarkably safe herb with incredible medicinal uses and a very low potential for abuse or dependence.

According to a survey of Law Enforcement Agencies, Hospitals, Colleges, Universities, and Rehab Clinics across the United States, in that time, there have been ZERO incidents of Salvia divinorum being directly related to any:

- Crimes
- Addictions
- Accidents
- Injuries

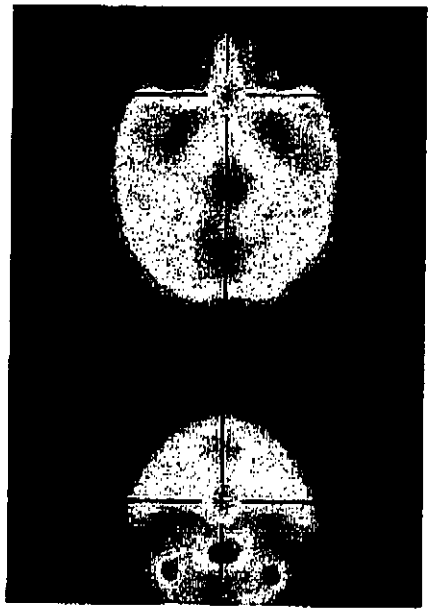
- Overdoses
- Deaths

Salvia divinorum has been SCIENTIFICALLY proven to:

- Be Completely ANTI-ADDICTIVE.
- Be Completely NON-TOXIC.
- Be short-acting with no negative long-term effects.
- Be non-euphoric, with higher dose effects being similar to taking a short nap and dreaming.
- Be an effective tool for psychotherapy due to its ability to enhance self-awareness.
- Be incredibly safer than alcohol, tobacco, or even marijuana.
- Be an effective natural medicinal herb.



Studies have shown Salvia divinorum may effectively treat:

- Severe Depression (long-term persistent relief)
- Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD)
- Drug addictions (crack, cocaine, meth, heroine)
- Obsessive Compulsive Disorder (OCD)
- Anxiety Dicorder
- Schizophrenia
- Chronic Pain
- Arthritis
- Congestive Heart Failure
- Stomach Disorders
- Sleep Disorders
- Bipolar Disorder
- ADD / ADHD
- Alzheimer's
- HIV / AIDS
- Cancer

The criminalization of Salvia divinorum will:

- Cost states millions upon millions per year in enforcement, prosecution and imprisonment.
- Break up and destroy otherwise healthy families through prosecution and imprisonment.
- Punish children for making a 'mistake' by tarnishing their records.
- Cause college students to lose financial aid as a result of a "drug" conviction.
- Prevent sick patients from obtaining organ transplants by branding them as a "drug" abuser.

- Contribute to the already growing problem of prison overcrowding.
- Put our trust and the well-being of our children into the hands of drug dealers.
- Infringe upon the religious freedoms and rights of those who consider Salvia divinorum a divine sacrament.
- Violate the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) established by the Supreme Court Case #04-1084
- Criminalize thousands of gardeners, forcing them to uproot their plants.
- Criminalize therapists who are successfully utilizing Salvia divinorum psychotherapeutically in their practices.
- Punish nonviolent medicinal users of Salvia divinorum.
- Promote unregulated, even unsafe use.
- Encourage a large black market.

The regulation of Salvia divinorum would:

- Protect our children by using the same guidelines currently used for Tobacco and Alcohol sales.
- Promote proper labeling of the product that would protect people more effectively than jails or prisons.
- Promote responsible adult use by criminalizing the sale to minors, effectively protecting our children.
- Prevent irresponsible adult use by utilizing current DWI/DUI, and public intoxication and endangerment laws.
- Be modeled off of the state of Maine which has successfully regulated Salvia divinorum.
- Implement the recommendations of studies that proved regulation is far more effective than criminalizing.
- Allow gardeners to continue utilizing Salvia divinorum as a decorative garden hedge.
- Utilize already established businesses to guard Salvia divinorum from our children via carding.
- Free up our Law Enforcement Officers to target drugs proven dangerous (Meth, Crack, Cocaine, Heroine).
- Allow psychotherapists to continue treating their patients with Salvia divinorum under their supervised care.
- Accommodate the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) by allowing the religious use of Salvia divinorum.
- Effectively address the problem at hand, preventing children from having easy access to Salvia divinorum.
- Generate healthy amounts of tax revenues.

Scheduling is intended for substances that have a high potential for abuse, a lack of accepted safety, and no currently accepted medical use. Scientifically speaking, Salvia divinorum does not meet any of these criteria and is an excellent candidate for regulation rather than criminalization.

In Summary, we recommend, as citizens working for the public good, and also as active voters concerned about the erosion of personal liberties in America, that you not criminalize Salvia divinorum. I wholeheartedly agree with the state of Maine: "Selling or providing Salvia divinorum or salvinorin-A to anyone under the age of 18 would be a criminal offense. Possession by a minor would be a civil violation, punishable by a fine, community service, or both".

We are not against laws being passed in respect to the regulation of this plant. We just wished to convey the most complete set of facts with which to make the best laws with.

MEDICAL & MEDICINAL PROPERTIES

The genus name Salvia is derived from the Latin salvare, meaning "to heal" or "to save." The words salvation and savior also come from this same root. Salvia divinorum is endemic to the Mazatec Sierra of central Mexico, where it has a long history of medicinal use. It is used both for its psychoactive properties and as an effective treatment for arthritis, headache, and eliminatory complaints. The validity of each of these different applications is well supported by recent pharmacological findings.

To summarize recent findings: Salvinorin A is a unique and highly selective kappa-opioid receptor agonist, and as such, it has tremendous potential for the development of a wide variety of valuable medications. The most promising of these include safe non-addictive analgesics, antidepressants, short-acting anesthetics that do not depress respiration, and drugs to treat disorders characterized by alterations in perception, including schizophrenia, Alzheimer's disease, chronic depression, and bipolar disorder (Roth et al., 2002).

Kappa-opioid receptor agonists are of particular interest to pharmacologists because they provide effective pain medications that are not habit forming and do not produce dependence. In fact, there is a growing body of evidence that indicates that kappa-opioid receptor agonists are actually "aversive"—the opposite of addictive. There are numerous case reports in which people testify to the effectiveness of this herb for managing pain. The ability of salvinorin A to block perception of pain also suggests that it proves quite useful as a general anesthetic. The fact that it does not depress respiration indicates that salvinorin A could be much safer than most general anesthetics currently in use. The traditional Mazatec use of Salvia divinorum to treat headaches and arthritis also attests to its efficacy as an analgesic.

Dr. Karl Hanes published a case report in the Journal of Clinical Psychopharmacology, in which he describes a patient that obtained relief from chronic depression by using Salvia divinorum (Hanes, 2001). Many accounts can be found online of people who have recovered from serious, life-threatening depression with the help of this herb. It is especially interesting that these people are able to obtain persistent relief from their depression after only a few treatments. Quite unlike the continuous medication regime required with conventional antidepressants such as Prozac—which in most cases only offer symptomatic relief from depression—Salvia divinorum often produces long-lasting clinical improvement.

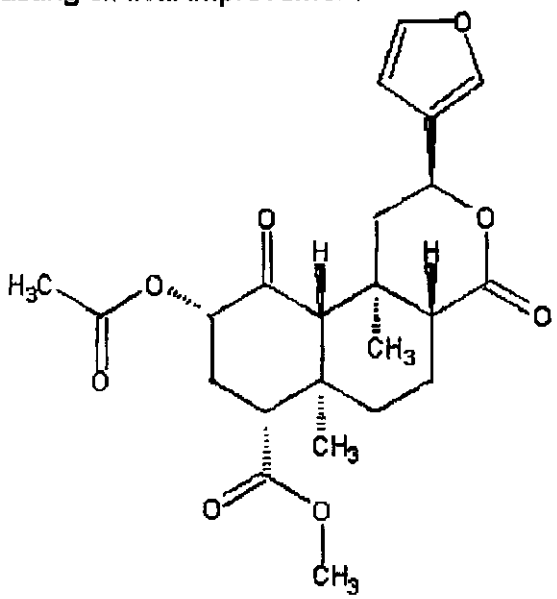
Because salvinorin A alters various perceptual modalities by acting on kappa-opioid receptors, it is clear that these receptors play a prominent role in the modulation of human perception. This suggests the possibility that novel psychotherapeutic compounds derived from salvinorin A would be useful for treating diseases manifested by perceptual distortions (e.g. schizophrenia, dementia, and bipolar disorders). This is a promising area of research that is important to pursue further.



Salvinorin A

Salvia divinorum has several properties that make it useful in psychotherapy: it produces a state of profound self-reflection, it improves one's ability to retrieve childhood memories, and it provides access to areas of the psyche that are ordinarily difficult to reach. There are many psychotherapists who have used this herb in their practice and are impressed with its effectiveness as a psychotherapeutic tool. It has even been used to successfully treat Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). This is not new—the Mazatecs have long used Salvia divinorum to treat psychological complaints.

There are many popular misconceptions about Salvia divinorum. Many of these misconceptions have their origin in a few sensationalistic articles that have appeared in the popular press, and others derive from the absurd advertising claims of unethical herb vendors who deliberately exaggerate the effects of Salvia divinorum in an effort to increase sales.

The fact is that the effects of Salvia divinorum are not appealing to recreational drug users. The majority of people who try it find that they do not enjoy its effects and do not continue using it. People who use it medicinally take it infrequently. It is not euphoric or stimulating. It is not a social drug. Since it increases self-awareness, it is useless as an escapist drug. It is most useful as a natural medicinal herb.

Salvia divinorum is not addictive or habit forming. Its mechanism of action indicates that it is actually anti-addictive. Many people have reported that Salvia divinorum helped them to overcome substance abuse problems. This has included, but is not limited to, addictions of alcohol, caffeine, crack, cocaine, heroin, marijuana, methamphetamine, nicotine, and XTC.

CULTURAL & RELIGIOUS PROTECTIONS

as a sacrament for spiritual ceremonies by the Mazatec peoples of Mexico and for other remedies. Hispanic women routinely use the leaves in a tea to help rid menstrual cramps, many also chew leaves to aid in pain relief or to act as a analgesic. Hispanic mothers have also been known to make a mild, highly effective, elixir for their children to help with colic and minor infections. Hispanics and people of Mexican descent have been using salvia for generations and this plant has been, and still is, a major part of Mexican culture.

There are also religious organizations within the United States which utilize Salvia Divinorum as a literal divine sacrament. They believe it is a plant that was put here, by God, to not only further spiritual enlightenment but to heal our minds, body and souls. It is the foundational basis of their beliefs and is crucially essential to the pursuits of the religion. Adult members utilize Salvia divinorum medicinally and also ritually as a divine spiritual sacrament that is approached with sincere reverence and protection. The act of cultivation is also a major part of this ritual for most followers. Many of these practices and beliefs are several hundred years old, derived from Mazatec spiritual practices. A small church in New Mexico (UDV) recently won a Supreme Court case upholding the use of certain other plants as religious sacraments (Case #04-1084). This gives guaranteed protection under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) that prevents interference and restriction of religious practices.

GENERAL SAFETY

Salvia divinorum is completely non-toxic. Toxicological studies have been performed by Dr. Leander Valdés at the University of Michigan, Jeremy Stewart at the University of Mississippi, Dr. Frank Jaksch of Chromadex Inc., and Wayne Briner of the University of Kansas. Neither Salvia divinorum nor salvinorin A showed toxicity in any of these studies. There is a vast body of empirical evidence that indicates Salvia divinorum is a remarkably safe herb. Indeed, the Mazatecs, who have used S. divinorum for hundreds of years, do not attribute any toxic properties to this plant.

Even after over 40 years of scrutiny the plant is still considered harmless. It has no lingering effects like a hangover, and no one, the DEA included, has heard of a person overdosing or experiencing long-term consequences. Calls to law enforcement agencies, hospitals, rehab clinics, colleges and universities across the United States, failed to reveal Salvia divinorum as a problem or a direct contributor to any addictions, conditions, accidents, injuries, crimes, or deaths. In short, Salvia divinorum is not, and will not be, a danger to anyone.

CONCLUSIONS

Salvia divinorum is a relatively obscure medicinal herb with no significant abuse potential. It does not present a risk to public health or safety.

Criminalizing it would only serve to create a problem where one did not previously exist. The regulation of herbal medicines is a matter handled by the FDA, not the Controlled Substances Act. There is no reasonable justification for making Salvia divinorum a controlled substance. Placing it in schedule I would deprive people of a safe and useful natural medicinal herb, hamper promising medical research, and deprive people of their religious freedoms.

There are also already many laws currently in place that can, and should, be enforced against 'reckless salvia users' that would address the issues of concern and not punish responsible users. This includes, but is not limited to, laws that prohibit public endangerment, public intoxication, reckless driving, and driving under the influence. A more sensible approach would be to regulate Salvia divinorum similar to alcohol or tobacco, moving towards regulating it to individuals 18 years of age or older, making selling or providing it to anyone under the age of 18 a criminal offense with possession by a minor being a civil violation. This would even generate tax revenue during a time when funds are lean and will also save money from the costs of enforcement and legal defense funds. Imprisoned citizens are expensive and deprive states of tax dollars. This is especially true with the costs of housing prisoners on the rise.

Many well meaning bills are based on inaccurate information about Salvia divinorum. Scheduling is intended for substances that have a high potential for abuse, a lack of accepted safety, and no currently accepted medical use. Salvia divinorum does not meet any of these criteria.

Senate Bill 52

Salvia Divinorum (pronounced Div-i-nor-um) is very powerful a hallucinogenic substance primarily grown in the mountainous regions of Mexico. It has a history of use as a vision inducing substance by the Mazatec Indians of the region. Because it is so easy to misuse and can produce long-lasting psychological effects, it is banned or tightly controlled in at least 6 countries and an ever growing number of states.

The leaves of this perennial herb, once processed can be eaten, drunk as a tea, or inhaled. Salvia is presently available to persons in Alaska who choose to order it over the Internet. Although purchasers of this substance are asked to certify they are over the age of 18, we know such restrictions are loosely applied. Sellers and their web sites promise mind-altering experiences, but experts warn that depression and schizophrenia are very real risks with this drug. (www.intheknowzone.com)

As with all items that enter the pop drug culture, Salvia Divinorum is enjoying a rise in use due to the lack of restrictions. We have an opportunity to get ahead of this powerful substance and reduce the risk to our young people by following the lead of other states and countries in declaring Salvia a dangerous substance and adding it to our Schedule II list of illegal drugs. Such action would place it in the same category as Mescaline and Peyote.

I urge your support for this important action.

Legal high new worry for parents

LSD-like herb blamed in Delaware teen's suicide

BY MIKE CHALMERS
THE NEWS JOURNAL

In the daily search for reasons behind their 17-year-old son's suicide, Dennis and Kathy Chidester keep coming back to the same answer: salvia divinorum.

The herb, a cousin of the flowering sages enjoyed by backyard gardeners, contains the world's most potent natural hallucinogen, as strong as LSD. The drug is legal in most states, including Delaware, and easily available through hundreds of Internet sites, including eBay.

That aura of legitimacy lulled Brett Chidester, a straight-A senior at Salesianum School, into thinking smoking salvia leaves was safe, even while convincing himself that he had gained incredible insights into the universe, his parents said.

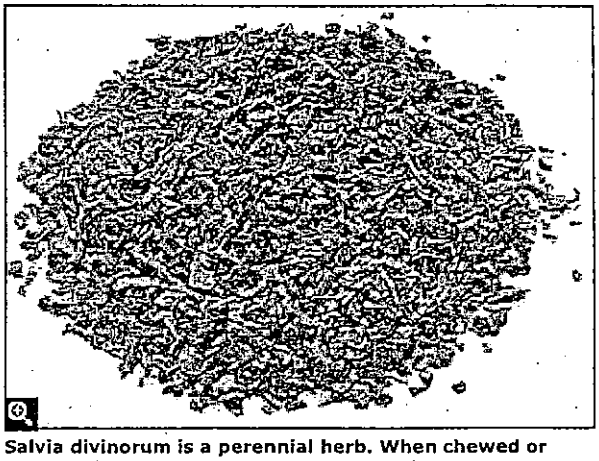
Bret Chidester's parents are certain that smoking salvia divinorum led him to take his own life.



Salvia divinorum is a perennial herb. When chewed or smoked, it produces LSD-type hallucinations.

"Salvia allows us to give up our senses and wander in the interdimensional time and space," Brett wrote in an essay his parents found after his death. "Also, and this is probably hard for most to accept, our existence in general is pointless. Final point: Us earthly humans are nothing."

Brett acted on that belief Jan. 23.

Dennis Chidester had been trying to call Brett all day with no luck. He came home at 5 p.m., opened the garage door and saw a tent pitched inside -- an odd sight that he didn't process right away.

"I just ran upstairs calling his name," Chidester remembered. "Now my heart's pounding. He's not in his room. I go downstairs, I go into the garage and I open up that tent.

"That's the one thing I didn't want to do," he said, his voice cracking. "I found him in there, dead. He had taken a charcoal grill and ... carbon monoxide poisoning."

Brett's essay, suicide note and actions before his death still

About the time Brett Chidester started smoking salvia, his parents say, he began falling into moods of anger or melancholy.

leave his parents with more questions than answers.

"We just won't have any answers, and we have to learn to accept that," Kathy Chidester said. "But my gut feeling is it was the salvia. It's the only thing that can explain it."

Abuse concerns DEA

Mazatec Indians have used salvia divinorum to divine spiritual truths for hundreds or thousands of years, experts said. Outsiders discovered it in the 1960s, but it remained a relatively obscure drug until popularized on the Internet, beginning in the 1990s. It's now sold as live plants that can be grown indoors, dried leaves or liquid extracts, from tiny bags costing a few dollars to wholesale shipments for hundreds of dollars.

"You type 'salvia divinorum' in a search engine and you get 10,000 hits, most of which are head shops on the Internet," said Thomas E. Prisinzano, a medical researcher at the University of Iowa. "That's not good. People are going to abuse it."

Experts and users say when the leaves are chewed or smoked, they produce powerful visions that make users believe they're in an alternate place and time. Despite its growing popularity online, law enforcement and health officials, as well as several teenagers and their parents, said salvia is not a common drug in Delaware.

Since 2003, the federal Drug Enforcement Agency has considered salvia divinorum a "drug of concern" because of its wide availability, potential for abuse and unknown long-term effects. Louisiana, Missouri and several countries have outlawed it, but congressional attempts to control it in the United States have failed, in part because of a reluctance to infringe on the religious freedoms of American Indians.

"It's dangerous," DEA spokeswoman Rogene Waite said. "Just because it's not a controlled substance, people shouldn't think it's OK to use it."

Dennis and Kathy Chidester, who divorced when Brett was 3, are uncomfortable talking publicly about their son's salvia use and suicide. But, they said, they are more uncomfortable remaining silent and letting other parents learn through tragedy.

"If other states can [regulate] it, why do we have to wait for a nationwide law?" Dennis Chidester said. "States should act on their own."

Delaware should consider outlawing salvia, two state legislators said. Sen. Karen E. Peterson, chairwoman of the Senate Combat Drug Abuse Committee, and Rep. Pamela S. Maier, chairwoman of the House Health and Human Development Committee, had not heard of the herb but said they would look at the laws in Louisiana and Missouri.

SALVIA Q&A

Is it legal?

It is not a controlled substance, so it is legal to own, use and distribute salvia divinorum in Delaware and most states. Louisiana, Missouri and several countries have outlawed salvia.

What are the effects?

The DEA considers salvia divinorum a "drug of concern" because its full effects are not known. Researchers said they do not know the long-term effects of using salvia.

Is it addictive?

Researchers and users said salvia is not addictive.

Who uses it?

Mazatec Indians have chewed salvia divinorum for ritual divination and healing for hundreds of years. Westerners discovered it in the 1960s, and its popularity has grown among teenagers and young adults since the 1990s because of availability over the Internet.

Does it have other uses?

Medical researchers are interested in the herb's potential to treat pain without addiction and to better understand Alzheimer's, Parkinson's and other diseases that alter a patient's perception of reality.

How is it sold?

Web sites and Internet vendors sell salvia divinorum as live plants, dried leaves, crushed leaves and a liquid extract.

Legislators in those states banned salvia last year over concerns about teenagers' abuse of it and other hallucinogenic plants.

"It was being marketed to high school kids," said Scott Lipke, a Missouri state representative. "It's not a widespread problem, but we were trying to be out in front on it."

Delaware police said they know little about salvia. "I don't think we'd even know what it is," said Sgt. William Wells, Wilmington police spokesman.

Health officials said it hasn't hit their radar screen, either.

"If it's not an FDA-regulated drug, we couldn't track it any more than we could track someone using ginkgo biloba," said Heidi Truschel-Light, spokeswoman for the Delaware Division of Public Health.

Local merchants who sell glass pipes and other smoking supplies said they don't sell salvia, even though customers ask for it and wholesalers have urged them carry it.

"Kids come in here all the time and ask for it," said Randy Neil, a cashier at Frolic in Newark. "But we don't mess with it. As far as I know, the only place you can get it is the Internet. Probably the reason it's legal now is most people don't know about it."

'Getting deep'

Dennis and Kathy Chidester had never heard of salvia until Brett's cousin told them last summer that she was worried about his salvia use.

About the same time, a friend showed Kathy Chidester Brett's site on MySpace.com, an Internet service where teenagers can chat and share pictures and music. Brett's site contained a video of him and a friend smoking salvia. She confronted him.

"He kept saying, 'Mom, it's legal. It's just an herb. The Indians used to use it to divine knowledge of the universe,' " she remembered. He told them he stopped using salvia, and they believed him.

Still, when Brett was out with friends, his parents would stay up until he came home.

"I thought, if he's doing this stuff or he's drinking, I'm going to know," Kathy Chidester said. "And when he came home, he would be normal, always normal."

Experts said salvia's effects last from a few minutes to an hour or two, with no hangover or other symptoms. Daniel Siebert, a California botanist who sells the herb online and promotes its "responsible" use, described the experience as similar to a vivid dream. "It's like your mind is on autopilot," Siebert said. "Your brain is generating images that have some kind of narrative line to them. It puts your mind in a very introspective place. It's a way of getting deep inside yourself."

Siebert said crowds and loud music make a salvia-induced trip unpleasant, so it's unlikely people would use it as a "party drug" more than once or twice. He supports some regulations on salvia, such as age restrictions and penalties for driving under the influence of salvia.

"People take their experiences way too literally and read too many things into it," Siebert said. "If you take it literally, you really believe you've traveled to other dimensions and met other beings that told you things. Minors are particularly prone to not understanding that."

That doesn't stop some Internet merchants from billing salvia as a legal, albeit more expensive, alternative to illicit recreational drugs.

The site where Brett Chidester got at least one batch sells it in packages dubbed "mind bender," "mood mix" and "freshman selection." It sells a "party pack" of three different strengths of extract, plus four ounces of leaves, for $207.90.

Promising medical use

Salvia does have legitimate research value.

Prisinzano, who earned a bachelor's degree in chemistry from the University of Delaware in 1995, is studying whether salvia's main ingredient, salvinorin A, could be used to create a nonaddictive painkiller. Also, he said, understanding the way salvia creates hallucinations could help scientists better understand Alzheimer's disease and mental illnesses that alter patients' perceptions of reality.

"It's actually become a hot area of research," said Bryan Roth, a leading salvia researcher at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland. In 2002, he discovered how salvinorin A travels through the brain.

One salvia user described watching a mountain lake turn into a desert, Roth said. Another said she found herself in a room with an alternate future behind each door. She picked one door and saw the death of her child, he said.

"Depending on the dose, it can cause a mild sense of distortion," Roth said. "In the extreme, people are basically shot out into another reality, another place and time."

A changed son

Dennis and Kathy Chidester think that's what happened to Brett.

About the time Brett began using salvia, he became more melancholy and had trouble sleeping, his parents said. He was sometimes angry for no reason. Because Brett had never displayed typical teenager moodiness, they thought he was just catching up to his peers.

"He definitely changed," Kathy Chidester said. "It wasn't a drastic change. I just figured well, this is the other shoe dropping. This is what teenagers are like and we haven't experienced it."

The week before Brett's suicide, Kathy Chidester called him from Austria, where she was leading an annual ski trip for the Wilmington Ski Club. Brett said he was fine and probably was going to make the Salesianum honor roll again.

The next Saturday night, Jan. 21, Brett went to his girlfriend's homecoming dance. In the few months they had been dating, the relationship had become serious, his parents said. Brett noted in his daily planner that he was going to buy her flowers and take her to dinner for Valentine's Day.

Brett spent much of the weekend writing college application essays, hoping to become an architect. Brett was off work Monday, Jan. 23, from his job in the dining room of Cokesbury Village, an assisted living facility.

He was still sleeping when his father left the house that morning.

"Mom and Dad, don't worry about me," Brett wrote in his suicide note. "Please don't cry. I love you guys so much. I always have. Take a vacation. You deserve it. Please do not be sad. I want you to carry on your lives. Remember me and be happy when you think of me, not sad. Tell yourselves I'm in a better place, because I am. I'm sorry I didn't get to say goodbye before this, but I love you."

SALVIA DIVINORUM

(Hallucinogenic) sage, Salvia divinorum, salvia, the matrix

Salvia is derived from the American plant Salvia divinorum, a member of the mint family. It is used by the Mazatecs and others in Meso America. It is marketed in the UK under many guises. In head and sex shops it is often sold as herbal ecstasy, using names such as Eclipse. It is also sold as a dried natural high, intended for smoking (in variable amounts) or as a herbal remedy under its botanical name, or as the matrix or 'hallucinogenic sage'.

"Salvinorin A" the active component of Salvia Divinorum, is most effective when vaporized and inhaled, but the most common way to take it is by swallowing or smoking. Its effects are more hallucinatory than other legal highs - though high doses of the raw plant are usually needed to achieve these effects.

A dose of 200-500 mcg produces profound hallucinations that last from 30 minutes to an hour or two, while doses over 2mg are effective for much longer. According to the literature, doses greater than 500 mcg can cause the user to become completely unaware of their surroundings and enter a state of uncontrollable delerium during which they must be watched carefully. Powerful but legal, hallucinogenic under scrutiny

USA Today

A little-known hallucinogenic leaf that is legal in most of the USA is the target of new calls for a ban after the suicide of a teenager who smoked it.

Salvia, a relative of flowering sages enjoyed by many gardeners, is the most powerful natural hallucinogen known — almost as strong as LSD, experts say. Known as "diviner's sage," salvia has been used for centuries by the Mazatec Indians in Mexico. In the USA it is sold in leaf and liquid form by websites and head shops and is available to anyone at any age.

"Kids fall into a false sense of security because it's legal," says state Sen. Karen Peterson, a Delaware Democrat. "We control LSD, and we should control this."

Peterson has filed a bill to make Delaware the third state to designate Salvia divinorum a banned substance like marijuana and heroin. Louisiana and Missouri have already taken such action.

Her action came in response to the suicide of Brett Chidester, 17, of Wilmington, Del., whose family blames the drug.

Brett was a straight-A student who ranked top in his state in Spanish and was making plans for college and to buy his girlfriend roses for Valentine's Day, his family says. On Jan. 23 he put a charcoal grill inside a tent in his father's garage, lit the grill and crawled inside the tent.

A suicide note described revelations that echoed descriptions of salvia experiences posted by users to various salvia-related websites. "How can I go on living after I learned the secrets of life," he wrote. "It took me 17 years, but I finally figured it out. I can't tell you that here because that kind of information can cause chaos."

His mother, Kathleen Chidester, says her son bought salvia on a website. His father, Dennis, says police took salvia from his room. Kathleen Chidester says she believes Brett was depressed and used salvia because it was legal. His suicide note left no doubt in her mind that salvia had something to do with his death.

Despite salvia's powerful nature, the Drug Enforcement Administration has not recommended that it be banned as a dangerous drug. The DEA has been collecting information for years on the leaf, says Rogene Waite, a spokeswoman for DEA. The process involves measuring its availability, potential for abuse and medical uses.

Salvia: It's intense, it's dangerous, it's inexpensive ... and it's legal Salvia is a powerful, legal herb from Mexico that produces vivid, often terrifying hallucinations. The drug is sold in Magic Man in various strengths.

Mail Tribune / Bob Pennell

By JOHN DARLING
for the Mail Tribune

Few police, teachers or counselors have even heard of it, but the drug salvia — a powerful psychedelic herb from Mexico — is legal in the U.S. and easily purchased over the counter in Medford or on eBay.

Also known as Diviner's Sage or Sally-D, salvia divinorum is extremely intense, say those who have tried it. They say it is as powerful or more so than LSD and produces vivid, often terrifying hallucinations and out-of-body experiences lasting five to 10 minutes. Effects vary widely; a few users report little or no effect.

The herb is sold at Magic Man in the Bear Creek Shopping Center in various strengths for $11.95 to $44.95. In Ashland, Zen Den doesn't sell it and Puff's used to but stopped.

Theresa Jermain of Medford called police when a 17-year-old high school student, for whom she is guardian, bought salvia at Magic Man and, after smoking it, told her he "got real high" and it was "way too strong."

After checking out the shop, police reported back to Jermain that the drug was not illegal and there was nothing they could do, she said.

The student, "Chris," who asked not to be identified by his full name, said he smoked it with 15 fellow South Medford High School students and that only three of them had a "good trip" – the rest being "very bad." Students, he added, are little aware of the drug and it's not being much used there.

He described his experience as an "out-of-body experience in a totally different world" followed by a bad "body high," in which he felt sick and awkward and couldn't move. With a cell phone, he videoed another student on salvia hallucinating and trying to crawl out the back window of a car, he said.

Sheriff's Lt. Dewey Patten, commander of the Jackson County Narcotics Enforcement Team, said he wasn't aware of the drug. "I don't know what we'd do if we found someone whacked on it, because it's not illegal," he said.

Jan Janssen, community outreach officer with Ashland Police, said she'd never encountered it, but after consulting the drug Web site erowid.org, said it's surprising that it's legal, considering that most users report unfavorable experiences. Ashland officers trained as drug recognition experts do know the drug and can spot its effects, she said.

Patten consulted a comprehensive drug reference, "Uppers, Downers and All-Arounders," co-written by Ashlander William Cohen, who also lectures and makes films about psychoactive drugs.

Salvia, wrote Cohen, is similar to PCP and originates among the Mazatec Indians of Oaxaca, Mexico, who use it to induce dreamlike hallucinations, delirium and out-of-body experiences, so as to seek out the causes of illness.

The effects, or "trip," last up to 10 minutes, tapering off over half an hour, with the nature of the trip dependent on the person's mind-set and surroundings.

"Cliff," a 19-year-old from Ashland who asked not to be identified, called salvia an "anti-drug drug" because his trip was so intense that it turned him off alcohol and drugs.

"In my first trip, my legs turned to a waterfall of tears," said Cliff. "The second time, I thought, seriously, that I had died and that my soul was being sucked out of me. It was the most intense thing I've ever done. Coming off it, I felt needles were coming out of my body. It definitely had teaching value because I was abusing (alcohol and drugs) and it gave me a lot of insight about what I was doing."

Magic Man owner John Hopf said salvia is sold as an incense or meditative aid like sage — and that customers learn about it on the Internet and come in to buy it. Although Hopf said he knows of no psychedelic properties for the plant, his store had a stack of printouts from a government Web site warning that salvia is a powerful hallucinogen.

"Pete," 27, another Medford resident who used salvia and asked not to be identified, said he had bought salvia from Magic Man seven or eight times. He described it as "a meditative thing that helps you feel a reality outside the ordinary reality and become one with yourself, as a unity."

He added, "It's very personal, not smoke-a-bowl-and-relax."

"Max," an 18-year-old senior at North Medford High School who bought salvia last week at Magic Man and declined to be identified, said friends suggested he try it. "I'm curious. I'll probably feel good for a while and hallucinate. They said it was worth the money for the feeling you get."

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration has the plant under review based on its potential abuse, availability and effects on users, said DEA public affairs officer Lauren Alder in Washington, D.C.

"The DEA lists it as 'of concern,' but just because it's not listed as a controlled substance doesn't mean it's healthy or safe," said Alder. "The medical profession stresses the danger of it."

The DEA Web page on salvia — www.usdoj.gov/dea/pubs/states/newsrel/newark_intel_bulletin_salvia.html — classifies it as a psychoactive terpenoid, a family that includes marijuana. It produces "profound hallucinations," with effects similar to mescaline, the DEA bulletin said.

The DEA welcomes comments at its Drug and Chemical Evaluation Section: 202-307-8570 (fax) or 202-307-7183 (phone).

Three years ago, staff Oregonian columnist Margie Boule branded salvia "the most powerful natural hallucinogen known on earth."

"Salvia divinorum is a wild ride," wrote Boule. "This is not a drug that simply makes people play Beatles' records backward. It induces powerful hallucinations that sometimes are terrifying."

Salvia is illegal in Australia, Italy, Denmark, Norway and South Korea. California Rep. Joe Baca in 2002 introduced a bill to ban it in the U.S., but, says erowid.org, it is chemically different from schedule I and II drugs, so it is not covered by the federal law used to ban drugs.

SALVIA

salvia divinorum

- Other names: Diviner's Sage, Sally-D
- Cost: Sold in various strengths for from $11.95 to $44.95 a bag
- Use: Similar to PCP, intense hallucinations lasting for 5-10 minutes when the drug is smoked
- Legal use: An incense or meditative aid, akin to sage
- Federal position: The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has the plant under review. The government classifies it as a psychoactive terpenoid, with effects similar to mescaline
- Why is it still legal? Chemically differences from schedule I and II drugs mean it is not covered by the federal law used to ban drug
- Where is it banned? Australia, Italy, Denmark, Norway and South Korea
- Salvia web site: erowid.org
- DEA information: www.usdoj.gov/dea/pubs/states/newsrel/newark_intel_bulletin_salvia.html
- Comments: The DEA welcomes comments at its Drug and Chemical Evaluation Section: 202-307-8570 (fax) or 202-307-7183 (phone).

The Legal Hallucinogen Targeted to Teens

Couples Company.com

By Laura Dawn Lewis

Salvia Divinorum (Salvia) or Salvinorin A, street names Salvia, Divine Sage and Magic Mint is a legal, powerful natural hallucinogen marketed to and easily accessed by teens on the web and at times, health and spirituality stores. Health care and law enforcement officials described Salvia as the organic hallucinogen as potent as LSD. Users dispute the comparing of Salvia to LSD and insist that it is a mild, harmless perception and spirituality enhancer.

Generally it takes science a few years to catch up with new herbal remedies that create potentially harmful reactions. This may be why even the DEA cannot respond to many questions regarding Salvia Divinorum. Though the DEA may not be able to junior high, high school and college students can.

Salvia Divinorum is currently legal in every country but Australia. The Australian government banned Salvia effective as of June 2002. Salvia is a member of the sage family and a common garden plant. To date, the Divinorum species of Salvia seems to be the only member of this family with perception-altering or intoxicating capabilities. Divinorum seeds are rare.

Salvia Divinorum is not a new drug or plant. Classified in the sage/mint family the Mazatec Indians of Northern Mountains in Oaxaca, Mexico have been using the leafy plant in healing and in religious ceremonies for centuries. The drug itself provides a trip for the user that can range from mild to extreme. Cases have been documented of users falling asleep while driving and walking through glass walls while under its influence.

Referring to the above cases, a 23-year-old Salvia defender in Pittsburgh, PA commented, "You state things like, it could cause a user to fall asleep while driving. What idiot would use this while trying to drive a car?"

Users argue that the effect lasts only about five minutes. One responded to this article by stating, "When salvia is smoked the "trip" only lasts about 3 minutes." The few medical sources we were able to find with some > background on Salvia placed intoxication closer to thirty to forty minutes. Several aficionados also insist that the effects "Aren't much more "intense" than smoking tobacco".

User sites dispute our reader's assertion that Salvia highs are no more intense than smoking tobacco. Search and you will see notations referring the 5th and 6th levels of intoxication, called immaterial and amnesiac. These notations dispute what many of the users are stating and do warn of the potential hazards and need for supervision. These are stressed for the highest level, Amnesiac.

"User remains conscious but loses accurate perception of actual surroundings. At this point the person should not be left alone and must have a sober person in the room. The user is in an altered reality, will wander and encounter brief periods of unconsciousness and blackouts."

The DEA's limited information on Salvia describes its use as follows: "Salvia is being smoked to induce hallucinations, the diversity of which are described by its users to be similar to those induced by ketamine, mescaline, or psilocybin. It is being widely touted on internet sites aimed at young adults and adolescents eager to experiment with these types of substances."

Access

Obtaining this drug is as simple as entering a store or visiting eBay. Users adamantly defend its virtues and their right to partake in its pleasures. The following came in to Couples Company from a reader. We found this letter interesting because unlike the others it wasn't angry but it does illustrate the allure. The writer is also mature and in his mid-thirties, showing the appeal to this drug transcends generations.

> Dear Couples Company.
> Thank you for bringing this subject to parents' attention. I wonder, why would the parents be the last to know about this plant? In answer to my own question, I say the parents are too comfortable in their lives and they don't want to know. Answering your question - I do know what salvia is. My first experience took place last December. Even though I had been reading what other people posted about their encounters with salvia for a few months before I got enough courage to try it myself (unfortunately, I am not a teenager any more). It was so unexpected, so moving, so out-of-this-world that you wouldn't believe. That experience that lasted no more than 5 minutes of Earth time changed my outlook on life in general and my life in particular. I set up a site to collect any salvia related posts that were ever published online - SalviaDivinorumCorps.org, started a discussion group "SalviaD Alliance" on Yahoo and recently formed "Salvia Buyers Club" to provide good quality salvia at wholesale prices to salvia community. My advice to the parents - take it into your hands, "say once to salvia" and be the judges what is good for your children.

Salvia is not just an intercity drug issue; like crack or ecstasy it is in small towns and the big cities. This legal consciousness-altering drug is being used in small towns and major cities around the world. The Internet makes it accessible by overnight delivery to anyone with a credit card, checking account or money order. About half of the 30 web sites we visited selling this drug were based in Germany. The rest are US based.

"Some drugs alter reality in such a way that you come face to face with thoughts that which you have been afraid to confront. There is a reason these substances have been (some still are) researched for psychiatric application," states an anonymous reader of Couples Company.

"This is an escape drug? You are totally wrong, unless you consider 3 minutes of calm an escape. No, alcohol is an escape drug," comments another reader.

Though users argue the drug does not offer an escape from reality, their web sites, comments and culture contradict this through the act of assigning varying descriptions to levels of intoxication or the exaltation of the trips; the creation of a special language for the drug and its altered states of reality. The documentation of experiences under the influence of the drug as exceptional, extraordinary and life-changing. These actions dispute and disprove claims of non-escapism or of a drug with little impact on the user.

Targeting Teens

The target market for Salvia is teens and twenty-something's and it taps into the issues, insecurities and confusion this age group struggles with and identifies with. Salvia ads promise to deliver spiritual enlightenment and bliss to the user. Testimonials from other users further convince and persuade potential users of the benefits of using the product. Many Salvia sales web sites includes step-by-step instructions for smoking the product, while enthusiastically showcasing the results through affirming statements, user trip reports and other personal accounts of the experiences. The following is the introduction from one of the largest legal Salvia dealers on the web:

General FAQ's

A typical ounce usually contains 100 – 200
One ounce = 4 to 12 doses

From this copy it is easy to see why many people refer to Salvia as the legal LSD Travel back in time to the 1960's and this same statement, nearly verbatim could be heard emanating from the lips of those enjoying or promoting LSD. Many Salvia Trip Reports are also eerily similar to the trip descriptions recorded by those on LSD.

> "There were beautiful closed eye visuals: a dome composed of ribs of light forming arched groining like that of a Gothic cathedral. The colors were the iridescent rainbow in a peacock's tail. This "reality" opened into another one: a narrow red rock canyon with a fast moving river plunging over rocks.
> I then felt that I was no longer a specific individual, but was an awareness that opened into every individual's consciousness everywhere, forever. I had the feeling that there was a lesson to be learned."
> Salvia Trip Report

Also like LSD, Salvia users have created their own language, logic and culture based around the experiences and consumption of the drug.

Salvia & Health

Salvia is endorsed and marketed by dealers as healthy with spiritual significance. Spirituality is empowered through the action of blessing the dried and cured leaves by an Indian Shaman. Then the leaves are consumed by smoking or chewing.

The health claims are easily disproved by the fact that the leaves are smoked. To date no scientific evidence exists to prove a medicinal purpose for this drug. It also must be noted that scientists have been unable to determine how it works. It does not appear to alter the nervous system and scientists speculate its effects can range from hormonal to affecting a gland yet to be studied. It is possible at a later date a medical purpose may be discovered. Claiming health benefits at this time has no foundation and is simply marketing.

Salvia is also marketed in high-potency drops referred to as Emerald Essence. The drops enter blood stream through the cells in the mouth where it is held for a period of time. Users insist the drops have no effect if ingested or added to food. Currently no scientific research or evidence exists to either prove or disprove this statement.

Salvia & Spirituality

The faith claim for Salvia is stronger than the health claims. As one reader points out, "For countless millennia, Shamanic traditions have used plant medicines and plant teachers for ceremonial and spiritual use."

Ancient Indian religions may use Salvia as part of their worship, but the majority of people using the drug today do not subscribe to Shamanic traditions and are not using it for religious purposes. Cocaine, peyote, opium and other drugs have also been used in religious observances in the past. To claim and use the drug as a religious necessity, users would need to convert and practice the Mazatec Indian's faith and then only use it for ceremonial purposes.

What Salvia Does:

Salvia Divinorum provides the user with an escape, or as users prefer, an enhancement of his or her reality. The drug creates a sense of well being within the user when the experience is positive. Negative experiences can be living nightmares and cause blackouts.

The 3 Degrees of Use

- General inebriation, (a few hits): Similar to mushrooms with brighter colors and increased sexual desire.
- Increased Potency: Users fall into Trances
- Further Increased Potency: User remains conscious but loses accurate perception of actual surroundings. At this point the person should not be left alone and must have a sober person in the room. The user is in an altered reality, will wander and encounter brief periods of unconsciousness and blackouts.

Salvia users rate trips on a 6-tiered scale based upon the name of the drug:

- S = SUBTLE effects
- A = ALTERED perception
- L = LIGHT visionary state
- V = VIVID visionary state
- I = IMMATERIAL existence
- A = AMNESIC effects

As a parent, what can you do and how do you know if your child is using this?

Going through the Salvia sites one thing stood out, vocabulary. The users speak about Trip Reports. These are retellings of their drug-induced experiences. The words "visionary, spiritual enhancement, soul, altered-consciousness, sage." There is an official Salvia dictionary for proper trip descriptions and these includes:

- weird
- wiSalviaom

Many of these words are not common in the English language or have been created specifically for this drug's culture. The use of such vocabulary may be your only clue as a parent that your child is involved in the Salvia culture. Symptoms of use are vague appear like those experienced under LSD, mushrooms and PCP.

The reason Salvia is not illegal is that scientist can't figure out how it works. This also means there is no documentation on the long-term ramifications of this drug, good or bad. The only professional consensus on Salvia at this time is that it is a hallucinogen. Unlike other hallucinogens, the active ingredient in Salvia, Salvinorin A does not attach itself to the neurotransmitters, a requirement for illegal classification. Unless the definitions for controlled substances are changed or process of intoxication is discovered, the drug can and will remain legal.

A group called the Group for Cognitive Liberty and Ethics is currently working a grassroots effort to keep Salvia Divinorum legal and easily accessible to the masses. Their stance is that drug use enhances creativity and brainpower and should be encouraged rather than prohibited.

This article was inspired by the October 20, 2002 Portland Oregonian Article by staff reporter Margie Boulé entitled: Meet the most potent natural hallucinogen—And it's legal!

Salvia Divinorum, ska Maria Pastora, Salvia (Salvinorin A, Divinorin A)

Introduction

Salvia Divinorum is a perenial herb in the mint family native to certain areas of the Sierra Mazateca region of Oaxaca, Mexico. It is one of 500 species of Salvia in the New World is in similar to the sage plant. The plant grows in large groupings to well over 3 feet in height. It's large green leaves, hollow square stems and flowers are it's characteristic features. S. Divinorum is one of several vision-inducing plants employed by the Mazatec Indians

There has been a recent interest among young adults and adolescents to re-discover ethnobotanical plants that can induce changes in perception, hallucinations, or other psychologically-induced changes. Since S. Divinorum, or any of its active ingredients are not specifically listed in the Controlled Substances Act, some on-line botanical companies and drug promotional sites have advertised Salvia as a legal alternative to other plant hallucinogens like mescaline. The plant material is smoked for the induction of "mystical" or hallucinogenic experiences.

Chemistry/Pharmacology

"Salvinorin A" the active component of S. Divinorum, is most effective when vaporized and inhaled. Chemically, Salvinorin A is a neoclerodane diterpene, a psychotropic terpenoid. The grouping of psychoactive plants containing terpenoid essential oils includes Salvia Divinorum, Wormwood (Absinth), and Cannabis Sativa (tetrahydrocannabinols, THC). Divinorin A was chemically characterized by Valdes et al., in 1984, however Ortega et al., (1982) had previously characterized the same substance and called it Salvinorin A and thus, out of convention, the psychoactive substance should be called Salvinorin A. A dose of 200 to 500 micrograms produces profound hallucinations when smoked. Its' effects in the open field test in mice and locomotor activity tests in rats are similar to mescaline. Salvinorin A's action in the brain are not well elucidated. However, recent tissue testing (in vitro assays) have suggested that Salvinorin A may act at the kappa opiate receptor site, but functional assays are lacking to determine the exact mechanism of action of this drug substance.

Illicit Uses

Salvia is being smoked to induce hallucinations, the diversity of which are described by its users to be similar to those induced by ketamine, mescaline, or psilocybin. It is being widely touted on internet sites aimed at young adults and adolescents eager to experiment with these types of substances.

User Population

The user populations, thus far, seems limited to younger adults and adolescents influenced by the promotion of the drug on internet sites

Illicit distributed

Salvia Divinorum is grown domestically and imported from Mexico, and Central and South America.

Control status

Salvia Divinorum, Salvinorin A, and Divinorin A are not listed in the Controlled Substances Act.

Comments and additional information are welcomed by the Drug and Chemical Evaluation Section, FAX 202-307-8570 or telephone 202-307-7183.

From Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia

Salvia divinorum (also known as Diviner's sage, María Pastora or simply Salvia, although the genus name is shared among many plants) is a psychoactive plant, a member of the sage genus and the Lamiaceae (mint) family. The plant is grown by the Mazatec indigenous people of the Oaxaca mountains of southern Mexico in isolated, moist, and secret plots. It has been used as an entheogen by their shamans for centuries for healing during spirit journeys. It is thought to be a cultigen. No definitively wild populations have been found. The Latin name Salvia divinorum literally translates to "sage of the diviners".

The primary psychoactive constituent is trans-neoclerodane diterpenoid known as salvinorin A. Salvia also contains the closely related compounds salvinorins B-G, divinatorins A-E, salvinicins A and B, and hardwickiic acid. Salvinorin A is the most potent naturally-occurring hallucinogen known. It is active at doses as low as 100 μg [1] (http://www.erowid.org/plants/salvia/salvia_faq.shtml). Recent research has shown that salvinorin A is a remarkably potent and selective kappa opioid receptor agonist. It has been demonstrated that the effects of salvinorin A are blocked by kappa opioid receptor antagonists. This indicates that the effects of S. divinorum can be largely, if not entirely, attributed to kappa agonism. Salvinorin A is unique in that it is the only naturally occurring substance known to induce a visionary state via this mechanism of action.

History

In 1939 Salvia was first recorded in print by Jean Basset Johnston. He was studying the psilocybin mushroom use of the Mazatecs in Mexico when he encountered this entheogen. R. Gordon Wasson documented its use a decade later and reported its effects through his own testimonials. Historical data at this point is largely unresearched, but it is likely to date back into the early history of Central America. It was not until the 1990s that it become more widely known through the experiments of Daniel Siebert.

As is often the case with cultigens, it is likely that the history of this plant dates back a number of generations. Cultigens require a long historical relationship with human cultures, and salvia is no exception. Perhaps the decline of its widespread use began with the Spanish Conquest, or this phenomenon may have been already underway, either due to religious or political reasons.

Gordon Wasson theorized that this plant was the mythological pipilzintzintli, the "Noble Prince" of the Aztec codices. This theory would explain why a cultigen of such extraordinary power was not otherwise known to the Aztecs, but this theory is not without dispute. The Aztecs were extremely knowledgeable in plant identification, and in their records report that pipilzintzintli has both male and female varieties. Salvia divinorum is lacking sexes, meaning there are no male or female flowers, as its flowers contain both sexes. The skeptics of this theory report that the Aztecs would have known the difference between male flowers and female flowers. Wasson, still, may have been correct in his hypothesis, in that there are a number of historical accounts of gendered properties being assigned to plants in a metaphorical manner, not in a botanically anatomical one.

Usage and effects

Methods of ingestion

Traditional Methods

Mazatec shamans use two methods of ingestion. Often, they simply eat the fresh leaves by chewing and swallowing them. Sometimes, they crush the leaves to extract the leaf juices, which they then drink (usually mixed with water). Reportedly, dosages vary from as few as 6 leaves to as many as 120, when using these methods.

Nontraditional Methods

Dry leaves can be smoked in a pipe but most users prefer the use of a bong to cool the smoke. The temperature required to release salvinorin-A from the plant material is quite high (about 240°C). A regular flame will work, but the direct application of something more intense, such as the flame produced from a butane torch lighter, is often preferred.

Many people find that smoking the unprocessed dried salvia leaf produces only light or unnoticable effects, perhaps due to the large volume of plant material that must be smoked to produce psychoactive effects. However, responses vary widely. A concentrated preparation of salvia leaf called salvia extract, with relative strength suggested by terms such as 5x, 10x, and 20x, may be smoked in place of natural strength leaves; this reduces the total amount of smoke inhaled for a given dosage of salvinorin overall, and facilitates more powerful experiences. One cone of 5X strength extract should be enough to produce the desired effect.

Sublingually ingested tinctures constitute another form of prepared salvia. A tincture is made from salvia leaf that has had the psychoactive components extracted, often using high-proof ethanol. Once produced, the liquid can either be used as a tincture or infused into salvia leaf, creating smokable salvia extract.

The traditional Mazatec method can also be employed; however, Salvinorin-A is generally considered to be inactive when ingested, because the chemical is inefficiently absorbed in the gastrointestinal tract unless thoroughly emulsified; therefore, emphasis is often placed on holding the leaves (and also the saliva secreted during chewing) in the mouth as long as possible, to facilitate absorption through the oral mucosa. This consumes much more of the drug than smoking, but also produces a longer-lasting experience.

Subjective effects

Most users find that the effects of salvinorin are not conducive to socializing. People given Salvia often feel as though a trick has been played on them; in fact, while under the influence, most people tend to find any external stimuli distracting. Most people under the influence of salvia will remain in place although some users may move around. This can be especially dangerous as the user is in an altered state of consciousness and is therefore at a greater risk of unintended bodily injury. It is advisable to have a sober trip sitter present.

The effects of salvia are found by many to be highly spiritual entheogenic experience. Others find salvia useful for meditation. Consciousness is retained until the highest doses, but body control, awareness of externalities, and individual personality can disappear with even modest amounts. Even experienced drug users may feel totally out of control and confused.

At lower doses the user may experience spontaneous laughter, mild closed-eye visuals, stuttering or strobing visual effects, changes in depth perception, and a heightened sense of color and texture.

Moderate doses appear trance-like. Time distortion and open-eye visuals become increasingly apparent. Fractal patterns and geometric shapes may be noticeable with eyes open, and can be very confusing. Many people experience sensations of falling, similar to what is occasionally felt at the onset of sleep. The user may experience fully formed visions of other places, people, and events, especially with eyes closed.

At high doses, the effects become more powerful and may additionally include out-of-body experiences, perceptions of gravitational distortion, vertigo, sensations of wind or physical pressure, hearing voices, flanging of sound, significant open and closed-eye visuals, experiencing alternate realities, contact with beings or entities, dissolution of one's ego, and dissociation. It is also typical that, while under the effects of salvia, a person will not realize they have used the drug. The salvia experience is quite different from that of most other hallucinogenic drugs and may be overwhelming, even with the correct set and setting. Most users recommend darkness and silence as the best environment, however, minimal, ambient or relaxing music can be helpful.

According to experience reports at Erowid (http://www.erowid.org/experiences/subs/exp_Salvia_divinorum.shtml) and elsewhere, Salvia seems to produce visual hallucinations which have a somewhat higher level of consistency than other substances. Reports of contact with an entity supposedly associated with the plant, ("the Shepherdess") again with fairly consistent characteristics, are also common.

Many salvia users, during high-dose out-of-body experiences, may suddenly "merge" with objects. With the significant time distortion typical of salvia, users may live a lifetime as another person, or as an inanimate object, such as a wall or a piece of furniture. The experiences can be extremely pleasant, or very frightening and confusing.

People often fail to achieve the effects the first time they try the plant, possibly due to problems in the administration of the drug. With repeated use, anecdotal evidence suggests that decreased dosage may be possible for the same level experience. Due to the lack of scientific studies on Salvia, if true it is unknown whether this is due to learning proper techniques of administration or a sensitization factor, sometimes colloquially referred to as "reverse-tolerance".

Some people who try Salvia find it difficult or impossible to achieve the desired effects. This may be due to an insufficient flame. However, sometimes the results are unpredictable. For example, a user may smoke a large amount and feel no effect, but the next day may smoke a small amount and experience a strong trip.

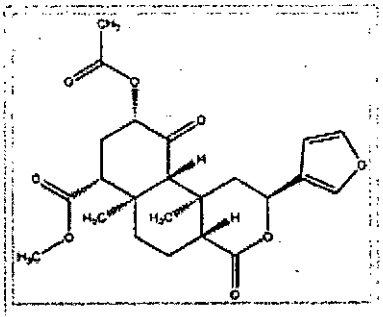
Duration and after-effects

If inhaled, the effects do not last very long, with the peak reached within one minute and then a slow descent back to one's self after about five minutes and back to baseline within 15 to 20 minutes. Chewing the leaf (in a 'quid') makes the effects come on more slowly and be experienced for longer. The first 5 minutes after smoking extract are very intense, and should be experienced lying or sitting down, eyes closed.

Most users report no hangover or negative after-effects. Some users report a pleasing "afterglow," or pleasant sensation and state of mind persisting after the experience has ended. Others, however, claim that Salvia has a depressing effect. Salvia has not been found to be either physically or psychologically addictive. There are no proven health risks associated with the psychoactive chemicals, although the long-term effects on the human body are not well documented. However, smoking any substance is generally regarded as unhealthy by medical professionals.

Chemistry

The primary active constituent is Salvinorin A, sum formula $C_{23}H_{28}O_8$. Unlike most other known psychoactive compounds, Salvinorin A is not an amine—meaning it contains no nitrogen functional group. The Salvinorin group of compounds (including Salvinorin A, Salvinorin B and Salvinorin C) are called neoclerodane diterpenoids.



Salvinorin A

Extraction and purification of Salvinorin A has been documented but should only be attempted by qualified researchers with experience in chemistry and the proper laboratory equipment. Measurement of safe dosages is difficult and requires a sophisticated analytical balance, due to the extreme quantitative potency of Salvinorin A.

Legal status, Controversy

Until the late 1980s, not many people knew about salvia. The heavy commercialization of the Internet in the mid-1990s and the realization that the plant was not legally controlled engendered numerous Internet mail-order businesses which sold dried salvia leaves and other preparations, sometimes for exorbitant prices.

The general public became increasingly aware of salvia in 2002. As of June 1, 2002, Australia became the first country to ban salvia and salvinorin [2] (http://www.cognitiveliberty.org/news/salvia_australia.htm), [3] (http://www.thecouriermail.news.com.au/common/story_page/0,5936,5717251%5E3102,00.html). In late 2002, Rep. Joe Baca (D-California) introduced a bill in the United States House of Representatives to schedule salvia as a controlled substance, and the DEA has indicated on its website that it is aware of salvia and is evaluating the plant for possible scheduling.

Press accounts of efforts to ban salvia often quote law enforcement and government officials who exhibit an inaccurate knowledge of the drug's effects, and frequently characterize the "high" as "chewable marijuana", or as identical to LSD and PCP (two drugs with quite dissimilar effects to each other, as well as to salvia).

Under Louisiana Act № 159, 40 plants, including Salvia divinorum, have become illegal if sold for human consumption. It is still legal to own the plants. More laws regarding S. divinorum can be found at Erowid's Salvia Law vault (http://www.erowid.org/plants/salvia/salvia_law.shtml).

Salvia divinorum was outlawed in Missouri in fall 2005. New York is considering a bill that would place heavy civil penalties on the sale of the plant. Illinois is also considering regulating Salvia divinorum.

In January 2006, the Swedish government declared their intention on making salvinorin A and all plants containing the chemical illegal. This law has been in effect since 1 March 2006.

In Delaware on January 23 2006, teen Bret Chidester (http://www.delawareonline.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20060226/NEWS/602260356/-1/NEWS01) committed suicide. His suicide note referred to the drug. In an essay found after his death, he wrote "Salvia allows us to give up our senses and wander in the interdimensional time and space,... Also, and this is probably hard for most to accept, our existence in general is pointless. Final point: Us earthly humans are nothing." Because his use of the drug is considered to have contributed to his suicide, the Delaware State Legislature is rapidly moving to pass legislation (http://www.delawareonline.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20060323/NEWS/603230360/-1/NEWS01) that would make the drug illegal there.

Unlike marijuana, salvia has a nondescript appearance (being in the same genus as cooking sage), can be grown in a small space, has no odor and requires no elaborate lighting set-up, criminalization is likely to affect only the commercial sale of the plant, and not its private cultivation, which would be impossible to police. For most regular users growing the plant is considered to be an integral part of establishing a relationship with it.

Botany

Unlike other sages, Salvia divinorum produces very few seeds, and the seeds it does produce seldom germinate. It appears to have very little histocompatibility variation, so the pollen from a plant genetically identical to the style fails to reach the ovule. It is propagated by cuttings and by falling over and growing new roots. Although reportedly (Valdez, et al) isolated stands of S. divinorum exist in its native range, these are thought to be purposely created and tended by the people of the region. Therefore it is considered a true cultivar and thus does not occur naturally in the wild anywhere.

For the most part, the fate of the species lies with a very small number of clone plants. Of these few clones, there are only two that are in any kind of public circulation; the Wasson/Hofmann strain, and the Blosser ("Palatable") strain. The former is a strain discovered by those whose name the plant bears, when on a visit to the Mazatecs. The latter is the same case, in regards to name, and was discovered in Oaxaca; it is called "Palatable" as well, as it is said to have more palatable leaves when ingested orally than those of the Wasson/Hofmann strain, though other reports state that there is little difference between the taste of the plants. Other varieties are also grown, including the Luna strain which is a strange offshoot of the Hofmann/Wasson line. A few other strains exist, but they are mostly quite similar, in potency, effect, and growth.

How To Smoke Salvia Divinorum

by MSS

After numerous attempts I finally came upon what I call the Secret of Smoked Salvia divinorum. I will not discuss the subjective effects except in a limited sense, but what I do wish to discuss is how one might better feel these effects.

Find a comfortable position, preferably sitting down in a quiet environment. Load a water pipe with a full hit of Salvia, light and inhale as deeply; and hold as long, as possible.

While holding in the hit it may be advantageous to poke out the left over ash/foliage and reload. Upon exhalation take a couple deep breathes of fresh air then inhale a second hit as above.

Before taking another hit you may want to empty the water pipe of the left over smoke from the previous hit since the smoke stales quickly and make the next hit more difficult to inhale and hold for a length of time.

Depending on unknown factors, or insufficient inhalations, one may find it necessary to do a hit or two more. Two deep hits has always been good for me, but I have unusually large lung capacity.

Those who are used to smoking are more likely to feel the effects of Salvia simply due to the fact that their lungs are much better prepared to inhale a large amount of smoke. One technique to use to bring in large volumes of smoke is to take a few deep breathes, exhale all the air in the lungs and then inhale from the water pipe.

One other technique is to continue loading and smoking until you no longer have the coordination to load anymore. I've tried this last technique before and it is really great for open eye visuals.

Most people don't feel anything the first time they try Salvia. If you do not get any results after several attempts, try using a high temperature lighter (or torch) and water pipe. The high temperature flame will vaporize more of the active ingredient than a standard lighter.

If you use a torch, don't do it alone. Make sure someone is there to turn off the torch. If the Salvia hits in the middle of a toke, you might loose control of the torch.

After taking the necessary hits close your eyes, lay your head back on a comfortable support, and get your arms and legs in a comfortable open position that won't require you to move after the effects have begun. When the effects begin one might have a strong desire to open ones eyes or change ones position to reestablish an equilibrium. It is important that you not do this. Lay perfectly still with eyes closed for the duration.

If you desire to attempt the experiment with eyes open I highly recommend staying still as possible, having no moving objects in sight, and fixing ones eyes upon a motionless object for the duration. The initial peak last for no more than three to five minutes while residual effects may carry on for ten.

With continued usage over time one becomes more adept at both noticing the effects of Salvia and at exploring the new landscape. As I continued using Salvia I reached a peak experience and now the visions are rather mundane, failing in their once spectacular glory.

The three most important factors in feeling the Salvia experience are appropriate silence, lack of movement, and closed eyes. I have found that a lack of dialog, either from other participants, or from TV is of primary importance, but that instrumental music makes for a quite intriguing experience, especially if 4 speakers are properly placed surrounding ones head.

Since silence is such an integral part of the experience I've conducted sessions with only one person experimenting at a time. The participation of others during ones Salvia experience can at times be a hindrance.

If others are present when you are experimenting it is important that they be as quiet as possible, both vocally and in their physical movements (no creaking in chairs or traversing hardwood floors, heavy breathing, or, the hardest thing for an observer to hold back, laughter).

I've always required of other participants/observers that they be completely still so as to cause absolutely no noise. During the experience a new landscape is opened up, one without borders, and space can appear to go on infinitely.

Usually this landscape is one that can shift from one scene to the next without apparent provocation and which resembles a rapid succession of unconscious material forcefully trying to push itself into conscious awareness. If someone makes a noise or speaks the vision may be lost or altered since the noise, and where it is located in space, can still be comprehended by the conscious and rational mind.

This causes the mind of the experimenter, which can be quite conscious of two realities at once, to become aware of the inconsistency between these realities, and this can, and in my case usually does, disrupt the experience.

What the motionless body allows the mind to do is to slip deeper into the 3 dimensional nature of the vision. If the body is moved the vision will often alter or slip away. In some way the physical body defines the inner landscapes of the vision. My only way to explain this is to say that the conscious rational mind retains awareness of consensus reality while under the influence of Salvia.

Since Salvia creates a non-consensus reality body movement causes a dichotomy of awareness which can cause the mind to attempt a reconciliation between these realities. Consensus reality often wins, causing the vision to dissipate, or at least lose its convincing nature.

This sort of dual awareness is also played out with sight, which may be why many who attempt to feel the effects of Salvia, and have failed to try closing their eyes, cannot. By having ones eyes open the mind appears to be unconsciously forced to recognize one reality over the next and therefore cannot fall deeply into the full Salvia experience.

Of course this dichotomy of forces appears to be overcome depending on how much is smoked, and obviously extracted Salvinorin-A forces consensus reality to the wayside.

The main physical effects that I have noticed are a feeling of a rise of body temperature and a slight tightening of the muscles, especially in the hands. I found that if I consciously focus on relaxing my body during this tensioning that I would be pulled further into the vision. This fits into my theory of dichotomy.

I've also found that after the main effects have worn off short term memory may be slightly impaired. For example, I kept forgetting about my lit cigarette in the ashtray. I would lay it down and then, in what appeared a couple minutes, it would be completely burned down to the filter.

One may also notice an inability to recall many of the aspects of the vision and may suffer from incoherent speech. The incoherent speech is very important in attempting to interpret the experience. Just as in Freudian dream psychoanalysis the mind make attempts to fill in the blanks of the vision with coherent structure, basically by adding material to make the vision make sense. But the visions in themselves are unconscious material coming up to a conscious level and this is very difficult to fully interpret.

When a participant comes down from the experience with me I remain completely silent, allowing the partaker to speak freely without my interjections or my attempts to make sense of what is being said. Let them freely speak, without the criticism of the all to common laughter, and try to form a new mental picture from remembered material. Let them have enough quiet time to digest what has happened so that they might come to their own personal understanding.

The main psychological effects seem to be a dissociation from ones physical surroundings. One becomes aware of other surroundings and of communication with alien, though not necessarily extraterrestrial or spiritual, beings. One of the more interesting factors I have found with Salvia is its ability to cause laughter, sometimes even uncontrollably so. Rarely have I seen fear from smoked foliage, but with Salvinorin-A I understand it is common.

Of course these are only my own observations and I make no guarantees of the same effects for others. Two last, though not thoroughly tested observations are that marijuana smoked beforehand interferes with the effects of Salvia and that the effects of Salvia plateau, thereby requiring a rapid succession of hits.

I have yet to see if any other entheogen limits Salvia's effects. I look forward to testing and hearing about others' experiments with smoked Salvia during Mescaline, Psilocybin, Ayahuasca, and LSD excursions. It might also be interesting to try Salvia (masticated or smoked) in conjunction with smoked DMT. I have personally tried a smoked Salvia/5-MeO-DMT combination with highly dissociative effect on the ego (due to Id influences) while keeping a sense of superego awareness.

I became my superego aware of my ego as it was being affected and effected by my id. You could also say I became my super consciousness aware of my conscious mind being affected and effected by my unconscious mind. Quite a spectacular feeling. Tripartite Being recognized as one.

You should be aware that Salvia suitable for smoking purposes is available in different strengths and forms, for the sake of your own health always get standardized extract when possible, see below for more info.

--- Normal Salvia Leaves are just that, leaves that have been harvested and dried.

--- High Grade Salvia Leaves come from premium plants, similar to high grade marijuana compared to a standard strain.

--- Crude Extract is prepared by mixing crude extract with Salvia divinorum leaves. This concentrates tars and other harmful components of the leaf. It is usually described by a number followed by an x (such as "5x," "10x," etc). The number indicates the ratio of extract to leaf. For example 'Salvia Divinorum 10X Organic Extract', is prepared by mixing one unit of leaf with the tar-like crude extract obtained from nine units of leaf. The resulting product is ten times as potent as the leaves used to produce it. This type of product can vary tremendously in potency because the potency of the leaves used to produce it varies. It has a somewhat sticky feel and inferior burning characteristics due to the impure quality of the extract.

--- Standardized Extract is prepared by extracting pure salvinorin A (the active principal of the plant), then adding a measured quantity back onto Salvia divinorum leaves to bring them up to a specific, reliable, and consistent level of potency. This type of product is time consuming to prepare, but is far superior to crude-extract enhanced leaf. Products that have been prepared in this manner have particularly good burning characteristics because they do not contain the tar-like, gummy chemicals found in crude extracts. Since the impurities have been removed during the extraction process, they won't end up in your lungs.

Salvia has been available legally in most areas of the world but it is being made illegal in more countries as time passes. Louisiana made it illegal to use Salvia as a drug in 2005. It used to be easy to buy Salvia online, it is becoming harder to find.

If you find a source, don't pay more than $50 for a gram of 20x standardized extract
$25 for a gram of 10x standardized extract
$15 for a gram of 5x standardized extract

When smoked (in the ways described), the effects of Salvia can be overpowering and overwhelming. If it is your first time trying Salvia use the table below to find the dosage you should start at.

Normal Salvia Leaves: 1/2 - 1 gram
High grade Salvia Leaves: 1/4 - 1/2 gram
Salvia Extract 5x: 1/10 - 1/3 gram
Salvia Extract 10x: 1/10 gram
Salvia Extract 15x: 1/20 gram
Salvia Extract 20x: 1/20 gram

The bouncing bear company sells salvia, that is ideal for smoking purposes, in the Salvia divinorum section of their site. They ship from the US to most areas of the world.

Liquid Salvia Extracts

I have seen liquid Salvia extracts (tinctures) available in the past but do not know if they are still available. They are recommended for people who don't like smoking or would prefer to ingest a liquid for a milder Salvia experience. Follow the manufacturers recommendations about how much to use and how to use it.

Using a liquid Salvia extract will not be as powerful as smoking Salvia, but the Salvia experience lasts longer when taken in liquid form than it does when smoked.

See talking with god for another persons idea of what the Salvia experience is like.

The Salvia Divinorum Grower's Guide

This book is dedicated to growing Salvia Divinorum only. There are other books that about dozens or hundreds of types of salvia, but this is the book to get if you want to grow the mind altering Salvia Divinorum plant.

It's an informative book that tells you everything you need to know about the special growing conditions of this unusual plant. It is only 64 pages, but the information it contains will help anyone start and maintain a Salvia Divinorum garden with ease.

The Salvia Divinorum Grower's Guide

A Book of Salvias:
Sages for Every Garden

Salvias constitute the largest genus in the mint family, valued for their medicinal and culinary qualities. The name is derived from the Latin word salvare, to heal, and salvia provides a beneficial addition to any garden.

More than 900 species of Salvia exist, with more than half occurring in North and South America. In this book, the author has selected over 100 beautiful, garden worthy species and dozens of commercially significant hybrids and arranged them alphabetically with documentation providing the scientific name and native habitat of each, including elevation ranges and temperature tolerance, as well as historical background.

The author describes the leaves and flowers of each species, its blooming cycle, and its light, watering, fertilizing, and pruning requirements. Also suggests companion plants and offers data on propagation. The book includes a list of where to see and buy salvias, a flowering guide by seasons, and cold and shade tolerance guides. There are 96 color photographs and 40 line drawings.

Salvinorin A: Notes of Caution

What's Related >>

by Daniel J. Siebert. From "The Entheogen Review" Vol. 3, No.4: Winter Solstice, 1994.

Salvinorin A (the major active principal of the plant Salvia divinorum) is an extremely powerful consciousness altering compound. In fact it is the most potent naturally occurring hallucinogen thus far isolated. But before would-be experimenters get too worked-up about it, it should be made clear that the effects are often extremely unnerving and there is a very real potential for physical danger with its use.

When the herb Salvia divinorum is consumed either by smoking the dried leaf or chewing the fresh leaves the effects are usually (but not always) pleasant and interesting, this is because when used this way the amount of salvinorin A absorbed into the blood stream is usually very small and in the case of the chewed leaves it is absorbed into the blood stream very gradually.

The pure compound salvinorin A is active at 200 - 500 mcg when vaporized and inhaled. Since very few people have the costly equipment necessary to accurately weigh anything close to this small an amount, it is inevitable that people will try to visually estimate the dose. Unfortunately there is little room for error before the effects become potentially dangerous. When the dose goes above 500 - 1000 mcg the effects can be very alarming, I have seen several people get up and lunge around the room falling over furniture, babbling incomprehensible nonsense and knocking their heads into walls. Several people have tried to wander out of the house. When the experience is over they have no memory of any of this. In fact they usually remember very different events. To an outside observer people in this condition have a blank look in their eyes as if no one is present (and perhaps no one is). It is also common for people to have a facial expression which is probably best described as being like that of a frighten ed animal. It appears that at these "larger" doses one completely loses awareness of, and control over, the physical body and for some reason part of the brain causes the body to get up and move about recklessly while the individual has no awareness of where their physical body is or what it is doing. It seems inevitable that one of these days some careless person will do too large a dose without a sitter and will wander out in the street, or hurt themselves in some way.

Because the dose is so small and insignificant looking, there is a tendency for people to think they need more than what they are told is a safe dose. Another problem is that the technique of vaporizing and inhaling the compound can be a bit tricky. Salvinorin A has a relatively high boiling point and people often don't get it hot enough to remain a gas all the way down into the lungs. Another problem is that so little is used that the vapor often disperses before it gets inhaled. Sometimes people just don't hold the vapor in their lungs long enough for thorough absorption. Several people after trying a dose in the recommended safe range and not getting an effect assumed that they needed a larger dose, when in fact the problem was that they did not vaporize the material efficiently the first time. I have already seen more than one intelligent, careful and experienced person accidentally do too large a dose because of this. Fortunately they had sitters and managed to get through the experience safely.

It is also important to understand that there have been no toxicological studies of this compound in humans. It is true that the Mazatecs have used the plant for a very long time and don't seem to have problems with it, but when the pure compound is used it would be a simple matter to consume a dose hundreds of times greater than anything ever encountered by the Mazatecs.

Not only is salvinorin A chemically different from other hallucinogens (it is a diterpene not an alkaloid) but its effects are quite different as well. Many people consider the effects less manageable and harder to work with than other entheogens. The majority of people who have had a full blown experience with salvinorin A are reluctant to ever do it again. Anyone choosing to experiment with this compound should always have an alert, clear-thinking sitter present to prevent them from injuring themselves or others.

Salvia divinorum as an herb can be used quite safely and many people claim that it has proved beneficial to them. Hopefully there will not be a rush to isolate the pure compound as it is almost inevitable that it will cause problems, people will get hurt, the compound and possibly the plant will get negative attention and it will become scheduled. We will just be adding one more potentially valuable plant ally to the list of species which are already feared and condemned in our society.

If you choose to pursue a relationship with this plant please treat it with respect and care. Perhaps if people can use the plant safely and responsibly it will be able to grow and thrive freely into the future.

Salvia Divinorum

Teens, preteens and young adults are showing a revived interest in an ancient plant. Salvia Divinorum is an hallucinogenic plant that some claim is a safe, natural high. Instead, it can place a user in danger.

Action Plan

Background

Salvia is part of a large genus of plants in the mint family, including the herb, sage. There are about 1,000 species of salvia. Most are used as ornamental plants for gardens and landscaping; some in America are popular for attracting hummingbirds or butterflies.

But one species - salvia divinorum - is better known for its chemical properties than its beauty. It originated in Mexico, where it has been used for healing and divination. The active component of salvia D has been identified In the U.S. it is also known under a variety of knicknames, like Maria Pastora, Sage of the Seers, Diviner's Sage, Salvia, Sally-D, and Magic Mint. In Western culture, it became popular for its hallucinogenic effects in the 90s. Use for this purpose in the United States is most popular with teens and young adults. Users who videotape their experiences and post them on YouTube and other Internet sites are spreading awareness of salvia's properties faster among the younger crowd.
The psychoactive component of salvia D has been identified as salvinorin A. It is hallucinogen.

Back to Top

Identifying characteristics

The salvia D plant, which can grow to over 3 feet in height, has large green leaves, hollow square stems and white flowers with purple calyces. It can grow successfully outside of its native region.
While some people grow their own plants for illicit purposes, most users purchase products online or at retail "head shops". The products may include whole fresh or dried leaves, as well as extract-enhanced leaves supposedly enriched with salvinorin A; chopped leaves; powders; crystals and tinctures. Please click on the thumbnail images below for more.

Back to Top

Legality

Neither salvia D nor its potent extract salvinorin A has an approved medical use in the U.S. Salvia is not "legal pot" or "legal acid." It is not a party drug. Even pro-drug websites caution that it is not fun and people who try to party with salvia will probably not have a good experience.

Salvia D is legal on the federal level, but there is a growing movement to regulate it because of its potential danger. A number of states either have or are considering restrictions on the sale, possession or use of the plant and salvinorin A. In some, people are allowed to have the plant as long as it is not intended for consumption. In others, the plants are legal but extract-enhanced leaves are not, while Maine only prohibits possession by minors. Illinois has made it a schedule I controlled substance. Lawmakers in several other states are considering bills that seek to ban salvia divinorum.

The federal government considered placing salvia D and salvinorin A in schedule 1 of the Controlled Substances Act in 2002. Some committees heard the bill, but no action was taken on it and it died at the end of 2002. In 2007, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) began an analysis of salvia D and salvinorin A to see if they present a risk to public safety that would justify making them controlled substances. The Controlled Substances Act requires that this analysis be performed before a substance can be scheduled as a controlled substance.

There are many already-existing non-drug-specific laws that can be enforced against reckless salvia users (e.g., laws that prohibit public endangerment, public intoxication, reckless driving, etc.).

Internationally, salvinorin A and/or Salvia divinorum have been placed under regulatory controls in Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, Italy, Spain, and Sweden

Back to Top

Effects

Salvia D leaves are generally smoked or chewed. When chewed, effects first appear within 5 to 10 minutes. Salvinorin A may be smoked or mixed with liquids and held in the mouth for absorption into the bloodstream. Smoking pure salvinorin A, at a dose of 200-500 micrograms, results in effects within 30 seconds and lasts about 30 minutes. While the high from salvia D is short-lived, the aftereffects can linger for hours.

A limited number of studies have reported the effects of using either plant material or salvinorin A. Psychic effects include perceptions of bright lights, vivid colors and shapes, as well as body movements and body or object distortions. Other effects include dysphoria (a feeling of emotional and/or mental discomfort, restlessness, malaise, and an agitated depression), uncontrolled laughter, a sense of loss of body, overlapping realities and hallucinations (seeing objects that are not present). Physical effects may include un-coordination, dizziness, and slurred speech.

One survey of 500 users self-reported lingering after effects from salvia D. Some of the effects included 'weird' thoughts, increased sweating, dizziness, lack of coordination, heart racing, anxiety, chills, irritability, nausea, diarrhea, muscle cramps/aches, worsened mood and decreased self-confidence.

One thing to note about salvia D: People who believe using salvia D could be a replacement for marijuana have found the high unpleasant.

Back to Top

Dangers

There have been relatively few studies on the dangers associated with salvia D or the long-term impact of use. Some research has suggested that the substance has a depressive effect in rats but there has not yet been a study showing such a causal relationship in humans. A professor in England, where the use of salvia D is growing, is concerned about a theory that salvia D interacts with receptors in the brain that may be linked with schizophrenia. He is urging more research into salvia D's role in brain chemistry.

The White House Drug Policy cautions that hallucinogens - including LSD, angel dust, and salvia D - can cause "powerful distortions in perception and thinking. Intense and often unpredictable emotional reactions can trigger panic attacks or psychotic reaction. An overdose of hallucinogens can cause heart failure, lung failure, coma, and death."

Even those who sell salvia D warn users to be cautious. Many sites "strongly recommend" that people planning to use the substance enlist a non-using friend to watch over them (a sitter) to make sure they don't hurt themselves or someone else. Users have developed a rating scale to rank the affects of salvia D. The SALVIA experiential rating scale runs from "S" (1) for subtle effects through "A" (6) for amnesic effects. At this stage either consciousness is lost; or at least the user is unable to later recall what was experienced. The individual may fall, or remain immobile or thrash around; somnambulistic behavior may occur; injuries can be sustained without pain being felt; on awakening the individual will have no recollection of what he/she did, experienced or said.

After the initial high, effects of the plant may linger for hours. A person driving in this state puts himself and the public at risk; even simple, everyday tasks around the home can be dangerous as the user may fluctuate between delusions and lucidity.

Salvia D and salvinorin A are not meant for human consumption, so they are not subject to standards, oversight or quality control. Users have no guarantee that what they are purchasing is a pure product, the strength of the drug or if it is tainted with other drugs or chemicals.

Researchers are studying reports of users suffering flashbacks from salvia D use, as well as suspicions tying the drug to suicidal ideation.

Back to Top

Action Plan

Even though South Dakota currently has no law against possessing salvia D, it is a potentially dangerous, mind/mood altering substance.

In addition to watching for the common signs of drug use in their children, parents concerned about possible salvia D use should:
Discuss salvia D with your teen. Find out if it is becoming more popular among his/her peers. Ascertain what your child knows or believes about the drug.

Check your child's Internet use history for sites focused on drug use and/or selling salvia.

Watch for paraphernalia associated with use, specifically bongs or drug vaporizers for smoking salvia.

Please call the PVPS S.A.F.E. Prevention Counselor at your child's school if you have more questions or concerns.

The Honorable Hollis French
Chair
Alaska Senate Judiciary Committee
State Capitol

RE: CS SB 54 (RES)

Dear Senator French:

Despite significant changes to the original bill, the Resources version of SB 54 imposes a great deal of risk to our business in Alaska. For that reason Tesoro opposes the Resources Committee substitute.

Without understandable definitions for the terms "excessive" and "exorbitant", refiners, wholesalers and retailers would be subject to serious business and legal risk while selling fuels.

I have heard testimony discounting this risk, so let me try to expand on our concern.

The current consumer protection laws, especially those prohibiting collusion and monopoly powers, are well defined, and make compliance straightforward. The regular investigations conducted by the Attorney General over the past decades have all been conducted in a consistent manner, regardless of who was serving as Attorney General.

The Attorney General recently concluded that supply and demand have, and are currently determining fuel price in Alaska. However, based on testimony, the sponsors believe that fuel prices in Alaska have been, and are now, excessive and exorbitant. If we imagined a world where "excessive" and "exorbitant" were law, we would have to consider the legislative record that indicates we are perceived to be in violation of the hypothetical law. Given our core value of complying with all laws, my company would be unwilling to risk breaking an undefined law, thus exposing shareholders to enormous penalties and costly legal proceedings.

Finally, the sponsors of this legislation reference the intent to give the Attorney General better tools to protect consumers. The anti-trust laws already on the books are powerful and effective in preventing anti-competitive behavior. Assuming that a market economy exists, logic would dictate that gouging is impossible – when prices rise to a level high enough, new competitors will enter the market, or an existing competitor will lower prices to gain market share.

Because the Attorney General has extensive authority under law to redress any market situation that would limit those reactions to prices, he already is empowered to prevent "gouging."

Thank you for the opportunity to comment. Please call me at 907-261-7221 with any questions.

Sincerely,

Kip Knudson

SPONSOR STATEMENT
Senate Bill 54

"An Act making sales of and offers to sell certain energy resources by a refiner at prices that are exorbitant or excessive an unlawful act or practice under the Alaska Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act."

Alaskans are paying far too much for heating and motor fuel. This bill will help reduce the cost of gasoline, and heating fuel for many Alaska residents, from road system communities where the price of gasoline is excessive, to rural communities where the price of heating fuel is far too high.

There is evidence that Alaska's refiners are marking up the cost they pay for crude oil at a rate that far exceeds the markup charged by West Coast refiners, and that is higher than the historical Alaska mark up. Many other states have price gouging laws, and Alaska should have one too.

Most Alaska motor fuel and heating oil is produced by the Tesoro and Flint Hills refineries, with most motor fuel coming from the former. Evidence to date shows that the high price Alaskans are paying for motor fuel and heating oil is caused in large part by this refiner mark-up. While it is understandable that fuel prices will rise and fall with the price of oil, there is questionable justification for the margins Alaska's main refiners are adding to their cost for Alaska crude oil.

This bill provides protection for Alaskan communities, individuals, and businesses that rely on refined petroleum products for heating and transportation by prohibiting refineries from charging excessive or exorbitant prices for heating oil, diesel, and automobile and aircraft fuel. An objective threshold is established where prices are presumed to be excessive or exorbitant, which refiners can rebut by showing that their prices are a reasonable response to expenses. The bill provides for monetary damages to deter potential violators.

During the recent fuel cost crisis, the rate at which Alaskan prices have been higher than Lower 48 rates has consistently exceeded historical norms, and Alaskan prices have increased while Lower 48 rates decreased. Even suspending Alaska's gasoline tax has not been able to eliminate this disparity.

This bill targets refinery prices, because the investigations conducted by the Legislative Research Division and the House Judiciary Committee have shown that the price disparities have arisen because of the prices that refineries sell products to retailers. This bill does not set or control pricing, and disparate pricing would still be legal if refiners can show their prices to be reasonable. This bill only applies to refiners with annual sales of over one million gallons of applicable fuel, exempting smaller community refiners.

While many other states' prohibitions against excessive fuel prices only apply in the event of natural disasters, terrorist attacks, or declared emergencies, Alaska has a unique Constitutional responsibility to ensure that natural resources are used to the maximum benefit of the Alaskan people. This bill prohibits refineries from charging exorbitant or excessive prices that are detrimental to state and local economies and the welfare of individual Alaskans. Also, this recent crisis has shown that high fuel costs alone can be enough to create an economic emergency.

Gas gouging

Fairbanks Daily News-Miner (AK) - Wednesday, March 25, 2009
Author: Bill Mitchell, Fairbanks

It is starting to appear that our state Legislature isn't going to do anything to protect Alaskans from the price gouging that we've been victimized by at the pump for a long time now.

I will not be able to vote for any incumbent who isn't willing to do whatever it takes to correct this massive injustice that we've faced for far too long. I hope that enough feel the same way that most if not all incumbents up for re-election are sent packing after the next election cycle. Regardless of their party affiliation, they will have demonstrated that they are unworthy of the position they hold. I guess legislative salary issues trump protecting the people from the ongoing pillaging at the pump.

Is there nothing the governor can do to stop the pillaging? I thank her for refusing the federal funds that would have created more future overhead.

North Pole gas prices

Fairbanks Daily News-Miner (AK) - Tuesday, March 17, 2009
Author: Sherry Smith, North Pole
March 16, 2009

To the editor :

The local tax has been removed, and we are still paying more than Fairbanks. What I find really odd is the fact that the gas prices in Tok also are less than ours. Last time I checked, Tok was quite a bit further away from the refinery. I guess Fairbanks is too.

Why are we paying so much more?

High gas prices in state smell fishy

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Monday, March 16, 2009

Today I researched using "gasbuddy.com" prices for fuel in the following cities. I then subtracted the state fuel tax for each type of fuel and compared those prices to Anchorage fuel prices , with the following results:

Great Falls -- regular gas $0.64; diesel $1.70.

Phoenix -- regular gas $0.55; diesel $1.67.

Seattle -- regular gas $0.61; diesel $1.69.

Honolulu -- regular gas $0.26; diesel $ 0.67.

As this information shows, we are being taken advantage of by our local oil companies and refineries. When we are paying more than Hawaii and have an in-state source for crude, then there can be no excuse for the high prices .

Also, these prices are compared with Anchorage prices . Most of the state pays far higher.

Everyone, and I mean everyone, needs to make our legislators and governor aware that this situation is not acceptable. Consider that most of us are affected by transportation for our food and necessities, and we are paying an additional $1.70 for diesel.

Fuel tax suspension helps a little

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Saturday, March 14, 2009

Glad to hear Gov. Sarah Palin pledged her support to extending the motor fuel tax suspension. The governor and lawmakers working together last year set the policy in place as part of the governor's comprehensive energy plan. I encourage legislators to keep this important tax suspension in place. Alaskans are still paying higher prices at the fuel pump than our neighbors in the Lower 48. Thank you, governor, for protecting our pocketbooks.

Gasoline threat

Fairbanks Daily News-Miner (AK) - Thursday, February 26, 2009
Author: Thomas McGhee, North Pole
Feb. 17, 2009

To the editor :

No illegal activity? A threat to create oil shortages and dire consequences intentionally would directly affect individuals, companies and entire communities. The evidence already is here today. "Jeff Cook, spokesman for Flint Hills Resources Alaska, forecast fuel shortages and other dire consequences should lawmakers approve anti-gouging or price cap bills." (Daily News-Miner, Feb. 13.) If that's not a threat, I don't know what one is.

There are no oil shortages, and there never has been a lack of oil other than those made by the companies. And why would anyone not want to protect residents?

Sell or close Flint Hills! It won't make it any worse for North Pole or the Fairbanks North Star Borough. We will survive your failures.

The truth is, price -gouging oil companies, greedy CEOs and outrageous union pay scales have put the public and private sector into stop-spending-and-protect-ourselves mode. In turn, it has back-fired and crippled everyone. Thanks, big oil companies, out-of-control unions and overpaid CEOs; you didn't look out for the consumer.

Is this referred to as biting the hand that feeds you?

No gouging?

Fairbanks Daily News-Miner (AK) - Tuesday, February 17, 2009
Author: Bob Bederka, Fairbanks
Feb. 13, 2009

To the editor :

OK, let me get this right. Jay Ramras and the rest of our politicians say there is no gouging on our fuel price .

Someone please explain to me then how oil can drop to $34 a barrel and gas in Fairbanks goes up? For that matter, explain why we are paying high gas prices to subsidize jet fuel prices ? Anyone in town who drives a jet, please raise your hand.

Jay should quit sniffing whatever it is he is sniffing and smell the coffee. That's coffee bought locally and not imported for him by his pals in the oil companies.

For that matter, all the doom and gloom that the oil companies and Jay predict will happen if we enact price caps might affect Jay's and Sarah's political contributions and actually be a good thing for us, the average normal Joe. Our prices are way out of line and it's time for something to be done. After all, tourist season is coming and all that does is give producers and retailers reason to raise our prices more!

Oh, and on a separate note ... Scott, leave Mount McKinley alone. We already renamed Alaskaland to Pioneer Park because some idiot somewhere thought it was supposed to be like Disney World with rides and roller coasters. Out-of-staters should quit being allowed to run our state.

Cut prices

Fairbanks Daily News-Miner (AK) - Tuesday, February 10, 2009
Author: Cami Pena, Fairbanks
Jan. 30, 2009

To the editor :

I dread going to the grocery store. There's nothing to fear more than looking at your barely-a-week-family-of-three groceries and realizing it slightly passes $200.

What happened to the days when a box of Wheat Thins was only $2, instead of rounding up to $4? I understand that as times get tough in our economy (i.e. Iraq War) prices will skyrocket. Yet how come they don't come back down?

Gasoline was such a huge struggle and although Alaska is still a dollar higher than the Lower 48, the prices still dropped. In a sense it infuriates me that grocery stores think that since the need for food is so high, people will still purchase groceries at a low income. The average American family's income has dropped dramatically with the recent downfall in employment. It would be nice if we could catch some sort of a break, soon!

Now don't get me wrong, I strongly appreciate the Safeway Club Card, Fred Meyer Rewards and even Wal-Mart's low prices , but it's still not enough. If most of Americans are overweight, how do you expect this to change with healthier and organic food prices through the roof?

So in regard to President-elect Obama, I understand he'd like to help the economy, but let's help the families first and cut prices .

Alaska should build a refinery

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Monday, February 9, 2009
Once again the Legislature has failed to do its job. After completing a 54-page report, the House Judiciary Committee has said that it has based its findings on "intuition" (ADN article Feb 3).

I think it's based on something else, but I won't go there. Their findings are based on the refiners subsidizing jet fuel prices by gouging the public at the gas pump.

The article's statement that "Because jets can refuel anywhere, jet fuel prices are controlled by the world market" is total hogwash. As a retired airline pilot I can tell you that jets don't land just anywhere, they usually like to land at their destination. Anchorage is one of the largest air cargo crossroads of the world because of its location. It is a shorter distance from here to there, period. If the cargo haulers don't land here where will they land? Whitehorse? Reykjavik? Greenland?

Those places would have trouble refining jet fuel at world prices . Will they fly extra and go out of their way to buy cheaper fuel? I don't think the savings would add up. Some agency outside the Legislature, the Attorney General's office perhaps, should do the investigating. Better yet, the state should build its own modern refinery and run it like the profit-making railroad.

Villages need fuel, food relief now

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - January 16, 2009

Recent reports from Emmonak, a village of 800 on the mouth of the Yukon River, have raised grave concerns. The high price of heating oil is causing families to choose between heat and basic food supplies. It is a problem that should concern us all. Immediate action is needed by the state to ensure villages faced with these unique problems have enough food, and if this can't happen the private citizens of Alaska need to organize a relief campaign. Time is wasting.

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Thursday, January 15, 2009

Price gouging is out of control

Your solution for high oil prices in Alaska does not go far enough. In a recent national campaign, a sandwich shop advertised $4.99 sandwiches that cost $5.99 here. My knee surgeries cost twice what they would have in Seattle. Years ago, when I was buying a new car from an Outside company, the local dealership wanted $800 to accept delivery, when the Outside rate for the same service was $150.

We need investigation into all of the higher prices we pay. Using your standard, we need a state agency that will investigate any price that is more than 10 percent above a specified Lower 48 average, maybe Seattle's. This agency should have the power to levy fines against plumbers and doctors and retailers and anyone else who is price gouging.

We need an agency that will determine what a fair profit to make is on any and all transactions. Why I have heard in the good years, fishermen can really rake it in. Why do I have to pay those exorbitant prices for halibut? A lot I had my eye on on the Hillside was going for $150,000. They bought it years ago for a fraction of that. Talk about gouging.

Let's get all of the Alaska price gouging under control, not just the refiners. A state agency to regulate profits is just what the doctor ordered.

Take a gasoline holiday

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Wednesday, January 14, 2009

Too bad everyone can't do as I do. If they could, gas would be $.50 a gallon; not $2.50 like it is here.

I filled the truck in Anchorage Nov. 3, and still have 1/4 tank. I am striving to buy gas every two months.

Not everyone can do that but still everyone has the power to bring down the price . If everyone would pick a day and not buy gas -- say Wednesday -- the price would come down. But will they? No! How could that be a problem? Not buy gas on a designated day? If you believe in doing this, notify all friends and relatives in and out of state.

Palin should take on gas prices

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Monday, January 12, 2009

I used to find it amusing when friends from the Lower 48 would ask how much we pay for gasoline here. I particularly enjoyed telling them the reason why it was so much cheaper here than wherever they live: "We grow it up here."

Now we find ourselves paying nearly a buck a gallon more than any of them and, as far as I can tell, there is only one thing that has changed between the time of my attempts at humor and now when it is no longer a joke.

Sarah Palin bragged while on the VP campaign trail that she took on the oil companies and raised their taxes here in Alaska. Her adoring public, in the Lower 48 and here, cheered this.

Are you cheering now? I honestly think that the oil companies, rather than spreading their new tax burden amongst all of their customers, are sticking it to us here.

Every time I fill up now, I think of this "Palin Tax" and wonder why she should be considered as a heroine to any of us. And why she refuses to do anything about this.

Monopoly keeps fuel prices high

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Sunday, January 4, 2009

I hope the state refineries and their retailers had a prosperous Christmas -- we're currently paying twice as much for gas as many places in the Lower 48. I'm a free marketer. Unfortunately we don't have a free market for gas/fuel oil in Alaska: We have a near-monopoly.

Bush Alaska is practically dying on the vine and the state economy is hurting all over because of this greed. The state should either buy Flint Hills and expand it to distribute gas at cost, or probably the easier thing would be to tax these guys 11 cents for every 10 they're over the national average. Hopefully the state legislators will grow a spine and takes steps to rectify this in the spring.

Gas issues

Fairbanks Daily News-Miner (AK) - Friday, January 2, 2009

Author: Janice Stables, North Pole
Dec. 29, 2008

To the editor :

I, too, have noticed the current plateau in local gasoline prices . According to a recent article in your pages, there has been a nationwide decline of 73 percent in oil prices since last summer. The national average price for gasoline is $1.69 per gallon.

I've done the math. Locally, our gasoline runs around $2.50 per gallon, 48 percent higher than the national average.

We have been told that our prices are based on the cost of gasoline plus the cost of shipping to Alaska (which in itself is questionable since we produce our own oil and gasoline).

I find it hard to believe that shipping costs are more than 3-5 cents per gallon. I find it even harder to believe that shipping costs 81 cents per gallon.

Is the Legislature done with its inquiry into local gasoline prices ? I hope not. Alaskans are still being taken for a ride.

OK, we elected you. Get to work!

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Saturday, December 27, 2008

Where are our elected leaders? What are they doing? Only last month were they on my doorsteps, on radio, on television, in the newspaper, sending fliers bombarding me begging for my vote. Well, you got it! What are you doing for us now? Have you forgotten who put you in office? I am writing about gas prices. Alaska has the highest gas prices in the nation. Are you kidding? Oil prices are now down to $25 a barrel. We are still paying more than $2 a gallon. Or have you not noticed? I will remember you the next time you need my vote.

Why so high?

Fairbanks Daily News-Miner (AK) - Wednesday, December 24, 2008
Author: Randy Frank, Fairbanks

To the editor :

How many other people have noticed the price plateau reached lately for the cost of a gallon of gas at local stations? As of Dec. 22, 2008, the lowest price per gallon has been stuck at $2.479 for about two weeks and I have to wonder why. The price of Alaska crude is still sliding; today it was $33-plus per barrel.

The Web site GasBuddy.com gives good gas prices throughout Canada and the United States. Even smaller communities in the Lower 48 states are seeing gas prices of less than $2 and there are some places in Utah and Wyoming where the price is below $1.40 per gallon.

According to GasBuddy, Tesoro is selling gas in Honolulu at $2.29 per gallon, and that is about the highest price in the city. Gas is selling for about $1.65 per gallon in Seattle.

This really makes me wonder, and why is diesel now a dollar more than gasoline when it used to be cheaper? I know that the requirement for diesel to be low or ultra-low in sulfur content has something to do with the added cost, but gasoline has to be low-sulfur also. Some price difference can be explained because we use less diesel than gasoline, although refining diesel is easier than making gasoline, so I think that would compensate some for the difference in the amounts used.

I am at a real loss to understand why our gasoline prices are so high relative to the Lower 48 states. I am sure of one thing, though — the refiners would have a real good answer for me. But I don't know that I would believe them. Oh, and today I paid $1.81 per gallon for No. 2 heating oil. Amazing and amusing.

State refinery could cut gas costs

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Saturday, December 13, 2008

Yesterday I returned from a visit to Georgia. Regular gasoline was selling for $1.34 to $1.45 and diesel was selling for $2.42 to $2.53 per gallon. Today prices here on the Kenai were $2.79 for gasoline and $3.79 for diesel, the highest prices in the nation. Why are Alaskans being charged almost double for fuel? Crude oil is selling for less than $40 a barrel, far less than it was 18 months ago, yet our fuel prices have retreated very little and very slowly.

The oil companies or refineries are ripping us off big time and the state seems unable or unwilling to try to stop them. Since the federal government has entered the private sector with the bailout of banks and the insurance industry, why doesn't the state build a refinery and enter into competition with the private refineries? That would certainly help ALL Alaskans and would drive prices down to a more comparable level.

Highest gas

Fairbanks Daily News-Miner (AK) - Tuesday, December 9, 2008
Author: Tracy Freel, Fairbanks
To the editor :

Alaskans get the shaft! In Alamosa, Colo., gas is $1.73 a gallon and it has to be trucked a minimum of 200 miles. In Fort Bridger, Wyo., where crude has to be trucked and then gas has to be trucked to retail stations, gas is $1.65 a gallon. Wildwood, Ga., — $1.54. Preston, Md., — $1.66. Garland, Texas, — $1.53. Fort Collins, Colo., — $1.47. Roanoke, Va., at Kroger gasoline station No. 3322 — $1.34.

We here in Fairbanks have a refinery in North Pole with a pipeline feeding it (crude is not trucked one foot), and we still have the highest gas, not to mention heating oil prices , in the nation. As of Nov. 28, gas was $2.629, and this was the lowest price in town. Is there something wrong with this picture, or is it just me? And all I can say when it goes back up is: Don't blame me, I didn't vote for him.

I'm proud to be an Alaska Republican, and I would like to say "thank you" to Ted Stevens for his years of service. He has my support and always has. Sarah Palin, I think, did a great job in the vice-presidential campaign and as our governor, and she has a strong backbone. She has the support of my family, and go get them and don't back down. Can't figure high gas prices ? Give 'Tyranny of Oil' a read

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Wednesday, December 3, 2008

The front page headlines in the Daily News Nov. 22 read "Alaska's high gas prices bewilder state lawmakers." For those citizens who would like an explanation, it can be found in a recent book written by Antonio Juhasz called "Tyranny of Oil".

Revealed is the history of the oil industry and how it has evolved to become the most powerful entity in the world. The industry's vertically integrated structure from well-head to consumer has allowed grossly high profits at the expense of the world's economy and its citizens. It is like a tax.

The oil industry was not able to be what it is today by just shrewd business practices. Their accomplishments have only been possible by political lobbying, influence peddling and campaign contributions at all levels of government. The millions of dollars spent have led to unchallenged corporate mergers, tax breaks, price manipulation, war in Iraq, and pollution at sea, in oilfields and refineries and in the air we breathe. Legislation has been and continues to be passed or defeated that benefits this industry.

Our elected officials have not and will not look after the people's well-being unless we hold them accountable. Who were the major contributors for the finance of the officials you voted for? Who are they indebted to and how will they stay in office? Who pays in the end?

Fuel disparities

Fairbanks Daily News-Miner (AK) - Tuesday, November 25, 2008
Author: Wayne C. Grieme, Fairbanks
Nov. 22, 2008

To the editor :

Fuel prices in the local area are out of sight but not out of mind. Local diesel prices range from $3.82 to $3.99 in the Fairbanks area, unleaded ranges from $2.79 to $2.99. Our combined local, state and federal taxes for diesel are 24.4 cents per gallon and for gasoline are 18.4 cents per gallon.

In Montana, diesel prices range from $2.62 to $2.72 while unleaded prices range from $1.80 to $1.86. Their combined local, state and federal taxes are: diesel — 52.2 cents, and gasoline — 46.2 cents.

In Utah, diesel prices range from $2.57 to $2.58 while unleaded prices range from $1.74 to $1.82. Their combined local, state and federal taxes are: diesel — 48.9 cents, and gasoline — 42.9 cents.

In Washington, diesel prices range from $2.66 to $3.24 while unleaded prices range from $1.89 to $2. Their combined local, state and federal taxes are: diesel — 61.9 cents, and gasoline — 55.9 cents.

Why such disparity? When you remove the taxes, it's even worse. I'm afraid to look at the home heating fuel prices .

Is our fuel processed here, or is it hauled in from the Lower 48?

Fuel prices change daily, but they can be verified on flyingj.com. The above prices were based on Nov. 22, 2008.

It's time for Palin to come home and take care of state's business

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Monday, November 17, 2008

Our governor, Sarah Palin, needs to wake up and realize that the campaign is over. She lost. It is time to come home and do her job. It sounds like she is taking a victory lap by the speech she made at the governors' meetings rather than taking care of business at home. Let's get back on the job and take care of Alaska.

She can start with doing something about the outrageous prices of fuel oil. I have a small home in Wasilla, not five miles from her home, and it is costing me $500 a month to keep it partly warm, and cold weather hasn't hit yet. Fuel oil is $3.50 a gallon, higher then gas , with oil at $55 a barrel, and lower refining costs. Why is that? Yes, she gave us $1,200 to help with energy costs. That bought her a few votes I am sure, but I would have preferred a natural gas line on my street, or an additional gas refinery in our state.

Now that the election is over, governor, what can you do to help Alaska?

Governor, deal with the gas that powers our vehicles

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Saturday, November 15, 2008

I was ready to discontinue my subscription to the paper if this morning (Tuesday) you had continued with your Ladies Home Journal style of journalism with the Palins in the kitchen. Glad to see we are back to news items.

My question for all Alaskans and Gov. Palin and staff, where is the uproar over gas prices ? I was in Manhattan two weeks ago, the most expensive place in the country, and gas was $2.72 a gallon. Currently lower yet, with Midwest states being under $2 a gallon, Seattle at $2.38 a gallon, San Francisco at $2.68 a gallon. What's up, Gov? Monopoly, price fixing after price gouging?

Where is the interest in what is best for Alaskans? Gov. Palin, you have a job to do. This is affecting every Alaskan. Can this be addressed soon?

Gasoline costs

To the editor :

I am a college student here at the University of Alaska Fairbanks. This is my first semester back in Alaska. Upon moving back, I thought I was leaving the expensive gas prices of Durango, Colo., behind. As it turns out, gas prices are no better here than in most parts of the Lower 48.

Some of the counties down there are currently paying under $2 per gallon, while we are still paying over $3.

This is ridiculous, considering that we have resources that we could put to use for our state. Is it really that difficult to lower the prices to match the prices of the rest of our country? Or to at least try?

Alaskans getting gouged for gas

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Sunday, November 9, 2008

I returned home yesterday from a trip to Texas where I paid $1.80 a gallon for gas. Our price here when I returned? $3.20. Alaska gas is now officially more expensive than Hawaii's. Texas gas stations used to gouge residents after tornadoes and government was very swift to act. Why is there so little response here? It's obvious to everyone Alaskans are getting a long-term "gouging" up here.

More regulation for refineries

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Tuesday, November 4, 2008

The ADN article "Local gas prices still lead nation" (Oct. 24) quoted economist Barry Pulliam as saying Alaska's "two refiners hold not a monopoly but a 'duopoly.' " This is an interesting observation because Chugach Electric and Municipal Light and Power can be considered a "duopoly" and are regulated utilities because they provide essential energy and do not function in a free market as defined in any Economics 101 textbook.

Alaska's two refineries have a natural geographic position that allows them to charge a higher price , which is just lower than what it would cost to truck gasoline to Alaska from Outside. A question that needs to be answered is: Why shouldn't the state address this duopoly as a regulated utility?

Reverse prices

To the editor :

I had a thought on how to make gas and oil prices fair again in Alaska. The prices for heating oil and gasoline are connected to prices of crude, so why not turn that around and make the crude connected to our price ?

Crude is about $70 today, yet our pump price looks more like that is around $100 to $110.

Gas gouging

To the editor:

Why isn't everybody up in arms about the price of gasoline? In the state of Washington, gas is $2.87 and diesel is $3.29 a gallon. People in Washington pay 36 cents a gallon state tax, we pay nothing.

I must have missed the results of the big state investigation into gas price gouging; anybody out there hear anything? Think about it, if the Washington state gas tax was repealed like Alaska's, they would be paying $2.51 for gas and $2.93 for diesel. Am I the only one who thinks something here just isn't right?

State attorney: Legal price-gouging going on Lawmakers may push bills to regulate fuel prices during upcoming session

By Tim Bradner<
Alaska Journal of Commerce
Publication Date: 11/02/08

Alaska legislators say they'll consider gasoline price-regulation or other actions, including state investment in a refinery, if refiners in Alaska don't lower gasoline prices.

"We're under tremendous pressure from our constituents to do something," Rep. Jay Ramras, R-Fairbanks, said in a legislative hearing Oct. 23.

Gasoline prices are dropping fast across the nation as crude oil prices fall, but they remain high in Alaska.

Ramras chairs the House Judiciary Committee, which held hearings on the fuel price issue in Anchorage.

At the hearing the state's lead attorney in an investigation on fuel prices told legislators that gasoline prices in Anchorage were as much as 90 cents a gallon higher than Seattle this summer and fall. On Oct. 24 regular gasoline sold for $3.51 per gallon in some Anchorage retail stations. On the same day gasoline prices averaged $3.08 per gallon in Seattle and $2.92 per gallon nationwide.

Prices were higher in small communities outside Anchorage. In Cordova, gasoline was selling for $4.93 per gallon. Residents of Kake, in Southeast Alaska, were paying $5.50 per gallon.

Ed Sniffen, head of the Department of Law's consumer protection division and lead investigator in the gasoline price inquiry, said he can find no explanation for the large price difference between Seattle and Alaska.

"Spreads like that raises anti-trust red flags," Sniffen told the Judiciary Committee.

It is possible that there is no illegal market activity and that the extended lag in price reductions results simply from the structure of the market, Sniffen said. He called it a "duopoly," or market domination by two suppliers.

Two refineries supply gasoline in Alaska. Tesoro Corp. is the state's main supplier, operating from its refinery near Kenai. Flint Hills Resources, a Koch Industries subsidiary, supplies gasoline to Interior Alaska markets from its refinery near Fairbanks.

Two other small refineries operated by PetroStar Inc., an Alaska company, make only jet fuel and diesel.

All of Alaska's fuel requirements except in the Southeast panhandle region are supplied by Tesoro and Flint Hills. Southeast Alaska is supplied by refineries in the Pacific Northwest.

Tesoro declined to appear before the committee, but Sniffen said he and other state investigators met with company officials in Anchorage on Oct. 22. Tesoro was cooperative in providing information, but Sniffen said he was unable to tell legislators what was discussed because of confidentiality agreements.

Flint Hills' Alaska public affairs manager Jeff Cook did appear before the committee but told legislators he couldn't answer detailed questions because of the investigation. Cook said Flint Hills supplies only 15 percent of the state's gasoline market and all of that is in Interior Alaska.

He also said new federal and state environmental requirements on fuels have imposed costs on the company's refinery, with an additional result that it is unable to produce as much gasoline as it did previously.

Ramras asked Econ One Inc., a consulting firm working for the state Department of Law, to analyze the effects of several legislative options, including price controls.

Other lawmakers aren't enthused about controls.

"Price controls can be very dangerous. The answer is to increase competition," Rep. Bob Lynn, an Anchorage Republican, said in the meeting.

Rep. Les Gara, an Anchorage Democrat, said he favors either price regulation or a major state investment in one of two refineries serving Alaska so state officials will have a way to influence markets.

"If the state owns 51 percent of one of the refineries, we could decide to take a lower margin at certain times as a way of influencing behavior of the other refiner," Gara has said.

These ideas would obviously require a great deal more discussion, but Gara expects several legislators to introduce bills next spring.

There may be an opportunity for state investment in the Flint Hills refinery. The company is studying options for the plant, including selling it, because of poor financial performance. One of the problems is a high premium charged by the state for state-owned royalty oil supplied to Flint Hills.

Sniffen also told the legislative committee the state could act to induce new competition. When such a large price spread between regional markets exists, competitors typically rush new supply into that market to take advantage of higher prices.

That isn't happening in Alaska, Sniffen said, possibly because the gasoline market is small and the existing suppliers control storage and distribution.

"There might not be enough of an incentive for an entrepreneur to get into the market," Sniffen said.

Barry Pulliam, an economist with Econ One, agreed with Sniffen.

"In small markets the normal price discipline, the opportunity for competitors to bring product in from elsewhere, is often missing," he said. "It's a complex question but it's often difficult to get people to do it."

Hawaii's situation is similar to Alaska's in that the state is remote and has two refineries, and the market is relatively small. The price spread for gasoline between Hawaii and the West Coast is almost as high as in Alaska, Pulliam said.

California provided an example of what can happen when the opportunity to import competing supply is missing.

When the state of California imposed standards for gasoline formulation for environmental reasons, the price differences between California and Texas, for example, at times reached 50 cents to 60 cents per gallon even though it only cost 8 to 12 cents per gallon to transport fuel from the U.S. Gulf Coast to California. Because California imposed the special fuel standards and it wasn't made elsewhere, there was a supply restriction.

Ramras said the state could invest in bulk fuel tanks at Anchorage's port, which could then be leased to a competitor bringing gasoline to the state.

Sniffen said Alaska's toolbox to influence refiners is limited absent discovery of antitrust or illegal collusion, because the state doesn't have a price-gouging law. Refiners are free to charge whatever they think the market will bear.

"In theory, there is nothing preventing them from charging $10 per gallon," he said.

But price-gouging laws in other states, which could serve as a model for Alaska, are typically linked to a natural disaster, such as a hurricane, and not to high crude oil prices. In those cases the state or other government entity must declare an emergency, which gives it powers to impose penalties if a marketer hikes prices unusually high compared with price levels prior to the event that triggered the emergency.

An alternative is for the Legislature to bring gasoline under state utility regulation that now covers telecommunications, electricity and natural gas sales, Sniffen said.

"That would work. It's a proven procedure," he said. The pitfalls with this are in the extended time needed for regulatory proceedings, he said.

Ramras said an option he wants to consider is to require refiners to maintain a certain spread between Anchorage and Seattle wholesale prices when crude oil prices exceed $100 per barrel, and to apply penalties if the spread exceeds those limits.

Sniffen said Flint Hills and Tesoro face challenges with their refineries. Flint Hills operates a topping plant near Fairbanks that can only make certain products from crude oil. Most of the output is jet fuel sold to airlines flying into international airports in Anchorage and Fairbanks. Flint Hills is capable of making only limited quantities of gasoline and diesel.

The refinery is also dependent on state-owned royalty oil delivered through the trans-Alaska oil pipeline, for which it pays a premium.

Tesoro's refinery near Kenai is designed to process light crude oil from Cook Inlet fields, but that supply is supplemented with crude oil from the North Slope and elsewhere. The refinery also has limited options for selling its residual oil, which amounts to about a third of production, and takes a loss on this, Sniffen told legislators.

Ramras said he doesn't want to "demonize" the refineries because he recognizes the problems they face. "Both of these plants are not models of efficiency," he said.

Sniffen cautioned legislators on price controls because of possible unexpected effects.

"In the worst case, one of the two refineries could close, leaving you worse off. There could also be effects on supply reliability," if the state moved aggressively to control margins. "Contracts for delivery to remote communities could be affected, for example."

Letter tells personal side of Emmonak's fuel crisis - ENERGY CRUNCH: Man had villagers describe their plight as they make do, or do without.

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Thursday, January 15, 2009

Author: KYLE HOPKINS khopkins@adn.com ; Staff

With a phone and a computer keyboard, Nicholas Tucker has turned a spotlight on his neighbors in the western Alaska village of Emmonak by telling stories of people trapped in a food and fuel crisis.

Earlier this month, Tucker asked fellow villagers to describe what Alaska's rural energy crunch meant to them. He says he talked to a 70 year-old husband who cries when he's alone because he can't feed his family, and a young wife who can't sleep because she doesn't know where she'll get her next gallon of heating fuel.

In a long letter, he spelled out the heart-rending plights of 25 households, identified only by initials. He sent it to politicians, a food bank, a Native corporation and rural newspapers. Alaska Newspapers Inc. published the letter on its Web site earlier this week, and statewide public radio followed with an interview. By Wednesday, the story of Emmonak's plight was spreading across the blogosphere, and state officials and others were scrambling to figure out what was going on.

Division of Community and Regional Affairs Director Tara Jollie said the state has been working with the community, and that she had talked with city officials there this week.

"I'm not getting the same sense of crisis in the tone of voice, but I am hearing from all parties that it's a real tough time," she said.

It's unclear whether things are worse in Emmonak than other villages in the hard-hit Yukon-Kuskokwim Delta, or whether a single eloquent voice struck an Internet nerve.

In any case, by Wednesday Tucker's phone rang non-stop as churches offered to fly food to the village and strangers from the Lower 48 asked how they could help. The local Native store gave him a calling card Wednesday that Tucker planned to use to call the state.

"Have you heard anything about Emmonak? Is there anyone that can help us," he wants to ask..

Three factors have hammered the Yup'ik village -- home to about 800 people at the mouth of the Yukon River -- over the past year.

Local commercial fishermen didn't make any money from king salmon -- a staple of the economy -- Tucker said, and an early freeze-up forced the village to miss its winter fuel barge.

Then the cold snap hit.

Tucker says he suspects other nearby villages are hurting in the same way.

HEATING OIL $11 A GALLON?

Jollie, the head of the Community and Regional Affairs Division, said she got copies of Tucker's letter from the Emmonak city clerk and Angoon Sen. Albert Kookesh.

"We're working as fast as we can to be thoughtful and responsive. There's fact-finding that has to happen in any situation," she said.

A rural subcabinet appointed by Gov. Sarah Palin will review the Division's findings at a special meeting planned for Friday, Jollie said.

Palin's rural advisor resigned in October. Palin spokesman Bill McAllister said possible replacements have been interviewed, but as far as he knows, no one's been selected to fill the job.

Emmonak leaders hoped the state would declare a fuel emergency in the village when an early freeze the kept the barge carrying heating fuel and gasoline from arriving in October. But state officials said such declarations are reserved for natural disasters, such as a storm destroying village fuel tanks.

Heating oil currently costs $7.68 a gallon, according to the Emmonak village corporation that sells the fuel.

But that price could soon rise, because the corporation had to start flying in extra heating fuel last week to make up for the missed barge.

Former Emmonak City Manager Martin Moore estimated in December that flying in the oil could raise the price as high as $11 a gallon.

'NOT MESSING AROUND'

The same day heating oil began to arrive by plane, Tucker put out a call over VHF radio asking people to tell him their stories. More than 20 people replied.

In the close-knit village where some people are embarrassed to have their private lives laid bare, Tucker identified the families by their initials.

He described a single father with five children living off moose meat alone: "Right now, we can't eat during the day, only at supper time. And, it is still not enough. If there had been no school lunch, our kids would be starving."

Another passage described a family of six: "(The husband's) family has been out of food for quite some time now. Their one-year-old child is out of milk, can't get it and he has no idea when he will be able to get the next can. He has been borrowing milk from anyone he can."

The next day, Tucker gave his letter to local officials who gathered for a meeting on fuel prices.

It calls for someone, anyone, to fly food into the village over the next several months. "I'm not messing around. If we can get a massive air lift, do it," he said in a phone interview Wednesday.

"I don't care how it's done," he said.

FOOD OR FUEL

The Food Bank of Alaska sends food from Anchorage to Emmonak to be distributed through the Emmonak women's shelter, said executive director Susannah Morgan.

Families can pick up a box of food per month, with the amount depending on how many people live in the household.

Morgan said the shelter currently has food to distribute and that she recently talked to shelter officials. Both sides agreed, she said, that not enough locals knew about the resource.

"It's not unusual for people who haven't been used to fighting hunger not to know where the hunger resources are," she said.

Tucker plans to ask the shelter to increase its orders.

Meantime, Alaska Newspapers Inc. -- a subsidiary of the regional Calista Corp. -- is launching a food drive for the village.

As Tucker notes in his letter, other villages may be struggling in the same way as Emmonak, said Managing Editor Tony Hall. "I really have to believe this is going on in a lot of other villages too, but we just haven't heard."

Tucker said churches in Fairbanks are also planning to send food and money by air, while people from the Lower 48 are calling him to ask how they can help.

A local Catholic church plans to hold a miniature potlatch this weekend -- an event where people can bring a few bags of ramen or boxes of pilot bread for their neighbors, Tucker said.

Many of the people he talked to told him they're choosing between food and fuel.

Tucker describes himself as a longtime advocate for fisheries and social issues in the region.

Asked what started Tucker on his mission, his wife Dorothy described a conversation she had one night with the couple's 8-year-old son.

The boy told her he was hungry.

"I said, 'I'm sorry we got nothing. We got no cereal we got nothing, so he went to bed hungry," Dorothy said.

Later, she talked to her husband.

"I told him I was really sad, and I was thinking of other people too. Some just have one meal a day, save the rest for the next day."

Daily News reporter Tom Kizzia contributed to this story.

Report: Refineries behind high gas prices in Alaska

Fairbanks Daily News-Miner (AK) - Monday, February 2, 2009

Author: Rena Delbridge

JUNEAU — A legislative committee tasked to look into high gas prices can't place a finger on any one reason Alaskans pay so much more at the pump.

House Judiciary Committee Chair Rep. Jay Ramras, R-Fairbanks, released a draft report today. Based on four public hearings and other information, the report cautions that any legislative action to force gas prices into parity with prices in the Lower 48 could drive refiners out of Alaska, leaving economic chaos in their wake.

Rep. John Coghill, R-North Pole, is a committee member.

He was somewhat frustrated by the lack of a conclusive finding, realizing that constituents are hurting at the gas pumps.

"They're really not gouging us," Coghill said.

Instead, he described a carefully choreographed dance between the higher prices Alaskans pay at the pump and the economic rewards the state realizes through the manufacture of jet fuel.

He shifted some of the question of high prices to Tesoro, which delivers about 85 percent of all motor fuel in Alaska. Flint Hills' North Pole Refinery turns out the other 15 percent.

Coghill said any final word on antitrust violations or price gouging will come from a state attorney general's office investigation, expected within days.

Ramras said the key finding is that the retail fuel and the aviation fuel businesses are tightly linked in Alaska.

"It's bad medicine to have to swallow, but Alaskans are sometimes, in some economic cycles, paying at the gas pump to keep the refineries producing jet aviation fuel, which represents 10 percent of the jobs in Alaska," he said.

He cautioned the analysis is intuitive and not based on any particular fact or document.

Some committee members are saying the draft — which they received at 5 p.m. Friday for a 1 p.m. hearing Monday — contains conclusions that weren't developed as a group.

Rep. Lindsey Holmes, D-Anchorage, doesn't know if she agrees with the report yet, because she hasn't had time to comb through it. She is critical of conclusions that she said weren't drafted by the committee.

"Really, they are comments by the committee chair," she said.

She also objected to the report picking apart a bill that didn't exist when the committee was at work by offering arguments against anti-gouging legislation. Ramras countered that the committee's original charge from former Speaker John Harris, R-Valdez, was to investigate retail gas prices and reach conclusions on possible legislative actions.

Introduced this session, House Bill 68 would make it illegal for Alaska refineries to sell gas, home heating fuel and diesel at prices more than 10 percent above the Washington state average.

Rep. Scott Kawasaki, D-Fairbanks, is among the bill's five sponsors. A parallel proposal, Senate Bill 54, is sponsored by three Anchorage Democrats.

Flint Hills Resources spokesman Jeff Cook said price-gouging legislation could have a significant, adverse affect on Alaska consumers and businesses, and could in fact prompt the refinery to change the way it does business.

"If the legislation is approved in Alaska, Flint Hills Resources may be forced to cease refining and fuel distribution in the state," Cook said.

If refiners shut up shop, Alaska loses its jet fuel production, which could place other economic cornerstones could be at serious risk, the report finds. Those include the Fairbanks and Anchorage airports because of a lack of jet fuel produced instate, the Alaska Railroad, which ships jet fuel and more, and Fort Wainwright and Eielson and Elmendorf air force bases, which draw on jet fuel manufactured instate.

John Binkley, chairman of the Alaska Railroad Corporation, confirmed that 40 percent of the railroad's revenue comes from hauling petroleum between North Pole and Anchorage.

"Without that base load, the railroad would look much different in terms of its size and its frequency of service," he said.

Gas price mystery

Rep. Ramras relies on intuition, leaves Alaskans wondering

Rep. Jay Ramras tried to have it both ways last week in his report on Alaska gasoline prices.

While the House Judiciary Committee report acknowledges a growing gap in Alaska and Lower 48 prices in the last year, Rep. Ramras advises against any "heavy-handed" government intervention to lower those prices.

He said that while he didn't have actual figures, he intuited that Alaskans were paying at the pump for the peculiarities of our fuel market, that high gasoline prices are the price we pay for a lively jet fuel market that keeps airports busy and jobs filled in Anchorage and Fairbanks and in between. If refiners have to cut jet fuel prices to remain competitive, they need to make it up at the pump when you fill your pickup.

Ramras' report was critical of House and Senate bills that would require refiners to justify their margins when the prices of fuels was more than 10 percent higher than Washington state prices.

Mess with the retail markets, he warned, and we might lose the Tesoro and Flint Hills refineries, which supply that jet fuel as well as gasoline, diesel and other fuels.

At the same time, he wrote that the committee shared the cynicism of Alaskans about the high refiners' margin, the difference between what it costs refiners to produce gasoline and the price they charge retailers. That margin is why Alaskans pay so much more for gasoline than drivers in Washington state -- as of Friday, about 42 cents per gallon more, and that's even more striking given that Alaskans pay 36 cents less per gallon in taxes than our brethren in Washington.

Rep. Ramras wrote: "There must be a better answer -- somebody must be playing 'hide the ball.' But we could not find it."

So the conclusion is that something is wrong here, but we don't know exactly what, and in any event it would be too risky to do anything about it other than build more storage capacity for rural Alaska.

We needed hearings for this?

Rep. Ramras may be trying to spike the gas pricing bills, but his conclusion makes a strong argument in favor of passage.

He says he can't find the ball?

The bills require refiners to show us the ball.

Rep. Pete Petersen, sponsor of the gas price bill in the House, argues that his bill doesn't impose price controls but does require justification for higher costs -- and that's justification beyond "what the market will bear."

Devoted free marketeers might argue that what the market will bear is the fair price. But Tesoro and Flint Hills make a duopoly that takes advantage of the fact that "Alaskans must drive," as the Ramras report says. We don't have the range of transportation alternatives most Lower 48 markets enjoy, so Alaskans can't cut their demand much when prices rise. And more competition is unlikely here for a variety of reasons. Small population and relative isolation preclude Alaska from the relief that is supposed to come from free market competition.

If jet fuel keeps so much of our economy running, and higher gasoline prices help subsidize those sales, then maybe those prices are justified. But the refiners should prove it. A lawmaker's intuition isn't enough.

BOTTOM LINE: We still need a better explanation for high Alaska gas prices. House Bill 68 will require it.

Who's up

Who's down

Rep. Jay Ramras: Fairbanks lawmaker and businessman spearheads food drive for strapped Alaska villages. Good work.

Rep. Jay Ramras: House Judiciary chair looks at Alaska gasoline prices, says something's wrong but let's not do anything about it. Huh?

Gov. Sarah: In one week she tangles with actress Ashley Judd over wolves, Rep. Jay Ramras over charity and Rep. Mike Hawker over budget cuts. Cue the banjos for Dueling Press Releases.

Todd and Palin aides: Senate votes them in contempt for ignoring Troopergate subpoenas. Contempt indeed. First Dude shrugs and revs up for Iron Dog.

Duct tape: Game face for Iron Doggers. Give an Alaskan duct tape, pilot bread, WD-40 and a little love, and he or she is set for life.

Alaska peony growers: There's gold in them thar flowers. Now if we can just find a market for fireweed and black spruce.

City of Anchorage: Assembly makes best of bad deal, agrees to buy Northpointe Bluff subdivision. Let's not do this again.

Seawolf women: UAA basketball team is the unanimous choice for No. 1 in the country. That's unanimous, sister. Wow.

Anchorage bond package: By even, we mean the chances of passage. Assembly helps with some judicious trimming. Don't ask for the moon in this economy.

Pilot bread: That Sailor Boy box is pitching books for Alaska kids. It's a natural -- kids curls up in a chair with Harry Potter and pilot bread. The crackers will last all seven volumes.

Gas price questions

'Something's out of whack'

Alaskans face a "duopoly" of gasoline suppliers in the state. Two refineries -- the Flint Hills operation in North Pole and Tesoro's Nikiski facility -- provide most of the state's gasoline.

So let's see ... Most of our gasoline is made here, yet as of December we were paying about 80 cents a gallon more than the national average.

Why?

The answer has been elusive.

State Sen. Bill Wielechowski has one. Alaskans, he said, are paying for "legal price gouging."

The senator and allies in the House -- Rep. Les Gara and Reps.-elect Pete Petersen and Chris Tuck -- have legislation in the works that would effectively roll back the "refiner's margin." That's the difference between what Alaska refiners pay for crude oil and what they charge retailers for their finished product.

What Alaskans want to know is why that margin keeps growing so fast, compared to refiners' margins in Washington state and the national average.

According to a legislative research report, the refiner's margin in Washington as of September 2008 was 60 cents a gallon. The U.S. average was 63 cents a gallon. The Alaska average was $1.25 a gallon -- double the Outside margins.

That's the reason Sen. Wielechowski says, "Something's out of whack."

As of Dec. 16, out of whack at the pump read this way, according to a legislative research report:

Alaska average per gallon: $2.67

National average per gallon: $1.81

Anchorage average per gallon: $2.45

Seattle average per gallon: $1.82

The price difference is even more striking because it includes all taxes, which in Washington state run 36 cents higher than in Alaska. We pay no state gasoline tax right now, because lawmakers have suspended it for a year. Even when that tax goes back into effect, it's only 8 cents a gallon -- lowest in the nation.

Last fall, Rep. Jay Ramras' House Judiciary Committee held hearings on gas prices. Tesoro declined to participate. Jeff Cook of Flint Hills said he couldn't say much because of the attorney general and Legislature's ongoing investigations. The state attorney, Ed Sniffen, said he couldn't say much because of confidentiality agreements over refiners' proprietary information.

Alaskan consumers have something to say every time they pull up at the pump.

So next week, Sen. Wielechowski hopes to offer legislation empowering the state to investigate refiners whenever their margin is more than 10 percent above a specified Lower 48 average, maybe Seattle's. If refiners could show that the margin was necessary to cover higher labor or other costs in Alaska and still turn a healthy profit, then fine. They could charge the higher amount.

But if they could show no such justification other than it's what the market will bear, then they could face fines and penalties for price gouging.

Why not let the free market determine the price?

"When there's no competition, there really isn't much of a free market," Rep. Gara said.

He's right.

The state has noted the lack of competition before. When former Attorney General Bruce Botelho concluded back in 2002 that there was no evidence of price collusion, he did say that the absence of competition meant that the refiners could enjoy the profits of collusion without the crime of collusion. In other words, they charge more because they can.

Cook, spokesman for Flint Hills, said Thursday he still couldn't comment because of the ongoing investigations. Tesoro spokesman Kip Knudson said that while he couldn't comment on legislation until he sees it, Tesoro would continue to work with the lawmakers and the attorney general's office.

For going on 10 years, Alaskans have asked why our gasoline prices rise as swiftly as the nation's but are sometimes much slower to fall.

We're still waiting for a good answer. If it's not forthcoming, then the state should have the authority to demand one.

BOTTOM LINE: Why do Alaskans pay more for gasoline than residents of any other state? We need good answers -- or lower prices.

Fair pay

Don Young can do right again

Today, the U.S. House of Representatives can fix one of the more mystifying U.S. Supreme Court decisions handed down in recent years.

In 2007, the court threw out a woman's pay discrimination lawsuit, filed under federal law, by using a creatively interpreted technicality. To pursue her claim, the court said, Lilly Ledbetter should have filed her suit within 180 days of when her employer decided to pay the illegally low, discriminatory wage.

As the dissenting justices noted, it often takes workers a long time to figure out they're getting paid less than they deserve. Wage and salary information is often confidential, making comparisons with co-workers difficult. The court ruling rewards rule-breakers if they can hide their pay discrimination for 180 days.

That just isn't fair. Which is why the U.S. House voted in summer of 2007 for a common-sense correction to the law. It said the 180 day clock for lawsuits runs from the most recent discriminatory paycheck. The measure, the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act, died after a Republican filibuster in the Senate.

In the House, Alaska's Don Young was one of only two Republicans to vote for the measure. That was the right call then, and it will be the right call again today.

BOTTOM LINE: Don Young can help fix a bad pay discrimination ruling.

Dear Attorney General Colberg:

We are writing to request an investigation into gasoline pricing in Alaska. As you know, the price of gasoline in Alaska is the highest in the nation. As of today, the average Alaska price is $4.62/gallon, while the national average is $3.88/gallon. This gap of 75 cents is substantially higher than the 20 cent spread that has historically existed. In fact, the actual price spread is higher than 75 cents, as Alaska's gasoline tax—which was 8 cents/gallon until recently suspended—was the second lowest in the country.

We would like to know what is responsible for this unprecedented discrepancy in pricing. Specifically could collusion at the wholesale or retail level be inflating prices in Alaska? We note that in 1999, after the last investigation into gasoline prices was initiated, the spread between Alaska and Lower 48 prices narrowed dramatically. This has led many people to speculate about whether informal price-fixing may have been at work.

We urge you to initiate this investigation as soon as possible as many Alaskans are struggling with today's exorbitant prices and desperately need relief.

Please do not hesitate to contact us if you have any questions about this request.

Re: Alaska Gasoline Pricing

Dear Senators Wielechowski and Davis:

Thank you for your August 11, 2008 letter requesting an investigation into gasoline pricing in Alaska. I am also concerned with the high cost of gasoline and the apparent disparity between prices in Alaska and markets in other parts of the United States. On Saturday, August 9, 2008, at the request of the Governor, I directed the Consumer Protection Unit within the Department of Law to initiate an investigation into Alaska gasoline pricing.

We completed a similar investigation in November, 2002 which lasted over three years. The results of that investigation did not find evidence of any illegal activity. This type of investigation is complicated, and will require significant resources including the retention of experts to assist us in gathering and deciphering documents and information. We do not know when the investigation, which must remain confidential, will be completed.

Thank you again for your inquiry. Please contact my office if you have any questions.

Sincerely,

Press Release

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE

For Immediate Release
November 20, 2008

UPDATE ON DEPARTMENT OF LAW'S GASOLINE PRICING INVESTIGATION

(Anchorage, Ak) - At the direction of Governor Sarah Palin, the Department of Law began an investigation into the pricing of gasoline in Alaska. The investigation was initiated in August, following the decline of gasoline prices across the country as the price of crude oil began to drop from record highs near $150 a barrel in July. Gasoline prices in Alaska, however, did not follow national trends, and soon became the highest in the nation. The Department's investigation is focused on explaining the slow decline of gasoline prices in Alaska, and whether the price of gasoline is the result of any illegal conduct, like price fixing or other collusive behavior.

The Department's investigation is ongoing, and must remain confidential under state law. The Department has gathered significant information from refiners, distributors, and retailers about the pricing of gasoline, and continues to gather additional data and information. The Department has retained Barry Pulliam, a Senior Economist at the Los Angles firm of Econ One, to assist the Department in its investigation. The Department has also attended two House Judiciary Committee hearings convened to discuss gasoline pricing issues.

The following is some useful information about gasoline pricing generally that may help explain some of the pricing for gasoline in Alaska.

1. The State of Alaska (or any state) does not regulate gasoline prices. Refiners, distributors, and retailers can sell gasoline at any price they want so long as those prices are not the result of collusive behavior, like "price fixing." If the price reached an "unconscionable" level, the price could also violate Alaska's consumer protection laws.

2. Because gasoline pricing is not regulated, economic forces including the available supply, consumer demand, and competition in the marketplace are the primary factors that determine gasoline prices.

3. Alaska does not have a price gouging law. Sellers of all goods and services (including gasoline) are not required to sell products on a "cost plus" basis. Thus, it does not matter what it costs the seller to acquire the goods or provide a service. Sellers can sell their products for whatever the market will bear. There is no "cap" on the amount of profit any business can make.

4. It does not matter what gasoline prices were when the price of oil was the same as it is today. For example, if refiners sold gasoline for $1.10/gallon when oil was $60 a barrel, this does not require them to sell it for $1.10 every time oil is $60 a barrel.

5. The price of gasoline in the lower 48 is not a good indicator of what prices "should be" in Alaska. The competitive forces that operate to control gasoline prices in the lower 48 are completely different from Alaska. The dynamics of supply, demand, and competition are unique in Alaska.

6. The demand for gasoline is not as "price sensitive" in Alaska as it is in other parts of the country. This means that regardless of the price, the demand does not change by much. This creates less incentive for suppliers to lower their price compared to areas of the country where demand drops significantly when prices rise.

7. Gasoline sold in Southeast Alaska is barged up from the Pacific Northwest and from Cook Inlet. Because fuel is only barged in once a month or every few months, it takes longer for prices to reflect current market conditions. It may take two or three months to exhaust current supply before less (or more) expensive gasoline is available and sold to retailers.

8. Some cities and boroughs charge tax on fuel sales. In the Kenai and Soldotna area, for example, the pump price adds a 6% city and borough tax that is not present in other cities, like Anchorage. Coupled with lower volumes and fewer stations, prices will tend to be higher in these communities.

The Department will complete its investigation to determine if there is any illegal activity among gasoline sellers that may be a cause of the high price of gasoline, and will prepare a summary of its findings when the investigation is done.

For further information, contact Department of Law Assistant Attorney General Clyde (Ed) Sniffen at (907) 269-5200.

Notes: All dollar amounts are per gallon. We use the word "margin" to mean the proportion of gasoline costs attributable to a certain step in the process of bringing a gallon of gasoline to the retail market. In this context, only a percentage of the total margin is taken as profit.
1) "Retail Gasoline" is the average price of gasoline "at the pump" to end-users and include taxes;
2) "Wholesale Gasoline" is the average price of gasoline charged by Alaska refinters to resellers;
3) "ANS Spot" is the cost of Alaska North Slope crude oil on the commodity market. We calculated this cost by dividing the price per barrel by 42 (the number of gallons in a standard barrel);
4) "Refiner Margin" is refiner wholesale price minus ANS Spot prices;
5) "Retail Margin" is retail price minus wholesale price.

ALASKA PETROLEUM PRODUCTS PRICING INVESTIGATION: UPDATE AND STATUS

Prepared by the Alaska Department of Law
December 21, 2001

Introduction

The Office of the Attorney General for the State of Alaska began an investigation of Alaska petroleum prices in 1999 by issuing Civil Investigative Demands to petroleum refiners and product distributors. The investigation was begun because of public complaints and inquiries to the Attorney General about the high price of gasoline in Alaska in comparison to other states. The purpose of the investigation is to determine whether Alaska petroleum product pricing is the product of illegal price fixing or other anticompetitive behavior in violation of state or federal statutes.

The Attorney General's investigation is ongoing. The Department of Law is reviewing the documents and data provided by the state's gasoline marketers. The Department of Law has not made a determination regarding whether there is sufficient evidence to warrant bringing an antitrust or other enforcement action.

Background

To bring an action under Section One of the Sherman Act (the federal antitrust law) or under AS 45.50 (Alaska's antitrust law), there must be evidence of an illegal agreement. This could be an actual written agreement, testimony, or other evidence of an agreement to fix prices, divide the market, or otherwise restrain competition.

Under existing law, the State of Alaska does not attempt to regulate wholesale or retail gasoline prices. A business is free to set its own price, but it is illegal for a business to collude with competitors to set prices.

The state has reviewed thousands of pages of documents, conducted interviews, and reviewed market data to determine whether there is direct evidence of an illegal agreement.

All material and data provided to the state in response to the civil investigative demands of the Attorney General are confidential by statute. AS 45.50.592(e). The following is a summary of the non-confidential portions of the analysis prepared by the department to date.

Price Differences Between Alaska and the Lower 48

Retail prices of gasoline in Alaska have more closely followed prices in other West Coast states than prices in the rest of the U.S. Given Alaska's relative proximity to the West Coast, this probably is to be expected. Though Alaska's refineries supply much of the petroleum products required in the state, jet fuel, diesel, and gasoline have regularly been shipped from West Coast refineries to Alaska during the past decade. (Alaska's sources of supply for petroleum products are discussed in greater detail below.) In addition, gasoline and other products have been exported from Alaska to the West Coast. Because West Coast refineries are the closest alternative source of refined petroleum products outside Alaska, and because refined products move from Alaska to the West Coast, Alaska prices are influenced by West Coast prices.

Unfortunately, gasoline prices on the U.S. West Coast have, historically, been higher than prices in the rest of the U.S. Over the past seven years, the average retail price for gasoline, excluding taxes[1], on the West Coast has been 11 cents per gallon ("cpg") higher than the average retail price throughout the 50 states.

Concerns expressed by consumers and others about West Coast gasoline prices prompted the Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") to initiate an investigation. The FTC studied West Coast gasoline pricing practices for almost three years, but ultimately concluded that there was nothing unlawful about the manner in which West Coast wholesalers priced gasoline.

The FTC closed its West Coast investigation in May 2001. In doing so, it concluded that the West Coast has several important characteristics that set it apart from much of the rest of the U.S. gasoline market. One of the most important characteristics is the West Coast's relative distance from the Gulf Coast. The Gulf Coast is the largest refining center in the U.S. and an important source of supply of gasoline and other refined products. Refined products move to much of the U.S. from Gulf Coast refineries through a network of pipelines. There are no pipeline connections, however, between the Gulf Coast's refineries and the West Coast. This means that products like gasoline moving from the Gulf Coast's refineries to the West Coast must be shipped through the Panama Canal on marine tankers. This may explain in part why gasoline and other products refined on the West Coast command higher prices.

Unique product requirements, such as those imposed by the California Air Resources Board ("CARB"), also tend to raise the price of gasoline. In addition, there are a limited number of gasoline refiners and wholesalers on the West Coast, and all refiners and wholesalers do not compete in all metropolitan areas.

[1] Retail gasoline prices at the pump include federal, state, and local taxes. Since Alaska has one of the lowest gasoline taxes in the nation, retail price comparisons understate the differences between prices in Alaska and elsewhere unless taxes are deducted.

Apart from the CARB standards, the West Coast market characteristics identified above are also present in Alaska. Compared to the West Coast, however, Alaska is even more distant from Gulf Coast product markets, has fewer refiners, and has even greater wholesale market concentration. This may explain in part why Alaska prices tend, on average, to be higher than those in other western states.

Yet these market characteristics, by themselves, do not explain why the price difference between Alaska and the West Coast grew sharply between 1995 and 1998. During this period, Anchorage-area prices were on average 17 cpg above retail prices in the Seattle area, a level nearly double the 9 cpg difference seen in the prior four years. This is curious given that Alaska refiners produced more gasoline during this period than was consumed here, and exported the surplus to the West Coast and Far East at prices lower than those offered in Alaska. Beginning in 1999, however—after the Attorney General initiated this investigation—the spread narrowed dramatically. Between January 1999 and December 2000, Anchorage-area retail prices averaged just 3 cpg above Seattle-area retail prices.

Supply and Demand of Petroleum Products

In addition to gasoline, the other major petroleum products sold in Alaska are jet fuel and diesel (No. 2 heating oil and No. 2 diesel fuel). These products and gasoline constitute more than 95% of the total volume of petroleum products sold in the state.

The Tesoro and Williams refineries produce gasoline, jet fuel, and diesel. The PetroStar refinery produces jet fuel and diesel, but no gasoline.

The Williams refinery, near Fairbanks, and the PetroStar refineries, near Fairbanks and in Valdez, all take Alaska North Slope crude ("ANS") directly from the TAPS line. Both companies reinject the unrefined portion of ANS back into the TAPS line.

Alaska's current demand for refined petroleum products is approximately 100 thousand barrels per day (MBD), or 1.5 billion gallons per year. Jet fuel consumption is just over 60 MBD, accounting for a little more than 60% of total demand for refined product in the state. Consumption of diesel and gasoline in Alaska runs approximately 16 MBD, or 245 million gallons per year, for each product.

More gasoline is produced in Alaska than is consumed. The excess is exported to the West Coast and foreign destinations. Nevertheless, gasoline, diesel, and jet fuel are barged into southeastern Alaska from Seattle-area refineries.

Historically, Alaska's refineries have not produced enough jet and diesel fuel to supply the state. These products are imported from the Far East or the West Coast.

Tesoro's refinery supplies the majority of gasoline consumed in Alaska, but Williams supplies most of the gasoline sold in Fairbanks and interior Alaska. Williams also ships gasoline and jet fuel by rail to Anchorage.

The Anchorage metropolitan area accounts for about 60% of the state's retail gasoline sales while Fairbanks, Juneau, the Kenai Peninsula, and Western Alaska account for roughly 10% of retail sales each. There are approximately 300 service stations in Alaska. About one-third of Alaska's 300 retail gasoline stations are located in the Anchorage area. The average retail station in Anchorage is larger and sells much higher volumes than stations in the rest of the state.

Alaska's Gasoline Industry Is Highly Concentrated

Williams, Tesoro, Chevron, and Texaco[2] account for the vast majority of gasoline marketed in Alaska. The state's two gasoline refiners, Williams and Tesoro, were also its largest gasoline marketers, accounting for nearly 65% of Anchorage-area sales between them in 1999. Chevron and Texaco accounted for approximately 32% of Anchorage volumes. These same four marketers have accounted for nearly all of Alaska's gasoline sales over the past decade.

For purposes of analyzing competition within a market, the U.S. Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission categorize markets into the following three groups: Unconcentrated, Moderately Concentrated, Highly Concentrated. Alaska's gasoline industry is Highly Concentrated at both the refining and wholesale distribution levels. Wholesale gasoline markets in Alaska are more concentrated than in most other wholesale gasoline markets in the U.S. and on the West Coast. Analysis of the available market share data shows that with the exception of the southeast part of the state, concentration levels are much higher in regions outside of Anchorage.

Competition, Oligopoly, and Illegal Behavior

Unconcentrated markets are characterized by a large number of sellers offering the same or similar products to consumers who can shop for the best value. Unconcentrated markets are generally assumed to be competitive. The more sellers, the more likely competition will thrive. In a competitive situation, no single seller has market power; the power to influence prices in the market on its own. Also where there are many sellers, it is difficult for sellers to coordinate their behavior or agree to volume or price restrictions without being detected.

[2] Since the late 1990's, in the West and Midwest, Texaco brand gasoline has been marketed by Equilon, a joint venture between Texaco and Shell. As a condition to approving the recent merger of Chevron and Texaco, Alaska, other states, and the Federal Trade Commission required Texaco to divest its interest in Equilon to Shell or another buyer. Therefore, the Chevron-Texaco merger should not reduce competition in the Alaska gasoline market.

In a competitive market, sellers are motivated to lower their prices in order to increase their sales, while buyers are motivated to seek out the best deal. Prices will tend to drop over time until they are close to sellers' costs. If prices begin to rise above costs, sellers will try to take advantage of the opportunity to increase profits by making more of the product available in the market. This increase in supply will in turn drive prices down to the point where they again are close to the sellers' costs. If prices fall to a level that does not cover sellers' costs, some sellers will go out of business. Those that are left will offer less of the product until prices start to increase again.

On the other end of the spectrum are highly concentrated markets, where there are relatively few sellers of a particular product. Economists call such a market an "oligopoly." Oligopolies do not always lead to higher prices, however. Prices in an oligopoly can be competitive even when there are very few sellers if, for example, potential new sellers are ready, willing, and able to enter the market in the event of even a small increase in price. In this situation, the threat of additional competition may tend to keep prices low. However, if there are relatively high costs associated with entering a market (entry barriers), existing sellers may be able to increase prices without much concern about attracting new competition.

When there are few sellers in a market, it is, presumably, easier for each to observe how its competitors react to decisions regarding output and prices, and each may take into account the potential impact of its own actions on market prices and the potential responses from other sellers. This type of competitive behavior, which is dependent in part on the expected actions or reactions of other sellers, is often referred to as "oligopolistic pricing" or "oligopolistic interdependence." In this environment, it is easy for sellers to develop a "live and let live" attitude toward their rivals that would not be possible to maintain in a competitive market. As a result, oligopolistic behavior can result in prices that are above competitive levels over extended periods of time.[3]

This type of interdependent behavior on the part of sellers is not generally regarded as a violation of antitrust laws so long as each business develops and implements its pricing and output decisions independently. That is, in determining what volumes to produce or what prices to offer, businesses can incorporate their expectations about a rival's likely reactions as long as those expectations are developed independently and without the aid of other sellers. If the sellers communicate about price setting or enter into an agreement that affects prices, it is considered collusion and a violation of the antitrust laws.

Economists believe collusion is more likely when certain conditions are present in a market, especially in markets for a relatively homogenous product like gasoline. These conditions include (1) the presence of only a few sellers (oligopoly), (2) inelastic demand, (3) relatively static or declining demand over time, (4) easy detection of sales by competitors, (5) price visibility, (6) difficulty of entry by potential new competitors, (7) frequent contact between sellers, and (8) few "fringe" or smaller sellers. All of these conditions are present in Alaska. But their presence, together with gas prices higher than one would expect in a competitive market, do not in themselves constitute a legal basis for an antitrust enforcement action. There must also be evidence of an illegal agreement or evidence that would allow the inference of such an agreement.

Additional Information on the Investigation

The companies have recently finished producing documents to the state. The state is in the process of reviewing and analyzing those documents to determine whether any laws or regulations have been violated.

Under Alaska's antitrust law, many aspects of this case are to be kept confidential. In particular, documents and their contents provided to the state in response to the Civil Investigative Demands (CIDs) issued by the Office of the Attorney General are to be kept confidential in the absence of a court order authorizing their disclosure to the public. AS 45.50.592(e). Such an order might be requested by the state if the investigation leads to an enforcement action. If the state finds no evidence of a violation of the antitrust laws, CID information may not be disclosed to the public in the absence of express authorization by the firm that provided the documents. AS 45.50.592(e). Because of the lawsuits filed against the state by some of the companies being investigated, court pleadings have been filed in the public record that contain some information about the investigation that would normally not be available to the public.

The state's initial CIDs were served upon several dealers of wholesale petroleum products in June, July, and August of 1999. Shortly thereafter, Tesoro, Chevron, and Texaco filed suit in Alaska Superior Court in Anchorage protesting the scope of the CID questions and the state's intended use of the produced documents. Those cases were consolidated under case number 3AN-99-8544CI. In an order issued October 7, 1999, the Superior Court upheld the propriety of the CIDs, with minor modification to a small number of questions, and the right of the state to share the documents with contract counsel without permission of the producing companies.

On October 13, 1999, Tesoro filed an appeal of the Superior Court's decision in the Alaska Supreme Court (Case No. S9379). Tesoro appealed both the scope of the CIDs and the state's right to share documents with contract counsel. The Alaska Supreme Court heard oral argument on November 15, 2000, but has yet to issue a decision.

The initial petition filed by Tesoro in the Superior Court explains Tesoro's contentions with respect to the scope of the CID. The CID, attached to the petition as an exhibit, lists the issues being examined by the Department of Law. Likewise, the state's opposition to Tesoro's petition outlines the issues that are the focus of the CID. The state's brief in the Alaska Supreme Court analyzes the issues being pursued and gives a brief history of the case proceedings. These documents are available at the state court clerk's office in Anchorage.

ALASKA PETROLEUM PRODUCTS PRICING INVESTIGATION:

CLOSING REPORT

Prepared by the Alaska Department of Law

November 21, 2002

Introduction

At my direction, the Alaska Department of Law conducted an extensive three-year investigation into the pricing of petroleum products in Alaska. The investigation was initiated in 1999 in response to public complaints about the high price of gasoline in Alaska in comparison to other states. I am closing the investigation because there is insufficient evidence indicating a violation of the antitrust laws.

Conditions Prompting the Investigation

Historically, the price of gasoline on the West Coast of the United States averaged 11 cents per gallon (cpg) higher than the average retail price throughout the 50 states, excluding taxes,[1] and the price of gasoline in Alaska has tended to be higher than the price of gasoline on the West Coast by about 9 cpg. Between 1995 and 1998, however, gasoline prices in Alaska were as much as 17 cpg higher than West Coast prices. This was the impetus for the investigation. Immediately after I initiated the investigation, beginning in 1999, the spread between prices in Alaska and the West Coast narrowed dramatically, more closely tracking the historical spread between Alaska and the other states.

Legal Standards

In order to establish a violation of Alaska's antitrust statute, AS 45.50.562 and AS 45.50.564 (or the comparable federal law), there must be evidence that two or more companies entered into an express or "tacit" agreement to fix petroleum prices. A showing that companies charged prices in excess of the competitive level, or raised and lowered prices in a parallel fashion, is not enough to establish the existence of a tacit agreement. Instead, evidence of uniform pricing must be accompanied by additional evidence demonstrating that two or more parties had a "meeting of the minds" to engage in cooperative pricing behavior, such as: (1) actions contrary to an entity's independent economic interests; (2) departure from normal business practices; (3) motive to conspire; (4) opportunity to conspire; (5) high level of inter-company communications; and (6) past antitrust violations involving collective action.[2]

[1] Retail gasoline prices at the pump include federal, state, and local taxes. Since Alaska has one of the lowest gasoline taxes in the nation, retail price comparisons understate the differences between prices in Alaska and elsewhere unless taxes are deducted.

[2] See, In re Baby Food Litigation, 166 F.2d 112, 122 (3d Cir. 1999) (proof of plus factors is a "prerequisite to finding that parallel action amounts to a conspiracy").

The Investigation

The investigation began in the summer of 1999 when my staff issued Civil Investigative Demands (CIDs) to refiners and distributors of petroleum products in the state. Hundreds of boxes of documents were produced in response to the demands. The investigation involved the review of thousands of pages of internal company documents, detailed analysis of pricing data, interviews of witnesses and potential witnesses, and formal depositions of several current and former oil company employees and executives.

Findings

My staff provided a summary of the investigation in a report entitled "Alaska Petroleum Price Fixing Investigation: Update and Status," December 21, 2001, http://www.law.state.ak.us/civil/oil-gas-mining/AKPPPI-1a_final.pdf. That report describes the economic conditions and market forces present in Alaska that affect the pricing of petroleum products. All of the information and data provided to me in response to the CIDs is, by statute, confidential. AS 45.50.592(e).

The investigation found that Alaska's gasoline industry is highly concentrated, in that four marketers accounted for the vast majority of gasoline sales during the relevant time period. When there are few sellers in a market, like Alaska, it is easier for them to observe how competitors react to decisions regarding output and prices, and each may take into account the potential impact of its own actions on market prices and the potential responses from other sellers. This type of interdependent behavior on the part of sellers often leads to parallel pricing, but that is not, in the absence of an express or implied agreement to set prices, a violation of the antitrust laws so long as each business develops and implements its pricing and output decisions independently. The investigation has not produced evidence of an express or implied agreement to set prices or to otherwise violate antitrust laws.

For the reasons set forth above, I am closing this investigation without further action. However, I expect the Department of Law to continue to monitor gasoline prices in Alaska.

SENATOR BERT K. STEDMAN

MEMORANDUM

To: Senator Hollis French, Chairman
Senate Judiciary Committee

CC: Senator Bert Stedman
Senator Lesil McGuire
Senator Bill Wielechowski
Senator Gene Therriault

From: Weston Eiler, Legislative Aide

Date: March 18, 2009

Subject: Senate Bill 59 – Hearing Questions Follow-Up

Senator Stedman would like to follow-up on questions raised during the March 18th Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on Senate Bill 59. Committee members raised questions regarding the scope of the bill's expanded access for low-speed vehicles, the official definition of low-speed vehicle, and required safety tests.

Section 1 Subparagraph B of SB 59 states that low-speed vehicles may operate on a highway with a maximum speed of 45mph if the highway is, "within an area of the unorganized borough, outside of a city, that is not connected by road to Anchorage or Fairbanks." The attached list details which communities would be allowed, and which would be unable, to implement this expanded access to 45 mph roads for low-speed vehicles.

Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard (FMVSS) 500 defines low-speed vehicle as:

(a) a 4-wheeled motor vehicle,

(b) whose speed attainable in 1.6 km (1 mile) is more than 32 kilometers per hour (20 miles per hour) and not more than 40 kilometers per hour (25 miles per hour) on a paved level surface, and

(c) whose Gross Vehicle Weight Rating (GVWR) is less than 1,133 kilograms (2,500 pounds).

FMVSS regulations also require several inspections including tests of the vehicle's maximum speed, carrying weight, and safety equipment. The attached documentation provides further details on the expected affect of SB 59 and applicable federal regulations. Please feel free to contact our office if you have any questions.

Note:

Under existing law, low-speed vehicles are allowed in these communities and able to drive on roads with a speed limit of up to 35mph. SB 59 expands access to roads with 45mph only in certain communities due to traffic congestion and safety concerns.

SB 59 - Low-Speed Vehicle Definition could create safety issues and concerns that negatively impact and cause severe damage to a new growth industry that provides real and significant solutions to our country and our planet's key issues." This petitioner envisions a Medium Speed Vehicle class that "would essentially be the same as the LSV regulations with the exception of the top speed of 35 miles per hour and additional vehicle requirement to increase the safety of margin [sic] for rollover, stopping, acceleration, and avoidance maneuvering." The petitioner lists these additional vehicle requirements as: Ability to maintain 35 mph on a level grade, ability to maintain 30 mph up an 8 percent grade, a minimum width of 55 inches, a "coil over shock" suspension, four-wheel hydraulic disc or drum brakes, and three-point automotive seat belts, in addition to the requirements that already exist for LSVs in FMVSS No. 500. The petitioner also states, "Additional testing of the vehicles should also be considered, including crush zones with a 2.5mph 'no damage' requirement. A full frontal crash should be required to meet safety standards between 17–18 mph, which is a derivative of full speed automobiles being crash tested at 35 mph." The petitioner does not state where the no damage crush zones would be on the vehicle, how they would be measured, or which safety standards would be tested at 17 or 18 miles per hour.

Porteon believes the new medium speed vehicle class is necessary because LSVs currently travel, with their top speed of 25 mph, on streets with speed limits up to 35 mph and normal traffic flow is impeded by these vehicles. MSVs, with their top speed of 35 mph, "would create a more cohesive traffic environment for mixed use vehicles."

III. Low Speed Vehicles

In 1998, NHTSA established Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard (FMVSS) No. 500, "Low speed vehicles," in response to growing interest in using golf cars and other similar-sized, 4-wheeled vehicles, including Neighborhood Electric Vehicles (NEVs), to make short trips for shopping, social, and recreational purposes primarily within retirement or other planned communities with golf courses. See 63 FR 33194. The definition of LSV established in that rulemaking was, "a 4-wheeled motor vehicle, other than a truck, whose speed attainable in 1.6 km (1 mile) is more than 32 kilometers per hour (20 miles per hour) and not more than 40 kilometers per hour (25 miles per hour) on a paved level surface."

In 2005, NHTSA published a final rule amending the definition of LSVs by removing the restriction on trucks, and instead establishing a 2,500 pound maximum GVWR. See 70 FR 48313. This allowed small vehicles designed for work-related applications within the intended communities, such as landscaping or delivery purposes, to be included within the definition of an LSV, without opening the category to unintended vehicles, such as street-sweepers or speed-modified passenger cars. Additionally, in 2006, in response to petitions for reconsideration from Dynasty Electric Car Corporation and Global Electric Motorcars (GEM), both manufacturers of electric LSVs, NHTSA increased the maximum GVWR for LSVs to 3,000 pounds. This was done, in part, to "level the playing field" between electric and gasoline-powered LSVs, by allowing for the additional weight in batteries required by electric vehicles. See 71 FR 20026.

In conceiving the concept of the LSV as a small vehicle that would not be subject to the same stringent safety criteria as other vehicles, a critical concept was that it would not ordinarily mix with other traffic. In our 1998 rule establishing the category of LSVs, NHTSA explained in the summary that the rule:

> [R]esponds to a growing public interest in using golf cars and other similar-sized, 4-wheeled vehicles to make short trips for shopping, social and recreational purposes primarily within retirement or other planned communities with golf courses. [emphasis added]

NHTSA's detailed analysis, as explained in the preamble of the 1998 final rule, recognized the importance of the fact that under most conditions, LSVs would not intermingle with regular automobile traffic, and the occasions where they would mix would be in controlled, low-speed environments. NHTSA stated that

> NHTSA has carefully reviewed their argument about the effects of this rulemaking. LSV safety, and thus the need for FMVSSs for LSVs, will be determined by the combination of three factors: vehicle design and performance; operator training and ability; and the operating environment. The agency believes that Standard No. 500, in combination with a limited operating environment and appropriate operator training and ability, will appropriately address the safety needs of LSV users.[4]

Additionally, in the 1998 final rule, NHTSA analyzed the Fatal Analysis Reporting System (FARS) data regarding fatalities involving golf cars. It was found that of the nine reported fatalities, eight of them involved a collision with a car or truck. This further underscored the importance of driving environment.

In the 1998 final rule, the agency studied the use of NEVs in various municipalities that permitted them to travel on public roads. In that notice, we stated that "the driving environment [of LSVs] should be appropriate to the vehicle and its characteristics. Limiting LSV use to low-speed city and suburban streets is necessary, but does not eliminate the safety risks."[5] NHTSA analyzed the State laws governing the on-road permissibility of NEVs in various States. Of the 12 States discussed, only one State (Arizona) permitted NEVs to travel on any road with a speed of 35 mph or less. The other 11 States (California, Nevada, New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming, Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa, Florida, Georgia, and Texas) restricted NEVs to roads specifically designated by State and local governments.[6]

One portion of the analysis discussed possible reasons for the disparity of fatalities between Sun City[7] (which had four NEV fatalities) and the City of Palm Desert (which had zero). We noted that:

> The City of Palm Desert has a more controlled environment than Sun City for golf car use. The City of Palm Desert permits on-road use of golf cars in the same lanes as passenger cars and other larger motor vehicles in speed zones posted for speeds up to 25 miles per hour. In speed zones posted for speeds over 25 miles per hour, golf cars may be operated on-road only if there is a lane designated for their use and if the golf car is, in fact, operated within that lane. By contrast, NHTSA understands that Sun City, under state law, allows golf cars to operate in the same lanes as larger traffic on any road with a maximum speed of 35 miles per hour.

Based in part on this analysis, as well as our other observations, we concluded that operating environment played an important role in determining the benefits of establishing the LSV classification, as well as determining what safety standards should apply to that class. While NHTSA does not regulate the driving environment (such decisions are at the discretion of State governments), it did recommend that LSVs be licensed only for use in environments with very limited traffic. Specifically, we stated:

> NHTSA recognizes that not all operating environments may be as controlled as that of the City of Palm Desert. The agency encourages other states and municipalities to study the features of the City of Palm Desert's

Regarding: HB59 – "An Act relating to the operation of low-speed vehicles"

1998 I started the business Solar Wind to promote the use of alternative energy systems within Alaska. In the 11 years that I have been in business I have sold over $350,000.00 worth of solar panels, inverters, batteries, generator, water turbines, and wind turbines. I have well over 100 customers significantly reducing their dependence upon carbon fuels.

Last year I expanded my business to include electric vehicles (EV's). Currently there are nine (9) EV's operating in Petersburg. Since last summer these vehicles have been driven over 8,000 miles saving 400 gallons of fuel.

EV's are ideal for small rural communities that have access to hydroelectric power. They cost less than 2 cents a mile to operate. The battery system that comes with the vehicle provides over 25 miles of range and is designed to function for over 20,000 miles, adding about 12 cents per mile for operation. There is minimal maintenance an no oil changes.

These EV's are a low-speed vehicle (LSV) and are ideally suited for short trips to the post office, grocery store, school, and shopping. Such short trips are the most fuel inefficient for internal combustion engines (ICE) and are hard on a cold engine.

Within Petersburg, as well as many of our smaller communities, most of our roads are posted at 35 mph or less and therefore are well suited to LSV's. The proposal to allow the use of LSVs on roads posted at 45 mph or less would greatly broaden the window of use.

I spoke to our chief of police, Mr. Stone, regarding the use of LSV's within Petersburg and he commented that many of our older citizens never drive over 25 mph anyway. He did not feel that their reduced speed would create a safety hazard within our community.

An interesting side note – many of my customers are older individuals who have difficulty getting in and out of conventional cars and trucks. However, they find the LSV's to be easy to get into and operate. They are some of my best champions driving their vehicles on a daily basis even through the winter.

I appreciate the support that you are providing to the use of alternative energy and LSV's. Please feel free to contact me at any time if there is information that I could provide or if you need support. Next time that you are in Petersburg I would enjoy giving you a ride from the airport or wherever (there may be a charge of 1.5 cents per mile).

Re: SB 59 - An Act relating to the operation of low-speed vehicles

Dear Senator Stedman,

On behalf of the Alaska Conservation Alliance (ACA), a consortium of 40 Alaska-based conservation groups, I would like to express our support for SB 59, an Act relating to the operation of low-speed vehicles. Allowing low speed vehicles to access more mileage of state and municipal roads will allow those already in possession of a low-speed vehicle to get more use out of their investment while at the same time giving an added incentive to low-speed vehicle purchases by meeting more customer needs.

For those Alaskan communities working toward energy self-sufficiency through local, secure clean-energy production and use, the switch to hybrid-electric and all-electric vehicles is a must. By allowing low speed vehicles to access additional roads within these communities, roads that could take drivers to the airport, hospital, ferry terminal or grocery store, this bill will make cheap, efficient, low-speed vehicles more practical in these self-sufficient communities.

Additionally, low-speed vehicles can cost tens of thousands of dollars less than full-sized electric cars. This bill will help broaden the penetration of electric vehicles and offer transportation options to commuters with lower incomes. The Alaska Conservation Alliance strongly encourage the Alaska Legislature to pass SB 59. Thank you for your time and consideration.

Sincerely,

Kate Troll

Petersburg gets charged up about their new electric cars

By ROBERT MONTEITH
Pilot writer

Petersburg's first ever car dealership held an open house last weekend. The event, which showed off the "Miles" electric car, was a huge success, attracting a crowd of over 100 people throughout the three-hour event.

"The first two hours, it was a lot like a fair. There were a lot of people milling around. I couldn't even answer all the questions. We invited all the current owners and they all came down to give everybody rides. It was just a lot of fun," said Gerry Herbrandson, who operates the company with brother Rod.

The brothers brought the compact electric cars to Petersburg after discovering the product existed. Herbrandson said he had been enthusiastic about alternative sources of energy like solar paneling for a long time. This new automobile venture, named Solar Wind of Alaska, is an extension of that interest.

The cars themselves run on 48 volt direct current motors that limit themselves to a legal low mileage vehicle limit of around 30 mph. The Herbrandsons have also recently started offering a truck, which is boosted up with a 72 volt AC motor that can haul ,700 lbs.

Herbrandson explained that for a long while, the manufacturer had difficulty finding the right market for these cars, which have a range of 30-50 miles between charges.

ROBERT MONTEITH / Petersburg Pilot

The Herbrandson brothers' electric car sales event attracted more than 100 people on Sunday.

"They made quite a few of these and put them in the larger cities. As you can see, that doesn't really make sense because they have boulevards and freeways so they didn't sell at all. So they were trying to figure out what to do with them. A number of dealers in small rural communities found out about this. They picked up on it because these are ideally suited for isolated small communities that don't have any freeways," he said.

The open house even attracted Douglas Wilson, an executive of the Miles' manufacturer, who want to know the appeal of the car in a place like Petersburg.

"He came up here specifically to show them why they are buying the cars. It's because of the ease of access and for just running around, it just makes a lot of sense," explained Herbrandson.

He went on to say that while he didn't expect the electric cars to replac[illegible]family's first vehicle, they offe[illegible]a lot as a way of getting around town quickly.

"Everybody is going to have to keep their truck to haul their boat out, haul their firewood, or do their long runs, but the problem is going to the grocery store or post office is just a short run. That is awful hard on gas engines. That's where your fuel efficiency is very low. You pick up some condensates in the engine because it's not getting warm enough. The electric cars, this is where they shine. If people are choosing to replace their second car, this is the car of choice because it meets a lot of needs," he said.

One need is the cost of fuel, which Herbrandson lists at about 1.5-2 cents worth of electricity per mile.

So far, business has been good for the upstart company with several Petersburg families purchasing the vehicles. The Herbrandsons will travel to Wrangell this weekend for another open house event.

Public testimony in regards to SB54 on April 3, 2009

www.fairbanksgas.com
1075 Trianon Dr.
Fairbanks, AK

Thank you, Chairman French for allowing public testimony today on SB 54. I want to share with you several events have transpired over the last few years that have left Alaska with a market that can no longer self regulate itself. The result being a dramatic increase in refinery margins which has cost the residents of Alaska over $230 million dollars over the last year.

In 2004 Flint Hills bought the North Pole refinery and entered into a contract with the State of Alaska to buy royalty oil from the North Slope. Within this contract was a stipulation that Flint Hills must invest in desulfurization facilities to be able to meet pending EPA requirements. Only months after the legislature ratified the royalty oil sales contract, Flint Hills backed out of this commitment setting the stage for where we find ourselves today.

In 2007 the EPA regulations of 15ppm ultra low-sulfur diesel took effect. As you can see from the chart on page 3, ULSD was first offered for sale in Alaska on June 1st, 2007. Prior to the new EPA regulations the Tesoro and Flint Hills refineries both produced similar product lines of gasoline, diesel and jet fuel with neither producer having a significant market ownership in one product.(Fig 1.) In fact in 2002 the State of Alaska reported that in-state refineries exported 84 million gallons of surplus gasoline.

	Percent of production	Quantity (million bbls.)
Flint Hills
Gasoline & Naphtha	19	4.44
Jet Fuel	57	13.31
Diesel	19	4.44
Gas Oil	4	0.99
Asphalt	1	0.23
Tesoro
Gasoline	25	4.56
Jet, diesel, fuel oil	45	9.03
Bottoms & residual	30	5.48

After the new EPA regulations went into effect this balanced market was shattered. Due to Flint Hill's lack of investment they could no longer produce gasoline and diesel to meet stricter EPA requirements. Tesoro gained a 100% market share of the ULS Diesel market and an 80% share of the gasoline market. Flint Hills focused on the production of jet fuel and was forced to purchase low-sulfur feed stock from Tesoro to dilute with their high sulfur gasoline to meet EPA regulations.

The third Alaska refiner, Petrostar mainly produces jet fuel and heating oil. Neither of these products was impacted by the 2007 EPA regulations. Petrostar has carved out their own share of this market as the prime supplier to the military bases. They have been able to maintain this market ownership of Alaska's military contracts through their minority owned preferred bidder status as a wholly owned subsidiary of ASRC.

The result today is that we have three refiners who each have over an 80% share in one or two segments of the market. The effect of this niche market ownership is blatantly obvious when you look at the chart on page two. The only product that all three refineries produce is jet fuel which does not show the same upward trends as gasoline and diesel fuel.

Without outside intervention it is highly unlikely that this situation will correct itself. All three refineries are enjoying profitable margins and there is no incentive for them to increase the level of competition in the market. Unless the legislature acts we will continue to see higher prices indefinitely.

There are three possible ways to remedy our current situation:

1. Flint Hills could build a desulfurization unit and reenter the gasoline and diesel fuel markets. This would rebalance the market shares bringing more competition. At this time Flint Hills has no plans to do so.

2. The State of Alaska could build the infrastructure to allow independent retailers to bring in fuel from outside Alaska. A fuel purchase program could be managed through existing channels. You only have to look as far as the gas pump in Juneau to see that this is possible. The capitol costs and risks are too great to expect a private entrepreneur to make this investment. To quote a local Fairbanks fuel distributor, "There is no way for an independent such as myself to import any real volume from the PNW (Pacific Northwest), I have no access to storage thus no way to bring enough in to make a meaningful difference in the market and the risk exposure is huge the refineries could make it an unprofitable load in the blink of an eye."

3. The third choice is to pass SB54 and bring balance to the market through regulation. This is the least preferred way of restoring prices, but the only way to provide immediate correction to the market.

I thank you for your time and consideration of this bill and urge you to move SB54 to a floor vote.

Crack spread is a term used in the oil industry for the differential between the price of crude oil and petroleum products extracted from it - that is, the profit margin that an oil refinery can expect to make by "cracking" crude oil. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Crack_spread

Gasoline Crack Spread

Alaska $2.12 x 42g./bbl - $49.38(ANS crude spot) = $39.66

Seattle $3.49 x 42g./bbl - $49.38(ANS crude spot) = $97.16

Difference $25.26 or 175%

Diesel Crack Spread

Alaska $2.92 x 42g./bbl - $49.38(ANS crude spot) = $73.26

Seattle $3.93 x 42g./bbl - $49.38(ANS crude spot) = $115.52

Difference $61.74 or 536%

Senate Bill 59

"An Act relating to the operation of low-speed vehicles"

In recent years, electric cars have progressed so they now come with all the necessary safety equipment as regular passenger vehicles. The use of low-speed electric vehicles has extended beyond golf communities and they are showing up in our towns. This new breed of electric car can help reduce carbon dioxide emissions and provide cheaper, environment-friendly transportation options for Alaskans.

Current Alaska law only allows electric cars to operate on roads with posted speed limits of 35 mph or less. In communities throughout Alaska, owners of electric cars are seeking access to more miles of road. If enacted, SB 59 will allow low-speed electric vehicles on roads with posted speed limits of 45 mph or less. This new access would be limited to communities not connected by road to Anchorage or Fairbanks, and with a maximum of 25,000 residents.

Larger communities may not want low-speed electric vehicles traveling on roads with high traffic volume for safety purposes. SB 59 allows municipalities to opt-in and expand access of low-speed vehicles at their discretion. However, many small communities throughout Alaska have few road miles and low traffic volume providing a suitable environment for electric cars. SB 59 will give individual communities the opportunity to increase electric car usage if they so choose.

Electric Cars You Can Drive

Electric cars and its hybrid technology is a burgeoning market, and the chance for America to become energy-independent is on everyone's minds as of late. No one wants to be paying for gasoline, when an 8-hour charge can get them much, much more for their time and money. When you read about these vehicles, keep in mind that this technology is new, but it's reliable.

durable construction and the ability to carry heavier loads at lower costs than a full-speed [vehicle] or purpose-designed LSV." While we agree that acceding to ETA's request would have this effect, it is again an effect we hope to avoid.

To begin, we note that foreign made on-road motor vehicles, that are capable of high-speed use, are not eligible to be transformed into LSVs via the adoption of a speed-limiting governor. In a June 28, 2000 letter of interpretation to Mr. Thomas E. Dahl on this issue, we stated there are no circumstances under which the addition of a speed governing device to a high-speed vehicle would make the vehicle meet the definition of an LSV. After explaining that we established the LSV class because the vehicles were too small to meet the full FMVSS requirements, we stated that a common feature of this class appeared to be that they were capable of a maximum speed of 25 mph as designed and manufactured. This is still our interpretation of the regulation.

Furthermore, the agency has stated several times that one concern we have regarding the LSV classification is that it could be used as a mechanism to import foreign motor vehicles without first making them conform to the FMVSSs. For example, in the 2005 final rule, we stated that "[t]he [2,500-pound] GVWR limit prevents attempts to circumvent FMVSSs for cars, trucks, and multipurpose passenger vehicles by applying the LSV classification to vehicle types that are able to meet the [full FMVSS] standards." [9] ETA's recommended 4,000-pound limit would permit the result we intended to prevent, and we view that as a reason to deny the petition.

b. Technology-Neutral Regulation

ETA's final argument is that the current GVWR limitation provides an advantage to gasoline-powered vehicles over electric vehicles. The agency is aware that, with current technology, the batteries needed to power an electric vehicle weigh substantially more than the fuel needed to power an internal combustion engine. This was considered to some extent in our original rulemaking establishing the 2,500-pound GVWR limit in 2005, and considered extensively in our 2006 rule increasing that limit to 3,000 pounds, a rule undertaken at the behest of two electric LSV manufacturers.

In the petitions that led to the 2006 rulemaking, NHTSA was presented with two differing solutions to this problem. The first, presented by Dynasty Electric Car Corporation, recommended a 2,500-pound GVWR restriction for internal combustion engine LSVs and a 2,800-pound GVWR restriction for electric LSVs. The second, recommended by GEM, requested that the GVWR limit be raised to 3,000 pounds for all LSVs, as this would accommodate electric LSVs with a cargo-carrying capacity of 1,000 pounds.

In the 2005 rule establishing the GVWR limitation, we discussed why we were not establishing different GVWR limitations for electric and gasoline-powered vehicles, despite the issue regarding the weight of the batteries. We noted that each propulsion type has its own advantages. While gasoline-powered vehicles are lighter, "the fact that electric LSVs are successful in the market indicates that any advantage of the [internal combustion] vehicle due to greater load capacity under our GVWR restriction will be overcome by other attractions of the electric vehicle to consumers." [10] ETA, perhaps inadvertently, cites several of these advantages in its petition. These include the high cost of gasoline, government mandates to reduce or eliminate petroleum-fueled vehicles from fleets, and the environmental benefits of electric vehicles. Therefore, we do not believe it is necessary to increase the regulatory complexity by setting different GVWR limitations based on propulsion method.

Finally, we believe that 3,000 pounds is a level at which electric LSVs that perform cargo-carrying work are practicable to build. In the 2006 final rule, we quoted one of the petitioners, GEM, where it stated:

> All that GEM seeks in the U.S. market is a comparable "level playing field" by allowing LSV trucks to weigh as much as 3000 pounds GVWR, which would accommodate the electric batteries and an appropriate payload for LSV trucks.

We note that GEM currently produces a cargo-carrying electric LSV with a GVWR of 3,000 pounds or less. We noted on GEM's Web site the GEM eL XD, which has a GVWR of 3,000 pounds, a payload capacity of 1,450 pounds, a top speed of 25 mph, and a range of up to 40 miles.[11] This example illustrates that the current GVWR limit permits the development of cargo-carrying, electric LSVs.

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, we are denying ETA's petition to increase the maximum allowable GVWR to 4,000 pounds for electric LSVs. Furthermore, because we are not increasing the maximum allowable GVWR, we are denying ETA's recommendation to establish brake requirements and tire weight rating requirements in FMVSS No. 500.

National Highway Traffic Safety Administration

49 CFR Part 571

[Docket No. NHTSA–2008–0154]

Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standards; Medium Speed Vehicles

AGENCY: National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA), DOT.

ACTION: Denial of petition for rulemaking.

SUMMARY: This document denies petitions for rulemaking submitted by Environmental Motors, and Porteon Electric Vehicles, Inc. and Mirox Corporation. The petitioners requested that NHTSA commence rulemaking to create a new class of motor vehicles known as medium speed vehicles, which would have a maximum speed capability of 35 mph. The petitioners contemplated that these vehicles would be subject to a set of safety standards greater than those that apply to low speed vehicles but substantially less than the full set of safety standards that apply to other light vehicles such as passenger cars. The petitioners cited a number of reasons in support of their petition, the most significant of which related to potential environmental benefits. After carefully reviewing the petitions, we are denying them because the introduction of such a class of motor vehicles without the full complement of safety features required for other light vehicles such as passenger cars would result in significantly greater risk of deaths and serious injuries. While NHTSA agrees with the importance of environmental issues, the agency believes that it is neither necessary nor appropriate to significantly increase the risk of deaths and serious injuries to save fuel.

I. Overview

NHTSA has received three petitions for rulemaking, from Environmental Motors, Porteon Electric Vehicles, Inc. and Mirox Corporation, requesting that the agency commence rulemaking to create a new class of motor vehicles known as medium speed vehicles MSVs. While the specific requests vary, they essentially ask the agency to conduct rulemaking to exclude smaller light vehicles that would currently be classified as passenger cars, multipurpose passenger vehicles (MPVs) or trucks from many or most of the Federal motor vehicle safety standards, if their speed capability is 35 mph or less. The vehicles would instead be subject to a set of safety standards greater than those that apply to low speed vehicles (LSVs) but substantially less than the full set of safety standards that apply to other light vehicles.

The petitioners made a variety of arguments in support of their requests, the most significant of which related to environmental benefits, including facilitating the development of electric vehicles and fuel savings. They argued that because LSVs are not permitted to have a speed capability greater than 25 mph, they cannot safely keep up with traffic in urban areas, and a need therefore exists for vehicles with a higher speed (35 mph) capability. The petitioners also noted that two States have passed laws that purport to allow medium speed electric vehicles to operate on certain public roads.

After carefully considering the petitions, we are denying them because the introduction of such a class of motor vehicles without the full complement of safety features required for other light vehicles would result in significantly greater risk of deaths and serious injuries. We address the petitioners' arguments in detail in the rest of this document, but note the following points in this overview.

The petitioners appear to view MSVs as a variant of LSVs, i.e., a special class of small motor vehicles that would not be required to meet the full complement of the Federal motor vehicle safety standards. However, the rationale for applying a limited set of safety standards to LSVs is not relevant to MSVs.

NHTSA issues different safety standards for different types of motor vehicles. The agency established the special category of motor vehicles called LSVs to accommodate the use of small golf cars and other vehicles primarily intended for use in controlled, low-speed communities, such as retirement communities. In order to qualify as an LSV under the agency's definition, a vehicle must, among other things, have a speed capability no higher than 25 mph. LSVs are subject to a limited set of safety measures in FMVSS No. 500, including requirements related to the installation of lamps, mirrors, seat belts and a windshield. However, LSV's are not subject to most of the standards to which other light vehicles such as passenger cars are required to comply, including the rigorous crashworthiness standards.

One of the principal concerns raised by the petitioners is that the 25 mph speed limitation that applies to LSVs prevents these vehicles from keeping up with traffic in urban areas. However, the 25 mph limitation reflects the fact that NHTSA designed the set of safety standards that apply to LSVs for vehicles intended to be used in controlled, low speed environments. Vehicles with a speed capability above 25 mph are more likely to be driven outside controlled, low speed environments, and the limited LSV safety requirements are not appropriate for such vehicles.

The petitioners appear to assume that the full set of safety standards applicable to other light vehicles such as passenger cars would not be appropriate for MSVs, i.e., small vehicles with a speed capability of 35 mph. However, the traffic environment in which these vehicles would likely travel, including, e.g., urban roads with a speed limit of 35 mph or 45 mph, is an environment for which the full set of the Federal motor vehicle safety standards is needed to prevent fatalities and serious injuries. MSVs would be traveling in mixed traffic at speeds in which crashes posed a risk of serious injury or fatality and in which safety features such as frontal and side air bags significantly reduced that risk. Also, a number of the crash test requirements included in our safety standards simulate crashes in this higher speed environment. We note that the petitioners did not provide analysis demonstrating why any of the Federal motor vehicle safety standards are not needed for MSVs.

NHTSA shares the concerns of the petitioners about the importance of environmental issues and saving fuel, and notes that it is currently engaged in rulemaking in which it has proposed to substantially increase average fuel economy standards for passenger cars and light trucks. We also note that a number of smaller vehicles have been introduced in recent years that are certified to comply with the full set of Federal motor vehicle safety standards. In addition, the current unprecedented cost of fuel is forcing manufacturers to improve fuel efficiency and reduce vehicle size without Federal mandates.

While we appreciate the importance of environmental issues, NHTSA does not believe that it is necessary or appropriate to significantly increase the risk of deaths and serious injuries to save fuel by introducing a new class of motor vehicles that does not provide adequate safety protection.

II. Petitions for Rulemaking

Environmental Motors

One of the petitions received by NHTSA was from Environmental Motors, an electric vehicle (EV) dealer located in Glendale, CA.[1] That company stated that the petition was being sent as part of an effort by a coalition interested in getting zero emission, energy-efficient vehicles on the road in a safe and timely manner. The coalition includes EV manufacturers and sellers (including Miles Electric Vehicles, Zenn Motor Company, e-ride Industries, Dynasty Electric Car Corp., Boshart Engineering, Free Drive EV, Inc, Clean-Tech LLC, LE Electric Automobiles, LLC, and Electrovaya, Resort Vehicles, Inc.), the City of Santa Monica, CA, the University of California, Santa Barbara, and the Sustainable Transport Club of Santa Monica, CA. All of these groups sent letters supporting Environmental Motors' petition, which were attached to the petition.

The petition itself requested that NHTSA establish a Medium Speed Vehicle (MSV) standard. According to the petition, the promulgated MSV standard should incorporate "the right mix of safety features," although it did not specify what it considered a right mix. In doing so, the petition requested that NHTSA consider a number of factors. These include:

- The fact that MSV legislation has been passed by several States.
- Alleged safety benefits of vehicles being able to keep up with traffic.
- That a MSV class would assist in the development of electric vehicles.
- That most MSVs would be electric, and noting the environmental benefits of electric vehicles.

Additionally, in letters of support, various supporters added additional arguments. These included:

- The fact that full-speed electric vehicles are expensive.
- Safety disbenefits incurred by the fact that some individuals modify LSVs to increase their speed.
- As an alternative to creating a class of MSVs, NHTSA could increase the speed limitation for LSVs.

Mirox Corporation

Another petition that NHTSA received was from Mirox Corporation (Mirox).[2] Mirox's petition was more detailed than that of Environmental Motors, but also suggested that NHTSA create a class of MSVs with a maximum top speed of 35 mph.

Mirox requested that NHTSA define a MSV as a vehicle with: (1) A maximum speed of 30–35 mph, a maximum GVWR of 3,000 lbs. for cargo-carrying vehicles, or 2,500 lbs. for vehicles with passenger-carrying capacity only; (3) has three or four wheels; and (4) a limited number of equipment and bumper requirements. These requirements are more stringent than those required for LSVs, but substantially less than those required for other light vehicles such as passenger cars. Most prominently, Mirox would exclude MSVs from the requirements of FMVSS Nos. 138, 202a, and 208. The petitioner's request is explained in more detail below.

Mirox presents a variety of reasons for recommending its MSV classification. Some of these are similar to those identified by Environmental Motors, but some are unique. The following is a summary of the arguments put forth by Mirox:

- MSVs are a viable alternative to motorcycles, including enclosed, three-wheeled motorcycles, which are currently subject to a very limited array of safety standards. Mirox notes that the rate of motorcycle fatalities has been increasing, and argues that the use of MSVs could alleviate this. Mirox also argues that MSVs would provide better protection from weather and outside conditions than motorcycles, and are therefore likely to be used more often. Additionally, Mirox states that MSVs would be easier to drive than motorcycles, which would also help reduce injuries.
- MSVs are a better alternative to LSVs for use in driving in urban environments. Mirox states that due to speed limitations, LSVs are unsuited to driving in urban conditions, as they impede traffic flow and have limited acceleration potential. Mirox also argues that drivers will prefer MSVs as defined by the petitioner, as they will offer more protection from outside conditions and be equipped with a wider array of safety features than LSVs.
- Mirox expounds on the environmental and economic benefits of increased fuel economy for MSVs over passenger cars. It argues that because most MSVs will be electric, they will not consume fuel while idling, which is common in the urban environments that Mirox believes will be the primary environment for MSVs.
- Like Environmental Motors, Mirox points to the adoption of MSEV statutes in Montana and Washington, and argues that Federal regulations should be changed to sanction vehicles built in accordance to those statutes.
- Mirox cites the use of "quadricycles" in Europe, and argues that similar vehicles should be permitted in the U.S. as well. Mirox asserts that European experience, especially in France, has shown that the quadricycle class of vehicles is the safest of all vehicle classes, and that their drivers had fewer accidents than the average driver of a full-sized car.

In its petition, Mirox recommended a specific, detailed definition for MSVs. While similar in nature to that for an LSV, Mirox's definition contains more specific safety requirements. We note that, while it espoused the benefits of electric power, unlike the Montana or Washington statutes, Mirox's recommended definition would include gasoline-powered MSVs.

Specifically, Mirox's recommended definition of medium-speed vehicle is:

> A self-propelled, four-wheeled or three-wheeled motor vehicle, equipped with a roll cage or crush-proof body design, whose speed attainable in one mile is more than thirty miles per hour but not more than thirty-five miles per hour on a paved level surface. Each Medium-speed vehicle shall at a minimum be equipped with [the] following safety equipment that [conforms] to [the] existing FMVSS and current applicable SAE standard:
> - Headlamps as per FMVSS No. 108
> - Front and rear turn signal lamps (SAE I) (49 CFR 571.108)
> - Taillamps (SAE T), (49 CFR 571.108)
> - Stop lamps (SAE S), (49 CFR 571.108)
> - Reflex reflectors: one red on each side as far to the rear as practicable, one amber on each side as far to the front as practicable (SAE A)
> - Side marker lights, one red on each side as far to the rear as practicable, one amber on each side as far to the front as practicable (SAE P)
> - An exterior mirror mounted on the driver's side of the vehicle and either an exterior mirror mounted on the passenger's side of the vehicle or an interior mirror (49 CFR 571.111)
> - A parking brake (49 CFR 571.135)
> - A windshield of AS–1 or AS–5 composition, that conforms to the American National Standards Institute's "Safety Code for Safety Glazing Materials for Glazing Motor Vehicles Operating on Land Highway," Z–26.1–1977, January 28, 1977, as supplemented by Z26.1a, July 3, 1980 (49 CFR 571.205)
> - A VIN that conforms to the requirements of 49 CFR Part 565, Vehicle Identification Number
> - A Type 1 or Type 2 seat belt assembly conforming to FMVSS No. 209, installed at each designated seating position, and whose mounting complies with FMVSS No. 210
> - Bumper system; both front and rear that conforms to 49 CFR Part 581
> - Audible Warning Devices; Horn and Reverse Warning Beeper
> - If the vehicle is electrically powered it shall conform to FMVSS No. 305
> - A GVWR of less than 1,361 kilograms (3,000 pounds) if the vehicle is designed with substantial cargo-carrying capacity (i.e., vehicles intended for carrying goods), or 1,134 kilograms (2,500 pounds) if the vehicle is designed solely for transport of passengers.
> Additionally, if the Medium-speed vehicle contains any equipment that is referenced in any of the following FMVSS[s], such equipment or features shall [conform] to all the requirements of the applicable FMVSS:
> FMVSS Nos. 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 108, 109, 110, 111, 113, 116, 118, 124, 135, 139, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 209, 210, 212, 214, 216, 219, 225, 301, 302, 304, 305, and 401.

Porteon Electric Vehicles, Inc

The last petition received by NHTSA was from Porteon Electric Vehicles, Incorporated of Portland, Oregon.[3] This petitioner plans to market an electric car designed from the ground up rather than retrofit an imported vehicle by removing the IC engine and replacing it with an electric motor. The petitioner is concerned, "that unregulated growth could create safety issues and concerns that negatively impact and cause severe damage to a new growth industry that provides real and significant solutions to our country and our planet's key issues." This petitioner envisions a Medium Speed Vehicle class that "would essentially be the same as the LSV regulations with the exception of the top speed of 35 miles per hour and additional vehicle requirement to increase the safety of margin [sic] for rollover, stopping, acceleration, and avoidance maneuvering." The petitioner lists these additional vehicle requirements as: Ability to maintain 35 mph on a level grade, ability to maintain 30 mph up an 8 percent grade, a minimum width of 55 inches, a "coil over shock" suspension, four-wheel hydraulic disc or drum brakes, and three-point automotive seat belts, in addition to the requirements that already exist for LSVs in FMVSS No. 500. The petitioner also states, "Additional testing of the vehicles should also be considered, including crush zones with a 2.5mph 'no damage' requirement. A full frontal crash should be required to meet safety standards between 17–18 mph, which is a derivative of full speed automobiles being crash tested at 35 mph." The petitioner does not state where the no damage crush zones would be on the vehicle, how they would be measured, or which safety standards would be tested at 17 or 18 miles per hour.

Porteon believes the new medium speed vehicle class is necessary because LSVs currently travel, with their top speed of 25 mph, on streets with speed limits up to 35 mph and normal traffic flow is impeded by these vehicles. MSVs, with their top speed of 35 mph, "would create a more cohesive traffic environment for mixed use vehicles."

III. Low Speed Vehicles

In 1998, NHTSA established Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard (FMVSS) No. 500, "Low speed vehicles," in response to growing interest in using golf cars and other similar-sized, 4-wheeled vehicles, including Neighborhood Electric Vehicles (NEVs), to make short trips for shopping, social, and recreational purposes primarily within retirement or other planned communities with golf courses. See 63 FR 33194. The definition of LSV established in that rulemaking was, "a 4-wheeled motor vehicle, other than a truck, whose speed attainable in 1.6 km (1 mile) is more than 32 kilometers per hour (20 miles per hour) and not more than 40 kilometers per hour (25 miles per hour) on a paved level surface.

In 2005, NHTSA published a final rule amending the definition of LSVs by removing the restriction on trucks, and instead establishing a 2,500 pound maximum GVWR. See 70 FR 48313. This allowed small vehicles designed for work-related applications within the intended communities, such as landscaping or delivery purposes, to be included within the definition of an LSV, without opening the category to unintended vehicles, such as street-sweepers or speed-modified passenger cars. Additionally, in 2006, in response to petitions for reconsideration from Dynasty Electric Car Corporation and Global Electric Motorcars (GEM), both manufacturers of electric LSVs, NHTSA increased the maximum GVWR for LSVs to 3,000 pounds. This was done, in part, to "level the playing field" between electric and gasoline-powered LSVs, by allowing for the additional weight in batteries required by electric vehicles. See 71 FR 20026.

In conceiving the concept of the LSV as a small vehicle that would not be subject to the same stringent safety criteria as other vehicles, a critical concept was that it would not ordinarily mix with other traffic. In our 1998 rule establishing the category of LSVs, NHTSA explained in the summary that the rule:

> [R]esponds to a growing public interest in using golf cars and other similar-sized, 4-wheeled vehicles to make short trips for shopping, social and recreational purposes primarily within retirement or other planned communities with golf courses. [emphasis added]

NHTSA's detailed analysis, as explained in the preamble of the 1998 final rule, recognized the importance of the fact that under most conditions, LSVs would not intermingle with regular automobile traffic, and the occasions where they would mix would be in controlled, low-speed environments. NHTSA stated that

> NHTSA has carefully reviewed their argument about the effects of this rulemaking. LSV safety, and thus the need for FMVSSs for LSVs, will be determined by the combination of three factors: vehicle design and performance; operator training and ability; and the operating environment. The agency believes that Standard No. 500, in combination with a limited operating environment and appropriate operator training and ability, will appropriately address the safety needs of LSV users.[4]

Additionally, in the 1998 final rule, NHTSA analyzed the Fatal Analysis Reporting System (FARS) data regarding fatalities involving golf cars. It was found that of the nine reported fatalities, eight of them involved a collision with a car or truck. This further underscored the importance of driving environment.

In the 1998 final rule, the agency studied the use of NEVs in various municipalities that permitted them to travel on public roads. In that notice, we stated that "the driving environment [of LSVs] should be appropriate to the vehicle and its characteristics. Limiting LSV use to low-speed city and suburban streets is necessary, but does not eliminate the safety risks." [5] NHTSA analyzed the State laws governing the on-road permissibility of NEVs in various States. Of the 12 States discussed, only one State (Arizona) permitted NEVs to travel on any road with a speed of 35 mph or less. The other 11 States (California, Nevada, New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming, Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa, Florida, Georgia, and Texas) restricted NEVs to roads specifically designated by State and local governments.[6]

One portion of the analysis discussed possible reasons for the disparity of fatalities between Sun City [7] (which had four NEV fatalities) and the City of Palm Desert (which had zero). We noted that:

> The City of Palm Desert has a more controlled environment than Sun City for golf car use. The City of Palm Desert permits on-road use of golf cars in the same lanes as passenger cars and other larger motor vehicles in speed zones posted for speeds up to 25 miles per hour. In speed zones posted for speeds over 25 miles per hour, golf cars may be operated on-road only if there is a lane designated for their use and if the golf car is, in fact, operated within that lane. By contrast, NHTSA understands that Sun City, under state law, allows golf cars to operate in the same lanes as larger traffic on any road with a maximum speed of 35 miles per hour.

Based in part on this analysis, as well as our other observations, we concluded that operating environment played an important role in determining the benefits of establishing the LSV classification, as well as determining what safety standards should apply to that class. While NHTSA does not regulate the driving environment (such decisions are at the discretion of State governments), it did recommend that LSVs be licensed only for use in environments with very limited traffic. Specifically, we stated:

> NHTSA recognizes that not all operating environments may be as controlled as that of the City of Palm Desert. The agency encourages other states and municipalities to study the features of the City of Palm Desert's plan, and to adopt those features to the extent practicable.[8]

[7] We note that Sun City is located in Arizona, the only State that allowed NEVs to travel on any street with a speed limit of 35 mph or less.

In later rulemakings, NHTSA made several adjustments to the definition of LSVs. First and foremost, the agency dropped its original restriction on "truck-like" vehicles, and replaced it with a maximum gross vehicle weight rating for LSVs.[9] This weight limit was originally 2,500 lbs., but was later increased to 3,000 lbs.[10]

IV. State Legislation on MSEVs and Relevant Federal Requirements

In the past year, two States have enacted legislation that purports to allow medium speed electric vehicles (MSEVs) to operate on certain public roads. Montana was the first State to pass such a law, on April 23, 2007. This was followed shortly thereafter by Washington State, which passed on May 15, 2007. These are the only two States that NHTSA is aware of that have passed any sort of MSV legislation.

The Montana and Washington statutes define MSEVs as electric-powered vehicles with a maximum speed of 35 mph that meet certain limited safety requirements similar to those established by NHTSA for LSVs.[11] The Montana law permits MSEVs to travel on public roads with a posted speed of up to 45 mph,[12] while the Washington law restricts them to roads with a posted speed of 35 mph or less.

NHTSA has considered the legislative history and other information relating to the aforementioned State laws. Both States were interested in expanding the use of electric vehicles in order to reduce fuel consumption, and economic and environmental benefits associated with that end. Additionally, there was a stated belief that a speed of 35 mph is needed for safety, as they would be able to keep up with traffic better. The following excerpt from the Washington State Senate report illustrates the considerations at issue:

> Staff Summary of Public Testimony: PRO: These electric vehicles are environmentally friendly and provide significant energy savings. They are not golf carts; they are cars designed for running errands in town. The current speed of 25 mph is too slow and puts people at risk. Increasing the allowed speed to 35 mph will improve safety.[13]

Under Federal law, vehicles with a speed capability above 25 mph that would be considered MSEVs under these State laws are classified as passenger cars, multipurpose passenger vehicles, or trucks. These vehicles are subject to the full range of FMVSSs that apply to these vehicles. The responsibilities of manufacturers and dealers to comply with Federal law, including not manufacturing or selling vehicles unless they comply with all applicable FMVSSs, are not limited by State laws on MSEVs.

V. Agency Response to Petitions

After carefully considering the petitions from Environmental Motors, Proteon and Mirox, we are denying them. First and foremost among this agency's considerations are safety concerns. The concept of establishing such a class of motor vehicles with limited safety features that would be likely to intermingle with larger, higher-speed vehicles in urban environments would result in significantly greater risk of deaths and serious injuries. The petitioners did not provide analysis demonstrating why any of the Federal motor vehicle safety standards are not needed for MSVs, given the traffic environment in which these vehicles would be likely to travel.

A. The Rationale for Applying a Limited Set of Safety Standards to LSVs Is Not Relevant to MSVs

As noted earlier, the petitioners appear to view MSVs as a variant of LSVs, i.e., a special class of small motor vehicles that would not be required to meet the full complement of the Federal motor vehicle safety standards. However, the rationale for applying a limited set of safety standards to LSVs is not relevant to MSVs.

NHTSA issues different safety standards for different types of motor vehicles. The agency established the special category of motor vehicles called LSVs to accommodate the use of small golf cars and other vehicles primarily intended for use in controlled, low-speed communities, such as retirement communities. In order to qualify as an LSV under the agency's definition, a vehicle must, among other things, have a speed capability no higher than 25 mph. LSVs are subject to a limited set of safety measures in FMVSS No. 500, including requirements related to the installation of lamps, mirrors, seat belts and a windshield. However, LSV's are not subject to most of the standards to which other light vehicles such as passenger cars are required to comply, including the rigorous crashworthiness standards.

One of the principal concerns raised by the petitioners is that the 25 mph speed limitation that applies to LSVs prevents these vehicles from keeping up with traffic in urban areas. They argued that because LSVs are not permitted to have a speed capability greater than 25 mph, they cannot safely keep up with traffic in urban areas, and a need therefore exists for vehicles with a higher speed (35 mph) capability.

However, the 25 mph limitation reflects the fact that NHTSA designed the set of safety standards that apply to LSVs for vehicles intended to be used in controlled, low speed environments. Vehicles with a speed capability above 25 mph are more likely to be driven outside controlled, low speed environments, and the limited LSV safety requirements are not appropriate for such vehicles.

When promulgating the original LSV rule, as stated above, at the time one of the most important factors was that LSVs were conceived as vehicles that would be used in controlled, low-speed environments, primary in retirement communities and those centered around golf courses. NHTSA surveyed the applicable State laws governing the on-road use of LSVs, and found that only one out of twelve States with LSV-use laws permitted them to travel on any public road with a speed limit of 35 mph or less. The other remaining States limited their use to specially-designated roads.[14] While NHTSA does not have the authority to prescribe the roads for which different types of vehicles are permitted, the agency suggested limiting LSVs to controlled environments. The following passage from the 1998 final rule properly summarizes NHTSA's position on this point:

> Still another reason [for the significant disparity in the number of deaths involving NEVs] may lie in the different operating environments in the two communities. The City of Palm Desert has a more controlled environment than Sun City for golf car use. The City of Palm Desert permits on-road use of golf cars in the same lanes as passenger cars and other larger motor vehicles in speed zones posted for speeds up to 25 miles per hour. In speed zones posted for speeds over 25 miles per hour, golf cars may be operated on-road only if there is a lane designated for their use and if the golf car is, in fact, operated within that lane. By contrast, NHTSA understands that Sun City, under state law, allows golf cars to operate in the same lanes as larger traffic on any road with a maximum speed of 35 miles per hour.
> NHTSA recognizes that not all operating environments may be as controlled as that of the City of Palm Desert. The agency encourages other states and municipalities to study the features of the City of Palm Desert's plan, and to adopt those features to the extent practicable.[15]

We recognize that since that time many States have passed laws permitting LSVs on a much wider variety of roads than originally contemplated. Today, many States permit LSVs on all public roads with posted speed limits of 35 mph or less. Some States even permit them on roads with speed limits of 45 mph.

As we have noted before, however, we continue to believe that LSV use on roads outside confined, controlled areas will be limited by the fact that occupants will not want to travel at less than 25 mph in mixed-vehicle traffic for other than very short trips, regardless of how States may or may not restrict their use. See 68 FR 68319, December 3, 2003.

We agree with the petitioners that the increased speed capability and other features in the requested MSV category would facilitate and encourage drivers to use MSVs in general driving environments. This, however, means that the rationale for applying a limited set of safety standards to LSVs is not relevant to MSVs. Instead, and as discussed further below, this is an argument for why these vehicles should be required to comply with the same safety standards as other light vehicles used in general driving environments, such as passenger cars.

B. The Traffic Environment in Which MSVs Would Likely Travel Is an Environment for Which the Full Set of the Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standards Is Needed To Prevent Fatalities and Serious Injuries

The petitioners appear to assume that the full set of safety standards applicable to other light vehicles such as passenger cars would not be appropriate for MSVs, i.e., small vehicles with a speed capability of 35 mph. However, the traffic environment in which these vehicles would likely travel, including, e.g., urban roads with speed limits of 35 mph or 45 mph, is an environment for which the full set of the Federal motor vehicle safety standards is needed to prevent fatalities and serious injuries. We note that the energy involved in vehicle-to-vehicle collisions increases proportional to the square of the velocity of travel, and the result of a vehicle collision at 35 mph is twice as severe as the same collision at 25 mph.

MSVs would be traveling in mixed traffic at speeds in which crashes posed a risk of serious injury or fatality and in which safety features such as frontal and side air bags significantly reduced that risk. Also, a number of the crash test requirements included in our safety standards simulate crashes in this higher speed environment. We note that the petitioners did not provide analysis demonstrating why any of the Federal motor vehicle safety standards are not needed for MSVs.

As part of considering this issue, we have looked at crash information on public roads with speed limits of 35 to 45 mph. For this traffic environment, the need for the safety features required in FMVSS No. 208, air bags, are far more important than for lower speed crashes, as frontal crashes become a more prominent part of the overall crash picture.

The total number of occupants killed annually in crashes is 37,314 (2002–2006 average, Fatality Analysis Reporting System). Of these occupant fatalities, 6,319 were killed on roads with posted speed limits of 35 mph or less, and 13,493 are killed in crashes on roads with posted speed limits of 45 mph or less. The total number of occupants suffering incapacitating injury annually is 13,492. Of these, 1,798 were injured in crashes on roads with posted speed limits of 35 mph or less, and 4,261 occupants were injured in crashes on roads with posted speed limits of 45 mph or less. It is important to note that those numbers reflect vehicles that were certified to comply with the Federal motor vehicle safety standards.

We estimate that in 2005, on roads posted at 35 mph or lower, 1,921 crash victims lived because the vehicles were compliant with all FMVSSs, including 278 saved by air bags. In crashes on roads posted at 45 mph or lower, 3,163 lives were saved because the vehicles involved were compliant with all FMVSSs. Of those, 414 were saved by air bags.[16]

Given these statistics, we believe the full set of Federal motor vehicle safety standards is needed for vehicles traveling in the traffic environment in which MSVs would likely travel, including, e.g., urban roads with speed limits of 35 mph or 45 mph.

Finally, as noted above, a number of the crash test requirements included in our safety standards simulate crashes in this environment. For example, our highest speed crash test in FMVSS No. 208 (vehicle compliance is currently phasing in) simulates a 35 mph frontal crash between the tested vehicle and a vehicle like itself. Our crash test in FMVSS No. 214 that helps ensure thoracic protection simulates a crash in which the tested vehicle traveling at 15 mph is struck in the side by a light vehicle traveling at 30 mph.

C. It Is Neither Necessary nor Appropriate To Significantly Increase the Risk of Deaths and Serious Injuries To Save Fuel

The petitioners and the supporters which wrote in favor of the Environmental Motors petition emphasized the potential to conserve fuel, thereby saving money at a time of high fuel prices as well as reducing emissions that can harm the environment. In the two States that passed MSEV statutes, the legislative history also shows that this legislation was conceived due to concerns about saving fuel.

NHTSA also considers fuel conservation an important goal. However, we believe that it is neither necessary nor appropriate to significantly increase the risk of deaths and serious injuries to save fuel.

Fuel conservation can be accomplished by means that are not inconsistent with the need for safety. Significant innovation is currently underway in fuel economy, gas-electric hybrid engine technology, and continued development of fully electric vehicles, such as the Chevrolet Volt, noted in the Mirox petition. NHTSA recently published a proposal to substantially increase fuel economy (CAFE) standards for passenger cars and light trucks. These standards affect nearly all light vehicles, and will have a tremendous impact on fuel savings. Furthermore, these vehicles are being designed to meet the full FMVSS requirements for passenger cars or other applicable vehicle class.

D. Other Issues

The petitioners raised a number of additional issues, which we discuss in this section.

Quadricycles

The Mirox petition compared the requested MSV classification to a type of vehicle used in Europe known as a "quadricycle." The Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) defines a quadricycle in two vehicle categories, L_6 "light quadricycle" and L_7 "quadricycle":[17]

Category L_6: A vehicle with four wheels whose unladen mass in not more than 350 kg, not including the mass of the batteries in the case of electric vehicles, whose maximum design speed is not more than 45 km/h, and whose engine cylinder capacity does not exceed 50 cm^3 for spark (positive) ignition engines, or whose maximum net power output does not exceed 4 kW in the case of other internal combustion engines, or whose maximum continuous rated power does not exceed 4 kW in the case of electric engines.

Category L_7: A vehicle with four wheels, other than that classified for the category L_6, whose unladen mass is not more than 400 kg (550 kg for vehicles intended for carrying goods), not including the mass of batteries in the case of electric vehicles and whose maximum continuous rated power does not exceed 15 kW.

Mirox claimed that quadricycles are an extremely safe method of transportation that is used extensively in Europe. The chief benefits of quadricycles is that they are easy to use (unlike motorcycles), easy to park, and consume far less fuel than even the smallest European passenger cars. Mirox requested that MSVs be defined in such a way that at least some European quadricycles can be legally imported as MSVs.

While the petitioner claimed that quadricycles are extremely safe, Mirox did not provide any data to support this claim or to show that introduction of these vehicles into the U.S. would be consistent with the need for safety. We note that we have earlier denied the petition of GG Quad North American to change the definition of "motorcycle" to allow quadricycles to be sold in the U.S. as motorcycles (71 FR 67843, November 24, 2006).

Aftermarket Speed Modifications of LSVs

A letter written in support of the Environmental Motors petition by Electrovaya suggested that "The new [MSV] regulations would give people a better option than illegally changing an LSV to go faster." We agree with Electrovaya that modifying an LSV to increase the speed is highly undesirable. However, we do not believe that adopting a regulation to accommodate this practice is a prudent response to the issue. Furthermore, we would point out that manufacturers, dealers, sellers, and motor vehicle repair businesses that modify the speed of an LSV are in violation of the "make inoperative" provision.

This statutory provision, 49 U.S.C. 30122, Making safety devices and elements inoperative, reads in part:

> A manufacturer, distributor, dealer, or motor vehicle repair business may not knowingly make inoperative any part of a device or element of design installed on or in a motor vehicle or motor vehicle equipment in compliance with an applicable motor vehicle safety standard prescribed under this chapter unless the manufacturer, distributor, dealer, or repair business reasonably believes the vehicle or equipment will not be used (except for testing or a similar purpose during maintenance or repair) when the device or element is inoperative.

If one of the above-mentioned entities increased the speed of an LSV to 25 mph or greater, that LSV would no longer comply with paragraph S5.3 of FMVSS No. 500, which specifies that the vehicle's top speed must be less than 25 mph. Therefore, the modifying entity would be subject to civil penalties as specified in 49 U.S.C. 30165.

Burgeoning Electric Vehicle Market

Porteon states in its petition, "Regardless of our [the electric cars' industry] success or failure, the U.S. will soon see an influx in electric vehicles as fuel prices, urbanization, and climate change effect [sic] transportation and state regulation. It is estimated that over 20 manufacturers are in operation or commencing production along with a new influx of imports anticipated from China and Malaysia. Our concern is that unregulated growth could create safety issues and concerns that negatively impact and cause severe damage to a new growth industry that provides real and significant solution to our country and our planet's key issues." NHTSA would like to point out that the electric vehicle market is not unregulated. Any vehicle not certified as an LSV, or that travels at speeds greater than 25 miles per hour, must meet all the FMVSSs in place for the appropriate vehicle type (passenger car, truck, bus, or MPV). The petitioner can rest assured that growth of the electric vehicle market will not occur without the vehicles meeting the existing regulatory safety requirements enforced by NHTSA. The only difference between electric vehicles and those predominately in use today is their propulsion system. An electric propulsion system will not exempt these vehicles from the requirement to meet all the Federal standards for motor vehicles.

VI. Conclusion

For the reasons discussed above, NHTSA denies the petitions for rulemaking submitted by Environmental Motors, Proteon Electric Vehicles and Mirox Corporation.

SPONSOR STATEMENT

SB 60: Uniform Probate Code; Trusts, Wills

Inevitably, every family in Alaska must deal with handling the affairs of a deceased family member's estate or trust. The Uniform Probate Code (UPC) is the legal model Alaska has relied upon to handle these matters since it was first adopted back in 1969.

The Uniform Probate Code (UPC) is a uniform act drafted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) governing inheritance and the decedents' estates in the USA. The primary purpose of the act is to streamline the probate process and to standardize and modernize the various state laws governing wills, trusts, and intestacy.

SB 60 updates and clarifies Alaska statutes relating to the UPC with the aim of improving the ease of administration of estates and trusts for Alaska residents. SB 60 provides the following amendments to the Uniform Probate Code:

- Allows the settlor of a trust to designate a representative who can represent or bind an incapacitated person in future proceedings relating to the trust administration.

- Establishes that an augmented estate does not include property transferred to an irrevocable trust if the settlor is a discretionary beneficiary of the trust and if the transfer was made more than 30 days before marriage, or with the consent of the decedent's spouse.

- Creates a procedure for the establishment of will and trust validity before death. Situations arise where there is a question concerning a person's capacity to execute a will or trust, or whether the document was executed as the result of undue influence, duress, fraud, or mistake. The new procedure will allow these issues to be brought before the court while the testator or settlor is alive and when evidence is fresh.

- Provides for venue of a probate proceeding if the decedent was not domiciled in Alaska but significant assets are located within the state.

The State of Alaska has directly received millions of dollars of insurance premium tax dollars and many jobs have been created in the trust, banking, insurance, and legal professions thanks to the business attracted by our competitive and contemporary trust laws.

SB 60 is one of three bills introduced (SB 60, SB 62, and SB 63) that aim to update and clarify Alaska trust laws to make Alaska a better place for investors and families – both Alaskan and from other states – to invest their money in the competitive arena of trust management.

MEMORANDUM March 17, 2009

SUBJECT: Identification of changes between CSSB 60( ) (26-LS0302\E) and 26-LS0302\A (Work Order No. 26-LS0302\E)

TO: Senator Lesil McGuire
Attn: Trevor Fulton

FROM: Theresa Bannister
Legislative Counsel

This memo is an identification of the changes between W.O. 26-LS0302\A and W.O. 26-LS0302\E. Unless specified otherwise, the references are to the "E" version.

Section 1. In AS 13.06.120(2)(G)(ii) and (iii), "represent or bind" replaces "represent and bind." In AS 13.06.120(3), you'll find a modified version of the non-liability language that was in version A's AS 13.06.120(2)(G)(iv); the E language adds a reference to extend the non-liability to "a person representing another person under (2)(A) - (F) of this section." In AS 13.06.120, the numbering of paragraphs (3) and (4) is changed to (4) and (5). In AS 13.06.120(4), the cross references are changed.

Section 2. In AS 13.12.201(b)(9)(C)(i), "the decedent" replaces "self."

Section 3. No difference.

Section 4. In new sec. 13.12.205(b), the conditions are changed for when the augmented estate does not include property transferred to an irrevocable trust with a transfer restriction. See page 8, lines 7 - 9.

Section 5. No difference.

Section 6. No difference.

Section 7. No difference.

Section 8. In sec. 13.12.530, adds another category to the persons who may petition the court: an interested party with the testator's consent.

In sec. 13.12.540, removes language from (a)(2) and changes the venue rules in (b).

In sec. 13.12. 545, removes language from (11) and removes (14) from version A.

In sec. 13.12.550, removes (11) from version A.

In sec. 13.12.555, removes (b) from version A.

In sec. 13.12.560, removes "Notwithstanding AS 13.06.120" at the beginning.

In sec. 13.12.565(c), removes the reference to AS 13.36 and the last sentence of version A, requiring giving notice to certain other persons. Adds a definition of "party in interest."

In sec. 13.12.585, rewrites (a).

Section 9. New section.

Section 10. New bill section number.

Section 11. New bill section number.

Section 12. New bill section number. In (a), adds a description of how the new bill section 9 changes a court rule. In (e), changes the description how AS 13.12.585 changes a court rule.

Section 13. New bill section number. Adds a reference to the new bill section 9.

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

MEMORANDUM March 16, 2009

SUBJECT: Sectional summary of CSSB 60( ) relating to the Uniform Probate Code (Work Order No. 26-LS0302\E)

TO: Senator Lesil McGuire
Attn: Trevor Fulton

FROM: Theresa Bannister
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional summary of the above-described bill. As a preliminary matter, note that a sectional summary of a bill should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill and the bill itself is the best statement of its contents.

Section 1. Amends AS 13.06.120(2), which lists the situations when persons are bound by orders binding others in proceedings under the Uniform Probate Code. Allows a person designated by a trust instrument to represent and bind a born or unborn trust beneficiary. Allows the settlor to designate the person in the trust in various ways. Generally does not allow a designated person serving as a trustee to represent and bind the beneficiaries. Generally does not allow the designated person to represent and bind a beneficiary if the designated person is also a beneficiary.

Also provides that certain persons who represent other persons under AS 13.06.120(2) (A) - (F) are not liable for good faith acts and omissions to the beneficiaries whose interests are represented or to persons claiming through those beneficiaries.

Section 2. Amends AS 13.12.201(b)(9). Makes grammatical and conforming amendments to the definition of "transfer" for certain provisions of the Uniform Probate Code that relate to the elective share of a surviving spouse.

Section 3. Amends AS 13.12.205, which relates to a decedent's nonprobate transfers to other persons. Deletes an irrevocable transfer in trust with a transfer restriction from the property that is included in the augmented estate.

Section 4. Adds AS 13.12.205(b). Provides that the augmented estate does not include property transferred to an irrevocable trust with a transfer restriction if two conditions relating to the trust's settlor and the transfer's timing are met.

Section 5. Makes a conforming amendment for bill sec. 4 to a cross-reference in AS 13.12.206(3).

Section 6. Makes a conforming amendment for bill sec. 4 to a cross-reference in AS 13.12.207(b).

Section 7. Makes a conforming amendment for bill sec. 4 to a cross-reference in AS 13.12.209(b).

Section 8. Adds a new set of sections that provide for establishing the validity of wills and trusts before death.

Sec. 13.12.530. Allows certain persons to petition the court to determine the validity of a will before the testator's death.

Sec. 13.12.535. Allows certain persons to petition the court to determine the validity of a trust before the settlor's death.

Sec. 13.12.540. Establishes the venue for a petition to determine will or trust validity.

Sec. 13.12.545. Identifies what a petition for will validity must contain.

Sec. 13.12.550. Identifies what a petition for trust validity must contain.

Sec. 13.12.555. Authorizes a court to declare a will or trust to be valid. Declares that the will has full legal effect and must be admitted to probate on request after the testator's death, unless modified or revoked after the court's declaration.

Sec. 13.12.560. Makes the court's validity declaration binding on other persons.

Sec. 13.12.565. Directs the court to hold a hearing after a petition is filed. Requires the petitioner to notify the spouse, children, and heirs of the testator or settlor. For a will, also requires the petitioner to notify the testator, the personal representatives nominated in the will, and the devisees under the will. For a trust, also requires the petitioner to notify the settlor and parties in interest.

Sec. 13.12.570. Establishes the burden of proof for the petitions.

Sec. 13.12.575. Allows a testator to modify or revoke the will after the court's declaration.

Sec. 13.12.580. Allows a trust to be modified, terminated, revoked, or reformed after the court's declaration.

Sec. 13.12.585. Establishes which records related to a petition are public, which are available only to certain persons, and which are confidential. Allows the court to order confidential records to be made available to other persons when good cause is shown.

Sec. 13.12.590. Defines terms for the new article.

Section 9. Amends AS 13.16.055(a). When decedents are not domiciled in this state, allows the first informal or formal testacy or appointment proceedings to be held in the judicial district where certain fiduciaries reside or have a principal place of business.

Section 10. Amends AS 13.16.410. Allows personal representatives to consider discretionary distributions to a beneficiary as being made from capital gains realized during the year.

Section 11. Amends AS 13.36.109. Allows trustees to consider discretionary distributions to a beneficiary as being made from capital gains realized during the year.

Section 12. Indicates how certain provisions in the bill amend the court rules.

Section 13. States that those sections that amend the court rules only take effect if bill section 12 is approved by a two-thirds vote.

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

MEMORANDUM March 17, 2009

SUBJECT: Identification of changes between CSSB 60( ) (26-LS0302\E) and 26-LS0302\A (Work Order No. 26-LS0302\E)

TO: Senator Lesil McGuire
Attn: Trevor Fulton

FROM: Theresa Bannister
Legislative Counsel

This memo is an identification of the changes between W.O. 26-LS0302\A and W.O. 26-LS0302\E. Unless specified otherwise, the references are to the "E" version.

Section 1. In AS 13.06.120(2)(G)(ii) and (iii), "represent or bind" replaces "represent and bind." In AS 13.06.120(3), you'll find a modified version of the non-liability language that was in version A's AS 13.06.120(2)(G)(iv); the E language adds a reference to extend the non-liability to "a person representing another person under (2)(A) - (F) of this section." In AS 13.06.120, the numbering of paragraphs (3) and (4) is changed to (4) and (5). In AS 13.06.120(4), the cross references are changed.

Section 2. In AS 13.12.201(b)(9)(C)(i), "the decedent" replaces "self."

Section 3. No difference.

Section 4. In new sec. 13.12.205(b), the conditions are changed for when the augmented estate does not include property transferred to an irrevocable trust with a transfer restriction. See page 8, lines 7 - 9.

Section 5. No difference.

Section 6. No difference.

Section 7. No difference.

Section 8. In sec. 13.12.530, adds another category to the persons who may petition the court: an interested party with the testator's consent.

In sec. 13.12.540, removes language from (a)(2) and changes the venue rules in (b).

In sec. 13.12. 545, removes language from (11) and removes (14) from version A.

In sec. 13.12.550, removes (11) from version A.

In sec. 13.12.555, removes (b) from version A.

In sec. 13.12.560, removes "Notwithstanding AS 13.06.120" at the beginning.

In sec. 13.12.565(c), removes the reference to AS 13.36 and the last sentence of version A, requiring giving notice to certain other persons. Adds a definition of "party in interest."

In sec. 13.12.585, rewrites (a).

Section 9. New section.

Section 10. New bill section number.

Section 11. New bill section number.

Section 12. New bill section number. In (a), adds a description of how the new bill section 9 changes a court rule. In (e), changes the description how AS 13.12.585 changes a court rule.

Section 13. New bill section number. Adds a reference to the new bill section 9.

Uniform Probate Code

The Uniform Probate Code (UPC) is a comprehensive statute that unifies, clarifies, and modernizes the laws governing the affairs of decedents and their estates, certain transfers accomplished other than by a will, and trusts and their administration. The UPC was originally approved by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws and the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association in 1969. The purpose of the UPC is to modernize probate law and probate administration and to encourage uniformity through the adoption of the code by all fifty states. The UPC, which has been amended numerous times, has been adopted in its entirety by sixteen states: Alaska, Arizona, Colorado, Florida, Hawaii, Idaho, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Carolina, South Dakota, and Utah. The other thirty-four states have adopted parts of the UPC, but in general the UPC has not succeeded in providing a uniform body of substantive and procedural probate law.

The UPC contains seven substantive articles. Article I contains general provisions, definitions, and jurisdictional topics. Article II governs wills and intestate succession, which occurs when a person dies without leaving a will. Article III deals with the probate of wills and the administration of estates, article IV concerns the probating of estates in states other than the domicile of the decedent, article V extends protection to persons under disability and their property, and article VI governs nonprobate transfers of property. Article VII contains comprehensive provisions on trust administration.

The prime objective of the UPC is to simplify the probate process. For example, article III provides for supervised and unsupervised administration of probate. For estates with few assets and no disputes among the beneficiaries, the UPC allows unsupervised administration. In this case the executor of the will, who is called a Personal Representative in the UPC, handles the probating of the estate without direct supervision by the probate court. The personal representative handles every step of the probate process by filing a series of simple forms with the probate court. Unsupervised administration reduces the cost of probate and speeds up the process. Probate courts are freed from dealing with routine matters and may concentrate their efforts on estates with substantial assets or contested matters, where supervised administration is necessary.

The adoption of the UPC by state legislatures has been fought both by attorneys, who are opposed to unsupervised administration and to the overturning of current state laws governing probate, and by bonding companies, which stand to lose business because unsupervised probate does not require the posting of a bond. In light of this opposition, the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws have developed freestanding acts from similar provisions integrated into the UPC. This technique permits provisions, such as those involving powers of attorney and guardianship, to become law without disturbing other parts of a state's probate code.

Re: Pending Trust and Estate Legislation

Dear Senator French:

Thank you for agreeing to meet with us and discuss pending trust and estate legislation before the Twenty-Sixth Legislature. As you know, we represent an informal group of attorneys and trust officers who practice in the area of estates and trusts in Alaska. We have been working with the Legislature for approximately 12 years in order to recommend improvements in Alaska's estate and trust statutes. We have recommended the following bills and have worked with the Legislature in order to assist in their drafting. The pending bills are as follows:

1. SB 60 (sponsor: McGuire); House counterpart, HB 144 (sponsor: Ramras)

In summary, this bill provides for the following:

✓ a. Allows a person who creates a trust to designate a person who will represent incapacitated persons in future proceedings.

✓ b. Updates Alaska's law with respect to an irrevocable trust that has the settlor as a discretionary beneficiary. Specifically, if the trust is created before marriage or with the spouse's consent, then the interest in the trust will not be part of the assets that a surviving spouse can choose to elect against after the settlor's death.

✓ c. Allows a person to have a will or trust validated before death and therefore not subject to challenge based on incapacity, undue influence, duress, fraud or similar claims.

d. Provides venue for probate of a will of a nonresident of Alaska.

e. Allows a fiduciary to consider discretionary distributions as from capital gain. This will allow better tax planning for beneficiaries of estates and trusts.

Status: Both bills were referred to Labor and Commerce and Judiciary. Labor and Commerce committees in both houses have heard the bills and reported them out. Next, to Judiciary for both bills.

2. SB 62 (sponsor: McGuire)

In 1998, Alaska enacted an optional community property system. Several amendments have been made to Alaska's act, and this bill proposes further amendments designed to improve the act. Specifically, the amendments accomplish the following:

a. Adds references to a community property trust in appropriate provisions.

b. Eliminates language stating a confusing statute of limitations and incorporates by reference a new statute of limitations.

c. Provides clarification that property which spouses agree is community property is owned as community property regardless of the form of title to the property. If title to community property is in a form that provides for survivorship ownership between the spouses then the survivorship ownership is presumed to have been made with the consent of both spouses. If one spouse designates a beneficiary for an interest in property, the designation is only effective for that spouse's one-half interest unless the other spouse consents in writing. Various family designations are presumed to have been made with the consent of the other spouse. The testimony of one spouse is sufficient to rebut a presumption.

d. Enacts remedies for improper transfers and limitation periods within which those remedies must be pursued.

Status: Referred to State Affairs and Judiciary. No hearings yet.

3. SB 63 (sponsor: McGuire); House counterpart, HB 146 (sponsor: Ramras)

This bill provides for the following amendments:

a. Clarifies the burden of proof which a creditor must meet to establish that a transfer in trust was done with the intent to defraud a creditor.

b. Clarifies that a spendthrift provision will apply to a trust if distributions are made under the exercise of discretion by a trustee who is not the settlor, whether or not the exercise of the discretion is governed by a standard.

c. Provides that the spendthrift provision in a trust will apply even though the trustee may distribute income or principal to the settlor to pay income taxes.

d. Clarifies that a beneficiary's interest in a trust, whether or not vested, is not considered a factor or economic circumstance in the division of property subject to divorce.

Status: SB 63 referred to State Affairs, Judiciary, and Finance; no hearings yet. HB 146 referred to Labor and Commerce and Judiciary; no hearings yet.

4. Uniform Disclaimer of Interests and Property Act

House Bill 201 was introduced by Representative LeDoux in the Twenty-Fifth Legislature. This bill contained the latest version of the Uniform Disclaimer of Property Interests Act. Our group reviewed this act and made a number of suggestions for changes, which were incorporated into the latest version of HB 201.

It is our understanding that this bill may be reintroduced into the Twenty-Sixth Legislature. As stated above, our group has thoroughly reviewed this bill and recommends its passage.

5. Proposals for a New Bill

Our group has reviewed the following subjects and recommends that they be included in a new estate and trust bill:

a. Remains Statute. This provision would clarify Alaska law concerning the persons who are entitled to make decisions about a person's remains after death.

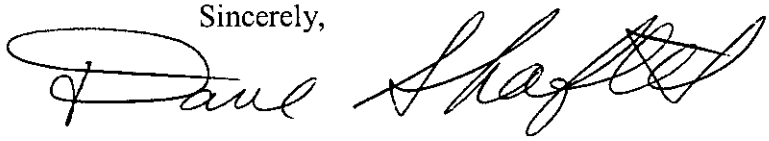
b. Directed Trustee Statute Improvements. This provision would clarify Alaska law in regard to allowing a settlor to direct that a trustee may follow the directions of other trustees or advisors, without liability.

c. Decanting Statute Improvements. This provision would substantially improve a trustee's ability to make needed modifications to a trust which are the result of errors, changes of circumstances, and similar matters.

d. IRA Transfers. This provision would allow the owner or participant of an IRA to make a voluntary transfer of his or her interest in the account. This would facilitate tax planning.

Again, thank you very much for making time to review and discuss these trust and estate matters which are pending before the Twenty-Sixth Legislature.

Sincerely,



David G. Shaftel

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS
CS for SENATE BILL NO. 63(STA)

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA
TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE—SECOND SESSION

Section 1. Amends AS 34.40.110(b), the subsection that makes exceptions to the transfer trust restrictions allowed under the section.

The (b)(1) exception, requires that a creditor establish the criteria for the exception by clear and convincing evidence.

The (b)(2) exception also makes a conforming amendment to reflect the addition of materials under (b)(3).

The context of subsection (b)(3) is that if a person has a transfer restriction established in subsection (a) it would prevent a creditor from reaching assets in a trust even if the trust requires that all/part of the trust assets must be distributed to the settlor so long as conditions established in subsections (A) through (F) are met. New Subsection (E) allows a settlor to receive certain discretionary distributions made by a trustee who is not the settlor. The second new exception (F) relates to the receipt of certain income or principal to pay income tax due on the trust.

Section 2. Amends AS 34.40.110(h). Provides that a transfer restriction on a beneficiary's trust interest is enforceable even if the settlor has certain listed powers relating to the appointment, removal, and replacement of a trustee, trust protector, or an advisor.

MEMORANDUM March 23, 2010

SUBJECT: Sectional summary of CSSB 63( ), a bill relating to transfer restrictions on trust interests (Work Order No. 26-LS0317\P)

TO: Senator Lesil McGuire
Attn: Esther Cha

FROM: Theresa Bannister
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional summary of the above-described bill. As a preliminary matter, note that a sectional summary of a bill should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill and the bill itself is the best statement of its contents.

Section 1. Amends the subsection that establishes four situations when a creditor can satisfy a claim out of a beneficiary's interest in a trust when the trust contains a transfer restriction. In the first situation, this bill requires that the creditor establish the intent to defraud by clear and convincing evidence. In the second situation, which is based on the settlor's (the creator of the trust) right to revoke or terminate the trust, deletes a current exclusion from the meaning of "revoke or terminate" because the exclusion does not fit within the concept of revocation or termination.

Section 2. Adds a new provision to the section that allows a person who creates a trust (settlor) to restrict the transfer of a beneficiary's interest before payment to the beneficiary. States that the transfer restriction is allowed even if the settlor has any of the three listed rights: (1) to appoint a trustee, a trust protector, or an advisor for the trust; (2) to remove a trustee or trust protector and appoint certain replacements; or (3) remove an advisor and appoint a replacement.

Section 3. Adds a new provision to the section that allows a person who creates a trust (settlor) to prohibit the transfer of a beneficiary's interest before payment to the beneficiary (the beneficiary can be the settlor). States that the transfer restriction operates even if two situations exist: (1) the beneficiary has the right to receive a distribution made in a person's discretion; or (2) the settlor, under specific conditions, potentially will receive or actually receives income or principal to pay income taxes due on the income of the trust.

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

SPONSOR STATEMENT
CS for SENATE BILL NO. 63(STA)

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA
TWENTY–SIXTH LEGISLATURE—SECOND SESSION

This bill amends and improves Alaska's trust provisions which permit a settlor to form an irrevocable trust, be a discretionary beneficiary of the trust and, if the trust has a spendthrift clause, protect the trust assets from the settlor's creditors. Alaska was the first state to enact this type of trust law. Since enactment in 1997, numerous other states have enacted similar statutes. At present, twelve states allow this type of trust.

This bill improves Alaska's trust provisions so that Alaska's statute remains competitive with those of other states. As a result, both residents, and nonresidents of Alaska who choose to form this type of trust in Alaska, will benefit from these improved provisions.

The bill upgrades Alaska's statute by adopting the following provisions which have been adopted in other states:

- A creditor must establish by clear and convincing evidence that a transfer was made with an intent to defraud a creditor. (This standard has been adopted by nine of the other twelve states);
- Distributions can be made under the discretion of a trustee pursuant to a standard, as well as with absolute discretion;
- The settlor may be reimbursed for income taxes attributable to the trust;
- The settlor can retain the power to replace a trustee/advisor with a non-related, non-subordinate party.

What is a Trust?

A Trust is a legal arrangement (basically a contract) where one person (called a trustee) holds property for the benefit of other persons (called beneficiaries). There are many different types of trusts.

The personal trust is the most common form of trust, created for non-business reasons for the benefit and protection of individuals. The trustee in a personal trust acts in accordance with the law and the instructions set forth in the governing instrument by the person who created the trust (called Grantor or Settlor). The primary responsibilities of the trustee are to manage and protect the assets in the trust for the best interest of the beneficiaries. The management and protection responsibilities include proper investment of assets, collection of income, maintenance of accurate books and records, filing of tax returns and other reports, and the payment of income and trust property to the beneficiaries in accordance with the terms of the trust.

Trusts are used throughout the United States to accomplish many different objectives such as;

- Protecting interest of minors
- Preserve assets for the family
- Accomplish the desires of the family
- Improve quality of life by allowing use of trust assets by beneficiaries
- Provide asset protection
- Reduce and in some cases eliminate gift, estate and income taxes

A self-settled trust is a trust where the grantor is also a beneficiary with other family members. This allows the assets in the trust to appreciate in value and the trust assets will not be in the Grantors taxable estate for federal estate tax purposes. The IRS has recently issued a private letter ruling acknowledging that these trusts can accomplish this objective.

From the information we have received from Alaska estate planning attorneys over ten thousand Alaskans have taken advantage of Alaska's favorable trust laws, non-residents of Alaska have also used Alaska's trust laws to accomplish their family financial goals.

Re: ACLU of Alaska – Support of SB 68

Dear Senator Davis:

On behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) of Alaska and our thousands of members and activists throughout the state, as well as our Board of Directors and Staff, I am writing to express our strong support of Senate Bill 68 seeking to enfranchise formerly incarcerated Alaskans.

We are grateful for your work in sponsoring this bill, and your historic commitment to the most fundamental of constitutional rights – the right to vote.

Thanks also to your office for responding to our inquiries regarding the details of this legislation. We appreciate the hard work of your staff in seeking to ensure that SB 68 will reduce unnecessary impediments to enfranchisement. As you know, those who participate in voting are less likely to re-offend, and reducing barriers to voting contributes to the public welfare of all Alaskans.

The ACLU of Alaska is pleased to support SB 68 and hopes to work with you towards quick passage of this legislation.

Please feel free to contact us at (907) 258-0044, or jmittman@akclu.org, if you require any additional information.

Sincerely,

Jeffrey A. Mittman
Executive Director

RECEIVED
APR 13 2009

Senator Bettye Davis
120 4th Street
Juneau, AK 99801-1182

Dear Senator Davis,

As your constituent, I ask you to support SB 68, which helps keep all Alaskans safer, by ensuring that ex-offenders have the right to vote and function as responsible citizens and taxpayers.

Restricting voting rights does not prevent crime or provide compensation to victims. Research shows that people who vote are much less likely to be re-arrested. That is why the American Probation and Parole Association, the National Black Police Association, the American Bar Association and others support full voting rights when former offenders return to their communities.

Senate Bill 68 encourages the behaviors we all wish to see and that society ought to encourage a commitment to community and participation in our democracy.

Thank you for supporting SB 68.

Sincerely,

Mr. Garrett Ennis

Sponsor Statement

SB 68 "An Act relating to the voting rights of felons"

Across the country states handle the right to vote for returning felons differently. Two (2) states, Maine and Vermont do not take away a felons right to vote. Thirteen states (13) allow felons to vote upon release from incarceration. Twenty one (21) including Alaska allow felons to vote after they complete all parole/probation requirements while fourteen (14) states permanently disenfranchise certain felons. If our belief is that felons once released have paid their debt to society then returning their right to vote upon release from incarceration would be a positive step.

SB 68 allows felons upon release from incarceration to register to vote. This bill starts the process which allows felons to start assuming responsibility for their reintegration in their communities. We are each responsible for how our government works and we do that through voting. In Alaska, 6081* Alaskans have lost their right to vote because of felony convictions. Currently, Alaska law bars the vote to persons convicted of felonies of moral turpitude until the expiration of a post-incarceration period of parole or probation, which is often years after they have reentered society to become productive citizens and tax payers. .

Harsh sentencing laws over the past 30 years have allowed the prison population to balloon, while reducing the rehabilitative model to almost non existent. Over 4.7 million Americans or 1 in 43 adults cannot vote due to felony convictions, with 1/3 or more of them were incarcerated due to alcohol and drug offenses. In Alaska we have gone from slightly over 800 prisoners in 1984 to 5344 in 2008, an increase of 149%. Of those incarcerated in Alaska 48% are Caucasian, 36% are Alaska Native, 10% are African American, 3% are Hispanic, and 3% are Asian/Pacific Islanders.* Nationally minority felons are disproportionately disenfranchised under current law and the harm of this continued disenfranchisement after release is exacerbated by stigma and other forms of discrimination as they try to reenter society. In Alaska 52% of our incarcerated offenders are minorities.

In Alaska, we do not have a problem taking a person off the voting roles if convicted of a felony but we do not have a system that will automatically allow them to return to the voting roles upon termination of supervision. Voting is just one of many steps a returning felon must make to become a productive member of the community. This Bill will help provide a clear time for returning voting rights and provide an important right/responsibility to felons returning to their communities.

MEMORANDUM February 2, 2009

SUBJECT: Sectional Summary of SB 68 (Work Order No. 26-LS0324\A)

TO: Senator Bettye Davis
Attn: Thomas Obermeyer

FROM: Alpheus Bullard
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional analysis of the above referenced bill. As a preliminary matter, please note that a sectional analysis should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill, and the bill itself is the best statement of its contents.

Section 1. Establishes that a person convicted of a crime that constitutes a felony involving moral turpitude under state or federal law may not vote while incarcerated for that crime, and that the person upon release will be advised of voter registration requirements and procedures.

Section 2. Establishes that the voter registration of a person convicted of a crime that constitutes a felony involving moral turpitude will be cancelled while that person is incarcerated.

Section 3. Establishes that a person convicted of a crime that constitutes a felony involving moral turpitude under state or federal law is disqualified from voting while incarcerated for that crime.

Section 4. Repeals AS 15.60.010(39), a definition of "unconditional discharge."

Alaska State Legislature

Sponsor Statement for SB 73

By passing Senate Bill 73, motorists would be required to use their vehicle's headlight system at all times while on Alaska's roads.

The bill will address a key goal of the Alaska Highway Safety Office's Strategic Highway Safety Plan. That plan recommends changing state law to require headlight use at all times. The Alaska Highway Safety Office backs up the need for the law with research showing a decrease in traffic accidents where daytime running lights are used. Enforcement of the headlight law could decrease head-on collisions by 7 percent to 15 percent, the AHSO has determined.

The effectiveness of "headlights on" rules can be seen on the Seward Highway. In the mid-1990s, signs were installed along the highway from Anchorage to Seward reading "Headlights On At All Times." The Department of Public Safety says the signs were very effective in saving lives. According to the Department of Transportation, there was a marked decrease in numbers of crashes around the time of sign posting on the Seward Highway.

Similar results have been seen in other countries located in Polar Regions like Alaska. In Sweden, which has similar weather conditions to Alaska, studies have found that the requirement to use headlights at all times reduced crash rates by 20 percent in urban areas and 17 percent in rural areas in winter months.

Currently, 39 out of 50 states, including Alaska, require use of headlights on motorcycles at all times while operating on roads. Experts report the headlights increase the conspicuousness of motorcycles, allowing other motorists to more easily see them.

Today, drivers pulled over without their headlights on in areas requiring headlights are fined $50 and two points on their license. According to Lt. Rodney Dial of the Alaska State Troopers, those fines would likely carry over statewide if SB 73 is passed.

Senate Bill 73 will increase the safety on Alaska's roadways by making all vehicles easier to see while traveling, especially during Alaska's long periods of dusk and dawn.

HH.3. Headlights On at All Times – Tier One

Description: Around 15 people die in Alaska each year in head-on crashes. National data indicate headlights-on signing and enforcement could eliminate 7 to 15 percent of these crashes.

This plan recommends changing state law to require headlights on at all times. If this is not done, we can still post signs that will make headlights mandatory on particular sections of road. 13 AAC 04.010 gives the signs the authority of law.

Data Analysis Needs or Available Resources:

Create a statewide map of head-on collisions, insurance report, photos, past country/state success stories.

Expected Effectiveness/Outcome:

Narrative: To eliminate fatal and major injury crashes – estimate number yet to be determined.

Average number of lives lost and major injuries sustained due to this problem over the past five years: Approximately 15 per year.

Estimated number of lives saved and major injuries prevented in one year following implementation: One.

Funding and Resource Requirements:

Narrative: Funding for AHSO to cover legal costs – approximately $10K. If signs are posted, approximately $1,000 per sign.

Estimated Cost to Implement: $ TBD

Action Steps and Timeline:

Action Step	Responsible Agency	Timeline/Due Date
Collect data and success stories in a draft packet for the legislature.	AHSO	December 2007
Collaborate with partners to develop a legislative information/ lobby plan.	AHSO	December 2007
Pass Legislation.	Legislature	May 2008
If successful, install signs in high-crash areas. (This could happen earlier.)

Measurement and Evaluation:

Strategy Performance Measures: Reduction in head-on collisions.

Evaluation:

Reduction in head-on collisions as indicated by before/after crash studies.

Technical Report

An Assessment of the Crash-Reducing Effectiveness of Passenger Vehicle Daytime Running Lamps (DRLs)

Executive Summary

This study estimates the effectiveness of passenger vehicle daytime running lights in reducing two-vehicle opposite direction crashes, pedestrian/bicycle crashes, and motorcycle crashes. The authors chose the generalized simple odds, a conventional statistical technique, to analyze the data. The generalized odds ratio attempts to adjust for a variety of exogenous factors other than the presence or absence of DRLs not specifically controlled for within the model.

Significant results of this study show that from 1995 to 2001:

Simple Odds Results:

- DRLs reduced opposite direction daytime fatal crashes by 5 percent.
- DRLs reduced opposite direction/angle daytime non-fatal crashes by 5 percent.
- DRLs reduced non-motorists, pedestrians and cyclists, daytime fatalities in single-vehicle crashes by 12 percent.
- DRLs reduced daytime opposite direction fatal crashes of a passenger vehicle with a motorcycle by 23 percent.

The reviewers of this paper required the inclusion of an analysis based on odds ratio, which can be found in Appendix B. Like the simple odds, the odds ratio attempts to control for a variety of factors other than the presence or absence of DRLs. The estimated effectiveness of DRLs based on this technique is extremely sensitive to small changes encountered in real world crash data. As a result, reductions in target crashes during the daytime using the odds ratio technique may not be detected over the inherent background noise of the data system. None of the results based on the odds ratio are statistically significant.

Odds Ratio Results:

- DRLs reduced opposite direction daytime fatal crashes by –6.3 percent that is DRLs increase opposite direction daytime fatal crashes by 6.3 percent.
- DRLs reduced opposite direction/angle daytime non-fatal crashes by –7.9 percent that is DRLs increase opposite direction/angle daytime non-fatal crashes by 7.9 percent.
- DRLs reduced non-motorists, pedestrians and cyclists, daytime fatalities in single-vehicle crashes by 3.8 percent.
- DRLs reduced daytime opposite direction fatal crashes of a passenger vehicle with a motorcycle by 26 percent.

Information from Kurt Smith, Department of Transportation

1. 13 AAC 04.010 became effective in April 1994. It authorized the department to install Headlights On At All Times signs.
2. HOAAT signs were posted on the Seward Highway from Seward to Anchorage mid summer 1994.
3. DPS claimed the signs were very effective in saving lives (16 fatalities during 1991-1993, none in 2004). They asked that the rest of our major highways be signed accordingly.
4. The department worked to install the signs (500 signs at an approximate cost of $250,000). Many signs were installed by late 1995.
5. The DOT&PF Commissioner, under direction from the governor, issued a stop work notice in late 1995 due to adverse public opinion. The signs were taken down, except for the signs on the Seward Highway.
6. It is hard to tell the long term safety impact of the Headlights On signs, because their installation coincided with some major passing lane and reconstruction projects on the Seward Highway. However, there was a marked decrease in numbers of crashes around that time. As I recall, severe crashes did not decrease that markedly.
7. Windshield "surveys" have indicated that a higher percentage of vehicles have their lights on on the Seward Highway than on other roads.

Information from the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety

1 | What are the safety advantages of DRLs?

Daytime running lights (DRLs) are a low-cost method to reduce crashes. They are especially effective in preventing daytime head-on and front-corner collisions by increasing vehicle conspicuity and making it easier to detect approaching vehicles from farther away.

2 | Where are DRLs required?

Laws in Canada and many European countries require vehicles to operate with lights on during the daytime. There are two types of laws. Canada's requires vehicles to be equipped with DRLs. Laws in Europe require motorists to turn on their headlights if their vehicles do not have automatic DRLs. In 1972, Finland mandated daytime running lights in winter on rural roads and a decade later made DRLs mandatory year-round. Sweden's law took effect in 1977, Norway's in 1986, Iceland's in 1988, and Denmark's in 1990. Hungary has required drivers on rural roads to operate with vehicle lights on since 1993. Canada requires DRLs for vehicles made after December 1, 1989. No US state mandates DRLs, but some require drivers to operate vehicles with lights on in bad weather.

3 | Are DRLs available on vehicles in the United States?

First offered on a handful of 1995 domestic and foreign model passenger cars, pickups, and SUVs, daytime running lights have become a more common feature. They are standard on all General Motors, Lexus, Mercedes Benz, Saab, Subaru, Suzuki, Volkswagen, and Volvo models. Other manufacturers also offer daytime running lights on certain models. GM offers retrofit kits for vehicles that do not already have DRLs. The kits can be used on non-GM models, too.

4 | How effective are DRLs?

Nearly all published reports indicate DRLs reduce multiple-vehicle daytime crashes. Evidence about DRL effects on crashes comes from studies conducted in Scandinavia, Canada, and the United States. A study examining the effect of Norway's DRL law from 1980 to 1990 found a 10 percent decline in daytime multiple-vehicle crashes.[1] A Danish study reported a 7 percent reduction in DRL-relevant crashes in the first 15 months after DRL use was required and a 37 percent decline in left-turn crashes.[2] In a second study covering 2 years and 9 months of Denmark's law, there was a 6 percent reduction in daytime multiple-vehicle crashes and a 34 percent reduction in left-turn crashes.[3] A 1994 Transport Canada study comparing 1990 model year vehicles with DRLs to 1989 vehicles without them found that DRLs reduced relevant daytime multiple-vehicle crashes by 11 percent.[4]

In the United States, a 1985 Institute study determined that commercial fleet passenger vehicles modified to operate with DRLs were involved in 7 percent fewer daytime multiple-vehicle crashes than similar vehicles without DRLs.[5] A small-scale fleet study conducted in the 1960s found an 18 percent lower daytime multiple-vehicle crash rate for DRL-equipped vehicles.[6] Multiple-vehicle daytime crashes account for about half of all police-reported crashes in the United States. A 2002 Institute study reported a 3 percent decline in daytime multiple-vehicle crash risk in nine US states concurrent with the introduction of DRLs.[7] Federal researchers, using data collected nationwide, concluded that there was a 5 percent decline in daytime, two-vehicle, opposite-direction crashes and a 12 percent decline in fatal crashes with pedestrians and bicyclists.[8]

5 | Will DRLs shorten headlamp bulb life or lower fuel economy?

Running vehicle lights in the daytime does not significantly shorten bulb life. Systems like those on General Motors cars that use high beams are designed to operate at half their normal power during daylight hours, thereby conserving energy and reducing the effect on a vehicle's fuel economy. The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) estimates that only a fraction of a mile per gallon will be lost, depending on the type of system used. GM estimates the cost to be about $3 per year for the average driver. Transport Canada estimates the extra annual fuel and bulb replacement costs to be $3-15 for systems using reduced-intensity headlights or other low-intensity lights and more than $40 a year for DRL systems using regular low-beam headlights.

6 | Will motorists be bothered by glare?

In most countries mandating DRLs, glare has not been an issue. However, some motorists in the United States have complained that the systems here are too bright. In response to these complaints, NHTSA in 1998 proposed reducing the maximum allowable light intensity from 7,000 to 1,500 candela, a value more in line with European DRLs. There has been no action on this proposal as yet.

7 | Are motorcycles required to have DRLs?

Federal law does not require motorcycles to have DRLs, but some states require motorcyclists to ride with their headlights on at all hours. Thus, since 1979 most manufacturers have equipped their cycles with automatic-on headlamps.

CS FOR SENATE BILL NO. 85( )

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE - FIRST SESSION

BY

Offered:
Referred:

Sponsor(s): SENATE RULES COMMITTEE BY REQUEST OF THE GOVERNOR

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to penalties for violations of limitations on possessing, sending, shipping, transporting, or bringing alcoholic beverages to, soliciting or receiving orders for delivery of alcoholic beverages to, and the manufacture, sale, offer for sale, barter, traffic, or possession of alcoholic beverages in, a local option area; relating to minor consuming or in possession or control of alcoholic beverages; relating to civil penalties for liquor licensees whose agents or employees furnish alcoholic beverages to a person under 21 years of age; and providing for an effective date."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 04.11.575 is amended by adding a new subsection to read:

(d) In addition to other penalties imposed by law, if an agent or employee of a licensee is convicted of a violation of AS 04.16.052(5) occurring on the licensed premises of the licensee, the board shall, for a first conviction, issue a written warning to the licensee. The warning must include a description of civil fines for second and subsequent convictions. The board shall impose a civil fine of $1,000 on the licensee for the second and subsequent conviction of an agent or employee of the licensee for violation of AS 04.16.052(5) occurring on the licensed premises of the licensee. In imposing a civil fine under this subsection, second and subsequent convictions include the cumulative number of convictions of all agents or employees of a licensee that are committed on the premises of the licensee that occur within 10 years after the first conviction. A conviction occurs on the date that sentence is imposed for the offense. A hearing under AS 44.62.330 - 44.62.630 (Administrative Procedure Act) to issue a warning or impose a fine under this section shall be limited to the following questions:

(1) was an agent or employee of the licensee convicted by plea or judicial finding of a violation of AS 04.16.052(5);

(2) did the violation of AS 04.16.052(5) by the agent or employee of the licensee occur on the licensed premises of the licensee; and

(3) if the hearing is to consider imposition of a fine, did the violation of AS 04.16.052(5) occur within 10 years after a conviction for a prior violation of AS 04.16.052(5).

* Sec. 2. AS 04.16.050(c) is amended to read:

(c) A person is guilty of repeat minor consuming or in possession or control if the person was previously granted a suspended imposition of sentence [PLACED ON PROBATION] under (b)(1) of this section, has a prior conviction under (b)(2) of this section, or has been previously convicted once, and the person violates (a) of this section. Upon conviction in the district court, the court shall

(1) impose a fine of $1,000 and require at least 48 hours of community work;

(2) revoke the person's driver's license for three months;

(3) take possession of the person's driver's license; and

(4) suspend up to $500 of the fine and place the person on probation for up to one year under (e) of this section.

* Sec. 3. AS 04.16.050(d) is amended to read:

(d) A person is guilty of habitual minor consuming or in possession or control if the person has a prior conviction [WAS PLACED ON PROBATION] under (c) of this section, or has been previously convicted two or more times [TWICE], and the person violates (a) of this section. Habitual minor consuming or in possession or control is a class B misdemeanor. Upon conviction, the court may impose an appropriate period of imprisonment and fine and place the person on probation under (e) of this section for one year, or until the person is 21 years of age, whichever is later, and shall

(1) impose at least 96 hours of community work;

(2) revoke the person's driver's license for six months;

(3) within five working days, notify the agency responsible for the administration of motor vehicle laws of the revocation; and

(4) take possession of the person's driver's license.

 Sec. 4. AS 04.16.200(h) is amended to read:

(h) Upon conviction of a class C felony under (b) or (e)(2) or (3) of this section, the court

(1) shall impose a fine of not less than $10,000 and a minimum sentence of imprisonment of

(A) 120 days if the person has not been previously convicted [ONCE];

(B) 240 days if the person has been previously convicted once [TWO TIMES];

(C) 360 days if the person has been previously convicted two [THREE] or more times;

(2) may not

(A) suspend execution of sentence or grant probation except on the condition that the person

(i) serve the minimum imprisonment under (1) of this subsection; and

(ii) pay the minimum fine required under (1) of this subsection; or

(B) suspend imposition of sentence.

 Sec. 5. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

APPLICABILITY. (a) AS 04.11.575(d), added by sec. 1 of this Act, applies to offenses committed on or after the effective date of this Act.

(b) AS 04.16.050(c), as amended by sec. 2 of this Act, and AS 04.16.050(d), as amended by sec. 3 of this Act, apply to probation ordered for offenses occurring before, on, or after the effective date of this Act. References to prior or previous suspended impositions of sentences or convictions include suspended impositions of sentences and convictions occurring before, on, or after the effective date of this Act.

(c) AS 04.16.200(h), as amended by sec. 4 of this Act, applies to an offense occurring on or after the effective date of this Act. References to previous convictions in sec. 4 of this Act apply to convictions occurring before, on, or after the effective date of this Act.

* Sec. 6. This Act takes effect immediately under AS 01.10.070(c).

RE: CS for SB85

I'd like to get a CS for SB85 (GS1009\E) with the attached language (which was provided by the Department of Law).

Because it eliminates the local option provision in \E, there will also need to be a title change.

The other major change to the existing bill adds language regarding hearings.

Please call me if you have any questions! We'd like the CS for discussion next week.

DRAFT

CS FOR SENATE BILL 85

"An Act relating to civil penalties for liquor licensees whose agents or employees furnish alcoholic beverages to a person under 21 years of age; relating to minor consuming; relating to penalties for violations of limitations on possessing, sending shipping, transporting, or bringing alcohol to a local option area; and providing for an effective date."

 Section 1. AS 04.11.575 is amended by adding a new subsection to read:

(d) In addition to other penalties imposed by law, if an agent or employee of a licensee is convicted of a violation of AS 04.16.052(5) occurring on the licensed premises of the licensee, the board shall, for a first conviction, issue a warning to the licensee. The warning shall include a description of civil fines for second and subsequent convictions. The board shall impose a civil fine of $1,000 on the licensee for the second and subsequent conviction of an agent or employee of the licensee for violation of AS 04.16.052(5) occurring on the licensed premises of the licensee. In imposing a civil fine under this subsection, second and subsequent convictions include the cumulative number of convictions of all agents or employees of a licensee that are committed on the premises of the licensee that occur within 10 years of the first conviction. A conviction occurs on the date that sentence is imposed for the offense. A hearing under AS 44.62.330 – 44.62.630 to issue a warning or impose a fine under this section shall be limited to the following questions:

(1) was an agent or employee of the licensee convicted by plea or judicial finding of a violation of AS 04.16.052(5);

(2) did the violation of AS 04.16.052(5) by the agent or employee of the licensee occur on the licensed premises of the licensee;

(3) if the hearing is to consider imposition of a fine, did the violation of AS 04.16.052(5) occur within ten years of the conviction of a prior violation of AS 04.16.052(5).

 Sec. 2. AS 04.16.050(c) is amended to read:

(c) A person is guilty of repeat minor consuming or in possession or control if the person was previously granted a suspended imposition of sentence [PLACED ON PROBATION] under (b)(1) of this section, has a prior conviction under (b)(2) of this section, or has been previously convicted once, and the person violates (a) of this section. Upon conviction in the district court, the court shall

(1) impose a fine of $1,000 and require at least 48 hours of community work;

(2) revoke the person's driver's license for three months;

(3) take possession of the person's driver's license; and

(4) suspend up to $500 of the fine and place the person on probation for up to one year under (e) of this section.

* Sec. 3. AS 04.16.050(d) is amended to read:

(d) A person is guilty of habitual minor consuming or in possession or control if the person has a prior conviction [WAS PLACED ON PROBATION] under (c) of this section, or has been previously convicted two or more times [TWICE], and the person violates (a) of this section. Habitual minor consuming or in possession or control is a class B misdemeanor. Upon conviction, the court may impose an appropriate period of imprisonment and fine and place the person on probation under (e) of this section for one year, or until the person is 21 years of age, whichever is later, and shall

(1) impose at least 96 hours of community work;

(2) revoke the person's driver's license for six months;

(3) within five working days, notify the agency responsible for the administration of motor vehicle laws of the revocation; and

(4) take possession of the person's driver's license.

* Sec. 4. AS 04.16.200(h) is amended to read:

(h) Upon conviction of a class C felony under (b) or (e)(2) or (3) of this section, the court

(1) shall impose a fine of not less than $10,000 and a minimum sentence of imprisonment of

(A) 120 days if the person has not been previously convicted [ONCE];

(B) 240 days if the person has been previously convicted once [TWO TIMES];

(C) 360 days if the person has been previously convicted two [THREE] or more times;

(2) may not

(A) suspend execution of sentence or grant probation except on the condition that the person

(i) serve the minimum imprisonment under (1) of this subsection; and

(ii) pay the minimum fine required under (1) of this subsection; or

(B) suspend imposition of sentence.

 Sec. 5. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

APPLICABILITY. (a) Section 1 of this Act applies to offenses committed on or after the effective date of this Act.

(b) Sections 2 and 3 of this Act apply to probation ordered for offenses occurring before, on, or after the effective date of this Act.

(c) Section 4 of this Act applies to an offense occurring on or after the effective date of the applicable section of this Act. References to previous convictions apply to convictions occurring before, on, or after the effective date of this Act.

 Sec. 6. This Act takes effect immediately in accordance with AS 01.10.070(c).

Honorable Sarah Palin
State of Alaska
PO Box 110001
Juneau, AK 99811-0001

Dear Governor Palin:

On behalf of the Alaska Peace Officers Association (APOA), I would like to thank you for facilitating the introduction of House Bill 91 and Senate Bill 85, relating to bringing alcoholic beverages to a local option area and minor consuming.

The APOA State Board and Legislative Committee reviewed this proposed legislation and unanimously support these bills.

We thank you for addressing this issue. Please contact the APOA office in Anchorage at 277-0515 if there is anything our organization can do to assist in the passage of this bill.

Sincerely,

Angella Long
State President

CITY OF BETHEL, ALASKA

Resolution # 09-11

OPPOSING THE COMMITTEE SUBSTITUTE FOR SENATE BILL 85 (CRA) "AN ACT RELATING TO LIMITATION ON POSSESSING, SENDING, SHOPPING, TRANSPORTING, OR BRINGING ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES TO A LOCAL OPTION AREA AND TO PENALTIES FOR VIOLATION OF HOSE LIMITATIONS; RELATING TO PROBATION FOR MINOR CONSUMING OR IN POSSESSION OR CONTROL OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES; RELATING TO CIVIL FINES FOR LIQUOR LICENSEES WHOSE AGENTS OR EMPLOYEES FURNISH ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES TO A PERSON UNDER 21 YEARS OF AGE; AND PROVIDING FOR AN EFFECTIVE DATE" AS THEY ARE CURRENTLY WRITTEN

WHEREAS, in 1977 under the provisions of title 4 of the Alaska statutes a majority of the eligible voters within the City of Bethel voted themselves into local option to prohibit the sale of alcoholic beverages within City limits however alcohol could still be purchased in other areas and shipped in;

WHEREAS, the proposed limitations in the new legislation will only drive up the price of bootlegged alcohol and perpetuate the problem; while bootlegging is a major issue in rural Alaska, this is not the best avenue to combat the problem;

WHEREAS, only four of the nineteen communities with "damp" status (Barrow, Kotzebue, Saint Mary's Bethel) will be impacted;

WHEREAS, it is the community's option to regulate the alcohol within their community through a local option referendum, stricter alcohol limitation should also be established by a vote of the people within the communities affected by the change;

WHEREAS, whether it be through limitations on alcohol amounts purchased or possessed, establishing a dry community or opting out of local option completely;

WHEREAS, none of these actions should be taken without the majority of the community's vote, local option should be just that, the option of the local community, allow the people to choose the best method of improvement for their city;

Introduced by: Mayor Zulkosky
Vice-Mayor Leinberger
Date: February 10, 2009
Action: Passed
Vote: 5-0

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED that the City Council of the City of Bethel is hereby opposed to the Committee substitute for Senate Bill 85 (CRA); as it should be left up to the respective community to establish additional regulations if desired.

ENACTED THIS 24th DAY OF FEBRUARY 2009 BY A VOTE OF 5 IN FAVOR AND 0 OPPOSED.

CS FOR SENATE BILL 85(CRA)
Sectional Analysis

Section 1 amends the law that requires package store liquor licensees who send alcohol to persons living in damp communities to check a statewide database before sending alcohol to a person. Under current law a licensee may send 10 ½ liters of distilled spirits, 24 liters of wine, and 12 gallons of malt beverage to each adult in a damp local option area every month.

This bill would change this provision so that a package store liquor licensee may send the same amount to an individual in a damp local option area once in a two month period.

Section 2 adopts civil penalties for liquor licensees whose agents or employees are convicted of furnishing alcohol to a minor on the licensee's premises. Under current law there are no certain legal consequences for the owner of a bar or liquor store if an employee sells alcohol to a minor. The bill requires Alaska Alcoholic Beverage Control Board to send a warning letter to the licensee the first time the licensee's agent or employee is convicted of furnishing alcohol to a minor on his or her premises. For a second or subsequent conviction by an agent or employee, the ABC board would impose a civil fine of $1,000.

Sections 3 and 4 correct a minor error in legislation adopted last year that reduced the probation period for minors convicted of consuming alcohol. The law addressing minor consuming in Alaska places progressive penalties on minors who consume alcohol. These sections clarify that the penalties imposed for second and third convictions will be imposed on all minors who have the requisite prior conviction or convictions.

Section 5 corrects a provision in legislation enacted last year that intended to adopt mandatory minimum penalties for bootlegging that are similar to the mandatory minimum penalties for drunk driving. Because the definition of prior conviction for bootlegging is different from that for drunk driving, the legislation did not adopt a mandatory minimum for the first time conviction of felony bootlegging. Senate Bill 85 amends the penalties for felony bootlegging so that the penalties are the same as those for felony drunk driving.

Sections 6 and 7 include applicability and effective date provisions.

SENATE BILL 85
Sectional Analysis

Section 1 addresses the amount of alcohol that a person may possess in or send to a damp community, the possession or sending of which would create a rebuttable presumption that it was for the purpose of illegal sale of the alcohol. A damp community is one that has elected to allow possession but not the sale of alcohol in their community.

Current law provides that a person may possess in or send to a damp community 10 ½ liters (or 14 fifths) of distilled spirits; 24 liters (or 32 bottles) of wine; and 12 gallons (about 21 - 12 ounce six packs) of malt beverages each calendar month before giving rise to the rebuttable presumption that the possession or transporting is for the illegal sale of the alcohol.

Section 1 of Senate Bill 85 reduces the amounts that give rise to the rebuttable presumption to three liters (or four fifths) of distilled spirits; 12 liters (or 16 bottles) of wine; and six gallons (about 11 - 12 ounce six packs). A person could possess or transport these amounts each month without giving rise to the rebuttable presumption.

Section 2 amends the law that requires package store liquor licensees who send alcohol to persons living in damp communities to check a statewide database before sending alcohol to a person. The licensee may not send alcohol if the person has already received the amount of alcohol that gives rise to the rebuttable presumptions described in Section 1. Section 2 amends the law to conform to the changes in the presumptive amounts described in Section 1.

Section 3 adopts civil penalties for liquor licensees whose agents or employees are convicted of furnishing alcohol to a minor on the licensee's premises. Under current law there are no certain legal consequences for the owner of a bar or liquor store if an employee sells alcohol to a minor. The bill requires Alaska Alcoholic Beverage Control Board to send a warning letter to the licensee the first time the licensee's agent or employee is convicted of furnishing alcohol to a minor on his or her premises. For a second or subsequent conviction by an agent or employee, the ABC board would impose a civil fine of $1,000.

Sections 4 and 5 correct a minor error in legislation adopted last year that reduced the probation period for minors convicted of consuming alcohol. The law addressing minor consuming in Alaska places progressive penalties on minors who consume alcohol. These sections clarify that the penalties imposed for second and third convictions will be imposed on all minors who have the requisite prior conviction or convictions.

Section 6 addresses the penalties for bootlegging, that hinge on the amount of alcohol illegally transported into a local option community. Under current law a bootlegger commits a class A misdemeanor (maximum term of incarceration one year) if the amount of alcohol illegally transported is less than 10 ½ liters of distilled spirits, 24 liters of wine, or 12 gallons of malt liquor. The bill would reduce the amount that delineates a class A misdemeanor to less than three liters of distilled spirits, 12 liters of wine, and six gallons of malt liquor.

Section 6 makes conforming changes for felony bootlegging. Bootlegging more than the amounts described above would be a class C felony. A third conviction of bootlegging the lower amounts within 15 years of the two prior convictions is also a class C felony.

Section 7 corrects a provision in legislation enacted last year that intended to adopt mandatory minimum penalties for bootlegging that are similar to the mandatory minimum penalties for drunk driving. Because the definition of prior conviction for bootlegging is different from that for drunk driving, the legislation did not adopt a mandatory minimum for the first time conviction of felony bootlegging. Senate Bill 85 amends the penalties for felony bootlegging so that the penalties are the same as those for felony drunk driving.

Sections 8 and 9 include applicability and effective date provisions.

Senator Donald Olson, Chair
Senate Community and Regional Affairs Committee
Alaska State Capitol, Room 514
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Re: An act relating to limitation on transporting alcohol to local option communities, minor consuming, and civil fines for licensees.

Dear Chairman Olson:

I am writing to respectfully request that you schedule the referenced bill for hearing in the Senate Community and Regional Affairs Committee at your earliest convenience. The bill builds on the recent alcohol enforcement efforts made by the legislature, by reducing the amount of alcohol a person may possess in or transport to a damp community before raising the presumption that the possession or transportation was for illegal sale of the alcohol. The bill makes conforming changes to the amount of alcohol that package stores may send to damp communities, and the penalties for bootlegging alcohol.

The bill also would impose civil penalties on a liquor licensee whose agents or employees are convicted of furnishing alcohol to a minor on the licensee's premises. For a first conviction, the ABC Board would send a warning letter to the licensee. For second and subsequent convictions, the Board would impose a civil fine of $1,000. Most liquor licensees are very responsible in emphasizing the importance of refusing to sell alcohol to minors. For the few that are not, this would encourage them to stress the importance of the law to their employees and agents.

Last, the bill makes two corrections in legislation adopted last year. The legislation that changed the probation period for minor consuming had a minor error. Second, the legislation that adopted mandatory minimum penalties for bootlegging needs amendment to conform to the mandatory minimum penalties for drunk driving.

In support of this bill we plan to have witnesses from the Division of Behavioral Health, the ABC Board, and a participant in the Rural Justice Commission.

Thank you for your consideration of this request.

Sincerely,

TALIS J. COLBERG

SB 92: The National Popular Vote is Good For Alaska

1. The National Popular Vote is Not Only Constitutional, but Employs the Historically Precedented Way of Changing the Method of Electing the President

The U.S. Constitution says "Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors...."

The U.S. Supreme Court has repeatedly referred to this unqualified grant of state power as "exclusive" and "plenary."

The winner-take-all rule (namely, awarding all of a state's electoral votes to the candidate who receives the most popular votes in each individual state) is not contained in the U.S. Constitution. Only three states used it in the nation's first presidential election in 1789.

Nearly all major changes U.S. presidential elections have been initiated and implemented at the state level — not by action at the federal level.

For example, there is nothing in the Constitution that says that the people may vote for President. In 1789, only five states let the people vote for President (while the state legislature or the governor and his cabinet cast the state's electoral votes in the other states). The states changed this, one-by-one, until, by 1880, the people in every state were able to vote for President.

Permitting the people to vote for President was not an "end run" around the Constitution, but, instead, an exercise of a power that the Constitution explicitly gave to state legislatures. We have not encountered a single person who argues that the state legislatures did anything improper, inappropriate, or unconstitutional when they made this most fundamental change in the way the President is elected.

Similarly, elimination of wealth qualifications to vote (which limited voting to about 3% of the population in 1789) was accomplished on a state-by-state basis.

Woman acquired the right to vote on a state-by-state basis over a 50-year period beginning in 1869. After 30 of the 48 states had already given women the right to vote, a federal constitutional amendment extended that policy to the remainder of the country.

For additional information, see section 10.1 of the book, Every Vote Equal: A State-Based Plan for Electing the President by National Popular Vote.

2. National Popular Vote is Especially Advantageous for Low-Population States Such as Alaska

Low-population states (such as Alaska) are the most disadvantaged group of states under the current system of electing the President.

The reason is that small states tend to be politically homogeneous, so 12 of the 13 smallest states are one-party states in presidential elections. In the six presidential elections since 1988, six of the 13 states with three or four electoral votes have regularly gone Republican (Alaska, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, and South Dakota). Six others have regularly gone Democratic (Hawaii, Vermont, Maine, Rhode Island, Delaware, and the District of Columbia).

Under the winner-take-all rule (i.e., awarding all of a state's electoral votes to the candidate who receives the most popular votes in each state), candidates have no reason to poll, visit, advertise, organize, or pay attention to issues concerning states where they are comfortably ahead or hopelessly behind. Instead, candidates concentrate their attention on a small handful of closely divided battleground states. In 2008, candidates concentrated over two-thirds of their campaign events and advertising money in just states, and 98% in just 15 states.

Alaska and the other small states are ignored in presidential elections not because they are small, but because the winner-take-all rule makes them irrelevant.

The 12 smallest non-competitive states have a combined population of 11.4 million. Coincidentally, Ohio has 11.4 million people. Because of the bonus of two electoral votes that every state receives, the 12 small states have 40 electoral votes. Ohio has 20 electoral votes. However, political power does not arise from the number of electoral votes that a state possesses, but, instead, from whether the state is a closely divided battleground state. In 2008, Ohio received 62 of the 300 post-convention visits (and corresponding amounts of money) whereas the 12 small states together received only 2 visits. The National Popular Vote bill would make a vote cast in Alaska as important as a vote cast in Ohio.

The winner-take-all rule is an especially bad deal for small red states. In 2004, John Kerry won 21 electoral votes from his 444,115-vote lead in the six non-competitive Democratic small states, whereas George W. Bush won only 19 electoral votes from his 650,421-vote lead in the six non-competitive Republican small states. The reason is that the small red states are redder than the blue states are blue. In 2004, the six small red states averaged 65% Republican whereas the Democrats carried three of their six small states with a slender 54% margin, and two more with only 60%.

The National Popular Vote bill is law in Hawaii. It has passed six state legislative chambers in Delaware, Maine, Rhode Island, and Vermont.

For additional information, see section 10.2 of the book, Every Vote Equal: A State-Based Plan for Electing the President by National Popular Vote.

3. The National Popular Vote Bill Does Not Stifle Alaska's Voice, But Instead Would Give Alaska Voters their Rightful Voice in Presidential Elections

The purpose of a presidential election is to elect someone to serve for four years as the nation's chief executive — not to send a group of unknown loyal party activists to a half-hour meeting in Juneau in mid-December for the ceremonial purpose of casting the state's electoral votes.

At the present time, presidential candidates ignore Alaska voters and Alaska issues Alaska because of the winner-take-all rule (i.e., awarding all of a state's electoral votes to the candidate who receives the most popular votes in each state). Under the current winner-take-all system, candidates only pay attention to issues concerning states where they are able to win or lose electoral votes. Neither party currently has anything to gain or lose in Alaska in a presidential campaign.

The National Popular Vote bill provides a way to make a vote in Alaska as valuable as a vote in a closely divided battleground state such as Ohio or New Hampshire. Tiny New Hampshire, for example, received 12 of the 300 post-convention visits from the 2008 candidates, while12 other non-competitive small states received virtually no attention.

The bill accomplishes this goal by guaranteeing enough votes in the Electoral College (at least 270 of 538) to the candidate who receives the most popular votes in all 50 states (and DC).

The essence of a nationwide popular vote for President is that the winner would be determined by the popular vote of the people in all 50 states — not by the separate state-by-state outcomes.

Ultimately, the choice is whether it is more important for the winner in a particular state to receive the state's electoral votes or for the winner of the entire country to win the White House.

70% of Alaska voters in a 2010 poll agreed that that the President of the United States should be the candidate who receives the most popular votes in all 50 states. In Utah (where support was also 70%), we asked an additional question, namely

> "Do you think it more important that a state's electoral votes be cast for the presidential candidate who receives the most popular votes in that state, or is it more important to guarantee that the candidate who receives the most popular votes in all 50 states becomes president?"

When asked this question, 66% Utah voters supported a national popular vote.

When a voter watches presidential election returns on election night, they are, first and foremost, interested in finding out their candidate won the Presidency. The question of whether their candidate won their state, county, city, or precinct is a secondary concern.

A McCain voter would certainly prefer to see John McCain in the White House, as opposed to seeing three Republican party activists travel to Juneau in mid-December to perform the ceremonial function of casting Alaska's three electoral votes for McCain.

4. There is No Evidence that Ordinary Plurality Voting Creates a Proliferation of Candidates or Permits Candidates to Win with Small Percentages (Such as 15%) of the Vote

Based on actual historical evidence, there is far more fragmentation of the vote under the current state-by-state winner-take-all system of electing the President than in ordinary elections in which the winner is the candidate who receives the most popular votes.

Under the current state-by-state winner-take-all system of electing the President (in which the candidate who receives a plurality of the popular vote wins all of the state's electoral votes), minor-party candidates have significantly affected the outcome in 40% (6 out of 15) of the presidential elections in the past 60 years. Specifically, minor-party candidates affected the outcome in the 1948, 1968, 1980, 1992, 1996, and 2000 presidential elections. Segregationists such as Strom Thurmond (1948) and George Wallace (1968) won 39 and 46 electoral votes, respectively. Candidates such as John Anderson (1980), Ross Perot (1992 and 1996), and Ralph Nader (2000) managed to affect the national outcome by switching electoral votes in numerous individual states. The reason that the current system has so frequently encouraged minor-party candidacies is that a third-party candidate has 51 separate opportunities to shop around for a particular state that he might shift from one major party to another or win outright.

In contrast, the winning candidate in 91% of the 905 gubernatorial elections in the same 60-year period received an absolute majority of the votes. The winning candidate received less than 45% of the popular vote in only 2% of the elections and received less than 40% in only 1% of the elections. No winning candidate received less than 35% of the popular vote.

Ordinary plurality voting rewards the formation of broad coalitions in which various groups and interests join together in order to win the most votes. The reason is that a vote cast for a splinter candidate generally produces the politically counter-productive effect of helping the major-party candidate whose views are diametrically opposite to those of the voter. For example, votes cast for Bob Barr (the Libertarian Party candidate) in 2008 made it easier for Barack Obama to win North Carolina, and votes cast for Ralph Nader (the Green Party candidate) in 2000 made it easier for George W. Bush to win Florida and New Hampshire.

It should be noted that, under the current system, no state requires that a presidential candidate receive an absolute majority of the popular votes in order to receive all of its electoral votes. Moreover, there is no requirement, under the current system, that a candidate receive an absolute majority of the popular vote nationwide in order to become President. For example, Truman (1948), Kennedy (1960), Nixon (1968), or Clinton (1992 and 1996) were elected with less than an absolute majority of the popular votes.

5. Candidates Would Campaign in Alaska Under a National Popular Vote Because Every Vote Would Matter

It is sometimes argued that some states are too small to attract the attention of presidential candidates. However, the reality is that candidates always go after every vote that matters.

For example, even though the 2nd congressional district of Nebraska contains a tiny percentage of the nation's population, both parties paid attention to the 2nd district because Nebraska awards electoral votes by congressional district, and the 2nd district was closely divided. Sarah Palin visited the 2nd district. Meanwhile, neither campaign paid any attention to Nebraska's 1st and 3rd congressional districts (or to the adjacent states of Kansas, Wyoming, and South Dakota). When votes matter, candidates vigorously solicit them.

It is sometimes argued that big cities would control a national popular election, using examples such as Los Angeles and Chicago. The fact is that a candidate cannot even win California by concentrating on Los Angeles. Ronald Reagan, George Deukmejian, Pete Wilson, and Arnold Schwarzenegger never came close to carrying Los Angeles (or San Francisco, San Jose, or Oakland). If big cities controlled elections, John Kerry (who carried Cleveland) would have won the White House by carrying Ohio in 2004 and Martha Coakley (who carried Boston) would have been elected Senator from Massachusetts.

It is also sometimes argued that candidates would find it more efficient to concentrate on big cities.

However, the facts are that candidates can get considerably more "bang for the buck" by campaigning in low-population areas because TV advertising (the biggest component of campaign costs) is premium-priced in high-population areas. It is, for example, considerably more expensive to buy television or radio time to reach Ohio's 11 million people than to buy television or radio time to reach the 11 million people who live in the 12 smallest non-competitive states, namely the six "red" states of Alaska, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, North Dakota, and South Dakota and the six "blue" states of Hawaii, Maine, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, and the District of Columbia.

It should be noted that the populations of the 50 largest cities together constitute only 19% of the nation's population. Arlington, Texas is the nation's 50th largest city (with a population of about 350,000).

Further evidence of the way a nationwide presidential campaign would be run comes from the way that national advertisers conduct nationwide sales campaigns. National advertisers seek out customers in small, medium-sized, and large towns of every small, medium-sized, and large state. National advertisers do not advertise only in big cities. Instead, they go after every potential customer, regardless of where the customer is located.

People are left out of presidential campaigns, under the current system, because of the state-by-state winner-take-all rule. Candidates have no reason to pay any attention to voters who do not live in closely divided battleground states. Under a national popular vote, every vote would be equal, and every vote would matter.

6. Myths about Recounts

Recounts would be far less likely to occur under a national popular vote system than under the current state-by-state winner-take-all system (i.e., awarding all of a state's electoral votes to the candidate who receives the most popular votes in each separate state).

The reason is that, under the current winner-take-all system, there are 51 separate opportunities for recounts in every presidential election. Thus, our nation's 56 presidential elections have really been 2,084 separate state-level elections. There have been five litigated counts in the nation's 56 presidential elections. The current system has repeatedly created artificial crises in which the vote has been extremely close in particular states, while not close on a nationwide basis.

The 2000 presidential election was an artificial crisis created because of Bush's lead of 537 popular votes in Florida. Given the miniscule number of votes that are changed by a typical recount (averaging only 274 votes), no one would have requested a recount in 2000 if Gore's 537,179-vote nationwide margin had controlled the outcome.

There was a recount, a court case, and a reversal of the original outcome in Hawaii in 1960. There were disputed statewide counts in the 19th Century in Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida.

Based on a recent study, the probability of a recount is 1 in 332 elections (23 recounts in 7,645 elections). The average change in the margin of victory as a result of a recount was a mere 274 votes. The original outcome remained unchanged in over 90% of the recounts.

A national popular vote would reduce the probability of a recount from five instances in 56 presidential elections to one instance in 332 elections (that is, once in 1,328 years). In fact, the reduction would be even greater because a close result is less likely to occur as the size of the jurisdiction increases.

If anyone is genuinely concerned about minimizing the possibility of recounts, then a single national pool of votes provides a way to drastically reduce the likelihood of recounts and eliminate the artificial crises that are regularly produced by the current state-level winner-take-all system.

In terms of logistics, all states routinely make arrangements for a recount in advance of every election. A recount is a recognized contingency that is occasionally required in the course of conducting elections, and recounts do indeed occur about once in every 332 elections. The personnel and resources necessary to conduct a recount are indigenous to each state. A state's ability to conduct a recount inside its own borders is unrelated to whether a recount is occurring in another state.

In terms of certainty, existing federal law specifies that each state's own "final determination" of its presidential election returns is "conclusive" (if done in a timely manner and in accordance with laws in existence prior to Election Day). The National Popular Vote compact is directly patterned after this existing federal law and requires each state to treat as "conclusive" each other state's "final determination" of its vote for President. No state will get involved in judging the election returns of another state.

Of course, the possibility of recounts should not even be a consideration in debating the merits of a national popular vote. No one has ever suggested that the possibility of a recount constitutes a valid reason why state governors or U.S. Senators, for example, should not be elected by a popular vote.

Re: Senate Bill 92 imposing the Koze electoral scheme

Attached please find my remarks in opposition to the Senate Bill 92 which would impose the Koza electoral scheme on the current American electoral process.

In addition, I would ask that the following 10 questions be posed to those who support the Koza scheme and that their answers be recorded for the record.

Under the Koza scheme:

1. How would Alaska cast it's electoral votes in an election in which the popular vote as tabulated by the media differed from the popular vote as tabulated by the Congressional Quarterly? [For example, in 1960 the Alabama Democratic electoral college slate included five electors pledged to Byrd and eleven to Kennedy. The media allocated all the popular votes cast in Alabama for that electoral slate to Kennedy, thereby concluding the Kennedy won the national popular vote; the Congressional Quarterly, however, allocated only five elevenths of the popular vote for the Democratic electoral slate to Kennedy, thereby concluding that Nixon won the national popular vote.]

2. Would Alaska be bound to accept the popular vote tallies from states whose voting standards violated the public policy of Alaska (such as allowing felons or illegal aliens to vote, or inhibiting voting by members of minority groups)?

3. Does the Koza scheme create an national office or officer which would tabulate a final tally of the national popular vote? If not, would that task be delegated to the media? If so, to which particular newspapers or television stations would that task be delegated? Would a tabulation by selected organs of the media confer any legitimacy on whomever the media chose to designate as the popular vote winner, particulary if federal entities such as the Congressional Quarterly disagreed with the manner in which the popular votes reported by each state were tabulated (as they did in 1960)?

4. If the voters of Alaska were to overwhelmingly cast its votes in favor of the electors pledged to a Democratic candidate, which officer in Alaska would be empowered to overule the will of the people of Alaska and dictate that Alaska cast its electoral votes instead to the popular vote loser in Alaska?

5. If Alaska state joined in a Koza conspiracy with other states but later decided to withdraw from that conspiracy, what national organ, if any, would be empowered to enforce the original terms of that conspiracy, and what sanctions would that organ be empowered to administer upon a state which wished to withdraw on public policy grounds?

6. If political parties proliferate (as they inevitably do under plebscite schemes currently imposed in Russia and a number of South American countries) resulting in no one candidate receiving a substantial plurality, what provision is there in the Koza scheme for a run-off? If none, would supporters of the Koza scheme support the election of a candidate receiving only, say, as little as 15% of the popular vote? Would they maintain that such an election was "democratic"?

7. If Koza scheme supporters are willing are willing to abrogate the "Grand Compromise" that brought the nation together at the Constitutional Convention and establish the fundamental foundation of federalism (by guaranteeing all states representation in the Electoral College based on equal representation in the Senate) why do they not also, in the name of "one man one vote" take the more logical first step in dismantling federalism by proposing to abolish the U.S. Senate, surely the more violative of the "one man one vote" principle?

8. When in 1974 the Labor party lost the "popular vote" but nevertheless elected more members to parliament (the British version of the Electoral College) and were thereby able to form the government, would Koza supporters claim that the British election was "undemocratic"?

9. If a popular vote tally was very close (as it was in 1960), would a "recount" be limited to just one state (as it was in 2000), or would recounts be required in every state in over 248,000 voting districts? If such recounts in 50 different states generated lawsuits in all 50 states, thus delaying a final national recount by up to a year (the length of time a recount it has been estimate that a national recount would have taken in 1960), would that be an acceptable outcome under the Koza scheme?

10. What if close popular vote tallies in some states triggered recounts in those states under those states' law, but did not trigger recounts in many other states where the popular vote in those states was not close, how could a national recount even be administered under the Koza scheme with only a few states participating in the recount? What provisions are there in the Koza scheme for one state to force another state to conduct a recount in violation of the other states' recount laws?

The proposed Compact among states to establish direct election of the President does:

1. Violate Section 10 of Article I of the U.S. Constitution which specifically states that "no state shall, without the consent of Congress...enter into any Agreement or Compact with another state..."

2. Undermine American federalism, and constitute a cynical scheme to illegally subvert Section I, Article II of the "U.S. Constitution which guarantees to every state, not just a favored eleven, a number of electors "equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress:..."

3. Cynically by-pass the established amending process set forth in Article V, including the approval of "two thirds of both houses...and the Legislatures of three fourths of the several states..." of any proposed amendment.

4. Diminish the political influence of racial and ethnic minorities in the United States in presidential elections [Ref: testimony of Vernon Jordan, president of the National Urban League at 1979 Congressional Hearings: "Take away the Electoral College and the importance of being black melts away. Blacks, instead of being crucial to victory in major states, simply become 10% of the electorate, with reduced impact"]

5. Subvert the "Grand Compromise" entered into by the Founding Fathers at the Constitutional Convention as the basis for federalism and our national union, the two prongs of which were: 1) the equal representation of each state in the Senate along with popular representation in the House, and 2) a number of presidential electors based on the number of representatives to which they were entitled in both the Senate and the House [Ref: statement of Senator John F. Kennedy in 1956 in opposition to a Republican proposal to abolish the Electoral College: "It is not only the unit vote for the presidency we are talking about, but a whole solar system of governmental power. If it is proposed to change the balance of power of one of the elements of the solar system, it is necessary to consider the others." (In other words, abolishing the U.S. Senate).]

6. Result in the chronic election of candidates who are supported by only a minority of the popular electorate by weakening the two party system and encouraging encourage splinter parties, eventually generating into a prolonged run-off system under which two minor party candidates enjoying little overall popular support can win the presidency despite being opposed by the vast majority of the electorate.[Ref: note the 1993 Russian multi-party "popular" vote election in which the electorate came within a whisker of being presented with a "runoff" choice between Fascists and Communists, despite the fact that 80% of the electoral opposed both].

7. Compromise the intention of the Founding Fathers that national support for a presidential candidate be broad as well as deep. The need to create concurrent pluralities throughout the United States would be eliminated and replaced by a myopic focus on population centers largely found in coastal areas.

8. Doom the United States to a destabilizing electoral crisis in every election in which the popular vote is close. When the electoral vote is close, as in 2000 (but which occurs only once every hundred years), the recount is isolated to one state. In a so-called "popular vote" election, a recount would be required in every one of 170,000 voting precincts and hamlets nationwide, enormously magnifying crises such as that endured in 2000. After the inevitable multiple lawsuits were filed, every recount would doubtlessly show a different result.

9. Wipe out the influence of "swing" states such as Colorado in the presidential election contest, as well as require Colorado to cast its electoral votes in direct opposition to the will expressed by the Colorado voters when the national popular vote plurality was different from that in Colorado.

10. Violate the Colorado Constitution (Schedule Provisions, Sec. 20) which mandates that "The general assembly shall provide that after the year eighteen hundred and seventy-six the electors of the electoral college shall be chosen by direct vote of the people."

TOP SEVEN MYTHS UPON WHICH THE KOZA SCHEME IS BASED

Myth 1. The Koza scheme is constitutionally sound.

Facts: The Art I, Section 10(3), specifically forbids any from entering "into any agreement or compact with another state" without the consent of Congress. Although the Supreme Court has upheld narrowly drawn agreements resolving actual disputes between states, such as over water rights, etc., it has NEVER upheld any scheme, compact, or agreement or conspiracy between the states which would reformulate federalism, the structure of the federal government, or the constitutional process for electing a president.

Myth 2: Without a constitutional amendment or federal legislation appointing a national officer with responsibility for conducting a tally of popular votes cast nationwide, it would be possible for a "chief election officer" to conduct a national tally of popular votes by delegating the task to newspapers or other state election officials.

FACTS: Without a constitutional amendment or federal legislation it would be impossible for any given state election official to conduct a "national tally" of popular votes, particular the popular votes in states which only offer electoral slates including electors pledged to more than one candidate (as was the case in Alabama in 1960).

MYTH 3. In the case of a presidential election in which the popular vote is very close and a recount were demanded, there is a way that a Koza state could force a non-Koza state to conduct a recount, even if such a recount were contrary to the law in the non-Koza state.

FACTS: There exists no provision in the U.S. Constitution whereby one state can force another state to violate its own election laws or to otherwise enforce any agreement, compact, or conspiracy.

MYTH 4. The two party system would continue under a Koza Scheme.

FACTS: One need only look at elections in countries which have neither an Electoral College of parliamentary (the functional equivalent of an Electoral College) to see that parties proliferate in their absence. (See, e.g. the 'popular vote" elections in Russia, Mexico, etc.) As a socialist testified at the 1977 congressional hearings on abolishing the Electoral College: "We thing we "(splinter) parties had in common was an absolute detestation of the Electoral College...We always started with 5 to 6 per cent who said they were for Norman Thomas.. By election day was that there was no chance for victory in any state..."

MYTH 5. Under a Koza scheme, presidential campaigns would be more likely to campaign in under populated states.

FACTS: Under the Electoral College, candidates have an incentive to visit small states since, as in 2000, even the smallest states have electoral votes which can determine the winner in an election. Under the Koza scheme, the incentive would be to campaign only in the areas of the greatest concentration of population in order to win the most popular votes.

MYTH 6. Elections in which the popular vote is close occus on average only once in "362" years, so there need be no concern about recounts would be conducted under Koza (which has no provision at all for a nationwide recount). In 1960, Kennedy "won" the popular vote by 118,000 votes.

FACTS: Kennedy's popular vote margin was reported by the media based on counting all of the popular votes cast in Alabama for both unpledged electors and electors pledged in to Byrd. According to the Congressional Quarterly, however, only five elevenths of the popular votes cast for Democratic electors in Alabama should have been allocated to Kennedy. Under the CQ tally, Nixon won the national popular vote by a handful of popular votes. `As Pierce and Longley's massive study of American elections observed: "It is impossible to determine what Kennedy's voter plurality—if it existed at all—really was."(Emphasis added).

MYTH 7. Under the Electoral College, the "wrong winner" was elected 7% of the time. ("Wrong" being defined as a candidate who won the electoral vote, but not the popular vote).

FACTS: In any parliamentary or Republican democracy, it is possible that the popular vote does not tally precisely with the parliamentary or electoral vote. In 1974 in England, for example, Labor lost the popular vote but gained three more seats in parliament and was able to form the government. Was the labor election "wrong"? A much better example of a "wrong" winner would be in countries such as Russian and Mexico, where the proliferation of parties results in run-off elections between minority candidates who are opposed by the vast majority of the people.

The only elections in which the popular vote did not match the electoral vote were in 1888 and 2000. (The election of 1876 was decided by a "bi-partisan electoral commission" compromise without regard to either the electoral or the popular vote). (Perhaps the Koza myth makers are counting the election of 1960, though this seems unlikely given that they have chosen to adopt the media's tally of popular votes instead of the tally conducted by the Congressional Quarterly.)

STATE OF ALASKA
SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Hearing on SB 92:
An Act ratifying an interstate compact to elect the President and Vice-President of the United States by national popular vote
February 19, 2010

Submitted By: Tara Ross
Author of Enlightened Democracy: The Case for the Electoral College

Full Testimony

The bill before you, SB 92, represents the latest attempt to eliminate America's unique and successful presidential system. Abolishing the Electoral College would be unhealthy for the country and especially detrimental to small states such as Alaska. But eliminating the Electoral College through this roundabout manner, without going through a formal constitutional amendment process, carries its own special dangers.

Proponents claim the National Popular Vote plan outlined in SB 92 will ensure that all voters receive equal attention because each vote will be weighted equally. But the truth is the precise opposite. NPV will lessen the need of presidential candidates to obtain the support of voters in rural areas and in less densely populated states such as Alaska.

Problems Created by NPV

The plan proposed by NPV is fraught with difficulties—some logistical, some philosophical. I will discuss these latter issues—arguments "for" and "against" the Electoral College—in a moment. But the logistical difficulties of changing the presidential election process without a constitutional amendment need to be fully explored.

The compact contemplated by SB 92 would give the presidency to the candidate winning the "largest national popular vote total." Note that it says the "largest" total. It is not looking for a majority winner. It is not even looking for a minimum plurality. Thus, a candidate could win with only 15 percent of votes nationwide. But it gets worse. Under this scheme, Alaska could be forced to award its entire slate of electors to a candidate who was not on its own ballot. What if voters in New York and Massachusetts throw all their weight behind one regional candidate? That person may not be on the ballot in a state like Alaska, but all 3 electors from Alaska would be given to that Northeastern regional candidate if that candidate obtains any winning (albeit small) plurality.

Alaska probably did not nominate a slate of electors for the third-party candidate in this example. But don't worry. NPV's compact allows the winning candidate to select his own slate. Perhaps he would select three New Yorkers to represent Alaska in the Electoral College vote. He'd hate to be undermined by a "faithless" Alaska elector, determined to vote for the choice of Alaskan voters.

There are other inconsistencies among states' ballots that would skew the election results. Some states allow felons to vote. States such as Alaska do not. States differ in their requirements for ballot qualification. Inevitably, Alaska would have to abide by national election results derived from policies with which it disagrees.

I wish I were done, but I am not. It gets even worse. States have different criteria for what does (or does not) trigger recounts within their borders. These differences could cause a whole host of problems. What if the national total is close—close enough to warrant a recount—but a recount can't be conducted because the margins in individual states were not close? Or perhaps recounts are conducted, but only in two or three states, each with a different idea of how to count a hanging chad. Perhaps a fourth state would see what is going on and choose to conduct a recount that its statutes previously deemed optional. Maybe this fourth state has a different definition of "hanging chad," and its sole goal is to counteract the efforts of the other states.

Such a state of affairs invites chaos, litigation, and confusion each and every election year. Some voters will be disenfranchised by the widely differing ideas of how to count a vote.

What if such problems caused one state to pull out of the compact in violation of its terms? How would compliance be enforced? How much litigation would ensue before the presidential election could be resolved?

Formally eliminating the Electoral College through a constitutional amendment would be unhealthy for the country. But NPV's efforts to skirt the constitutional amendment process altogether would create added difficulties. These logistical nightmares could haunt the country each and every presidential election year.

The Benefits of the Electoral College

I do not mean to imply that the only problem with NPV is its logistical difficulties. Eliminating the Electoral College would do serious harm to a country as diverse as our own. The system provides our country with many great benefits that tend to remain unnoticed and thus unappreciated by most Americans.

The history of the Electoral College must be understood if its benefits are to be appreciated. The delegates to the Constitutional Constitution had to reconcile two seemingly irreconcilable goals: They wanted the people to govern themselves, but they also wanted to ensure that minority interests could not be completely ignored by the majority. A pure democracy would not accomplish their objective. In a pure democracy, 51 percent of the people rule the other 49 percent all the time, without exception. If we lived in a pure democracy, imagine what could happen in the wake of an event like 9/11. A bare majority could enact any law it desired, even if that law was tyrannical, racist, or penalized some people for their religious beliefs.

The Founders decided not to create a pure democracy. Instead, they created a Constitution that tempered its democratic aspects with republican and federalist characteristics. Constitutional safeguards such as the Senate (with its one state, one vote representation), the presidential veto, supermajority requirements to amend the Constitution, and the Electoral College allow the majority to rule, but only while they act reasonably. Minority political interests, particularly the small states, are protected.

The Electoral College provides three benefits that still protect Americans today.

The Benefits of Federalism

Electoral College opponents argue that presidential elections are undemocratic. They are wrong. America holds 51 purely democratic elections each presidential election year (one in each state and one in D.C.). Such a process combines democracy and federalism into one process. The result is that candidates can't win unless they build nationwide support.

Obama can't rely solely on big cities in California. Republicans can't rely solely on Texas. They must win simultaneous, concurrent majorities nationwide. They can't achieve those victories unless they reach out to a wide variety of voters. They will fail if they rely upon isolated pockets of support in one region or among voters in one special interest group.

Many dispute that our system creates national coalition-building, arguing that it instead causes a disproportionate focus on mid-sized "swing" states. These arguments appear true if we focus on one or a handful of election years in isolation. But if we look at the states' full histories of voting, we see that the identity of "swing" and "safe" states changes all the time. West Virginia, for example, was considered a safe Democrat state for years. Since 2000, however, it has been voting Republican. Likewise, California is often viewed as irreversibly Democrat, but it voted for Republican candidate George H.W. Bush as recently as 1988. Texas used to be as undeniably Democrat as it is Republican today. States such as Georgia, Kentucky, and Louisiana all voted for Bill Clinton in the 1990s, but they were considered very safe Republican states in 2008.

Ultimately, the Electoral College ensures that the political parties must reach out to all the states. As a matter of history, no political party has ever been able to ignore any state for too long without feeling the ramifications at the polls.

Moderation and Compromise

The most likely consequence of a change to a direct popular vote is the breakdown of the two-party system. Today, third-party candidates do not receive much support. In a direct popular election, everything changes. A vote for Ross Perot or Ralph Nader is no longer "wasted," and the number of presidential candidates would increase drastically. Voters would fracture their votes across many candidates. The result will be lower vote totals per candidate and an increased likelihood that two or more candidates will have close popular vote totals. Recounts would proliferate. Worse, extremist candidates could more easily sway an election, because no candidate is required to obtain majority support. This problem is exacerbated by the fact that SB 92 does not include a run-off provision. Electoral votes are given to the winner of any plurality—even a very small one.

NPV proponents argue that the President should have the support of most Americans. But in real life, "most" Americans will never agree on their ideal candidate. Individuals' opinions differ too greatly. Given the general inability to obtain majority consensus (or even the consensus of a large plurality), the Electoral College provides the country with the next best alternative. Electing Presidents by states' electoral votes, rather than individuals' votes, creates a method of electing a President who is a good compromise candidate for most Americans, as represented by their states. The Electoral College requires moderation, compromise, and coalition-building from any candidate before he can be successful.

Stability and Certainty in Elections.

The Electoral College encourages stability and certainty in our political system. Events such as those that occurred in 2000 are rare. The Electoral College typically produces quick and undisputed election outcomes for two reasons: First, the system (in combination with the winner-take-all rule) tends to magnify the margin of victory, giving the victor a certain and demonstrable election outcome. Such certainty couldn't be provided by a direct popular election. Popular votes are often close, and these close votes would result in constant litigation and recounts. Second, the system controls the impact of fraud and error. In part, this is because it is difficult to predict where stolen votes will make a difference to the national outcome. But if one person can identify a problematic state (think Ohio in 2004), then, in all likelihood, everyone knows and that area is closely watched. It becomes harder to steal votes. To the degree that fraud and errors do occur, the Electoral College makes it possible to isolate the problem to one or a handful of states. The country is given a clear set of problems to resolve one way or another before moving on to a definitive election outcome.

Conclusion

The Electoral College is an important safeguard in our constitutional system of checks and balances, and it is critical to the success of our nation's republican democracy. I urge you to protect the Electoral College by voting "no" on SB 92.

Senator McGuire,

I am writing to ask you to support the National Popular Vote bill (SB92), currently under consideration by the Senate Judiciary Committee.
It is plainly obvious that the candidate who gets the most votes should become President.

This is not only fairer than the current way, but it would make candidates more likely to visit Alaska during the election cycle.

Hollis,

I've read about the plan to elect the President by a nationwide popular vote (SB92), and I think it is an idea that has demonstrated its necessity since the 2000 election cycle. This is the way we fill other offices. The Electoral College method is a thing of the past.

I'm pleased to know that you support this bill and look forward to moving this bill moving out of committee.

Thank you for considering my opinion.

Recounts in Presidential Elections in Connection with the National Popular Vote Bill

(SB 92)

Hon. Hollis French, Chair
Senate Judiciary Committee
Alaska State Senate
State Capitol
Juneau, AK 99801

Dear Senator French,

This letter comments on recounts in presidential elections in connection with the National Popular Vote bill.

- Recounts would be far less likely under a National Popular Vote than under the current state-by-state winner-take-all system (section 1).
- The current state-by-state winner-take-all system is a not a firewall that helpfully isolates recounts to particular states, but, instead, is the repeated cause of unnecessary artificial crises (section 2).
- Resolution of all disputes relating to a presidential election must, under current federal law, be completed prior to the meeting of the Electoral College in mid-December, which is constitutionally required to be held on the same day in all 50 states (section 3).
- A recount is conducted by personnel indigenous to each state, and no state needs the help of any other state in order to conduct its own recount (section 4).
- No state is put in the position of judging election returns from other states under the National Popular Vote bill (section 5).
- Under a national popular vote, there would be less incentive for fraud and mischief, and less drastic consequences for whatever fraud and mischief does occur (section 6).
- The currently existing schedule for the "final determination" of presidential election results (established by current federal law) and the triggers for recounts should be improved; however, these changes are far more urgently needed for the current state-by-state winner-take-all system than for the National Popular Vote system (section 7).

1. Recounts would be far less likely under a National Popular Vote than under the current state-by-state winner-take-all system.

Recounts in presidential elections would be far less likely to occur under a national popular vote system than under the current state-by-state winner-take-all system (i.e., awarding all of a state's electoral votes to the candidate who receives the most popular votes in each separate state).

In fact, if the President were elected from a single nationwide pool of votes, one would expect a recount once in 332 elections, or once in 1,328 years.

Based on a recent study of 7,645 statewide elections in the 26-year period from 1980 through 2006 by FairVote,[1] the probability of a recount is 1 in 332 elections (23 recounts in 7,645 elections). Thus, with 420 statewide races on the ballot in 2006, there was one statewide recount (the Vermont State Auditor's race). Similarly, there was one recount in 2004 (the Washington state governor) and one in 2008 (the U.S. Senate race in Minnesota).

Under the current state-by-state winner-take-all system, there are 51 separate opportunities for recounts in every presidential election. Thus, our nation's 56 presidential elections have really been 2,084 separate state-level elections. In this group of 2,084 separate elections, there have been five seriously disputed counts. The current system has repeatedly created artificial crises in which the vote has been extremely close in particular states, while not close on a nationwide basis. Note that five seriously disputed counts out of the 2,084 separate state-level elections is closely in line with the historically observed probability of 1 in 332.

A national popular vote would reduce the probability of a recount from five instances in 56 presidential elections to one instance in 332 elections (that is, once in 1,328 years).

A good way to visualize this is to think of the chance of a recount as loading one bullet into a 332-chamber gun. Under a national popular vote, the gun is fired once every 4 years. We can therefore expect a recount once in 332 elections, or once in 1,328 years. In contrast, under the current system, the gun is fired 51 times every 4 years. Therefore, we should not be surprised to have had five seriously disputed counts out of the 2,084 separate state-level elections.

The 2000 presidential election was an artificial crisis created because of Bush's lead of 537 popular votes in Florida. Gore's nationwide lead was 537,179 popular votes (1,000 times larger). Given the miniscule number of votes that are changed by a typical statewide recount (averaging only 274 votes), no one would have requested a recount or disputed the results in 2000 if the national popular vote had controlled the outcome. Indeed, no one (except perhaps almanac writers and trivia buffs) would have cared that one of the candidates happened to have a 537-vote margin in Florida.

There was a recount, a court case, and a reversal of the original outcome in Hawaii in 1960. Kennedy ended up with a 115-vote margin in Hawaii in an election in which his nationwide margin was 118,574.

Samuel Tilden's 3% lead in 1876 was a solid victory in terms of the national popular vote (equal to Bush's solid percentage lead in the 2004 election). However, an artificial crisis was created because of the razor-thin margin of 889 votes in South Carolina, 922 in Florida, and 4,807 in Louisiana. No one would have cared who received more votes in these closely divided states if the President had been elected by a nationwide popular vote.

In fact, the reduction of the chance of a presidential recount would be even greater than stated above because a close result is less likely to occur as the size of the jurisdiction increases. Indeed, only two of the 23 recounts among the 7,645 statewide elections in the 26-year period from 1980 through 2006 were in big states.

Critics of a national popular vote have argued that there could be an extremely close nationwide count in the future (and historical data indeed indicate that there would be one such extremely close election every 1,328 years). However, because about a third of the 50 states are closely divided battleground states even in that rare situation, there would also be, almost inevitably, one or more states with razor-thin popular vote margins. Thus, such an election would also be controversial under the current system.

The average change in the margin of victory as a result of a recount was a mere 274 votes. The original outcome remained unchanged in over 90% of the recounts.

It is important to note that the question of recounts comes to mind in connection with presidential elections only because the current system so frequently creates artificial crises and unnecessary disputes.

More importantly, the possibility of a recount should not even be a consideration in debating the merits of a national popular vote. No one has ever suggested that the possibility of a recount constitutes a valid reason why state governors or U.S. Senators, for example, should not be elected by a popular vote.

2. The current state-by-state winner-take-all system is a not a firewall that helpfully isolates recounts to particular states, but, instead, is the repeated cause of unnecessary artificial crises.

It is sometimes argued that the current state-by-state winner-take-all rule acts as a helpful firewall that helpfully isolates post-election disputes to individual close states. In fact, the state-by-state winner-take-all system is not a helpful firewall, but instead the cause of unnecessary fires.

Under the current state-by-state winner-take-all system, there are 51 separate vote pools in every presidential election that matter. Thus, our nation's 56 presidential elections have really been 2,084 separate state-level elections. These 51 separate pools regularly create artificial crises in elections in which the vote is not at all close on a nationwide basis, but close in particular states. This is the reason why there have been five seriously disputed counts in only 56 presidential elections (as listed in section 1).

If anyone is genuinely concerned about minimizing the possibility of recounts, then a single national pool of votes provides a way to drastically reduce the likelihood of recounts and eliminate the artificial crises that are regularly produced by the current state-level winner-take-all system.

3. Resolution of all disputes relating to a presidential election must, under current federal law, be completed prior to the meeting of the Electoral College in mid-December, which is constitutionally required to be held on the same day in all 50 states.

The laws governing the finalization of the count (and completion of any recount) for a presidential election are entirely different than those governing, say, a disputed race for, say, one of the 100 seats in the U.S. Senate (e.g., the 2008 Senate race in Minnesota).

The U.S. Constitution establishes a strict overall national schedule for finalizing the results of a presidential election. These existing provisions would apply to elections conducted under the proposed National Popular Vote legislation in the same way that they apply to elections conducted under the current system.

The U.S. Constitution provides:

> "The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States."[2] [Spelling as per original]

Congress has exercised this constitutional power to set the uniform nationwide date for meeting of the Electoral College.

> "The electors of President and Vice President of each State shall meet and give their votes on the first Monday after the second Wednesday in December next following their appointment at such place in each State as the legislature of such State shall direct."[3]

Under both the current system and the National Popular Vote approach, all counting, recounting, and judicial proceedings must be conducted so as to reach a "final determination" prior to the uniform nationwide date for the meeting of the Electoral College in mid-December.

The U.S. Supreme Court has made it clear that the states are expected to make their "final determination" six days before the Electoral College meets (the so-called "safe harbor" date established by section 5 of title 3 of the United States Code).

In 2008, the "safe harbor" date was December 8, and the Electoral College meeting date was December 15.

It may be argued that the schedule established by the U.S. Constitution, existing federal statutes, and existing state statutes may sometimes rush the count (and may possibly even create injustice). However, there can be no argument that this schedule exists in the U.S. Constitution, federal statutes, and state statutes and that this existing schedule guarantees "finality" prior to the meeting of the Electoral College in mid-December. The existing constitutional and statutory schedule would govern the National Popular Vote compact in exactly the same way that it governs elections under the current system.

[2] U.S. Constitution. Article II, section 1, clause 4.

[3] United States Code. Title 3, chapter 1, section 7.

4. A recount is conducted by personnel indigenous to each state, and no state needs the help of any other state in order to conduct its own recount.

A recount is not an unimaginable horror or a logistical impossibility. All Secretaries of State routinely have plans in place for a recount in advance of every election. A recount is a recognized contingency that is occasionally required in the course of conducting elections, and recounts do indeed occur about once in every 332 statewide elections.

No state needs the help of any other state in order to conduct its own recount. The personnel and resources necessary to conduct a recount are indigenous to each state. Thus, a state's ability to conduct a recount inside its own borders is unrelated to whether a recount is being conducted in another state.

Under both the current system and the National Popular Vote approach, all counting, recounting, and judicial proceedings must be conducted so as to reach a "final determination" prior to the uniform nationwide date for the meeting of the Electoral College in mid-December.

In fact, the U.S. Supreme Court has made it clear that the states are expected to make their "final determination" six days before the Electoral College meets (the so-called "safe harbor" date established by section 5 of title 3 of the United States Code).

Because all states must finalize their count (or finish their recount) by the "safe harbor" date in early December, and because the only remaining step required by the National Popular Vote bill is adding up the vote totals from all 50 states and the District of Columbia, the final national vote totals will be available six days before the Electoral College meets.

5. No state is put in the position of judging election returns from other states under the National Popular Vote bill.

Existing federal law specifies that each state's own "final determination" of its presidential election returns is "conclusive" (if done in a timely manner and in accordance with laws in existence prior to Election Day). The wording of the National Popular Vote compact is directly patterned after this existing federal law and requires each state to treat as "conclusive" each other state's "final determination" of its presidential vote.

The "safe harbor" provision of federal law specifies the conditions under which a state's "final determination" is considered "conclusive."

> "If any State shall have provided, by laws enacted prior to the day fixed for the appointment of the electors, for its final determination of any controversy or contest concerning the appointment of all or any of the electors of such State, by judicial or other methods or procedures, and such determination shall have been made at least six days before the time fixed for the meeting of the electors, such determination made pursuant to such law so existing on said day, and made at least six days prior to said time of meeting of the electors, shall be conclusive, and shall govern in the counting of the electoral votes as provided in the Constitution, and as hereinafter regulated, so far as the ascertainment of the electors appointed by such State is concerned."[4]

The fifth clause of article III of the National Popular Vote compact provides:

[4] United States Code. Section 5 of title 3, chapter 1.

> "The chief election official of each member state shall treat as conclusive an official statement containing the number of popular votes in a state for each presidential slate made by the day established by federal law for making a state's final determination conclusive as to the counting of electoral votes by Congress."

In short, no state has any power to judge the presidential election returns of any other state under either the National Popular Vote compact or the current system.

6. Under a national popular vote, there would be less incentive for fraud and mischief, and less drastic consequences for whatever fraud and mischief does occur.

The potential for political fraud and mischief is not uniquely associated with either the current system or a national popular vote. In fact, the current state-by-state winner-take-all system magnifies the incentive for fraud and mischief because all of a state's electoral votes are awarded to the candidate who receives a bare plurality of the votes in each state.

Under the current system, the national outcome can be affected by mischief in one of the closely divided battleground states (e.g., by placing insufficient or defective voting equipment into the other party's precincts, by selectively and overzealously purging voter rolls). The ill-advised use of the butterfly ballot by a Democratic election official in one county in Florida cost Gore an estimated 6,000 votes — far more than the 537 popular votes that he needed to carry Florida and win the White House in 2000. However, an incident involving 6,000 votes would have been a mere footnote if the nationwide count had governed the presidential election (where Gore's margin was 537,179).

Senator Birch Bayh (D–Indiana) summed up the concerns about possible fraud in a 1979 Senate speech by saying:

> "One of the things we can do to limit fraud is to limit the benefits to be gained by fraud. Under a direct popular vote system, one fraudulent vote wins one vote in the return. In the electoral college system, one fraudulent vote could mean 45 electoral votes."[5]

In the 1950s and 1960s, accusations of voter fraud by both political parties were commonplace in Illinois and various other states. In 1960, a switch of 4,430 votes in Illinois and a switch of 4,782 votes in South Carolina would have given Nixon a majority of the electoral votes. However, 4,430 votes in Illinois were only a focus of controversy in 1960 because of the statewide winner-take-all rule. John F. Kennedy led Richard M. Nixon by 118,574 popular votes nationwide. So, four thousand votes in two states would not have been decisive in 1960 in terms of changing the national popular vote. If Nixon had carried Illinois and South Carolina in 1960, he would have won a majority of the votes in the Electoral College without receiving a majority of the popular votes nationwide.

7. The currently existing schedule for the "final determination" of presidential election results (established by current federal law) and the triggers for recounts should be improved; however, these changes are far more urgently needed for the current state-by-state winner-take-all system than for the National Popular Vote system.

As discussed in section 1, recounts in presidential elections would be far less likely to occur under a national popular vote system than under the current state-by-state winner-take-all system (i.e., awarding all of a state's electoral votes to the candidate who receives the most popular votes in each separate state). Under a national popular vote, one can expect a recount once in 332 elections, or once in 1,328 years.

Having said that, the current schedule for the "final determination" of the results of a presidential election (established by current federal law) and the triggers for recounts should be improved in the following five ways.

First, Congressman David Price of North Carolina has filed bills in Congress in recent years (e.g., J.R. 1579 in 2005) to move the meeting of the Electoral College from the first Monday after the second Wednesday in December to January 2 (or January 3 if January 2 is a Sunday). This change would add 17 (or 18) days to the period available to the states to make their "final determination" of presidential election results.

Second, we believe that federal law should be amended to say that a state must complete its initial count of votes for President no later than two weeks after election day (i.e., the schedule already required by Minnesota and some other states).

Third, we believe that federal law should be amended to give the presidential candidate himself (or herself) the unconditional right to initiate a recount immediately after the initial count, with such a recount being paid for by the presidential candidate. According to Election Line,[6] a candidate already has an unconditional right to initiate a recount in 25 states and a conditional right to do so in 14 additional states.

Fourth, because time is of the essence in resolving disputes involving presidential elections, no time should be sacrificed by perfunctory (and often cosmetic) "automatic recounts" (unless they can be directed at the specific issues that must be decided in a particular race).

Fifth, because time is of the essence in resolving disputes involving presidential elections, we believe that federal law should be amended to give the presidential candidate the right to initiate the "contest" phase of the dispute, without any delay.

Note that the above changes are more urgently needed under the current winner-take-all system than they would be under the National Popular Vote compact, because there are 51 separate opportunities for a recount in every presidential election under the current winner-take-all system, whereas there is only one pool of votes under a national popular vote.

Dear Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee:

I have become aware thru several news reports that SB 92, Popular National Vote is being considered in the Alaska Legislature. There is no doubt that the presidential election process needs revision as many, myself included continue to be baffled that we as Americans elect the president thru just a handful of states instead of a direct national vote.

Please consider carefully as you deliberate on this legislation, as passing SB 92 is the right thing to do.

Thank you.

Dear Senator,

Very glad to see that finally there is a remedy (SB 92, Popular Vote of President) to the current system of electing the President of the United States. The election of the most powerful position should no longer be any different of how we choose other elected officials. Every vote needs to be counted.

Dear Senator French:

I would like to thank you for supporting SB 92, National Popular Vote.

As you know, Alaska has never been a player in presidential elections. But, that could change under SB 92, National Popular Vote legislation in Alaska. With electoral reform like SB 92, Alaska cannot be ignored as candidates will need to visit all the states, not just battleground types that have decided too many elections.

Thanks again for giving Alaska the opportunity to have a voice in presidential politics.

Thank you,

Dear Senator Hollis French,

I recently heard a discussion, this past Saturday on the KBYR AM program, "Citizen's Soap Box" on the National Popular Vote. After a little research, the concept of a popular vote makes a lot of sense.

You don't have to go back very much in our presidential election history to see why the system is broken, ie··· a simple shift of just 60, 000 votes in Ohio in 2004 would have defeated Bush, despite the fact that he had a nationwide lead of 3.5 million votes.

Please pass SB 92, as it's about time the electoral system is fixed.

Sincerely,

Dear Committee,

The National Popular Vote is an issue that has been a topic of discussion this past week on several radio talk shows. The following points makes sense, 1/ the President of the United States should be elected by a national popular vote instead of a winner take all system. 2/the bill in Alaska, SB 92, would according to the nationalpopularvote.com, "enact the proposed interstate compact entitled the "Agreement among the States to Elect the President by National Popular Vote." The compact would take effect only when enacted, in identical form, by states possessing a majority of the membership of the Electoral College (that is 270 of 538 electoral votes)."

So, please support SB 92, as it will finally help reform the Electoral College.

Sincerely,

James Dooley

Chairman French

Dear Senate Judiciary:

I recently read at the national popular vote web site (nationalpopularvote.com) that 70% of Alaskans support the idea that the president of the United States should be the candidate that receives the most popular votes in all 50 states. Another important point of the poll is that support comes from a wide range of political thought, Democrats(78%) , Republicans(66%), Non Partisan(70%), Alaska Independent Party (82%), and among others @ 69%.

Please join the majority of Alaskans and support the National Popular Vote, which is currently being considered in Senate Judiciary as SB 92.

Most sincerely,

Dear Senator French,

I would like to ask your consideration in supporting the proposal to elect the President by a national popular vote in all 50 states (SB92). When we vote for other offices, ie. legislative, mayor, senator, etc....., the candidate who receives the most votes wins and so, it should be for president as well!

Thank you.

SPONSOR STATEMENT: SB 92

Under the National Popular Vote interstate compact, electoral votes which are based on the number of U.S. Representatives and U.S. Senators in each state, would be awarded to the national winner, not the state winner. The U.S. Constitution gives the states exclusive and plenary control over the manner of awarding their electoral votes. The winner-take-all rule is not in the Constitution. The fact that Maine and Nebraska award electoral votes by Congressional district, is a reminder that an amendment to the U.S. Constitution is not required to change the way the President is elected.

As of January 2010, this interstate compact has been joined by Hawaii, Illinois, Maryland, New Jersey, and Washington. Their 61 electoral votes amount to 23% of the 270 votes needed for the compact to take effect. The bill has also passed in one or both houses in many states and has continued to gain support nationally.

Because of the current winner-take-all rule, a candidate can, and has won the Presidency Without winning the Most popular votes nationwide. This has occurred in 4 of the nation's 56 presidential elections (and 1 in 7 of the non-landslide elections). In 2004, A shift of fewer than 60,000 votes in Ohio would have defeated President Bush despite his nationwide lead of 3,500,000 votes.

Another shortcoming of the winner-take-all rule is that presidential candidates have no reason to poll, visit, advertise, or organize in states where they are comfortably ahead or hopelessly behind. In 2008, candidates concentrated over two-thirds of their campaign visits and ad money in just six closely divided "battleground" states. A total of 98% went to just 15 states. In other words, voters in two thirds of the states were essentially spectators to the election.

Under the National Popular Vote Interstate Compact bill, all the electoral votes from the enacting states would be awarded, as a bloc, to the presidential candidate who receives the most popular votes in all 50 states (and DC). The bill would take effect only when enacted by states possessing a majority of the electoral votes — that is, enough electoral votes to elect a President (270 of 538).

SUBJECT: Sectional summary of SB 92 (Work Order No. 26-LS0441/A)

TO: Senator Bettye Davis
Attn: Thomas Obermeyer

FROM: Alpheus Bullard
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional summary of the above-described bill.

As a preliminary matter, note that a sectional summary of a bill should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill and the bill itself is the best statement of its contents. If you would like an interpretation of the bill as it may apply to a particular set of circumstances, please advise.

Section 1. Ratifies an interstate compact to elect the President and Vice- President of the United States by national popular vote. Under the compact and the bill, the presidential candidate who receives the most popular votes in all 50 states and the District of Columbia will win the presidency. Under the compact, all of the state's electoral votes would be awarded to the presidential candidate who receives the most popular votes in all 50 states and the District of Columbia. This compact would take effect only when enacted by states possessing a majority of the electoral votes, that is, enough electoral votes to elect a President, which is 270 of 538 electoral votes.

Sections 2 -5. Conform statutes to the changes made by section one of the bill.

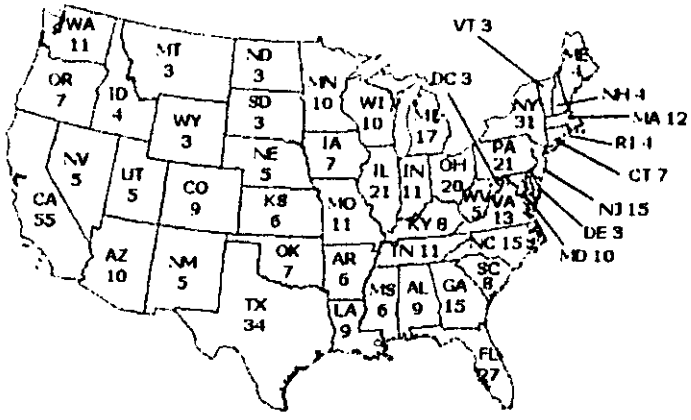
The Electoral College



The U.S. Constitution specifies that the President and Vice President of the United States are to be chosen every four years by a small group of people who are individually referred to as "presidential electors." The electors are collectively referred to as the "Electoral College."

The Constitution specifies that each state is entitled to one member of the Electoral College for each of its U.S. Representatives and U.S. Senators. Today, there are a total of 538 electoral votes in the Electoral College. This total corresponds to the 435 U.S. Representatives from the 50 states plus the 100 U.S. Senators from the 50 states plus the three members of the Electoral College to which the District of Columbia became entitled under the 23rd Amendment (ratified in 1961). Every 10 years, the 435 U.S. Representatives are reapportioned among the states in accordance with the latest federal census, thereby automatically reapportioning the membership of the Electoral College among the states.

Members of the Electoral College are chosen by each state and the District of Columbia on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November in presidential election years. Each political party nominates its own candidates (typically long-standing party activists) for the position of presidential elector.

The 538 members of the Electoral College cast their votes for President and Vice President in meetings held in the 50 state capitals and the District of Columbia in mid-December of presidential election years. If all 538 electors are appointed, 270 electoral votes (i.e., a majority of 538 members of the Electoral College) are required to elect the President and the Vice President.

The three North Dakota members of the Electoral College met on December 15, 2000, in Bismarck to cast their votes for the Bush-Cheney ticket. Gov. John Hoeven (left) observes former Gov. Ed Schafer put his signature to ballot for Electoral College. The other two electors are former state Senator Bryce Streibel of Fressenden and former Lieutenant Governor Rosemarie Myrdal. more

The three Wyoming members of the Electoral College met in December 1996 in Cheyenne to cast their votes for the Robert Dole for President and Jack Kemp for Vice President.

The table below shows the distribution of electoral votes among the 51 jurisdictions that appoint members of the Electoral College. Because each state has two Senators and at least one Representative, no state has fewer than three members of the Electoral College. The states with the most members of the Electoral College are California (55), Texas (34), and New York (31). There are 13 low-population states with three or four members of the Electoral College. The average number of members of the Electoral College per state is about 11.

The date for the meeting of the Electoral College is established by federal election law (United States Code. Title 3, chapter 1, section 7). In 2004, the designated day for the meeting of the Electoral College was Monday, December 13. This statute was enacted in 1934 after the 20th Amendment changed the date for the presidential inauguration from March 4 to January 20.

The people have the right, under the U.S. Constitution, to vote for U.S. Representatives. The 17th Amendment (ratified in 1913) gave the people the right to vote for U.S. Senators (who were elected by state legislatures under the original Constitution). The people, however, have no federal constitutional right to vote for President or Vice President or for their state's members of the Electoral College. Instead, the Constitution (Article II, section 1, clause 2) provides:

> "Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress...."

As the U.S. Supreme Court observed in the 1892 case of McPherson v. Blacker:

> "The constitution does not provide that the appointment of electors shall be by popular vote, nor that the electors shall be voted for upon a general ticket, nor that the majority of those who exercise the elective franchise can alone choose the electors." ...
> "In short, the appointment and mode of appointment of electors belong exclusively to the states under the constitution of the United States."

In 2000, the U.S. Supreme Court in Bush v. Gore reiterated the principle that the people have no federal constitutional right to vote for President or Vice President or for their state's members of the Electoral College..

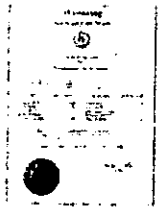
> "The individual citizen has no federal constitutional right to vote for electors for the President of the United States unless and until the state legislature chooses a statewide election as the means to implement its power to appoint members of the Electoral College."

The Constitution's delegation of power to the states to choose the manner of selecting their members of the Electoral College is unusually unconstrained. It contrasts significantly with the limitations contained in the Constitution on state power over the manner of conducting congressional elections (Article II, section 4, clause 1).

> "The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations...."

In a 1919 case involving a state statute entitled "An act granting to women the right to vote for presidential electors," the Maine Supreme Judicial Court wrote (In re Opinion of the Justices):

> "[E]ach state is thereby clothed with the absolute power to appoint electors in such manner as it may see fit, without any interference or control on the part of the federal government, except, of course, in case of attempted discrimination as to race, color, or previous condition of servitude...."



Certificate of Ascertainment showing that Wyoming cast its three electoral votes for the Bush-Cheney ticket because that state received more popular votes in Wyoming than any other state.

2.1 MYTH: The small states would be disadvantaged by a national popular vote.

The small states are the most disadvantaged group of states under the current system.

Although the small states theoretically benefit from receiving two extra electoral votes corresponding to their U.S. Senators, this "bonus" does not, in practice, translate into political power. Political power in presidential elections comes from being a closely divided battleground state—not from the two-vote bonus conferred on the small states in the Electoral College.

Under the winner-take-all rule (i.e., awarding all of a state's electoral votes to the candidate who receives the most popular votes in each state), candidates have no reason to poll, visit, advertise, organize, or pay attention to the concerns of states where they are comfortably ahead or hopelessly behind. Instead, candidates concentrate their attention on a small handful of battleground states. This means that voters in the vast majority of the states are ignored in presidential elections. In 2004, candidates concentrated over two-thirds of their money and campaign visits in five states; over 80% in nine states; and over 99% of their money in 16 states. In 2008, candidates concentrated over two-thirds of their campaign events and ad money in just states, and 98% in just 15 states.[20]

The reason that the small states are the most disadvantaged group of states under the current system is that almost all of them are one-party states in terms of presidential elections. In the last six presidential elections (1988 through 2008), six of the 13 least populous states (i.e., those with three or four electoral votes) have regularly gone Republican (Alaska, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, and South Dakota). Six others (Hawaii, Vermont, Maine, Rhode Island, Delaware, and the District of Columbia) have regularly gone Democratic.[21] New Hampshire has been the only battleground state among the 13 smallest states.

The 12 smallest non-competitive states have a combined population of 11.4 million. Because of the bonus of two electoral votes that every state receives, these 12 small states have 40 electoral votes. Coincidentally, Ohio has 11.4 million people. Ohio has 20 electoral votes. That is, the 11 million people in Ohio have "only" 20 electoral votes, whereas the 11 million people in the 12 smallest non-competitive states have 40 electoral votes. However, political power does not arise from the number of electoral votes that a state possesses, but, instead, from whether the state is a closely divided battleground state. The battleground state of Ohio (with "only" 20 electoral votes) received 62 visits in the 2008 presidential election. However, the 12 non-battlegound small states (with their 40 electoral votes) were politically irrelevant. In 2008, the 12 small non-competitive states received no visits, advertising, polling, or policy consideration by presidential candidates because the outcome of the presidential race in those states is generally a foregone conclusion. The winner-take-all rule makes the 11 million people in the closely divided battleground state of Ohio crucial in presidential races, while rendering the 11 million people in the nation's smallest states irrelevant. This is a situation in which 20 is much more than 40. A national popular vote would make every vote equal throughout the United States. A national popular vote would make a vote cast in a small state as important as a vote cast in Ohio.

Most of the states with five or six electoral votes are similarly non-competitive in presidential elections (and therefore similarly disadvantaged). In fact, of the 22 least populous states (i.e. those with between three and six electoral votes), only New Hampshire (four electoral votes), New Mexico (five electoral votes), and Nevada (five electoral votes) have been battleground states in recent elections.

The fact that the small states are disadvantaged by the current system has been recognized by prominent officials from smaller states. In a 1979 Senate speech, Senator Henry Bellmon (R–Oklahoma) described how his views on the Electoral College had changed as a result of serving as National Campaign Director for Richard Nixon and a member of the American Bar Association's commission studying electoral reform.

> "While the consideration of the electoral college began—and I am a little embarrassed to admit this—I was convinced, as are many residents of smaller States, that the present system is a considerable advantage to less populous States such as Oklahoma. ... As the deliberations of the American Bar Association Commission proceeded and as more facts became known, I came to the realization that the present electoral system does not give an advantage to the voters from the less populous States. Rather, it works to the disadvantage of small State voters who are largely ignored in the general election for President."[22] [Emphasis added]

Senator Robert E. Dole of Kansas, the Republican nominee for President in 1996 and Republican nominee for Vice President in 1976, stated:

> "Many persons have the impression that the electoral college benefits those persons living in small states. I feel that this is somewhat of a misconception. Through my experience with the Republican National Committee and as a Vice Presidential candidate in 1976, it became very clear that the populous states with their large blocks of electoral votes were the crucial states. It was in these states that we focused our efforts.
> "Were we to switch to a system of direct election, I think we would see a resulting change in the nature of campaigning. While urban areas will still be important campaigning centers, there will be a new emphasis given to smaller states. Candidates will soon realize that all votes are important, and votes from small states carry the same import as votes from large states. That to me is one of the major attractions of direct election. Each vote carries equal importance.
> "Direct election would give candidates incentive to campaign in States that are perceived to be single party states.[23] [Emphasis added]

Because so few of the least populous states are battleground states in presidential elections, the current system actually shifts power from voters in the small and medium-sized states to voters in a handful of big states. As early as the spring of 2008, both major political parties acknowledged that there would be at most 14 battleground states (involving only 166 of the 538 electoral votes) in the 2008 presidential election.[24] In other words, two-thirds of the states were regarded as irrelevant under the current system. Among this group of 14 battleground states, Michigan (17 electoral votes), Ohio (20), Pennsylvania (21), and Florida (27) contain over half (85) of the 166 electoral votes. Among the 22 least populous states, only three (i.e., New Hampshire, New Mexico, and Nevada) were among this group of 14 battleground states. These three states contain only 14 of the 166 electoral votes. The net result is that the current system shifts power from voters in the least populous states to voters in a handful of closely divided battleground states (almost all of which are big states).

The facts speak for themselves. Hawaii was the fourth state to enact the National Popular Vote bill. As of 2008, the bill has been approved by a total of seven state legislative chambers in small states, including one house in Maine and both houses in Hawaii, Rhode Island, and Vermont.

The concept of a national popular vote for President is far from being politically "radioactive" in small states. Indeed, the concept of a national popular vote for President is popular in small states. Polls in 2008 showed a high level of support for a nationwide election for President in small states such as Vermont (75%), Maine (71%), New Hampshire (69%), and Rhode Island (74%).[25] These results are consistent with the fact that more than 70% of the American people have favored a nationwide election for President since the Gallup poll started asking this question in 1944. The Washington Post, Kaiser Family Foundation, and Harvard University poll in 2007 showed 72% support for direct nationwide election of the President. This recent national result is similar to recent statewide polls in Arkansas (74%), California (70%), Connecticut (73%), Massachusetts (73%), Michigan (73%), Missouri (70%), and Washington (77%). In short, there is very little difference in the level of political support for a national popular vote in small, medium-sized, and large states.

The small states are the most disadvantaged group of states under the current system (as discussed in section 10.2.1 of this book). The fact that the bonus of two electoral votes is an illusory benefit to the small states is not a new revelation. This fact has been widely recognized by the small states for some time. In 1966, Delaware led a group of 12 predominantly low-population states (including North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Utah, Arkansas, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Iowa) in suing New York in the U.S. Supreme Court. These states argued that New York's use of the winner-take-all rule effectively disenfranchised voters in their states.[26] The Court declined to hear the case (presumably because of the well-established constitutional provision that the manner of awarding electoral votes is exclusively a state decision). Ironically, the defendant (New York) is no longer an influential battleground state (as it was in the 1960s). Today, New York suffers the very same disenfranchisement as most of the less populous states because it too has become politically non-competitive. Today, a vote in New York is equal to a vote in Wyoming—votes in both are equally irrelevant in presidential elections.

The Electoral College is not the bulwark of influence for the small states in the U.S. Constitution. The 13 smallest states (with 3% of the nation's population) have 25% of the votes in the U.S. Senate—a very significant source of political clout. However, the 13 smallest states (i.e., those with three or four electoral votes) have only 26 extra votes in the Electoral College by virtue of the two-vote bonus—not a large number in relation to the total of 538 electoral votes. Although the 13 smallest states cast 3% of the nation's popular vote while possessing 6% of the electoral votes, the extra 3% is a minor numerical factor in the context of a presidential election. More significantly, this small theoretical advantage is eradicated by the fact that the small states are equally divided between the two major political parties and because the one-party character of the small states makes 12 out of 13 of them irrelevant in presidential elections. In fact, the bulwark of influence for the small states is the equal representation of the states in the U.S. Senate—not the small number of additional electoral votes that they have in the Electoral College.

2.3 MYTH: The National Popular Vote bill threatens the equal representation of the states in the U.S. Senate.

Equal representation of the states in the U.S. Senate is explicitly established in the U.S. Constitution. This feature of the U.S. Constitution cannot be changed by state law. In fact, it may not even be amended by an ordinary federal constitutional amendment. Instead, this feature of the U.S. Constitution may only be changed by unanimous consent of all 50 states.[27] In contrast, the U.S. Constitution explicitly assigns the power to choose the manner of electing the President to the state legislatures. The adoption by a state legislature of the National Popular Vote bill is an exercise of a legislature's existing powers under the U.S. Constitution. Such action has no impact or bearing on the constitutional provisions concerning representation in the U.S. Senate.

2.4 MYTH: A national popular vote would undermine a partisan advantage in favor of the Republican Party in the small states.

The small state issue sometimes serves as a surrogate for the unstated political concern (and misconception) that the small states confer a partisan advantage in favor of the Republican Party. However, this belief does not reflect current political reality. In the last six presidential elections (1988 through 2008), six of the 13 least populous states have regularly gone

Republican (Alaska, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, and South Dakota), while six others (Hawaii, Vermont, Maine, Rhode Island, Delaware, and the District of Columbia) have regularly gone Democratic.[28] New Hampshire has been, in recent years, the one closely divided battleground state among the 13 smallest states (having supported the Democrat in 1992 and 1996, the Republican in 2000, and the Democrat in 2004 and 2008).

Interestingly, the 12 smallest non-competitive states actually confer a slight political advantage on the Democratic presidential candidate. For example, in 2004, John Kerry won 21 electoral votes from his 444,115-vote lead in the six non-competitive Democratic small states, whereas George W. Bush won only 19 electoral votes from his 650,421-vote lead in the six non-competitive Republican small states. The reason that the Democrats enjoy a partisan advantage in presidential elections in the smallest states is that the six regularly Republican small states are very heavily Republican (Alaska 64%, Idaho 69%, Montana 61%, Wyoming 70%, North Dakota 64%, and South Dakota 61%). In contrast, the Democrats carried three of their six small states (Delaware, Hawaii, and Maine) with only 54% of the vote. A 54% margin is generally viewed as placing a state safely out of reach for the opposition during a typical presidential campaign;[29] however, 54% is considerably less than the Republican Party's margin in their six small states. In two additional states (Vermont and Rhode Island), the Democrats won with 60% of the vote (again a smaller margin than the Republican Party's margin in their six small states). If the boundaries of the small states had been recently drawn, there would be accusations that the boundaries were a Democratic gerrymander.

[21] Among the six regularly Republican-leaning small states Clinton carried Montana in 1992 (presumably due to Perot's presence on the ballot). Among the six Democratic-leaning small states, George H. W. Bush carried Delaware, Maine, and Vermont in 1988.

For National Popular Vote

Hartford Courant editorial
March 2, 2008

Connecticut, to everyone's surprise, was in play during the Super Tuesday primaries. Three major candidates visited the state.

But that may not happen in the run-up to the November general election (minus a quick fundraising visit or two to Fairfield County). If, say, the state is considered safe for the Democrats, neither candidate will feel the need to campaign here. The same thing is likely to happen in two-thirds of the other states.

Our system of electing the president and vice president is flawed and archaic. There is a way to change it without amending the U.S. Constitution. The states can simply agree to give their electoral votes — regardless of who wins each state's popular vote — to the winner of the national popular vote. There is a serious proposal to adopt the "National Popular Vote" plan here and across the country. It's worth supporting.

Connecticut Often Ignored

The problem with the present system is the winner-take-all rule used in 48 states. In all states except Maine and Nebraska, the candidate who wins the state's popular vote gets all of the state's electoral votes.

So if a candidate is assured of winning, say, 55 percent of the popular vote, the campaign is over. He or she will get all the electoral votes, and there's no point in trying to get more votes, nor is there any point in the losing candidate losing by fewer votes. Although it's possible that the losing candidate could try to reverse the numbers, what almost always happens is that both candidates put their money and time into battleground states.

According to the FairVote organization, 99 percent of the campaign advertising money in the 2004 presidential election was spent in just 17 states, and 92 percent of the campaign visits were in only 16 states. Issues in those states are thrust to the fore, at the expense of whatever Connecticut and other less-noticed states are concerned about. Federal grants tend to find their way to contested states, especially as elections near.

The way we elect presidents now thwarts the democratic principle of majority rule. Four times in our nation's history, most recently in 2000, a president has won the office while losing the popular vote. It almost happened in a number of other elections. A shift of only 60,000 votes in Ohio would have given the 2004 election to John Kerry, despite President George W. Bush's 3.5 million-vote lead in the popular tally.

Also, the lack of a meaningful campaign depresses voter turnout, which in turn makes things worse for the minority party.

Reformers have been trying to scuttle the Electoral College system for at least 50 years. Twice in the 1970s, a proposed constitutional amendment passed one house of Congress, only to be blocked by beneficiaries of the current system. It is difficult, as it should be, to amend the U.S. Constitution. But because states have the power to allocate their electoral votes, some clever folks have come up with another way around the block.

Change How States Use Votes

The National Popular Vote creates a compact. All of the states that join agree to give their electoral votes to the candidate who receives the most popular votes in all 50 states and the District of Columbia. The compact only kicks in when enacted by states possessing a majority of the electoral votes — 270 of 538, enough to elect a president.

The bill has passed in two states, Maryland and New Jersey, and is in the pipeline in more than 40 other states, including Connecticut. The bill, which failed to pass last year, has been introduced again, and backers say it has a better chance of passage this year.

Support is not universal. Critics such as Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who vetoed the bill after it passed both houses in the California legislature, object to the possibility that a state could give its electoral votes to a candidate it didn't support.

Others in favor of the devil-we-got say the new method could increase the cost of elections and focus campaigning on population centers at the expense of rural areas.

Those points are well-taken, but the positives of National Popular Vote outweigh the negatives. There are no other indirect elections left in government; they are a relic of the past. The Electoral College was supposed to help small-population states (and Southern states where slaves couldn't vote), but most small-population states aren't in play on Election Day. That the 2000 election was hanging on hanging chads was absurd.

If a million votes in Connecticut count as much as a million votes in Ohio, we'll see the candidates again. National Popular Vote is worth a try.

Maryland Takes the Lead

April 14, 2007

As the nation braces for a long and numbing presidential election, the State of Maryland has done voters a favor by rejecting the Electoral College as a fossil in need of a democratic makeover. Gov. Martin O'Malley and the Annapolis legislature made the state the first in the nation to decide that its Electoral College members should someday be required to vote for the presidential candidate chosen by a plurality of the nation's voters, not according to the state's parochial tally.

The change would not take effect until it won final acceptance by enough states to amount to a 270-vote majority in the college. (Maryland has 10 votes.) But it is something all Americans would benefit from, particularly the masses of voters routinely ignored when candidates focus on a few battleground states — just 16 in 2004 — that increasingly settle modern campaigns.

The need to scrap the creaky college machinery was made clear in the angst of the 2000 election. George W. Bush lost the popular election by almost 544,000 votes, yet won in a Supreme Court showdown over Florida's electors that hinged on far fewer disputed state ballots. Four years later, it was Mr. Bush's turn to sweat as he handily won the national vote yet came close to losing Ohio — and the White House — in the college's arcane state-by-state fragmentation of the popular majority.

The reform movement, driven by a bipartisan coalition called National Popular Vote, has a long way to go. But Hawaii is close to approval, and hundreds of legislators are sponsoring the change in more than 40 other states. It is an ingenious way around the fact that the alternative strategy of trying to amend the Constitution would require the approval of three-fourths of the states, leaving veto power in the hands of smaller states over-represented in the college.

The objection that reform would mean that rural interests would be ignored is a canard. The change would require candidates to present positions that galvanized all Americans. This is the truer and more certain path of democracy.

We vote for a fairer way to decide national elections

Chicago Sun-Times editorial
March 1, 2006

Calls to reform or abolish the Electoral College hit a fever pitch after the 2000 presidential election, when Al Gore won the popular tally but didn't have enough votes in the right states to carry the electoral vote. That call quieted somewhat after the 2004 election, when President Bush won the popular vote but still could have lost the election if John Kerry had won Ohio. Despite interest in reform, nothing has happened, mostly due to the difficulty in amending the Constitution.

Now a bipartisan commission, whose members include former Rep. John Anderson (R-Ill.) and former Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), has proposed an idea to retain the Electoral College while still ensuring it reflects the will of the majority of voters. The Sun-Times News Group backs the concept and applauds the National Popular Vote group for thinking outside the box.

The group's plan is to get enough states to agree to give all their electoral votes to the national vote winner, regardless of the results in their individual states. Under the proposal, each state would pass laws to change the way their electoral votes are awarded, a process the Constitution leaves for the states to set. They would also enter an interstate compact with other states that make the same change, agreeing that the new system won't take effect until states representing 270 electoral votes -- the number needed to carry the Electoral College -- have joined.

In Illinois, the plan is backed by a group that includes state Senators Jacqueline Collins, a Chicago Democrat, and Kirk Dillard, a Hinsdale Republican and chairman of the DuPage County Republican Party.

Using such a system in the last election would have meant Bush won all of Illinois' electoral votes, even though Kerry easily carried the state. If that sounds strange, it's no stranger than Illinois and other populous states being virtually ignored by both parties during the last campaign, since one candidate or the other had them locked so early. That likely hurt the turnout in those noncompetitive states, affecting elections further down the ticket.

What of awarding electoral votes by the top vote-getter in each congressional district, as is currently done in Nebraska and Maine? That would simply set up a situation where candidates concentrate on a small number of battleground districts, because, thanks to gerrymandering, most districts are noncompetitive.

Republicans may be hardest to persuade to support this plan, over fears that large urban centers that tend to vote Democratic will dominate elections. But that wasn't an impediment to Bush's re-election. And polls show most Americans want the president to be elected by the popular vote. It's time to make the change with this innovative plan.

This editorial represents the view of the Sun-Times News Group of 100 newspapers in the Chicago metro area.

States join forces against electoral college

A piecemeal approach may be the only way to kill the anachronistic institution

Los Angeles Times Editorial

June 5, 2006

A PROPOSED EXPERIMENT with majority rule has generated plenty of naysayers who apparently think that some nations are simply too immature to let people directly choose their own leaders. But we say the United States is ready for real democracy.

The experiment is the National Popular Vote campaign, which intends to undermine the Constitution's anachronistic Electoral College. If the campaign succeeds, future presidents will take office only if they win the popular vote nationwide.

The ingenious scheme was developed by John R. Koza, a Stanford professor who also invented the scratch-off lottery ticket. It calls on state legislatures to pass a measure dictating that all the electoral votes from that state go to the winner of the national popular vote. It goes into effect only if enough states approve it to represent a majority of the electoral votes. In other words, if states that represent at least 270 of the 538 electoral votes all approve the measure, the winner of the popular vote nationwide would automatically win the presidency. It thus renders the Electoral College moot without eliminating it.

This kind of end run is necessary because the only way to get rid of the Electoral College entirely is via a constitutional amendment, which would be nearly impossible to pass. Enough small states benefit from the current system to block an amendment. The beauty of this approach is that each state is constitutionally allowed to allot its electoral votes as it sees fit. The measure was approved by California's Assembly on Tuesday and is pending in four other states; backers hope to get it before all 50 states by January.

Anyone wondering why he should care about the Electoral College need look no further than the 2000 election, when George W. Bush won the presidency despite getting about half a million fewer votes than Al Gore. If that makes conservatives think they should be thankful that the majority doesn't always rule in the United States, they should think again. The same thing nearly happened in reverse in 2004. If John Kerry had picked up a mere 60,000 more votes in Ohio, he would have won — even though Bush took in 3 million more votes overall.

The Electoral College doesn't skew just election results; it skews elections. Candidates know they don't have to campaign in states that either clearly favor them or clearly don't; they have to focus only on swing states. In the 2004 campaign, Bush and Kerry spent a great deal of time brushing up on agricultural policy and other issues of vital concern in Iowa, while ignoring matters important to people in states such as California, Texas and New York.

Opponents argue that the current system ensures that smaller states continue to have a say in setting national policy. But the U.S. Senate already gives Delaware every bit as much clout as California. Any method besides majority vote empowers some citizens at the expense of others and makes the president beholden to minority interests.

At its inception, the United States was, well, a union of states. But it is now one nation, and our president should be elected by the citizens of that nation, not by its constituent states. To argue otherwise is to say that some Americans should have more power to elect a president than others simply because of where they live. Remember, all men are created equal. Including Californians and New Yorkers.

Minneapolis - St. Paul, Minnesota

How to drop out of the Electoral College:

There's a way to ensure top vote-getter becomes president

Editorial—Minneapolis Star Tribune
March 27, 2006

This country could form a more perfect union by accepting a novel idea: that the president of the United States should be elected by the people of the United States.

That's not the way it's done, of course, and, given the Constitution's enshrinement of the Electoral College, things aren't likely to change. To quit the college would take approval of two-thirds of both houses of Congress and three-quarters of state legislatures, so fuggedaboudit.

But now comes a gaggle of bipartisan reformers with a cheeky idea worth considering. What if legislatures, one by one, entered their states into an interstate compact under which members would agree to award their electoral votes to the winner of the national popular vote? The compact would kick in only when enough states had joined it to elect a president—that is, when a majority of the 538 electoral votes were assembled. As few as 11 states could ensure that the candidate with the most popular votes nationally would win the presidency. As a result, the Constitution and the Electoral College would stay intact, but the college's fangs would be removed.

That approach would be more democratic than current practice. Recall that Al Gore lost the 2000 election to George W. Bush despite getting a half-million more popular votes, and that Bush nearly lost the 2004 election despite getting 3 million more popular votes (a shift of only 60,000 votes in Ohio would have thrown the election to John Kerry). So, both parties have reason to fear the college's distortions.

That the Electoral College has "worked" in all but one election since 1888 isn't a good enough reason to stay with the status quo. The college has a perverse impact on campaigns. With no incentive to compete in states that are predictably red or blue, candidates concentrate on the battleground states—only 13 of them in 2004, down from 24 in 1960. That's not the national campaign voters deserve. In the last election, 92 percent of campaign events took place in just 13 states, which also absorbed 97 percent of advertising during the campaign's final month. Three dozen red and blue states as large as California, New York and Texas and as small as Delaware, Utah and Wyoming were mere spectators.

Now that Minnesota is a battleground getting lots of attention, it's a lot to ask the Legislature to do the right thing and endorse the new compact. But it really should. So should other states—both red and blue—join, for the sake of a better democracy.

Editorial: Rx for U.S. elections

States can assure the popular vote rules

Saturday, June 3, 2006

The election of the U.S. president should reflect the directly expressed will of the American people. But it doesn't.

The current Electoral College system can produce perverse results: A candidate can lose the popular vote and win the Electoral College vote and, thus, the presidency. That has happened several times in American history, most recently in 2000. With the nation so closely divided politically, this is likely to be an ongoing problem, undermining the legitimacy of our presidential elections.

It doesn't have to be that way.

Polls for the last 30 years have shown that Americans overwhelmingly support direct election of the president, but Congress hasn't budged on a constitutional amendment.

A new campaign, "National Popular Vote," spearheaded by several former members of Congress, including California's Tom Campbell (most recently Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's finance director), has a creative way to get the same result.

The campaign uses an old mechanism -- an interstate compact -- to achieve the direct election of the president. The idea is modeled on existing interstate compacts, such the Colorado River Compact, which divides water among seven Western states. The compact depends on states changing their own rules for dividing up their electoral votes.

We'd prefer a constitutional amendment simply abolishing the Electoral College, but this state-by-state reform is an achievable second-best solution to a defective product that even the Founding Fathers regarded wearily and warily.

The strongest arguments at the 1787 Constitutional Convention favored direct election of the president by the people. Proponents wanted the president to be the "guardian of the people" and as independent as possible of Congress and the states. But the delegates were hopelessly divided between direct election by the people and election by Congress.

The Electoral College was a last-minute compromise, reached under what James Madison called the "hurrying influence produced by fatigue and impatience." The Electoral College has been patched many times since.

The interstate compact proposal wouldn't abolish the Electoral College, but at least it would ensure that it reflects the national popular vote.

Election officials in the compact states would award all of their electoral votes to the candidate receiving the greatest number of votes nationally.

Clearly, one state could not do this on its own. So each of the states has the same 888-word bill entering into a binding interstate compact (you can find the text at www.nationalpopularvote.com). States would join the agreement one by one. The compact would take effect only after enough states joined to represent a majority of Americans and electoral votes -- 270 of the 538 electoral votes.

So far, the bill has been introduced in five legislatures -- California, Illinois, Colorado, Missouri and Louisiana. The campaign's goal is 10 states by the end of 2006 and enough states by the end of 2007 to make direct election the governing rule for the 2008 presidential election.

In California, the Assembly approved the bill Tuesday. Because California has such strong influence nationally, the governor and senators can get this process rolling in other states by acting this session. Otherwise, in presidential elections, unhappy Americans are bound to continue paying for the Founding Fathers' fatigue.

The Fayetteville Observer

Our View: Electoral vote change would be good for the state and its people

The Fayette Observer Editorial
May 16, 2007

Four times since the framers met in Philadelphia in 1787, the presidency has gone to the candidate on the losing end of the popular vote. The republic still stands.

That's hardly a compelling argument for leaving things as they are. The Electoral College less than perfectly reflects the will of the people, and the threat of the "faithless elector" who tips an election the way his partisan bias dictates is real, if remote. Both threats would vanish if the election automatically went to the candidate for whom most registered voters pulled the lever.

This is the point at which the conversation normally would turn to amending the federal Constitution to abolish the Electoral College. But the state Senate has just passed a bill that would achieve a comparable effect by simple statute.

The bill provides that, if enough states join in to command a majority in the Electoral College, all of North Carolina's electoral votes will be awarded to the winner of the popular vote — not the statewide winner, but the one who wins nationwide. More than 40 states are already looking at substantially the same bill.

If it works as planned, the problem goes away, with no violence done to the Constitution.

Something else happens, too. North Carolina will less often find itself in political obscurity when the nation chooses its top leader.

During the 2000 election, one analyst noted that the candidates were focusing most of their time and effort on 11 swing states. Ironically, only three of those had more electoral votes than North Carolina, which was not one of the 11. If candidates understand that they have a real shot at our 15 electoral votes right up until the polls close on that fateful Tuesday in November, we are unlikely to be shrugged off or taken for granted again.

The arguments against it are no stronger than those for retaining the Electoral College in all its supreme majesty: (1) it's different; and (2) it means that North Carolina could end up giving its 15 votes to someone not favored by the majority of Tar Heel voters. The first argument lacks heft. The second would make perfect sense, but only if one could ignore the fact that presidential elections are held to enable individual Americans to put someone in the White House, not merely to express each state's collective pique or pleasure.

This is worth a try — for the sake of simplicity and fairness, and in the interest of raising our state's political profile.

Drop Out of the College

March 14, 2006

The Electoral College is an antidemocratic relic. Everyone who remembers 2000 knows that it can lead to the election of the candidate who loses the popular vote as president. But the Electoral College's other serious flaws are perhaps even more debilitating for a democracy. It focuses presidential elections on just a handful of battleground states, and pushes the rest of the nation's voters to the sidelines.

There is an innovative new proposal for states to take the lead in undoing the Electoral College. Legislatures across the country should get behind it.

Both parties should have reason to fear the college's perverse effects. In 2000, the Democrats lost out. But in 2004, a shift of 60,000 votes in Ohio would have elected John Kerry, even though he lost the national popular vote decisively.

Just as serious is the way the Electoral College distorts presidential campaigns. Candidates have no incentive to campaign in, or address the concerns of, states that reliably vote for a particular party. In recent years, the battleground in presidential elections has shrunk drastically. In 1960, 24 states, with 327 electoral votes, were battleground states, according to estimates by National Popular Vote, the bipartisan coalition making the new proposal. In 2004, only 13 states, with 159 electoral votes, were. As a result, campaigns and national priorities are stacked in favor of a few strategic states. Ethanol fuel, a pet issue of Iowa farmers, is discussed a lot. But issues of equal concern to states like Alabama, California, New York and Indiana are not.

The Electoral College discourages turnout because voters in two-thirds of the nation know well before Election Day who will win their states. It also discriminates among voters by weighing presidential votes unequally. A Wyoming voter has about four times as much impact on selecting that state's electors as a California voter does on selecting that state's.

The answer to all of these problems is direct election of the president. Past attempts to abolish the Electoral College by amending the Constitution have run into difficulty. But National Popular Vote, which includes several former members of Congress, is offering an ingenious solution that would not require a constitutional amendment. It proposes that states commit to casting their electoral votes for the winner of the national popular vote. These promises would become binding only when states representing a majority of the Electoral College signed on. Then any candidate who won the popular vote would be sure to win the White House.

The coalition is starting out by trying to have laws passed in Illinois and a few other states. Americans are rightly cautious about tinkering with mechanisms established by the Constitution. But throughout the nation's history, there have been a series of reforms affecting how elections are conducted, like the ones that gave blacks and women the vote and provided for the direct election of United States senators. Sen. Linda Menard, Chair
Members of the State Affairs Committee

I strongly support SB 92, a bill to enter into an interstate compact for a popular vote for Presidential elections.

After looking at a number of sources on this important issue, I have concluded three basic advantages of this type of election; those being:
Nationwide popular election of the President is the only system that:
(1) makes all states competitive in presidential elections,
(2) guarantees that the candidate with the most popular votes nationwide wins the Presidency, and most importantly
(3) makes every vote equal.
I have been following the issue and am very excited to see that Alaska will now have an opportunity to comment in the form of this proposed legislation. This bill will give Alaska an opportunity to gain parity in Presidential elections.

Please consider supporting SB 92, in reference to a popular vote for Presidential elections. The current electoral system needs updating, a direct election of the president is just plain common sense as that is the system that's in place for all other elective officials.....

Legislative Testimony

HEARING: (S) JUD Mar 11, 2009 @ 1:30 PM BELTZ 211
TELECONFERENCE

Thank you Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. My name is Eddie Brakes, IV-D Director, for Central Council Tlingit and Haida Indian Tribes of Alaska (CCTHITA) Tribal Child Support Unit (TCSU).

I am offering this testimony in support of SB 96 Sec. 2. Alaska Statutes 25.25.101 (19) concerning changing the definition of State to include "the Virgin Islands" and "an Indian tribe" which puts Alaska in compliance with federal regulations.

Child support programs that receive federal funding under Title IV-D of the Social Security Act are called Title IV-D programs. In March of 2004, the final rule for Tribal Child Support Programs was published at 45 CFR 309. This rule provides regulations for Tribes to receive federal funding to operate Tribal IV-D programs. The State of Alaska and the CCTHITA both operate federally funded and approved programs. CCTHITA does not receive any funding from the State to operate its child support program.

In March of 2007, the CCTHITA received federal funding to operate a comprehensive IV-D Program. TCSU has been working collaboratively with State of Alaska CSSD. CSSD has transferred for services approximately 700 Child Support cases to the Tribe. Both CSSD and TCSU are working together to provide child support services

Federal regulations require states and Tribes to work together and cooperate, providing one another the full range of services. These are available to all other IV-D programs throughout the country.

This amendment will assist the State and Tribe in their ongoing collaborations. The TCSU, CSSD, and Department of Law have been in monthly telephonic meetings, working together towards the common goal of ensuring all children receive the critical financial and emotional support they deserve.

It is important to note that every other state in the U.S. has adopted the federal definition of "State" to include an Indian Tribe. According to the CSSD sponsor statement, SB 96 puts the State of Alaska CSSD in compliance with federal child support regulations, and does not jeopardize 17 million dollars in federal funding.

TEL. 907-586-1432 www.ccthita.org TOLL FREE 800-344-1432

In conclusion, CCTHITA is in absolute support of the State of Alaska CSSD's efforts to be in compliance with the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act through amending the definition of "State" in SB 96. Both CSSD and the TCSU provide resources and opportunities to families to better the lives of Alaska children. Making sure the State of Alaska continues to receive federal funding for the Child Support Program is in the best interest of all Alaska families and children.

This concludes my testimony, thank you.

Juneau, AK 99811

Dear Senator French,

This letter is in support of SB 96 to help inform the legislature of necessary actions required to bring Alaska into federal compliance with the federal law. If the state remains out of compliance after this legislative session, CSSD could lose more than $17 million federal dollars. This is nearly the entire operating budget required to operate the child support activities mandated by state and federal law.

The Alaska Child Support Services Division (CSSD) needs to amend state law on two issues. The first amendment is less controversial and only requires that child support orders include a provision for obligors to pay cash medical assistance to the custodial parent to help with health costs when insurance is not provided for that child.

The second amendment is more sensitive to certain legislators. The Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA) contains a definition of "state." Under federal law, all states must adopt the uniform act's definition of "state" that includes "the United States Virgin Islands" and "an Indian tribe." For Alaska, the impact of adopting a definition that would include Indian tribes, means Indian tribes can issue and serve income-withholding orders on employers. The obligor would be entitled to contest the jurisdiction of the tribe to issue the order and the usual rights to contest the validity or enforcement of an order by an obligor would still apply. The change would also affect the process for state recognition of tribal orders. A tribal child support order would be registered in the Alaska state courts under the UIFSA procedures instead of a comity process. These changes are consistent with the purpose of UIFSA. The purpose of UIFSA is to unify state laws relating to child support orders, to provide efficient procedures for collecting child support in interstate cases, and to eliminate multiple support orders that were permitted under prior child support laws.

One question raised by the changes required by UIFSA is whether the tribal amendment would result in an expansion of tribal authority. The Department of Law has examined this question and came to the following conclusion:

> "UIFSA's underlying purpose is not to define jurisdiction. Nor does the state have the ability to define tribal jurisdiction. The overall purpose of UIFSA is simply to unify state laws relating to child support orders, to provide efficient procedures for collecting child support in interstate cases, and to eliminate multiple support orders that were permitted under prior child support laws. These purposes do not trigger broader jurisdictional concerns."

A letter of intent could be included in the introduced child support legislation (SB 96) to ease concerns of legislators who are not comfortable with issues related to Indian tribes. The letter of intent could be attached as a separate letter or as an amendment to the bill. I might suggest the following as an amendment:

LEGISLATIVE FINDINGS AND INTENT. (a) The legislature finds that

(1) failure to bring AS 25.25.101 into compliance with the federal Social Security Act Title IV-D could result in the loss of approximately $17,000,000 in administrative funding;

(2) of the 33 states that have federally recognized tribes, Alaska is the only state that has not yet passed conforming legislation; and

(3) to bring Alaska into conformity with UIFSA, the legislature finds that it is necessary to amend AS 25.25.101 to include "an Indian tribe" and "the United States Virgin Islands" in the definition of "state."

(b) It is the intent of the legislature that this Act not alter or expand in any way the governmental relationship between federally recognized tribes and the state.

Thank you for working with us on this issue.

The Honorable Hollis French
Chair, Senate Judiciary Committee
Alaska State Legislature
State Capitol, Room 417
Juneau, AK 99801-1182

Dear Senator French:

The Senate Health and Social Services Committee introduced legislation on behalf of the Division of Child Support Services (CSSD). SB 96 passed out of (S) HSS on Monday, March 2, 2009 and has been transmitted to Senate Judiciary Committee for consideration.

SB 96 addresses two time sensitive amendments to the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA) that will bring the Division into federal compliance. Briefly, the two changes are; 1) providing for cash medical assistance for children in custodial homes, and 2) clarifying the definition of "state" to include the US Virgin Islands and Indian tribes. If these two amendments are not adopted during this state fiscal year, the Department of Revenue will be at risk to lose more than $17 million federal receipts to support the fiduciary services provided by CSSD.

I respectfully request that CSSB96(HSS) be scheduled for hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee as early as possible. CSSB96(HSS) carries with it a zero fiscal note.

If the Committee requires any additional information, please contact me.

SB 96

TITLE: "An Act relating to nonpayment of child support: relating to certain judicial and administrative orders for medical support of a child;."

SPONSOR STATEMENT (B)

In July 2008, the federal government issued new medical support regulations that require states to have guidelines addressing how either or both parents will provide for a child's healthcare needs through accessible health insurance coverage, cash medical support, or both. Under the federal regulations, states must order either or both parents to purchase reasonably-priced, accessible health insurance coverage, provide cash medical support or both. Cash medical support may be required in those cases where no reasonably-priced health insurance coverage is accessible to the child. If a parent is ordered to pay cash medical support, the Child Support Services Division must enforce the ongoing cash medical support obligation as well as collect any cash medical support arrears. Failure to satisfy these mandated jeopardizes 17 million dollars in federal funding for the state's child support program.

This bill adds to existing law the authority for a tribunal to order either or both parents to pay cash medical support, if warranted. In addition, the bill directs CSSD to review child support orders for modification on a federally mandated three-year cycle. The bill adds cash medical support to the definition of arrearage and the definition of support order thereby enabling CSSD to use its existing enforcement tools to collect a cash medical support obligation on behalf of the child. Finally, the bill removes the language limiting who may request the correction of a clerical mistake in an administrative order or request the vacation of an administrative order based upon a default income.

This bill puts Alaska in compliance with the federal requirements. As explained above, this bill will assure that Alaska's children receive the medical support to which they are entitled.

CS FOR SENATE BILL NO. 102( )

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE - FIRST SESSION

BY

Offered:
Referred:

Sponsor(s): SENATORS DAVIS, McGuire

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to compulsory school attendance; and relating to the crime of contributing to the delinquency of a minor."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 11.51.130(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of contributing to the delinquency of a minor if, being 19 years of age or older or being under 19 years of age and having the disabilities of minority removed for general purposes under AS 09.55.590, the person aids, induces, causes, or encourages a child

(1) under 18 years of age to do any act prohibited by state law unless the child's disabilities of minority have been removed for general purposes under AS 09.55.590;

(2) under 18 years of age or allows a child under 18 years of age to enter or remain in the immediate physical presence of the unlawful manufacture, use, display, or delivery of a controlled substance knowing that the manufacture, use, display, or delivery is occurring, unless the child's disabilities of minority have been removed for general purposes under AS 09.55.590;

(3) under 18 [16] years of age to be repeatedly absent from school, without just cause; or

(4) under 18 years of age to be absent from the custody of a parent, guardian, or custodian without the permission of the parent, guardian, or custodian or without the knowledge of the parent, guardian, or custodian, unless the child's disabilities of minority have been removed for general purposes under AS 09.55.590 or the person has immunity under AS 47.10.350 or 47.10.398(a); it is an affirmative defense to a prosecution under this paragraph that, at the time of the alleged offense, the defendant

(A) reasonably believed that the child was in danger of physical injury or in need of temporary shelter; and

(B) within 12 hours after taking the actions comprising the alleged offense, notified a peace officer, a law enforcement agency, or the Department of Health and Social Services of the name of the child and the child's location.

 Sec. 2. AS 14.30.010(a) is amended to read:

(a) Every child who is [BETWEEN] seven years of age or older and under 18 [16] years of age shall attend school at the public school in the district in which the child resides during each school term. Every parent, guardian, or other person having the responsibility for or control of a child who is [BETWEEN] seven years of age or older and under 18 [16] years of age shall maintain the child in attendance at a public school in the district in which the child resides during the entire school term, except as provided in (b) of this section.

 Sec. 3. AS 14.30.010(b) is amended to read:

(b) This section does not apply if a child

(1) is provided an academic education comparable to that offered by the public schools in the area, [EITHER] by

(A) attendance at a private school in which the teachers are certificated according to AS 14.20.020;

(B) tutoring by personnel certificated according to AS 14.20.020; or

(C) attendance at an educational program operated in compliance with AS 14.45.100 - 14.45.200 by a religious or other private school;

(2) attends a school operated by the federal government;

(3) has a physical or mental condition that a competent medical authority determines will make attendance impractical;

(4) is in the custody of a court or law enforcement authorities;

(5) is temporarily ill or injured;

(6) has been suspended or expelled under AS 14.03.160 or suspended or denied admittance under AS 14.30.045;

(7) resides more than two miles from either a public school or a route on which transportation is provided by the school authorities, except that this paragraph does not apply if the child resides within two miles of a federal or private school that the child is eligible and able to attend;

(8) is excused by action of the school board of the district at a regular meeting or by the district superintendent subject to approval by the school board of the district at the next regular meeting;

(9) has completed the 12th grade or has graduated from a secondary school;

(10) is enrolled in

(A) a state boarding school established under AS 14.16; or

(B) a full-time program of correspondence study approved by the department; in those school districts providing an approved correspondence study program, a student may be enrolled either in the district correspondence program or in the centralized correspondence study program;

(11) is equally well-served by an educational experience approved by the school board as serving the child's educational interests despite an absence from school, and the request for excuse is made in writing by the child's parents or guardian and approved by the principal or administrator of the school that the child attends;

(12) is being educated in the child's home by a parent or legal guardian.

SB 102 "An Act relating to compulsory school attendance; relating to the crime of contributing to the delinquency of a minor; and relating to school disciplinary action and truancy."

Sponsor Statement

SB 102 increases the Alaska compulsory school attendance age from 7-16 to 7-18. At the same time it necessarily amends the crime of contributing to the delinquency of a minor from the maximum age 16 to 18. This bill will not preclude parents from homeschooling children, or using charter or alternative schools, or any other of the twelve enumerated exceptions to compulsory education under AS14.30.010(b), including completion of grade 12 or graduation from a secondary school before age 18.

3283 Alaska students dropped out and 62.4% graduated in the 2007-2008 school year per the Alaska Department of Education and Early Development (DEED). Nationally, the graduation rate is 70% or higher. The highest dropout rates in Alaska are among minorities with Alaska Natives at double the rate of others. These numbers have not changed much in many years and Alaska's compulsory school attendance age has not changed in decades.

17 states have increased the compulsory school attendance age to 18. 9 states maintain age 17, and 23 states maintain age 16, per the US Department of Labor February 10, 2009. The legislative intent by states which have increased compulsory school attendance age to 18 is to encourage more students to stay in school long enough to graduate, attend institutions of higher education, and decrease dropout rates, juvenile crime, and teen pregnancy. Studies have shown that students without a diploma earn less than 75% of those with a diploma; they are more likely to live in poverty, go to jail, and have health problems.

National Education Association's "12-Point Action Plan for Reducing the School Dropout Rate" lists as a first priority to "mandate high school graduation or equivalency as compulsory for everyone below the age of 21." It reports:

"Just as we established compulsory attendance to the age of 16 or 17 in the beginning of the 20th century, it is appropriate and critical to eradicate the idea of 'dropping out' before achieving a diploma. To compete in the 21st century, all of our citizens, at minimum, need a high school education."

Increasing compulsory school attendance age is the first step in reducing dropouts and increasing graduation rates. The NEA also recommended high school graduation centers for students 19-21; individual attention in smaller learning communities; expanding graduation options in partnership with community colleges in career and technical fields and with alternative schools to provide other ways to earn a high school diploma; increasing workforce readiness programs; acting early to provide high-quality universal preschool and full-day kindergarten; involving families in students' learning at school and home; monitoring academic progress during the school year to prevent falling behind; involving the entire community in dropout prevention; providing educators with the training and resources to prevent dropouts; and asking Congress to invest $10 billion over 10 years to support dropout prevention programs and states which make high school graduation compulsory.

Remedial programs, work-study programs, alternative schools, and parental support to age 18 have proven effective in other states. Opponents to increasing compulsory school age who are concerned about forcing students to be in the classroom against their will argue that these students may become disruptive and require more time and expense on behavior and truancy problems. For those students who want to work or are not as academically inclined, school districts are encouraged to continue accredited alternative schools and work-study programs to help students earn credits toward a diploma while they often work at the same time. Students will want to come to school, stay in school, and graduate, if academic problems are identified early and they helped long before they dropout. Coupled with early efforts to retain, train, and graduate, SB 102 can bring hope and success to thousands of Alaskan students who otherwise might not stay in school and graduate

"An Act relating to compulsory school attendance; and relating to the crime of contributing to the delinquency of a minor."

Explanation of Committee Substitute

The Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 102 ( ), 26-LS0514\R was required because the first version of SB 102, 26-LS0514\A, inadvertently also included a subsection on truancy from a former bill which was not intended in this bill.

The Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 102 ( ), 26-LS0514\R effectively eliminated sections 4 and 5 from the original bill, SB 102, 26-LS0514\A.

ANALYSIS: (Attach a separate page if necessary)

The bill would change the compulsory age of a student attending public school in their district to begin no later than age 7 and under the age of 18. Exceptions to this would be if the student either graduates or completes the 12th grade.

In FY08 there were approximately 1,661 students between the ages of 16 and 18 that dropped out of public school after the student count period. The average cost of a student run through the FY10 foundation formula is $10,010.
1,661 x $10,010 = $16,626,610

ASSOCIATION OF ALASKA SCHOOL BOARDS

Position Statement on SB 102
Compulsory School Attendance

School boards believe that 16-year-olds are not ready to make the enormous decision to give up a high school education. Increasing the mandatory attendance age from 16 to 18 helps ensure that students who have not yet graduated from high school and are too young to make the life-changing decision to forego basic education will stay in school and have more opportunities to meet performance standards and pass the High School Graduation Qualifying Exam. AASB believes that the best way to keep students in school is to fund and provide education programs that engage students.

Senator Bettye Davis
State of Alaska
State Capital
Juneau, AK 99801-1182

Dear Senator Davis:

NEA-Alaska supports SB 102, a raise in the age of compulsory school attendance to eighteen for Alaska's children. Truancy and dropout rates are too high and we believe every effort should be made to encourage our youth to become as fully educated as possible. Raising the age of mandatory school attendance may serve to keep students in school longer than they now stay. If this bill causes even one child to complete their education it will be worthwhile.

Further, the annual Delegate Assembly of members in January 2009 passed a resolution which states:

> NEA-Alaska believes the Legislature should establish penalties for non-compliance with Alaska's compulsory attendance laws.

It is our belief that a law with no teeth serves little purpose. Alaska's school employees work hard to offer our children opportunities which prepare them for life. We cannot fulfill the promise of a high quality education for Alaska's children if they are not in our classrooms.

Thank you for sponsoring this piece of legislation and the work you do on behalf of Alaska's future.

Respectfully,

Barb Angaiak

NEA's 12-Point Action Plan for Reducing the School Dropout Rate

To address the nation's school dropout crisis, NEA has developed a 12-point action plan that includes the most promising actions supported by experience and data.

1. Mandate high school graduation or equivalency as compulsory for everyone below the age of 21. Just as we established compulsory attendance to the age of 16 or 17 in the beginning of the 20th century, it is appropriate and critical to eradicate the idea of "dropping out" before achieving a diploma. To compete in the 21st century, all of our citizens, at minimum, need a high school education.

2. Establish high school graduation centers for students 19-21 years old to provide specialized instruction and counseling to all students in this older age group who would be more effectively addressed in classes apart from younger students.

3. Make sure students receive individual attention in safe schools, in smaller learning communities within large schools, in small classes (18 or fewer students), and in programs during the summer, weekends, and before and after school that provide tutoring and build on what students learn during the school day.

4. Expand students' graduation options through creative partnerships with community colleges in career and technical fields and with alternative schools so that students have another way to earn a high school diploma. For students who are incarcerated, tie their release to high school graduation at the end of their sentences.

5. Increase career education and workforce readiness programs in schools so that students see the connection between school and careers after graduation. To ensure that students have the skills they need for these careers, integrate 21st century skills into the curriculum and provide all students with access to 21st century technology.

6. Act early so students do not drop out with high-quality, universal preschool and full-day kindergarten; strong elementary programs that ensure students are doing grade-level work when they enter middle school; and middle school programs that address causes of dropping out that appear in these grades and ensure that students have access to algebra, science, and other courses that serve as the foundation for success in high school and beyond.

7. Involve families in students' learning at school and at home in new and creative ways so that all families-single-parent families, families in poverty, and families in minority communities-can support their children's academic achievement, help their children engage in healthy behaviors, and stay actively involved in their children's education from preschool through high school graduation.

8. Monitor students' academic progress in school through a variety of measures during the school year that provide a full picture of students' learning and help teachers make sure students do not fall behind academically.

9. Monitor, accurately report, and work to reduce dropout rates by gathering accurate data for key student groups (such as racial, ethnic, and economic), establishing benchmarks in each state for eliminating dropouts, and adopting the standardized reporting method developed by the National Governors Association.

10. Involve the entire community in dropout prevention through family-friendly policies that provide release time for employees to attend parent-teacher conferences; work schedules for high school students that enable them to attend classes on time and be ready to learn; "adopt a school" programs that encourage volunteerism and community-led projects in school; and community-based, real-world learning experiences for students.

11. Make sure educators have the training and resources they need to prevent students from dropping out including professional development focused on the needs of diverse students and students who are at risk of dropping out; up-to-date textbooks and materials, computers, and information technology; and safe modern schools.

12. Make high school graduation a federal priority by calling on Congress and the president to invest $10 billion over the next 10 years to support dropout prevention programs and states who make high school graduation compulsory.

Subject: SB 102

Dear Senator Elton and Education Committee Members:

I am writing in support of SB 102, a bill to raise the compulsory age of school attendance.

The Anchorage School Board has consistently supported raising the age of school attendance to 18 years of age or graduation with a high school diploma, which ever comes first. This bill would accomplish that. While raising the school age would not prevent all students from dropping out, it would change the minds of some students. Over the years, we have heard of students whose parents tell them to leave school and get a job because the family needs the money and school is not required once they turn 16. We also hear of students who convince their parents that they should be permitted to stop going to school after they turn 16 because the current law says it is okay.

It is not okay for a 16 or 17 year old to stop going to school if they do not have a diploma. A high school diploma has become too important in today's society. We need to take all reasonable steps to reduce the number of students who leave school before graduating, and this is one of those steps. It is not the entire solution, but it is one piece of the solution.

The second part of this bill addresses procedures to reduce truancy. The Anchorage School Board has not yet had an opportunity to take a position on this issue, but I am confident that the Board would be interested in looking at ways to reduce truancy. I have personally noticed one thing in this portion of the bill that I want to bring to your attention.

The proposed definition of truancy says it is an unexcused absence without the prior knowledge and consent of the parent or guardian. From talking to teachers, it seems that a significant problem is that some parents routinely give their children permission to be absent from school. Because they have permission, they could not be considered truant under this bill. From an educational point of view, I don't think it would matter whether a student misses class with or without parental permission. The problem is missing too many instructional days. I don't know how best to address this, but I thought I would bring it to your attention.

Thank you for your consideration, and I urge you to support raising the compulsory age for school attendance.

1 Nearly all States exempt those whose physical or mental condition precludes attendance. Other exemptions not directly related to employment include those because of distance from school or school transportation; expulsion, suspension or determined to be disruptive; marriage; excused by court or judge; and receiving religious education.

2 The Dropout Prevention Act is a comprehensive program to have all the schools within the state make an attempt to keep students in school. There were no changes to the age limits for school attendance, but the establishment of a state-wide program is a major effort to prevent students from leaving school early - for any reason.

Compulsory Education

Overview

Legislation & Laws

Overview

More than 150 years have passed since Horace Mann helped Massachusetts establish a statewide system of education that eventually led to the requirement that all children attend public school. In 1852, Massachusetts became the first state to pass compulsory school attendance laws, and by 1918, all states required children to receive an education.

Compulsory Education Requirements

Today, every state and territory requires children to enroll in public or private education or to be home-schooled. More than half—32 states—require students to begin their education by age 6. Some states' set their age requirements as low as age 5 and as high as age 8. All children are required to continue their education into their high school years, with 26 states setting the cutoff age at 16. The remaining states require students to stay in school through age 17 or 18.

Compulsory education laws vary greatly from state to state. While some states use a student's date of birth to determine the beginning and ending dates for compulsory education, other states require a student to begin school if he or she will turn 6 during the school year and require a student to remain in school until completion of the school year in which he or she turns 17. Four states—Arizona, Montana, Vermont and Wyoming—require students to remain in school through a specified grade. Most states allow parents to petition their local school board or principal for a waiver of these requirements under certain circumstances, such as enrollment in a vocational education program or an institution of higher education or early completion of required coursework.

Kindergarten Enrollment

States and territories also set a minimum age for children to enroll in kindergarten, which is typically one or two years earlier than the compulsory education age. Every state or territory with a policy on this issue has established age 5 as the minimum age. However, six states—Colorado, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania—leave this decision up to local education agencies. In addition to the age requirement, each state also sets a date by which students must have attained the specified age in order to attend kindergarten. The cutoff dates range from August 1 in Indiana and Missouri to Jan. 1 in Connecticut and Vermont.

The School Age Debate

School attendance ages are often controversial. Many early childhood experts argue that if policymakers establish early cutoff dates for kindergarten, they should also establish aggressive school readiness programs to ensure students' success. Others argue that because there has been an increased emphasis on early childhood development and school readiness, we should continue to challenge children at a younger age. Some experts assert that age may be an arbitrary indicator or measure of a child's ability to succeed in school and should not be used at all. Others point out that when a state considers legislation, such as Nebraska, allowing younger children to enter kindergarten, policymakers must understand that there is likely to be a large increase in the number of children entering kindergarten during the first year of the new policy, thereby straining already tight school district budgets and increasing the need for teachers.

The age through which students must attend school can also be controversial. To encourage more students to attend institutions of higher education and to decrease dropout rates, juvenile crime and teen pregnancy, some state legislatures have increased the school attendance requirement to age 17 or 18. Opponents are concerned about forcing students to be in the classroom against their will. They say that these students may become disruptive and may require teachers and principals to spend more time and resources disciplining such students for disruptive or violent behavior and truancy. They also point out that there probably will be a greater need for funding, teachers and classrooms for alternative education.

State Action

Many state legislatures continue to debate school attendance policies. During the 2005 legislative session, Indiana changed their kindergarten enrollment date from July 1st to August 1st. During the 2004 legislative session, at least seven states enacted legislation regarding compulsory education. Alaska extended the required school age for a child who is six years of age on or before Sept. 1 following the beginning of the school year, and who is under the age of 20 and has not completed the 12th grade. Illinois increased the compulsory school age from 16 to 17 years of age, with certain exceptions. Kansas and Kentucky will both, under specific circumstances, grant exemptions from compulsory attendance. Nebraska changed the mandatory ages for compulsory education beginning in the 2005-06 school year to age of 6 by Jan. 1 of the current school year through the age of 17, with certain exceptions. In New York, local school districts will have the power to require minors from 16 to 17 years of age to attend full time day instruction. Finally, Virginia strengthened the mechanisms for enforcement of the compulsory school attendance law.

FactSheet

Updated February 2009

High School Dropouts in America

Over a million of the students who enter ninth grade each fall fail to graduate with their peers four years later. In fact, about seven thousand students drop out every school day. Perhaps this statistic was acceptable fifty years ago, but the era in which a high school dropout could earn a living wage has ended in the United States. Dropouts significantly diminish their chances to secure a good job and a promising future. Moreover, not only do the individuals themselves suffer, but each class of dropouts is responsible for substantial financial and social costs to the communities, states, and country in which they live.

Although graduation rates are a fundamental indicator of how schools are ultimately performing, only recently have those rates been rigorously scrutinized and the extent of the crisis in America's high school been revealed. For decades, schools and districts published misleading or inaccurate graduation rates, and as a result, the American public knew little of the scope and gravity of the problems faced by far too many of the nation's high schools. Reputable, independent research has exposed alarmingly low graduation rates that were previously hidden behind inaccurate calculations and inadequate data.

Who Is Dropping Out?

Overall, far too many students are not graduating on time with a regular diploma; low-income and minority students fare the worst in the dropout epidemic.

- Each year, approximately 1.2 million students fail to graduate from high school, more than half of whom are from minority groups. [1]
- Nationally, about 71 percent of all students graduate from high school on time with a regular diploma, but barely half of African American and Hispanic students earn diplomas with their peers. In many states the difference between white and minority graduation rates is stunning; in several cases there is a gap of as many as 40 or 50 percentage points.[2]
- A sixteen- to twenty-four-year-old coming from the highest quartile of family income is about seven times as likely to have completed high school as a sixteen- to twenty-four-year-old coming from the lowest quartile.[3]

Where Are Students Dropping Out?

A relatively small number of chronically underperforming high schools are responsible for more than half of the nation's dropouts.

- Approximately two thousand high schools (about 12 percent of American high schools) produce more than half of the nation's dropouts. In these "dropout factories," the number of seniors enrolled is routinely 60 percent or less than the number of freshmen three years earlier.[4]
- Eighty percent of the high schools that produce the most dropouts can be found in a subset of just fifteen states. The majority of dropout factories are located in northern and western cities and throughout the southern states.[5]

Phone 202 828-0828 · Fax 202 828-0821 · www.all4ed.org

- Dropout factories produce 69 percent of all African American dropouts and 63 percent of all Hispanic dropouts, compared to 30 percent of all white dropouts.[6]

Why Do Students Drop Out?

While there is no single reason that students drop out, research indicates that difficult transitions to high school, deficient basic skills, and a lack of engagement serve as prominent barriers to graduation.

- Most dropouts are already on the path to failure in the middle grades and engage in behaviors that strongly correlate to dropping out in high school. Various researchers have identified specific risk factors, such as low attendance or a failing grade, which can identify future dropouts—in some cases as early as sixth grade.[7]
- Ninth grade serves as a bottleneck for many students who begin their freshman year only to find that their academic skills are insufficient for high school-level work. Up to 40 percent of ninth grade students in cities with the highest dropout rates repeat ninth grade; only 10 to 15 percent of those repeaters go on to graduate.[8]
- Academic success in ninth grade course work is highly predictive of eventual graduation; it is even more telling than demographic characteristics or prior academic achievement.[9] Unfortunately, many students are not given the extra support they need to successfully make the transition to high school. As a result, over one third of all dropouts are lost in ninth grade.[10]
- The six million secondary students who comprise the lowest 25 percent of achievement are twenty times more likely to drop out of high school than students in the top-performing quartile.[11]
- Both academic and social engagement are integral components of successfully navigating the education pipeline. Research shows that a lack of student engagement is predictive of dropping out, even after controlling for academic achievement and student background.[12]

What Are the Costs of Dropping Out of High School?

Dropouts suffer from reduced earnings and lost opportunities; there is also a significant social and economic cost to the rest of the nation.

- Over the course of his or her lifetime, a high school dropout earns, on average, about $260,000 less than a high school graduate.[13]
- Dropouts from the Class of 2008 alone will cost the nation more than $319 billion in lost wages over the course of their lifetimes.[14]
- If the United States' likely dropouts from the Class of 2006 had graduated, the nation could have saved more than $17 billion in Medicaid and expenditures for uninsured health care over the course of those young people's lifetimes.[15]
- If U.S. high schools and colleges raise the graduation rates of Hispanic, African American, and Native American students to the levels of white students by 2020, the potential increase in personal income would add more than $310 billion to the U.S. economy.[16]
- Increasing the graduation rate and college matriculation of male students in the United States by just 5 percent could lead to combined savings and revenue of almost $8 billion each year by reducing crime-related costs.[17]

Article 1. Compulsory Education

Sec. 14.30.010. When attendance compulsory. (a) Every child between seven and 16 years of age shall attend school at the public school in the district in which the child resides during each school term. Every parent, guardian or other person having the responsibility for or control of a child between seven and 16 years of age shall maintain the child in attendance at a public school in the district in which the child resides during the entire school term, except as provided in (b) of this section.

(b) This section does not apply if a child

(1) is provided an academic education comparable to that offered by the public schools in the area, either by

(A) attendance at a private school in which the teachers are certificated according to AS 14.20.020;

(B) tutoring by personnel certificated according to AS 14.20.020; or

(C) attendance at an educational program operated in compliance with AS 14.45.100-14.45.200 by a religious or other private school;

(2) attends a school operated by the federal government;

(3) has a physical or mental condition that a competent medical authority determines will make attendance impractical;

(4) is in the custody of a court or law enforcement authorities;

(5) is temporarily ill or injured;

(6) has been suspended or expelled under AS 14.03.160 or suspended or denied admittance under AS 14.30.045;

(7) resides more than two miles from either a public school or a route on which transportation is provided by the school authorities, except that this paragraph does not apply if the child resides within two miles of a federal or private school that the child is eligible and able to attend;

(8) is excused by action of the school board of the district at a regular meeting or by the district superintendent subject to approval by the school board of the district at the next regular meeting;

(9) has completed the 12th grade;

(10) is enrolled in

(A) a state boarding school established under AS 14.16; or

(B) a full-time program of correspondence study approved by the department; in those school districts providing an approved correspondence study program, a student may be enrolled either in the district correspondence program or in the centralized correspondence study program;

(11) is equally well-served by an educational experience approved by the school board as serving the child's educational interests despite an absence from school, and the request for excuse is made in writing by the child's parents or guardian and approved by the principal or administrator of the school that the child attends;
(12) is being educated in the child's home by a parent or legal guardian.
(c) If a parent, legal guardian, or other person having the responsibility for or control of the child elects to enroll a child who is six years of age in the first grade at a public school, after enrollment, the child is subject to the provisions of (a) and (b) of this section. If the parent or guardian of a child who is six years of age and is enrolled in first grade at a public school determines, within 60 days after the child is enrolled, that the best interests of the child are not being served by enrollment in the first grade, the child may be withdrawn from school, and the provisions of (a) and (b) of this section do not apply to the child until the child is seven years of age.

What are the differences between the dropout rate and the graduation rate?

Dropout Rate

The dropout rate is a one-year calculation.

The dropout rate uses enrollment information from grades 7-12.

A student can be reported in the dropout rate over multiple years. If a student dropped out in 2006-07, they would be reported as a dropout. If they returned in 2007-08 and dropped out again, they would be included in that year as a dropout as well.

If a student comes back as a 5th year senior and drops out, they are counted in the dropout rate for that year.

The dropout rate includes any student in grades 7-12 who dropped out in that specific year.

Graduation Rate

The graduation rate is an estimated four-year cohort calculation.

The graduation rate uses enrollment from grades 9-12.

In the graduation rate calculation, the numbers are unduplicated so a student who drops out multiple times is only counted once in the calculation.

If a student comes back as a 5th year senior and does not graduate, it has no impact on the graduation rate. The senior is removed from the calculation because they were already counted against the school as a continuing COA student the previous year.

If a student comes back as a 5th year senior and does graduate, it helps the graduation rate because the student is counted as a graduate in that school year.

The graduation rate includes the 9-12 cumulative unduplicated dropouts over the 4-year cohort.

Senator Hollis French, Chair
Senate Judiciary Committee

RE: Request for Hearing for CSSB 102 - Compulsory School Attendance Age

"An Act relating to compulsory school attendance; and relating to the crime of contributing to the delinquency of a minor."

Dear Senator French:

Senator Davis respectfully requests a hearing by the Senate Judiciary Committee on CSSB 102. A committee substitute was required and adopted by EDU because the first version of SB 102, 26-LS0514\A, inadvertently also included a subsection on truancy from a former bill which was not intended in this bill. This bill increases the compulsory school attendance to age 18 and also necessarily amends the Title 11 section relating to the crime of contributing to the delinquency of a minor to the age 18. As explained infra, this is but one of many steps recommended by the NEA to reduce dropouts and increase graduation rates in Alaska. The bill is supported by Alaska school districts, superintendents, and the Alaska School Board Association.

Included in this hearing package are:

1. Sponsor Statement
2. Explanation of Committee Substitute
3. Committee Substitute for SB 102
4. Sectional Summary of CSSB 102
5. Original Bill, SB 102, 26-LS0514\A
6. Fiscal notes
7. Additional Documentation
8. Anticipated teleconference testimony from educators, parents, and the department

Dear Senator French:

On behalf of the Alaska Peace Officers Association (APOA), I am writing regarding your introduction of SB 110, an act relating to the preservation of evidence.

The APOA State Board's Legislative Committee recently reviewed this proposed legislation and decided to unanimously oppose this bill. We believe this would be over burdensome for a number of agencies. Our suggestion would be amending the bill for time limits and/or storage options after all appeals are exhausted—maybe the Crime Lab.

We urge you to reconsider this legislation. Please contact the APOA office in Anchorage at 277-0515, if you have any questions.

Sincerely,

Angella Long

CS FOR SENATE BILL NO. 110(JUD)

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE - FIRST SESSION

BY THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Offered:
Referred:

Sponsor(s): SENATOR FRENCH

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to the preservation of evidence."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 12.36 is amended by adding a new section to read:

Article 2. Preservation of Evidence.

Sec. 12.36.200. Preservation of evidence. (a) Notwithstanding AS 12.36.010 - 12.36.090, the Department of Law, the Department of Public Safety, the Alaska Court System, or a municipal law enforcement agency shall preserve

(1) all evidence that is obtained in relation to an investigation or prosecution of a crime under AS 11.41.100 - 11.41.130, 11.41.410, or 11.41.434 for the period of time that the crime remains unsolved;

(2) biological evidence in an amount and manner that is sufficient to develop a DNA profile from any material contained in or included on the evidence that was obtained in relation to the prosecution of a person convicted of, or adjudicated a delinquent for, a crime under AS 11.41.100 - 11.41.130, a person convicted of a crime after being indicted under AS 11.41.410 or 11.41.434 while the person remains a prisoner in the custody of the Department of Corrections or subject to registration as a sex offender, or a person adjudicated a delinquent for a crime after the filing of a petition alleging a violation of AS 11.41.410 or 11.41.434 while the person remains committed to a juvenile facility or subject to registration as a sex offender.

(b) Under (a) of this section, an agency is not required to preserve physical evidence of a crime that is of a size, bulk, quantity, or physical character that renders preservation impracticable. When preservation of evidence of a crime is impracticable, the agency shall, before returning or disposing of the evidence, remove and preserve portions of the material likely to contain relevant evidence related to the crime in a quantity sufficient to permit future DNA testing. In making decisions under this section, an agency shall follow written policies on evidence retention.

(c) Upon written request of a person convicted of a crime and a prisoner, adjudicated delinquent for a crime and committed, or subject to registration as a sex offender, an agency shall prepare or provide an inventory of biological evidence that has been preserved under (a)(2) of this section in connection with the person's criminal case.

(d) An agency required to preserve biological evidence under (a) of this section may destroy biological evidence before the expiration of the time period in (a)(2) of this section if

(1) the agency is not required to maintain the evidence under another provision of state or federal law;

(2) the agency mails a certified delivery of notice of intent to destroy evidence to

(A) each person who remains a prisoner or committed or subject to registration as a sex offender for the crime for which the evidence was preserved under (a)(2) of this section;

(B) the attorney of record for each person listed in (A) of this paragraph;

(C) the Public Defender Agency;

(D) the district attorney responsible for prosecuting the crime;

and

(3) no person who is notified under (2) of this subsection, within 120 days after receiving the notice,

(A) files a motion for testing of the evidence; or

(B) submits a written request for continued preservation of the evidence.

(e) Upon receipt of a request for continued preservation of biological evidence under (d)(3)(B) of this section, an agency may petition the court for permission to destroy the evidence. The court may grant the petition if the court finds that the request is without merit or that the evidence has no significant value for biological material.

(f) When an agency is required to produce biological evidence required to be preserved under this section and the agency is unable to locate the evidence, the chief evidence custodian of that agency shall submit an affidavit, executed under penalty of perjury, describing the evidence that could not be located and detailing the efforts taken to locate the evidence.

(g) If a court finds that evidence was destroyed in violation of the provisions of this section, the court may order remedies the court determines to be appropriate.

(h) The unintentional failure of an agency to preserve evidence as required by this section is not a basis for civil liability.

(i) In this section,

(1) "agency" means the Department of Law, the Department of Public Safety, the Alaska Court System, or a municipal law enforcement agency;

(2) "biological evidence" means

(A) the contents of a sexual assault forensic examination kit;

(B) semen, blood, hair, saliva, skin tissue, fingernail scrapings, bone, bodily fluids, or other identifiable human bodily material, collected as part of a criminal investigation;

(C) a slide, swab, or test tube containing material described in (B) of this paragraph; and

(D) swabs or cuttings from items that contain material described in (B) of this section;

(3) "DNA" means deoxyribonucleic acid;

(4) "prisoner" has the meaning given in AS 33.30.901.

 Sec. 2. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

TASK FORCE ON STANDARDS AND TRAINING OF EVIDENCE TECHNICIANS. (a) The Task Force on Standards and Training of Evidence Technicians is created in the Department of Law. The task force consists of the following persons appointed by the governor:

(1) the attorney general;

(2) the public defender;

(3) the director of the office of public advocacy;

(4) a chief of a municipal police department not on the state's interconnected road system;

(5) the commissioner of public safety;

(6) a chief of a municipal police department; and

(7) a representative of the Alaska Innocence Project.

(b) There shall be three ex officio members of the task force as follows:

(1) a member of the House Judiciary Committee selected by the speaker of the house of representatives;

(2) a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee selected by the president of the senate; and

(3) the victims' advocate.

(c) Persons appointed under (a) of this section or identified under (b) of this section may select a designee from the same agency or organization to act on the person's behalf as a member of the task force.

(d) Not later than December 31, 2011, the task force shall

(1) devise standards regarding the proper collection, retention, and cataloging of evidence, for ongoing investigations and prosecutions;

(2) recommend practices, protocols, models, and resources for the cataloging and accessibility of preserved evidence.

* Sec. 3. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

APPLICABILITY. AS 12.36.200, enacted in sec. 1 of this Act, applies to all evidence in the possession of an agency listed in AS 12.36.200(a) on the effective date of this Act for crimes committed before the effective date of this Act and all evidence collected on or after the effective date of this Act.

* Sec. 4. Section 2 of this Act is repealed January 1, 2012.

MEMORANDUM

March 10, 2009

TO: Jerry Luckhaupt, Leg Legal

From: Cindy Smith

RE: new CS for SB110 Preservation of Evidence 26-LS0560\A

Please prepare a Judiciary CS for SB110 with the following amendments:

1. Add language to include juveniles adjudicated for the offenses to the requirements in (2) on page one.

2. On page two in (b) please add language that says that in determining what evidence cannot be kept due to size etc., the agency will abide by its written policies on evidence retention.

3. On page 2 at line 25, after (d), the Department of Law and at least one committee member thought an "and" should be inserted, but we all defer to the wisdom the drafter as to whether this is correct!

4. After (g) on page 3, please add a provision like those developed in victims' rights that provides immunity to agencies from civil suits for unintentional loss or destruction of evidence.

5. Please eliminate the Supreme Court appointment on the task force (page 4 at line 10) and roll the dates back on the task force and the repealer by a year (lines 19 and 30).

6. Please add the provisions on DNA destruction, attached (Law drafted this language - feel free to redraft if/as needed. These are provisions needed to meet CODIS requirements - I don't know if you will need to make any changes to the bill's title or not....

ACTION NARRATIVE

1:37:00 PM
CHAIR HOLLIS FRENCH called the Senate Judiciary Standing Committee meeting to order at 1:37 p.m. Present at the call to order were Senators Elton, Wielechowski, McGuire and French. Senator Therriault arrived soon thereafter.

SB 110-PRESERVATION OF EVIDENCE

1:37:16 PM

CHAIR FRENCH announced the consideration of SB 110. He informed the committee that Lieutenant Dial with the troopers, John Glass and Orin Dym from DPS, and Rebecca Brown with the Innocence Project are online.

CINDY SMITH, Staff to Senator Hollis French, said the concept of SB 110, which is preserving biological evidence, was put forth for the first time last year. Reading from the sponsor statement she stated the following:

> The American system of justice is founded on balancing the twin protections of the rights of those harmed by crimes, and the rights of the accused. Criminal convictions are guided by evidence of innocence or guilt, and no one in the criminal justice system wants innocent people to be convicted of crimes they did not commit. The availability and use of physical evidence at trials and during appeals is a critical part of a meaningful justice system.
> The point of SB 110 is to address the issue by requiring that biological evidence in murder and sexual assault cases is properly retained while cases are unsolved and during the period after conviction that an offender is imprisoned or required to register as a sex offender. The bill does provide for police departments to return or dispose of evidence that's too large to keep after portions of the material that are likely to contain biological evidence have been removed. The bill asks that that evidence also be retained while cases are unsolved. It then provides a notice process for cases where evidence will be destroyed and establishes … a temporary task force.

MS. SMITH provided an explanation of the bill.

Section 1, page 1, requires the Department of Law, the Department of Public Safety, the Alaska Court System, or a municipal law enforcement agency to preserve all evidence that is related to unsolved cases of murder in the first degree, murder in the second degree, manslaughter, criminally negligent homicide, sexual assault in the first degree or child sexual assault in the first degree.

CHAIR FRENCH added that those crimes are listed on page 1, line 9.

MS. SMITH agreed; AS 11.41.100 - AS 11.41.130 are the murder crimes, AS 11.41.410 is sexual assault in the first degree, and AS 11.41.434 is child sexual assault in the first degree.

The bill requires preservation of biological evidence in an amount that is sufficient to develop a DNA profile in cases where the person convicted remains a prisoner in the custody of the state or is subject to registration as a sex offender. "Biological evidence" is defined on page 3, beginning on line 16. The sponsor worked with the Department of Law and the Department of Public Safety to develop a list of kinds of biological evidence including slides, swabs, and contents of forensic kits.

Then the bill provides two broad exceptions to the requirements for evidence preservation. One is if the physical evidence is "of a size, bulk, quantity, or physical character that renders preservation impracticable," it can be returned or disposed of after removal of materials that are likely to contain relevant evidence for DNA testing. The language is intentionally broad and allows agency discretion because of the different storage capabilities at different locations throughout the state. The situation in Nome, for example, may be very different than in the Anchorage area.

The agency may destroy biological evidence, but before doing so it must provide notice of intent to destroy the evidence. There is a list of parties to notify and a process for doing that.

Finally, SB 110 establishes a one-year task force to develop standards and best practices for collection, retention, and storage of evidence.

1:42:45 PM
CHAIR FRENCH asked when the task force will be created.

MS. SMITH said it will be named essentially at the passage of this Act. Page 4, line 19, states that the task force will deliver a report not later than [December 31,] 2010. The task force is repealed January 1, 2011.

ANNE CARPENETI, Assistant District Attorney, Criminal Division, Department of Law (DOL), said testimony from the Department of Public Safety will probably be more helpful, but she has several things to mention.

CHAIR FRENCH said it's worth pointing out that the Department of Law will not have to store any evidence.

MS. CARPENETI agreed. Referring to subsection (b) on page 2, lines 2-7, relating to practicable preservation of physical evidence, she said DOL's only concern is that a small village police department not be held to the same standard of keeping large items as an agency in a larger community.

She pointed out that on page 2, all the standards for disposing of biological need to be met. Therefore, she believes that the word "and" needs to be inserted [at the end of] line 25.

1:45:18 PM
CHAIR FRENCH thanked her for bringing that to their attention.

SENATOR WIELECHOWSKI referred to page 3, lines 10-11, and asked if the state will be exposed to liability if there isn't preservation of evidence.

MS. CARPENETI said that was her third point. DOL would suggest the committee add a provision similar to the domestic violence statute, AS 18.66.180, which provides that state agencies and their employees will not be subject to civil liability.

CHAIR FRENCH said the bill will receive careful consideration and certainly won't move today.

1:47:55 PM
SENATOR THERRIAULT joined the committee.

SENATOR WIELECHOWSKI asked if a person who has been convicted would be able to file an appeal on the grounds that certain evidence wasn't considered and, under this law, that evidence wasn't preserved. "It's something to think about," he said.

MS. CARPENETI said that general statement you're describing has given DOL pause. [Subsection (g) on page 3] says that if the court finds that evidence was destroyed, it may order appropriate remedies. She would read that to mean remedies the court deems appropriate as provided in law so that you could file a post-conviction relief action or something similar. But it has to be some procedure that is available now, she added.

SENATOR ELTON asked if there shouldn't be a provision that protects individuals from somebody who intentionally destroys evidence.

MS. CARPENETI said that could be part of the protection that's included. You could have some standard that everybody knows about such as recklessly or intentionally. She added that she believes they need to protect little police departments in small villages that are doing their best.

CHAIR FRENCH pointed out that a tampering with evidence crime is already in statute. It almost always applies to criminals, but once in awhile you could imagine a police officer tampering with evidence. The charge applies to any violator.

SENATOR WIELECHOWSKI asked if the provision on page 1, lines 11-13, increases the requirements for law enforcement agencies to retain biological evidence.

MS. CARPENETI said the statute doesn't state that this is what police departments have to do now, but she believes there will be testimony that this is what they actually do.

1:51:24 PM
SENATOR THERRIAULT asked how adjudicated minors are handled under this.

MS. CARPENETI said it might not apply to minors because this talks about convictions. Minors aren't convicted for an offense, they're adjudicated. It's something to think about.

SENATOR THERRIAULT asked Senator French if the split was purposeful.

CHAIR FRENCH said no, but it's a good point. Any 16-year-old or 17-year-old who is convicted of an adult crime would have the evidence preserved because it's a conviction, and an unsolved crime would have the evidence preserved. But under the strict reading of the bill, the evidence wouldn't be preserved in the case of a 14-year-old or a 15-year-old who committed an adult crime.

SENATOR THERRIAULT suggested the committee give that some thought.

CHAIR FRENCH said it's a good point because it would seem that the same principle would apply to adults and minors.

SENATOR THERRIAULT asked if there was any specific talk about what happens to the evidence after someone has served their time and is no longer on probation.

MS. CARPENETI said she assumes the evidence would not be retained as long as it isn't a sex crime - sexual abuse of a minor in the first degree and sexual assault of a minor in the first degree. SB 110 requires biological evidence to be retained if someone is indicted for those crimes, but subsequently convicted of a lesser crime. People who are convicted of a sex crime in the first degree have to register as a sex offender for life, and under the bill that means the police would have to retain the evidence for the life of that individual. DOL has concern with that because it could be a long time, but it only applies to biological evidence. Mr. Dym from the crime lab will probably testify that they keep that type of evidence anyway, but this may mean that they'll need more space.

1:54:17 PM
CHAIR FRENCH told her she'll hear the committee ask police officers and the folks who are testifying on behalf of law enforcement the extent to which current practices comport with the bill as written. He believes they'll say that the bill is fairly consistent with what they do now, but it is something they're a bit worried about.

SENATOR WIELECHOWSKI said he'll be interested in hearing about security measures to protect the victims of sexual violence because their DNA will be retained forever.

MS. CARPENETI said she believes Mr. Dym will say they keep that information in different databases.

SENATOR ELTON asked if the language on page 1, lines 8-10, means there is no need to retain evidence once there is a conviction.

MS. CARPENETI explained that paragraph (2) on line 13, talks about preservation of biological evidence if a person is convicted of a crime under [AS 11.41.100-11.41.130]. She believes the sponsor chose these because they are the type of crimes that you have by DNA evidence.

SENATOR ELTON asked what happens to biological evidence that's collected at the scene that doesn't belong to the person who was convicted.

MS. CARPENETI deferred the question.

1:57:42 PM
SENATOR THERRIAULT asked if paragraphs (1), (2) and (3) under subsection (d) on page 2, are connected with an "and" or an "or."

CHAIR FRENCH said Ms. Carpeneti highlighted that earlier and it's a crucial point to square away with the drafters.

1:59:19 PM
BILL OBERLY, Executive Director, Alaska Innocence Project, said he sees SB 110 as securing justice for Alaskans. Alaska needs this legislation because the state has no universal policy on evidence preservation. As it stands now, justice depends on where you live in the state. You're lucky if you live in Galena because as of February 2008 they retain evidence indefinitely as possible exculpatory evidence for potential future appeals and cold case investigations. According to Police Chief Rob Heun, Anchorage retains indefinitely evidence from homicides and sexual assault cases. From there evidence preservation drops precipitously, he said.

SB 110 is limited to evidence in cold cases and those involving homicides and the most serious sex crimes. It calls for retention of all evidence in cold cases and in post conviction cases it calls for retention of evidence likely to contain biological evidence. Referring to page 3, subsection (h)(2)(B), he suggested the committee insert the words "items containing" at the beginning of line17. That would clarify that these are evidentiary items and not just test tubes and things like that. It certainly makes more sense when read with [subsection (b) on page 2] that talks about the size of evidence. He described the provision that calls for preservation of evidence as long as the person has to register as a sex offender appropriate and fair.

MR OBERLY said the bill has practical safety valves related to evidence retention. If the evidence is too big, it allows removal of areas likely to contain relevant biological evidence. It also establishes a procedure for early destruction. Significantly, it provides the impact of destruction in violation of the statute as a remedy rather than a sanction. Hopefully that will address some of the concerns the state has. Finally, it creates a task force to review the standards and practices for collection, retention and cataloging of evidence. This will allow the state to look at how this law is working and tweak it where necessary. The bill allows for extraction of portions of material likely to contain relevant evidence and he would suggest waiting for the task force report before placing further limitations on the size of items to be retained.

MR OBERLY said His final comments relate to the benefits of SB 110. First, it will improve and standardize cold case evidence retention, which doesn't currently exist. Second, it will ensure that individuals with viable claims of actual innocence will have the evidence that can establish their innocence. Third, this will help bring actual perpetrators to justice because when someone is wrongly convicted there is a perpetrator who has not been caught. Finally, there is a fiscal benefit. Justice For All grant money is available and could be used to upgrade DNA testing, help with the DNA work backlog and help identify and test claims of wrongful conviction. The money is available to states that have a statewide evidence retention statute, which is what SB 110 provides.

BARBARA BRICK, representing herself and speaking as a board member of the Alaska Innocence Project, said she was a public defender in Alaska for 23 years. During that time there were huge increases in technology. In 1982 it was a big deal to get facsimile machines and word processors and today she can't imagine the practice of law without a computer. Similar advances have been made in scientific evidence including fingerprinting, firearm analysis, bite mark identification, blood spatter, hair analysis, and handwriting analysis. Each has been hailed as an advance and gave the sense that they were reliable and provided trustworthiness to jury decisions.

But last week the National Academy of Science issued findings and conclusions indicating that these items of evidence that had been used nationwide to convict or exonerate people were, for the most part, handled by poorly-trained technicians. Furthermore, their reports and testimony exaggerated the accuracy of their methodologies as well as their conclusions. A primary reason for drawing this conclusion was that none of the scientific laboratories were truly independent or objective. Instead they were closely affiliated with law enforcement and the prosecution and the work was done by human beings, all of whom are fallible. This isn't the first time that scientific evidence has been discredited, she said. In 2004 the FBI had to notify hundreds of potentially wrongfully convicted individuals because the reliability of chemical bullet analysis had been far overstated.

MS. BRICK said she provided the history lesson because most people today believe that DNA evidence is the be-all and end-all. It's true that 124 people who were on death row after they went through jury trials and lost their appeals have been exonerated and advances in DNA testing techniques have exonerated over 200 people nationwide. That's the state of the state today, but she would like a preservation of evidence bill to cover things that haven't been thought of.

Preservation of evidence is critical because it can help exonerate innocent people and help prosecute people who aren't identifiable at the time of the crime. Less than 10 percent of violent crimes involve DNA evidence so an evidence preservation bill like SB 110, which limits its approach to biological evidence, may be missing an opportunity for greater justice. It only applies to a narrow category of crimes and a narrow category of biological evidence if the case has been solved. It's a good start, but we don't know what advances in technology are going to be made in the future and it seems that we're doing ourselves a disservice as far as unsolved crimes and their consequences, she said. Every piece of preserved evidence has the potential to improve justice.

MS. BRICK said it's been important to the people who work in criminal justice that there is just one standard of justice statewide and Alaska's preservation of evidence policies need reform to do the same. Procedures need to be standardize so that the amount of justice and public safety that's available does not depend on where a person happens to live or what the local police remember to put in the refrigerator. "We can do better than that," she said.

2:14:32 PM
RICH NORGARD, Board President, Alaska Innocence Project, said he is also speaking on his own behalf as someone who has worked in the criminal justice system for 16 years. He said he echoes what Ms. Brink said. SB 110 is needed because we know that testing has changed dramatically over the years and we just don't know what we might be able to test tomorrow. DNA testing may be just the tip of the iceberg.

MR. NORGARD urged the committee to pass SB 110 with the changes that the National Innocence Project submitted and those Mr. Oberly recommended. He cautioned against narrowing the bill and emphasized that it needs to say that items containing biological evidence will be preserved - not just the biological evidence itself. He encouraged passing a strong bill that preserves evidence now and for the future.

REBECCA BROWN, Policy Analyst, Innocence Project, described SB 110 as a reform whose time has come. She explained that the Innocence Project was founded in 1992 at the Benjamin Cardozo School of Law to exonerate the innocent through post-conviction DNA testing. Since that time forensic DNA testing has proven the innocence of 232 people and identified the real perpetrator in 100 of those cases. None of this would have been possible without the proper preservation of biological evidence. She cited the Ricky Johnson case, which shows the promise that new technology holds for solving long-forgotten cases. It's a testament to the crime-solving potential of modern DNA technology, she said.

MS. BROWN said that evidence rooms across the country have become crime solving gold mines and it's understandable that evidence custodians become concerned when legislation is considered that will require them to save evidence for which they have little room. But SB 110 is incredibly modest compared to other retention laws across the country. It only requires retention of evidence in a very narrow category of serious violent offenses. In fact the language in Section 1, subsection (b), is consistent with the federal standard. The federal government also issued regulations to make the law practicable and she would encourage Alaska to look at those federal regulations for guidance. There is no sanction identified in this law so no one is going to be liable in the small number of cases where a mistake might happen, she said.

MS. BROWN said the creation of a task force will ensure that a range of stakeholders can take part in a deliberative process to consider the contours of the issue over time. This expert work will allow for reasoned refinements. It may narrow the concept of retention and it may consider expanded retention policies. The provision of guidance and direction to evidence custodians won't create an unfunded mandate and may well save money over time by creating space for future evidence through the identification of evidence that can be lawfully destroyed, she said.

Safeguarding biological evidence is in the interest of all members of the criminal justice community - from crime victims to law enforcement to the wrongfully convicted. Often when the innocent are exculpated, the guilty are identified through CODIS hits, she said. Many states realize that their retention policies have not kept up with DNA advances. Just last year three states passed laws mandating the preservation of biological evidence in several crime categories. SB 110 promises to shape an evidence management policy that is respectful of Alaska's specific concerns articulated by a range of stakeholders. "I think this is a wonderful bill," she said.

ORIN DYM, Forensic Laboratory Manager, Department of Public Safety (DPS), said he would first respond to some of the questions that have come up. First he clarified that victim DNA samples are not uploaded into the national CODIS database system. When a case comes in for analysis it may have from one to several hundred items of evidence. He and his staff first look at the most intimate and probative pieces of evidence and work out to the least intimate and least probative. Depending on what they find, not all the evidence will be analyzed.

If a piece of evidence is analyzed, a sample is obtained where biological evidence is expected to be present. Those samples are retained by the laboratory indefinitely. But if an item is not looked at in the laboratory - perhaps because they have body swabs that contain sufficient evidence - it will never be opened, looked at or sampled in the laboratory and nothing will be retained.

MR. DYM commented that although people are very proud that DNA has exonerated 200 people in the last several years, he can say that exonerations are happening every day with DNA in the laboratory. Not every DNA exam identifies a suspect; more often than not it eliminates an individual as a suspect.

MR. DYM expressed concern about laboratory resources. They already retain many samples that technically belong to law enforcement agencies throughout the state because they recognize that most law enforcement agencies throughout the state do not have sufficient resources and expertise to store these samples properly. We are committed to retaining and storing these samples properly and that's what we've done, he said.

The existing crime laboratory has had 500 square feet of storage space for the last 22 years. It simply is not enough so there is a resource issue with the storage of samples, he said. The laboratory also have a great number of biological samples that predate computerization and he recognizes that those have to be brought up to computer standards for easy tracking and ready preparation of lists of where evidence is located.

2:28:14 PM
SENATOR ELTON asked if some of the things that are collected at a crime scene that are not initially tested are, in fact, evidence.

MR. DYM said yes; evidence that is not analyzed the first time through may become highly probative later on.

SENATOR ELTON said that's what he wanted to hear because then the laboratory would be required to hold as evidence everything else that may have been collected but not tested.

MR. DYM said that's correct. He's looked at the possibility of screening more evidence when a case initially comes in, but there is absolutely no space in the existing laboratory to place an additional biological screener. The next issue that comes up relates to an agency that wants to dispose of the clothing or chair or jeep seat that hasn't been analyzed. He believes that it falls to the crime laboratory to evaluate and sample that item. That too impacts the laboratory.

SENATOR ELTON questioned adding $40,000 in cost to the bill when the laboratory already needs more space to store evidence. "That's just a question that I might ask at finance," he said.

2:32:04 PM
MR. DYM said we'll address that there.

SENATOR WIELECHOWSKI asked if everything in a room that is splattered with blood is typically preserved as evidence.

MR. DYM said it depends, but potentially everything is submitted to the laboratory. In general they would not retain the entire item. Rather, they would swab blood samples or cellular material that might be present from the item and retain the swab. In the case of a picture that has 27 droplets of blood, they might photograph the document and only collect and retain 2 or 3 representative droplets.

SENATOR WIELECHOWSKI asked how he might examine this committee room; 17 people are present and DNA is everywhere.

MR. DYM said they rely on the investigators to apply good detective work to determine what might have scientific value and limit the number of samples collected.

2:34:31 PM
CHAIR FRENCH asked how full the 500 square foot crime laboratory evidence room is now, how long it has taken to get that full, and when it will be physically impossible to fit anything else in.

MR. DYM replied it's been full since he arrived 1.5 years ago. Recently they installed a CONEX container to hold non-evidentiary items to free closet space in the laboratory for evidence storage and they might be able to utilize a closet in the back of the boiler room to handle evidence overflow. Also, they've quadrupled the volume of evidence they ship back to agencies. Things that are not related to DNA are shipped back.

CHAIR FRENCH asked what in this bill is specifically different from current practice.

MR. DYM said the bill requires more evidence to be sampled and retained than current practice. Before agencies dispose of items that have been returned, they will probably send those items back to the laboratory for sampling or identification of potential biological evidence.

2:37:25 PM
JOHN GLASS, Deputy Commissioner, Department of Public Safety, said he is available to answer questions.

RODNEY DIAL, Lieutenant, Alaska State Troopers, Department of Public Safety (DPS), provided an overview of DPS evidence procedures at trooper posts across the state. Currently department evidence custodians are required to be knowledgeable of Alaska statutes that apply to evidence. Those include AS 12.36 and AS 34.45, which relate to disposal of evidence. They are also required to be knowledgeable of the department's operating procedures manual and the detachment SOPs. Before evidence is disposed of, the custodian must have one or more of the following: written authorization from the case officer, a court order, permission from the district attorney's office, or permission from the state medical examiner. Standard practice is to retain evidence from serious crimes for a significant amount of time. Retention is also dependent on factors such as statute of limitations, involved parties, whether or not appeals have been exhausted, and if it's reasonably believed that there is no value in continuing to retain the evidence.

Referring to the question about exculpatory evidence, he explained that evidence in cases where a person was convicted of a crime is retained until the department obtains a release from the district attorney's office.

CHAIR FRENCH asked whether the DA's office allows evidence to be disposed of before a person is released from prison.

LIEUTENANT DIAL said yes, but generally not in murder cases or other serious violent offenses where appeals are expected.

2:40:21 PM
SENATOR ELTON asked what kind of training occurs now and what might be envisioned after the task force is finished.

LIEUTENANT DIAL explained that all academy recruits receive basic procedures and instructions on evidence handling, collection, and preservation techniques. Once they're in the field they go through additional field training. At most trooper posts primary and secondary evidence custodians are identified. They must be knowledgeable of the statutes relating to the collection of evidence as well as the department's operating procedures manual. Detachment commanders are also required to inventory evidence facilities on a regular basis to ensure that those standards are adhered to. It's an ongoing process of following rigid guidelines coupled with oversight, he said.

SENATOR ELTON asked if the current training procedures are good enough to assume that the task force wouldn't suggest more training.

LIEUTENANT DIAL said he believes more training would be required before taking steps to dispose of certain types of evidence in certain cases.

2:43:16 PM
MIKE MOBERLY, representing himself, Anchorage, said he works in the courts on a daily basis and believes that everyone in the process works hard to see that the right results occur. But it doesn't always happen. "One needs only to look at the disproportionate representation of minorities or economically disadvantaged peoples in custody to know that that just isn't the case." SB 110 is a modest effort to ensure that convictions that are obtained are sound and that we can have confidence in the system. He said he supports legislation that reasonably preserves evidence to provide confidence in the outcome that's obtained through the justice system.

CHAIR FRENCH closed public testimony and held SB 110 in committee for further work.

2:45:25 PM
There being no further business to come before the committee, Chair French adjourned the Senate Judiciary Standing Committee at 2:45 pm.

Senator Hollis French
Alaska Senate
Juneau, AK 99801

Dear Hollis,

Further to our brief conversation about your bill on evidence SB110 I have two concerns that might be addressed in your bill.

RELAEASE OF EVIDENCE TO THE VICTIM
I have a constituent who runs a boat building shop. Two "potential customers" visited his shop, looked around and left. That night $35,000 worth of boxed marine electronics were stolen. The shop owner called APD filed a report and then got busy trying to locate his client's stolen equipment. He found most of it in local hock shops and some on Craig's list. He also got most of the information on the perpetrator's identities which he turned over to APD. The police probably had other priorities and I do not think that a trial has happened yet. Never the less, the boat builder has been forced to purchase identical equipment for his client because the police have not released the stolen evidence, even after 2+ years.

I have done some research and it appears that our state statues do a good job of authorizing the release of evidence after police have recorded it (generally photographs) and documented the chain of custody. The problem is that it largely doesn't happen. I talked with Walt Monegan and one prosecutor and it seems that the victim's property problem is not high priority for the overworked prosecutors and they have to get an approval form the defense attorney to release the stolen goods. Walt says the prosecutor could by-pass the defense attorney problem by going to a magistrate for release approval, but that is a bit of a hassle.

At Walt's suggestion, I am going to write to the State and local prosecutors offices, asking them to help these stolen property victims. I may also contact the Attorney General's office.

I would like you to consider adding a sentence or section to your bill making it very clear that police and prosecutors have a clear duty to get stolen material returned to the victims as soon as possible except in the rare cases when the properties appearance in court is essential to the prosecution's case.

RETENTION OF DNA FOR INNOCENT CITIZENS

I have a UofA professor in my area who is adamant that when a citizen's DNA is taken by law enforcement, it should be destroyed when the citizen is no longer being considered for criminal prosecution. The civil libertarian part of me is attracted to this issue but I understand the other considerations. Lt. Dave Parker of APD says that DNA often proves more people innocent than guilty. I am of two minds about this and I would appreciate your thoughts on it. I did tell my constituent Bill Kirk that I would talk to you about it.

I would greatly appreciate your consideration of both of these issues.

INNOCENCE PROJECT

Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, Yeshiva University

WRITTEN TESTIMONY OF REBECCA BROWN
POLICY ANALYST, INNOCENCE PROJECT
BEFORE THE ALASKA SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITEE
RE: SB 110 – AN ACT RELATING TO THE PRESERVATION OF EVIDENCE
FEBRUARY 25, 2009

Thank you for the opportunity to speak before you today and submit written comments for your consideration of SB 110, which would mandate the preservation of certain probative biological evidence and create a task force for the development of standards on the same.

In the emerging DNA era, preserving and readily retrieving evidence from adjudicated cases has clear benefits for all members of the criminal justice system. As we recognize the incredible identification power of DNA evidence, it has also become clear that amazing crime solving potential resides, latent, in biological evidence from crime scenes. Innocence claims can be settled. "No subject" cold cases can be solved. True culprits can be identified. In addition, crime scene DNA can provide "value added" by enabling us to link an unknown perpetrator of a given crime to other crimes - across time periods and across jurisdictions.

In the Justice for All Act of 2004, Congress recognized the importance of preserved biological evidence by strongly enhancing federal preservation of evidence policies and making hundreds of millions of dollars in authorized state grant programs contingent upon proper preservation practices. In doing so, Congress recognized that modernizing evidence retention practices not only benefits the potentially innocent; properly preserved biological evidence also allows law enforcement to solve decades-old, previously unsolvable cases.

Determining questions of fact in our criminal justice system is an unavoidably imperfect venture. While the system surely gets it right in the vast majority of cases, in an important minority of cases credible questions of innocence linger. Where that is the case, post-conviction DNA testing of biological evidence can also provide true finality in the face of lingering doubt by proving guilt or strong evidence of actual innocence. To be able to ensure justice, however, that biological evidence must have been preserved, and saved in such a way that it can be located when necessary.

A clear examination of all facets of this issue will show that the benefits of ensuring a comprehensive evidence preservation scheme far outweigh the costs, that it is an endeavor most efficiently and effectively undertaken statewide, and that changes to current practice will enhance Alaska's crime-solving potential.

Technological advances make preserved evidence a critically important tool for justice

Modern DNA technology, coupled with today's comprehensive information and communications technology, has exponentially increased the power of preserved evidence, to levels unimaginable just a generation ago. DNA found at crime scenes can now, with a simple keystroke, be compared to DNA found at other crime scenes as well as the DNA of millions of individuals, thereby linking previously un-linkable cases and perpetrators to one another. As a result, evidence preservation practices that may have seemed adequate – if still a bit disconcerting – in the early 1980's are today an incredible waste of criminal justice potential. Our governments can be forgiven for their failure to anticipate the future power of preserved evidence, but there is no excuse for perpetuating this situation in light of preserved evidence's new power to provide justice in some of our most serious and violent cases.

Many of these serious and violent cases could not have been solved even a few years ago. A review of the National Institute of Justice's list of items where biological evidence can be found in criminal cases illustrates the variety of items that can be successfully tested with improved technology: fingernail scrapings analyzed with Y DNA tests; skins cells in the hinge of eyeglasses; dandruff, saliva, hair, sweat, and skin cells from hats, bandanas and masks; saliva cells on tape or ligatures; traces of blood on a bullet; traces of blood and/or hairs on, or in the crevices of, a variety of weapons used to inflict injury; or even blood and tissue cells swabbed from the bullet inside a gun, identifying the person who might have last loaded it.[1] The list of these evidence items that are being successfully tested now, but could never have been tested successfully only a few years ago, is enormous. I have attached an appendix to this statement in which I describe just a few cases where innocence was proven through more modern DNA testing methods.

Tapping this potential is as simple as properly identifying, collecting, preserving, storing, and organizing biological crime scene evidence. The task before Alaska is to undertake this process in order to make evidence– and in particular, biological evidence - readily accessible when it is sought to advance justice.

The alternative is for Alaska to fail to preserve evidence in a manner that allows its ready retrieval. This would needlessly result in failure to solve solvable crimes and denial of justice to victims. It would also prevent the wrongfully convicted from proving their innocence and leave the public at large vulnerable to previously unidentified offenders who are eminently identifiable.

SB 110: A Conservative Approach

As compared to other state laws mandating the preservation of evidence, SB 110 has a modest approach. While some states go so far as to require biological evidence retention in all crimes, or even all felony crimes, SB 110 defines a narrow category of crimes for which evidence must be preserved (e.g. A.S. 11.41.100- 11.41.130; 11.41.410; or 11.41.434). Further, while SB 110 requires the preservation of "all evidence" associated with certain unsolved crimes, it creates a restricted threshold for the retention of biological evidence associated with those cases in which an innocent person might seek to obtain postconviction DNA testing. For these cases, SB 110 only requires that biological evidence "in an amount and manner that is sufficient to develop a DNA profile" is retained.

Indeed, because the evidence that is preserved for the purposes of solving a cold case is no different from the type of evidence that is retained for the purposes of settling an innocence claim, I would recommend the following small changes to the proposed legislation:

[1] In the 2002 report by the National Institute of Justice, "Using DNA to Solve Cold Cases" available at http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/194197.pdf, the authors identify "some common items of evidence that may have been collected previously but not analyzed for the presence of DNA evidence (Exhibit 4), p. 21.

1) In section (a)(2), I recommend changing the term "all evidence" to "biological evidence" so that the entire clause reads: "~~all~~ biological evidence that is obtained in relation to an investigation or prosecution of a crime under A.S. 11.41.100- 11.41.130, 11.41.410, or 11.41.434 for the period of time that the crime remains unsolved."

   This recommendation is based on the idea that there should be no differentiation between evidence saved for the purposes of solving a cold case and evidence saved for the purposes of settling a claim of innocence. The guidelines defining what evidence should be retained should be the same in both scenarios. By making this change to the language, it will be made clear to evidence custodians that there is only one standard guiding what evidence needs to be retained.

2) In section (h)(2)(B), for the purposes of clarity, I would add the following clause: "any physical item that contains semen, blood, hair, saliva, skin tissue, fingernail scrapings, bone, bodily fluids, or other identifiable human material, collected as part of the criminal investigation."

   This recommendation is predicated on the notion that biological evidence itself is generally culled from physical items collected at crime scenes. In many cases, those physical items contain biological evidence that was never tested at trial. Under the framework currently contemplated in SB 110, a test tube containing an extract of what is believed to be probative biological material from trial may be preserved for posterity, while the physical item from which that extract was obtained and that may contain other additional evidence that would prove more probative, can be destroyed. Since this legislation already contains a clause aimed at addressing law enforcement concerns about the possible burden of saving unnecessary evidence (i.e. allowing a police agency to use its discretion in destroying bulk items of evidence), adding this language will clarify the desire to retain that evidence which has the ability to shed light on innocence and guilt.

These modest changes promise to bring clarity to the legislative intent of SB 110, ensuring that probative evidence in Alaska's most serious and violent crimes is retained for DNA testing using modern testing methods. In addition, SB 110 also creates a task force charged with the creation of standards and training for evidence custodians. Such an approach ensures that a range of stakeholders can take part in a deliberative process that considers all of the contours of the issue in a thoughtful way over time. The task force may decide that a narrower conception of evidence retention may be appropriate, and the creation of an expert work group will allow for reasoned refinements or, perhaps, the consideration of an expanded retention policy. In the following section, I humbly offer some ideas for consideration by the task force.

Recommended steps to properly store and organize preserved evidence in Alaska

Even the most well-intentioned evidence custodian can only do as good a job as the system allows. Systemic changes are needed. Order can only be brought to chaos through legislation such as this, which defines those crime categories for which evidence must be preserved and the manner in which it should be retained. A law like this will also ensure uniformity of practice across jurisdictions statewide, so that the availability of evidence does not depend on the jurisdiction in which the crime was committed.

Other jurisdictions, recognizing the crime-solving potential of old evidence for cold cases and observing the miscarriages of justice likely to occur when innocence claims cannot be addressed, have undertaken just such a process. For instance, police officials in Charlotte, NC, America's 5th largest urban region, launched an initiative in 1995 to re-catalogue all of its evidence. In nine months, all of Charlotte's evidence was re-catalogued and placed in one 6,700 square foot storage space. Following the re-cataloguing of old evidence, Charlotte's Police Department formed a Homicide Cold Case Unit. To date, the Cold Case Unit has cleared fifteen cases, charged fourteen persons with murder and is actively investigating a dozen reopened cases. The re-cataloguing and bar-coding of old evidence, as was accomplished in Charlotte, is one method Alaska should consider, both statewide and/or in key jurisdictions. These are questions that are perhaps best answered by the task force which would be established by SB 110.

There are a number of steps that the task force established in this legislation might consider to effectively preserve, organize, and make accessible biological evidence in the state of Alaska. The expert task force that would be established by this legislation – representing key stakeholders from different corners of the criminal justice system – is well-positioned to study and discuss this issue thoroughly, and outside of the glare of the political spotlight. Evidence, after all, belongs to the People, and not any one side. The Task Force's recommendations for a comprehensive evidence preservation scheme for the state of Alaska could include consideration of the following:

- Definition of the Proper Period of Preservation: The Justice For All Act mandates the preservation of biological evidence connected to federal crimes for the period of time in which a defendant remains incarcerated in connection with that crime. It is the position of the Innocence Project that biological evidence should be preserved in all cases where it may be probative, for at least as long as a sentence or collateral consequence of a wrongful conviction is in effect. Biological evidence, as a general principle, should also be preserved as long as a case remains unsolved, so that it is readily available to law enforcement officers investigating old cases. Although if SB 110 were to become law, it would mandate the preservation of biological evidence in certain discrete crime categories, this Task Force should soberly assess the potential risks involved in destroying evidence associated with crime categories before the conclusion of a case resolution and/or the completion of a sentence, including the collateral consequences of a conviction.
- The Manner in Which Evidence Should Be Preserved
- The Amount of Evidence Which Should be Preserved
- Determining Where Evidence is Kept: Identification all of the facilities (courthouses; hospitals; laboratories; prosecutors' offices; etc.) where old evidence is currently stored.
- Inventory of Evidence: Provision of a brief description of the evidence located in each facility.
- Repackaging Evidence: The repackaging, as necessary, of all relevant biological evidence that may be vulnerable to degradation.
- The Organization and Cataloguing of Evidence by Case: The identification and inventorying of all voucher numbers associated with evidence, ensuring that all pieces of evidence associated with a particular case are grouped together, and identifying a means through which that evidence can be readily located. This can be accomplished, as was done in Charlotte, through a bar coding system. Such automated systems have enabled jurisdictions such as Salt Lake City, UT, Phoenix and Tucson, AZ, and El Paso, TX to realize the full-scale crime-solving potential of biological evidence. Alaska might consider the jurisdictions in which such a system may be advisable and practicable.

- Contemplation of Remedies That Should Be Offered If Evidence is Destroyed: The task force may further consider the articulation of remedies for those whose innocence claims that can never be settled in the face of evidence destruction.
- Clearly Articulated Policies and Procedures/Training: Finally, the task force should consider the substance of uniform statewide policies directing the preservation and accessibility of biological evidence for all evidence custodians in the state. The task force will also need to address attendant training needs so that evidence custodians can ensure the proper implementation of such policies and guidelines.

Conclusion

With today's technology, preserved evidence is nothing less than a goldmine of potential justice. Crimes can be solved, thus enhancing public safety and serving the victims whose cases were never before solved; and the innocent and their families will no longer have to endure the terrible nightmare of a wrongful conviction.

But as long as this important issue is largely ignored, victims, the wrongfully convicted, and the public at large are denied access to this incredible crime solving potential that is in our possession, yet beyond access. Indeed, reforming evidence preservation policies are integral to a 21st century justice system in the state of Alaska.

The reliability of our criminal justice system cannot depend on the serendipitous discovery of evidence. By establishing a reasonable evidence preservation policy that is both comprehensive and provides ready access to those in need, Alaska will tap into the potential of preserved evidence – and more importantly, provide Alaskans with the quality of justice that it would be unconscionable to deny.

By empowering a cross-section of experts from throughout your criminal justice system to explore this subject and issue recommendations, you have greatly increased Alaska's ability to identify the most effective steps for enhancing the proper collection, retention, preservation, and cataloguing of biological evidence. And by conducting your business in the thorough and balanced manner which seems assured, you will provide other states with a model for addressing such questions, and ultimately improve the accuracy and justice of their systems as well.

Thank you for the opportunity to share these views with you. I hope you will contact me if there is any additional information that I can provide on the subject.

APPENDIX – Case Studies Demonstrating the Critical Need to Preserve Evidence and/or the Value of Subjecting Old Evidence to Modern DNA Testing Methods

Luis Diaz: Luiz Diaz's case involved multiple rapes. Although he was convicted in 1980, it wasn't until 2005 that Mr. Diaz was released from a Florida prison after DNA testing of a rape kit proved that he was not the notorious "Bird Road Rapist." This individual had been responsible for the attacks, and in some cases sexual assaults, of more than twenty-five women. By the time Mr. Diaz petitioned for testing in 2003, the only evidence that could be located was one rape kit, which was sent to a private lab in California. As the results were awaited, more evidence from the same case was located and sent to the Miami Dade Police Department Crime Lab. In June of 2005, testing results from both labs indicated that the male profile that was found did not match Mr. Diaz. Prosecutors then searched for evidence in all of the cases attributed to the Bird Road Rapist. Only one rape kit was located from an uncharged crime that occurred in August 1979. This kit was sent to the Miami Dade Police Department Crime Laboratory. The results indicated that, again, Luis Diaz was not the male contributor to the semen evidence. Further, the tests yielded evidence that the same unknown male had raped both victims, thereby providing investigators with important information with which to pursue the cold cases. Had the evidence in Mr. Diaz's case been lost or destroyed, he would have died in prison. None of the evidence in Mr. Diaz's case had previously been subjected to DNA analysis, as the technology was simply unavailable at the time of his conviction.

Chad Heins: Chad Heins, another Floridian, was convicted of the rape and murder of his sister-in-law. Several pieces of evidence had been collected at the crime scene, including hairs that excluded Mr. Heins, fingernail scrapings taken from under the victim's nails, and the bedsheet where the rape and murder took place. At the time of the trial in 1994, DNA testing methods were not advanced enough to identify any semen on the bedsheet or to yield a profile from the fingernail scrapings. As a result, the only biological evidence available at the time of trial was the hair evidence and prosecutors successfully argued that a stray hair from a stranger had accidentally ended up in the victim's bedroom. Mr. Heins first sought post-conviction DNA testing in 2001, and DNA tests that were eventually performed in 2003 using a more modern STR DNA testing method. The tests demonstrated that the hairs collected from the victim's bed matched to the fingernail scrapings, and that these pieces of evidence could not be tied to Mr. Heins. A more modern STR DNA testing method also demonstrated that there was, indeed, semen from the victim's bedsheet and that it also matched to the unknown man. Mr. Heins was released from prison 13 years after his conviction. This case study demonstrates the impact that modern DNA testing methods can have, teaching us that old evidence – such as the semen-stained bedsheet – that might never have been subjected to more than presumptive DNA testing could be tested today and yield a valuable crime-solving profile.

Scott Fappiano: Scott Fappiano was convicted of a rape in 1985 and consistently maintained his innocence throughout his incarceration. While a wealth of samples had been collected from the crime scene, DNA technology at the time was not sufficient to produce a result that would conclusively identity the perpetrator of the heinous crime for which he was convicted. Some exhibits containing biological evidence used at trial were returned to the DA's office; others were vouchered and sent to New York Police Department evidence storage facilities. Two items of evidence – the rape kit and a pair of sweatpants containing semen stains—were sent in 1989 by the DA's office to a now-defunct DNA laboratory called Lifecodes, which at the time performed rudimentary DNA analysis for the state of New York. DNA in the late 1980's was limited, and although Lifecodes found semen to be present on the available evidence, they could not produce a conclusive result. In 1998, more advanced DNA testing methods had developed and a search for the original crime scene evidence was initiated. The DA's office fully cooperated with a search of its storage areas, but none of the original exhibits could be located. A similar search of NYPD storage facilities yielded nothing. After a long and uncertain search, Orchid Cellmark, a private DNA laboratory in Texas which had, after a series of mergers, taken over the Lifecodes lab, was contacted. Remarkably, in August of 2005, two test tubes containing biological samples from the crime scene were located. DNA testing of those extracts, using more progressive DNA testing methods, excluded Mr. Fappiano. He was freed from prison in October of 2006 – 21 years after his wrongful conviction. Had the liquid DNA material not been preserved by a private lab, Mr. Fappiano would still be in prison despite his actual innocence. Like Mr. Heins's case, Mr. Fappiano's case also demonstrates the value of subjecting preserved biological evidence to modern DNA testing methods.

Calvin Willis: Calvin Willis was convicted in 1982 of the brutal rape of a ten-year-old girl in Louisiana. Critical evidence had been collected, including a rape kit that contained fingernail scrapings, a bedspread, the victim's underwear and nightgown, and a pair of boxer shorts that were left on the couch at the crime scene. DNA testing wasn't yet available and so the state crime lab performed conventional serological testing on the rape kit evidence and blood typing on stains from the nightgown and bedspread. Because the victim is a type A secretor and Willis is an O secretor, he could not be excluded as the contributor to the stain. Perhaps even more troubling, Mr. Willis was identified through a flawed lineup procedure. In 1998, our office accepted his case and DNA testing was performed on the boxer shorts and the fingernail scrapings. Mr. Willis was excluded from being a contributor to any of the samples. He was released from prison in 2003, after having spent more than 21 years behind bars. Had it not been for the preserved evidence – which had not previously been subjected to DNA testing – Mr. Willis would still be in prison since he had been sentenced to life without parole.

Rickey Johnson: Rickey Johnson was convicted in1983 of aggravated rape and was sentenced to life without parole in Louisiana's Angola Farm Prison. His conviction was secured based upon the strength of conventional serological testing and an eyewitness identification made by the victim. With the case going to trial years before DNA tests were to become a common law-enforcement tool, no DNA tests were performed on the evidence. Throughout his ordeal, Mr. Johnson maintained his innocence and held out hope that the truth would one day be discovered. In 2006, after the Innocence Project took on Mr. Johnson's case, the DA agreed to test vaginal swabs from the rape kit using conventional STR testing. The tests produced just three markers--enough to potentially exculpate Mr. Johnson, but not a sufficient number to help identify the perpetrator. In 2007, a new form of STR testing, minifiler-STR, was performed. Minifiler-STR makes possible the examination of badly degraded evidence. Through the use of this new technology, eight additional markers were found, yielding a full profile. That profile not only proved Mr. Johnson's innocence, thereby leading to his exoneration, but also enabled the evidence to be run through CODIS. The process resulted in a CODIS hit and the true perpetrator, a man who was housed in the same prison as Mr. Johnson himself, was identified. Mr. Johnson's case shows the promise that new technology holds for solving long forgotten cases and is a testament to the crime solving potential of modern day DNA technology.

Sponsor Statement
Senate Bill 110 Preservation of Evidence

The American system of justice is founded on balancing the twin protections of the rights of those harmed by crimes, and the rights of the accused. Criminal convictions are guided by evidence of innocence or guilt, and no one in the criminal justice system wants innocent people to be convicted of crimes they did not commit. The availability and use of physical evidence at trials and during appeals is a critical piece of a meaningful justice system.

Modern DNA technology, coupled with today's comprehensive information and communications technologies, has exponentially increased the power of preserved evidence. Preserved evidence can solve cold cases and prove or disprove claims of innocence in ways unimaginable just a few years ago. The problem is, however, that evidence collection and preservation policies have not always kept pace with these new technologies.

Senate Bill 110 begins to address this issue by requiring that biological evidence in murder and sexual assault cases is properly retained while cases are unsolved and during the period after conviction that an offender is imprisoned or required to register as a sex offender. The bill still provides for police departments to return or dispose of evidence too large to keep after portions of the material likely to contain biological evidence have been removed and preserved. The bill provides for a notice process in cases where evidence will be destroyed, and it establishes a temporary task force to look at other issues involved in this emerging field of technology and make recommendations on standards and practices in cataloging and handling evidence.

Recently in Denver, Colorado a young man who had been convicted of murder at the age of 15 and who served over a decade in prison was released and his conviction was vacated as a result of DNA evidence that proved his innocence. And in cases closer to home, DNA was used after 13 years to identify a suspect in the murder of Bonnie Craig, a UAA student. The preservation of evidence is a vital and effective way to ensure the criminal justice system meets its goal of protecting the innocent and convicting the guilty. Join me in supporting this important bill.

Prison inmate charged in Bonnie Craig killing

DNA Database connects man held Outside to 1994 slaying of Anchorage teen.

By MEGAN HOLLAND
Anchorage Daily News

A grand jury has charged a former Anchorage man with murder in the slaying of Bonnie Craig, an 18-year-old college student who was raped and savagely beaten before she toppled over a cliff into a creek in 1994.

Kenneth Dion, now 37 and in prison in New Hampshire for a series of armed robberies, has also been charged with rape in one of the most highly publicized and emotional slayings in Anchorage in recent decades.

DNA evidence that prosecutors say links Dion to the slaying was central to the solution, according to cold-case investigators.

"It's a major step in a case that was of significance to Anchorage and a burden to the family for years," prosecutor Pat Gullufsen said.

Dion was on probation on an Anchorage robbery conviction and had been out of prison for only a few months when Bonnie was killed.

"Just to know he's already in jail and there's no way he can hurt anyone else is a relief," said Bonnie's mother, Karen Foster, reached Monday morning. She said she had been told in January that charges could be coming in the slaying of her daughter, who had been a high school wrestler and had taught swimming to junior high kids.

Troopers were able to match semen found on Bonnie with Dion through a national computer database of DNA profiles. Dion was never known to troopers and wasn't a suspect in the case until the DNA match came back in November.

"There is no doubt about this one," trooper cold-case investigator Jim Stogsdill said of the match. "There's no confusion."

Dion likely did not know Bonnie, Stogsdill said, but apparently picked her up as she walked to a bus stop on Lake Otis Parkway on the way to an early-morning class on Sept. 28, 1994, at the University of Alaska Anchorage. Her body was found that afternoon by a hiker at McHugh Creek.

FORT RICHARDSON

Dion, originally from New Hampshire, came to Alaska as a soldier and was stationed at Fort Richardson, then stayed for a couple of years after he left the military. He did not have a job at the time of Bonnie's slaying and was in and out of jail on robbery and assault charges. He was 25 years old when Bonnie was killed.

He was in jail in Alaska at the end of July 1994, two months before Bonnie's death. And he returned to jail on a probation violation about two months after the slaying.

Troopers say Bonnie was beaten and raped before she fell off a cliff near the Seward Highway. Her body was found floating in McHugh Creek near Mile 112.

Troopers have said she died of a head injury and hypothermia.

As to how Bonnie got to McHugh Creek, 10 miles from her home, or where she was raped, or whether she was struck in the head by her killer or she injured her head in the fall off the 30-foot cliff, "we can only surmise," Stogsdill said.

The hunt for her killer mesmerized Anchorage. Family and friends posted photocopies of the doe-eyed teenager who graduated from Service High School, asking for anyone with information about her killer to call troopers. She was not the kind of young woman to get in trouble. She lived with her parents and played the violin. She didn't drink.

Clues, though, were few and far between. And as the years passed, the crime remained unsolved and a reminder to young women walking alone that a brutal rapist had not been found.

As authorities kept looking, technology advanced to better match DNA, and more people were put into a national database.

DNA from Bonnie's case was put in the national database in 2000. New Hampshire authorities entered Dion's information in November 2006. Immediately, when workers with the Alaska state crime lab were conducting their weekly routine check of the database on Nov. 9, they had a hit.

Tammy Gregory, who was married to Dion at the time Bonnie was killed, broke down crying when reached Monday afternoon in Kenai. She said Dion was in and out of jail, on drugs, and generally abusive during those years. She hasn't seen or spoken to him in a decade. She doesn't want to remember that time in her life.

But still, she said, "I would never have thought he was capable of that. I would never have thought I was associated with someone like that."

NEW HAMPSHIRE RECORD

Dion, who left Alaska around 1996, made it back to New Hampshire, where he committed a series of robberies beginning in May 2002, according to authorities there and in Alaska. One robbery was of a pharmacy. He didn't have a weapon but, using his finger, pretended to, said Tom Velardi, deputy county attorney for Strafford County, N.H.

Dion ordered the pharmacy workers to give him OxyContin, a prescription painkiller similar to heroin that has become a popular street drug. "He had very serious addiction to it," Velardi said.

After the initial DNA match in November, authorities collected new DNA from Dion, which was taken back to Anchorage and matched again, Stogsdill said.

The grand jury in Anchorage indicted Dion on one count of first-degree murder, two counts of second-degree murder and one count of first-degree sexual assault. The two counts of second-degree murder are because it could have been a situation in which Dion didn't intend to kill Bonnie, Stogsdill said.

According to the New Hampshire Department of Corrections, Dion was sentenced to 15 years in prison in February 2003 for five robberies that occurred from spring 2002 until he was incarcerated. Dion was living in Rochester, N.H., before he went to prison. According to the department's Web site, he is eligible for parole in August 2008.

Alaska troopers and New Hampshire authorities interviewed Dion recently, but Stogsdill said he revealed little information.

"This is a long-overdue resolution to the Bonnie Craig case," Stogsdill said.

Bonnie's mother said the news of the charges is a relief, but it also opens old wounds and memories of what happened to her little girl. She said she doesn't want a trial to deepen those wounds. She hopes Dion will admit to the crime and make a deal with prosecutors. That would be easier, she said.

Alaska authorities will try to have him extradited here to face the new charges, Gullufsen said. And, if he is convicted, he will likely finish out his sentence in New Hampshire, then transfer to an Alaska prison.

DALLAS, Texas (CNN) -- The family of Timothy Cole, a Texas man who died in prison nearly a decade ago while serving a sentence for a rape he swore he did not commit, is hoping a court will issue the state's first posthumous exoneration.

Timothy Cole died in prison while serving a sentence for a rape DNA tests show he did not commit.

1 of 2

Cole was convicted and sentenced to 25 years in prison for the 1985 rape of 20-year-old Michele Mallin. He maintained his innocence, but it was not confirmed by DNA until years after his 1999 death, when another inmate confessed to the rape.

"Everybody thinks he died a felon, a hardened criminal," Cole's brother, Cory Session, told CNN. "That's what hurts."

The court hearing on the exoneration began Thursday afternoon, according to the Austin American-Statesman.

Mallin, who has spoken publicly about the case, will join Cole's family in the Austin, Texas, courtroom. They want a judge to clear Cole's name, according to the Innocence Project of Texas, a nonprofit organization that seeks to help the wrongfully convicted.

Among those expected to testify are Mallin and Jerry Wayne Johnson, her confessed rapist.

Watch Cole's mother make emotional plea »

Then a student at Texas Tech University in Lubbock, Mallin was walking to her car, intending to move it to another parking lot, when a man approached her asking about jumper cables, she told CNN. In a matter of seconds, he put her in a chokehold, a knife to her neck. He forced himself into her car and drove her to the outskirts of town, where he raped her.

The next day, police investigators showed Mallin pictures of possible suspects. She chose a picture of Cole and said he was her attacker. She later identified him in a physical lineup, according to the Innocence Project of Texas.

"I was positive," she told CNN. "I really thought it was him."

But there was one detail: Mallin told police her attacker was a smoker. "He was smoking the entire time."

And Cole, who suffered from severe asthma, "was never a smoker," Session said. "He took daily medications (for asthma) when he was younger."

"He was the sacrificial lamb. To them, my brother was the Tech rapist, there was no backtracking. It was the trial of the decade for Lubbock."

The "Tech rapist" attacked four women other than Mallin -- abducting them in parking lots near campus and driving them to a vacant location, where he would rape them and flee on foot, according to the Innocence Project of Texas. The rapist "terrorized" the Texas Tech campus in the mid-1980s, the organization said.

Cole, like Mallin, was a student at Texas Tech. He had finished two years of college previously and was returning to school after spending two years in the Army, his brother said.

But his dreams of getting married and having children never materialized. He was arrested and charged with Mallin's rape, declining a plea bargain offer that would have put him on probation. A jury convicted him and imposed a 25-year sentence.

That night, "he hugged my mother, and he said, 'Mother, why these people lie on me? Why they do this to me?' " Cole's brother Reggie Session recounted for the Lubbock Avalanche-Journal, which published a three-part series on the case in June.

"He said, 'They know I ain't done nothing to that girl. I don't even know that girl. Why they do this to me, mother?' ... He cried in my mother's arms on the floor."

Later, while in prison, Cole rejected an offer of parole that would have required him to admit his guilt. "His greatest wish was to be exonerated and completely vindicated," his mother, Ruby Session, told CNN affiliate News 8 Austin.

But the asthma that plagued Cole throughout his life brought about his death on December 2, 1999. The cause was determined to be heart complications due to his asthmatic condition. He was 39.

It was 2007 when a letter addressed to Cole arrived at his family's home, written by Johnson.
Read the letter »

"You may recall my name from your 1986 rape trial in Lubbock," says the letter, dated May 11, 2007. "Your Lubbock attorney, Mike Brown, tried to show I committed the rape.

"I have been trying to locate you since 1995 to tell you I wish to confess I did in fact commit the rape Lubbock wrongly convicted you of. It is very possible that through a written confession from me and DNA testing, you can finally have your name cleared of the rape ... if this letter reaches you, please contact me by writing so that we can arrange to take the steps to get the process started. Whatever it takes, I will do it."

Johnson did not know Cole had died. In fact, according to the Avalanche-Journal, he had been writing to court officials for years to confess to the rape, but got nowhere.

Upon finding out that Cole was dead, Johnson wrote he "cried and felt double guilty, even though I know the system's at fault," according to the Avalanche-Journal.

"A day later, I am still bothered, terribly, by the death revelation. Because, not knowing Mr. Cole at all, I wonder if the wrongful incarceration contributed to his death."

Johnson has been in prison since 1985 on two convictions for aggravated sexual assault, according to the Texas Department of Corrections. He was given a life sentence for the rape of a 15-year-old girl, and a jury later tacked on a 99-year sentence for another rape, according to the Avalanche-Journal. He cannot be charged with the Mallin case, as the statute of limitations has expired.

The Innocence Project became involved after Cole's family received Johnson's letter. DNA tests confirmed that Johnson was Mallin's attacker. Now, Cole's family hopes the court hearing will be the final step in clearing his name.

Mallin is helping them. "I was very traumatized," she told CNN. "I was scared for my life. I tried my hardest to remember what he looked like.

Missing rape kits foil justice

Rape kits routinely vanish, unfuriating victims and prosecutors alike. Even when evidence is intact, laws can keep suspects like William Harold Johnson walking free in our midst.

"The only way I can describe it is that I felt drunk but I hadn't had enough to feel drunk." That's how Joanna remembers the night she suspects she was slipped a date-rape drug while drinking with other New Mexico Tech students. Further testing of material from her rape evidence kit might have shed light on what was in her system, but the hospital discarded it and the case was never prosecuted. (Post / Helen H. Richardson)

Socorro, N.M. - Bruised and shaking, Joanna watched the doctor prepare the instruments that could cull traces of a gang rape from her body.

At a party the night before, three fellow New Mexico Tech students had drugged her, overpowered her and raped her, she told the hospital staff.

Now, she was lying unclothed on a cold table splashed with bright light, allowing another set of prying hands - a female physician's - to probe her body.

"Just please get it over with," the 19-year- old recalls saying to herself last November.

In the age of DNA and other forensic advances, victims endure the invasive rape evidence exam, knowing that one plucked hair or fluid specimen alone can seal a case against their attackers.

THE DENVER POST

Joanna wouldn't be so lucky.

Only a week later, the Socorro County district attorney gave her a jolt: the hospital had thrown away biological evidence from her case, in violation of its own policy. Among the casualties: a urine specimen the doctor had characterized as containing a "date-rape drug," according to records.

Because of the lost evidence, the criminal charges against Depesh Patel, Ibrahim Hassan and Sandro Santos were dropped. None has responded to repeated interview requests from The Denver Post.

Today, eight months later, neither local authorities in the tiny town of 5,000 nor hospital officials have provided Joanna and her family a full explanation of how the evidence was destroyed - and by whom.

New Mexico statutes, like those in most states, do not require formal inquiries into the destruction of biological evidence in criminal cases. Nor do they require preservation of biological evidence at the outset of criminal investigations.

Joanna, whose full name is being withheld to protect her identity, said the evidence loss only compounds her personal anguish.

She has dropped out of school, and flashbacks still haunt her, including several words spoken by the physician.

"For the hospital not to hang onto the rape kit, the blood and the urine samples from the victim was really, really hard to deal with," said Deputy District Attorney Stacey Ward. The hospital investigated the disposal and said it found no wrongdoing. (Post / Helen H. Richardson)

"'I know them,'" Joanna recalls the doctor saying before the exam, referring to her alleged attackers.

Rape evidence destruction, the most common evidence loss discovered by The Post, represents a hidden crucible for countless sex-assault victims in the U.S.

Behind 5,515 rape evidence kits destroyed or lost by authorities nationwide in the past decade are thousands of women like Joanna who endured the scraping of fingernails and the swabbing of their most private parts, only to be cheated of justice and, often, true healing.

And behind those evidence purges are thousands of offenders who escaped prosecution.

The full scope of the lost specimens and their impacts may never be known because most state governments don't require that police, hospitals and other public agencies report the evidence they toss.

I THINK I VE BEEN TAKEN ADVANTAGE OF | Those were Joanna's words to her mother the morning after she says she was gang-raped by fellow students at a New Mexico college. She endured a rape exam, but the hospital threw the evidence kit away just days later, leaving the deputy district attorney no choice but to drop the case. (Helen Richardson | The Denver Post)

The problem flows from widespread ignorance, rape-crisis experts say. Ignorance about the kits' forensic value. Ignorance about rape trauma.

Ignorance about the small spaces the kits consume. And ignorance about how DNA may render rape statutes of limitations obsolete.

"The destructions defy belief because (biological evidence) is the cleanest, least emotional, most unbiased and least politically fraught evidence there is," said Kim Tolhurst, a Washington, D.C., attorney.

Working as legal counsel for a coalition of victim advocacy groups, Tolhurst successfully pushed for a kit-preservation law in Iowa, ensuring they are kept for a decade. She had tape-measured her own shower to show lawmakers how hundreds of kits would easily fit in it.

While most of the rape evidence purges found by The Post were carried out by police agencies, untold numbers of kits also have been discarded by hospitals. Like law-enforcement agencies, medical facilities typically wield wide discretion to destroy samples. In many states, victims go through rape-kit exams but wait before approaching police - to work through their trauma - leaving the kits' fate up to the medical facilities.

Some hospitals in New York and Pennsylvania have disposed of kits as early as weeks to a month after the rape-kit exam is performed, foiling possible prosecutions, advocacy groups say.

In Joanna's case, the New Mexico hospital's procedures were to retain samples for seven days.

"If you destroy it, you not only destroy an option to prosecute but a sense of hope and justice," said Susan Lewis, spokeswoman for the National Sexual Violence Resource Center in Pennsylvania. "Generally, there's just no uniformity in the country for how hospitals deal with things like rape kits."

Such scenarios have played out along the West Coast, too.

"It's appalling to think of all the offenders we can't identify and who've gone free," said Terrence Newsome, a former analyst for the California governor's office who learned of thousands of rape-kit destructions in unsolved cases in the Golden State five years ago. These kits were never analyzed, thus never matched against offenders in the national FBI database.

Victims were outraged, and California later passed one of the few laws in the country requiring kits to be preserved.

But most destructions are carried out in the shadows, without accountability.

Drinks with acquaintances

Joanna's story, like so many rape cases, starts over drinks with someone she knew.

As recounted in police reports, the New Mexico Tech student took up Patel's offer of music and beers at Santos' apartment. Hassan was there. Santos arrived later in the evening.

"It seemed innocent at the time, but I remember they kept moving the bottles closer to me," she recalls.

Though she's uncertain when it kicked in, she felt an unusual buzz, she told police. She remembers them playing with her jacket zipper, telling her "it wasn't Alaska" and that she should remove her coat. She remembers consuming several drinks, at one point leaving the apartment to get margarita mix.

Most of all, she remembers making decisions that evening she didn't want to make.

"The only way I can describe it is that I felt drunk but I hadn't had enough to feel drunk."

The evening blurred into numbness, dizziness, then blackouts. She awoke the next morning in her own apartment with bruises and a swollen lip, all documented on hospital reports. She also had memories of sex acts with the three men.

She rushed to the shower, letting the hot water flow over her for an hour.

"I think I've been taken advantage of," Joanna told her mother.

"We have to go to the police," her mom said.

Joanna, who began to believe she had been slipped a drug, was nervous about pursuing charges. "I knew there was so much blame put on the victim when this happens."

But she decided she needed medical attention.

At Socorro General Hospital, she agreed to a rape-evidence exam. The doctor, Susan Lewark, stepped into the exam room. Joanna told her the story, told her the names of her alleged attackers.

The doctor paused. She told Joanna she knew the men from the campus clinic, where she worked part time, Joanna recalls.

She then asked a couple of questions: "Do you still want me to do the exam? Do you want someone else to do it?"

Joanna didn't grasp the possible conflict. Didn't practically every one in Socorro know each other?

"If you're OK with it, I am," Joanna recalls saying.

Later that morning, after learning of Joanna's report, New Mexico Tech campus police officer Billy Romero stopped the three men as they were driving from the apartment complex's parking lot. He told the students he was investigating a rape case.

Patel, police reports show, had an immediate answer: He claimed he had been in Albuquerque the previous night. Romero arrested all of them.

Back at the hospital, Lewark found a barbiturate in Joanna's urine sample, according to hospital records.

In a conversation with Joanna and her mother,

THE DENVER POST

Lewark referred to it as a date- rape drug, Joanna said.

"That explained a lot," her mom said.

Lewark told police the same thing, according to Romero's report.

Meanwhile, the three suspects conceded that they had been with Joanna, contradicting Patel's initial account of his whereabouts that night. But they stressed that the sex was consensual. They said they even used their cellphones during the sex encounters to record her, asking whether she was having sex of her own free will.

They denied slipping her drugs.

After "three to five days," according to Deputy District Attorney Stacey Ward, Romero phoned the hospital from her office to make sure the staff had saved the rape specimens for further testing.

The hospital response: The small samples no longer existed. Ultimately, Ward said, they blamed the problem on lack of storage space.

Ward was astonished, she said. Without the specimens, more advanced testing to identify the drug and other substances in Joanna's system wouldn't be possible. "Their main problem was that they failed to recognize this was evidence," Ward said.

In interviews with police, Lewark also backed off her assertion that the drug could be a date-rape drug, Ward and Romero said.

Barbiturates, indeed, are not common date-rape drugs, but rape-crisis experts say a variety of intoxicants are used to take advantage of women.

As a result of the evidence destruction, Ward felt the case was just too murky to pursue.

It was dead-ended.

"For the hospital not to hang onto the rape kit, the blood and the urine samples from the victim was really, really hard to deal with," Ward said. "I was excited about having a provable case. The problem is that we had a victim voluntarily drinking large amounts of alcohol with these guys, and at one point, leaving and coming back. We needed more evidence.

"As it is, a cloud hangs over everything."

Joanna, meanwhile, has never been told the full story, including who threw out her evidence. She wonders, was it simply an accident? Or was there more to it?

The last person she knew to have custody of the evidence was the doctor, Lewark.

Officer Romero said Lewark also told him that she knew the three suspects. The doctor, he said, works with international students at the college. At least two of the accused are international students. At one point, Romero said, Lewark told him the three "were real nice guys."

THE DENVER POST

Lewark declined interview requests and would not answer written questions from The Post.

In interviews in January, Ward said she found Lewark's reversal in characterizing the substance found in Joanna's urine as a date-rape drug unusual. Last week, however, she said had become convinced that the evidence destruction was simply a bureaucratic bungle.

Ward said the hospital told her that the person who disposed of the evidence was a technician.

Last week, Socorro hospital administrator Bo Beames released a statement to The Post. He declined to detail what happened or say who tossed the evidence.

He stressed that the hospital had reviewed the case carefully and found no wrongdoing. He also said that in a small town he would not be surprised if a caregiver at the hospital knew a suspect in a criminal case.

"We are confident that our employees involved acted ethically and honored their medical duty."

Evidence-handling practices are being revamped, he said. "We also know from recent events that we can improve - and are committed to improving - the cross-training and communication between law enforcement and our caregivers in matters of sample collections to be used as evidence."

That's little solace to Joanna's father. He said he has tried repeatedly through meetings with hospital officials and law-enforcement authorities to find more answers.

"As a one-man task force, I've only hit walls," he said. "We deserve to know more."

Joanna said she's beginning to heal. But she is no longer attending classes, no longer pursuing her dream of being a veterinarian.

She is taking a year off from school to think about her future. During the break, she's joined AmeriCorps, helping teach art to the disabled.

And she's also working as a rape-crisis advocate in Albuquerque.

She recently answered a hotline call from a rape victim who had a familiar story: Her case evidence had been destroyed.

"Before she got off the phone, she told me, 'You've helped me so much,'" Joanna said. "At least something good has come out of this."

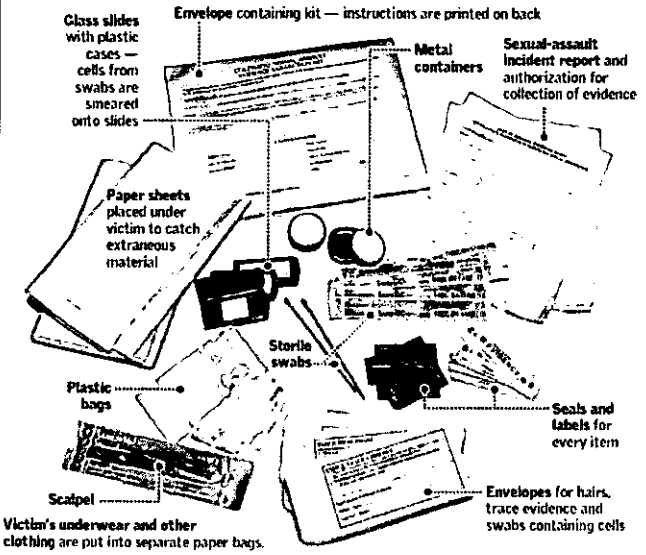
The "black box" of sex-crime investigations

A rape kit can contain multiple pieces of evidence, primarily specimens carrying DNA and other biological information taken from the victim's body during a rape exam. The destruction of a single kit can mean multiple specimens with crime-solving value are lost. Contents of a rape kit:



What investigators look for

- Foreign material swabbed from patients' bodies, including blood, semen and saliva — often collected with swabs.
- Foreign material dislodged from mouth with dental floss.
- Loose hairs, possibly belonging to the assailant, captured by swabs, tweezers or a towel placed under the patient during the exam.
- Blood and urine samples from victims that may reveal traces of drugs or other substances slipped to the victim.

A genetic profile often can be extracted from many of these biological traces, then matched against the accused or other suspects. It also can be entered into the national FBI database of archived sex offenders and other criminals for a match.

Masters released from jail

By Howard Pankratz
The Denver Post
Posted: 01/22/2008 01:02:20 PM MST

Tim Masters leaves the Larimer County courtroom where he was released after serving nearly a decade of a life term in prison for the murder of Peggy Hettrick in 1987. (THE DENVER POST | CRAIG F. WALKER)

FORT COLLINS — Special prosecutors today said that DNA testing of murder victim Peggy Hettrick's clothing revealed the partial profiles of three men but that the profiles excluded Tim Masters as the source of the DNA.

Minutes after the prosecutors handed their findings to Judge Joe Weatherby, Weatherby vacated the judgment of conviction and sentence against Masters, who was immediately released from custody on a $200,000 personal recognizance bond.

Masters' next court date is Feb. 5, after the Larimer County district attorney assesses the status of the case.

A short time after Masters' release, longtime Colorado defense attorney David Wymore — who led the effort to free Masters for a crime Masters maintained he didn't commit — praised former employees of the Colorado Bureau of Investigation, the FBI and Fort Collins Police Department for their help in freeing Masters.

"The reason why we are here is because Tim is innocent," Wymore told a room packed with Masters supporters and press. "He remains the victim of an unfair conviction."

Masters, dressed in a new suit, was humble and appeared surprised by the attention, which included television cameras from at least 20 regional affiliates and national networks.

"I'm a little overwhelmed," he said as supporters and media jammed a conference room. "I want to thank my family and friends. I want to thank the media."

Weatherby presided over months of hearings in which Wymore and co-counsel Maria Liu argued that prosecutors in the original case had withheld evidence from Masters' defense team and had failed to look at alternate suspects.

Rather, they said, they focused solely on Masters.

The key alternate suspect, they claimed, was Dr. Richard Hammond, who lived near where Hettrick's body was found.

But special prosecutor Mike Goodbee made it clear today that the DNA of Hammond, who is now deceased, was not on Hettrick's clothing.

Goodbee said that he first became aware on Dec. 6 that CBI testing had revealed the partial profiles of the three men on Hettrick's clothing.

Then on Jan. 15, Goodbee said, the defense provided the special prosecutors a DNA profile developed in the Netherlands which the defense said belonged to a potential suspect in the early investigation of Peggy Hettrick's murder. The defense findings were presented to the CBI, which conducted its own tests.

"On Jan. 18, we learned (from the CBI) that the results of this new testing and comparison confirmed the presence of DNA on clothing of Hettrick at the time of her murder was consistent with the alternate suspect and inconsistent with Tim Masters," said Goodbee.

During the relatively short proceedings this morning, which were delayed because of paperwork, Weatherby's courtroom was packed.

More than 40 of Masters' relatives stood to the left of the judge and in front of Masters.

There were not, however, any of Hettrick's relatives present. Wymore specifically addressed the victim's family at the press conference, saying it had never been the defense's intention to open old wounds in trying to free Masters.

"We'd like to acknowledge Peggy Hettrick," said Wymore. "We are sorry if we have opened any wounds."

The murder of Hettrick on Feb. 11, 1987, sickened the city of Fort Collins. Her murder was particularly gruesome, and she was sexually mutilated.

Masters, who was 15 at the time of the murder, was convicted of the crime in 1999.

In the years that followed, both the Colorado Court of Appeals and then the Colorado Supreme Court upheld the conviction.

Much of the case was based on the testimony of Reid Meloy, a forensic psychologist.

In February 2001, in a precedent-setting ruling, the Colorado Court of Appeals said it is permissible for forensic psychologists to testify about "sexual homicides" in Colorado courts.

Masters' attorneys told the Court of Appeals that such testimony amounted to "impermissible psychological profiling."

But the judges rejected that argument.

They stated that there were fundamental differences between the psychological theories and analysis offered in the Masters case and impermissible profiling.

And in October 2002, the Colorado Supreme Court, again breaking new legal ground in Colorado, upheld the conviction in a 4-3 vote.

The majority of justices said that writings and drawings by men that depict hatred of women are admissible in court and forensic psychologists may testify about the traits that drive men to commit "sexual homicides."

The two appellate courts were presented with evidence uncovered by the Fort Collins Police Department.

When investigators searched Masters' bedroom, they found a large collection of knives with long blades, one containing a scalpel in its handle. Also found was a fillet knife, a machete, a ninja sword, a suitcase of pornographic depictions of the female anatomy and a large number of drawings and narratives.

The drawings were made by Masters and depicted surprise attacks, gruesome death scenes and scenes of violence and sex, authorities said.

The case languished for 10 years because police couldn't find Hettrick's blood on Masters' clothing or property.

But then a field of expertise in sexual homicides developed, and in 1997, the Fort Collins Police Department contacted Meloy.

Meloy reviewed the drawings and narratives produced by Masters, together with other evidence in the case. He concluded that Masters killed Hettrick and in doing so, had symbolically killed his own mother. Masters' mother and Hettrick looked similar — including wavy red hair.

Meloy testified that a primary reason perpetrators of sexual homicides fantasize is to express deeply felt hostility toward women.

The majority of four justices said Meloy's expertise met court standards and the bulk of Masters' writings was properly admitted.

At the time of Hettrick's death, Masters was 15. He became a prime suspect because his window faced a field where he could see Hettrick's sexually mutilated body. Masters failed to report the body, later telling police he thought it was a mannequin.

Several detectives who worked on the case never believed that Masters committed the crime.

Former Fort Collins Detective Linda Wheeler, who has long believed that Masters was innocent, asked Masters' attorneys to submit Hettrick's clothing for advanced forensic analysis in the Netherlands.

There, scientists targeted spots where the killer, or killers, may have touched her forcefully, embedding skin cells in her clothes.

The Dutch lab found a full genetic profile last summer of a person who left DNA inside Hettrick's waistband.

That man, a former boyfriend who still lives in Fort Collins, told police he had seen her about a week earlier for dinner but did not reveal whether they had intimate contact since that date.

He denied any involvement in her death.

SENATOR FRED DYSON

Sponsor Statement for SB 146

"An Act declaring that certain firearms and accessories are exempt form federal regulation."

April 11, 2009

Contact: Lucky Shultz at Senator Fred Dyson's office (907) 465-2199

The United States Constitution gives Congress the authority to regulate interstate commerce between the states. Furthermore, 18 USC 922 makes it unlawful for any person not licensed as a manufacturer or dealer in firearms to engage in the business of manufacturing or dealing in firearms. Take together, the Interstate Commerce Clause and 18 USC 922 effectively allow the federal government to regulate firearms.

Senate Bill 146 addresses this breach of our second amendment rights by exempting firearms, firearm accessories, and ammunition manufactured and retained in the state from federal firearm control laws, including registration, since firearms meeting this criteria will not fall under interstate commerce and therefore shouldn't be regulated by the federal government. It should be noted that firearms addressed by this bill, and exempt from federal regulation, must have the words, "Made in Alaska" clearly stamped on a central metallic part such as the receiver or frame.

This bill frees certain firearms and accessories from federal regulation as long as certain conditions are met. It frees the state of Alaska from restrictive federal firearms regulations and allows the state to take responsible fire arm regulation into her own hands. SB 146 also provides a mechanism for protecting those Alaskans taking advantage of this action by requiring the state's Attorney General to defend such individuals who beforehand advise the Attorney General of the citizen's intent to manufacture firearms and accessories under this bill. Outdoorsmen, hunters, and Alaskans defending their families and property will benefit from the passage of SB 146.

Dear Senator Kookesh,

I am writing this letter on behalf of the Ruby Tribal Council and all its Tribal Members to fully support SB -148 a bill you sponsored and introduced during the Senate Transportation Committee hearing this past week. This bill will complete the circle of federal funds that comes to Alaska to build and maintain Alaska's entire public infrastructure, especially in rural Alaska where the absence of funding for infrastructure improvements is felt the most.

This bill, SB – 148 will be a first step in bridging Tribal and State funding strategies for years to come when it concerns public community streets, highways, bridges, trails, and ferry systems.

Thank you for all the work you do for the State of Alaska, and our tribal communities.

SB 148

SB 148 will resolve the issue of liability to the state or employees of the state when partnering with federally recognized tribes under the Indian Reservations Roads Program. With the decline in state and federal highway funds it's imperative we collaborate and work together. This bill will assist the partnering process, and ultimately benefit all Alaskans by leading to long-term improvements in the state's overall transportation infrastructure.

To take advantage of all available federal transportation dollars on state highways, Alaska DOT&PF and Indian Tribes may enter a series of inter-governmental agreements outlining respective obligations. The process of drafting such inter-governmental agreements can be time consuming and costly. Negotiations will often center on liability concerns, and sometimes months may elapse while trying to resolve the issues. This bill will lessen inter-governmental disputes or disagreements about liability concerns and will enable the tribe and the state to focus instead on the core transportation project(s).

Tribes have both the legal authority and financial capacity to assist with the improvements to the state transportation infrastructure. Congress made significant transportation dollars available under the Indian Reservation Roads (IRR) program. These IRR funds were made available upon the passage of the Safe, Accountable, Flexible, Efficient Transportation Equity Act: A legacy for users (SAFETEA-LU), Pub.L.No. 109-59 (2005). In FY 2008 the Alaska share of IRR funds is over $45 million and the recent stimulus package supplemented those funds by approximately $40 million.

This bill has the benefit of advancing state-tribal relations, advancing the state-tribal interest in improving state transportation infrastructure (including access to Alaska native villages) and minimizing nuisance litigation which can cost the state significant moneys to defend and settle.

This bill has the support of DOT& PF and I would appreciate your prompt and favorable action on this measure.

Indian Reservation Road (IRR) Program Within Alaska
Synopsis by Alaska DOT&PF
February, 2009

Overview

IRR program established in federal law in 1982. Though initially managed primarily by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, this has evolved to a joint management structure between tribal governments and two federal agencies (BIA and FHWA). Participation by Alaska tribes in this program was limited prior to 2005 by two factors: First, the BIA held most decision and performance authority, and second, the funding allocated to Alaska was relatively small, resulting in very little road work being accomplished.

Under SAFETEA-LU (2005 surface transportation authorization) the statutory foundation for the program changed significantly. First, the amount of nationwide funding increased each year (starting at $300 Million per year in 2005 and rising to $450 Million per year in 2009). Second, each tribe was allotted funding annually based on a formula established through regulations. The formula is complex, but apart from population, the most important variable to each tribe is the number of road miles in their tribe's inventory.

Road Inventory and Funding

This identification of road miles takes place between each tribe and BIA and can include roads owned by other entities (such as Alaska DOT&PF, USFS and local governments). Since 2005 there has been a very active effort by tribes in Alaska to add as many road miles as possible to their individual inventories. While there was at one point (in 2007) a legal complication between the tribes and the State of Alaska over the inventory process (because BIA was requiring that road owners such as the state must "consent" to their roads being added to an inventory), this has been favorably resolved and the state is no longer involved in the inventory process.

The inventory process for Alaska tribes is different than most other tribes, which have reservations and thus clear boundaries. The tribal inventory of reservation-based tribes was largely based on the roads within their reservation boundary. In Alaska, with only one reservation-based tribe, essentially all but one of Alaska's 228 or so tribes must rely on road miles in and around each tribe's geographic location. Because some tribes are located in areas with a substantial number of roads, their tribal inventories are large. Other Alaska tribes, in areas with limited road mileage, have much smaller inventories and thus garner far less funding each year under the federal formula.

Another factor is the national split of funds between tribes. As Alaska's tribes have increased their inventory of IRR road miles since 2005, this has led to a smaller share of funding to other tribes in the United States. In response, these tribes have sought to expand their own inventory of miles, by expanding to include roads that lead to the reservation but are not within the reservation. Since Alaska, taken as a whole, has relatively few miles of total road in the state, this effort by non-Alaska tribes is likely to shift the balance of miles under IRR inventory back to these other non-Alaskan tribes as their inventories expand.

There are also some other categories of funding that are allocated on a discretionary (competitive) basis, such as $14 million per year for bridge projects across all tribes in the U.S.

Examples of IRR Funding to Alaska Tribes

In 2008 Alaska tribes received about $40 Million in funding based on the Relative Need" formula used by BIA. This formula uses several factors, including population, amount of vehicle travel, the total number of road miles and a "cost to construct factor" (which is designed to normalize funds across different construction cost circumstances). This is somewhat less than an average of $175,000 per Alaska tribe per year. However, the distribution of funds varies widely from this average. Some tribes garner nearly $2 million per year, while others earn less than $5,000. In general, the tribes in Southeast Alaska do the best under the formula, in part because of their population, and also because there are relatively high number of road miles in this region due to USFS logging road construction. (See attached table from BIA)

Use of IRR Funding by Tribes

The rules governing the use of IRR funding gives substantial latitude to each tribe as to how they use their funds. Some examples of what they can perform with their funding includes:

- Maintenance: 25% of each year's funding is eligible for routine road and bridge maintenance
- Match to other federal: IRR road funds can be used to match other federal funds, including FHWA highway funds and/or Denali Commission funds
- Design and Construction: IRR funds can be used for the tasks required to plan and engineer roads, as well as the actual construction. Construction can occur under force-account rules, unlike most other federal fund sources, which require competitive bids.
- Projects types include:
    - Transportation facility planning, research, engineering, construction and reconstruction
    - Tourism enhancement and recreational development
    - Vehicular parking area improvements and additions
    - Interpretive signage installation
    - Scenic easement and scenic or historic site acquisition
    - Pedestrian and bicycle on-and-off road system improvements, including modification of public walkways to comply with the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA)
    - Construction and reconstruction of roadside rest areas, including sanitary and water facilities
    - Provision of transit facilities and services within public lands, national parks and Indian reservations
    - Other appropriate facilities such as visitor centers

In order to use their funds, each tribe must prepare a Transportation Improvement Program or TIP (much like the state STIP) which identifies the project scope, cost and location of each project and activity to be funded.

Successful Examples of DOT&PF-Tribal Cooperation

Several groups of tribes within Alaska have established mutual organizations to better manage the program and take advantage of a pooled approach. For example, twenty tribes in the Bering Strait area operate a transportation organization called the Kawerak Transportation Program, which has professional road engineers, planners and accountants to internally identify and manage projects. By pooling their IRR funds and taking turns at project construction within their several communities, they are able to accomplish one or more projects each year, in order to improve employment opportunities and the road system in their communities. Several of these multi-tribe transportation organizations, sometimes called compacts, have been established in the state.

There have also been examples of tribes wishing to help fund work on state roads. For example, in Petersburg, the Petersburg Indian Association has helped to fund two state projects, including intending to perform the work on one project the tribe funded. This work is planned to be accomplished in cooperation with Alaska DOT&PF. Other examples of state-tribal partnerships include:

- Cordova: Native Village of Cordova (Eyak) is performing highway work on the state-owned Copper River Highway and intends to perform bridge work in the future.
- Sitka: Sitka Tribe of Alaska is operating a community-wide transit system and has received state managed transit funds.
- Mat-Su Borough: Chickaloon Native Village is evaluating the possibility of a transit system that might run from Glenallen to Anchorage on a daily or several times per week basis. This latter project received a transit grant from the Federal Transit Administration. DOT&PF transit planners have assisted the planning for this effort.
- Gambell: A federal highway earmark for road work in Gambell is being performed by Kawerak, under a transfer of funds from Alaska DOT&PF.

Impact of Stimulus Funds to Alaska Tribes

The American Recovery and Reinvestment Act contains $310 M nationally for funding to tribes for stimulus purposes. This is about 75% increase to regular 2009 funding to all tribes, including Alaska tribes or about $35 Million. The law's language requires that priority be given to projects that can be completed in 2 years or less, and after one year, BIA may be redistribute funds among the tribes. The allocation of IRR stimulus funds, and any redistribution of funds, is determined by the two federal agencies involved: BIA and FHWA.

Role of DOT&PF in the IRR Program

DOT&PF has been active in working with tribes in order to better achieve transportation improvements for all Alaskans. We have recently agreed to participate in a task force between the state and tribes to find workable solutions, including standard legal formats, in order to accelerate projects. That work is underway this year. We have also entered into several agreements, or otherwise assisted tribes in their use of IRR funds. Perhaps one key factor, as we prepare the next STIP, is that for the first time tribes can bring both matching funds, and maintenance funds to the table. Both factors will permit tribes' nominated projects to score higher, and thus improve the chances of garnering funds.

Dear Senator French,

I respectfully request a hearing for Senate Bill 148 " An act relating to limitation of state liability on certain federal highway programs" at your earliest convenience. Time is of the essence for tribes to use stimulus funds and get projects ready for our short construction season. This bill will lessen inter-governmental disputes or disagreements about liability concerns and will enable the tribes and state to focus on transportation projects.

Thank you, your consideration is greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

Albert Kookesh

RE: SB-153 Manufactured Housing Conversion Procedure

Dear Senator French:

The Alaska Bankers Association consists of the following eight member banks: Alaska Pacific Bank, Denali State Bank, First Bank Ketchikan, First National Bank Alaska, KeyBank, Mt. McKinley Bank, Northrim Bank, and Wells Fargo Bank.

The Alaska Bankers Association supports SB-153, the Manufactured Housing Conversion Procedure bill.

SB-153 will amend state law in Alaska to provide a formal method of eliminating the certificate of title to a manufactured home, converting the home to real property when the home is or will be permanently affixed to real property, and obtaining a new certificate of title when a home previously affixed to real property is severed.

Alaska, unlike the vast majority of states, has no formal statutory procedure for converting a manufactured home to real property. Under current Alaska law including Alaska's Uniform Commercial Code, a security interest in a manufactured home permanently affixed to land can be perfected only by noting the secured party's interest on the home's certificate of title and recording a deed of trust with a fixtures clause and an appropriate description of the home. The need for legislation arises from the fact that the Alaska Division of Motor Vehicles ("DMV") will not issue a title for a manufactured home that is affixed to a permanent foundation, notwithstanding the requirements of the Uniform Commercial Code, and has created and administers a vaguely defined procedure with no record notice. The result for many Alaska manufactured homeowners is an unmarketable title to their home and for many lenders an unperfected security interest in their collateral.

In addition, Alaska's current statute does not meet the eligibility requirements to sell a mortgage for a manufactured home to Fannie Mae or Freddie Mac, including the process to legally classify the home as real property and placing the lender in first lien position.

Alaska also does not have a clear method to convert a factory built home to real property, especially older manufactured homes that come back on the market for resale.

AK SB-153 will bring state definitions of manufactured housing into accordance with HUD definitions to create a system for title transfer and property conversion. Additionally, the bill will create a means for titling manufactured homes that have been affixed to property, but the title can't be found.

This bill is good for manufactured home owners and good for lenders that finance manufactured homes.

Thank you for the opportunity to provide comment on SB-153.

Sincerely,

David Lawer

SB 153 – MOBILE HOMES AS REAL PROPERTY

Sponsor Statement

Senate Bill 153 establishes procedures to convert manufactured homes to real property, through a defined process within the Division of Motor Vehicles. This change will give the owners of manufactured homes better access to traditional mortgage financing, which often features lower interest rates, and it will help homeowners increase the value of their house by allowing them to convert their manufactured home into real property. The legislation will also help to prevent 'clouded' titles that often hinder clean transactions involving manufactured homes.

Currently, when a manufactured home is affixed to a permanent foundation on land owned by an individual, the vaguely defined title surrender procedure currently used by the Division of Motor Vehicles lacks a record notice. Without a record notice, a homeowner is often left with an unmarketable title and an unperfected security interest in their house, placing all parties in a real estate transaction – the buyer, the lender, and the seller - at risk.

Many Alaskans live in manufactured homes. This legislation will treat residents that permanently affix a manufactured home to land they own the same way that traditional homeowners are treated in the state. I urge you to support this fair legislation.

MEMORANDUM March 19, 2009

SUBJECT: Sectional summary for SB 153 relating to manufactured homes (Work Order No. 26-LS0650\R)

TO: Senator Hollis French
Attn: Cindy Smith

FROM: Theresa Bannister
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional summary of the above-described bill. As a preliminary matter, note that a sectional summary of a bill should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill and the bill itself is the best statement of its contents.

Section 1. States the findings and purpose for the bill.

Section 2. Adds a new subsection to AS 06.05.207 of the banking code. Defines "real property" to include a manufactured home that has become real property under new sec. 34.85.010.

Section 3. Adds a new subsection to AS 06.15.250 of the mutual savings bank chapter. Defines "real property" to include a manufactured home that has become real property under new sec. 34.85.010.

Section 4. Amends AS 06.45.060(5)(A) of the credit union chapter to change "mobile home" to "manufactured home."

Section 5. Adds a new subsection to AS 06.45.060 of the credit union chapter to provide a definition of "manufactured home."

Section 6. Amends the definition of "mortgage loan" in AS 06.60.990(19) of the mortgage lending regulation chapter to include a manufactured home that has become real property under new sec. 34.85.010.

Section 7. Adds a new definition section to AS 09.45, the chapter relating to real property actions, to define "real property" to include a manufactured home that has become real property under new sec. 34.85.010 and to define "manufactured home."

Section 8. Amends AS 28.05.061(a), which relates to vehicle records, to list manufactured home documents as records that the Department of Administration is to file, maintain, and index.

Section 9. Adds new subsections to AS 28.05.061, which relates to vehicle records, to indicate what the department record must state for certain documents relating to manufactured homes. Defines "recording information" for AS 28.05.061.

Section 10. Amends AS 28.10.201(b) to reference a new subsection added by bill sec. 11 and to change "mobile home" to "manufactured home."

Section 11. Adds a new subsection to AS 28.10.201. Prohibits the department from issuing a certificate of title to a manufactured home if an application has been filed under secs. 28.10.262 - 28.10.264.

Section 12. Amends AS 28.10.211(c) to substitute "manufacturer's certificate of origin" for "manufacturer's statement of origin."

Section 13. Adds a new subsection to AS 28.10.211, relating to applications for vehicle titles. Allows the holder of a manufacturer's certificate of origin for a manufactured home to deliver the certificate to a person to facilitate the home's conveyance or encumbrance. The recipient holds it in trust.

Section 14. Adds a new subsection to AS 28.10.221, which relates to the refusal, suspension, or revocation of a vehicle title. Prohibits the department, with an exception for new sec. 28.10.263, from suspending or revoking a certificate of title to a manufactured home just because the home is affixed to real property.

Section 15. Adds a new subsection to AS 28.10.261, which relates to evidence. Makes a manufactured home's certificate of title issued by the department prima facie evidence of what it says, even if the home is affixed to real property.

Section 16. Adds new sections to AS 28.10.

Sec. 28.10.262. Directs the department to cancel a manufacturer's certificate of origin to a manufactured home if an application is filed and certain other conditions are met. States that when a person satisfies this section, the manufactured home is not subject to AS 28.10.

Sec. 28.10.263. Directs the department to cancel a certificate of title to a manufactured home if an application is filed and certain other conditions are met. States that when a person satisfies this section, the manufactured home is not subject to AS 28.10.

Sec. 28.10.264. Directs the department to confirm the conversion of a manufactured home to real property if an application is filed and certain other conditions are met. States that when a person satisfies this section, the manufactured home is not subject to AS 28.10.

Sec. 28.10.265. Directs the department to issue a certificate of title for a manufactured home if an application is filed and certain other conditions are met. States that when a person satisfies this section, the manufactured home is subject to AS 28.10.

Sec. 28.10.266. Lists what an application under secs. 28.10.262 - 28.10.265 must provide.

Sec. 28.10.267. Establishes the requirements for the declaration required by sec. 28.10.266(11) for an application under sec. 28.10.264 or 28.10.265.

Sec. 28.10.268. Indicates the time when the requirements of secs. 28.10.262 - 28.10.264 are considered to be satisfied if an application under one of those sections is delivered to the department within 30 days after an affixation affidavit is recorded.

Sec. 28.10.269. Defines terms for AS 28.10.201 - 28.10.269.

Section 17. Adds new subsections to AS 28.10.371, which relates to liens and encumbrances on vehicles, to address certain situations involving liens on manufactured homes.

Section 18. Adds a new subsection to AS 28.10.381, which relates to liens and encumbrances on vehicles, to generally prohibit cancelling certificates while a lien or encumbrance is outstanding, and to state that the validity and priority of the liens and encumbrances continue.

Section 19. Adds a new subsection to AS 28.10.391, which relates to liens and encumbrances on vehicles, to indicate that the liens and encumbrances of converted manufactured homes are governed by real property law.

Section 20. Amends AS 28.10.661(2) to define "mobile home" as a "manufactured home" for the chapter.

Section 21. Adds a new paragraph to AS 28.10.661 to define "manufactured home" for the chapter.

Section 22. Amends AS 29.45.070, which relates to municipal taxation, to reflect the conversion to real property allowed by the new chapter in AS 34.85.

Section 23. Amends AS 34.03.360 of the state's uniform residential landlord and tenant act to add a definition of "mobile home."

Section 24. Amends AS 34.70.200(3) of the chapter dealing with disclosures in residential real property transfers to include as residential real property manufactured homes that have become real property under AS 34.85.010.

Section 25. Amends AS 34.80.090(6) of the chapter that deals with escrow transactions for residential real property to include converted manufactured homes as residential real property.

Section 26. Adds a new chapter relating to converting manufactured homes to real property.

Sec. 34.85.010. Lists the criteria for a manufactured home to become real property.

Sec. 34.85.020. Describes the effects of converting a manufactured home to real property.

Sec. 34.85.040. Describes how the ownership interest requirement of sec. 34.85.010 can be satisfied when the manufactured home owner does not own the real property where the home is located.

Sec. 34.85.060. Establishes what an affixation affidavit must provide.

Sec. 34.85.070. Describes what an owner's statement required for an affixation affidavit must state.

Sec. 34.85.080. Indicates that permanently affixing a manufactured home to real property or recording an affixation affidavit does not affect liens and encumbrances on the manufactured home unless certain conditions are met.

Sec. 34.85.090. Directs the recipient of a certified copy of an affidavit to deliver the copy to the department under secs. 28.10.262 - 28.10.264.

Sec. 34.85.100. States that, except as provided by certain statutes, an affixation affidavit is not necessary or effective to convey or encumber a manufactured home or to change the character of a manufactured home to real property. Indicates what a conveyance of land on which a manufactured home is located must recite. Voids an agreement that waives this section.

Sec. 34.85.110. Directs each person having an interest in the real property from which a converted manufactured home is severed to record a severance affidavit.

Sec. 34.85.120. Establishes what a severance affidavit must contain or be accompanied by.

Sec. 34.85.130. Directs the recipient of a certified copy of a severance affidavit to deliver the copy to the department under secs. 28.10.262 - 28.10.264.

Sec. 34.85.140. Requires an affixation affidavit and a severance affidavit to be acknowledged like real property conveyances and be in a recordable form. Directs the department to establish the forms for the affidavits.

Sec. 34.85.150. Establishes when a manufactured home is considered to be permanently affixed to real property.

Sec. 34.85.190. Defines terms for the new chapter.

Sec. 34.85.195. Gives the chapter a short title.

Section 27. Adds a new section to the state's chapter on the recording of real property documents. Directs the recorder to record an affixation affidavit and a severance affidavit if they meet specified requirements. Indicates what the recording officer must write on the recorded affidavit. Directs the recording officer to send a certified copy to the person designated in the affidavit.

Section 28. Amends the definition of "goods" in the Alaska Retail Installment Sales Act to include manufactured homes.

Section 29. Directs the Department of Administration to adopt regulations for this Act.

Section 30. Preserves rights and claims existing before January 1, 2010.

Section 31. Sets an immediate effective date for bill sec. 29, which authorizes the adoption of implementing regulations.

Section 32. Sets the effective date for all of the bill except bill sec. 29, which authorizes the adoption of implementing regulations.

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

On behalf of Wells Fargo, I appreciate the opportunity to submit testimony in support of Alaska Senate Bill 153.

SB-153 will amend state law in Alaska to provide a formal method of eliminating the certificate of title to a manufactured home and converting the home to real property when the home is or will be permanently affixed to real property, and obtaining a new certificate of title when a home previously affixed to real property is later physically severed from it.

Alaska, unlike the vast majority of states, has no formal statutory procedure for converting a manufactured home to real property. Under current Alaska law including Alaska's Uniform Commercial Code, a security interest in a manufactured home permanently affixed to land can be perfected only by noting the secured party's interest on the home's certificate of title and recording a deed of trust with a fixtures clause and an appropriate description of the home. The need for legislation arises from the fact that the Alaska Division of Motor Vehicles ("DMV") will not issue a title for a manufactured home that is affixed to a permanent foundation, notwithstanding the requirements of the Uniform Commercial Code, and has created and administers a vaguely defined procedure with no record notice. The result for many Alaska manufactured homeowners is an unmarketable title to their home and for many lenders an unperfected security interest in their collateral.

We feel the bill will: (1) Help manufactured homeowners in the state increase the value of their homes by allowing them to convert their manufactured homes to real property, including manufactured homes not covered by certificates of title (or for which the certificates of title cannot be found) but permanently affixed to real property before the effective date of the legislation; (2) Help lenders gain perfected security interests in manufactured homes; (3) Help the Alaska Division of Motor Vehicles by putting in place a formalized procedure for canceling a title when a manufactured home is put on a permanent foundation; and (4) Increase property tax revenue in the municipalities in Alaska that levy property taxes as the result of manufactured homes' being converted to and considered real property.

RE: SB-153 Manufactured Housing Conversion Procedure

Dear Senator French:

Wells Fargo is writing to support SB-153, the Manufactured Housing Conversion Procedure bill.

SB-153 will amend state law in Alaska to provide a formal method of eliminating the certificate of title to a manufactured home, converting the home to real property when the home is or will be permanently affixed to real property, and obtaining a new certificate of title when a home previously affixed to real property is severed.

Alaska is the only state that currently has no statutory conversion procedure. The need for legislation arises from the fact that the Alaska Division of Motor Vehicles ("DMV") will not issue a title for a manufactured home that is affixed to a permanent foundation, notwithstanding the requirements of the Uniform Commercial Code, and has created and administers a vaguely defined procedure with no record notice. The result for many Alaska manufactured homeowners is an unmarketable title to their home and for many lenders an unperfected security interest in their home.

We feel the bill will: (1) Help manufactured homeowners in the state increase the value of their home by allowing them to convert their manufactured homes into real property; (2) Help lenders gain a perfected security interest on manufactured homes; (3) Help the Alaska Division of Motor Vehicles by putting in place a formalized procedure for getting rid of a title when a manufactured home is put on a permanent foundation; and (4) Increase property tax revenue in the municipalities in Alaska that do levy property taxes as the result of manufactured homes being converted and considered real property.

Thank you for the opportunity to provide comment on SB-153.

Sincerely,

Juneau, AK 99811

Dear Senator French:

Listed below are responses to questions that were posed to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) on Wednesday, January 28, 2010, during the Senate Judiciary Committee hearing.

Senator Coghill: It is his understanding that law enforcement is not referring all the youth that it could to the DJJ for minor consuming violations. If it did, DJJ would see its referral trends dramatically increase. Is this DJJ's understanding as well? DJJ only has jurisdiction for minor consuming offenses when they rise to the habitual level—that is, a youth has to be cited for minor consuming three times before he is referred by law enforcement or the District Court to DJJ. First and second-time referrals for minor consuming are managed through District Courts. We are unable to locate statistics from District Court on the frequency of first- and second minor consuming citations statewide, but for DJJ to manage these violations would undoubtedly and dramatically increase the number of referrals we would need to manage, and require significantly more resources for the division. In addition, changes to the statutes surrounding minor consuming and juvenile delinquency would be needed, as these would be the only violations under the jurisdiction of the division. (The division currently manages offenses only when they rise to the misdemeanor or felony level, unless they occur as probation violations for youth already under our supervision.)

Out of the 7,692 offenses referred to DJJ in FY09, there were 117 (1.5%) alcohol related offenses (primarily "habitual minor consuming" but also a variety of others such as furnishing alcohol to a minor). Additionally, there were 469 (6.1%) probation or conduct violations related to alcohol and drug use.

Senator McGuire: What neurological anomalies are we seeing with the 10 and under age group? DJJ has no data readily available on neurological anomalies among its population. A mental health screening for youth at admission would assist us in getting an understanding of the frequency of these anomalies among our youth, so we will continue to explore the possibility of adding such a screen to our practice.

Currently, a mental health assessment required within seven days of institutionalization for youth. At that time we ask each institutionalized youth for a history of head injuries. If there is significant TBI this in noted as a DSM IV diagnosis (axis three, as it is a medical issue) and in our recommendations, we let the treatment team know what to look for with TBI and more effective ways of dealing with the resulting outcomes of TBI. This mental health assessment is presented and reviewed with the treatment team by the mental health clinician as part of our practice.The mental health clinicians who work at the Division have received training on TBI, and at McLaughlin Youth Center they work closely with Dr. Randy Moss, a psychiatrist who is able to assess TBI issues that our mental health clinicians think may be present. Over the years, youth have been sent to a neuropsychologist for specialized assessments and treatment suggestions. They have identified youth with TBI as a result of three- and four-wheeler accidents, abuse, and other issues. In addition, Dr. Moss has worked with the lead McLaughlin mental health clinician to provide training in TBI in March for all interested staff. This will be the second time staff have been offered TBI training, and the expectation is that this training will be offered at McLaughlin once each year.

Do you know the number of youth who also experience abuse/neglect? The division has actually been devoting considerable attention to this question recently. Last week, we pulled the current open supervision cases in the six pilot communities for the department's Families First project. The six locations are: Anchorage, Mat-Su, Fairbanks, Nome, Juneau and Sitka. Specifically, of the 1120 youth with open referrals or open supervision within the juvenile justice system, 24% also had an ORCA ID number. This means that the youth has had some current or past involvement with a child abuse or neglect case. The youth could be a sibling or a victim, or in a rare instance, possibly the natural child of a foster parent. This information is consistent with a recent informal survey of juvenile justice supervisors statewide, who estimated that that 10%–20% of the approximately 1,300 juveniles under division custody or supervision on any given day have current or recent involvement with the state's child protective services agency.

The division expects that the development of the Department of Health and Social Services's Master Client Index (MCI) will assist us in our desire to understand how many youth are involved with the juvenile justice and child protection systems, as well as other agencies in the department such as Public Assistance and Behavioral Health. We expect to refine our data-extraction methods as development of the MCI progresses.

In addition, both DJJ and the Office of Children's Services have made recent changes to their divisional databases to increase the ease with which staff may mutually access and share information through these IT systems.

Senator French: It would be good to see the DJJ Recidivism further broken down by region. Please see below:

What would be the cost for three positions to provide oversight and quality assurance for our evidence-based practices?: The division has determined that the position ranges would likely be one Range 21 position and two Range 20 positions. These positions would work to ensure the sustainability and effectiveness of evidence-based programs such as Aggression Replacement Training, a curriculum proven to change behavior of youth demonstrating chronic violent behavior and aggressiveness; and the Youth Level of Service Inventory, an assessment tool highly effective in identifying those youth at high risk of reoffending. The cost for the three positions would be approximately $350.0.

SB 156: Compact for Juveniles; Interstate Council

SB 156 updates Alaskan laws regarding juveniles under court supervision by adopting a new Interstate Compact for Juveniles.

Since 1960, Alaska has relied on the Interstate Compact on Juveniles to provide us with model language to regulate the movement of juveniles under court supervision across state lines.

SB 156 adopts a new Interstate Compact on Juveniles and significantly updates the 50-year-old mechanism for tracking and supervising juveniles that move across state borders. Providing enhanced accountability, enforcement, visibility and communication, the new compact seeks to update a crucial yet outdated tool for ensuring public safety and preserving child welfare.

Primary changes to the original Juvenile Compact include requiring that Alaska:

- Support establish and contribute members to an independent, national compact operating authority (a "national commission") to administer ongoing compact activity;
- Agree to be subject to sanctions if the state fails to support essential compact operations;
- Collect and provide standardized information as requested by the national commission;
- Financially support essential compact operations.

The new compact was developed by the Council of State Governments in collaboration with the US Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency. Thirty-six other states have adopted the new compact and there is pending legislation to adopt the compact in at least four others.

If Alaska chooses not to adopt the new Interstate Compact, the state will soon face serious and costly challenges in its ability to monitor juveniles who arrive here from out of state, including potentially dangerous juveniles who may present a risk to public safety and a liability concern for Alaskan agencies. In addition, other states would be under no compulsion to accept Alaskan juveniles who seek to visit or reside within their borders. Not adopting the Compact would also likely result in requiring Alaska to form individual agreements with each state, which could prove to be time-consuming, expensive, and less effective.

SB 156 is a timely and important piece of legislation that will help ensure public safety and preserve child welfare.

MEMORANDUM March 30, 2009

SUBJECT: Sectional Summary - SB 156 (Work Order No. 26-LS0758\A)

TO: Senator Lesil McGuire
Attn: Trevor Fulton

FROM: Gerald P. Luckhaupt
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional summary of the above-described bill. As a preliminary matter, please note that a sectional summary of a bill should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill - the bill itself is the best statement of its contents.

Section 1 amends AS 33.36.140(a) by changing the name of the State Council for Interstate Adult Offender Supervision and designating the council to implement the compact set out in AS 33.36.110 (current law) and the juvenile offender supervision compact newly created in AS 47.15.101, added by sec. 4.

Section 2 increases the number of members of the council from seven to nine.

Section 3 makes a conforming change.

Section 4 is the new Interstate Compact for Juveniles.

Section 5 allows the commissioner of health and social services to designate a compact administrator.

Section 6 provides that the State Council for Interstate Adult and Juvenile Offender Supervision (see sec. 1) shall serve as the state council for the new juvenile compact (see sec. 4).

Section 7 provides that the Department of Health and Social Services may adopt regulations to implement the juvenile compact.

Section 8 amends AS 47.15.070 to clarify that additional procedures are not precluded by the juvenile compact.

Section 9 provides a conforming change.

Section 10 provides a repealer.

Section 11 provides indirect court rule amendments.

Section 12 provides that the Department of Health and Social Services may continue to implement the old juvenile compact with those states that have not adopted the new juvenile compact.

Section 13 provides notice that the provisions of the new compact that indirectly amend court rules only take effect if they receive the two-thirds majority vote required by the constitution.

Section 14 provides that this Act only takes effect if at least 34 states adopt the juvenile compact.

Section 15 provides a special effective date.

The New Interstate Compact for Juveniles & Alaska

Since 1955, the Interstate Compact on Juveniles has provided states with the procedural means to regulate the movement of juveniles under court supervision across state lines. (Alaska adopted the original compact into statute in 1960.) A new compact has been developed by the Council of State Governments in collaboration with the U.S. Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention.

What are the major differences between the old compact and the new one?

The old compact set out the rules under which states would operate to return runaways, escapees, and absconders to their home states; a voluntary return procedure; cooperate on supervision of probationers and parolees; responsibility for costs; and other factors. The new compact places more emphasis on how the compact itself will be administered, and what the responsibilities (regarding rules, enforcement procedures, financial management, communications, data sharing) are for states that are party to the compact.

What would change for Alaska under the new compact?

Alaska would be required to:

- Support establishment and contribute members to an independent, national compact operating authority (a "national commission") to administer ongoing compact activity;
- Agree to be subject to sanctions if the State fails to support essential compact operations;
- Collect and provide standardized information as requested by the national commission;
- Financially support essential compact operations.

How many youth are subject to interstate supervision in Alaska?

About 160 juveniles under the supervision of the Department of Health and Social Services leave or enter the State of Alaska each year. This includes about 100 juveniles who make brief, temporary visits either from other states or to Alaska for work or family needs, and about 60 juveniles who move to assume a new residency with relatives, attend college, or assume placement in a residential program or facility. In addition to these 160 juveniles, another 20-25 juveniles are continuing their placement or residency in Alaska or elsewhere from a prior year, and continuing supervision under the Interstate Compact for Juveniles.

Have other states adopted the new compact?

As of January 26, 2009, 35 states have adopted the new compact; legislation to adopt was pending in 5 others. The new Interstate Compact for Juveniles is now officially active. The interstate commission has held its first meeting and now has less than one year to adopt bylaws that will govern operation of the compact.

What if Alaska doesn't adopt the new compact?

If Alaska chooses not to adopt the new Interstate Compact for Juveniles, the State would soon face serious challenges in its ability to monitor juveniles who arrive here from out of state, including potentially dangerous juveniles who may present a risk to public safety and a liability concern for Alaska. In addition, states would be under no compulsion to accept Alaskan juveniles who seek to visit or reside within their borders. Ultimately, Alaska would be forced to develop individual agreements with each state, perhaps specific to each case, which would ultimately prove more expensive and less effective than adopting the new Interstate Compact for Juveniles.

What will it cost to implement the new compact?

The Division of Juvenile Justice estimates a total cost of $45.0 per year. This costs includes:

- $13.0 for travel associated with membership participation, including travel to required meetings by staff;
- $27.0 Membership Dues, teleconferences, overhead costs that include chargeback, etc;
- $ 5.0 Supplies for staff and required meetings

Frequently Asked Questions

FREQUENTLY ASKED QUESTIONS CONCERNING THE INTERSTATE COMPACT FOR JUVENILES

1. A juvenile compact already exists. Why should we replace it?

Answer: The existing Interstate Compact on Juvenile was created in 1955 when only a few hundred juveniles were being apprehended or found in states other than where they were residents or where their cases were adjudicated. Today that number exceeds twenty thousand (20,000) juveniles. In addition, the existing compact authority and structure are seriously outdated.

Examples include:

- Limited knowledge of who is moving, where and when they are going;
- Limited agreement between states regarding what supervision means;
- Limited ability and commitment to notify victims, communities and law enforcement officials of the movement of juveniles;
- The Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators may identify failures to comply with established rules, but it is severely limited in its ability to enforce compliance when that becomes necessary; and
- No recognized authority to promulgate rules.

2. Why is it important to replace the compact right away?

Answer: Because the existing interstate agreement has been severely compromised by individual state actions; incomplete adoption of three (3) subsequent amendments to the compact; and inability to promptly gather and transmit data concerning these juveniles or enforce provisions for their care and supervision. As soon as the new compact takes effect the 35 (or more) participating states will promptly commence administrative, by-law and rule making decisions to address these deficiencies.

- Since 1958, three amendments to the compact have been drafted and only a few states have adopted all three with a majority adopting only one or two. This lack of uniformity has created substantial inconsistency in interpretation and application of the existing compact. There is no longer a common agreement between states concerning what types of juveniles can be sent to other states for supervision, and no authority to hold other states accountable for following existing compact rules. The existing compact will soon become so dysfunctional that a nationwide system for tracking and monitoring this population will not exist at all. In 2000, a nationwide effort to develop workable alternatives to the existing system commenced and materialized in 2002 with an amended compact entitled The Interstate Compact for Juveniles. Without passage of the new interstate compact, individual states will resume addressing concerns by enacting various statutes and executive orders, and even the appearance of interstate cooperation in managing these juveniles will cease.

- The new compact language was subject to critique and comment from a mailing to 200 individuals, agencies and associations. Transition and timing activities were identified as major concerns. As a result, the final compact language raises the number of required jurisdictions (states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico or territories) to 35 before implementation; and added July 1, 2004 as the "earliest implementation date" so that states could evaluate and consider their participation.

- After July 1, 2004, the Compact will take effect once it has been enacted into law by the 35th jurisdiction. States that have passed the compact will join together and begin making administrative decisions, by-laws, and the rules to govern signatory states. Non-member states may be present to voice their concerns, but may not vote. When a state joins the compact, after the initial 35, they will have an equal voice in all subsequent rule making matters, but will inherit the decisions made by other states during the start-up phase.

3. We keep hearing that there are over 20,000 juveniles in states other than where they were adjudicated. How reliable is that number and is it changing?

Answer: Nobody can accurately answer this question. The lack of reliable interstate data has long been a problem. The National Institute of Corrections' Information Center completed a survey of states in 1999, the beginning of the project. At that time, the estimated number of individual cases being supervised in other states totaled 15,000. This number does not include juveniles who moved to another state without going through the transfer process or had been issued travel permits, figures that are currently impossible to gather.

The Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators gathers statistics annually on the number of compact transfer requests for juveniles entering and exiting compacting states. According to statistics gathered from July 1, 2001 to June 30, 2002, there were an estimated 25,870 interstate compact transactions. Travel permits are cases not officially transferred, even though the juvenile has been authorized to travel to another state for a period of time. The universal opinion of compact and agency administrators consulted was that more individuals were in the travel category than in the supervised group. Therefore, it is safe to assume that the 20,000 figure is an extremely low estimate of the interstate movement of adjudicated juveniles.

4. Will there be more juveniles under interstate supervision as a result of the new compact?

Answer: Enacting the compact will not directly affect the number of juveniles under interstate supervision. However, several things could happen:

- The information system that will be developed will equip states with reliable data about how many of their juveniles are being supervised in other states, and how many they are supervising for other states. Reliable data may indicate that a different number of juveniles are actually under supervision.

- A number of juveniles are currently in other states and transferred to other states unbeknownst to compact administrators and without formal authority by the interstate compact. The goal of bringing states into compliance with mutually agreed upon rules will result in an increase in the number of compact cases as the states account for these "stealth" movers and provide appropriate supervision and care.

5. Will the new compact eliminate the problems experienced under the current compact, and how will member states assure compliance?

Answer: Nobody can guarantee elimination of all problems experienced under the current compact. The proposed compact will have in place a staff and committee structure that will permit swift identification of potential problems and a manageable process for addressing concerns of member states in a timely manner. This ability to attend to compliance concerns in the early stages will identify and avert major conflicts.

With regard to authority, the revised compact clarifies that the member states will have a contractual obligation to comply with the terms of the compact as well as the by-laws and all rules promulgated by the National Commission. The new compact provides various tools (Article XI, Sections B & C), which provide for compliance and enforcement of the compact. These range from technical assistance, mediation and arbitration to suspension, termination, and legal action in federal court that will result in recovery of legal fees and costs by the prevailing party.

6. States do not have similar structures and systems to supervise juveniles. What effect will this have on interstate compact enforcement?

Answer: States are organized differently and have unique systems in place to supervise and manage their juvenile population. Some states have juvenile supervision within the department of corrections and elsewhere it is with a child protective services or welfare agency. Some states have probation within judicial districts, and in others it is a county executive function. However, an interstate compact is state law and the compact law supersedes conflicting state and local laws. It does not matter which branch or level of government provides the supervision services, the compact must be followed and enforced. Compliance requirements apply equally to any agency providing supervision in a state that has enacted the compact.

7. Why is it necessary to have State Councils?

Answer: State Councils address at least three significant problems:

- Interstate supervision is unknown outside the agency or agencies where deputy compact administrators work. Consequently, in many states there is scant awareness that interstate issues are a significant public concern until a horrific crime occurs.

- Each state has one designated compact administrator, yet interstate compact compliance is not exclusively an issue for one state agency. In many instances juvenile supervision takes place in separate agencies within the executive branch, or in different (executive and judicial) branches and levels of government (state and county). Extradition funding and decision-making may be administered elsewhere. Judges and juvenile supervision agencies are obligated to observe compact rules regardless of where compact administration is housed. An ongoing awareness of interstate supervision issues is necessary in many areas of state government.

- Interstate supervision is a significant public policy concern that it merits the working knowledge of all State Council members, including victims of crime. However, states individually determine the specific role and membership of their State Council.

The states have discretion to decide whether the State Council is to be a separately constituted body or whether it assigns the duties of the State Council to an existing state entity, provided that representation from the executive, legislative and judicial branches of government and victims groups is present as required under the compact. The requirement for a State Council does not assume creation of a new or costly bureaucracy.

8. Who will be my state's commissioner?

Answer: The commissioner will be that person appointed by the State Council or the governor under Article III (B), subject to qualifications determined by each state.

9. The National Commission will develop the by-laws and regulations after the new compact becomes operational. Isn't that expecting states to "sign-up blindly" before knowing the rules. Why is this necessary?

Answer: The most effective way to manage the movement of juveniles is through an enforceable compact between states that results from member states' ongoing participation in administrative and rule-making duties. Therein lies the "Catch 22". States, through the National Commission, cannot write the rules and regulations until the new compact exists and the initial member states are known. However, this also means that states must pass the legislation and then trust the process in place to develop appropriate rules during the compact's first twelve-months of existence. The alternative of including all the rules in the compact itself would not only sacrifice state input and participation in the development of those rules, but it would also require each compacting state the burdensome task of legislatively approving these rule changes.

States are currently obligated to a full set of rules as developed and passed by compact administrators through the Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators. These rules were passed without any "Sunshine" or open-meeting provisions or conventional administrative law constraints as outlined in the new compact. As the new compact is ratified and the 35the jurisdiction is reached, it is expected that many of the rules for the new compact will be similar, if not identical, to the old rules as they are currently written. In fact, the new compact states that the existing rules governing the operation of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles will be null and void after twelve (12) months from the first meeting of the Interstate Commission. For more information on the current rules, please visit: http://www.ajca.us.

The new compact will create a governing structure with the capacity and authority to effectively manage rule making and compliance by member states. Rule making authority is left to representatives of those states that choose to enact the compact. The compact creates a process for rules to be made and enforced and when necessary, to be modified without returning to each state legislature. However, as a safeguard of states authority, the compact drafters created a provision for a majority of state legislatures to nullify any rule passed by the National Commission.

10. Will the new compact enable states to deny transfer of juveniles into their state?

Answer: Yes, states will only be obligated to accept juveniles classified and transferred under the provisions of the compact, its by-laws, and rules. Transfer denials, which contradict the terms of the compact and its rules, will not be permitted and would subject any non-compliant state to enforcement action as determined by the National Commission.

11. What control will states have over the National Commission?

Answer: It is important to remember that the National Commission is comprised of one voting representative from each member state. All proposed rules of the National Commission are required to be published in advance. Therefore, your state will have every opportunity for input before a vote is taken, and any member state will have the opportunity to have their position heard and to vote for passage or rejection of rules, by-laws and routine business. The standard for passage is a majority of members present at a meeting, unless a greater percentage is established in the by-laws (Article V).

Three relevant provisions are also included:

- Article VI concerning individual rules: "If a majority of the legislatures of the compacting states reject a rule by enactment of a statute or resolution in the same manner used to adopt the compact, then such rule shall have no further force and effect in any compacting state."

- Article X concerning amending the compact itself: "Amendments to the compact may be proposed by the Interstate Commission for enactment by the compacting states. No amendment shall become effective and binding upon the Interstate Commission and the compacting states unless and until it is enacted into law by unanimous consent of the compacting states."

- Article XI: "...a compacting state may withdraw from the compact by enacting a statute specifically repealing the statute which enacted the compact into law."

12. What are the limitations, if any, on the ability of the commissioner to sue member states (injunctive as well as mandatory relief)? What assurances can be given to states considering adoption?

Answer: No unilateral authority is given to an individual commissioner to sue another state. The National Commission is empowered, under Article XI (b) and Article XI (c) to enforce the compact against any member state, in the exercise of its reasonable discretion, through a variety of means ranging from alternative dispute resolution to judicial enforcement. Under Article XI (c) judicial enforcement is authorized by majority vote of the National Commission members in the U.S. District Court where the National Commission headquarters is located or the District of Columbia to enforce the provisions of the Compact, its by-laws and rules. Both injunctive relief and monetary damages may be sought and the prevailing party is entitled to an award of costs including reasonable attorney's fees. However, the intent of the Drafting Committee was that disputes under the compact be resolved at the lowest level, and with the least severe action necessary to ensure compliance.

13. Can any of the language in the new compact be changed or must all states use identical language? Can my state pass only certain parts of the revised compact?

Answer: Generally, the compact language must be identical with regard to the substantive provisions of the agreement. However, the enabling legislation, which embodies that agreement, does not have to be uniform in all party states and can be utilized to fit variations into the compactual pattern. The enabling legislation can be used to condition the impact of a compact in a particular state. While these allowances may be made for format, the operative language of the agreement must be identical from state-to-state; otherwise these material differences in language in any state statute purporting to adopt the compact could render it "void" or "voidable". The compact also contains a provision in Article XIII (B) (4) which preserves the limits placed on the Legislature's obligations, duties, powers, or jurisdiction under the constitution of that state.

14. Does the compact language conform to state constitutional language?

Answer: The compact language was drafted with cognizance of state constitutional requirements common to most state constitutions such as separation of powers, delegation of power, and debt limitations. The validity of the state authority to enter into compacts and delegate authority to an interstate agency was specifically recognized and unanimously upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court in West Virginia vs. Sims, 341 U.S. 22 (1951). This decision also approves of a provision practically identical to the provisions of Article X of the Interstate Compact for Adult Offender Supervision concerning constitutional debt limitations. Under Article XIII (B)(4), provisions of the compact exceeding the constitutional limits imposed on the legislature of any state are ineffective.

15. Aren't we creating an expensive bureaucracy without the promise of anything better than what we already have?

Answer: Key concerns with the existing compact are accountability for member states and the ability to promulgate and enforce compact rules. An interstate compact that cannot assure compliance by member states is in effect a "toothless tiger." Despite remarkable efforts by those working in compact administration to hold the system together, governance issues have evolved to the point that greater compact authority is essential for states to function effectively. This illustrates the need for a national office to oversee administrative issues. Nothing in the drafting process requires an expansive bureaucracy, although it will create an administrative structure that will hold member states accountable for compliance. Given the degree of dissatisfaction with the current compact, many feel that a realistic question is whether the existing compact will survive if it is not replaced quickly. At the state-level, nothing mandates an expansive bureaucracy.

16. The new compact establishes the need for a data-sharing/information system. What type of information system will be necessary?

Answer: With the assistance of a Management and Information Systems consultant, a working committee of compact administrators has developed a plan for a comprehensive, secure and affordable information system. Development and maintenance of the information system would be part of the National Commission funding and responsibility. The system utilizes an "open technology" design and implementation of an Internet-based system accessible by industry standard software products. In some state compact offices, the minimal technology already exists. In others, it could be achieved with minimal enhancements of existing systems and for the balance, an initial investment of $2000 - $3,000 would provide the capacity to utilize form templates and to transmit and receive the information via an Internet e-mail connection. The working committee was sensitive to privacy concerns of transferred information, potential costs, and the reality that states utilize the full range of hardware and software products. Similar Internet-based systems are used extensively in the medical field and successfully accommodate these same concerns. The system is being designed so that the state compact office must be automated, while regional or field offices may use the system if they have access to the minimal equipment. Determination of privacy policies regarding the resulting national database will be made by states through the National Commission's enactment of rules and/or by-laws.

17. Will the National Commission's rulemaking authority allow it to preempt a state's privacy laws?

Answer: Under Article VI the National Commission's rulemaking authority is subject to the provisions of the Model State Administrative Procedures Act, 1981 Act Uniform Laws Annotated, Vol. 15, p.1 (2000), or such other Administrative Procedures Act as it deems appropriate and consistent with the requirements of due process. It is anticipated that rules promulgated by the National Commission would not conflict with state privacy laws except to the extent that any particular state privacy law is in direct contravention of a compact rule pertaining to the transfer and supervision of juveniles under the compact. In that case, the provisions of the Compact would supersede the conflicting state law provision under Article XIII (A) (2). It is not possible to predict what specific rules of the Interstate Commission will possibly conflict with a particular provision of the privacy laws of a particular state until a specific rule has been promulgated and a specific state privacy law has been identified.

18. How much will the new compact cost my state?

Answer: Based on a preliminary estimate contained within the fiscal note, the start-up costs to establish the National Commission will cost approximately $1 million. Support for the National Commission will come from state dues as determined by the National Commission as contained in the compact (Article VIII, (B)). Funding support for each State Council will be determined by individual state based on their specific needs and circumstances, (e.g. some states currently have existing mechanisms and/or councils that could absorb the duties of the proposed State Councils with some minor modifications).

19. Are there any the hidden costs associated with the new compact?

Answer: There are no costs mandated aside from the annual state assessment. However, it is possible that states might encounter additional costs. Examples may include:

- The proposed commission budget would pay for the voting representative from each member state to attend National Commission meetings. If a state decided to send more than one person to the meetings, the additional travel and per diem costs would be the responsibility of that state. However, states currently pay for their voting representative to attend meetings.

- The additional costs anticipated are limited to travel and per diem for members to meet within their state. It is possible that a state could decide to create a more formal structure and additional costs could be incurred.

- It is possible after examining the current level of state commitment to their centralized interstate compact administrative function that a state may determine they need more or a different level of staff assigned to that function. No additional staff would be required by adoption of the new compact, but in many states it has long been an under-funded activity.

- It is possible that more juveniles could be under supervision if compact requirements are faithfully followed and all juveniles going to other states are processed through the compact. It is not anticipated that numbers under supervision would increase (as a result of enacting the compact) to the point that additional community supervision staff will be required. Also, it is anticipated that automation will reduce the per-case work-effort required.

- The information system is discussed in question 16. The system is being designed so that it may be accessed from common computers and will not require specialized equipment. The state compact office will require a computer and scanner and the system is being designed so that regional and field supervision units could also use the automated information system. Necessary state compact office equipment is estimated to cost $2,000 - $3,000 and compact administrators estimate that only a few states currently lack this equipment in their compact office.

20. Can a state create a law that limits its costs to the National Commission?

Answer: To the extent costs exceed a defined limit imposed by the constitution of a state on the legislature, such a provision could be determined under state law based on Article XIII (B)(4).

21. How can we determine the current status of efforts to implement The Interstate Compact for Juveniles?

Answer: Thirty-five jurisdictions (states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and territories) must pass this legislation before it may take effect. The 2003 legislative session will be the first time states have an opportunity to consider the revised compact. A current "State-by State" status page may be accessed on the Internet at: http://www.csg.org/. Also, you may contact either of the two individuals listed in the final portion of this document.

THE INTERSTATE COMPACT FOR JUVENILES - CASE STUDIES

All types of juveniles may potentially be supervised under The Interstate Compact for Juveniles. The tragic problems caused by very serious juvenile offenders raise many public safety concerns for the states. The number of offender cases involving out-of-state juveniles has grown exponentially over the past few decades with the increase in the national highway system and air travel. Violent and non-violent offenders on probation and parole need to cross state lines every day and the compact is the only mechanism to insure continued supervision. Likewise, the compact insures the return of juvenile escapees and absconders to the supervising state, preventing those juveniles from committing other crimes or becoming victims themselves.

In addition to public safety, an important reason for supervision is to insure that each juvenile receives the best possible services to avoid future lawbreaking and/or to safeguard their well-being. Unfortunately, the current compact does not have an administrative process or governing structure in place with authority to hold member states accountable for compliance with their mutually agreed upon rules. There are more than 20,000 interstate compact cases processed annually. Consider the range and types of interstate supervision issues that arise and need to be governed effectively by rules agreed upon by member states:

- A 17-year-old juvenile parolee, serving a sentence for burglary and armed with a dangerous weapon, absconded from state supervision. The sending state issued a warrant for his arrest and extradition. One month later, the juvenile was picked up in another state for a minor traffic violation. The receiving state detained the youth in a detention center for juveniles and sent a notice to the youth's home state with details of his detainment and a request for transportation. Disagreements between both states over transportation payments ensued. Meanwhile, the local jurisdiction holding the juvenile ignored the interstate compact law and released the juvenile on grounds of local laws governing the detainment of out-of-state juveniles for misdemeanor charges. The juvenile walked away from the detention center unsupervised. While robbing a convenient store one year later, the juvenile shot and killed the store clerk. The juvenile remains locked-up in state prison today.

- A 15-year-old adjudicated juvenile received specialized and high-cost sex offender treatment and services in his state of residence. The terms of the juveniles' probation included weekly counseling and regular therapy by a state sanctioned non-profit organization. The father of the juvenile was fired from his employment and was forced to accept employment in another state. After hearing about the juveniles' need to move, the sending state terminated the juveniles' court order for treatment early due to the high-costs associated with the sex offender treatment and failed to notify the receiving state about the juvenile. Under the compact rules, sending states are obligated to fund necessary treatment, services and supervision for juveniles moving across state lines. As expected, the youth moved with his father unsupervised and without treatment. Not until he was adjudicated for another sex offense one year later did the receiving state find out about the youth's troubled past.

- The mother of a runaway filed a report with the National Crime Information Center. The 16-year-old runaway was identified in a non-neighboring state three days later and was placed in temporary housing with minimal supervision. Youth workers in the receiving state discovered that the youth suffered from an extreme case of depression but could not provide needed therapy without permission by the youth's parents and payment by their home state. In the meantime, the mother was notified but lacked the funds to arrange for transportation to fly her daughter home. The youth's home state forbade the use of state funds for travel and other expenses for a runaway not in their custody. Likewise, the receiving state law required a lengthy legal process to handle custody issues for out-of-state runaways. One week later, the youth escaped from the temporary housing and supervision. Her remains were found three months later and it was determined that she committed suicide by consuming lethal amounts medicine.

- A 14-year-old juvenile was on probation for a gang related crime involving the murder of a citizen. After receiving a lenient sentence for providing fellow gang member names to local law enforcement, the juvenile began receiving threats on his life from the other gang members. To provide temporary protection for the juvenile, the sending state decided to relocate the youth to family in another state for an undetermined length of time. Before gaining approval from the receiving state, local authorities released the youth to family members in the receiving state without arranging for appropriate supervision. Two weeks later, the gang members found the 14-year-old in the receiving state, assaulted and hospitalized the youth, and made threats to the juveniles' extended family. Only after the assault and threats did local authorities realize that a juvenile probationer was located in their jurisdiction.

- A 16-year old juvenile was on probation for a shopping mall theft. She came from an abusive family and marks on her body reflected regular abuse by her parents. Local social services were ordered to provide the youth and her family with regular counseling and supervision. Midway through her probation period, the juvenile escaped to another state and was arrested for another theft one week later. The receiving state notified the youth's home state about the arrest. Under terms and rules of the current compact, the youth's home state is required to transport that youth under an appropriate level of supervision. In an attempt to save dollars, the youth's home state decided to buy a one-way bus ticket for the juvenile but decided not to provide an escort. The youth escaped while enroute home at a gas station and remains unaccounted for today.

- A 17-year-old juvenile absconded from his state of residence while on parole for drug possession and drug use. The juvenile was identified and picked-up in another state where 17-year-olds are considered adults. Under compact rules, juveniles are defined by their home state's laws, not the receiving states laws. The juvenile's home state issued a court order for the juvenile's detainment and extradition. Due to the lengthy and formal process to detain and transport juveniles, the youth's home state could not extradite the youth in a timely manner. Meanwhile, the local jurisdiction holding the juvenile released him on the grounds that he was an adult and their local law forbade them from detaining adults over a specified period of time without formal criminal charges. The juvenile was arrested three months later in the same state for cocaine possession and is now serving two new sentences for drug possession and use.

Re: Hearing Request: SB 156 – Compact for Juveniles; Interstate Council

I respectfully request that SB 156 – Compact for Juveniles; Interstate Council be scheduled for a hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee at your earliest convenience.

SB 156 updates Alaskan laws regarding juveniles under court supervision by adopting a new Interstate Compact for Juveniles. It is important that, before the end of the year, Alaska joins the other 36 states that have already adopted the new compact, otherwise we will have no agreement with those 36 states.

Attached you will find the most current version of the resolution, a sponsor statement, and all backup information.

If you have any questions or concerns, please feel free to contact me personally or my staff, Trevor Fulton, at x3579. Thank you for your time and consideration.

SB 158: Return of property used as evidence to the owner

All too often victims of robbery are victimized a second time by bureaucracy. Victims of crime involving property of little value are certainly inconvenienced. However, victims of theft of property of considerable value face the added burden of having to purchase replacements for the stolen property. Small business owners who have their inventory stolen may even lose potential sales or bankruptcy if the loss of property results in the inability to consummate the sale or the inventory is uninsured or underinsured. But perhaps the most frustrating of all is when property is recovered by law enforcement agencies, only to be held as evidence and not returned to the victim for weeks, months, or years.

Victims generally understand the necessity of holding stolen items for a period of time to ensure successful prosecution of a case. However, when property is held for an extended period of time, even though it is no longer necessary to physically retain the item, it is no longer acceptable to not return the property to the rightful owner. When it is no longer necessary to retain the property to prosecute a case, law enforcement agencies must return the property to the rightful owner as soon as reasonably possible without jeopardizing their case.

Alaska Statute 12.36.020(c) directs that property in the possession of law enforcement personnel and used as evidence in a criminal proceeding or a children's court proceeding is to be returned to the owner within 60 days after the final disposition of the case. Unfortunately, final disposition of the case may, to the owner, be protracted for a seemingly unending period of time. It is not always necessary for law enforcement personnel to physically retain the property for evidence. In such cases the property should be returned to the owner when it is no longer needed as evidence by law enforcement, rather than being held until final disposition of the case.

Passage of SB 158 will provide for return of property to the owner when the property is no longer needed as evidence or within 60 days of disposition of the case, whichever first occurs.

MEMORANDUM

April 2, 2009

To: Senator Hollis French, Chair
Senate Judiciary Committee

From: Senator Fred Dyson

Subject: Request Hearing on SB 158, Return of Stolen Property

Please schedule Committee Substitute Senate Bill 158(STA) for hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

As you heard in the Senate State Affairs Committee, I am aware of Alaska businessmen and women who have had expensive items stolen from their businesses, have had the police recover the property, but then have had the property retained by the police for extended periods of time to be used as evidence. The business people, in order to meet their obligations to customers, are forced to buy replacement materials and items, often at premium prices because the items are being bought in smaller quantities or are being bought with a short lead time in order to meet promised delivery dates. This bill will allow property to be returned to owners much more quickly.

ANCHORAGE SCHOOL DISTRICT
ANCHORAGE, ALASKA

ASD MEMORANDUM # 252 (2008-2009) March 23, 2009

TO: SCHOOL BOARD

FROM: OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT Carol Comeau

SUBJECT: RESOLUTION IN SUPPORT OF THE INTERSTATE MILITARY COMPACT ON EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY FOR MILITARY CHILDREN

RECOMMENDATION:

It is the recommendation of the administration that the School Board approve a resolution in support of the interstate military compact on educational opportunity for military children (attachment A). It is further recommended that the School Board and administration communicate the support of the Anchorage School District to the Alaska Legislature, the State Board of Education and Early Development, and the Governor.

PERTINENT FACTS:

The United States Departments of Education and Defense signed a historic agreement in June of 2008. This historic agreement set the state for a formalized working agreement to work collaboratively to ease the challenges of transitions for military dependent students. As of the beginning of the 2008-2009 school year, the following states have passed legislation in support of military compacts: Arizona, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, North Carolina, and Oklahoma. Other states have legislation pending. Subsequent to that action, the State Board of Education and Early Development discussed the military compact and expressed strong support for Alaska entering into this compact. This was communicated to the Alaska Legislature and to Governor Palin.

Subsequently, Representative John Coghill, filed HB 137, "An act relating to the Interstate Compact on Educational Opportunity for Military Children..." It is moving through the legislature during this first session of the twenty-sixth legislature. Representative Dahlstrom has attended meetings relating to this issue as part of her legislative responsibilities.

The administration has reviewed the military compact and the proposed legislation and urges the School Board to pass this resolution in support of its guiding principles. The administration supports this compact because it validates our close working relationships and current practices with our military installations and dependent families. The Mat-Su, Fairbanks, Kodiak, and Sitka school districts are in support of this compact and are in the process of supporting this action for their districts. The administration would like to work with our military representatives and members of the legislature on this important legislation.

An information packet provided to school districts provides general information to the School Board in support of this administrative recommendation and is included as Attachment B.

A RESOLUTION ENDORSING THE GUIDING PRINCIPLES OF THE INTERSTATE COMPACT ON EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY FOR MILITARY CHILDREN

WHEREAS, military students are faced with numerous transitions during their formative years, and

WHEREAS, moves during the school years, particularly the high school years, present special challenges to learning and future achievement, and

WHEREAS, there is a large and growing military student population in the Anchorage School District, and

WHEREAS, the Anchorage School District can help ease the school transition challenges faced by its military students through awareness, flexibility and accommodations as reflected in the Interstate Compact on Educational Opportunity for Military Children,

THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED that the Anchorage School Board endorses the guiding principles expressed on Attachment B of this document, and urges all employees to institute these practices no later than the beginning of the 2009-2010 school year.

"An Act relating to an interstate compact on educational opportunity for military children; amending Rules 4 and 24, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure; and providing for an effective date."

Section 1: AS 14. Adds a new chapter:
Chapter 34. Interstate Compact on Educational Opportunity for Military Children

Article I – Purpose
This article describes the purposes of this compact which is to remove barriers to educational success for military children by facilitating enrollment, placement, and timely graduation; providing enforcement of rules, uniform collection and sharing of information; and promoting coordination, flexibility, and cooperation among member states.

Article II – Definitions
This article provides definitions for terms used throughout the compact.

Article III – Applicability
This article defines the children covered by this compact.

Article IV – Educational Records and Enrollment
This article outlines how sending and receiving states handle a military student's unofficial and official educational records. The Interstate Commission determines what information must be included in the records, and the time line for providing the records. It provides a 30-day grace period for immunizations. Kindergarten and first grade entrance is addressed for both grade level and age.

Article V – Placement and Attendance
This article describes course placement; education program placement, and special education services to address federal requirements for students with disabilities. Placement flexibility and absences related to deployment are also addressed.

Article VI – Eligibility
This article provides information on enrollment eligibility. It prohibits the student from being charged a tuition if the student lives in a different jurisdiction, and allows the student to continue to attend the school they were enrolled in while residing with the custodial parent. The military student shall have as many opportunities as possible to participate in extracurricular activities, even if they have missed the application deadlines.

Article VII – Graduation
This article facilitates on-time graduation by providing procedures for waivers, exit exams and transfers during a military student's senior year.

Article VIII – State Coordination
This article establishes requirement for creation of a State Council or other existing body to provide coordination among its government, local and military agencies. Membership requirements are also addressed.

Article IX – Interstate Commission on Ed Opportunity for Military Children
This article deals with creating the commission and its responsibilities, powers, and duties. It details membership, voting rights, meetings, executive committee, bylaws and rules, data collection, and a process for reporting alleged violations.

Article X – Powers and Duties of the Interstate Commission
This article lists the powers and duties of the Interstate Commission: Dispute resolution; promulgate rules; issue advisory opinions; enforce compliance; and other powers and duties related to establishing and running and supporting the state councils at a national level.

Article XI – Organization and Operation of the Interstate Commission
This article provides the structure for the Interstate Commission to organize, establish bylaws, set up executive and other committees, establish procedures for meetings, and providing for start-up rules for the initial administration of the compact.

Article XII – Rulemaking Functions of the Interstate Commission
This article gives the Interstate Commission rulemaking authority, and rulemaking guidelines and a provision for judicial review of a proposed rule.

Article XIII – Oversight, Enforcement, and Dispute Resolution
This article addresses oversight, enforcement and dispute resolution specifically. Oversight: Charges the executive, legislative and judicial branches of state governments regarding the purpose and intent of the Compact. It further states that the Interstate Commission shall receive all service of process and has standing to intervene. Further addresses consequences of default by a member state. Dispute Resolution: If requested the Interstate Commission will attempt to resolve disputes and provide rules for mediation and binding dispute resolution. Enforcement: The Interstate Commission shall enforce the rules and provisions of this compact and may initiate legal action to enforce compliance with the provisions of the compact.

Article XIV – Financing the Interstate Commission
This article provides a method for the Interstate Commission to pay its reasonable expenses by collecting annual assessments from each member state. There are limits on incurring obligations and the need for accurate accounting of all receipts and disbursements, and the requirement for a yearly audit by a certified or licensed CPA.

Article XV – Member States, Effective Date and Amendment
States are eligible to become members, the compact becomes effective when no less than 10 states enact the compact into law and the member state passes the law. Rules for how amendments become effective and binding.

Article XVI – Withdrawal and Dissolution
This article addresses how member states withdraw from the compact, what their responsibilities of notice, time, and responsibility for assessments. This article also addresses reinstatement, and compact dissolution.

Article XVII – Severability and Construction
Provisions of this compact are severable and any portion deemed unenforceable does not affect the remaining compact. The compact should be liberally construed, and nothing in this compact inhibits other interstate compacts.

Article XVIII – Binding Effect of Compact and Other Laws
Nothing in this compact prevents the enforcement of other laws that are not inconsistent with this compact. Conflicting laws are superseded by the compact to the extent of the conflict. All rules of the Interstate Commission are binding on the members states. Any provisions that exceed constitutional limits are ineffective to the extent of the conflict of the member state.

Sec. 14.34.020 Compact Administrator.
Establishing a compact administrator and the duties of that office.

Sec. 14.34.030 State Council.
Establishes the state council as a subcommittee of the membership.

Sec. 14.34.040 Regulations.
The board may adopt regulations to implement this chapter.

Sec. 14.34.090 Short Title.
Interstate Compact of Educational Opportunity for Military Children

Section 2: Uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section:

INDIRECT COURT RULE AMENDMENTS. The changes made by Sec. 1 of this Act have the effect of changing Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure:

(1) Rule 4 – entitles the Interstate Commission to receive service of process of a judicial proceeding that pertains to a Compact provision or rule.

(2) Rule 24(b) - entitles the Interstate Commission to intervene in a judicial proceeding in which the validity of a compact provision or rule is at issue.

Section 3: Uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section:

CONDITIONAL EFFECT OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS.

Provisions set out in Section 1 concerning service of process and standing to intervene, take effect only if Section 2 receives two-thirds majority vote of each house required by the State Constitution.

Section 4: Uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section:

CONDITIONAL EFFECT OF ACT; COMMISSIONER'S DUTY TO NOTIFY.

When Sections 1 and 2 of this Act will take effect and notification requirements when the 10 or more states have ratified this compact.

Section 5: Setting out the effective dates of this Act to be not less than 10 states other than this state ratify the Compact or July 1, 2009, whichever is later.

Case Study #1

Commissioned Personnel

Family of a Major General, United States Air Force; stationed in Virginia

Due to multiple reassignments for our family, my son attended ten different schools prior to graduating from high school. Though he was certified as academically advanced by previous school systems, he was denied advanced placement in one school system solely because he was not in that system for the required period of time. He was denied advanced placement in another system due to its different qualifying criteria as compared to previous jurisdictions. For one four year period during which we were reassigned each year, my son was required to read Romeo and Juliet for each of those four years despite having done so in each preceding state. He was denied the opportunity to participate in sports on more than one occasion because we were reassigned after team tryouts and he was told he was too late. Finally, we had to take the drastic measure of placing him in a private school after one reassignment because, in order for him to graduate on time from his assigned public school, he would have been required to stay in school for an extra year since the new school system refused to accept all of his credits that he had completed in the previous jurisdiction.

My daughter, currently a high school freshman, has attended seven different schools. She had an IEP (Special Education: Individual Education Plan) from one state that was not continued in the next state because her success out-scored their expectation of what her aptitude score indicated she could achieve. In our current state of residence, she is required to pass six course competency tests, even though she took some of those courses in a different state. Furthermore, the preparatory curriculum for these tests is different than in the last jurisdiction so her burden has been needlessly increased. What is most problematic is that, in order for her to graduate high school on time, she must pass an exit exam which is designed for students who have been in this particular state system for twelve years. For that reason, and because previously earned credits have not been accepted by the present jurisdiction, she must take summer school courses every summer for the next three years.

Case Study #2

Enlisted Personnel

Family of a Technical Sergeant, United States Air Force; stationed in Florida

My daughter is 10 years old and is in the 5th grade. Our family moved to Patrick AFB, Florida from Kirtland AFB in New Mexico last May on military orders. My husband is in the Air Force. We enrolled my daughter in elementary school in Florida during the summer and her new school requested her school records in August from her previous school in New Mexico. By the middle of October, the records had not yet been sent to the new school. After repeated written requests, phone calls and emails from Florida school officials and myself to her previous school in New Mexico, some of her records arrived in late October. However, her complete record did not arrive until November 19th.

When her records finally arrived, the school transferred her to the fifth grade QUEST class which is an advanced placement class for students who are gifted and talented. This is where she should have been placed at the beginning of the semester. However, due to the inexplicable delay in transferring her records, her new school placed her in a less challenging learning environment. Therefore, she spent almost a whole semester in an inappropriate classroom setting. The effects of this delay, which may seem to be of little consequence to adults, have been severe and profound for my 10 year old. She was miserable in school for months, forced to study material she had already mastered. She was bored and restless, and she sometimes got into trouble as a result. She is also not where she should be academically and has some catching up to do.

Despite this setback, now that she is in the proper class, she is back to being my happy, well behaved student. However, had legislation such as the proposed compact been in place in time for my daughter, we could have avoided this situation entirely.

Re: IN SUPPORT of HB 137:
Interstate Compact on Educational Opportunities for Military Children
Hearing: Friday, March 20, 2009, 1:30 PM

Dear Representative Coghill and Education Committee Members:

The US Pacific Command wishes to formally register support for the Interstate Compact on Educational Opportunities for Military Children. With over 12,000 school-age military dependents, Alaska ranks 15th in the nation for the number of military students educated within the state. Representing the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marines and Coast Guard, the children of our military families in Alaska come from and move to nearly every state in the country and numerous US Department of Defense schools around the globe. Each year, approximately one-third of our children transfer from Alaska and are replaced by incoming military-affiliated students. Because of the mobility imposed on families due to assignments and deployments, our children face significant educational challenges including enrollment, eligibility, placement, and graduation.

The passage of this bill allows Alaska to join with other states to create the Interstate Compact, a program that seeks to remove barriers to educational success due to the frequent military moves. The Interstate Compact provides a venue for states to work together which allows our military families to fulfill the mission of serving our country without penalizing the education of their children.

I wholeheartedly support and urge the passage of House Bill 137. Thank you for all you do for the children of military families who, in their own way, also serve our country.

Sincerely,

Re: IN SUPPORT OF HB137
Hearing: Fri, 20 Mar 09 at 0800

Dear Representative Coghill and Committee Members

Partnership and collaboration are longstanding keystones for military and local community support to Alaska public school students. In this spirit, I provide my support to House Bill HB137 "Interstate Compact on Educational Opportunities for Military Children."

HB137 is groundbreaking legislation written specifically for the unique requirements of a transient student population. Issues such as enrollment, testing standards and graduation requirements are addressed through the interstate compact. These types of standards allow a military student to progress without fear of having to reaccomplish work to meet a new requirement after a move. Additionally, this compact provides an avenue for states to not only establish this list of standards but to collaborate on future issues as they arise.

I look forward to increased cooperation with those who set policy for and educate our children in Alaska. The changes implemented from HB137 will directly impact the social, emotional and academic experience of transitioning students who attend Hawaii public schools.

I personally appreciate the hard work and dedication of all those involved with HB137. Thank you for your submission and continued support of our military families.

Re: In SUPPORT of HB# 137 "Interstate Compact on Educational Opportunities for Military Children"

Dear Representative Coghill:

The United States Army, Pacific (USARPAC) would like to inform you of our support for the Interstate Compact on Educational Opportunities for Military Children (House Bill #137). When considering the number of school-age military children impacting each state, Alaska has approximately 12,000 school-age military dependents attending public, private, and homeschooling venues. As these students move from state to state, many of them encounter considerable challenges when dealing with enrollment, eligibility, placement, extra-curricular activities, and graduation requirements. Often, military students lose course credits due to multiple school transfers and are often improperly placed in courses due to the varying school requirements.

USARPAC appreciates all that Alaska public schools have done on behalf of our military children regarding transition and deployment issues. The Interstate Compact on Educational Opportunities for Military Children will only serve to compliment and augment what is already being done in the Alaska public schools. Additionally, this bill will join Alaska with other states in an effort to streamline the school transition process and create much needed uniformity between states.

For these reasons, USARPAC supports this compact and encourages the Alaska House of Representatives to pass House Bill #HB137. If you need additional information, please contact my Well Being/Education Specialist, Ruth Davis, at 808-438-4177 or E-mail nancy.ruth.davis@us.army.mil.

Dear Representatives:

Kodiak Island Borough School District wholeheartedly endorses House Bill 137. A substantial number of Kodiak Island students come to us from the United States Coast Guard as well as the United States Navy.

We eagerly join this compact's intent to remove the barriers to educational success imposed on the children of military families due to the frequent moves and deployment of their parents. We will be committed to supporting and enforcing the rules and provisions of this compact. It is our District's goal to provide uniform collection and sharing of information; and to promote coordination, flexibility and cooperation between educational systems and families in order to achieve educational success for the student.

We thank Representative Coghill for sponsoring House Bill 137. His concern is for the best interest of the children whose parents are serving this nation with such honor. We appreciate their service and this bill represents a small token of thanks as well as removes several obstacles that are imposed upon their children during their service to our country.

Sincerely,

CS FOR SENATE BILL NO. 190( )

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE - SECOND SESSION

BY

Offered:
Referred:

Sponsor(s): SENATORS WIELECHOWSKI, Ellis

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to biometric information."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 18 is amended by adding a new chapter to read:

Chapter 14. Biometric Information.

Sec. 18.14.010. Biometric information consent. (a) A person may not retain or analyze, or disclose or distribute to another person, biometric information on an individual without first obtaining the informed and written consent of the individual.

(b) An individual may, at any time, revoke or amend the individual's consent provided under (a) of this section.

Sec. 18.14.020. Alternate identification. A person may not require an individual to provide biometric data to the person for the purpose of identifying the individual if the individual provides the person with a valid current

(1) United States passport; and

(2) identification card issued by a state in the United States or by a branch of the armed forces of the United States.

Sec. 18.14.030. Uniform consent form. The Department of Health and Social Services may by regulation adopt a uniform consent form to assist persons to meet the requirements for the consent required by AS 18.14.010. A person who retains or analyzes, or discloses or distributes to another person, biometric information, based on consent that is provided in a uniform consent form that has not been revoked, is exempt from civil liability under AS 18.14.060 and from criminal liability for the retention, analysis, disclosure, or distribution of the biometric information.

Sec. 18.14.040. General authorization. A general authorization for the release of medical records or medical information may not be construed to constitute the informed and written consent required by AS 18.14.010.

Sec. 18.14.050. Private right of action. An individual may bring a civil action against another person who violates AS 18.14.010 or 18.14.020. Except as provided by AS 18.14.030, a person who violates AS 18.14.010 is liable to the individual for actual damages and a penalty of $5,000, except that, if the violation resulted in profit or monetary gain to the person, the penalty is $100,000.

Sec. 18.14.060. Exemptions. This chapter does not apply to the retention, analysis, disclosure, or distribution of biometric information

(1) for a law enforcement purpose, including the identification of perpetrators, the investigation of crimes, the identification of missing or unidentified persons or the identification of human remains; or

(2) when authorized by state or federal law.

Sec. 18.14.090. Definitions. In this chapter,

(1) "biometric data" means fingerprints, handprints, voices, facial images, iris images, or retinal images;

(2) "biometric information" means biometric data that is used in a biometric system for fingerprint recognition, hand geometry recognition, voice recognition, facial recognition, iris scans, retinal scans, or palm vein recognition;

(3) "biometric system" means an automated system capable of

(A) capturing biometric data from an individual's biometric information;

(B) extracting and processing the biometric data captured under

(A) of this paragraph;

(C) storing the biometric data extracted under (B) of this paragraph;

(D) comparing the biometric data extracted under (B) of this paragraph with biometric data stored for the individual for use in future recognition of the individual;

(E) determining how well the extracted and stored biometric data match when compared under (D) of this paragraph, and indicating whether an identification or verification of identity has been achieved;

(4) "facial recognition" means the use of an image of the visible physical structure of an individual's face for recognition purposes;

(5) "fingerprint recognition" means the use of the physical structure of an individual's fingerprint for recognition purposes;

(6) "governmental entity" means a state agency, a municipality, and an agency of a municipality; in this paragraph, "state agency" means an agency of the executive, judicial, or legislative branch of state government;

(7) "hand geometry recognition" means the use of the physical structure of an individual's hand for recognition purposes;

(8) "iris scan" means the use of an image of the physical structure of an individual's iris for recognition purposes;

(9) "palm vein recognition" means the use of the veins in an individual's palm print for recognition purposes;

(10) "person" has the meaning given in AS 01.10.060, and includes a governmental entity;

(11) "retinal scan" means the use of the pattern of blood vessels in an individual's eye for recognition purposes.

Draft CS for SB 190(JUD) – Proposed Changes

The following changes are proposed for Senate Bill 190 in the Senate Judiciary Committee and can be found in the attached version 26-LS0332\W:

1. A new chapter entitled "Biometric Information" is created for this provision of the law.

Discussion: This was done at the recommendation of the Attorney General's office because SB 190 is substantially different from the chapter in which it was originally contained titled "Genetic Privacy."

Location: Page 1, lines 3 and 4.

2. The term "collect" is removed from the bill.

Discussion: Both the Attorney General's office and committee members expressed concern that the term "collect" might prevent legitimate social and economic practices from taking place.

Location: Page 1, lines 5-7; page 2, lines 3-4; page 2, lines 16-17.

3. Clarification was made that there is an exception for the retention, analysis, disclosure, or distribution of biometric information for law enforcement purposes, or when authorized by state or federal law.

Discussion: This is based on suggested language from the Attorney General's office and is intended to clarify that private investigations into such crimes as fraud or arson are legal, and that biometric information can continue to be collected for criminal background checks.

Location: Page 2, lines 16-21.

4. The word "willing" is removed from the "informed and written consent" found in the previous version.

Discussion: This language now mirrors that which is found in the current Genetic Privacy statute.

5. Biometric data cannot be required for personal identification if the person to be identified can provide a valid current United States Passport and valid state or military ID.

Discussion: Since biometric data, such as a fingerprint, is only as good as the initial ID with which it is presented, it would seem that there is no valid reason to collect this data identification purposes.

Location: Page 1, lines 10-15.

6. The definitions section has been greatly expanded and clarified. A distinction has been made between "biometric information," "biometric data," and a "biometric system." The "biometric information" referenced in this bill is now defined as "biometric data" that has been used in an automated system capable of capturing, extracting, and processing biometric data. Further, the system must be capable of storing the data, comparing the data with other stored data, and indicating whether an indication or verification of identity has been achieved.

   This section also provides clear definitions for the specific forms of biometric information referenced in this bill—using definitions from the National Science and Technology Council to the extent practicable.

Senate Bill 190

"An Act Relating to the use of biometric information"

Sponsor Statement

In 2004, the Alaska Legislature unanimously passed legislation outlawing the collection, analysis, or storage of a law-abiding citizen's genetic information without their express written consent. This legislation was drafted in response to rapidly evolving technology that holds great promise for fields such as medicine and law enforcement; but also holds the potential for misuse by those who would use a person's genetic data to obtain information about them that they would normally have an express right to keep private.

Senate Bill 190 would update this legislation to protect not only Alaskans' DNA, but all similar forms of biometric information. The term "biometric information" refers to any information about an individual based on their unique behavioral or physiological characteristics. The most commonly known forms of biometric information are a person's fingerprints and their DNA; but also include such information as iris and retinal patterns, hand geometry, voice patterns, and facial characteristics.

At this time, many potential uses of biometric information are still at the rudimentary stages of development. However, new technologies will soon be available that will be able to make use of this information with chilling consequences for individual privacy and civil liberties.

Examples of the potential misuse of biometric information include the collection of an individual's DNA by potential employers or insurers to weed out applicants that may have a genetic predisposition towards certain illnesses; and the use of video surveillance enhanced by facial recognition technology to track citizens' movements without their knowledge.

Alaskans should bear in mind that one of the proposed requirements of the Federal REAL ID Act was that every Alaskan ID card contain a radio frequency identification (RFID) chip, which would allow a citizen's movements to be tracked without their knowledge.

Thankfully, the State of Alaska has joined other states in refusing to submit to the REAL ID Act. The legislature should take a similar strong stand to protect Alaskans' biometric information and their constitutional right to privacy.

SUBJECT: SB 190 relating to biometric information
(Work Order No. 26-LS0332\P)

TO: Senator Bill Wielechowski
Attn: George Ascott

FROM: Theresa Bannister
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional summary of the above-described bill. As a preliminary matter, note that a sectional summary of a bill should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill and the bill itself is the best statement of its contents

Section 1. Expands AS 18.13.010(a), which currently deals with DNA information, to prohibit collecting other biometric information from a person, retaining other biometric information, and disclosing the results of other biometric information without the required consent. Makes the other biometric information the exclusive property of the person who was the source of the biometric information.

Section 2. Amends AS 18.13.010(b), which lists the situations to which (a) does not apply. Expands the subsection to indicate that the listed situations cover "other biometric information collected" as well as DNA. Adds to the list an exception for background checks as required or permitted by state or federal law.

Section 3. Amends AS 18.13.020, which provides a private right of action for violations. Adds the biometric information prohibitions to the violations for which a person has a right of action.

Section 4. Amends AS 18.13.030(a), which sets a criminal penalty for violations, to include violations of the biometric information prohibitions. Removes governmental entities from the subsection.

Section 5. Amends AS 18.13.030(c), which makes the crime a class A misdemeanor. Conforms the name of the violation to the name of the crime established in (a).

Section 6. Amends AS 18.13.100, the definition section for AS 18.13. Adds definitions for "biometric information," "governmental entity," and "person."

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

Facial Biometrics System Capable of Creating a Facial 'DNA'

ScienceDaily (Nov. 16, 2009) — Research into techniques of facial biometrics, carried out by scientists at Universidad Carlos III de Madrid (UC3M), has resulted in a system that is able to recognize the facial "DNA" of every individual by determining his/her most noteworthy facial traits, with a of 95% rate of precision.

Recognition techniques based on facial features, known as facial biometrics, is usually based on the search for those traits which make one face different from another. The research carried out by this team, in contrast, approaches the issue from a slightly different point of view.

"The difference between our work and the majority of the others that are found in this field is the idea of individualized models," explains one of the study's authors, mathematician David Delgado Gomez from the UC3M Statistics Department. "Our objective," he continued, "is to create a model for each person which highlights the most distinguishing features of each face, as a sort of facial 'DNA'."

The researchers had this idea when they were imagining the situation of a crowded room where someone comes in asking for one of them. "Our way to describe a person is through some traits that the others don't have, such as the tall woman with blue eyes, or the bald guy with a beard. We try to apply this idea to our algorithm," remarked Professor Delgado, who has been carrying out this research with Federico Sukno, Kaushik Pavani and Alejandro Frangi from the CISTIB Group of Universidad Pompeu Fabra of Barcelona, and Bjarne Ersboll and Jens Fagertun from the mathematical modelling group of Technical University of Denmark, which has recently published an article entitled "Similarity-based Fisherfaces," with some of their research results appearing in the scientific journal Pattern Recognition Letters.

A facial biometrics system is normally made up of three components. First, a camera is necessary to record an image; secondly, a software program is needed which determines if there is a face in that image, locating among other things, the facial geometry (the placement of the eyes, nose, mouth, etc.); and thirdly, a system that is capable of classifying all those elements to differentiate between them and those of other persons. The most complicated part, according to the researchers was combining the facial geometry and facial texture.

"With only the geometric information, very low classifications are obtained, which is why we combine this information with that of facial texture to obtain a more robust model, and a statistical way of combining them occurred to us, which offered very good results.," Delgado pointed out. The researchers have shown that when this system is used in a controlled environment, it can achieve a 95% rate of precision.

The main complication occurring when using this type of systems is the lighting, which can change the color of the face. Another challenge is the passage of time, because as a person ages, his/her face undergoes changes as it becomes heavier, thinner, or more wrinkled, which can then fool the classifiers. On the other hand, the researchers add, it does have a significant advantage when compared to other biometric systems: it doesn't need direct interaction with a person as do fingerprinting or iris recognition, for example.

Editorial: Time for laws on genome spies

This man's genome has hacked. That was for work purposes. You may not be so lucky (Image: Mark Richards)

INTIMATE secrets hidden in your DNA could be stolen without you even realising. By taking a glass from which you have drunk, a "genome hacker" could obtain a comprehensive scan of your genome, revealing DNA variants that help determine your susceptibility to a wide range of diseases, from a common form of blindness to Alzheimer's disease.

That's the disturbing finding of a New Scientist investigation, in which one of us - Michael Reilly - "hacked" the genome of the other - Peter Aldhous - armed with only a credit card, a private email account and a home address.

You might have thought that genome hacking requires specialist skills, and personal access to sophisticated equipment. But in recent years, some companies have started to offer personal genome scans to the public over the internet. Other firms routinely analyse genomes on behalf of scientists involved in human genetics research. In theory, both types of service are vulnerable to abuse by a genome hacker determined to submit someone else's DNA for covert analysis.

Until our investigation, it was not clear whether this would be possible in practice. Could a hacker with no access to a genetics lab take an item carrying another person's DNA and obtain a sample that companies would accept for scanning? Would the sample be of high enough quality to yield accurate results? And would genome analysis companies have procedures in place to identify and refuse suspicious orders?

We decided to find out. Rather like computer security researchers who expose vulnerabilities in software code so that they can be "patched" to guard against malicious hackers, our goal was to uncover vulnerabilities in the way companies offering genome scans operate, so that they can be fixed.

Our investigation uncovered some loopholes that might be closed to help thwart genome thieves. The findings also strengthen the case for additional laws to protect the information contained in the DNA that we all shed continually and leave lying around.

"Just as we have a right to expect that relatives, neighbours, or even strangers can't poke through our medical records without our permission, we should have a right to expect that people can't snoop through our genes," says Kathy Hudson, who heads the Genetics and Public Policy Center in Washington DC.

We should have a right to expect that people can't snoop through our genes

Our experimental genome hack began like this: Peter drank water from a glass, which he handed to Michael. Michael's first task was to get Peter's DNA off the glass and turn it into a sample that he could submit to a genome-scanning company.

Michael approached several firms that ordinarily extract DNA from items like drinking glasses and match this DNA against particular individuals, on behalf of the police, private detectives or citizens pursuing their own investigations. He said nothing about his intentions, but soon found a company that would extract the DNA without performing any DNA matches. Some weeks later a vial containing a solution of Peter's DNA turned up at Michael's home.

DNA boosters

Companies that perform genome scans use DNA "chips" that test for the presence of hundreds of thousands of DNA variants known as single nucleotide polymorphisms, or SNPs - some of which have been associated with susceptibility to various diseases. As these chips require more DNA than came from our drinking glass, Michael's next challenge was to duplicate Peter's DNA to get a large enough sample.

This procedure, called "whole genome amplification", is offered to scientists and could, for instance, be used to amplify DNA from small clinical samples in studies investigating the genetic origins of disease. Geneticists often place orders involving large numbers of samples, but Michael found a lab services firm that was willing to amplify our single sample to produce more than enough DNA to run on a SNP chip. He did not say why he wanted this done.

Next we had to choose a company to perform the genome scan itself. Lab services companies, such as the one that performed our amplification, often offer this service to scientists as well. But they do not provide an interpretation of the scans in terms of health risks and other traits - something a genome hacker is likely to want. So this wasn't our first port of call. Instead, we looked at the personal genomics services offered to members of the public by companies such as Decode Genetics of Reykjavik, Iceland, and the Californian firms 23andMe of Mountain View and Navigenics, based in Foster City.

Swab spiker

To gather the DNA provided by their customers, 23andMe and Navigenics use a collection tube into which you must spit about 2 millilitres of saliva. We decided that it would be hard to convert Peter's amplified DNA sample into a form that closely mimicked saliva. So we chose to use Decode's service, branded deCODEme, which instead collects DNA using swabs consisting of a piece of filter paper on a plastic handle that customers are supposed to rub against the inside of their cheek. We reasoned that Michael might be able to "spike" these swabs with Peter's amplified DNA without Decode noticing.

The terms and conditions for the deCODEme service state that someone submitting DNA must have the legal authority to do so, and that the sample must be taken from the cheek. We wanted to test whether deCODEme is vulnerable to abuse from someone prepared to ignore these terms, so Michael pipetted some of Peter's DNA onto deCODEme's swabs and sent them off for analysis under his own name. As far as Decode was concerned, it was a sample of Michael's DNA taken by swabbing his own cheek.

This is when we hit our only real obstacle. A few weeks later, Michael was told that the sample had not processed successfully. This is possibly because Decode uses a chip that isn't designed to work with amplified DNA.

We had two contingency plans, however. First, Michael contacted our original lab services company again and asked it to analyse the remainder of our amplified sample using a different type of chip to the one that Decode uses. This company also has terms and conditions specifying that customers must have the necessary consents and approvals to submit samples. Mimicking a hacker who would be willing to ignore these terms, Michael submitted the amplified DNA for scanning.

Second, we made use of the replacement cheek swabs sent to deCODEme customers when a sample fails to process. We wanted to test the swabs' vulnerability to being spiked with a different source of "abandoned" DNA that might be taken by a genome hacker - semen from a used condom. Peter sealed the replacement swabs, spiked with his semen, in an envelope, which Michael sent back to Decode.

Both of these back-up plans worked. For the sample of DNA taken from the drinking glass and analysed by the lab services company we obtained a read-out of about a million of Peter's SNPs. To interpret this information, we used a computer program called Promethease, which can be downloaded for free from the genomics website SNPedia.com.

SNPedia contains information contributed by genomics enthusiasts on the diseases and traits linked to particular SNPs, mostly drawn from scientific papers. Promethease is a tool intended for legitimate customers of personal genomics companies that takes the raw data from an individual's genome scan and relates it to the information in SNPedia, highlighting those SNPs that seem to reveal the most interesting things about the person concerned.

For the semen sample submitted to Decode, we obtained the company's own interpretation of Peter's lifetime risks of developing a range of diseases, in addition to a full download of the raw data, again documenting about a million SNPs.

So what would a hacker who had taken Peter's DNA have learned about him? For the DNA taken from the drinking glass, Promethease highlighted a range of SNPs, including those conferring increased risks of baldness, the skin disease psoriasis, and a form of blindness called exfoliation glaucoma. Decode's interpretation of the semen sample was rather different. For instance, it decided from an analysis of eight different SNPs that Peter's risk of developing psoriasis is very low (see table). And while Promethease and Decode both concluded that Peter is more likely than a typical person to develop Alzheimer's disease, they disagreed on the size of his risk (see "A short-lived Alzheimer's scare").

In part, these confusing results reflect current limits to geneticists' knowledge of how individual variations in DNA sequences influence health. But the science is advancing quickly, so there is no room for complacency about the ease with which a genome can be hacked.

Motives for such hacking are not hard to find. In the wake of the US presidential election, Robert Green and George Annas of Boston University speculated that future campaigns could be blighted by the sneaky analysis of a candidate's DNA by political opponents who hope to reveal looming health problems (The New England Journal of Medicine, vol 359, p 2192).

For people who are not politicians or celebrities, the most obvious threat comes from unscrupulous employers or insurers - and many countries have already restricted their use of genetic information. But private citizens may also have motives to pry into one another's DNA. A newly engaged person might want to know whether their future spouse carries genes making them vulnerable to dementia, for example. Or a childless couple could simply wipe a dribbling baby's mouth to investigate the child's genetic heritage and traits before deciding whether to adopt.

> An engaged person might want to know if their future spouse is vulnerable to dementia

Cost is not a huge obstacle, as the sums we spent would not deter a wealthy snoop. Decode's analysis of Peter's semen cost $985, while the total price for extracting his DNA from a drinking glass and then getting it amplified and analysed by the lab services company was about $1700. Genomic analysis is only going to get cheaper, and more powerful. "The plummeting costs of genome profiling and sequencing make it all too tempting to snoop around in other people's genomes," says Hudson.

Still, the results of our investigation suggest steps that companies could take to help protect people's privacy, and New Scientist has informed firms that run SNP analyses of our findings.

For companies selling genetic analyses to the public, verifying the origin of samples will always be difficult unless sample collection is supervised by a medical professional or some other official witness. It is possible to run lab tests that distinguish saliva and swabs taken from inside the cheek from other biological samples, however.

Companies offering services to research scientists, meanwhile, might consider running some checks to try to confirm that customers are legitimate. Such checks may not be completely hacker-proof, but had Michael been asked for evidence of affiliation to a scientific institution, he would not have been able to provide it legitimately.

Following our investigation, the company that amplified and analysed the sample from the drinking glass is now considering whether it could introduce further checks without obstructing legitimate orders. "Clearly we do not want to process samples where the proper consent has not been obtained," says the firm's operations director. "It's a question of how to achieve that goal without impeding the research of legitimate scientists."

Thwarting genome hackers may also require new laws to protect privacy. One approach would be for other countries to follow the UK, which has made it a crime to have someone else's DNA with the intent of analysing it without consent. "Although we are not aware of any instances of this in personal genome analysis, there is a clear rationale for making it illegal to analyse an individual's DNA without their knowledge and consent," says Decode spokesman Edward Farmer. Such laws are difficult to enforce, however, as an earlier New Scientist investigation revealed (31 January, p 6).

Another approach, which could be tried in parallel, would be to make it illegal for companies to extract and analyse DNA left on everyday items, except under specific circumstances. "There's no good reason, unless you are a police officer investigating a crime, to be doing DNA analysis on a sample from a drinking glass," argues Mark Rothstein, director of the Institute for Bioethics, Health Policy and Law at the University of Louisville in Kentucky.

One thing is clear: if lawmakers fail to rise to the challenge posed by genome hacking, we all have reason to fear for the security of our DNA.

A short-lived alzheimer's scare

We have shown that a genome hacker could take someone's DNA and obtain scans that reveal their risks of certain diseases (see main story). But how accurate are these scans, and how meaningful are the interpretations drawn from them?

To get an idea, we compared the scan results for three samples of DNA taken from our reporter Peter Aldhous. One scan was obtained legitimately by Peter submitting a sample of his saliva to the personal genomics firm 23andMe; the other two were from simulated genome "hacks". The first of these hacked samples was semen from a condom, submitted to a rival service provided by Decode Genetics; the second consisted of DNA extracted from a drinking glass, which was then amplified and scanned by a lab services company.

The raw data from these scans, which document DNA variants known as SNPs, were reasonably consistent, according to an analysis performed for New Scientist by Kevin Jacobs, who runs Bioinformed Consulting Services in Gaithersburg, Maryland.

The raw data for the hacked semen sample were the same as for the legitimate saliva control for 99.996 per cent of the SNPs recorded in both cases. Meanwhile, the SNP data for the DNA taken from the drinking glass diverged a little from the results coming from the semen sample and the control, agreeing about 93 per cent of the time in each case. Why the glass sample gave slightly different results is unclear, but it might be due to degradation or contamination of the DNA, or artefacts introduced during its amplification.

Interpretations of the raw SNP data varied much more widely, however (see table). Most confusing - and initially rather scary - were the suggestions about Peter's risk of developing Alzheimer's disease.

Look again

Alzheimer's risk is determined partly by variants of a gene called APOE. 23andMe provides no information on these variants, and for the other two samples we received conflicting interpretations.

For the DNA sample taken from the drinking glass, the software that we used to interpret the scan, called Promethease, highlighted a rare form of one SNP, which nestles close to APOE and tends to be inherited along with two copies of the risky variant of the gene, known as epsilon 4. Based on this, Promethease suggested Peter's risk of developing Alzheimer's disease was between 15 and 25 times that of an average person.

It all seemed very worrying, until we looked at Decode's analysis. The raw data confirmed that Peter does carry this rare SNP, but Decode does not assess APOE in the indirect way that Promethease does. Instead, it analyses two SNPs in the APOE gene itself that define how many copies of the risky variant are actually present. This revealed that Peter has just one copy of epsilon 4, and one of the common variant, epsilon 3. On this basis, Decode concluded that he is only twice as likely to develop Alzheimer's as a typical person - a moderate risk that Peter shares with about 1 in 5 people of European descent.

So while the raw data from genome scans - legitimately obtained or not - are reasonably accurate, determining what they mean is another matter entirely.

Fingerprinting program threatens privacy for CPAs, accountants

By Jason Giaimo
Publication Date: 04/27/08

Accountants and certified public accountants are in an uproar over a new program instituted by the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants that forces those seeking certification to be fingerprinted.

Worse still, fingerprints will be stored by a soon-to-be foreign corporation.

For the first time in its 121-year history, the venerable American Institute of Certified Public Accountants (AICPA) is forcing examinees across the country to either submit to being fingerprinted or be barred from the exam process, regardless of other identification presented.

Accountants should think twice before taking the CPA exam until this program is rescinded. I am challenging the national accounting board over its new forced fingerprint collection program, and I am far from alone.

We have surrendered enough of our privacy. This illogical, un-American and Orwellian obsession with collecting innocent people's fingerprints must end now.

It's hard to understand the business case for this type of application. I offered to show my U.S. passport, driver's license, social security card, even my original birth certificate, but was still barred from completing my remaining CPA exams due to "insufficient identification." I was two days away from completion when the new program went into effect.

How can a passport be sufficient identification to travel the world and enter the USA, but not to sit for the CPA exam? This is clearly not about identification, but about data collection. It's shameful and it needs to stop.

CPAs across the nation, including the Alaska State Board of Accountancy, staunchly oppose the new national forced fingerprinting program. The AICPA has agreed to put the program on the agenda for review at its May 19 national meeting, according to national accounting board official Pat Hartman.

The Institute of Management Accountants (IMA), another group that offers certifications, said it does not plan to require fingerprinting for their exams.

Some believe fingerprints are necessary for identity validation. Others say it's too risky. Risky indeed.

According to the National Association of State Boards of Accountancy executives, the new CPA fingerprint database will be stored by ChoicePoint Corp., the same data broker that was recently fined a whopping $15 million by the Federal Trade Commission - the largest civil penalty in FTC history - for "making false and misleading statements about its privacy policies, violating consumer's privacy rights, and for violating numerous federal laws," according to the FTC Web site.

ChoicePoint was also accused of selling highly confidential financial information to Nigerians involved in crime operation.

Currently, the company maintains more than 17 billion records of individuals and businesses, which it sells to an estimated 100,000 clients, including the Department of Homeland Security, law enforcement agencies and the FBI. Worse still, ChoicePoint recently announced that it is being acquired by foreign corporation ReedElsevier, which privacy advocates maintain will make it even less subject to U.S. regulatory and legal control.

Why should innocent Americans object to having their fingerprints taken?

When you submit to being fingerprinted for "routine" background checks, your prints are compared against the FBI's database of more than 55 million sets of fingerprints, and then (supposedly) purged.

However, according to a Dec. 23, 2007, article in the Washington Post, the FBI is initiating a new program called "rap-back," which will allow the FBI to retain and add the fingerprints from "routine" background checks on innocent Americans to their massive tracking database.

Your fingerprints will then be subject to "electronic line-ups" whenever the law enforcement database is queried for terrorism, murder or other criminal activities.

Mistakes do happen. People have been falsely imprisoned by errors in fingerprint matching. Just Google U.S. attorney Brandon Mayfield for one such example. His prints initially came back a "100 percent perfect match" to a terrorist bombing, according to FBI fingerprint experts.

I remain an optimist. The AICPA is responsive to public comment and has top-notch leadership. While this unfortunate misstep puts CPAs at risk and hurts the profession, I'm confident the organization will rectify the situation by shutting down this program at its May 19 meeting. My hope is that the public and CPAs will e-mail the AICPA to share their views about this program.

The e-mail addresses of key AICPA/NASBA executives can be found on my Web site at www.NetGainConsultants.com or on the AICPA's site at www.aicpa.org.

Biometrics: Who's Watching You?

Introduction

Among the many reactions to the September 11 tragedy has been a renewed attention to biometrics. The federal government has led the way with its new concern about border control. Other proposals include the use of biometrics with ID cards and in airports, e.g. video surveillance enhanced by facial-recognition technology.

The purpose of this document is to sketch out EFF's concerns about biometrics. In today's public arena, biometric technologies are being marketed as a "silver bullet" for terrorism; however, very little independent, objective scientific testing of biometrics has been done. Deploying biometric systems without sufficient attention to their dangers makes them likely to be used in a way dangerous to civil liberties. This document is very much a work in progress and we welcome comments.

What Are Biometrics?

Biometrics refers to the automatic identification or identity verification of living persons using their enduring physical or behavioral characteristics. Many body parts, personal characteristics and imaging methods have been suggested and used for biometric systems: fingers, hands, feet, faces, eyes, ears, teeth, veins, voices, signatures, typing styles, gaits and odors.

Our Major Concerns

- Biometric technology is inherently individuating and interfaces easily to database technology, making privacy violations easier and more damaging. If we are to deploy such systems, privacy must be designed into them from the beginning, as it is hard to retrofit complex systems for privacy.
- Biometric systems are useless without a well-considered threat model. Before deploying any such system on the national stage, we must have a realistic threat model, specifying the categories of people such systems are supposed to target, and the threat they pose in light of their abilities, resources, motivations and goals. Any such system will also need to map out clearly in advance how the system is to work, in both in its successes and in its failures.
- Biometrics are no substitute for quality data about potential risks. No matter how accurately a person is identified, identification alone reveals nothing about whether a person is a terrorist. Such information is completely external to any biometric ID system.
- Biometric identification is only as good as the initial ID. The quality of the initial "enrollment" or "registration" is crucial. Biometric systems are only as good as the initial identification, which in any foreseeable system will be based on exactly the document-based methods of identification upon which biometrics are supposed to be an improvement. A terrorist with a fake passport would be issued a US visa with his own biometric attached to the name on the phony passport. Unless the terrorist A) has already entered his biometrics into the database, and B) has garnered enough suspicion at the border to merit a full database search, biometrics won't stop him at the border.
- Biometric identification is often overkill for the task at hand. It is not necessary to identify a person (and to create a record of their presence at a certain place and time) if all you really want to know is whether they're entitled to do something or be somewhere. When in a bar, customers use IDs to prove they're old enough to drink, not to prove who they are, or to create a record of their presence.
- Some biometric technologies are discriminatory.A nontrivial percentage of the population cannot present suitable features to participate in certain biometric systems. Many people have fingers that simply do not "print well." Even if people with "bad prints" represent 1% of the population, this would mean massive inconvenience and suspicion for that minority. And scale matters. The INS, for example, handles about 1 billion distinct entries and exits every year. Even a seemingly low error rate of 0.1% means 1 million errors, each of which translates to INS resources lost following a false lead.

- Biometric systems' accuracy is impossible to assess before deployment Accuracy and error rates published by biometric technology vendors are not trustworthy, as biometric error rates are intrinsically manipulable. Biometric systems fail in two ways: false match (incorrectly matching a subject with someone else's reference sample) and false non-match (failing to match a subject with her own reference sample). There's a trade-off between these two types of error, and biometric systems may be "tuned" to favor one error type over another. When subjected to real-world testing in the proposed operating environment, biometric systems frequently fall short of the performance promised by vendors.
- The cost of failure is high. If you lose a credit card, you can cancel it and get a new one. If you lose a biometric, you've lost it for life. Any biometric system must be built to the highest levels of data security, including transmission that prevents interception, storage that prevents theft, and system-wide architecture to prevent both intrusion and compromise by corrupt or deceitful agents within the organization.

Despite these concerns, political pressure for increasing use of biometrics appears to be informed and driven more by marketing from the biometrics industry than by scientists. Much federal attention is devoted to deploying biometrics for border security. This is an easy sell, because immigrants and foreigners are, politically speaking, easy targets. But once a system is created, new uses are usually found for it, and those uses will not likely stop at the border.

With biometric ID systems, as with national ID systems, we must be wary of getting the worst of both worlds: a system that enables greater social surveillance of the population in general, but does not provide increased protection against terrorists.

Some Current Biometric Initiatives

Sec. 403(c) of the USA-PATRIOT Act specifically requires the federal government to "develop and certify a technology standard that can be used to verify the identity of persons" applying for or seeking entry into the United States on a U.S. visa "for the purposes of conducting background checks, confirming identity, and ensuring that a person has not received a visa under a different name."

The recently enacted Enhanced Border Security and Visa Entry Reform Act of 2002, Sec. 303(b)(1), requires that only "machine-readable, tamper-resistant visas and other travel and entry documents that use biometric identifiers" shall be issued to aliens by October 26, 2004. The Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and the State Department currently are evaluating biometrics for use in U.S. border control pursuant to EBSVERA.

Even prior to September 11, however, large-scale civilian biometric identification systems were being pushed. Both the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Act of 1995 (PRWOA), a welfare reform law, and the Immigration Control and Financial Responsibility Act of 1996 (ICFRA), an immigration reform law, called for the use of "technology" for identification purposes.

The PRWOA requires the states to implement an electronic benefits transfer program "using the most recent technology available . . . which may include personal identification numbers, photographic identification . . . and other measures to protect against fraud and abuse." This law covers, for example, the Food Stamps program.

The ICFRA requires the President to "develop and recommend . . . a plan for the establishment of a data system or alternative system . . . to verify eligibility for employment in the United States, and immigration status in the United States for purposes of eligibility for benefits under public assistance programs . . . or government benefits." This system "must be capable of reliably determining with respect to an individual whether . . . the individual is claiming the identity of another person."

The Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 (IIRAIRA) requires the INS to include on alien border crossing cards "a biometric identifier (such as the fingerprint or handprint of the alien) that is machine readable." The State Department collects fingerprints and photographs of aliens for these cards.

The Truck and Bus Safety and Regulatory Reform Act of 1988 (TBSRRA) requires "minimum uniform standards for the biometric identification of commercial drivers."

EFF's concerns about biometrics

Why be concerned about biometrics? Proponents argue that: A) biometrics themselves aren't dangerous because all the real dangers are associated with the database behind the biometric information, which is little different from problems of person-identifying information (PII) databases generally; B) biometrics actually promote privacy, e.g., by enabling more reliable identification and thus frustrating identity fraud.

But biometric systems have many components. Only by analyzing a system as a whole can one understand its costs and benefits. Moreover, we must understand the unspoken commitments any such system imposes.

Surveillance

The chronic, longitudinal capture of biometric data is useful for surveillance purposes. Our Surveillance Monitor page highlights some of these issues. Biometric systems entail repeat surveillance, requiring an initial capture and then later captures.

Another major issue relates to the "voluntariness" of capture. Some biometrics, like faces, voices, and fingerprints, are easily "grabbed." Other biometrics, at least under present technology, must be consciously "given." It is difficult, for instance, to capture a scan of a person's retina or to gather a hand geometry image without the subject's cooperation. Easily grabbed biometrics are a problem because people can't control when they're being put into the system or when they're being tracked. But even hard-to-grab biometrics involve a trust issue in the biometric capture device and the overall system architecture.

Databases

To be effective, a biometric system must compare captured biometric data to a biometric database. Our National ID System page highlights issues surrounding database abuse, which has both static and dynamic dimensions.

The static issues surrounding databases are mainly about safeguarding large and valuable collections of personally identifying information. If these databases are part of an important security system, then they (and the channels used to share PII) are natural targets for attack, theft, compromise, and malicious or fraudulent use.

The dynamic issues surrounding databases mainly concern the need to maintain reliable, up-to-date information. Databases that seek to maintain accurate residence information must be updated whenever one moves. Databases that are used to establish eligibility for benefits must be updated so as to exclude persons no longer eligible. The broader the function of the system, the more and broader the updating that is required, increasing the role of general social surveillance in the system.

It may seem that one of the issues that plagues token-based ID systems (like ID cards) -- the security or integrity of the token itself -- does not apply for biometric systems, because "you are your ID." But the question of the reliability of the token is really a question about trust. In an ID card system, the question is whether the system can trust the card. In biometric systems, the question is whether the individual can trust the system. If someone else captures your signature, fingerprint, or voice, for instance, what prevents it from being used by others? Any use of biometrics with a scanner run by someone else involves trusting someone's claim about what the scanner does and how the captured information will be used.

Vendors and scanner operators may say that they protect privacy in some way, perhaps by hashing the biometric data or designing the database to enforce a privacy policy. But the end user typically has no way to verify whether such technical protections are effective or implemented properly. End-users should be able to verify any such claims, and to leave the system completely if they are not satisfied. Exiting the system, of course, should at least include the expungement of the end-user's biometric data and records.

Linking

An oft-noted risk of biometric systems is the use of biometrics as a linking identifier. This risk, of course, depends to some extent on standardization. Consider, for instance, the use of the Social Security number as a linker across disparate databases. While the private sector would not have been able to develop anything like the SSN on its own, once the government created this identifier, it became a standard way of identifying individuals. Standardization therefore creates new privacy risks because information gathered for one purpose can be used for completely unrelated, unconsented-to purposes.

Currently, Automated Fingerprint ID Systems (AFIS) are heavily used by the government in connection with law enforcement, but there is at present little standardization within the AFIS industry. If law enforcement and private industry were to unify their fingerprint databases under one common standard, such as under a national ID system, this would potentially put one's entire life history in interoperating databases that are only a fingerprint away.

Tracking

By far the most significant negative aspect of biometric ID systems is their potential to locate and track people physically. While many surveillance systems seek to locate and track, biometric systems present the greatest danger precisely because they promise extremely high accuracy. Whether a specific biometric system actually poses a risk of such tracking depends on how it is designed.

Why should we care about perfect tracking? EFF believes that perfect tracking is inimical to a free society. A society in which everyone's actions are tracked is not, in principle, free. It may be a livable society, but would not be our society.

EFF believes that perfect surveillance, even without any deliberate abuse, would have an extraordinary chilling effect on artistic and scientific inventiveness and on political expression. This concern underlies constitutional protection for anonymity, both as an aspect of First Amendment freedoms of speech and association, and as an aspect of Fourth Amendment privacy.

Implemented improperly, biometric systems could:

- increase the visibility of individual behavior. This makes it easier for measures to be taken against individuals by agents of the government, by corporations, and by our peers.
- result in politically damaging and personally embarrassing disclosures, blackmail and extortion. This hurts democracy, because it reduces the willingness of competent people to participate in public life.
- increase the 'circumstantial evidence' available for criminal prosecution. This might dramatically affect the existing balance of plausible-sounding evidence available to prosecutors, and hence increase the incidence of wrongful conviction. Many criminal cases are decided by plea bargaining, a process that is sensitive to the perceived quality of evidence. Even ambiguous or spurious evidence generated by complex technical systems may be difficult for overburdened public defenders to challenge.
- enable the matching of people's behavior against pre-determined patterns. This could be used by the government to generate suspicion, or by the private sector to classify individuals into micro-markets, the better to manipulate consumer behavior.
- aid in repressing readily locatable and trackable individuals. While the public's concern is usually focused on the exercise of state power, these technologies may also greatly empower corporations. If proper privacy safeguards are not constructed into such systems, they would prove useful in dealing with such troublesome opponents as competitors, regulators, union organizers, whistleblowers, and lobbyists, as well as employees, consumer activists, customers and suppliers.

The Attributes of Biometric Systems

How Do Biometrics Compare to Other Types of ID?

Currently other than personally recognizing someone, or having a trusted third party personally swear to their identity, the only other technique for identifying a person is through the use of a "token." These tokens, which are in essence representations of the oath of a trusted third party, come in two basic forms:

- Knowledge tokens, such as passwords, secret PINs (Personal Identification Numbers), or knowledge of personal data (knowing one's mother's maiden name, e.g.), or
- Physical tokens such as ID cards, passports, chip cards, or plain old keys.

Token IDs offer certain advantages over biometric identification. Security against "false acceptance" of impostors can be raised by increasing the complexity of the token used for identification. Also, in the event of loss or compromise, the token, be it a password, PIN, key, or ID card, can be revoked, changed or reissued, a biometric measurement cannot.

The advantage of biometrics is that unlike tokens, biometrics cannot be lost, loaned, or forgotten. Token-based systems must verify that the presenter is the authorized user, not an unauthorized person who has come to possess the token.

Used carefully, biometrics may be combined with token-based systems to mitigate the vulnerability of ID tokens to unauthorized use.

Functions of Biometric Systems

One useful way of thinking about biometrics is that they are used for one of two purposes: A) To prove that you are who you say you are (positive ID), or B) To prove that you are not who you say you are not (negative ID).

In a positive ID situation, the subject asserts that she is Jane Doe and submits a "live" sample (a fingerprint, for example) to the system. The system then checks its database of previously enrolled or registered samples to see if the live sample matches the reference sample. A positive ID system is designed to prevent more than one person from using a single identity.

In a negative ID situation, John Roe claims not to be someone already known to the system. Here, the system checks its database to see that Roe is not on the watchlist of suspected criminals and terrorists, whose biometrics are already in the system. A negative ID system is designed to prevent one person from using more than one identity.

When biometrics are employed to effect negative identification, one need not be enrolled. The only persons who must be "in" the database are those whom the operator is trying to keep out or catch.

Biometrics alone cannot establish "true identity." A biometric system cannot prevent someone from furnishing fake credentials when they first enter the system. They can only prevent them from using another identity once enrolled.

Common Aspects of All Biometric Systems:

All biometric technology systems have certain aspects in common. All are dependent upon an accurate reference or "registration" sample. If a biometric system is to identify a person, it first must have this sample, positively linked to the subject, to compare against. Modern biometric identification systems, based on digital technology, analyze personal physical attributes at the time of registration and distill them into a series of numbers. Once this reference sample is in the system, future attempts to identify a person are based on a comparison of a "live" sample and the reference sample or samples.

A perfect system would recognize a person 100% of the time, and reject an impostor 100% of the time. However, biometric samples are gathered from people in environmental conditions that are uncontrollable, over equipment that may slowly be wearing out, and using technologies and methods that vary in their level of precision. Consequently, the accuracy of biometric systems is assessed in light of these confounding variables via its tendency to experience either a "false match" (also called a "false accept") or a "false non-match" ("false reject"). The point at which these two rates intersect is called the equal error rate or crossover point.

Biometric systems may be "tuned" to diverge from the equal error rate to provide a match threshhold that satisfies the designer's requirements. If a system compares a large number of persons against a small number of samples, and the consequence of a false match is low, (for example, at a border crossing or airport that is looking for a short list of criminals) a system biased towards a higher "false accept" or "false match" rate may be desirable. The advantage to biasing a system in this manner is that it is likely to err on the side of safety, and less likely to let a criminal slip through undetected. The disadvantage is that the system will falsely associate innocent people with criminals. If other safeguards are in place and the system operators understand the system's bias towards false match, the result can be a relatively trivial loss of convenience due to increased scrutiny (extra inspection of luggage, questioning, etc.) Biasing such a system towards a high "false non-match" or "false reject" rate will result in fewer passengers slowed down at the gate, but at the cost of possibly losing the sought-after criminals.

When assessing the utility or the cost of a biometric system, it's important to bear the common features of all such systems in mind. How is the reference sample to be gathered and catalogued? How it the live sample going to be gathered? Can a live sample be captured without the subject's knowledge and cooperation? What are the implications of all four possible outcomes (true match, true non-match, false match, false non-match)? What is the value of a successful system, and what is the cost, to all parties, should it fail?

Further, we should not assess failure simply from the perspective of the core biometric technology itself. Even an ideal system can be defeated easily if it is incorporated into an insecure or poorly-designed overall system architecture. Any biometric system, especially one that involves a component of telecommunication, must be very carefully designed to prevent the loss or interception of user biometrics. Any deployed system must incorporate safeguards to prevent the interception of biometric data while it is being communicated. If a user's biometric is intercepted, criminals may be able to replicate either the sample itself or the string of binary data produced by a successfully-matched sample. Armed with such intercepted biometric data, a criminal would be able to effect a potentially very damaging identity theft.

Types of Biometrics

A proper assessment is built not only on a general understanding of biometrics, but also on an understanding of specific technologies. An understanding of both biometrics in general and specific biometric technologies is a necessary condition for a solid understanding of the larger social implications of biometrics.

Signature

The biometric most familiar to us is the signature. Our ability to judge by sight if one signature matches another has made this a time-proven and legally-binding biometric. However, by sight alone, most of us cannot recognize the pressure of the pen on the paper or the speed and rhythms of its traverse of the page. Computers can do all these things, and quantify, analyze and compare each of these properties to make signature recognition a viable biometric technology. Being based on things that are not visible (pen pressure and velocity, for example), signature-based biometric technology, offers a distinct advantage over regular signature verification -- in addition to mimicking the letter forms, any potential forger has to fabricate a signature at the same speed, and with the same pen weight, as his victim.

Signature biometrics pose a couple of unique problems. The first is the comfort with which people are already willing to use their signature as a form of identification. While this high level of consumer acceptance is viewed as a strength by vendors of such systems, this bears with it a strong downside. Without proper notification, a person may sign an electronic signature pad and unwittingly also be surrendering a reference or live biometric sample. Since the custom of leaving a signature as one's "official mark" is based on the presumption of irreproducibility (i.e., that a forger would be hard-pressed to imitate a signature just by looking at it), people are willing to provide a signature without giving its potential for reproduction a second thought. However, electronic data is easy to copy and transmit. And so, a forger posing as a delivery man might fraudulently secure a signature biometric by presenting a victim with a "gift" box, requesting a signature to confirm delivery, and making off with the victim's biometric data.

The second unique property of signature biometrics is that unlike all other biometrics, which either establish an identity (identification) or confirm an identity (authentication), a signature can convey intent (authorization). In other words, a traditional signature on paper is taken both to authenticate the signator, and to convey the signator's legal authority. An electronic system that solicits a user's non-signature biometric must provide a separate step to convey the user's legal authorization for any binding transaction. A signature-based biometric system could mimic our current legally customary acceptance of a signature to simultaneously convey both identity and authority.

Keystroke Dynamics

The rhythms with which one types at a keyboard are sufficiently distinctive to form the basis of the biometric technology known as keystroke dynamics. While distinct, keystroke dynamics are not sufficiently unique to provide identification, but can be used to confirm a user's identity.

Keystroke dynamics, unlike other biometric technologies, is 100% software-based, requiring no sensor more sophisticated than a home computer. Because of this, deployment is occurring in fairly low-stakes, computer-centric applications, such as content filtering (Net Nanny owns BioPassword, the leading keystroke dynamics vendor) and digital rights management, in which passwords to download music are bolstered with by keystroke dynamic verification, to prevent password-sharing. As a general rule, any method involving home or office computers is inherently insecure, as these devices leave a lot more room for experimentation than devices like ATMs or entry systems, and the information they use tends to travel over unsecured communication lines.

Hand Geometry

Perhaps the most ubiquitous electronic biometric systems are hand geometry based. Hand-geometry-based systems require the subject to place his or her hand (usually the right hand) on a plate where it is photographically captured and measured. Made of 27 bones and a complex web of interconnected joints, muscles, and tendons, the human hand presents a sufficiently peculiar conformation of anatomical features to enable authentication, but is not considered sufficiently unique to provide full identification. Further, the geometry of the hand is variable over time, as hand shape may be altered due to injury, disease, aging, or dramatic weight swings. A simple hand-geometry system will measure length and thickness of digits, width of the palm at various points, and the radius of the palm. This results in a relatively simple identification that can be expressed in a very simple, compact string of data. Efforts have been made to improve the accuracy of hand geometry, including three-dimensional sampling (i.e., a second camera measuring the thickness of the hand from the side), and a patented system (owned by the British concern, Neusciences) that measures the pattern of the veins of the hand. Neusciences claims that their system provides a high degree of accuracy and that the hand vein feature is unique and relatively invariable, changing little over a person's lifespan.

In deployment, traditional hand geometry systems have found acceptance in applications requiring verification of an identity, rather than a full proof or establishment of an identity. Airports, prisons, and factories have successfully employed hand-geometry-based systems to restrict access to runways, to prevent walk-out escapes during visits, and to ensure that time cards are being punched only by the worker, and not by that worker's pal on his or her behalf. In all these instances, the subject is attempting to prove or disprove his or her membership in a relatively small group of people (authorized runway personnel, prisoners/visiting family, factory workers). When stakes are high, these systems are not relied on exclusively to confirm identity; rather, they are used to provide an additional layer of security above and beyond that provided by existing security systems.

Since they must accommodate the largest of hands, any hand geometry or hand vein system must be somewhat bulky, and requires the user to perform an obtrusive task (placing his or her hand on the platen for sampling). Because of this obtrusiveness, hand-based biometrics represent less of a privacy threat than some other systems: subjects cannot have their biometric features sampled without their knowledge, and the sampling method is unambiguous in its intent.

Fingerprint

Fingerprinting is a highly familiar and well-established biometric science. The traditional use of fingerprinting, of course, has been as a forensic criminological technique, used to identify perpetrators by the fingerprints they leave behind them at crime scenes. Scientists compare a latent sample left at a crime scene against a known sample taken from a suspect. This comparison uses the unique features of any given fingerprint, including its overall shape, and the pattern of ridges, valleys, and their bifurcations and terminations, to establish the identity of the perpetrator.

In the context of modern biometrics, these features, called fingerprint minutiae, can be captured, analyzed, and compared electronically, with correlations drawn between a live sample and a reference sample, as with other biometric technologies. Fingerprints offer tremendous invariability, changing only in size with age, are highly resistant to modification or injury, and very difficult to "forge" in any useful way. Although the development of some sort of surreptitious sensor is not inconceivable, the reality is that sensors remain obtrusive, requiring a willful finger pressure to gather a useful sample. Unlike other systems, based on cameras and high-tech sensors, fingerprint sampling units are compact, rugged, and inexpensive, with commercially available systems from multiple vendors offering very good accuracy. Next-generation scanners can analyze below the surface of the skin, and can add pore pattern recognition in addition to the more obvious minutia of the fingerprint.

Facial Recognition

Facial recognition sprung into the national spotlight during the 2001 Super Bowl, when Tampa police scanned the faces of game fans without their knowledge for the purpose of spotting terrorists in the crowd. While this proved a public relations nightmare in January 2001, the use of this technology in New Orleans at the post-9/11 Super Bowl of 2002 generated little controversy. Facial recognition remains one of the more controversial biometric technologies because of its very *un*obtrusiveness. With good cameras and good lighting, a facial recognition system can sample faces from tremendous distances without the subject's knowledge or consent.

Most facial recognition technology works by one of two methods: facial geometry or eigenface comparison. Facial geometry analysis works by taking a known reference point (for example, the distance from eye to eye), and measuring the various features of the face in their distance and angles from this reference point. Eigenface comparison uses a palette of about 150 facial abstractions, and compares the captured face with these archetypal abstract faces. In laboratory settings, facial recognition results are excellent, but critics have questioned the effectiveness of the technology in real-world circumstances. Nevertheless, the accuracy of facial recognition has been good enough for casinos to have put the the technology to use since the late 1990s as a means to spot banned players. Facial recognition technology proponents claim good performance even against disguises, weight changes, aging, or changes in hairstyle or facial hair.

Eye biometrics: Iris/Retina

The human eye offers two features with excellent properties for identification. Both the iris (the colored part visible at the front of the eye) and the veins of the retina (the thin film of nerve endings inside the eyeball that capture light and send it back to your brain) provide patterns that can uniquely identify an individual. Retinal scanning is the older technology, and requires the subject to look into a reticle and focus on a visible target while the scan is completed. It's definitely one of the more intrusive biometric technologies, with some subjects reporting discomfort at the scanning method. Iris recognition has an advantage in ease of use, in that it merely requires the subject to look at a camera from a distance of three to ten inches. The iris scanner illuminates the iris with invisible infra-red light, which shows details on darker-colored eyes that are not visible to the naked eye. The pattern of lines and colors on the eye are, as with other biometrics, analyzed, digitized, and compared against a reference sample for verification.

Iridian Technologies, who hold the patents on iris recognition, claim that the iris is the most accurate and invariable of biometrics, and that their system is the most accurate form of biometric technology. Iridian's system also has the benefit of extremely swift comparisons. The compay claims that it can match an iris against a database of 100,000 reference samples in 2-3 seconds, whereas a fingerprint search against a comparable database might take 15 minutes.

Voice Verification

None of us finds it remarkable when a friend recognizes our voice on the telephone. However, what we find easy to do is still a very hard problem for computers, especially when their job is to identify someone positively. The prospect of accurate voice verification offers one great advantage, which is that it would allow a remote identification using the phone system, an infrastructure that's already been built and thus has zero client-side cost: no special reader needs to be installed in your home. Even without the phone system, the sampling apparatus, a microphone, remains far cheaper than competing, largely optically-based biometric technologies.

But voice recognition technology is still not good enough to be used as a front-line biometric technology. Simply put, voice verification systems have to account for a lot more variables than do other systems, starting with the inevitable compression of a voice captured by cheap microphones (especially those found on phone handsets), discriminating a voice from background noise and other sonic artifacts, and the human voice's tremendous variability, due to colds, aging, and simple tiredness. Also, just as a voice can be surreptitiously recorded over the telephone or face-to-face, a person's voice can be captured surreptitiously by a third party (either by tapping or bugging) and replayed, or a person's voice might be biometrically sampled remotely without consent during a fake door-to-door or telephone sales call. Because of these difficulties, commercial deployments of voice verification have been limited to "backup" status, systems in which there are other token-based methods of identification, with voice verification providing an added layer of protection.

Characterizing Different Biometrics

Different biometric features have characteristics that make them more or less useful for particular applications. Dr. James Wayman, director of the National Biometric Test Center at San Jose State University, categorizes biometric features in terms of five qualities:

- Robustness: repeatable, not subject to large changes.
- Distinctiveness: there are wide differences in the pattern among the population.
- Accessibility: easily presented to an imaging sensor.
- Acceptability: perceived as non-intrusive by the user.
- Availability: a user may present a number of independent measurable features.

Dr. Wayman explains these qualities by comparing fingerprinting to hand geometry.

> "Fingerprints are extremely distinctive, but not very robust, sitting at the very end of the major appendages you use to explore the world. Damaging your fingerprints requires less than a minute of exposure to household cleaning chemicals. Many people have chronically dry skin and cannot present clear prints. Hands are very robust, but not very distinctive. To change your hand geometry, you'd have to hit your hand very hard with a hammer. However, many people (somewhat less than 1 in 100) have hands much like yours, so hand geometry is not very distinctive. Hands are easily presented without much training required, but most people initially misjudge the location of their fingerprints, assuming them to be on the tips of the fingers. Both methods require some "real-time" feedback to the user regarding proper presentation. Both fingerprints and the hand are accessible, being easily presented. In the 1990 Orkand study, only 8% of customers at Department of Motor Vehicle offices who had just used a biometric device agreed that electronic fingerprinting "invades your privacy." Summarizing the results of a lengthy survey, the study rated the public acceptance of electronic fingerprinting at 96%. To our knowledge, there is no comparable polling of users regarding hand geometry, but we hypothesize that the figures would not be too different. With regard to availability, our studies have shown that a person can present at least 6 nearly-independent fingerprints, but only one hand geometry (your left hand may be a near mirror image of your right)."*

Characterizing Biometric Applications

Dr. Wayman suggests characterizing biometric applications in terms of seven variables:

- Cooperative vs. Non-Cooperative This refers to the behavior of the "threat" or would-be deceptive user. Is the "threat" trying to cooperate with the system? If the threat is trying to enter a restricted area, she either cooperates with the positive ID system to try to fool it into thinking she's allowed in, or deceptively tries not to cooperate with a negative ID system so as not to trigger the alarm. One implication of this variable is the scope of database search. In cooperative applications, users may first identify themselves with a card or PIN, so that the system need only match against the claimed identity's template. In non-cooperative applications, users can't be trusted to identify themselves correctly, so the entire database may need to be searched.
- Overt vs. Covert Is the user aware that the biometric sampling and identification is occurring?
- Habituated vs. Non-Habituated Is the intended user expected to be experienced in the use of the system?
- Attended vs. Non-Attended Will the intended user be supervised when using the system?
- Standard vs. Non-Standard Environment How controlled are the environmental conditions for operation?
- Public vs. Private Will users be customers (public) or employees (private)?
- Open vs. Closed Will the application be required to exchange biometric data with other systems or not?

Dr. Wayman explains that the positive biometric identification (hand geometry) of users of the Immigration and Naturalization Service's Passenger Accelerated Service System (INSPASS) for rapidly admitting frequent travelers into the United States:

"can be classified as a cooperative, overt, non-attended, non-habituated, standard environment, public, closed application. The system is cooperative because those wishing to defeat the system will attempt to be identified as someone already holding a pass. It will be overt because all will be aware that they are required to give a biometric measure as a condition of enrollment into this system. It will be non-attended and in a standard environment because collection of the biometric will occur near the passport inspection counter inside the airports, but not under the direct observation of an INS employee. It will be non-habituated because most international travelers use the system less than once per month. The system is public because enrollment is open to any frequent traveler into the United States. It is closed because INSPASS does not exchange biometric information with any other system." (emphases added)

Characterizing Biometric ID Systems

Dr. Wayman suggests that biometric ID systems should be viewed in terms of a generic biometric system made up of five basic components or subsystems, depending on the application: data collection, transmission, signal processing (which comprises feature extraction, quality control, pattern matching), storage, and decision.

- Data collection Biometric systems involve at least two discrete data collection steps. First, any biometric system must contain a biometric characteristic deemed "true" or canonical from the system's viewpoint. The term "enrollment" or "registration" refers to the first entry of biometric data into the database. Second, the system must compare a later-submitted "sample" (often called a "live sample") to the sample in the database. (Scale is crucial to the enrollment step, sometimes for quite mundane reasons. In the context of biometric visa issuance by the State Department, for instance, the government has been looking at whether or not U.S. consulates around the world have room to handle the additional equipment and physical traffic needed for data collection.)
- Transmission Many biometric systems collect data at one location but store and/or process it at another. Such systems require data transmission.
- Signal processing Once a biometric is acquired, it must be prepared for comparison. There are three basic tasks here: feature extraction, quality control, and pattern matching. A fourth task in large-scale systems is pattern classification.
    - Feature extraction involves finding the true biometric pattern amid noise and signal degradation, preserving the critical information, and discarding redundant or unnecessary data. Dr. Wayman gives the example of a text-independent speaker-recognition system. A properly implemented system isolates "features that depend only on the speaker and not on the words being spoken." At the same time, the system focuses on features that do not change "even if the speaker has a cold or is not speaking directly into the microphone."
    - Quality control involves checking to see if the signal is of good quality. Ideally, it should be possible to make a quick determination so that another measure can be taken if the signal is inadequate.
    - Pattern matching involves comparing the live sample to the reference sample in the database. If the user claims to be Jane Doe, the pattern-matching process may only need to compare the sample to Jane Doe's stored template. In other situations, the sample must be compared to multiple templates. The pattern-matching process generates a quantitative "distance" measure of the comparison -- how close are they? Even for the same person, the distance is rarely if ever zero.
    - Pattern classification is a technique aimed at reducing the computational overhead of pattern matching. In large-scale systems, it can be computationally taxing to match each sample against all stored templates in the database. If biometric patterns can be categorized, then it may be possible to perform the match against only the stored templates in that category. This is sometimes referred to as "binning." A different technique with the same goal is "filtering," which involves partitioning the database based on information not contained in the biometric itself. If you know the person is a man, you don't need to check against women's biometrics. Both of these techniques introduce additional error possibilities; if binning or filtering is erroneous, then the true template is not used and a false non-match results.
- Decision This subsystem implements the biometric ID system's actual policy with regard to matching. In general, lowering the number of false non-matches raises the number of false matches, and vice versa. The signal processing subsystem yields a quantitative "distance" measure, but "how close or far is enough?" is a matter of policy. In a high-security application where the cost of a false acceptance could be high, system policy might prefer very few false acceptances and many more false rejections. In a commercial setting where the cost of a false acceptance could be small and treated as a cost of doing business, system policy might favor false acceptances in order not to falsely reject and thereby inconvenience large numbers of legitimate customers. The inevitable existence of these errors means that any biometric ID system must also have well-designed policies for exception handling.
- Storage Biometric reference samples must be stored somewhere for matching purposes. For systems only performing "one-to-one" matching, the database may be distributed on cards carried by each enrolled user. The user simply presents his or her biometric and the system checks to see if it matches the template stored on the card. Depending upon system policy, no central database need exist, although in this application a centralized database can be used to detect counterfeit cards or to reissue lost cards without re-collecting the biometric pattern.

In other cases, centralized storage is necessary because the system must match the live sample to multiple templates. As the number of templates grows, speed becomes an increasingly significant issue. One technique is to partition the database (i.e., binning or filtering) so that any sample need only be matched to the templates in one partition. This increases system speed and decreases false matches at the expense of increasing the false non-match rate owing to partitioning errors. System error rates thus change with increasing database size and ID systems do not linearly scale.

Full biometric patterns cannot be reconstructed from the stored reference samples if these are stored as templates, which reduce data richness dramatically. Templates themselves are often created using the system vendor's proprietary feature extraction algorithms. Whether stored templates themselves can be used to "spoof" the system internally is entirely dependent on the security of the system architecture.

Biometric ID systems may store not only the templates but also raw data. One reason to do so would be to allow changes to the system or to change system vendors without having to re-collect data from all enrolled users. Full raw data storage is a riskier practice in that new templates may be extracted from the data or the raw data itself may be used against the system.

The State of Scientific Testing of Biometric ID Systems

According to Dr. Wayman,

> "Testing of biometric devices requires repeat visits with multiple human subjects. Further, the generally low error rates mean that many human subjects are required for statistical confidence. Consequently, biometric testing is extremely expensive, generally affordable only by government agencies. Few biometric technologies have undergone rigorous, developer/vendor-independent testing to establish robustness, distinctiveness, accessibility, acceptability and availability in 'real-world' (non-laboratory) applications."

An in-depth discussion of the statistical methodology in testing biometric ID systems is beyond the scope of this discussion. We recommend Dr. Wayman's website to interested persons. Note, however, that it is very difficult to generalize from test results. At this time, scientists have no way of accurately estimating how large a test is needed to adequately characterize any biometric device in any application, even with advance knowledge of theoretical error rates.

FROM: Senator Bill Wielechowski

RE: Hearing Request for SB 190

Dear Senator French:

I respectfully ask that you schedule a hearing for SB 190 – "An Act relating to biometric information" in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

I intend to request that representatives from the appropriate state agencies and from legislative legal services be present to respond to any questions that may arise. Further, I would like to allow public testimony to be taken statewide by electronic means.

Please feel free to contact my aide George Ascott at 465-2435 with any questions or concerns.

Thank you for your consideration of this request.

Illinois Compiled Statutes

Information maintained by the Legislative Reference Bureau
Updating the database of the Illinois Compiled Statutes (ILCS) is an ongoing process. Recent laws may not yet be included in the ILCS database, but they are found on this site as Public Acts soon after they become law. For information concerning the relationship between statutes and Public Acts, refer to the Guide.

Because the statute database is maintained primarily for legislative drafting purposes, statutory changes are sometimes included in the statute database before they take effect. If the source note at the end of a Section of the statutes includes a Public Act that has not yet taken effect, the version of the law that is currently in effect may have already been removed from the database and you should refer to that Public Act to see the changes made to the current law.

CIVIL LIABILITIES
(740 ILCS 14/) Biometric Information Privacy Act.

(740 ILCS 14/1)
Sec. 1. Short title. This Act may be cited as the Biometric Information Privacy Act.
(Source: P.A. 95-994, eff. 10-3-08.)

(740 ILCS 14/5)
Sec. 5. Legislative findings; intent. The General Assembly finds all of the following:
(a) The use of biometrics is growing in the business and security screening sectors and appears to promise streamlined financial transactions and security screenings.
(b) Major national corporations have selected the City of Chicago and other locations in this State as pilot testing sites for new applications of biometric-facilitated financial transactions, including finger-scan technologies at grocery stores, gas stations, and school cafeterias.
(c) Biometrics are unlike other unique identifiers that are used to access finances or other sensitive information. For example, social security numbers, when compromised, can be changed. Biometrics, however, are biologically unique to the individual; therefore, once compromised, the individual has no recourse, is at heightened risk for identity theft, and is likely to withdraw from biometric-facilitated transactions.
(d) An overwhelming majority of members of the public are weary of the use of biometrics when such information is tied to finances and other personal information.
(e) Despite limited State law regulating the collection, use, safeguarding, and storage of biometrics, many members of the public are deterred from partaking in biometric identifier-facilitated transactions.
(f) The full ramifications of biometric technology are not fully known.
(g) The public welfare, security, and safety will be served by regulating the collection, use, safeguarding, handling, storage, retention, and destruction of biometric identifiers and information.

(740 ILCS 14/10)

Sec. 10. Definitions. In this Act:

"Biometric identifier" means a retina or iris scan, fingerprint, voiceprint, or scan of hand or face geometry. Biometric identifiers do not include writing samples, written signatures, photographs, human biological samples used for valid scientific testing or screening, demographic data, tattoo descriptions, or physical descriptions such as height, weight, hair color, or eye color. Biometric identifiers do not include donated organs, tissues, or parts as defined in the Illinois Anatomical Gift Act or blood or serum stored on behalf of recipients or potential recipients of living or cadaveric transplants and obtained or stored by a federally designated organ procurement agency. Biometric identifiers do not include biological materials regulated under the Genetic Information Privacy Act. Biometric identifiers do not include information captured from a patient in a health care setting or information collected, used, or stored for health care treatment, payment, or operations under the federal Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996. Biometric identifiers do not include an X-ray, roentgen process, computed tomography, MRI, PET scan, mammography, or other image or film of the human anatomy used to diagnose, prognose, or treat an illness or other medical condition or to further validate scientific testing or screening.

"Biometric information" means any information, regardless of how it is captured, converted, stored, or shared, based on an individual's biometric identifier used to identify an individual. Biometric information does not include information derived from items or procedures excluded under the definition of biometric identifiers.

"Confidential and sensitive information" means personal information that can be used to uniquely identify an individual or an individual's account or property. Examples of confidential and sensitive information include, but are not limited to, a genetic marker, genetic testing information, a unique identifier number to locate an account or property, an account number, a PIN number, a pass code, a driver's license number, or a social security number.

"Private entity" means any individual, partnership, corporation, limited liability company, association, or other group, however organized. A private entity does not include a State or local government agency. A private entity does not include any court of Illinois, a clerk of the court, or a judge or justice thereof.

"Written release" means informed written consent or, in the context of employment, a release executed by an employee as a condition of employment.

(740 ILCS 14/15)

Sec. 15. Retention; collection; disclosure; destruction.

(a) A private entity in possession of biometric identifiers or biometric information must develop a written policy, made available to the public, establishing a retention schedule and guidelines for permanently destroying biometric identifiers and biometric information when the initial purpose for collecting or obtaining such identifiers or information has been satisfied or within 3 years of the individual's last interaction with the private entity, whichever occurs first. Absent a valid warrant or subpoena issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, a private entity in possession of biometric identifiers or biometric information must comply with its established retention schedule and destruction guidelines.

(b) No private entity may collect, capture, purchase, receive through trade, or otherwise obtain a person's or a customer's biometric identifier or biometric information, unless it first:

(1) informs the subject or the subject's legally authorized representative in writing that a biometric identifier or biometric information is being collected or stored;

(2) informs the subject or the subject's legally authorized representative in writing of the specific purpose and length of term for which a biometric identifier or biometric information is being collected, stored, and used; and

(3) receives a written release executed by the subject of the biometric identifier or biometric information or the subject's legally authorized representative.

(c) No private entity in possession of a biometric identifier or biometric information may sell, lease, trade, or otherwise profit from a person's or a customer's biometric identifier or biometric information.

(d) No private entity in possession of a biometric identifier or biometric information may disclose, redisclose, or otherwise disseminate a person's or a customer's biometric identifier or biometric information unless:

(1) the subject of the biometric identifier or biometric information or the subject's legally authorized representative consents to the disclosure or redisclosure;

(2) the disclosure or redisclosure completes a financial transaction requested or authorized by the subject of the biometric identifier or the biometric information or the subject's legally authorized representative;

(3) the disclosure or redisclosure is required by State or federal law or municipal ordinance; or

(4) the disclosure is required pursuant to a valid warrant or subpoena issued by a court of competent jurisdiction.

(e) A private entity in possession of a biometric identifier or biometric information shall:

(1) store, transmit, and protect from disclosure all biometric identifiers and biometric information using the reasonable standard of care within the private entity's industry; and

(2) store, transmit, and protect from disclosure all biometric identifiers and biometric information in a manner that is the same as or more protective than the manner in which the private entity stores, transmits, and protects other confidential and sensitive information.

(740 ILCS 14/20)

Sec. 20. Right of action. Any person aggrieved by a violation of this Act shall have a right of action in a State circuit court or as a supplemental claim in federal district court against an offending party. A prevailing party may recover for each violation:

(1) against a private entity that negligently violates a provision of this Act, liquidated damages of $1,000 or actual damages, whichever is greater;

(2) against a private entity that intentionally or recklessly violates a provision of this Act, liquidated damages of $5,000 or actual damages, whichever is greater;

(3) reasonable attorneys' fees and costs, including expert witness fees and other litigation expenses; and

(4) other relief, including an injunction, as the State or federal court may deem appropriate.

Sec. 25. Construction.

(a) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to impact the admission or discovery of biometric identifiers and biometric information in any action of any kind in any court, or before any tribunal, board, agency, or person.

(b) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to conflict with the X-Ray Retention Act, the federal Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996 and the rules promulgated under either Act.

(c) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply in any manner to a financial institution or an affiliate of a financial institution that is subject to Title V of the federal Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act of 1999 and the rules promulgated thereunder.

(d) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to conflict with the Private Detective, Private Alarm, Private Security, Fingerprint Vendor, and Locksmith Act of 2004 and the rules promulgated thereunder.

(e) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to apply to a contractor, subcontractor, or agent of a State agency or local unit of government when working for that State agency or local unit of government.

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to penalties and civil damages for certain alcohol violations."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 04.16.049(e) is amended to read:

(e) A licensee may bring a civil action against a person who violates this section if the violation occurs on the premises of that licensee. If judgment is entered in favor of the licensee, the court shall award civil damages in the amount of $1,500 [$1,000] and award reasonable costs and reasonable attorney fees allowed under the Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure.

 Sec. 2. AS 04.16.065(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person who has attained 18 years of age, or an emancipated minor, who violates AS 04.16.060 is, in addition to any criminal penalty provided by law, liable in a civil action to the licensee for a penalty of $1,500 [$1,000] plus costs and reasonable attorney fees.

 Sec. 3. AS 04.16.180 is amended by adding a new subsection to read:

(e) In addition to other penalties provided in this chapter, the court may require a person convicted of an offense under this chapter who was less than 21 years of age at the time the person committed the offense to pay for and enroll in a juvenile alcohol safety action program if one is available.

 Sec. 4. AS 04.21.080 is amended by adding a new paragraph to read:

(18) "juvenile alcohol safety action program" means

(A) a juvenile alcohol safety action program developed and implemented or approved by the Department of Health and Social Services under AS 47.37;

(B) any other alcohol education or treatment program approved by the Department of Health and Social Services under AS 47.37 if a program described in (A) of this paragraph is not available in the community in which the person resides; or

(C) a program or counseling approved by the court if a program or treatment described in (A) of this paragraph is not available in the community where the person resides.

 Sec. 5. AS 28.15.183(g) is amended to read:

(g) Except as provided under (h) of this section, the department may not issue a new license or reissue a license to a person whose driver's license, permit, or privilege to drive has been revoked under this section unless the person, if required to participate in a juvenile alcohol safety action program, as defined in AS 04.21.080 [AS 04.16.050], has successfully completed any education or treatment recommended.

 Sec. 6. AS 28.15.211(g) is amended to read:

(g) Except as provided under AS 28.15.183(h), the department may not issue a new license or reissue a license to a person whose driver's license has been revoked under AS 04.16.050, AS 28.15.183, or 28.15.185 unless the person, if required to participate in a juvenile alcohol safety action program, has successfully completed any education or treatment recommended. In this subsection, "juvenile alcohol safety action program" has the meaning given in AS 04.21.080 [AS 04.16.050].

 Sec. 7. AS 04.16.050(l)(2) is repealed.

Alaska State Legislature

Please enter into the record my testimony to the SENATE JUDICIARY committee name committee on SB 194 bill/subject, dated 2-15-10

CSSB194 is toothless piece legislation which will not clean up the sale of Alcohol to minors or those who Prohibited from consuming or buying Alcohol or being on the premises where Alcohol is consumed. CSSB 194 is a ruse for those legislators to say they acted to protect the public when fact they did not.

As House Judiciary Chairman Jay Ramras, a beverage dispensary license holder ably pointed out that HB 283 the house version CSSB194 is nothing more than special legislation for Alaska's largest liquor dealer BROWN JUG.

The other Alcohol dealers are small enterprises which neither have the time nor the resources to take advantage of this legislation. Chairman Ramras used himself as an example. Chairman Ramras used his business at an example of one, though larger than most, could not take advantage this special legislation.

Brown Jug did not appear before Chairman Ramras' committee however a woman who had been convicted of DWI did appear and begged the committee to help her say sober by putting teeth in the legislation and demand carding.

She had voluntarily gone to DMV and had red line placed on her driver's license should she ever fall off the wagon.

Dear Senator Meyer,

I am writing to you regarding Senate Bill 194, an act relating to civil damages for certain alcohol violations.

As you may know, one of Alaska CHARR's top legislative priorities is fighting underage drinking. We appreciate your efforts to increase the civil penalty for underage persons attempting to purchase alcohol to $1,500.00. We believe this will encourage licensees to pursue the civil liability penalty making the penalty a stronger deterrent and sending a stronger message to underage persons that their criminal actions will not be taken lightly.

Alaska CHARR fully supports SB194, and would like to thank you for helping the hospitality industry send a stronger message to kids that attempting to buy alcohol is a serious offense.

Please let me know if I can be of additional assistance.

SPONSOR STATEMENT FOR CSSB 194

"An Act relating to penalties and civil damages for certain alcohol violations."

SB 194 increases civil damages to licensees from minors who knowingly enter or remain in premises licensed to sell alcohol. This increase in damages would also apply to those purchasing or delivering alcohol to persons under the age of 21. The bill would increase the amount awarded in civil damages from $1,000 to $1,500 under AS 04.16.049 and AS 04.16.065.

Additionally, SB 194 may also require a person convicted of the aforementioned offenses to pay for and enroll in a juvenile alcohol safety action program or similar alcohol education or treatment program if one is available.

Underage drinking is a problem in Alaska. According to the State of Alaska's Plan to Reduce & Prevent Underage Drinking (October 2009), 11 percent of all treatment admissions for alcohol abuse in the state were youth aged 12-20. An increase in civil damages would reinforce the message to those youth that underage drinking will not be tolerated.

Passing SB 194 will reinforce the penalty on youths who knowingly enter or remain on premises where alcohol is sold or consumed. The bill will also encourage licensees to continue their enforcement of underage drinking laws.

Re: SB 194

Dear Senator Meyer:

Underage drinking in Alaska has long been a concern in our communities and for this reason we support legislation to increase penalties for underage drinking through the civil penalties process.

As responsible owners and operators, we do not want to contribute to the problem of underage drinking. When a licensee is caught serving or selling alcoholic beverages to a minor the consequences and penalties are severe. We believe the minor should be held primarily responsible for his/her actions; the current $1,000 civil penalty is not enough. There should be steps for offenses to include increasing the $1,000 to $1,500, required or mandatory education and prevention and delaying access to the driver license at the age of 21.

In 2006, the Alaska Federation of Natives (AFN) with funding from the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) report highlights the current status of underage drinking throughout rural and urban Alaska from a youth's perspective. The problem of underage drinking is statewide and impacts families, communities, social, health, medical, justice, law enforcement, education and economic bodies.

Anchorage CHARR assists members by processing civil penalty cases against minors on behalf of the licensee and providing information about minor civil penalty law. We compile information from our member about the civil case against the minor, prepare all required legal documents and coordinate third party notification for court appearance.

Currently our office has processed 42 minor cases with 15 pending court filing.

We urge you to please consider supporting SB 194.

STATE OF ALASKA
Plan to Reduce & Prevent Underage Drinking
October 2009, pages 5-7 (28 pages total) http://www.hss.state.ak.us/DBH/prevention/docs/2009_underagedrinkplan.pdf

Executive Summary

Childhood and underage drinking has been shown to be a causal factor in homicide, suicide, traumatic injury, traffic fatalities, drowning, burns, violent and property crime, high risk sex, fetal alcohol syndrome, alcohol poisoning and the need for treatment for alcohol abuse and dependence.[iii] The research shows that early onset alcohol use is strongly associated with adult alcohol dependence.[iii] While there are no significant differences between national and Alaskan trends for heavy drinking[a], the prevalence of binge drinking[b] among Alaska's adults is consistently higher than the national average.[c iv]

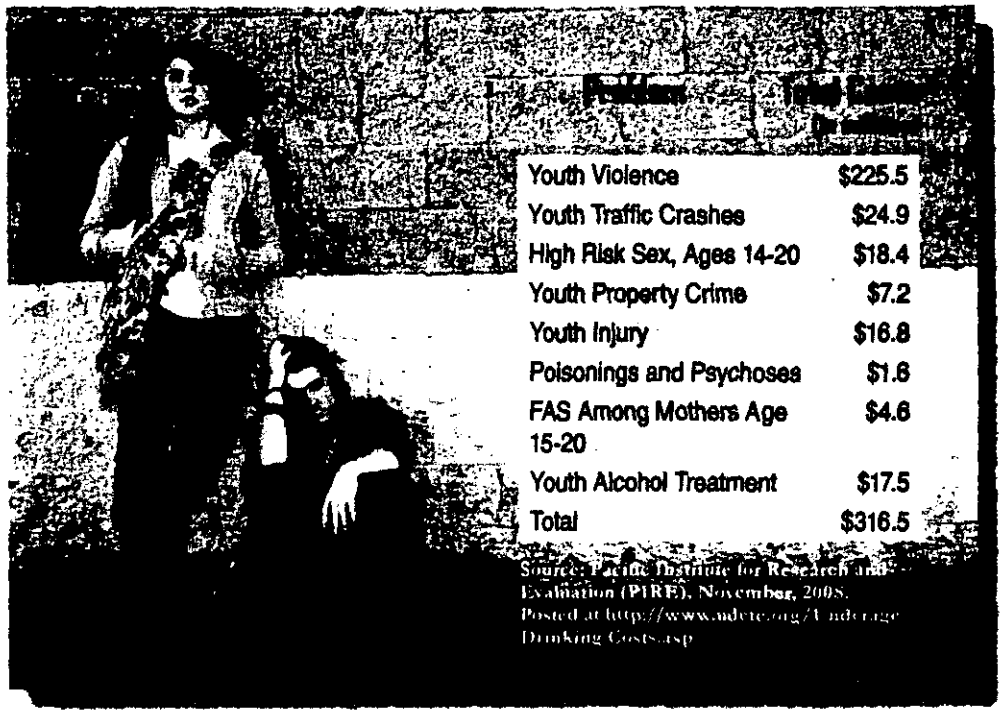
Further, excessive alcohol use by youth causes damage to the developing brain.[v] There exists a perception that adolescents can easily recover from drinking because their bodies are more resilient; however, the opposite is true. According to the American Medical Association, alcohol can seriously damage long and short term growth processes of the brain during adolescence. Frontal lobe development and the refinement of pathways and connections continue until the age of 16, and a high rate of energy is used as the brain matures until the age of 23. Damage from alcohol prior to age 23 can be long-term and irreversible. Furthermore, even moderate drinking impairs learning and memory in youth.[vi]

A myriad of catastrophic health, social and economic problems resultant from underage drinking has impacted Alaska's youth. In 2000, the Alaska Department of Health and Social Services, Division of Juvenile Justice sponsored an assessment of underage drinking in Alaska. Investigators examined statewide efforts and data and conducted more detailed inquiries by interviewing 203 key informants from 17 rural and urban sample communities. The consequences of underage drinking in Alaska are reflected in an increase in the number of alcohol-related accidents among youth requiring hospitalization of 66.3 percent between 1991 and 1998. Over this period, Alaska averaged 30 suicide attempts annually among youth where alcohol was a factor.[vii]

The cost of underage drinking to the citizens of Alaska was $317 million in 2005, inclusive of medical care, work loss, and pain and suffering.[viii] This is equivalent to $3,944 per year for each youth in the State. Based on these figures, per capita, Alaska is second among the fifty states for the cost of underage drinking.

As demonstrated in the table below, the largest costs to the State of Alaska can be attributed to youth violence and traffic crashes by underage youth under the influence of alcohol. Furthermore, a multitude of other problems contribute significantly to the overall cost. For example, among teen mothers, fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS) costs Alaska $4.6 million. Young people who begin drinking before age 15 are four times more likely to develop alcohol dependence and are two and a half times more likely to become abusers of alcohol

Costs of Underage Drinking by Problem, Alaska 2005



Youth Violence	$225.5
Youth Traffic Crashes	$24.9
High Risk Sex, Ages 14-20	$18.4
Youth Property Crime	$7.2
Youth Injury	$16.8
Poisonings and Psychoses	$1.6
FAS Among Mothers Age 15-20	$4.6
Youth Alcohol Treatment	$17.5
Total	$316.5

than those who begin drinking at age 21.[ix] In 2003, 366 youth 12-20 years old were admitted for alcohol treatment in Alaska, accounting for 11 percent of all treatment admissions for alcohol abuse in the State.[x]

The Alaska Departments of Education and Early Development and Health and Social Services conduct a biannual statewide student survey on health behavior. Alaska uses the Alaska Youth Risk Behavior Survey (YRBS), based upon the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's (CDC) epidemiological surveillance system.[xi] This survey was established to monitor the prevalence of behaviors that not only influence adolescent health, but also put youth at risk for the most significant health and social problems. Participating school districts may receive a full report of their local data, which can be the centerpiece of their own local needs assessments, adding other data such as the Alaska School Boards' School Climate and Connectedness survey and local law enforcement data.

In 2007, 43 high schools were scientifically selected to be included in the survey. Thirty-eight (88 percent) schools participated and 1,318 (68 percent) students (from a total of 1, 952 selected) completed the survey resulting in an overall response rate of 60 percent (P. Owen, personal communication, October 27, 2008).

According to self-reports by Alaskan students in grades 9-12:[xiii]

- 74% had at least one drink of alcohol on one or more days during their life.
- 20% had their first drink of alcohol, other than a few sips, before age 13.
- 40% had at least one drink of alcohol on one or more occasion in the past 30 days.
- 26% had five or more drinks of alcohol in a row (i.e. binge drinking) in the past 30 days.

The 2007 YRBS also shows that 10 percent of Alaska youth self-reported drinking and driving within the past 30 days. According to the Alaska Highway Safety Office 2006 Annual Report, a third of alcohol impaired drivers and 47 percent of speeding drivers were under the age of 26.[xiii] Additionally, in 2006 there were 102 traffic accidents with alcohol impaired youth drivers ages 11-20.[xiv]

The state-wide YRBS demonstrates that underage drinking is widespread in Alaska, but it does not include all age appropriate youth. There are more youth at risk than are represented. Alaska state law requires that students have active consent[d] from parents to participate in school surveys, which excludes students who do not return a signed permission slip. In addition, alternative high school students were excluded from the state-wide YRBS report and students who have dropped out of school were not represented. Studies have shown that alternative high school students are at significantly higher risk for engaging in risky behaviors[xv] and substance use is correlated with school dropout.[xvi] As such, the risk behaviors of youth are likely underrepresented with the Alaska state-wide YRBS.

However, in 2007, with support from community partners, the Anchorage School District was able to administer the YRBS in alternative schools.[xvii] While they were not able to obtain the 60 percent response rate needed to generalize the findings to all alternative high school students,[e] the findings are important to consider as we plan prevention measures. The table below compares the responses from the Anchorage traditional high schools that were included with the state-wide YRBS and those Anchorage students who participated in the alternative school YRBS.[f]

Comparison of Traditional vs Alternative High Schools in Anchorage 2007

	Traditional High Schools	Alternative High Schools	McLaughlin High School
Percentage of students who had their first drink of alcohol other than a few sips before age 13	20.6%	30.8%	41.3%
Percentage of students who had at least one drink of alcohol on one or more of the past 30 days	40.8%	54%	76.4%
Percentage of students who had 5 or more drinks of alcohol in a row within a couple hours on one or more of the past 30 days	26.2%	37.3%	63.8%

Executive Summary

The alternative high schools participating in the 2007 Anchorage Youth Risk Behavior Survey included the following:

- McLaughlin Secondary School serves students who have been incarcerated at the McLaughlin Youth Center, a state detention center for juveniles.
- AVAIL (Anchorage Vocational Academic Institute of Learning) is an alternative high school program devoted to students who have dropped out of traditional schools.
- Benson/Search is an alternative school serving the educational needs of students who have been deemed "at risk."
- COHO (Creating Optimal High School Opportunities) offers students in the Chugiak and Eagle River area an alternative to the traditional high school classroom.
- Continuation Program is a self-directed alternative education program for students who are expelled, on a long-term suspension, or are in need of a transitional education placement.
- Crossroads is the Anchorage School District's school for pregnant and parenting teens.
- SAVE is an accredited comprehensive alternative high school that provides the opportunity for credit recovery, and is designed to meet the requirements for high school graduation.

These findings both highlight the need for further evaluation of alternative school students' risk behaviors in an effort to better plan prevention measures for these students and illustrate the strong likelihood that current reports of underage drinking in Alaska are under representative of the actual trend.

Despite the toll that underage drinking brings to bear on all citizens of Alaska — be it physical, mental, social, or economic — social norms remain static leaving the overall impression that underage drinking in Alaska "isn't a problem". Alaska has made great strides in the prevention of underage tobacco use and the parallels between the two drugs, alcohol and tobacco, are remarkable. That being said, enforcement efforts within the Departments of Health and Social Services and Public Safety have been coordinated for both tobacco and alcohol. As a result, an interesting pattern has emerged, which clearly demonstrates exactly where social attitudes lie. For example, in FY 2007, 9.2 percent of all retailers investigated sold tobacco to underage buyers whereas 22 percent of all retailers investigated sold alcohol to underage buyers.

Holding youth solely responsible for underage drinking is unreasonable. As the national report concluded, "Youth drink within the context of a society in which alcohol use is normative behavior and images about alcohol are pervasive." Efforts to reduce and prevent underage drinking, therefore, need to focus on a variety of environmental strategies that engage adults, youth, and the society at large. Alaska's plan employs a variety of strategies, including, but not limited to: public awareness; alcohol advertising; education; limiting access; collaboration; governmental assistance; and research and evaluation.

The problem of underage drinking in Alaska is significant but not insurmountable. It will, however, require determination and commitment to a long-term effort on the part of our citizens, state and community leaders to get involved and to take the action necessary to make a difference.

The national and Alaska-specific information and recommendations contained herein provide a blueprint for a range of science-based state and community actions that are necessary in order to successfully reduce underage drinking in Alaska. These recommendations are based on the IOM/NAS Report: Reducing Underage Drinking: A Collective Responsibility. Each recommendation is categorized as national (N), state (S), or local (L). The national recommendations are numbered based on the location within the IOM/NAS report. The numbering of the state and local recommendations is specific to this plan.

[d] Parents must sign a permission slip (versus passive consent in which the parent can exclude the student from participating with a written request).

[e] There were 230 respondents from Anchorage alternative schools and 75 respondents from McLaughlin High School.

[f] The Anchorage alternative school YRBS is only representative of those students who participated in the survey as the response rate was not high enough to generalize it to all alternative school students.

MEMORANDUM

October 20, 2009

SUBJECT: Requiring Alcohol Education and Assessment for Minors in Civil Actions Brought by Licensees (Work Order No. 26-LS0895\R)

TO: Senator Kevin Meyer
Attn: Christine Marasigan

FROM: Gerald P. Luckhaupt
Legislative Counsel

You have requested that mandatory alcohol education be required for persons subject to civil suits by licensees under AS 04.16.049(e) and 04.16.065(a). These civil suits are brought by licensees against persons under the age of 21 who attempt to use fake ids or otherwise access premises or purchase alcohol when they are underage. These civil suits are lawsuits between two private parties and do not involve the state or other prosecuting authority and criminal and other penalties may not be imposed. Imposition of criminal sanctions including attendance at alcohol education[1] is inappropriate and unavailable to civil litigants. I do not see how one civil litigant can be authorized to impose a potential criminal sanction on the other civil litigant.

What I did do is provide that a court may require a person under the age of 21 to participate in a juvenile alcohol action safety program whenever the person is convicted of an offense under AS 04.16. Currently we only require this for minor in possession under AS 04.16.050. While this does not directly satisfy your request it does allow alcohol education programs to be required of minors when they are prosecuted and convicted of offenses under AS 04.16.049 and 04.16.065 and other offenses under AS 04.16.

RE: Senate Judiciary Committee Hearing Request for CSSB 194

This is a request for a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing for CSSB 194, "An act relating to penalties and civil damages for certain alcohol violations."

The following documents are attached and will be sent electronically:

- Current version of the bill
- Sponsor Statement
- Changes the bill has gone through since introduction
- Letters of support
- Back up information
- Fiscal Notes
- Witness/Testimony:
  - OC Madden, Brown Jug
- Staff member assigned to the bill: Christine R. Marasigan, 465-6876

This bill would increase the civil damages under 4.16.049 and 4.16.065 from $1,000 to $1,500 and would make it possible for a person convicted to pay for and attend a juvenile alcohol safety action program if available.

Please contact Christine if you have any questions regarding this legislation.

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to the commission of a crime when the defendant directed the conduct constituting the crime at the victim based on the victim's race, sex, color, creed, physical or mental disability, sexual orientation, gender identity, ancestry, or national origin."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 11.76 is amended by adding a new section to read:

Sec. 11.76.150. Motivation by prejudice, bias, or hatred. (a) A person commits the crime of motivation by prejudice, bias, or hatred if the person commits a crime in this title and the person knowingly directed the conduct constituting the crime at the victim of the crime because of the victim's race, sex, color, creed, physical or mental disability, sexual orientation, gender identity, ancestry, or national origin.

(b) In this section, "gender identity" means actual or perceived gender-related characteristics.

(c) Motivation by prejudice, bias, or hatred is a

(1) class A misdemeanor if the crime committed is a class B misdemeanor;

(2) class C felony if the crime committed is a class A misdemeanor;

(3) class B felony if the crime committed is a class C felony;

(4) class A felony if the crime committed is a class B felony;

(5) unclassified felony and the defendant shall be sentenced to a definite term of imprisonment of at least five years but not more than 99 years if the crime committed is a class A felony.

 Sec. 2. AS 12.55.155(c)(22) is amended to read:

(22) the defendant knowingly directed the conduct constituting the offense at a victim because of that person's race, sex, color, creed, physical or mental disability, sexual orientation, gender identity, ancestry, or national origin; in this paragraph, "gender identity" means actual or perceived gender-related characteristics;

Re: Senate Bill 202
Constitutional Issues

Chair French:

Thank you for the opportunity to submit written testimony regarding Senate Bill 202.

As you know, the American Civil Liberties Union of Alaska represents thousands of members and activists throughout the state who seek to preserve and expand individual freedoms and civil liberties guaranteed under the United States and Alaska Constitutions. The ACLU supports legislation designed to protect the civil rights of individuals who may be targeted for violence or harassment based on membership in a historically disfavored class.

However, we are also concerned that the important First Amendment rights of all Alaskans are carefully protected. Whether under the US or Alaska Constitutions, the rights of freedom of speech and of association are crucial to our democratic society. The ACLU must oppose any legislation which would lead to governmental restrictions on, or chilling of, any speech or associational rights, even if those rights represent unpopular or repugnant views.

We applaud the Bill's sponsor for introduction of this legislation and trust that – through working with her office and the Judiciary Committee – we can address the following concerns:

1. Inclusion of necessary protections of speech and associational rights;
2. Addition of language regarding "gender identity;" and
3. Alternatives to mandatory minimum sentencing clauses.

Amendment to Protect Speech and Associational Rights

As currently drafted, SB 202 would allow prosecution of a defendant and introduction at trial of constitutionally protected speech or association as substantive evidence of the defendant's motivation, whether or not that evidence directly related to the alleged crime.

For example, if a defendant were alleged to have targeted a victim who was Jewish, the defendant's membership in the Klu Klux Klan, or internet postings he wrote attacking Zionism could be introduced at trial. Such introduction would not only be unconstitutional, but also the basis for challenging and overturning a conviction.

Contrast with the above example, a defendant who – while attacking the same Jewish victim – states: "Jews have no place in America." Introduction of such evidence would not be based on the defendant's associations or beliefs, but rather relate to the attack and specifically relevant to his motivation to commit the alleged crime.

In order to differentiate between these two situations, we recommend the inclusion in SB 202 of language such as:

> In a prosecution for an offense under this section, evidence of expression or associations of the defendant may not be introduced as substantive evidence at trial, unless the evidence specifically relates to that offense.
> However, nothing in this section affects the rules of evidence governing the impeachment of a witness.

It is instructive to note that similar language was included in the Federal MATTHEW SHEPARD AND JAMES BYRD, JR. HATE CRIMES PREVENTION ACT, HR 2647; Public Law No. 111-084:

> SEC. 4710. RULE OF CONSTRUCTION.
> For purposes of construing this division and the amendments made by this division the following shall apply:

> (1) IN GENERAL.—Nothing in this division shall be construed to allow a court, in any criminal trial for an offense described under this division or an amendment made by this division, in the absence of a stipulation by the parties, to admit evidence of speech, beliefs, association, group membership, or expressive conduct unless that evidence is relevant and admissible under the Federal Rules of Evidence. Nothing in this division is intended to affect the existing rules of evidence.

Inclusion of Gender Identity

As currently drafted, SB 202 leaves unprotected a minority group which has been shown to suffer violence at a far greater rate than their representation in the population: transgender individuals. It is essential that "gender identity" be included in this Bill.

Some information and statistics that may be of interest to the Committee are available at http://www.avp.org/documents/2008HVReportDraft3smallerfile.pdf, Hate Violence against Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender People in the United States, a Report by THE NATIONAL COALITION OF ANTI-VIOLENCE PROGRAMS. Additional information regarding "Trans Murder Statistics 1970 to 2004" is at http://www.gender.org/resources/dge/gea02002.pdf.

Again, it is instructive to note that protections for transgender individuals were, in fact, included in the Hate Crimes Prevention Act passed by Congress:

> SEC. 4707. PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN HATE CRIME ACTS.
> . . . '(2) OFFENSES INVOLVING ACTUAL OR PERCEIVED RELIGION, NATIONAL ORIGIN, GENDER, SEXUAL ORIENTATION, GENDER IDENTITY, OR DISABILITY.—
> ''(A) IN GENERAL.—Whoever, whether or not acting under color of law, in any circumstance described in subparagraph (B) or paragraph (3), willfully causes bodily injury to any person or, through the use of fire, a firearm, a dangerous weapon, or an explosive or incendiary device, attempts to cause bodily injury to any person, because of the actual or perceived religion, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity, or disability of any person . . .

http://frwebgate.access.gpo.gov/cgi-bin/getdoc.cgi?dbname=111_cong_public_laws&docid=f:publ084.111.pdf (pg. 651 of 656), Public Law 111-084.

Elimination of Mandatory Minimums

As a general rule, the ACLU does not support mandatory minimum sentencing, and recommends that sentencing be determined by the Courts based on the particularized facts of each incident prosecuted.

Presuming the amendments outlined above, the ACLU will support SB 202, and would welcome the opportunity to work with the Bill's Sponsor and the Committee in addressing these issues.

Thank you again permitting us to share our concerns. Please feel free to contact the undersigned should you require any additional information.

Sincerely,

Jeffrey Mittman

Letter of Support

SB 202: Hate Crimes
March 2010

The Alaska Women's Lobby, a statewide group with steering committees in Fairbanks, Anchorage and Juneau organized to protect and advance the rights of women, children and families supports SB 202.

According to the Anti-Defamation League 43 states and the District of Columbia have enacted hate crime laws using a "penalty-enhancement" concept similar to that proposed in SB 202. Alaska should join these states in emphasizing that people who choose to intimidate not only an individual victim but the victim's community have committed a more serious offense and should be held accountable as such.

All Alaskans have an interest in an effective response to violent bigotry. Hate crimes deserve increased penalties because the perpetrator has damaged more than one individual or institution. The offender tries to intimidate other members of the minority group by his or her actions against one person. Members of the targeted group may feel isolated, vulnerable and unprotected by the law. We need to be weaving communities together not allowing a few, bound by their ignorance, to try and keep us fragmented.

Thank you to Senator Davis for introducing this important piece of legislation. We agree with the message of her sponsor statement that while this measure alone cannot eliminate prejudice or hatred, it can send a message that Alaskans will not tolerate hate crimes in any form. Please join her in working this bill through the legislative process.

Testimony for Senate Judiciary Committee

SB 202 Hate Crimes

By Marsha Buck for Alaskans Together for Equality, Inc.

My name is Marsha Buck and I live in Juneau. I am here as past president of the Board of Directors of Alaskans Together for Equality, Inc., Alaska's statewide advocacy organization formed to advance civil equality for Alaska's gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender citizens. I serve on the Alaskans Together for Equality Board because my daughter is in a lifelong committed relationship with a woman and I am a proud grandmother because of that relationship. I call my daughter's partner my daughter-in-law. I am testifying today because I care deeply about the personal safety of my daughter, my daughter-in-law, and my two grandchildren.

Alaskans Together for Equality would like to thank Senator Davis for proposing SB 202 and thank you for scheduling the bill for hearing. We support the bill in its coverage of crimes motivated by prejudice, bias, or hatred based on several inherent characteristics, characteristics with which people are born, including sexual orientation. We recognize that hate crimes are not limited to our gay and lesbian neighbors or family members, but occur throughout the minority community and are designed to create fear among all Alaskans. This bill emphasizes that Alaska has no tolerance for such acts.

Our support for this bill, however, comes with conditions of an amendment. Section 11.76.150 (a) of the bill needs to be amended to include "gender identity and expression." As I'm certain you are aware, some people in our society perceive others as "different," as too feminine or too masculine, and that perception may evoke a violent emotional response leading to harm. It does not matter if the person perceived as different is heterosexual, i.e. straight, or gay to be the recipient of that response. The way in which we all identify and express our gender may be different than the societal norm, and that identity and expression needs protection under this bill. We strongly contend that many Alaskans are in jeopardy of gender expression hate crimes, particularly our youth who are often subject to bullying based on expression that is different from the fluctuating norm.

The term "gender identity" also includes Alaskans who are transgender. I was horrified to learn recently about a transgender woman whose nose was broken during an assault while she was traveling on a People Mover Bus in Anchorage – an assault that occurred because she is transgender. We ask you, representing the Alaska Legislature, to stand up firmly and amend this bill to make it clear that you have no tolerance for such acts.

In closing, Alaskans Together for Equality would ask that you pass SB 202 out of committee with an amendment that adds "gender identity" to paragraph (a) of Sec. 11.76.150. Thank you for your attention.

Dear Ms. Smith:

In response to Senator French's question regarding SB202, either one of the following two changes to the bill would address the question of what mens rea applies to motive:

1) Page 1, Line 8: delete "knowingly"

2) Page 1, Line 8: delete "knowingly directed the conduct constituting the crime at the victim of the crime." Replace with "intentionally selected the victim as the object of the conduct constituting the crime."

The first suggestion would eliminate the inconsistency with respect to the appropriate mens rea. The second suggestion specifically defines motive and the mens rea that applies. Please let me know if you have any questions.

Senator French:

We have heard that SB 202, proposed hate crimes legislation may be forwarded to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The ACLU of Alaska generally supports protections for individuals targeted for acts of violence, and are very pleased that Senator Davis has introduced this legislation.

We hope to work with you and the Senate Judiciary Committee on passage of a Bill that protects all of Alaska's citizens, while guaranteeing that Constitutional rights are protected. To achieve that balance we would ask that the Committee consider potential revisions:

1. First Amendment Protections

In order to ensure that free speech or associational rights are not infringed, we would recommend inclusion of language in the Bill such as:

> "In a prosecution for an offense under this section, evidence of expression or associations of the defendant may not be introduced as substantive evidence at trial, unless the evidence specifically relates to that offense.
> However, nothing in this section affects the rules of evidence governing impeachment of a witness."

2. Gender Identity

We are pleased that SB 202 includes "sexual orientation" as a covered class.

We would request that "gender identity" be included as well. We are happy to provide your office with information or statistics regarding acts of violence against transgender individuals.

3. Mandatory Minimums

We hope to discuss with you alternatives to inclusion of mandatory minimum sentences.

Again, thank you for all that you and the Committee do to protect the rights of Alaskans. We look forward to discussing these points further at your convenience, or to providing any additional information you may wish to review.

Best,

SB 202 - "An Act relating to the commission of a crime when the defendant directed the conduct constituting the crime at the victim based on the victim's race, sex, color, creed, physical or mental disability, sexual orientation, ancestry, or national origin."

SPONSOR STATEMENT

Senate Bill 202 makes any crime against a person a more serious or aggravated crime if it is motivated by race, sex, color, creed, physical or mental disability, sexual orientation, ancestry, or national origin. Such crimes are referred to as "Hate Crimes." Hate crimes are inchoate offenses which are crimes of preparing for or seeking to commit another crime. Absent a specific law, an inchoate offense requires that the defendant have the specific intent to commit the underlying crime. For example, for a defendant to be guilty of the crime of assault in the third degree in Alaska, the defendant knowingly must place another person in fear of imminent serious physical injury or intentionally or recklessly cause serious injury to another person by means of a dangerous instrument. If this crime was motivated by hatred, bias, or prejudice, under SB 202 it merges into a more serious hate crime and is punished at a higher level than normally would be accorded the underlying offense.

Without creating a new list of "hate crimes" under AS 11.76, new Sec. 11.76.150 simply reclassifies the level of any crime up one notch if motivated by prejudice, bias, or hatred. For example, a class B misdemeanor becomes a class A misdemeanor; a class A misdemeanor becomes a C felony; a class C felony becomes a B felony, etc. Such reclassification, of course, increases the penalties appropriate to the classification in sentencing under AS 12.55.

The need for Senate Bill 202 is demonstrated by increasing reports of violence against homeless persons, minorities, religious groups, and others motivated by prejudice, bias, and hatred in Alaska and across the country in our highly diverse and multicultural society. When crimes are committed because of people's differences, the effects reverberate beyond a single victim or group into an entire community, city, state, and society as a whole. While Senate Bill 202 alone cannot eliminate prejudice/bias, or hatred, it will send a message that Alaskans will not tolerate hate crimes in any form, the consequences and punishment of which are very severe.

Obama Signs Hate Crimes Bill

By JEFF ZELENY

Doug Mills/The New York Times The hate crimes measure was included in the national defense authorization act that President Obama signed into law on Wednesday.

President Obama signed a hate crimes bill into law on Wednesday, telling an audience at the White House that the provision would "strengthen the protections against crimes based on the color of your skin, the faith in your heart, or the place of your birth."

The law expands the definition of violent federal hate crimes to those committed because of a victim's sexual orientation. Under existing federal law, hate crimes are defined as those motivated by the victim's race, color, religion or national origin.

"Prosecutors will have new tools to work with states in order to prosecute to the fullest those who would perpetrate such crimes," Mr. Obama said, speaking in the East Room of the White House at an evening reception, "Because no one in America should ever be afraid to walk down the street holding the hands of the person they love."

The hate crimes measure was included in a defense spending bill, which Democratic leaders in Congress intentionally did in an effort to keep Republicans from blocking the legislation. The legislation had been under consideration in Congress for years. It was named in memory of Matthew Shepard, the gay Wyoming college student who was murdered 11 years ago.

"You understood that we must stand against crimes that are meant not only to break bones, but to break spirits — not only to inflict harm, but to instill fear," Mr. Obama said. "You understand that the rights afforded every citizen under our Constitution mean nothing if we do not protect those rights — both from unjust laws and violent acts."

The audience at the White House included Denis and Judy Shepard, the parents of Matthew, and the family of the late Senator Edward M. Kennedy, who championed the legislation for years, but died before the bill was ultimately passed.

Summaries

Congressional Research Service Summary

The following summary was written by the Congressional Research Service, a well-respected nonpartisan arm of the Library of Congress. GovTrack did not write and has no control over these summaries.

4/28/2009--Introduced.

Matthew Shepard Hate Crimes Prevention Act - Adopts the definition of "hate crime" as set forth in the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 (i.e., a crime in which the defendant intentionally selects a victim or, in the case of a property crime, the property that is the object of the crime because of the actual or perceived race, color, religion, national origin, ethnicity, gender, disability, or sexual orientation of any person). Authorizes the Attorney General to: (1) provide state, local, or tribal law enforcement agencies with technical, forensic, prosecutorial, or other assistance in the investigation or prosecution of violent crimes and hate crimes; and (2) award grants to assist such agencies with the extraordinary expenses associated with the investigation and prosecution of hate crimes. Authorizes the Office of Justice Programs to award grants to state, local, or tribal programs designed to combat hate crimes committed by juveniles. Authorizes appropriations to the Department of Justice (DOJ), including the Community Relations Service, for FY2010-FY2012 to prevent and respond to hate crime acts. Amends the federal criminal code to prohibit willfully causing bodily injury to any person because of the actual or perceived race, color, religion, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity, or disability of such person. Amends the Hate Crimes Statistics Act to expand data collection and reporting requirements under such Act to include: (1) crimes manifesting prejudice based on gender and gender identity; and (2) hate crimes committed by and against juveniles. Declares that nothing in this Act shall be construed to prohibit the exercise of constitutionally-protected free speech.

HR 1913: Local Law Enforcement Hate Crimes Prevention Act of 2009

April 29, 2009

Background:

Representative John Conyers of Michigan introduced the Local Law Enforcement Hate Crimes Prevention Act of 2009 on April 2, 2009 and the bill was promptly referred to the House Committee on the Judiciary. Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts is sponsoring the companion bill (S. 909). The Judiciary marked up the bill on April 22, 2009 and April 23, 2009 and moved to the House floor. The committee amendments removed the "findings" portion contained in the original bill and also removed language concerning the Hate Crimes Statistics Act (28 U.S.C. 534). An amendment offered by Rep. John Conyers on the House floor was adopted on April 29, 2009. This amendment 1) clarifies the coverage of tribal lands, 2) extends the period for the Attorney General to approve applications for grants 3) clarifies that offenses committed with weapons can be considered hate crimes 4) clarifies jurisdictions of the bill and 5) limits prosecutions, trials, and punishment for offenses not resulting in death. The bill passed the house on April 29, 2009 by a vote of 249 to175. The Local Law Enforcement Hate Crimes Prevention Act of 2009 (H.R. 1913) currently carries one hundred twenty cosponsors and is under consideration in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

DEFINITION OF HATE CRIME:

"crime of violence" – defined in section 16, title 18, United States Code

"hate crime" – defined in section 280003(a) of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 (28 U.S.C. 994 note)

"local" - means a county, city, town, township, parish, village, or other general purpose political subdivision of a State.

SUPPORT FOR CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS AND PROSECUTIONS:

At the request of a state, local, or tribal law enforcement agency, the Attorney General (AG) may provide assistance in the criminal investigation of any crime that:

- Constitutes an act of violence;
- Constitutes a felony under the state, local, or tribal laws
- Is motivated by prejudice based on race, color, religion, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity, or disability of the victim, or
- Is a violation of state, local, or tribal hate crime laws.

The AG will give priority to crimes and offenders in multiple state jurisdictions and to rural jurisdictions, particularly those having difficulty covering "extraordinary expenses" relating to the investigation or prosecution of the crime. The AG may award grants to state, local, and Tribal law enforcement agencies for those expenses. The Office of Justice Programs (OJP) will implement the grant program and address the concerns and needs of all affected parties. Each state, local, and Tribal law enforcement agency that desires a grant must submit an application to the AG. Applications must be a 60-day period prescribed by the AG. A state, local, or Tribal law enforcement agency applying for a grant must:

- Describe the "extraordinary purposes" for which the grant is needed
- Certify that the state, local, or Indian tribe lacks the resources to investigation or prosecute the hate crime
- Demonstrate that the state, local, or Tribal law enforcement agency has consulted with non-profit, nongovernmental service programs that provide services to victims of hate crimes
- Certify that any federal funds granted will be used to supplement, not supplant, non-federal funds for specified activities

An application for a grant must be approved or denied by the AG not later than 180 business days after the date received. A grant must not exceed $100,000 for any single jurisdiction in any 1-year period. By December 31, 2011, the AG must submit a report to congress describing the applications, awarded grants, and purposes for which the grants were expended.

$5 million for each FY 2010 and FY 2011 is authorized to be appropriated for this program.

GRANT PROGRAM:
OJP may award grants with the regulations prescribed by the AG to state, local, or tribal programs designed to combat hate crimes committed by juveniles. This includes programs to train local law enforcement in identifying, investigating, prosecuting, and preventing hate crimes.

There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out this program.

AUTHORIZATION FOR ADDITIONAL PERSONNEL
There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Justice, including the Community Relations Service, for fiscal years 2010, 2011, and 2012, such sums as are necessary to increase the number of personnel to prevent and respond to alleged hate crimes.

PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN HATE CRIME ACTS
This language adds a section entitled "Hate crime acts" to Chapter 13 of title 18, USC.
This section establishes that any person who attempts or commits a hate crime (as defined in the statute):

Shall be imprisoned not more than 10 years, fined, or both AND Shall be imprisoned for any term of years or for life if:

Death results from the offense
The offense includes kidnapping or an attempt to kidnap,
The offense includes aggravated sexual abuse, or an attempt to commit aggravated sexual abuse
Or an attempt to kill

---

A BILL

To provide Federal assistance to States, local jurisdictions, and Indian tribes to prosecute hate crimes, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the 'Matthew Shepard Hate Crimes Prevention Act'.

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress makes the following findings:

(1) The incidence of violence motivated by the actual or perceived race, color, religion, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity, or disability of the victim poses a serious national problem.

(2) Such violence disrupts the tranquility and safety of communities and is deeply divisive.

(3) State and local authorities are now and will continue to be responsible for prosecuting the overwhelming majority of violent crimes in the United States, including violent crimes motivated by bias. These authorities can carry out their responsibilities more effectively with greater Federal assistance.

(4) Existing Federal law is inadequate to address this problem.

(5) A prominent characteristic of a violent crime motivated by bias is that it devastates not just the actual victim and the family and friends of the victim, but frequently savages the community sharing the traits that caused the victim to be selected.

(6) Such violence substantially affects interstate commerce in many ways, including the following:

(A) The movement of members of targeted groups is impeded, and members of such groups are forced to move across State lines to escape the incidence or risk of such violence.

(B) Members of targeted groups are prevented from purchasing goods and services, obtaining or sustaining employment, or participating in other commercial activity.

(C) Perpetrators cross State lines to commit such violence.

(D) Channels, facilities, and instrumentalities of interstate commerce are used to facilitate the commission of such violence.

(E) Such violence is committed using articles that have traveled in interstate commerce.

(7) For generations, the institutions of slavery and involuntary servitude were defined by the race, color, and ancestry of those held in bondage. Slavery and involuntary servitude were enforced, both prior to and after the adoption of the 13th amendment to the Constitution of the United States, through widespread public and private violence directed at persons because of their race, color, or ancestry, or perceived race, color, or ancestry. Accordingly, eliminating racially motivated violence is an important means of eliminating, to the extent possible, the badges, incidents, and relics of slavery and involuntary servitude.

(8) Both at the time when the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments to the Constitution of the United States were adopted, and continuing to date, members of certain religious and national origin groups were and are perceived to be distinct 'races'. Thus, in order to eliminate, to the extent possible, the badges, incidents, and relics of slavery, it is necessary to prohibit assaults on the basis of real or perceived religions or national origins, at least to the extent such religions or national origins were regarded as races at the time of the adoption of the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

(9) Federal jurisdiction over certain violent crimes motivated by bias enables Federal, State, and local authorities to work together as partners in the investigation and prosecution of such crimes.

(10) The problem of crimes motivated by bias is sufficiently serious, widespread, and interstate in nature as to warrant Federal assistance to States, local jurisdictions, and Indian tribes.

SEC. 3. DEFINITION OF HATE CRIME.

In this Act--

(1) the term 'crime of violence' has the meaning given that term in section 16, title 18, United States Code;

(2) the term 'hate crime' has the meaning given such term in section 280003(a) of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 (28 U.S.C. 994 note); and

(3) the term 'local' means a county, city, town, township, parish, village, or other general purpose political subdivision of a State.

SEC. 4. SUPPORT FOR CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS AND PROSECUTIONS BY STATE, LOCAL, AND TRIBAL LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICIALS.

(a) Assistance Other Than Financial Assistance-

(1) IN GENERAL- At the request of State, local, or tribal law enforcement agency, the Attorney General may provide technical, forensic, prosecutorial, or any other form of assistance in the criminal investigation or prosecution of any crime that--

(A) constitutes a crime of violence;

(B) constitutes a felony under the State, local, or tribal laws; and

(C) is motivated by prejudice based on the actual or perceived race, color, religion, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity, or disability of the victim, or is a violation of the State, local, or tribal hate crime laws.

(2) PRIORITY- In providing assistance under paragraph (1), the Attorney General shall give priority to crimes committed by offenders who have committed crimes in more than one State and to rural jurisdictions that have difficulty covering the extraordinary expenses relating to the investigation or prosecution of the crime.

(b) Grants-

(1) IN GENERAL- The Attorney General may award grants to State, local, and tribal law enforcement agencies for extraordinary expenses associated with the investigation and prosecution of hate crimes.

(2) OFFICE OF JUSTICE PROGRAMS- In implementing the grant program under this subsection, the Office of Justice Programs shall work closely with grantees to ensure that the concerns and needs of all affected parties, including community groups and schools, colleges, and universities, are addressed through the local infrastructure developed under the grants.

(3) APPLICATION-

(A) IN GENERAL- Each State, local, and tribal law enforcement agency that desires a grant under this subsection shall submit an application to the Attorney General at such time, in such manner, and accompanied by or containing such information as the Attorney General shall reasonably require.

(B) DATE FOR SUBMISSION - Applications submitted pursuant to subparagraph (A) shall be submitted during the 60-day period beginning on a date that the Attorney General shall prescribe.

(C) REQUIREMENTS- A State, local, and tribal law enforcement agency applying for a grant under this subsection shall--

(i) describe the extraordinary purposes for which the grant is needed;

(ii) certify that the State, local government, or Indian tribe lacks the resources necessary to investigate or prosecute the hate crime;

(iii) demonstrate that, in developing a plan to implement the grant, the State, local, and tribal law enforcement agency has consulted and coordinated with nonprofit, nongovernmental victim services programs that have experience in providing services to victims of hate crimes; and

(iv) certify that any Federal funds received under this subsection will be used to supplement, not supplant, non-Federal funds that would otherwise be available for activities funded under this subsection.

(4) DEADLINE- An application for a grant under this subsection shall be approved or denied by the Attorney General not later than 180 business days after the date on which the Attorney General receives the application.

(5) GRANT AMOUNT- A grant under this subsection shall not exceed $100,000 for any single jurisdiction in any 1-year period.

(6) REPORT- Not later than December 31, 2010, the Attorney General shall submit to Congress a report describing the applications submitted for grants under this subsection, the award of such grants, and the purposes for which the grant amounts were expended.

(7) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS- There is authorized to be appropriated to carry out this subsection $5,000,000 for each of fiscal years 2010 and 2011.

SEC. 5. GRANT PROGRAM.

(a) Authority To Award Grants- The Office of Justice Programs of the Department of Justice may award grants, in accordance with such regulations as the Attorney General may prescribe, to State, local, or tribal programs designed to combat hate crimes committed by juveniles, including programs to train local law enforcement officers in identifying, investigating, prosecuting, and preventing hate crimes.

(b) Authorization of Appropriations- There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out this section.

SEC. 6. AUTHORIZATION FOR ADDITIONAL PERSONNEL TO ASSIST STATE, LOCAL, AND TRIBAL LAW ENFORCEMENT.

There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Justice, including the Community Relations Service, for fiscal years 2010, 2011, and 2012 such sums as are necessary to increase the number of personnel to prevent and respond to alleged violations of section 249 of title 18, United States Code, as added by section 7 of this Act.

SEC. 7. PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN HATE CRIME ACTS.

(a) In General- Chapter 13 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

'Sec. 249. Hate crime acts

'(a) In General-

'(1) OFFENSES INVOLVING ACTUAL OR PERCEIVED RACE, COLOR, RELIGION, OR NATIONAL ORIGIN- Whoever, whether or not acting under color of law, willfully causes bodily injury to any person or, through the use of fire, a firearm, a dangerous weapon, or an explosive or incendiary device, attempts to cause bodily injury to any person, because of the actual or perceived race, color, religion, or national origin of any person--

'(A) shall be imprisoned not more than 10 years, fined in accordance with this title, or both; and

'(B) shall be imprisoned for any term of years or for life, fined in accordance with this title, or both, if--

'(i) death results from the offense; or

'(ii) the offense includes kidnapping or an attempt to kidnap, aggravated sexual abuse or an attempt to commit aggravated sexual abuse, or an attempt to kill.

'(2) OFFENSES INVOLVING ACTUAL OR PERCEIVED RELIGION, NATIONAL ORIGIN, GENDER, SEXUAL ORIENTATION, GENDER IDENTITY, OR DISABILITY-

'(A) IN GENERAL- Whoever, whether or not acting under color of law, in any circumstance described in subparagraph (B) or paragraph (3), willfully causes bodily injury to any person or, through the use of fire, a firearm, a dangerous weapon, or an explosive or incendiary device, attempts to cause bodily injury to any person, because of the actual or perceived religion, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity or disability of any person--

'(i) shall be imprisoned not more than 10 years, fined in accordance with this title, or both; and

'(ii) shall be imprisoned for any term of years or for life, fined in accordance with this title, or both, if--

'(I) death results from the offense; or

'(II) the offense includes kidnapping or an attempt to kidnap, aggravated sexual abuse or an attempt to commit aggravated sexual abuse, or an attempt to kill.

'(B) CIRCUMSTANCES DESCRIBED- For purposes of subparagraph (A), the circumstances described in this subparagraph are that--

'(i) the conduct described in subparagraph (A) occurs during the course of, or as the result of, the travel of the defendant or the victim--

'(I) across a State line or national border; or

'(II) using a channel, facility, or instrumentality of interstate or foreign commerce;

'(ii) the defendant uses a channel, facility, or instrumentality of interstate or foreign commerce in connection with the conduct described in subparagraph (A);

'(iii) in connection with the conduct described in subparagraph (A), the defendant employs a firearm, dangerous weapon, explosive or incendiary device, or other weapon that has traveled in interstate or foreign commerce; or

'(iv) the conduct described in subparagraph (A)--

'(I) interferes with commercial or other economic activity in which the victim is engaged at the time of the conduct; or

'(II) otherwise affects interstate or foreign commerce.

'(3) OFFENSES OCCURRING IN THE SPECIAL MARITIME OR TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION OF THE UNITED STATES- Whoever, within the special maritime or territorial jurisdiction of the United States, commits an offense described in paragraph (1) or (2) shall be subject to the same penalties as prescribed in those paragraphs.

'(b) Certification Requirement-

'(1) IN GENERAL- No prosecution of any offense described in this subsection may be undertaken by the United States, except under the certification in writing of the Attorney General, or his designee, that--

'(A) the State does not have jurisdiction;

'(B) the State has requested that the Federal Government assume jurisdiction;

'(C) the verdict or sentence obtained pursuant to State charges left demonstratively unvindicated the Federal interest in eradicating bias-motivated violence; or

'(D) a prosecution by the United States is in the public interest and necessary to secure substantial justice.

'(2) RULE OF CONSTRUCTION- Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to limit the authority of Federal officers, or a Federal grand jury, to investigate possible violations of this section.

'(c) Definitions- In this section--

'(1) the term 'bodily injury' has the meaning given such term in section 1365(h)(4) of this title, but does not include solely emotional or psychological harm to the victim;

'(2) the term 'explosive or incendiary device' has the meaning given such term in section 232 of this title;

'(3) the term 'firearm' has the meaning given such term in section 921(a) of this title; and

'(4) the term 'gender identity' for the purposes of this chapter means actual or perceived gender-related characteristics.'.

(b) Technical and Conforming Amendment- The analysis for chapter 13 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

'249. Hate crime acts.'.

SEC. 8. STATISTICS.

(a) In General- Subsection (b)(1) of the first section of the Hate Crime Statistics Act (28 U.S.C. 534 note) is amended by inserting 'gender and gender identity,' after 'race,'.

(b) Data- Subsection (b)(5) of the first section of the Hate Crime Statistics Act (28 U.S.C. 534 note) is amended by inserting ',

SB 209 Sponsor Statement

Senate Bill 209 will provide the Alaska State Council on the Arts the authority to adopt regulations relating to its statutory powers and duties.

The bill has been introduced at the request of the Alaska State Council on the Arts (ASCA), which is the Last Frontier's state arts agency, created over 40 years ago. The council works in partnership with the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) to foster the development of the arts for all Alaskans through education, partnerships, grants and services.

Several of ASCA's programs are governed by regulations, which ASCA has promulgated and updated over the years. Recently ASCA has sought to improve and streamline its grant-making policies, procedures, and regulations. In the course of this effort, ASCA was informed by the Department of Law that ASCA technically does not have statutory authority to adopt regulations under the Administrative Procedures Act (APA). While this legal opinion is at odds with long-standing practice, ASCA considered the advice from the Attorney General's office, and determined that the best way to rectify the current anomalous situation is to amend its enabling statute to allow ASCA the explicit statutory authority to adopt regulations.

This legislation will in essence codify existing practice and will enable ASCA to continue to administer and oversee its existing programs. Any and all regulations adopted in future will have to comply with the review and public-notice provisions of the APA. This bill has a zero fiscal note and will help ASCA continue performing its long-standing mission of helping more Alaskans appreciate, create, and enjoy the arts and having regulatory authority will directly contribute to ASCA's ability to do so.

SENATE BILL NO.

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE - SECOND SESSION

BY SENATOR MENARD

Introduced:
Referred:

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act providing the Alaska State Council on the Arts the authority to adopt regulations relating to its statutory powers and duties; and providing for an effective date."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 44.27.052(a) is amended to read:

(a) The council may

(1) hold public and private hearings;

(2) enter into contracts, within the limit of funds available, with individuals, organizations, and institutions for services furthering the educational objectives of the council's programs;

(3) enter into contracts, within the limit of funds available, with local and regional associations for cooperative endeavors furthering the educational objectives of the council's programs;

(4) accept gifts, contributions, and bequests of unrestricted funds from individuals, foundations, corporations, and other organizations or institutions for the purpose of furthering the educational objectives of the council's programs; [AND]

(5) make and sign agreements and do and perform any acts necessary to carry out the purposes of AS 44.27.040 - 44.27.060; and

(6) adopt regulations under AS 44.62 (Administrative Procedure Act) to carry out the provisions of AS 44.27.040 - 44.27.060.

 Sec. 2. This Act takes effect immediately under AS 01.10.070(c).

The Hon. Kevin Meyer and Joe Thomas
Co-Chairmen, Senate Education Committee
State Capitol, Rooms 101 & 504
Juneau, Alaska 99811

Dear Senators Meyer and Thomas:

I am writing on behalf of the Alaska State Council on the Arts (ASCA) to express our support for Senate Bill 209. I hope to ensure that all members of the Senate Education Committee and, indeed, the full Senate, will support this simple yet important piece of legislation.

SB 209 was necessitated by a determination of the Alaska Department of Law that ASCA does not possess statutory authority to adopt regulations, although ASCA had been so doing for many years. When this technical lack of authority came to our attention, the members of the State Council weighed our options, and decided that simply adding the missing language from the statute would be the best way to remedy the situation.

ASCA's work is vitally important to the cultural well-being of Alaskans, and we could not operate our regrant program in accordance with federal standards without the state regulations that implement our enabling statutes. Giving ASCA the explicit power to adopt simple regulations subject to the same scrutiny that applies to all other regulations adopted in Alaska will allow Alaska's state arts agency to continue to do its job to the benefit of all Alaskans.

Please don't hesitate to let me know if I can answer any questions about this legislation or ASCA, and thank you for you consideration of this bill.

Yours sincerely,

Benjamin Brown, Chairman
Alaska State Council on the Arts

TO: Senator Linda Menard
Attn: Mike Rovito

FROM: Dennis C. Bailey
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional summary of the above-described bill.

As a preliminary matter, note that a sectional summary of a bill should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill and the bill itself is the best statement of its contents.

Section 1. Gives the Alaska State Council on the Arts the authority to adopt regulations relating to its statutory powers and duties.

Section 2. Provides an immediate effective date for the measure.

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

Dear Senator Menard:

I would like to lend the support of myself and the Alaska State Council on the Arts, a division of the Department of Education, to Senate Bill 209, which will at long last provide our agency the authority to adopt regulations.

While, in many respects, this legislation is a housekeeping matter, it is a critical bill for our agency. We need the ability to update and amend our regulations over time, and without the statutory authority to do so, the Alaska State Council on the Arts will remain static and unable to respond to changes in the field.

Thank you, Senator Menard, for carrying this legislation. I look forward to working with you and your office.

Sincerely,

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE - SECOND SESSION

BY

Offered:
Referred:

Sponsor(s): SENATOR HUGGINS

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act establishing child custody, modification, and visitation standards for a military parent; and amending Rule 99, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 25.20 is amended by adding a new section to read:

Sec. 25.20.095. Custody and visitation proceedings involving a military parent. (a) Except as provided in this section, a parent's temporary duty, mobilization, or deployment to military service and the resultant temporary disruption to the schedule of a child of the parent may not be a factor in a court's decision to grant or deny a petition for custody or visitation.

(b) A parent who is deployed may petition a court of competent jurisdiction for custody or visitation. The petition shall be construed to be an application for affirmative relief, consistent with the protections afforded under 50 U.S.C. App. 501 - 596 (Servicemembers Civil Relief Act) and may include a request to delegate the deployed parent's visitation rights to a family member.

(c) A court shall order a delegation of visitation rights based on a petition filed under (b) of this section if the court finds that

(1) the family member receiving the delegation has an existing close relationship to the child; and

(2) the delegation is in the child's best interest.

(d) A hearing on a petition filed under this section shall be expedited by the court on a motion filed by the deployed parent and subject to an additional 10 days' notice.

(e) A parent who is deployed may not be construed to have waived any rights or protections with regard to custody or visitation of the deployed parent's child unless the deployed parent expressly waives the right or protection in writing.

(f) A court order entered under this section must require that

(1) the nondeployed parent make the child reasonably available for visitation to the deployed parent when the deployed parent is on leave if the visits are in the child's best interest;

(2) the nondeployed parent facilitate contact, including telephonic and electronic contract, between the deployed parent's child and the deployed parent if the contact is in the child's best interest; electronic contact with a video image must be facilitated whenever feasible; and

(3) the deployed parent provide timely information to the nondeployed parent regarding the deployed parent's leave schedule.

(g) In making a determination of the best interests of the child, the court shall consider the factors under AS 25.24.150(c) and apply the rebuttable presumption under AS 25.24.150(g) to visitation, delegation, and custody orders issued under this section.

(h) In this section,

(1) "deployment" or "deployed" means military services performed in compliance with a valid order received by an active duty or reserve member of the armed services of the United States, National Guard, or United States Coast Guard to report for combat operations, contingency operations, peacekeeping operations, temporary duty, a remote tour of duty, or other active service for which the deploying parent reports unaccompanied by any family member;

(2) "family member" means a person who is an adult sibling, aunt, uncle, first cousin, or grandparent related by blood, adoption, or marriage or a stepparent to the child who is the subject of a custody order issued under this section;

(3) "military service" includes the period from which the deployed parent receives and is subject to deployment orders and the period in which the parent is awaiting travel or remains deployed because of sickness, wounds, leave, or other lawful cause.

* Sec. 2. AS 25.20.110 is amended by adding new subsections to read:

(d) Except as provided in (e) - (h) of this section, a parent's temporary duty, mobilization, or deployment to military service and the resultant temporary disruption to the schedule of a child of the parent may not be a factor in finding a change of circumstances on a motion to modify child custody or visitation.

(e) A court may provide for a temporary modification of a custody or visitation order during the period of a parent's deployment to military service to make reasonable accommodation for the deployment. The temporary order must specify that deployment is the basis of the order and include provisions for

(1) custody or reasonable visitation during a period of leave granted to the deployed parent if the custody or visitation is in the child's best interest;

(2) termination of the temporary order and resumption of the permanent order within 10 days after notification of the deployed parent's ability to resume custody or visitation unless the court finds that resumption of the custody or visitation order in effect before deployment is no longer in the child's best interest; the nondeployed parent shall bear the burden of proving that resumption of the order is no longer in the child's best interest;

(3) a hearing if a child of a deployed parent has been moved out of state and the nondeployed parent has filed a motion that alleges that resumption of the permanent custody order will result in immediate danger of irreparable harm to the child or that the presumption under AS 25.24.150(g) exists;

(4) delegation, on request of the deployed parent, of the deployed parent's visitation rights under an existing order, if any, to another family member who has an existing close relationship to the child if the delegation is in the child's best interest; and

(5) immediate notification by the parent who is not deployed of a change of address or contact information to the deployed parent and to the court.

(f) A court shall expedite a hearing to modify custody or visitation on a motion made by a parent who is subject to deployment.

(g) In making a determination of the best interests of the child, the court shall consider the factors under AS 25.24.150(c) and apply the rebuttable presumption under AS 25.24.150(g) to visitation, delegation, and custody orders issued under this section.

(h) In this section, "deployment," "family member," and "military service" have the meanings given in AS 25.20.095.

 Sec. 3. AS 25.24.150 is amended by adding a new subsection to read:

(l) Except as provided in AS 25.20.095 and 25.20.110, a court may not consider a parent's activation to military service and deployment in determining the best interest of the child under (c) of this section. In this subsection, "deployment" has the meaning given in AS 25.20.095.

 Sec. 4. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

DIRECT COURT RULE AMENDMENT. Rule 99(a), Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure, is amended to read:

(a) Authorization for Telephonic, Video, or Internet Participation. The court may allow one or more parties, counsel, witnesses or the judge to participate telephonically in any hearing or deposition for good cause and in the absence of substantial prejudice to opposing parties. The court shall allow video or Internet testimony if the hearing or deposition involves the custody or visitation of a child of a parent who is deployed, as that term is defined in AS 25.20.095, at the request of the deployed parent. Authorization for a witness to telephonically participate in a deposition does not bar the witnesses' testimony from being videotaped under Civil Rule 30.1; nor does it bar a party or attorney from being present at the site at which the witness is physically present.

* Sec. 5. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

CONDITIONAL EFFECT. The amendment to Rule 99(a), Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure, made by sec. 4 of this Act, takes effect only if sec. 4 of this Act receives the two-thirds majority vote of each house required by art. IV, sec. 15, Constitution of the State of Alaska.

Sponsor Statement SB 210

"An Act establishing child custody, modification, and visitation standards for a military parent who is deployed; and amending Rule 99, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure."

For nearly a decade, the War on Terror has required Alaska to frequently deploy our active military, reserve, and National Guard troops. This high deployment tempo is putting even more pressure on our already strained military families. Children who are already in unusual circumstances due to their parents' military careers are being put in the situation of having to deal with a deployed parent. It is no wonder that the divorce rate for members in the military has been steadily rising for the past decade.

However, while the travesty of divorce is hard enough on all members of a family, the court system is also finding it difficult to balance the issues of deployment with child custody issues. A deploying family member now must fight a battle on two fronts, the one overseas, and the one at home. SB 210 ensures that the court system has clear directive as to how it should deal with a deploying military member if they should find themselves in the midst of a child custody battle. It affords them the right to an expedited hearing so that matters can be taken care of before deployment, if necessary, and it also allows the member to delegate their visitation rights to another family member in order for the child to maintain all familial connections. Most importantly, SB 210 requires that a court not use deployment as the sole reason for a change in a child custody order. Our men and women are sacrificing enough for our country, their military service should not be a reason in itself for them to lose custody of their children.

In 2009, because of the potential for conflict with current states child custody laws, congress deemed military child custody to be the responsibility of individual states.

SB 210 includes the following items and restrictions:

- A definition of a military absence.
- Assurance that military duties cannot be the sole reason for a permanent change of custody.
- Allowance of expedited hearings with restrictions.
- The right to delegate visitation to another family member.
- Allowance of electronic testimony.
- Limitations on temporary custody orders.

In recognizing that the federal government should not legislate a Military Child Custody statute, that Alaska has many service-members, that the United States military currently has a high rate of deployment, and that military divorce rates continue to rise, now is a good time for the Alaska Legislature to address military child custody.

SB 210
"An Act establishing child custody, modification, and visitation standards for a military parent; and amending Rule 99, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure."

Section 1: AS 25.20 adds a new section:

Sec. 25.20.095. Custody and visitation proceedings involving a military parent.
(a) Military service cannot be a factor in granting or denying a petition for custody or visitation.

(b) – (e) Upon receiving deployment orders a military parent shall receive an expedited hearing and the parent can delegate visitation rights to a family member if doing so is within a child's best interests. Any petition for custody or visitation will be given the same protections as afforded under the SCRA. Additionally, rights or protections regarding custody or visitation can only be waived writing

(f) A court order entered under this section must require
(1) a child be made reasonably available during periods of leave
(2) the facilitation of written and electronic contact between the deployed parent and the child, preferably electronic contact with a video image
(3) the deployed parent provide timely leave information

(g) Factors in determining a child's best interests. Cross reference to AS 25.24.150(c) and AS 25.24.150(g)

(h) Definition of "deployment," "family member," and "military service"

Section 2: AS 25.20.110 is amended by adding new subsection to read:

(d) Except as provided in (e) – (h) military service cannot be a factor in finding a change of circumstances on a motion to modify child custody or visitation

(e) A court may provide for a temporary modification of a custody or visitation order to make reasonable accommodation for a deployment. The temporary order must include provisions for

(1) custody or visitation during periods of leave if doing so is within the child's best interests.

(2) termination of the temporary order within 10 days of notification of the deployed parent's ability to resume custody if doing so is within the child's best interests. The non-deployed parent shall bear the burden of proof.

(3) a hearing if a child of a deployed parent moved out of state and the non-deployed parent files a motion that alleges that resumption of the permanent custody order will result in immediate danger of irreparable harm to the child or that the presumption under AS 25.24.150(g) exists

(4) delegation of the deployed parent's visitation rights to a family member if doing so is within the child's best interests.

(5) immediate notification from the non-deployed parent of a change of address or contact information.

(f) A court shall expedite a hearing to modify custody or visitation on a motion made by a parent who is subject to deployment.

(g) Factors in determining a child's best interests. Cross reference to AS 25.24.250(c) and AS 25.24.250(g)

(h) Definition of "deployment," "family member," and "military service." Cross reference to AS 25.20.095

Section 3: AS 25.24.150 is amended by adding new subsection to read:

(l) Except as provided in AS 25.20.095 and 25.20.110 military service cannot be a factor in determining the best interest of the child under (c) of this section.

Section 4: The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

(a) Authorization for Telephonic, Video, or Internet Participation.
The court shall allow video or Internet testimony if the hearing or deposition involves the custody or visitation of a child of a parent who is deployed, as that term is defined in AS 25.20.095, at the request of the deployed parent.

Military Divorce Rate Continues to Climb
The divorce rate in the armed forces continues to grow, despite efforts by the military to help struggling couples.

The Pentagon recently reported there were an estimated 27,312 divorces among roughly 765,000 married members of the active-duty Army, Air Force, Navy and Marine Corps in fiscal year 2009.

That's a divorce rate of about 3.6 percent, compared with 3.4 percent a year earlier, according to figures from the Defense Manpower Data Center. Marriages among reservists failed at a rate of 2.8 percent compared to 2.7 the previous year.

The reported 3.6 percent rate is a full percentage point above the 2.6 percent reported in late 2001, when the U.S. began sending troops to Afghanistan in response to the Sept 11 terrorist attacks.

As in previous years, women in uniform suffered much higher divorce rates than their male counterparts: 7.7 percent compared to 3 percent for men in 2009.

The only comparable measure for civilian divorce rates is what the Centers for Disease Control said in 2005 that 43 percent of all first marriages end in divorce within 10 years.

Critics believe that the divorce rate reported by the Pentagon comes nowhere close to depicting the damage done to marriages and families by the two ongoing wars.

The Pentagon number doesn't count veterans, who divorce after leaving the services, let alone reflect other possible wartime consequences on families, such as increases in alcoholism or the toll on orphaned or emotionally stressed children of troops.

In an Army battlefield survey taken in Iraq in the spring, nearly 22 percent of young combat soldiers questioned said they planned to get a divorce or separation, compared to 12.4 percent in a survey conducted in 2003.

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

SECTION OF FAMILY LAW
STANDING COMMITTEE ON LEGAL ASSISTANCE FOR MILITARY PERSONNEL
STANDING COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AID AND INDIGENT DEFENDANTS

REPORT TO THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES

RECOMMENDATION

RESOLVED, That the American Bar Association opposes the enactment of federal legislation that would:

(a) create federal-question jurisdiction in child custody cases, including cases involving servicemember-parents;

(b) dictate case outcomes or impose evidentiary burdens in state child-custody matters involving servicemember-parents;

(c) co-opt the discretionary authority of state courts, in cases involving servicemember-parents, to determine the best interests of the child and award custody accordingly; and

(d) pre-empt the growing body of state laws that comprehensively address servicemember domestic relations matters, including child custody.

FURTHER RESOLVED, That the American Bar Association urges states to enact legislation prohibiting denial of child custody to a servicemember based solely on absence due to military deployment.

REPORT

We Americans owe many things to those who disproportionately bear the burden of national sacrifice, but bad law is not one of them. Today as always, the American Bar Association is as resolutely committed to the legal rights of American military members as it is to those of America's children. Yet there can be no Solomon-like splitting of interests when it comes to legislation that, in the name of deployed servicemembers' parental rights, would create a federal child custody law that usurps the historic primacy of the states in domestic relations law and relegates the best interests of the child to a secondary consideration in custody disputes.

Such legislation was kept out of the Fiscal Year 2009 National Defense Authorization Act at the eleventh hour. Similar measures had been introduced in prior sessions of Congress, and there is every reason to believe that this measure will keep resurfacing until either passed, or finally dispatched after a full vetting. Should such a measure re-surface, the ABA urges Congress to reject in its entirety this unsound incursion into the realm of the states, however well-intentioned its proponents, with the understanding that the rights of servicemembers and their children are best served within the existing framework of state laws and court-integrated social services, and the formidable procedural protections already built into the federal Servicemembers Civil Relief Act (SCRA).

The Recent Legislation

The latest iteration of the opposed legislation, section 4510 of H.R. 5658, 110th Congress, would have amended 50 U.S.C. App. § 521, the SCRA, by adding language dictating outcomes in child custody cases, where a servicemember parent had legal custody of the child at the time the parent was deployed to a contingency operation such as Iraq or Afghanistan. The bill would have compelled courts to restore custody of the child to the servicemember parent upon his or her return home post-deployment, unless it could be demonstrated by "clear and convincing evidence" that it was not in the child's best interest to have custody restored to the returning servicemember parent. The bill also would have prohibited a court, in deciding the child's interests, from considering how a servicemember's extended absence due to deployment may have affected those interests. The bill further would have prohibited change in child custody while a servicemember was deployed, through modification of a child custody arrangement that existed at the time of deployment, absent clear and convincing evidence that the change was in the child's best interests.

The Threat to Existing, Effective Legal Mechanisms

On its face, the proposition that an American servicemember must not lose custody of his or her child by virtue of service to our country in distant danger zones seems unassailable. On the other hand, is it ever reasonable to suggest that a court, in deciding a child's best interest, be prohibited from even considering how a parent's prolonged military deployment, among other factors, might affect the child's-best-interests analysis? The reality is that conflicting interests within separated families do not lend themselves to inflexible legal prescriptions. Such matters must be decided on a case-by-case basis, always focusing on the best interest of the child as the primary factor.

Wielding the club of a federal child-custody law that pre-ordains pro-servicemember outcomes in these cases would compromise the generally-accepted "best interests of the child" standard governing custody decisions.

A. Creating a Federal Law of Child Custody for These Servicemember-Parent Cases Would Invade the Province of State Courts and Disrupt Existing, Effective Legal Frameworks for Resolving Child Custody Disputes.

Child Custody Is Not a Federal Question.

The opposed legislation would create a new substantive legal interest in restored child-custody rights, under the SCRA. It would thus create federal-question jurisdiction over covered child custody cases, forcing federal judges to venture into the terra incognita of child custody jurisprudence when a covered case is originally filed in federal court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §1331 or removed to federal court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §1446.

Such an outcome would run counter to a long and unbroken history of federal deference to state courts on subject matters not expressly reserved to federal judicial authority. In particular, federal courts have not entertained claims addressing child custody or visitation, or other "adjustments to family status." See Ankenbrandt v. Richards and Kessler, 504 U.S. 689 (1992); Thompson v. Thompson, 798 F.2d 1547 (9th Cir. 1986), aff'd 484 U.S. 174 (1988); Cole v. Cole, 693 F.2d 1083 (4th Cir. 1980); Doe v. Doe, 660 F.2d 101 (4th Cir. 1981). In Ankenbrandt, the Supreme Court observed:

> Issuance of [custody] decrees . . . not infrequently involves retention of jurisdiction by the court and deployment of social workers to monitor compliance. As a matter of judicial economy, state courts are more eminently suited to work of this type than are federal courts, which lack the close association with state and local government organizations dedicated to handling that arise out of conflicts over divorce, alimony, and child custody decrees. Moreover, as a matter of judicial expertise, it makes far more sense to retain the rule that federal courts lack power to issue these types of decrees because of the special proficiency developed by state tribunals of the past century and a half. 504 U.S. at 703-04.

The same reasoning must guide Congress in consideration of the next bill purporting to create a federal law of child custody.

Such Legislation Would Tie the Hands of Judges.

Whether these matters are decided in federal or state court, the opposed legislation would tie the hands of judges by mandating a particular result in favor of the servicemember parent returning from deployment. It would mandate automatic restoration of custody to the returning parent, provided that he or she had custody of the child at the time of deployment. In forcing that decision, the opposed rule would bar a court from even considering the effect of prolonged parental absence, due to deployment, on the child's best interests. The court would have no discretion in these custody decisions, absent a showing by "clear and convincing" evidence that the child should not resume residence with that parent.

Even where it could be proven by a preponderance of the evidence that the child's best interests lay with a grant of custody to the other parent, the court would be forced to restore the child to the custody of the returning servicemember, unless the more stringent "clear and convincing" threshold could be met.

The States Are Making Rapid Progress in Addressing These Matters.

The states have moved rapidly and responsibly to address the extraordinarily complex set of family law and other legal issues confronting this generation of servicemembers and their families, of whom so much has been demanded. Nine states have enacted legislation squarely addressing the child custody circumstances at issue in the opposed legislation: Arizona, California, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, North Carolina and Virginia. More than 20 states have adopted legislation acknowledging the potentially competing interests of the child and custodial servicemember and seeking to balance those interests within the framework of the individual states family service systems. These recent state statutes provide, or will provide, broad protections of family member interests, addressing not only restoration of custody but representation of the servicemember's interests in state proceedings and incorporation of mental health and other state support services.

The typical emergent state statute goes much further than the opposed federal bill in protecting servicemembers' interests. For example, it provides for electronic testimony by deployed servicemembers and expedited dockets for those wishing to organize their affairs in advance of deployment.

Importantly, many of the new comprehensive state laws, unlike the proposed federal legislation, also address child-visitation for servicemembers who do not have custody. Most active-duty servicemembers who have minor children are not custodial parents. Department of Defense regulations generally prohibit first-term single parents from having legal custody of a minor child. Moreover, the military lifestyle often compels the servicemember parent to relinquish custody to the non-servicemember parent.

These state-law solutions, tailored to and consonant with particular state social service systems and the broad array of servicemember parental interests, represent by far the better and more effective remedy.

The U.S. Department of Defense strongly opposes the type of legislation at issue – the department has urged in its position statement on point:

> The progress with which the states have embraced the military-specific issues has been phenomenal and shows no indication of waning. Five military custody bills became law in just the first six months of 2008. It would be a mistake to intrude on the significant protections and creativity demonstrated by the states.

The opposed bill would do substantial damage to this significant new line of state-based protections, as federal law would be pre-emptive on the burden of proof question and, in a radical and unprecedented departure from the long history of state dominion over family relations disputes, would mandate custody-dispute outcomes from afar without due consideration of the child's best interests. It must be recognized that, at the end of the day, the creative servicemember-parent protections offered by the new and growing array of state statutes are significantly stronger than those contained in this misguided proposal.

B. This Legislation Would Undermine and Misuse The Servicemembers Civil Relief Act.

The opposed bill would compromise the purpose and effect of the SCRA by converting it into a results-driven hammer for forcing particular outcomes in child custody cases. Such a misuse of this far-reaching legal shield for American servicemembers and their families would destroy its procedural focus, as it applies to courts and litigation, with its provisions for issuing automatic stays, vacating default judgments and appointing counsel for servicemembers.

As the Department of Defense noted in its opposition:

> The SCRA . . . currently provides powerful rights to mobilized custodial caregivers. A number of high-visibility custody cases have resulted in custody decisions adverse to deployed servicemembers; however, in many of these cases the basic and generally easily met prerequisites for automatic 90-day stays under the SCRA were not followed. In other cases, judges simply ignored the SCRA. This indicates a problem of a lack of education about the effect and use of the SCRA rather than a problem with its substantive limitations.

The opposed initiative would also introduce a real risk of dilution of important protections already found in the SCRA, by creating the possibility of a legal inference that those protections only apply to the particular child custody circumstances addressed by the bill, (i.e., the custody rights of servicemembers who had custody pre-deployment and are returning from deployment.)

The Department of Defense also points out that passage of the proposal could leave "other types of domestic cases vulnerable to arguments that the failure to explicitly address them indicates a legislative intent to exclude them" from SCRA procedural protections."

The SCRA, as it is written, provides clear protections for civil litigants in uniform, including deployed servicemembers in child custody matters, and it means what it says. Doubt as to the scope and reach of this seminal statute's array of servicemember protections must not be legislatively introduced, where no such doubt currently exists.

Damage to the purpose and function of this pre-eminent servicemember-protection statute was a primary consideration of an original sponsoring entity of the instant resolution, the Standing Committee on Legal Assistance for Military Personnel (LAMP), in its decision to strongly oppose the legislative proposal at issue here. LAMP exists to serve and support American servicemembers and their families. While on its face the offending legislation purports to support servicemember parents, the LAMP Committee has concluded that this support is largely illusory, as the bill would do irreparable harm to state-law-based servicemember protections, which are rapidly improving, and upset the well-established legal-social framework for managing child custody cases affecting military and civilian families alike.

C. The Best Interests of the Child Standard Must be Preserved in Custody Cases.

The opposed bill would compromise the best interest of the child standard in custody decisions. To be sure, in fairness to those who leave home to answer their country's call to arms, the mere fact of deployment of a custodial caregiver, standing alone, cannot constitute legal grounds for depriving a servicemember parent of custody. But the proposal in question veers off to the opposite extreme, making restoration of pre-deployment custody automatic and relegating the child's interests to a secondary consideration, unless it can be shown by "clear and convincing" evidence that restoring custody to that servicemember-parent would be against the child's best interests. In the murky world of most family relationships, proving anything to a "clear and convincing" certainty is a tall order indeed. The proposed standard thus would turn on its head the generally-accepted "best interests" standard, a deviation that would represent a dangerous precedent that ultimately serves no one's interests, including those of servicemembers or their families.

Additional Considerations

The proposal is also unworkable to the extent that it would only create custody rights in cases involving the actual deployment of a servicemember to a "contingency operation," which means a designated conflict zone such as Iraq or Afghanistan. As the Department of Defense noted, this introduces > another arbitrarily created distinction between those involved in a contingency operation and those who must be absent from their child for other military-directed reasons. Why should the deployment of a servicemember in support of a humanitarian operation, as opposed to a peacekeeping operation, be forced to operate under different laws and perhaps different courts? Few other provisions of the SCRA turn on such arbitrarily imposed distinctions.

Likewise, no protections would be afforded servicemembers who are called up to replace those mobilized and who take their places, yet are not on a humanitarian mission, and those who face military absence due to the nature of the mission – an "unaccompanied tour." There is no reason why these members of the military should face disparate treatment.

On a separate point, all of the service branches (Army, Navy, Air Force, Coast Guard and Marine Corps) have been developing new Family Care Plan instructions designed to encourage servicemembers to create explicit plans for the handling of child custody issues and other family matters in the event of deployment. Going forward, the revised Family Care Plan instructions, once completed by all the services, should prevent a number of these custody disputes from arising, further obviating a statutory fix that would be far worse than the problem.

Submitted By: Anita M. Ventrelli, Chair, Section of Family Law
Donald J. Guter, Chair, Standing Committee on Legal Assistance for Military Personnel

1. Summary of Recommendation(s).

The Section of Family Law and the Standing Committee on Legal Assistance for Military Personnel (LAMP) of the American Bar Association recommend to the ABA House of Delegates that the ABA urge Congress to oppose any federal legislation that would create a new federal law of child custody controlling resolution of child-custody disputes involving the custodial rights of servicemember-parents. They recommend opposition to such legislation to the extent that it would: create federal-question jurisdiction over these child custody cases; threaten existing procedural protections for American servicemembers found in the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act; co-opt the growing body of state laws that comprehensively address the domestic relations interests of servicemembers; and legislatively dictate outcomes and evidentiary burdens in child-custody cases, while compromising the best-interests-of-the-child standard.

2. Approval by Submitting Entity.

This Recommendation was approved by the Council of the Section of Family Law on October 2, 2008 and by the LAMP Committee on November 14, 2008.

3. Has this or a similar recommendation been submitted to the ABA House of Delegates or Board of Governors previously?

No

4. What existing Association policies are relevant to this recommendation and how would they be affected by its adoption?

This Recommendation is consistent with the American Bar Association's 1984 policy urging the legal profession to direct attention to issues affecting children, including the preservation of children's legal rights; the 1995 policy urging respect of the rights of all children in the United States; and the 1993 policy urging amendment of the former Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act to clarify and modernize the Act's protections of American servicemembers.

5. What urgency exists which requires action at this meeting of the House?
The latest iteration of the opposed legislation was introduced as part of the Fiscal Year 2009 National Defense Authorization Act. Only at the eleventh hour was this bill, along with other bills amending the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act, purged from the Defense Authorization Act. Congressional staff and observers who closely follow this subject expect the bill to be reintroduced in 2009. Action by the House at this time is necessary to have an influence on Senate and Congressional action.

6. Status of Legislation. (If applicable.)

The opposed bill, section 4510 of H.R. 5658, would have amended 50 U.S.C. App. § 521, the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act. It was introduced in the 110th Congress in 2008. It was not adopted as part of the final FY 2009 National Defense Authorization Act. It is not a currently pending bill, but is expected to be reintroduced.

7. Cost to the Association. (Both direct and indirect costs.)

None.

8. Disclosure of Interest. (If applicable.)

None.

9. Referrals. (List entities to which the recommendation has been referred, the date of referral and the response of each entity if known.)
The Resolution and Report were distributed to the following ABA entities on Nov. 13, 2008, with the request for their co-sponsorship:
Standing Committee on Armed Forces Law,
Standing Committee on Legal Aid and Indigent Defense (SLCAID),
Section of Litigation,
Center for Children and the Law,
General Practice, Solo, and Small Firm Division (Military Committee), Government and Public Sector Lawyers Division,

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

1. Summary of the Recommendation

The Recommendation calls for the American Bar Association to urge Congress to oppose legislation that would create a federal law of child custody controlling state custody cases involving servicemember-parents. The Recommendation urges that the legislation be stopped because it would dictate court outcomes in child custody cases, even where the child's best interests do not support that outcome; create federal-question jurisdiction over child custody cases, long the province of state courts; impose federally-mandated evidentiary burdens on state courts; co-opt the growing body of state laws that comprehensively and appropriately address domestic relations matters affecting servicemembers; and cast doubt on existing servicemember protections found in the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act (SCRA), 50 U.S.C. App. §§ 501-596.

2. Summary of the Issue that the Resolution Addresses

The issue arises from strong concern among child advocates, military legal assistance experts and others that the opposed legislation would inappropriately employ federal fiat to invade the province of the states by dictating court outcomes in child custody cases affecting deployed servicemembers. The opposed legislation provides that deployed servicemembers who had child custody at the time of their deployment would automatically have that custody restored upon their return, irrespective of other considerations affecting the best interests of the child. The opposed legislation would provide that custody could be denied to the returning servicemember in such a case only by a showing of "clear and convincing" evidence that it was not in the child's best interests. The opposed legislation improperly creates federal substantive law and evidentiary rules for custody determinations historically left to state courts. The opposed legislation would misuse the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act, the source of important procedural protections for servicemembers in litigation, to dictate substantive outcomes in custody cases. The legislation would cast doubt of the ample and adequate servicemember protections already found in the SCRA. The opposed legislation would create federal-question jurisdiction over these child custody cases, a role federal courts are ill-equipped to fulfill. The opposed legislation would pre-empt the emerging body of state laws that comprehensively and organically address servicemember domestic relations interests. The essence of the issue is that the opposed legislation is not in the interest of children or servicemembers.

3. Please Explain How the Proposed Policy Position will Address the Issue

The Proposed Policy would influence the United States Senate and the House of Representatives to oppose the legislation and thereby remove the threat to the interests of children and servicemembers posed thereby.

4. Summary of Minority Views

We are aware of no minority views within the ABA.

SENATOR BILL WIELECHOWSKI

Sponsor Statement: SB 214
Animal Cruelty

The intent of SB 214 is to ensure the most heinous crimes of animal cruelty are treated as felony offenses.

Since the 1970's there has been a documented link between those who abuse animals and offenders of domestic violence and other violent crimes. FBI reports going back to the 1970's show that most serial killers had a history of killing or torturing animals as children. Most victims of domestic violence also report animal abuse in their homes by their batterer.

Felony level penalties for the worst crimes of animal cruelty exist in 46 states. Alaska currently allows perpetrators three chances to commit these horrific crimes before charging them with a felony offence. As the links between animal abuse and domestic violence and other crimes against people become more clear, this bill can help prevent additional violent attacks on members of our communities.

SB 214 will amend the current statute to ensure that the most malicious acts of animal cruelty are treated as felony offenses.

Please join me in supporting this legislation to bring the animal cruelty code in Alaska up to the same standards as 46 other states.

THE HUMANE SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES

FactSheet

The Connection between Animal Cruelty and Human Violence

Research indicates that without strict intervention, people who abuse and kill animals are more likely to similarly abuse humans. Many of society's most infamous mass murderers, serial killers, and a significant percentage of spousal abusers initially target animals with their violent conduct. It is critical to interrupt the cycle of violence before it escalates. Passage of a felony-level animal cruelty law is a critical initial step in halting the progression of violent crime.

Animal cruelty is a predictor and indicator of other violent crimes.

- Acts of animal cruelty are linked to a variety of other crimes, including crimes of violence against humans, property crimes, and the commission of drug or disorderly conduct offenses (Arluke & Luke, 1997)

Animal abuse is associated with both domestic violence and child abuse.

- Pet abuse is a significant predictor of partners who will become batterers (Campbell, 2006).
- State and national surveys of domestic violence victims consistently find that as many as 71% of battered women report their partners threatened, or killed, the family pet (Ascione, 1995).
- The threat of animal abuse to silence child sex abuse victims has been a factor in a number of criminal convictions (Davidson, 1998).
- An early study found that there was animal abuse in 88% of families who were under State supervision due to the physical abuse of their children (DeViney, Dickert & Lockwood, 1983).

Animal cruelty often is an indicator that a child poses a risk to himself and or others.

- A U.S. Department of Justice supported longitudinal study beginning in 1987 found that animal abuse predicted which children would exhibit anti-social and aggressive behavior later childhood, adolescence, and then adulthood (Broidy, 2003).
- Animal cruelty is a warning sign for at-risk youth, according to the National School Safety Council, U. S. Department of Education, the American Psychological Association, and the National Crime Prevention Council.

Serial killers and school shooters have histories of abusing animals.

- Ted Bundy, Jeffrey Dahmer, Albert DeSalvo (the "Boston Strangler") and many others committed heinous acts of animal cruelty before brutally maiming and killing their human victims.
- Of 36 convicted multiple murderers questioned in an often-cited study, 46% admitted committing acts of animal torture as adolescents (Congressional Register, 1996).
- Over half of the school shooters were known to persistently abuse animals (Miner, 1999).

People want animal cruelty to be prosecuted.

- In a survey of over 1,000 representative U.S. households, 85% of those responding thought it was either "very important" or "important" to protect animals from cruelty (2006).

Forty-three states and the District of Columbia have enacted felony level penalties for egregious acts of animal cruelty. Please help strengthen the animal cruelty laws in your state.

Every Home A Safe Home

PETS AND DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

WHY IT MATTERS

Pets are not immune to domestic violence. Batterers frequently threaten, injure, maim, or kill their partners' or children's pets in conjunction with domestic abuse. Because victims understand the extent of the harm that their abusers will likely inflict upon their pets, many hesitate to leave violent relationships out of concern for the safety of their pets. When batterers abused victims, victims see the animal cruelty as part of a long history of violence aimed at them and their families.[1] Recognizing this, an increasing number of shelters have added kennels or instituted "safe haven" animal foster care programs in an effort to protect victims, their children, and their pets.

DID YOU KNOW?

- 71% of pet owners entering domestic violence shelters report that their batterer had threatened, injured, or killed family pets.[2]
- One study found that 87% of batterer-perpetrated incidents of pet abuse are committed in the presence of their partners for the purpose of revenge or control.[3]
- Studies show that up to 76% of batterer-perpetrated pet abuse incidents occur in the presence of children.[4]
- 13% of intentional animal abuse cases involve domestic violence.[5]
- Women in domestic violence shelters are 11 times more likely to report animal abuse by their partner than women not experiencing violence. [6]
- 85% of domestic violence shelters report that they commonly encounter women who speak about pet abuse incidents.[6]
- 52% of victims in shelters left their pets with their batterers.[6]
- Criminals and troubled youth have high rates of animal cruelty during their childhood, perpetrators often were victims of child abuse themselves.[7]
- Investigation of animal abuse is often the first point of social services intervention for a family experiencing domestic violence.[8]

THE LINK BETWEEN PET ABUSE AND DV

- Similar to domestic abuse, abusers demonstrate power and control over the family by threatening, harming, or killing animals.[8]
- Domestic violence victims whose batterers abuse their pets report more than twice as many incidents of child abuse as compared to domestic violence victims whose batterers have not abused their pets.[10]
- Batterers threaten, harm, or kill their children's pets in order to coerce them into sexual abuse or to force them to remain silent about abuse.[11]
- Abusers harm pets to punish the victim for leaving, or in attempts to coerce her/him to return.[17]
- Abusers may harm pets to retaliate for acts of self-determination or independence.[9]
- Animal abusers are more likely to be domestic violence abusers, to have been arrested for other violent crimes and drug-related offenses, and engage in other delinquent behavior.[6]
- Many abusers have a history of animal abuse that precedes domestic violence toward their partner.[12]
- Animals may sometimes be used as weapons against domestic violence victims.[6]

THE ROLE OF PETS

- Family pets are commonly viewed as family members and companions.
- 55% of domestic violence victims and their children report that their pets are very important sources of emotional support, thus violence toward pets may be especially devastating and viewed as another form of family violence.[13]
- A large majority of women residing in domestic violence shelters report being emotionally close to their pets and experience distress when their animals are abused.[6]
- Studies show that a vast majority of children who witness pet abuse become distressed and emotionally distraught.[6]
- Women without children are more likely to postpone seeking shelter out of concern for their pets' safety as compared to women with children, 33.3% versus 19.5%.[6]

BARRIERS TO SEEKING SERVICES

- 65% of women who report prior pet abuse continue to worry for their pets' welfare after entry into a shelter.[6]
- Up to 40% of domestic violence victims are unable to escape their abusers because they are concerned about what will happen to their pets when they leave.[14]
- Only 12% of domestic violence programs can provide shelter for pets and 24% provide referral services to local animal welfare organizations.[15]
- Victims of domestic violence have been known to live in their cars for as long as four months until an opening was available at a pet-friendly safe house or shelter.[16]

TIPS FOR VICTIMS WITH PETS[9]

- Some shelters allow pets and many others have established "safe haven" foster care programs for the animal victims of domestic violence.
- If it is not possible to take the animals when the victim leaves the home, try to arrange temporary shelter for the pets with a veterinarian, trusted friend or family member, or local animal shelter.
- When vaccinating pets against rabies and licensing them with the town or county, it is important that registrations are in the victim's name. This will serve as proof that the victim owns the pets.
- Prepare the pets for a quick departure: collect vaccination records, pet license, medical records, and other documents.
- Ask for help from animal care and control officers or law enforcement if pets need to be retrieved from the abuser. Never reclaim animals alone.

Pet hoarder hit with animal cruelty charges

CAT-RESCUE OWNER: Police say critters lived in squalid conditions.

By JAMES HALPIN
jhalpin@adn.com

(10/12/09 22:03:21)

The owner of a local cat-rescue nonprofit has been charged with 33 counts of animal cruelty after Anchorage police say they found dozens of cats, dogs and birds sick and wallowing in their own waste at her home and shelter.

Police say Deborah Ann Allen, 54, has for years hoarded cats and dogs, turtles, birds, lizards and a rabbit, cramming the critters in her cluttered Sand Lake home that reeked of feces and urine and had swarms of flies inside.

When police searched her home at 7101 Kitlisa Drive last Tuesday, they found 23 cats, eight dogs and one bird, many of them malnourished, dirty and with untreated injuries, according to an affidavit filed in court by Detective Jackie Conn. At the Chateau Pampered Purr shelter in Midtown, a nonprofit run by Allen, authorities found 50 or more cats in similar straits.

"It's not unusual for (animal hoarders) to present themselves as rescuers," Conn said Monday. "Typically, I'd have to say most, if not all, of them have good intentions. But when you get so many animals in a small space, it's almost impossible to keep above the illnesses and that kind of thing. It's a difficult situation."

According to Conn's affidavit, city Animal Care and Control began citing Allen for neglecting her animals in October 2004. Since then, Animal Control has received at least eight complaints about unclean living conditions and five more for loose dogs and cats at the Allen properties.

"In multiple complaints animal control officers and sometimes APD officers have described a foul urine and feces smell that can be detected from outside of the house on Kitlisa. The house is described as having feces outside and inside on the ground," Conn wrote. "At least twice officers commented on swarms of flies in the house."

INSIDE THE HOUSE

Conn got a search warrant for the home Sept. 30 and served it last week. Officers entering the 3,500-square-foot home found it cluttered and dirty, some rooms so full of personal property they "could not be entered," according to the affidavit. Everything was covered in animal hair and kennels were strewn about the home.

Police say all the animals were found in a dimly lit two-car garage. There was no air circulation and a small animal door leading to an enclosure outside, the flooring of which was spattered in feces.

Many cats had respiratory problems, including eye and nose discharges, sneezing, coughing and labored breathing, according to police. Some appeared undernourished and one had a bad infection around its left ear, Conn wrote.

Dogs had matted, dirty fur and eye problems, and a cockatoo was missing all the feathers from its chest, police said. There was a large amount of food left in a communal feeder for the animals and the water was filthy.

One dog, a bull terrier, appeared in very poor health, with hair missing from his chest and belly, pus coming from his eye and red skin on his face. The affidavit said, "this dog matches the description of a dog that had skin issues in 2006 that Allen was not treating properly."

The animals were seized and brought to animal control. Lab tests were still pending on some of the animals from the home, so whether some or all will be euthanized was not known Monday.

50 MORE CATS, 2 LIZARDS

Police then went to search Chateau Pampered Purr at 611 Tudor Road on Tuesday. Allen's license to operate the nonprofit Chateau Pampered Purr expired in December 2007 but its operation continues, according to police.

"In contacts with Allen, she has told officer that she takes in strays," police Lt. Dave Parker said. "Apparently she operates a cat adoption clinic at Petco."

At the chateau, police found 50 or more cats and two lizards in filthy conditions and with similar health problems. The animals remain there because animal control, besieged by the influx of animals from the first round, had nowhere to put them, animal control spokeswoman Brooke Taylor said.

"We don't have facilities here for that many animals, so we're trying to decide what's the best course of action," Taylor said. "There's an issue with, if there is sickness, we can't have these animals in a location where our healthy population here at the center could be exposed to something, so that's a concern of ours. (Also) just basic space."

In the meantime, Conn hopes Allen is feeding them.

THE OLDER SISTER

Conn has dealt with a similar situation before.

Allen's sister, Krystal Renea Allen, 55, was convicted in an animal hoarding case from 2004 in which police found 165 cats covered in filth, many of them sickly. In that house there were also at least a dozen exotic birds in cages and a couple of dogs, and, out in the yard, chickens.

Krystal Allen told officers she meant well by taking in strays but it had gotten out of hand. She later pleaded no contest to two animal cruelty charges, was sentenced to 30 days in jail and ordered to pay a $1,000 fine.

Since her arrest Thursday, Deborah Allen has been freed on $750 bail. Allen did not return messages seeking comment. There was no answer at her home at the end of a dead-end, wooded street Monday night. Several cat-themed pieces of art decorated the cluttered porch. The smell of animal urine was noticeable.

Each misdemeanor animal-cruelty count carries a maximum penalty of one year in prison and a fine of up to $10,000. Allen, if convicted, could also be ordered to reimburse animal control for the cost of housing, feeding and veterinary care.

Animal Abuse and Domestic Violence

Concern that acts of animal abuse are connected with or are predictors of domestic violence prompted a number of specific research studies in the 1990s. This early work focused on describing interviews with women in battered women's shelters and highlighted the frequency with which women reported abuse of pets by their partners. The interviews documented a high rate of pet abuse and appeared to indicate that animal abuse in the home and concern for pets affected if and when a woman sought assistance at a shelter—particularly because shelters did not normally accept pets.

As more attention was given to animal abuse and its impact in the context of domestic violence assaults, additional studies were undertaken. Frank Ascione discussed the limitations of some of these past studies in his article, "Emerging Research on Animal Abuse as a Risk Factor for Intimate Partner Violence" in the Civic Research Institute's 2007 publication, Intimate Partner Violence. He noted that although twelve different studies found (1) a high rate of pet ownership by domestic violence victims in shelters, (2) a substantial rate of children's exposure to pet abuse, and (3) clear indications that domestic violence victims' concern for pets affected their decision to stay in or leave a relationship with a batterer, more research is needed that includes women in domestic violence situations who have not chosen to go to a shelter, in addition to women in shelters. In response to the concern expressed by battered women for their pets, many areas developed "safe haven" programs for free fostering of pets of victims of domestic violence. Anchorage is currently the only area in Alaska with a "safe haven" program. It is administered by Friends of Pets, a local nonprofit animal welfare group, in collaboration with the Abused Women's Aid in Crisis (AWAIC) shelter. Another local nonprofit, the Eva Foundation Pet's Program, provides post-shelter transition services to domestic violence victims and their pets.

In addition, since 2006 ten states have enacted domestic violence protective orders covering pets: California, Colorado, Connecticut, Illinois, Louisiana, Maine, Nevada, New York, Tennessee, and Vermont.

Research involving a larger sample population of women was reported by Ascione, et al. in 2007 in Violence Against Women, "Battered Pets and Domestic Violence: Animal Abuse Reported by Women Experiencing Intimate Partner Violence and Nonabused Women." The findings of this study agreed with earlier research about the high rate of pet abuse reported by victims of intimate partner violence (IPV). Responses showed that women in domestic violence shelters were nearly 11 times more likely to report that their partner had engaged in pet abuse than women who said they had not experienced intimate partner violence. This study again stressed the need for further research on co-occurring pet abuse and IPV with larger and more diverse populations, i.e., urban, suburban, and rural victims of intimate partner violence, as well as non-victims of IPV.

Catherine Simmons and Peter Lehman addressed some of these issues in a 2007 Journal of Interpersonal Violence article, "Exploring the Link Between Pet Abuse and Controlling Behaviors in Violent Relationships." In their study of 1,283 women who owned pets and were sheltered at an urban domestic violence center in Texas between 1998 and 2002, they concluded that "[m]en who abuse the family pet appear to be more dangerous than men who do not." The authors did not find that pet abuse was always a form of controlling behavior in incidents of domestic violence assault. However, they did conclude:

> Despite the limitations of this study, it is clear that animal cruelty is an important factor for domestic violence workers to address in assessment and treatment of both victim and perpetrator populations. Batterers who also abuse their pets are both more controlling and use more dangerous forms of violence than batterers who do not. Therefore, addressing whether pet abuse has occurred in the home can help workers in the domestic violence field better understand the behavior of the batterer and the overall risk they present to their partner.

Animal abuse is one factor in the complex dynamic of intimate partner violence, and can be used by law enforcement and domestic violence advocates in assessing risk. In 2008, the Anchorage Police Department (APD) began a program to target animal abuse and to look at its connection to domestic violence. Detective Jackie Conn was assigned as the liaison to the Anchorage Animal Care and Control Center and received training from the Law Enforcement Training Institute National Cruelty Investigations School and from the First Strike program developed by the Humane Society of the United States to raise awareness about the connection between animal cruelty and other violent crime. Detective Conn now trains APD personnel in recognizing animal abuse, and relating it to the possible presence of other types of abuse in the home. She works closely with Alaska Department of Law Assistant District Attorney Joan Wilson who is regularly assigned the prosecution of animal abuse cases. For the period 2002–2009, 121 misdemeanor animal cruelty cases under Alaska Statute 11.61.140 and 11.61.145 were referred and 94 prosecuted. During the same period, one felony case was referred and prosecuted. Case statistics are also being compiled to better understand the relationship between domestic violence and animal abuse.

Leading Causes of Death

A look at recent data on leading causes of death in Alaska and the U.S. shows that malignant neoplasms (cancer) and heart disease rank as the top two causes. Although intentional self-harm (suicide) and assault (homicide) do not rank in the U.S. top ten leading causes of death, they have ranked as leading causes of death in Alaska for many years. A comparison of rankings of suicide and homicide as causes of death for specific age groups in Alaska and the U.S. reveals some similarities in trends.

In 2008 in Alaska, suicide was ranked number 6 among the top ten causes of death for the entire population. Suicide has been ranked number 5 or 6 consistently for the past decade. Homicide has been reported as the number 8 cause of death in 1999, number 10 in 2001, and number 10 again in 2007. The rankings for the leading causes of death by specific age group in Alaska show that suicide and homicide are in the top five for each age group up to the age of 44. In Alaska, and the nation as a whole, people aged 15–34 are more likely to die in an accident, at the hands of another, or by suicide, than by cancer or heart disease. For the period 2005–2007, suicide and homicide were the second and third leading causes of death for both 15–24 and 25–34 year olds. Suicide was the second leading cause of death for 35–44 year olds, and homicide was fifth. Among 45–54 year olds, suicide was the fourth leading cause of death.

Nationally, suicide and homicide are not among the ten leading causes of death according to the most current final data available: 2006. However, suicide ranked number 11 in causes of death for the overall population for 2006; homicide ranked 15.

In the U.S. in 2006, homicide and suicide were the second and third leading causes of death, respectively, for 15–24 year olds, while for 25–34 year olds, suicide ranked second and homicide third. Suicide was the fourth leading cause of death for 35–44 year olds, and the fifth leading cause for 45–54 year olds. These rankings mirror those of Alaska for those aged 15–44, where both suicide and assault were in the top five leading causes of death. Suicide was one of the top five causes of death for 45–54 year olds.

This high ranking of suicide as a cause of death for 15–44 year olds is also seen globally. According to the World Health Organization, suicide is among the top three leading causes of death in 15-44 year olds. For the worldwide population, the top two leading causes of death are coronary heart disease, and stroke and other cerebrovascular diseases.

The leading causes of death for the overall population continue to be related to diseases of the body; however, the growing rate of suicide among young people and the suicide rate among other age groups, as well as the rate of homicide, are the focus of national and international study and prevention programs.

Dear Senator Wielechowski:

We are writing in support of SB214, an Act relating to penalties for cruelty to animals which acknowledges the strong correlation between animal abuse and family violence by holding perpetrators accountable who hurt or kill animals in order to intimidate, threaten, or terrorize another person.

Animals are often used as a tool of control in family violence situations where the threat of harm or killing the pets is used to coerce or terrorize victims. A 1997 national Survey or Shelters for Women Who are Battered (Utah State University, Ascione, et.al.) included these findings:

- 85.4% of women coming to shelter talked about incidents of pet abuse.
- 63% of children coming to shelter talked about incidents of pet abuse.
- 83% of advocates working in the shelter say they have observed the coexistence of domestic violence and pet abuse.

Alaska shelter directors and advocates tell us that these high correlations apply to Alaska. Often victims will try to bring animals with them to the shelter or board them at a humane society (if there is one in their community) in order to protect them. However, many also refuse to leave their home for the safety of a shelter due to the fear of harm or death of their pets while they are gone.

It is time to make it a crime in Alaska when someone uses or hurts and animal in order to control the actions of another person, especially when that person is a spouse, household member or child. Thank you again for recognizing and addressing this important issue.

Sincerely,

Sandy Samaniego

Dear Legislator:

On behalf of The Humane Society of the United States (The HSUS), the nation's largest animal protection organization with more than 18,000 members and constituents in Alaska, I am writing to urge you to support S.B. 214, to make the worst types of animal cruelty a felony on the first offense.

Numerous studies over the last 25 years have demonstrated that violent offenders frequently have childhood and adolescent histories of serious and repeated animal cruelty. The FBI has recognized the connection since the 1970s, when its analysis of the lives of serial killers suggested that most had killed or tortured animals as children. These crimes are so serious that allowing offenders a second and third chance to commit their atrocities is irresponsible and dangerous to society.

Just last month, "machete murderer" Christopher Erin Rogers, Jr., was sentenced to 498 years in prison for his horrific crimes. Charges against Rogers included misdemeanor animal cruelty charges for brutally slashing the dog that intervened, saving Elann Moren's life. While there can be no comparison between crimes against animals and such horrific murders, Rogers' acts have been described as "one psychotic episode." The same tendencies that motivated Rogers' murders also drove him to attack the dog. Accordingly, when other individuals brutally torture or maim animals, that same tendency should not be allowed to go essentially unchecked until it happens, is witnessed, and is successfully prosecuted three separate times.

Forty-six states have enacted felony level penalties for the most malicious acts of animal cruelty. Alaska is alone in requiring a third offense to trigger the felony clause.

Passage of a first offense felony animal cruelty law is an essential initial step in halting the progression of violent crime—against humans as well as animals. Enactment of S.B. 214 would bring Alaska's cruelty code in line with the rest of the country, and would protect Alaskan communities from the very worst animal abusers.

Sincerely,

Tami Santelli

Dear Senator Wielechowski:

On behalf of the Alaska Peace Officers Association (APOA), I would like to thank you for introducing Senate Bill 214, an act relating to penalties for cruelty to animals.

The APOA State Board of Directors recently reviewed this proposed legislation and decided to unanimously support this bill.

We thank you for addressing this issue. Please contact the APOA office in Anchorage at 277-0515, if there is anything our organization can do to assist in the passage of this bill.

LETTER IN SUPPORT OF SENATE BILL 214

Animal Legal Defense Fund

February 10, 2010

Senate Judiciary Committee
State Capitol
Juneau, AK 99801

Dear Chairman French and Members of the Committee:

I am the Director of Legislative Affairs and an attorney for the Animal Legal Defense Fund (ALDF).[1] ALDF was established as a national non-profit law organization in 1979, and is committed to protecting the lives and advancing the interests of animals through the legal system. We have over 100,000 supporters nationwide – many of whom call Alaska home.

I am writing to you today to express our strong support for Senate Bill 214, a bill to increase the penalties for the most serious forms of animal cruelty to the felony level. Currently, 46 states have enacted laws that include felony penalties for the very worst types of animal cruelty. Of these states, only 5, including Alaska, do not have felony penalties for first offenses – no matter how extreme the crime. SB 214 will ensure that the penalty fits the horrendous nature of these crimes. Not only are strong anti-cruelty laws important for the safety of our animals, they can also help to reduce other forms of violence in our communities. There is a strong correlation between those who engage in animal cruelty, and those who commit violence against humans. A seminal study by Northeastern University found that when compared to their neighbors, animal abusers were five times more likely to commit violent crimes against people, four times more likely to commit property crimes, and three times more likely to have a record for drug or disorderly-conduct offenses.[2]

Alaskans support laws to ensure that animals are treated humanely. SB 214 is an important, yet measured, step forward in this regard. It increases the penalties where appropriate and needed, yet preserves all existing exemptions for lawful activities.[3]

In addition, for the past four years, ALDF has published an annual ranking of all states and territories on the strength and comprehensiveness of their animal protection laws – and Alaska has consistently scored in the bottom tier of this report.[4] Passage of SB 214 will help improve Alaska's position, yet more importantly, its passage will send a strong message that Alaska is not a safe harbor for those who choose to torture and maliciously abuse animals. Please support this important bill.

Sincerely,

Stephan K. Otto, Esq.

Subject: Support passage of SB 214

I heartily support passage of Senator Wielechowski's SB 214, "An Act relating to penalties for cruelty to animals".

The values of a society are reflected in many ways, not least of which, by its laws. The more highly we have evolved as a society, the more we have sought to protect the most vulnerable and the disenfranchised. It is a mark of our progress as a culture and as a species. No longer is it permissible to own slaves, for wives to be beaten, for children to spend their childhood laboring in factories. These laws have not just protected the most vulnerable; they have strengthened the society as a whole, by recognizing and disallowing exploitation and cruelty. With laws outlawing certain despicable acts, society's bar for an acceptable standard of behavior is raised.

But here in Alaska, we have not set the bar adequately high with regard to treatment of helpless animals. The Animal Legal Defense Fund ranks Alaska in the bottom tier in the nation in terms of laws that protect animals. Is it just a coincidence that we also have among the highest rates of domestic violence, rape, and child abuse?

Treating a helpless animal cruelly is not a small crime, a petty offense, akin to a parking violation or a speeding ticket. It is a crime against another sentient animal that feels fear and pain. And some of these crimes against animals are so heinous they truly make you sick. It is wrong to consider these heinous crimes trivial, small, petty; misdemeanors.

Animals cannot speak out on their own behalf, lobby their representatives, cast a vote, or donate to a political campaign. But we need to protect them anyway. It is the right thing to do. Doing the right thing shows our strength and, in turn, makes us stronger as individuals and as a society. Please do the right thing and pass SB214.

Sincerely,

Andrea Veach

Subject: Alaska SPCA Endorses SB 214

Importance: High

Dear Senator Wielechowski:

Please accept this letter of strong support for Senate Bill No. 214, "An Act relating to penalties for cruelty to animals." The Alaska Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (Alaska SPCA) is a statewide animal welfare organization dedicated to the humane treatment of animals. In addition to the ongoing spay-neuter, rescue, and education-outreach programs that we and other animal welfare groups conduct, is the need for stronger anti-cruelty laws at the state level. We believe that the proposed felony provisions of SB214 are much needed and would be a significant deterrent to animal cruelty and abuse. They would also bring Alaska's state law more in line with many other states who have successfully made animal cruelty a felony. It is well-known that there is a strong link between domestic violence and animal cruelty. If passed, the provisions of SB214 have the potential to benefit domestic violence victims as well as animal victims.

Thank you very much for your commitment to this proposed legislation. We urge the Alaska Legislature as a whole to enthusiastically endorse and pass SB214.

Hello Shelly,

Please forward my written comments in support of SB214.

I am an Animal Shelter Assistant, and a resident of the state of Alaska , and I am in support of Alaska following suit with those states that consider cruelty against animals an unforgivable offense. Many people live with both physical abuse, and mental abuse when these offenders strike. Even if the abuse is not physical toward a human, it becomes a controlling measure in a household when the violence is directed toward a beloved animal of the victim. These acts are a definite link to the violence in our society, and can no longer be ignored.

I am writing in order to voice my strong support of the anti Animal Cruelty act in SB 214. It is a testimony to society's decency that its citizen's be held accountable for cruel and tortuous treatment of helpless animals. The disregard for animal welfare is strongly correlated to more deep seated psychological maladjustment and a true menace to the surrounding society at large. I vehemently urge your Office to approve the Bill under consideration which would increase the cruelty to animals penalty from the current misdemeanor status to the more serious rung of felony. Misdemeanors penalty does little to dissuade negative behavior, whereas a felony count would provide greater deterrent. Please do the right thing and see that this bill proceeds towards law.

Dear Ms. Morgan-

I understand that SB 214 is up for public hearing tomorrow afternoon. I won't be able to testify on the bill as I have a doctor's appointment at that time but I would like to convey our position in support of the bill. The Municipal Animal Control Advisory Board formally supported passage of this bill last year and, as the bill hasn't changed, our position hasn't either. We continue to support this proposal. The one reservation we had at the time is one I still have. There should be a specific exemption for licensed veterinarians performing euthanazia procedures. As currently written, a veterinarian can raise medical necessity as an affirmative defense against a cruelty charge arising from euthanizing an animal but could still be charged for having performed the procedure. While the likelihood of that occurring is pretty remote, we don't think Alaska's veterinarians should have that hanging over their heads. As such, we would recommend adding a protective exemption for veterinarians who are licensed and practicing in Alaska. We hope this input in helpful in considering the merits of the bill. If durther information is desired, please feel free to contact me.

SENATE BILL 214

Dear Senator Wielechowski,

As Alaska residents and members of the Alaska State Veterinary Medical Association Executive Board we lend unanimous support to Senate Bill 214.

We know the association between animal abuse and other forms of societal violence are nationally recognized. Threats or actions against companion animals are strong indicators that violence against human family members will follow. This bill will help guarantee such actions will be properly reported, investigated and prosecuted as a crime with serious consequences.

Innocent animals need strong voices like yours to speak for them. Thank you for your efforts and work on this legislation.

Honorable Senator Bill Wielechowski,

Thank you for your time and assistance in defending the rights of the State to make our laws pertaining to animal care resemble our society's current mood of treating animals with respect.

An act of animal cruelty law is a slap to mankind. The State of Alaska shouldn't bare the costs, if the perpetrator is found guilty. So my wife (Amanda Jensen) and I would appreciate the guilty abuser(s) pay all costs attributed to the care of the animal abused and in need of rescue.

Obviously those who are found to be guilty, ironically shouldn't be allowed to legally be able to repeat the pattern. So the State should impose a cooling off period of separation and instate counciling for those who cant understand the correlation of their actions. Perhaps obtain a psychological evaluation to present to a judge for future involvement with animals [other then hunting or subsistence].

I question euthanasia by mean of slow [lethal] painful means to also be considered abusive on a case by case basis. When the animals health is worse then the outcome of death and could be confirmed under autopsy.

My wife and I appreciate the opportunity to speak and would hope that this bill could have been more heavily advertised so as to respond more candid and also share with our other acquaintances to join in the discussion of this particular bill.

So in close we support any endeavors to give law enforcement every opportunity to thwart animal cruelty. How we interact with animals is vital to the sanity of our way.

Dear Senator French:

I strongly support SB 214 - Animal Cruelty sponsored by Senator Bill Wielechowski.

It is appalling to learn that the State of Alaska lags behind 46 other states that have felony penalties for first time animal cruelty offenders. It's hard to believe that in our state a perpetrator of malicious animal abuse is allowed to repeat animal cruelty three times before being convicted of a felony.

It is a well known fact as shown in case after case, animal abuse can escalate to domestic violence. The bully takes it out on those who are vulnerable. We need to break the abuse cycle before the perpetrator becomes a repeat offender.

Please support SB 214 which will amend the current statute to ensure that malicious acts of animal cruelty be treated as felony offenses.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

Penelope Wells

Senator Ellis,

I support SB214 and would like you support it also. It is my understanding 42 other states have stronger legislation than AK when it comes to cruelty against animals. Please support SB214. Thank you,

SB 214 –Animal Cruelty

Fact Sheet

PROBLEM:

- Currently, animal cruelty is a misdemeanor offense and only a Class C felony on the 3rd offense within 10 years. Alaska is the only state requiring a 3rd offense prior to triggering the felony clause and one of 5 states without felony on the first offense.

- 46 other states have felony level animal cruelty penalties.

- For the period 2002-2009, 121 misdemeanor animal cruelty cases under the Alaska Statute 11.61.140 and 11.61.145 were referred and 94 prosecuted- an average of 72 cases per year.

- SB 214 will amend the current statute to ensure that the most heinous acts of animal cruelty are a felony on the first offense.

STATUTORY SOLUTION:

- SB 214 creates a felony animal cruelty provision for:
  - Knowingly inflicting severe and prolonged physical pain or suffering on an animal, and
  - Killing or injuring an animal by the use of a decompression chamber or poison.

- In comparison, the punishment for serious injury of a person is typically a Class A or Class B felony and that for poisoning a person to death is an unclassified felony.

- SB 214 creates a Class A misdemeanor for first offense & Class C felony for second offense within 10 years for:

- Failing to care for an animal with criminal negligence resulting in death, severe pain or suffering, and
- Knowingly killing or injuring an animal with the intent to intimidate, threaten, or terrorize another person.

- Negligent child endangerment is a Class C felony and stalking is a Class A misdemeanor on the 1st offense and a Class C felony on the 2nd offense.

LINKING DOMESTIC VIOLENCE & ANIMAL CRUELTY:

- The link between animal cruelty and domestic violence and other violent crimes has been well documented since the FBI made a strong correlation in the 1970's.

- Over 70% of pet owners entering domestic violence shelters report that their batterer had threatened, injured, or killed family pets.

- Nearly 90% of violent attacks on animals are committed in the presence of a partner or family member to seek revenge or control.

- During 2008, over 8,000 Alaskans sought help in victim service programs due to domestic violence in their homes.

- Animal cruelty often is an indicator that an individual poses a risk to oneself and or others. Studies show that animal abuse often predicts which children will exhibit anti-social and aggressive behavior later in childhood, adolescence, and adulthood. Serial killers and school shooters often have histories of abusing animals.

- Acts of animal cruelty are linked to a variety of other crimes, including crimes of violence against humans, property crimes, drug dealing or other disorderly conduct offenses.

- Women in domestic violence shelters are 11 times more likely to report animal abuse by their partner than women not experiencing violence.

- SB 214 provides an opportunity to prevent further violent acts in our community by identifying these individuals before they can do more harm to humans.

Re: Letter of Support
SB 214 – An Act Relating to Animal Cruelty

Dear Senator Wielechowski:

On behalf of the eighteen domestic violence and sexual assault member organizations throughout the state that comprise the Alaska Network on Domestic Violence & Sexual Assault, we submit this letter of support for SB 214 - An Act Relating to Cruelty.

SB 214 changes the current Class A misdemeanor animal cruelty provision relating to a perpetrator who "knowingly kills or injures an animal . . . with the intent to intimidate, threaten, or terrorize another person" to a Class C felony, if the person has been previously convicted within the last 10 years.

The link between pet abuse and domestic violence is well-documented and has been a subject studied in increasing detail over the past ten years. Scholarly studies cited by the National Coalition to End Domestic Violence provide evidence of this:

- 71% of pet owners entering domestic violence shelters report that their batterer had threatened, injured, or killed family pets.
- 87% of batterer-perpetrated incidents of pet abuse are committed in the presence of their partners for the purpose of revenge or control.
- Similar to domestic violence, abusers often threaten, harm, or kill animals as a means of demonstrating power and control over the family.[1]

In order to understand how a perpetrator of domestic violence may abuse animals as a means of intimidating, threatening, or terrorizing another person, it may help to briefly consider the elements of domestic violence. Domestic violence is most commonly defined as a pattern of coercive behaviors by which one person tries to control another person. Perpetrators who wish to control their victims' behavior may use animals to demonstrate and confirm dominance over the family. For instance, a perpetrator might beat a dog, or even kill it, and then say to a victim:

"Don't make me do this to you." Perpetrators may even use animals to degrade the victim through involvement in the abuse; in fact, a March 2008 incident in Indiana illustrates this sobering dynamic all too vividly: in this case, a father was jailed after forcing his seven-year-old young daughter to stab the family cat. [ii]

Although Alaska-specific studies have not been conducted, anecdotal evidence from shelter advocates suggests a similar prevalence of these issues in our state. In addition, we know from our work that when family pets are used as a weapon of control and dominance, the situation has reached a high lethality level. In response to this reality, many shelter programs have cooperative agreements with their local humane society chapters. In Juneau, for example, representatives from Gastineau Humane Society serve on the local Domestic Violence Task Force, and the AWARE shelter has a cooperative agreement with GHS allowing shelter residents to board their animals free of charge.

Thank you for sponsoring SB 214. Making this specific provision of the animal cruelty statutes a Class C felony will hold perpetrators who use pets as weapons accountable, keeping victims safe by reducing the lethality in these serious domestic violence situations.

Sincerely,

Peggy Brown, Executive Director

Alaska Statutes.
Title 11. Criminal Law
Chapter 61. Offenses Against Public Order
Section 140. Cruelty to Animals.

previous: Section 130. Misconduct Involving a Corpse. next: Section 145. Promoting An Exhibition of Fighting Animals.

AS 11.61.140. Cruelty to Animals.

(a) A person commits cruelty to animals if the person

(1) knowingly inflicts severe and prolonged physical pain or suffering on an animal;

(2) with criminal negligence, fails to care for an animal and, as a result, causes the death of the animal or causes severe physical pain or prolonged suffering to the animal;

(3) kills or injures an animal by the use of a decompression chamber; or

(4) intentionally kills or injures a pet or livestock by the use of poison.

(b) Each animal that is subject to cruelty to animals under (a)(1) - (4) of this section shall constitute a separate offense.

(c) It is a defense to a prosecution under this section that the conduct of the defendant

(1) was part of scientific research governed by accepted standards;

(2) constituted the humane destruction of an animal;

(3) conformed to accepted veterinary or animal husbandry practices;

(4) was necessarily incidental to lawful fishing, hunting or trapping activities;

(5) conformed to professionally accepted training and discipline standards.

(d) In (a)(2) of this section, failure to provide the minimum standards of care for an animal under AS 03.55.100 is prima facie evidence of failure to care for an animal.

(e) This section does not apply to generally accepted dog mushing or pulling contests or practices or rodeos or stock contests.

(f) Cruelty to animals is a class A misdemeanor. The court may also

(1) require forfeiture of any animal affected to the state or to a custodian that supplies shelter, care, or medical treatment for the animal;

(2) require the defendant to reimburse the state or a custodian for all reasonable costs incurred in providing necessary shelter, care, veterinary attention, or medical treatment for any animal affected;

(3) prohibit or limit the defendant's ownership, possession, or custody of animals for up to 10 years.

CS FOR SENATE BILL NO. 222(JUD)

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE - SECOND SESSION

BY THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Offered:
Referred:

Sponsor(s): SENATE RULES COMMITTEE BY REQUEST OF THE GOVERNOR

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to the crimes of harassment, distribution and possession of child pornography, and distribution of indecent material to a minor; relating to suspending imposition of sentence and conditions of probation or parole for human trafficking or for certain sex offenses; relating to aggravating factors in sentencing; relating to reporting of crimes; relating to administrative subpoenas for certain records involving exploitation of children; amending Rule 16, Alaska Rules of Criminal Procedure; and providing for an effective date."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 11.56.759(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of violation by sex offender of condition of probation [OR PAROLE] if the person

(1) is on probation [OR PAROLE] for conviction of a sex offense;

(2) has served the entire term of incarceration imposed for conviction of the sex offense; and

(3) [EITHER

(A)] violates a condition of probation imposed under AS 12.55.100(a)(5), (a)(6), or (e), 12.55.101(a)(1), or any other condition imposed by the court that the court finds to be specifically related to the defendant's offense [; OR

(B) VIOLATES A CONDITION OF PAROLE IMPOSED UNDER AS 33.16.150(a)(3), (a)(4), (a)(6), (a)(13), (b)(4), (b)(11), OR (f)].

 Sec. 2. AS 11.56.759(c) is amended to read:

(c) Violation by sex offender of condition of probation [OR PAROLE] is a class A misdemeanor.

 Sec. 3. AS 11.61.118(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of harassment in the first degree if

(1) the person violates AS 11.61.120(a)(5) and the offensive physical contact is contact with human or animal blood, mucus, saliva, semen, urine, vomitus, or feces; or

(2) under circumstances not proscribed under AS 11.41.434 - 11.41.440, the person violates AS 11.61.120(a)(5) and the offensive physical contact is contact by the person touching through clothing another person's genitals, buttocks, or female breast.

 Sec. 4. AS 11.61.125(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of distribution of child pornography if the person distributes in this state or advertises, promotes, solicits, or offers to distribute in this state [BRINGS OR CAUSES TO BE BROUGHT INTO THE STATE FOR DISTRIBUTION, OR IN THE STATE DISTRIBUTES, OR IN THE STATE POSSESSES, PREPARES, PUBLISHES, OR PRINTS WITH INTENT TO DISTRIBUTE,] any material that is proscribed under AS 11.61.127 [VISUALLY OR AURALLY DEPICTS CONDUCT DESCRIBED IN AS 11.41.455(a), KNOWING THAT THE PRODUCTION OF THE MATERIAL INVOLVED THE USE OF A CHILD UNDER 18 YEARS OF AGE WHO ENGAGED IN THE CONDUCT].

 Sec. 5. AS 11.61.127(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of possession of child pornography if the person knowingly possesses or knowingly accesses on a computer with intent to view any material that visually [OR AURALLY] depicts conduct described in AS 11.41.455(a) knowing that the production of the material involved the use of a child under 18 years of age who engaged in the conduct or a depiction of a part of an actual child under 18 years of age who, by manipulation, creation, or modification, appears to be engaged in the conduct.

 Sec. 6. AS 11.61.127(c) is amended to read:

(c) Each film, audio, video, electronic, or electromagnetic recording, photograph, negative, slide, book, newspaper, magazine, or other material that visually or aurally depicts conduct described in AS 11.41.455(a) that is possessed or accessed in violation of (a) of this section [BY A PERSON KNOWING THAT THE PRODUCTION OF THE MATERIAL INVOLVED THE USE OF A CHILD UNDER 18 YEARS OF AGE THAT ENGAGED IN THE CONDUCT] is a separate violation of this section.

 Sec. 7. AS 11.61.127 is amended by adding new subsections to read:

(e) In a prosecution under (a) of this section, it is an affirmative defense that the person

(1) possessed or accessed fewer than three depictions described in (a) of this section; and

(2) without allowing any person other than a law enforcement agency to view the depictions, either took reasonable steps to destroy the depictions, or reported the matter to a law enforcement agency and allowed the agency access to the depictions.

(f) In this section, "computer" has the meaning given in AS 11.46.990.

(g) In a prosecution under (a) of this section, the prosecution is not required to prove the identity of a minor depicted or that the defendant knew the identity of a minor depicted.

 Sec. 8. AS 11.61.128(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of [ELECTRONIC] distribution of indecent material to minors if

(1) the person, being 18 years of age or older, knowingly distributes to another person [BY COMPUTER] any material that depicts the following actual or simulated conduct:

(A) sexual penetration;

(B) the lewd touching of a person's genitals, anus, or female breast;

(C) masturbation;

(D) bestiality;

(E) the lewd exhibition of a person's genitals, anus, or female breast; or

(F) sexual masochism or sadism; [AND]

(2) the material is harmful to minors; and

(3) either

(A) the other person is a child under 16 years of age; or

(B) the person believes that the other person is a child under 16 years of age.

* Sec. 9. AS 11.61.128(c) is amended to read:

(c) Except as provided in (d) of this section, [ELECTRONIC] distribution of indecent material to minors is a class C felony.

* Sec. 10. AS 11.61.128(d) is amended to read:

(d) Distribution [ELECTRONIC DISTRIBUTION] of indecent material to minors is a class B felony if the defendant was, at the time of the offense, required to register as a sex offender or child kidnapper under AS 12.63 or a similar law of another jurisdiction.

* Sec. 11. AS 11.61.128 is amended by adding a new subsection to read:

(e) In this section, "harmful to minors" means

(1) the average individual, applying contemporary community standards, would find that the material, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest in sex for persons under 16 years of age;

(2) a reasonable person would find that the material, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, educational, political, or scientific value for persons under 16 years of age; and

(3) the material depicts actual or simulated conduct in a way that is patently offensive to the prevailing standards in the adult community as a whole with respect to what is suitable for persons under 16 years of age.

 Sec. 12. AS 12.55.085(f) is amended to read:

(f) The court may not suspend the imposition of sentence of a person who

(1) is convicted of a violation of AS 11.41.100 - 11.41.220, 11.41.260 - 11.41.320, 11.41.360 - 11.41.370, 11.41.410 - 11.41.530, [OR] AS 11.46.400, or AS 11.61.125 - 11.61.128;

(2) uses a firearm in the commission of the offense for which the person is convicted; or

(3) is convicted of a violation of AS 11.41.230 - 11.41.250 or a felony and the person has one or more prior convictions for a misdemeanor violation of AS 11.41 or for a felony or for a violation of a law in this or another jurisdiction having [SUBSTANTIALLY] similar elements to an offense defined as a misdemeanor in AS 11.41 or as a felony in this state; for the purposes of this paragraph, a person shall be considered to have a prior conviction even if that conviction has been set aside under (e) of this section or under the equivalent provision of the laws of another jurisdiction.

 Sec. 13. AS 12.55.100(e) is repealed and reenacted to read:

(e) In addition to other conditions imposed on the defendant, while on probation and as a condition of probation

(1) for a sex offense, as described in AS 12.63.100, the defendant

(A) shall be required to submit to regular periodic polygraph examinations;

(B) may be required to provide each electronic mail address, instant messaging address, and other Internet communication identifier that the defendant uses to the defendant's probation officer; the probation officer shall forward those addresses and identifiers to the Alaska state troopers and to the local law enforcement agency;

(2) if the defendant was convicted of a violation of AS 11.41.434 - 11.41.455, AS 11.61.125 - 11.61.128, or a similar offense in another jurisdiction, the defendant may be required to refrain from

(A) using or creating an Internet site;

(B) communicating with children under 16 years of age; or

(C) possessing or using a computer.

 Sec. 14. AS 12.55.155(c)(5) is amended to read:

(5) the defendant knew or reasonably should have known that the victim of the offense was particularly vulnerable or incapable of resistance due to advanced age, disability, ill health, homelessness, consumption of alcohol or drugs, or extreme youth or was for any other reason substantially incapable of exercising normal physical or mental powers of resistance;

 Sec. 15. AS 12.55.155(c)(18) is amended to read:

(18) the offense was a felony

(A) specified in AS 11.41 and was committed against a spouse, a former spouse, or a member of the social unit made up of those living together in the same dwelling as the defendant;

(B) specified in AS 11.41.410 - 11.41.458 and the defendant has engaged in the same or other conduct prohibited by a provision of AS 11.41.410 - 11.41.460 involving the same or another victim; [OR]

(C) specified in AS 11.41 that is a crime involving domestic violence and was committed in the physical presence or hearing of a child under 16 years of age who was, at the time of the offense, living within the residence of the victim, the residence of the perpetrator, or the residence where the crime involving domestic violence occurred;

(D) specified in AS 11.41 and was committed against a person with whom the defendant has a dating relationship or with whom the defendant has engaged in a sexual relationship; or

(E) specified in AS 11.41.434 - 11.41.458 or AS 11.61.128 and the defendant was 10 or more years older than the victim;

 Sec. 16. AS 12.63.100(6) is amended to read:

(6) "sex offense" means

(A) a crime under AS 11.41.100(a)(3), or a similar law of another jurisdiction, in which the person committed or attempted to commit a sexual offense, or a similar offense under the laws of the other jurisdiction; in this subparagraph, "sexual offense" has the meaning given in AS 11.41.100(a)(3);

(B) a crime under AS 11.41.110(a)(3), or a similar law of another jurisdiction, in which the person committed or attempted to commit one of the following crimes, or a similar law of another jurisdiction:

(i) sexual assault in the first degree;

(ii) sexual assault in the second degree;

(iii) sexual abuse of a minor in the first degree; or

(iv) sexual abuse of a minor in the second degree; or

(C) a crime, or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit a crime, under the following statutes or a similar law of another jurisdiction:

(i) AS 11.41.410 - 11.41.438;

(ii) AS 11.41.440(a)(2);

(iii) AS 11.41.450 - 11.41.458;

(iv) AS 11.41.460 if the indecent exposure is before a person under 16 years of age and the offender has a previous conviction for that offense;

(v) AS 11.61.125 - 11.61.128;

(vi) AS 11.66.110 or 11.66.130(a)(2) if the person who was induced or caused to engage in prostitution was 16 or 17 years of age at the time of the offense; [OR]

(vii) former AS 11.15.120, former 11.15.134, or assault with the intent to commit rape under former AS 11.15.160, former AS 11.40.110, or former 11.40.200; or

(viii) AS 11.61.118(a)(2) if the offender has a previous conviction for that offense;

* Sec. 17. AS 44.23 is amended by adding a new section to read:

Sec. 44.23.080. Subpoena power of attorney general in cases involving use of an Internet service account in the exploitation of children. (a) In an investigation of an offense under AS 11.41.452, 11.41.455, or AS 11.61.125 - 11.61.128 and on reasonable cause to believe that an Internet service account has been used in the exploitation or attempted exploitation of children, the attorney general may issue in writing and cause to be served a subpoena requiring the production and testimony described in (b) of this section.

(b) A person receiving a subpoena under (a) of this section shall disclose, for the account that is the subject of the subpoena,

(1) the name of the person holding the account;

(2) the address associated with the account;

(3) local and long distance telephone connection records, including records of session times and durations for the account;

(4) length of service, including service start date, and types of service used by the account;

(5) the telephone or instrument number or other subscriber number or identifier, including any temporarily assigned network address for the account; and

(6) the means and source of payment for the service, including a credit card or bank account number associated with the account.

(c) At any time before the return date specified on the subpoena, the subpoenaed person may petition a court of competent jurisdiction for the judicial district in which the person resides or does business for an order modifying or setting aside the subpoena or for an order sealing the court record.

(d) A subpoena under this section must describe the objects required to be produced and must prescribe a return date with a reasonable period of time within which the objects must be assembled and produced.

(e) If no case or proceeding arises from the production of records or other documents under this section within a reasonable time after those records or documents are produced, the attorney general shall either destroy the records and documents or return them to the person who produced them.

(f) A subpoena issued under this section may be served as provided for service of subpoenas under Rule 45, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure, or for service of process under Rule 4, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure.

(g) Except as provided in this section, any information, records, or data reported or obtained under a subpoena under this section shall remain confidential and may not be disclosed unless the disclosure occurs in connection with a criminal case related to the subpoenaed materials.

 Sec. 18. AS 44.41.020(c) is amended to read:

(c) The department shall establish, and may require state and local law enforcement agencies to use, standardized methods of collecting and recording law enforcement and crime statistics. At a minimum, the department shall require reporting from law enforcement agencies of each type of felony sexual offense proscribed in the state.

 Sec. 19. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

DIRECT COURT RULE AMENDMENT. Rule 16(b), Alaska Rules of Criminal Procedure, is amended by adding a new paragraph to read:

(9) Restriction on Availability of Certain Material or Property. Notwithstanding (b)(1)(A)(iv) of this rule, the court shall deny any request by the defendant to copy, photograph, duplicate, or otherwise reproduce any property or material that may be illegal or prohibited under AS 11.41.455(a) or defined as "child pornography" under 18 U.S.C. 2256, provided the prosecution makes the property or material reasonably available to the defendant. Property or material shall be deemed to be made reasonably available to the defendant if the prosecution provides, at a prosecution or law enforcement facility, ample opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination of the property or material by the defendant, the defendant's attorney, and any individual the defendant may seek to qualify to furnish expert testimony at trial.

 Sec. 20. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

APPLICABILITY. (a) Sections 1 - 16 of this Act apply to offenses committed on or after the effective date of this Act.

(b) Sections 17 and 19 of this Act apply to offenses committed before, on, or after the effective date of this Act.

* Sec. 21. This Act takes effect July 1, 2010.

CS FOR SENATE BILL NO. 222(JUD)

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SIXTH LEGISLATURE - SECOND SESSION

BY THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Offered:
Referred:

Sponsor(s): SENATE RULES COMMITTEE BY REQUEST OF THE GOVERNOR

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to the crimes of harassment, distribution and possession of child pornography, and distribution of indecent material to a minor; relating to suspending imposition of sentence and conditions of probation or parole for human trafficking or for certain sex offenses; relating to aggravating factors in sentencing; relating to registration as a sex offender or child kidnapper; relating to reporting of crimes; relating to administrative subpoenas for certain records involving exploitation of children; amending Rule 16, Alaska Rules of Criminal Procedure; and providing for an effective date."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 11.56.759(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of violation by sex offender of condition of probation [OR PAROLE] if the person

(1) is on probation [OR PAROLE] for conviction of a sex offense;

(2) has served the entire term of incarceration imposed for conviction of the sex offense; and

(3) [EITHER

(A)] violates a condition of probation imposed under AS 12.55.100(a)(5), (a)(6), or (e), 12.55.101(a)(1), or any other condition imposed by the court that the court finds to be specifically related to the defendant's offense [; OR

(B) VIOLATES A CONDITION OF PAROLE IMPOSED UNDER AS 33.16.150(a)(3), (a)(4), (a)(6), (a)(13), (b)(4), (b)(11), OR (f)].

 Sec. 2. AS 11.56.759(c) is amended to read:

(c) Violation by sex offender of condition of probation [OR PAROLE] is a class A misdemeanor.

 Sec. 3. AS 11.56.840 is repealed and reenacted to read:

Sec. 11.56.840. Failure to register as a sex offender or child kidnapper in the second degree. (a) A person commits the crime of failure to register as a sex offender or child kidnapper in the second degree if the person

(1) is required to register under AS 12.63.010;

(2) knows that the person is required to register under AS 12.63.010; and

(3) fails to

(A) register;

(B) file written notice of

(i) change of residence;

(ii) change of mailing address;

(iii) establishment of an electronic or messaging address or any change to an electronic or messaging address; or

(iv) establishment of an Internet communication identifier or any change to an Internet communication identifier;

(C) file the annual or quarterly written verification; or

(D) supply accurate and complete information required to be submitted under this paragraph.

(b) In a prosecution for failure to register as a sex offender in the second degree under (a) of this section, it is an affirmative defense that

(1) unforeseeable circumstances, outside the control of the person, prevented the person from registering under (a)(3)(A) of this section or filing or supplying the written notices, verification, and other information required under (a)(3)(B) - (D) of this section; and

(2) the person contacted the Department of Public Safety orally and in writing immediately upon being able to perform the requirements described in this section.

(c) Failure to register as a sex offender or child kidnapper in the second degree is a class A misdemeanor.

 Sec. 4. AS 11.61.118(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of harassment in the first degree if

(1) the person violates AS 11.61.120(a)(5) and the offensive physical contact is contact with human or animal blood, mucus, saliva, semen, urine, vomitus, or feces; or

(2) under circumstances not proscribed under AS 11.41.434 - 11.41.440, the person violates AS 11.61.120(a)(5) and the offensive physical contact is contact by the person touching through clothing another person's genitals, buttocks, or female breast.

 Sec. 5. AS 11.61.125(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of distribution of child pornography if the person distributes in this state or advertises, promotes, solicits, or offers to distribute in this state [BRINGS OR CAUSES TO BE BROUGHT INTO THE STATE FOR DISTRIBUTION, OR IN THE STATE DISTRIBUTES, OR IN THE STATE POSSESSES, PREPARES, PUBLISHES, OR PRINTS WITH INTENT TO DISTRIBUTE,] any material that is proscribed under AS 11.61.127 [VISUALLY OR AURALLY DEPICTS CONDUCT DESCRIBED IN AS 11.41.455(a), KNOWING THAT THE PRODUCTION OF THE MATERIAL INVOLVED THE USE OF A CHILD UNDER 18 YEARS OF AGE WHO ENGAGED IN THE CONDUCT].

 Sec. 6. AS 11.61.127(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of possession of child pornography if the person knowingly possesses or knowingly accesses on a computer with intent to view any material that visually [OR AURALLY] depicts conduct described in AS 11.41.455(a) knowing that the production of the material involved the use of a child under 18 years of age who engaged in the conduct or a depiction of a part of an actual child under 18 years of age who, by manipulation, creation, or modification, appears to be engaged in the conduct.

 Sec. 7. AS 11.61.127(c) is amended to read:

(c) Each film, audio, video, electronic, or electromagnetic recording, photograph, negative, slide, book, newspaper, magazine, or other material that visually or aurally depicts conduct described in AS 11.41.455(a) that is possessed or accessed in violation of (a) of this section [BY A PERSON KNOWING THAT THE PRODUCTION OF THE MATERIAL INVOLVED THE USE OF A CHILD UNDER 18 YEARS OF AGE THAT ENGAGED IN THE CONDUCT] is a separate violation of this section.

 Sec. 8. AS 11.61.127 is amended by adding new subsections to read:

(e) In a prosecution under (a) of this section, it is an affirmative defense that the person

(1) possessed or accessed fewer than three depictions described in (a) of this section; and

(2) without allowing any person other than a law enforcement agency to view the depictions, either took reasonable steps to destroy the depictions, or reported the matter to a law enforcement agency and allowed the agency access to the depictions.

(f) In this section, "computer" has the meaning given in AS 11.46.990.

(g) In a prosecution under (a) of this section, the prosecution is not required to prove the identity of a minor depicted or that the defendant knew the identity of a minor depicted.

 Sec. 9. AS 11.61.128(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of [ELECTRONIC] distribution of indecent material to minors if

(1) the person, being 18 years of age or older, knowingly distributes to another person [BY COMPUTER] any material that depicts the following actual or simulated conduct:

(A) sexual penetration;

(B) the lewd touching of a person's genitals, anus, or female breast;

(C) masturbation;

(D) bestiality;

(E) the lewd exhibition of a person's genitals, anus, or female breast; or

(F) sexual masochism or sadism; [AND]

(2) the material is harmful to minors; and

(3) either

(A) the other person is a child under 16 years of age; or

(B) the person believes that the other person is a child under 16 years of age.

* Sec. 10. AS 11.61.128(c) is amended to read:

(c) Except as provided in (d) of this section, [ELECTRONIC] distribution of indecent material to minors is a class C felony.

* Sec. 11. AS 11.61.128(d) is amended to read:

(d) Distribution [ELECTRONIC DISTRIBUTION] of indecent material to minors is a class B felony if the defendant was, at the time of the offense, required to register as a sex offender or child kidnapper under AS 12.63 or a similar law of another jurisdiction.

* Sec. 12. AS 11.61.128 is amended by adding a new subsection to read:

(e) In this section, "harmful to minors" means

(1) the average individual, applying contemporary community standards, would find that the material, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest in sex for persons under 16 years of age;

(2) a reasonable person would find that the material, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, educational, political, or scientific value for persons under 16 years of age; and

(3) the material depicts actual or simulated conduct in a way that is patently offensive to the prevailing standards in the adult community as a whole with respect to what is suitable for persons under 16 years of age.

 Sec. 13. AS 12.55.085(f) is amended to read:

(f) The court may not suspend the imposition of sentence of a person who

(1) is convicted of a violation of AS 11.41.100 - 11.41.220, 11.41.260 - 11.41.320, 11.41.360 - 11.41.370, 11.41.410 - 11.41.530, [OR] AS 11.46.400, or AS 11.61.125 - 11.61.128;

(2) uses a firearm in the commission of the offense for which the person is convicted; or

(3) is convicted of a violation of AS 11.41.230 - 11.41.250 or a felony and the person has one or more prior convictions for a misdemeanor violation of AS 11.41 or for a felony or for a violation of a law in this or another jurisdiction having [SUBSTANTIALLY] similar elements to an offense defined as a misdemeanor in AS 11.41 or as a felony in this state; for the purposes of this paragraph, a person shall be considered to have a prior conviction even if that conviction has been set aside under (e) of this section or under the equivalent provision of the laws of another jurisdiction.

 Sec. 14. AS 12.55.100(e) is repealed and reenacted to read:

(e) In addition to other conditions imposed on the defendant, while on probation and as a condition of probation

(1) for a sex offense, as described in AS 12.63.100, the defendant

(A) shall be required to submit to regular periodic polygraph examinations;

(B) may be required to provide each electronic mail address, instant messaging address, and other Internet communication identifier that the defendant uses to the defendant's probation officer; the probation officer shall forward those addresses and identifiers to the Alaska state troopers and to the local law enforcement agency;

(2) if the defendant was convicted of a violation of AS 11.41.434 - 11.41.455, AS 11.61.125 - 11.61.128, or a similar offense in another jurisdiction, the defendant may be required to refrain from

(A) using or creating an Internet site;

(B) communicating with children under 16 years of age; or

(C) possessing or using a computer.

 Sec. 15. AS 12.55.155(c)(5) is amended to read:

(5) the defendant knew or reasonably should have known that the victim of the offense was particularly vulnerable or incapable of resistance due to advanced age, disability, ill health, homelessness, consumption of alcohol or drugs, or extreme youth or was for any other reason substantially incapable of exercising normal physical or mental powers of resistance;

 Sec. 16. AS 12.55.155(c)(18) is amended to read:

(18) the offense was a felony

(A) specified in AS 11.41 and was committed against a spouse, a former spouse, or a member of the social unit made up of those living together in the same dwelling as the defendant;

(B) specified in AS 11.41.410 - 11.41.458 and the defendant has engaged in the same or other conduct prohibited by a provision of AS 11.41.410 - 11.41.460 involving the same or another victim; [OR]

(C) specified in AS 11.41 that is a crime involving domestic violence and was committed in the physical presence or hearing of a child under 16 years of age who was, at the time of the offense, living within the residence of the victim, the residence of the perpetrator, or the residence where the crime involving domestic violence occurred;

(D) specified in AS 11.41 and was committed against a person with whom the defendant has a dating relationship or with whom the defendant has engaged in a sexual relationship; or

(E) specified in AS 11.41.434 - 11.41.458 or AS 11.61.128 and the defendant was 10 or more years older than the victim;

 Sec. 17. AS 12.63.100(6) is amended to read:

(6) "sex offense" means

(A) a crime under AS 11.41.100(a)(3), or a similar law of another jurisdiction, in which the person committed or attempted to commit a sexual offense, or a similar offense under the laws of the other jurisdiction; in this subparagraph, "sexual offense" has the meaning given in AS 11.41.100(a)(3);

(B) a crime under AS 11.41.110(a)(3), or a similar law of another jurisdiction, in which the person committed or attempted to commit one of the following crimes, or a similar law of another jurisdiction:

(i) sexual assault in the first degree;

(ii) sexual assault in the second degree;

(iii) sexual abuse of a minor in the first degree; or

(iv) sexual abuse of a minor in the second degree; or

(C) a crime, or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit a crime, under the following statutes or a similar law of another jurisdiction:

(i) AS 11.41.410 - 11.41.438;

(ii) AS 11.41.440(a)(2);

(iii) AS 11.41.450 - 11.41.458;

(iv) AS 11.41.460 if the indecent exposure is before a person under 16 years of age and the offender has a previous conviction for that offense;

(v) AS 11.61.125 - 11.61.128;

(vi) AS 11.66.110 or 11.66.130(a)(2) if the person who was induced or caused to engage in prostitution was 16 or 17 years of age at the time of the offense; [OR]

(vii) former AS 11.15.120, former 11.15.134, or assault with the intent to commit rape under former AS 11.15.160, former AS 11.40.110, or former 11.40.200; or

(viii) AS 11.61.118(a)(2) if the offender has a previous conviction for that offense;

* Sec. 18. AS 44.23 is amended by adding a new section to read:

Sec. 44.23.080. Subpoena power of attorney general in cases involving use of an Internet service account in the exploitation of children. (a) In an investigation of an offense under AS 11.41.452, 11.41.455, or AS 11.61.125 - 11.61.128 and on reasonable cause to believe that an Internet service account has been used in the exploitation or attempted exploitation of children, the attorney general may issue in writing and cause to be served a subpoena requiring the production and testimony described in (b) of this section.

(b) A person receiving a subpoena under (a) of this section shall disclose, for the account that is the subject of the subpoena,

(1) the name of the person holding the account;

(2) the address associated with the account;

(3) local and long distance telephone connection records, including records of session times and durations for the account;

(4) length of service, including service start date, and types of service used by the account;

(5) the telephone or instrument number or other subscriber number or identifier, including any temporarily assigned network address for the account; and

(6) the means and source of payment for the service, including a credit card or bank account number associated with the account.

(c) At any time before the return date specified on the subpoena, the subpoenaed person may petition a court of competent jurisdiction for the judicial district in which the person resides or does business for an order modifying or setting aside the subpoena or for an order sealing the court record.

(d) A subpoena under this section must describe the objects required to be produced and must prescribe a return date with a reasonable period of time within which the objects must be assembled and produced.

(e) If no case or proceeding arises from the production of records or other documents under this section within a reasonable time after those records or documents are produced, the attorney general shall either destroy the records and documents or return them to the person who produced them.

(f) A subpoena issued under this section may be served as provided for service of subpoenas under Rule 45, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure, or for service of process under Rule 4, Alaska Rules of Civil Procedure.

(g) Except as provided in this section, any information, records, or data reported or obtained under a subpoena under this section shall remain confidential and may not be disclosed unless the disclosure occurs in connection with a criminal case related to the subpoenaed materials.

 Sec. 19. AS 44.41.020(c) is amended to read:

(c) The department shall establish, and may require state and local law enforcement agencies to use, standardized methods of collecting and recording law enforcement and crime statistics. At a minimum, the department shall require reporting from law enforcement agencies of each type of felony sexual offense proscribed in the state.

 Sec. 20. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

DIRECT COURT RULE AMENDMENT. Rule 16(b), Alaska Rules of Criminal Procedure, is amended by adding a new paragraph to read:

(9) Restriction on Availability of Certain Material or Property. Notwithstanding (b)(1)(A)(iv) of this rule, the court shall deny any request by the defendant to copy, photograph, duplicate, or otherwise reproduce any property or material that may be illegal or prohibited under AS 11.41.455(a) or defined as "child pornography" under 18 U.S.C. 2256, provided the prosecution makes the property or material reasonably available to the defendant. Property or material shall be deemed to be made reasonably available to the defendant if the prosecution provides, at a prosecution or law enforcement facility, ample opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination of the property or material by the defendant, the defendant's attorney, and any individual the defendant may seek to qualify to furnish expert testimony at trial.

 Sec. 21. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

LEGISLATIVE STATEMENT CONCERNING CULPABLE MENTAL STATE. In AS 11.56.840(a), as repealed and reenacted by sec. 3 of this Act, the only culpable mental state required to be proven by the prosecution is the "knowing" requirement in paragraph (2) of that subsection. No other culpable mental state needs to be proven for the other elements of that offense.

 Sec. 22. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

APPLICABILITY. (a) Sections 1 - 17 and 21 of this Act apply to offenses committed on or after the effective date of this Act.

(b) Sections 18 and 20 of this Act apply to offenses committed before, on, or after the effective date of this Act.

 Sec. 23. This Act takes effect July 1, 2010.

MEMORANDUM

Report and Recommendations: Reducing Sexual Assault in Alaska

Introduction:

Alaska has the highest reported rate of sexual assault in the United States. Between 2003 and 2007, Alaska's reported rate of forcible rape was over two and a half times the national average, with Anchorage reports at almost three times the national rate and Fairbanks reports at over five times the national rate. This does not include all sexual assaults in Alaska, since the definition used in the federal reporting system (the Uniform Crime Report) excludes child victims, male victims, and many other forms of sexual assault. Nevertheless, forcible rape is a greater percentage of all violent crimes reported in Alaska than it is nationally, at 12% of all violent crime in Alaska as opposed to 6% of violent crime in the United States on average.

Between 2003 and 2004, the Troopers received 1,184 reports of contact sexual violence cases involving forcible rape, sexual assault, or sexual abuse of a minor. Of those, some 884 were deemed to have occurred and to have an identifiable suspect. The troopers then turned over 449 cases, or about half, to the Department of Law for their screening. Of these, 271 were accepted for prosecution, and some 217 convictions resulted.

During hearings of the Senate Judiciary Committee conducted during 2009, committee members heard testimony as to what Alaska can do to reduce sexual assault and improve rates of prosecution and conviction.

The following issues were discussed:

A. Inadequate and inaccurate data:

1. The current system for tracking reports of sexual assault is inadequate at best. The Uniform Crime Report (UCR) excludes many kinds of sexual assault, making it unreliable, even for reported crimes. Not all police departments in Alaska provide information to the UCR, though they are statutorily required to do so. According to the Department of Public Safety, 41 local police departments failed to file the data needed for the Uniform Crime Report in 2007.

2. Alaska has never done a victimization study (a survey that includes both reported and unreported cases). Because of this, we do not know if Alaska's rates of sexual assault are higher, or the rate at which reports are made are higher, or both. So, for example, Fairbanks may have a very high rate of sexual violence, or it may be that citizens are simply more likely to report that violence, or it may be that both these things are true. Nationwide, it is estimated that 52% of sexual assaults are not reported to law enforcement. Without a victimization study, there is no way to know if this is also the case in Alaska.

3. Finally, the statistics that are available, largely collected through studies done by the Justice Center of the University of Alaska, show differences in the groups that are most likely to be victimized in various regions. For instance, a review of Alaska State Trooper cases showed that 94% reports are of victims who were 15 years of age or younger, while 73% of reports coming to the Anchorage Police Department are from victims aged 18 and older.

Recommendations:

- The legislature should fund a victimization survey to determine the actual rate of both reported and unreported sexual assaults in Alaska. This survey should be large enough to look at the state by region, so that programs and policies can be tailored to be most effective.

- Legislation should be enacted requiring the Department of Public Safety to collect annual statistics on reported sexual assault in Alaska as defined in state law. This legislation should require local police department participation.

- A data system should be developed to track sexual assaults from report to conviction. This will require interagency cooperation and so should be addressed by a group such as MAJIC or the Criminal Justice Working Group.

B. Certain resources have a disproportionate and positive impact on cases being accepted for prosecution, yet for the most part no consistent state policy has been implemented to ensure that these best practices are followed.

1. UAA Justice Center studies show that certain factors increase the likelihood of prosecution and conviction. These include the presence of a Village Pubic Safety Officer (VPSO), a Village Police Officer or Tribal Police Officer for crimes in villages. In State Trooper cases where a VPSO was available, rates of serious assault went down by 40% and the likelihood of the case being accepted for prosecution went up by three and a half times.

2. When victims received a medical-forensic exam, it more than doubled the likelihood that their case was accepted for prosecution. Documentation of non-genital injury was particularly important in the eventual decision to prosecute a case. However, of the 15 Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner programs that have been instituted in Alaska, only 4 are currently active.

3. In cases where witnesses were located and interviewed, and where appropriate investigative follow-up and victim support was done, the likelihood of prosecution increased by more than three times.

4. Finally, DNA evidence is becoming increasingly critical to sexual assault prosecutions and testimony indicated that there are significant delays and backlogs in getting this evidence processed in a timely way.

Recommendations:

- The legislature should continue to increase the number of villages with local law enforcement through the VPSO program.

- The legislature should consider grant funding for local hospitals to provide qualified Sexual Assault Nurse Examiners and to support the cost of existing programs. In addition, a pilot project which looks at the use of telemedicine in extending SANE services to rural communities without SANE nurses should be explored.

- Law enforcement agencies should prioritize sexual assault investigations so that investigators have the time to contact potential witnesses, work with victims, and collect any other evidence that may be available in these cases.

- The legislature and the Department of Public Safety must address the needs of the State Crime lab and look at methods to process DNA evidence in a timely way.

C. Alcohol use is significantly associated with sexual assault.

1. In a study of Anchorage Police Department cases, over 60% of victims and 70% of suspects had used alcohol just prior to or at the time of the assault. Similar statistics were also found in a study of cases in Alaska's Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner (SANE) program. In Trooper cases, where the victims tended overwhelmingly to be children, the victim use was 27% and suspect use was 42%. In addition, significant numbers of victims report having consumed alcohol to the point of incapacitation (e.g., Anchorage 23%; Fairbanks 31%). This both increases the vulnerability of the victim to an assault and can make cases more difficult to prosecute.

2. The UAA Justice Center reports that rates of serious injury from assault are 36% lower in dry villages and, further, that cases involving alcohol use are less likely to be referred for prosecution and are less likely to be accepted for prosecution when they are referred.

Recommendations:

- Alaska should continue to support programs and policies that reduce alcohol consumption

- Education efforts in sexual assault awareness and prevention should specifically address alcohol use and its potential adverse effects on personal safety.

D. Ongoing efforts to reduce recidivism by known sex offenders is critically important.

1. In a 1988 study (Abel, et al), of offenders who participated and who admitted to child molestations and rapes, 97% were never arrested for these crimes. The lag time for detection of sex offenders ranges from between 6 years to 16 years according to various national studies.

2. Nationally, almost 45% of prisoners serving time for rape or sexual assault committed their crime while on probation or parole.

Recommendations:

- Alaska should continue to fund and expand its sex offender management programs, particularly the current Containment Model, which utilizes offender polygraphs but in prison and on probation.
- Alaska's Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, which locates offenders who are looking for victims using the internet, should be expanded. This program has resulted in arrests and convictions of adults who would otherwise have offended against children.

The Senate Judiciary Committee would like to thank the many experts who provided their time and knowledge to the committee during these hearings. The committee particularly acknowledges the work done by the UAA Justice Center, which has provided vital leadership in its research regarding violence against women in Alaska.

Re: CS (JUD) for Senate Bill 222
Constitutional Issues

Chair French:

Thank you for the opportunity to submit written testimony regarding CS (JUD) for Senate Bill 222. These comments reflect analysis in addition to our prior correspondence of February 15, with respect to provisions amended in the CS.

Section Seventeen – Unjustified Invitation to Abuse

Section 17, proposes that the Attorney General may issue administrative subpoenas to obtain an internet user's name, address, telephone records, bank or credit card information, service history, and any telephone number or IP address used in accessing the internet through the service provider.

The general rule in criminal investigations has been that a warrant issues from a judge or other judicial authority. In some contexts, administrative warrants have been issued by various administrative agencies – to assist the IRS, for instance, in recovering owed taxes, or the SEC in identifying violations of securities regulations.

Permitting a criminal enforcement agency to issue its own subpoenas for the purpose of prosecution has been rarely tried and leads to abuse when it has occurred. In the wake of 9/11, the FBI seized on the authority of "exigent letters" and "national security letters" to demand phone records and other information from businesses. Investigation of this authority found that the letters were issued where no exigent circumstances or national security issue existed, that the secrecy surrounding the procedure allowed agents to misrepresent where the information had come from, and allowed the FBI to obtain phone records of some individuals, including journalists, in ways which raise serious civil liberties concerns.

Testimony to the effect that such sweeping authority should be removed from the hands of a judge – who traditionally affords constitutional protections as a neutral party – has indicated that the judicial process is too cumbersome or takes too much time. However, the submission of a warrant to a judge is the same procedure by which the phones of those accused of drug dealing are tapped, by which the homes of those accused of murder are searched, and by which those accused of rape are arrested. While the "affidavit" portion of a warrant request can be lengthy, much of it is boilerplate. The ACLU can provide the Committee with an exemplar affidavit showing that the original language necessary to complete the affidavit is rather minimal.

Testimony that it would be easier for the head of the state's law enforcement and litigation agency to read an application for an administrative subpoena than for any of the many state court judges to do so is similarly unpersuasive. Regardless of who will finally sign a warrant or subpoena, the same steps must be completed. The statement of probable cause must be drafted, the statement of what materials are to be seized must be prepared, and the application must be submitted for signature. Whether the application is faxed to a judge's chambers or carried upstairs does not add significantly to the time needed to complete the application. One could imagine that the Attorney General would have less time to fully review the application than judges around the state. If the intention of the bill is that the Attorney General will designate representatives to sign these warrants in his name, such a practice invites different concerns. Devolving subpoena power to numerous subordinates whose actions would be difficult to track even within the Department of Law, opens even more avenues for abuse.

Some of the material sought by these subpoenas should be considered private and outside the scope of an administrative subpoena. State v. Miles, 160 Wash.2d 236, 252 (Wash. 2007) (holding that bank records were private and not subject to administrative subpoena). The context of the subpoena – internet usage – should prompt more scrutiny from the courts, since access to the internet is part of the freedom of speech. Allowing the government to discover who makes negative comments about political figures on websites, to find out whether a state employee is visiting a website about whistleblower law, and who is supporting rival political campaigns threatens the privacy and the free speech rights of citizens. Doe v. Alaska Superior Court, 721 P.2d 617, 629 (Alaska 1986) (privacy clause protects "sensitive personal information"). It is no answer to say that the statute is supposedly about child exploitation when the subpoenas are not subject to independent scrutiny. The only entity able to challenge the subpoena would be the internet service provider, which has no particular interest in the freedom of speech or privacy of citizens.

Allowing a law enforcement agency to issue its own subpoenas without review by a neutral party has led in the past and will lead again to serious abuse by government officials.

Sections Five and Six: First Amendment Issues

As noted in Committee colloquy during the Monday, April 5 hearing, Sections 5 and 6 as currently drafted, present First Amendment issues. By inclusion of non-obscene material, these proposed amendments run afoul of the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002), (child pornography cannot be banned if it is both (1) not constitutionally obscene and (2) not a depiction of real children).

As currently drafted, one could imagine a work of art, for instance, placing a photo of the head of a minor Britney Spears, on drawing intended as commentary on media depictions of youth and sexuality unconstitutionally qualifying as "criminal material." Absent, for example, language tracking the Miller standard (Miller v. California, (1973) 413 U.S. 15) these provisions are subject to facial challenge.

Conclusion

As previously noted, the ACLU takes seriously the need to address sexual assault in Alaska. But the sections cited invite constitutional challenge and will likely entangle the state in lengthy and costly litigation, and lead to unnecessary uncertainty in criminal verdicts, should the CS (JUD) for S.B. 222 pass as currently written.

Re: Senate Bill 222
Constitutional Issues

Chair French:

Thank you for the opportunity to submit written testimony regarding Senate Bill 222. As you know, the American Civil Liberties Union of Alaska ("ACLU) represents thousands of members and activists throughout the State of Alaska who seek to preserve and expand individual freedoms and civil liberties guaranteed under the United States and Alaska Constitutions. From that perspective, we have several concerns with the proposed legislation.

Section 16 Proposed Amendments to Rule 16 of the Rules of Criminal Procedure

Section Sixteen of the Bill proposes changes to the rules of criminal procedure that violate the state and federal constitutional rights to a fair trial and to effective representation, and would result in lengthy and costly litigation. The Section proposes that relevant evidence should be revealed to defendants, defense attorneys, and defense experts only at a state facility, under the control of a law enforcement agency. While protecting the privacy of the victims of certain crimes is an important interest, the proposed changes to the Rules of Criminal Procedure unnecessarily restrict the rights of the accused.

In some cases, the use of a technological expert is invaluable. Defendants are entitled to establish, for example, that images at issue in a trial are not illegal material, were placed on the drive by another party, or were altered in some way. The computer source files would require review at length by an expert witness. Being forced to conduct the review at a local police department or District Attorney's office would make the work of these experts essentially impossible. Moreover, the analysis of hard drives and other media would likely require unique analysis programs which would necessitate examining the images on the expert's own computers. The proposed Rule Amendment would effectively deprive defendants of the effective use of expert testimony, which would be a key defense resource in these cases.

Even where the use of an expert is unnecessary, the defense attorney may need to review the files at length, to establish the exact nature of images or files, or to determine whether some of them are duplicates. Requiring defense attorneys to do their work at times and places convenient to the state is unnecessarily and unconstitutionally restrictive.

A case from Washington State perfectly illustrates why the proposed rule would result in lengthy and expensive litigation which would ultimately result in the overturning of the statute. In State v. Boyd, for example, the prosecution in a child pornography case sought and obtained a protective order from the court which only permitted the defense to view the evidence at a state facility. 158 P.3d 54 (Wash. 2007). The Supreme Court of Washington ruled that the Rules of Evidence, the Fifth Amendment right to a fair trial, and the Sixth Amendment right to effective representation by counsel all required that the protective order be struck down and the defendant be granted a new trial, because the defendant could not be adequately represented nor fairly tried under the order.

The important privacy of needs of victims can be protected without the measures laid out in Section 16. For example, the Boyd court upheld an order requiring the defense to keep "mirror image" hard drives of evidence under lock and key, to use firewall software on any computer viewing images that was connected to the internet, making the attorney personally and professionally responsible for any unauthorized release of the images, and allowing state experts to verify the complete eradication of the images after the conclusion of the case.

The power of a court to issue a protective order in a particular case already exists and needs no augmentation by the legislature. An order issued after consideration of the unique facts of an individual case is far more likely to survive appellate review than a blanket rule set down by the legislature.

Section 16 of S.B. 222 violates the state and federal constitutional rights to a fair trial and to effective representation. We recommend the Bill be revised so that the courts would be permitted to manage the disclosure of evidence on a case-by-case basis, rather than by instituting a blanket rule that would invite litigation.

Section 15 Requirement for Registration of Sex Offenders from Other Jurisdictions

Section 15 proposes to expand the list of those required to register as sex offenders to include anyone required to register in another jurisdiction. The ACLU of Alaska has numerous objections to this amendment.

The Alaska Supreme Court ruled in Doe v. State that those convicted of sex offenses in Alaska before the enactment of the sex offender registry statutes in 1994 could not be required to register, as the statute would otherwise violate the ex post facto provision of the State Constitution. 189 P.3d 999 (Alaska 2008). In many other jurisdictions, the state courts have not declared their state sex offender statutes to offend their own ex post facto rules. The Alaska ex post facto provision may prohibit mandatory registration for those convicted of offenses in another state prior to 1994. A final determination would need to be made by the Alaska Supreme Court, likely after lengthy litigation, and potentially overturning many convictions.

The proposed amendment in Section 15 also usurps the State's own policy making decisions. In Alaska, for instance, the legislature has set the age of consent at sixteen. This amendment would nullify the legislature's judgment and require someone convicted of having sex with a 17-year-old in another state to report to the Department of Public Safety and face incarceration should he fail to report on time. Should he end up incarcerated, the people of the state of Alaska will be paying $44,000 a year to incarcerate someone as a consequence for committing an underlying act which would not even be a crime in Alaska.

The current state of the law in Alaska is that anyone convicted under appropriate Alaska statutes or similar statutes in another state, such as rape, sexual assault, etc., must register in Alaska. Section 15 would therefore expand the registry not to the most culpable and the most dangerous, but to those convicted of designated sex offenses that lie outside the most dangerous sex offenses: particularly, those convicted of having sex with 16 or 17 year olds; those convicted of prostitution offenses; and those convicted of some other minor offenses, like indecent exposure. These offenders are not particularly more likely to commit the rapes and molestations that the registry is designed to protect Alaskans from.

Generally, registries have been ineffective in preventing crime. A Rutgers University study showed that the New Jersey sex offender registry had "no demonstrable effect in reducing sexual re-offenses." The study also showed the enactment of the law had no effect on the number of victims of sex offenses, no effect on how long those convicted of sex offenses remained arrest-free, and no effect on the type of sex offenses committed. The legislature should look for proven, effective methods of preventing sex offenses. The proposed expansion of the sex offender registry in S.B. 222 is not a means to do this.

Section Three – Eliminating the Mental State Requirement of the Failure to Register Statute

Subsection (b) of Section Three of the Bill eliminates any mental state requirement, or mens rea, for the offense of failure to register, which means that a person who accidentally or in good faith neglects to complete the registration requirement every three months could still be found guilty of the offense. Subsection (c) creates an affirmative defense that registration became impossible because of an unforeseen circumstance and that the individual orally registered with the Department of Public Safety as soon as possible.

Generally, the criminal law requires "not only the doing of some act by the person to be held liable, but also the existence of a guilty mind during the commission of the act." Speidel v. State, 460 P.2d 77, 80 (Alaska 1969). The Alaska courts have held that, for major felonies, a mental state requirement is mandatory, while some minor offenses, such as hunting or public health related offenses, may be strict liability offenses without a mental state requirement. Speidel, 460 P.2d 77 (holding that the statute declaring the failure to return a car to be a crime, regardless of mental state, violated due process); see also State v. Guest, 583 P.2d 836 (Alaska 1978); State v. Fremgen, 914 P.2d 1244 (Alaska 1996).

In some cases, the courts have avoided declaring a statute unconstitutional by creating a mental state requirement where a statute has no provision for mental state but no language stating that no mental state requirement exists. Kimoktoak v. State, 584 P.2d 25 (Alaska 1978); Alex v. State, 484 P.2d 677 (Alaska 1971). With an explicit statement that no mental state is required in Section Three, the courts will not be able to avoid the constitutional conflict and may rule the statute unconstitutional.

Of note, as well, are the unique conditions here in Alaska. Many registered sex offenders live off the road system and in remote villages in which mail service gets interrupted, travel and telecommunications are irregular, and weather could keep an offender from being able to comply. Placing the burden on the defendant to prove his innocence reverses our legal tradition and the traditional balance of powers between the defense and the prosecution. The elimination of the mental state requirement and the substitution of a restrictive affirmative defense make Section Three subject to attack under the Alaska constitution.

Conclusion

We hope that the Judiciary Committee will note these constitutional infirmities in Sections Three, Fifteen, and Sixteen of Senate Bill 222 and consider amending them or eliminating them from the Bill to avoid these concerns.

While the ACLU of Alaska takes very seriously the need to address the epidemic of sexual assault in Alaska, these sections are not well-crafted to vindicate the state's purposes. The sections we have identified present substantial Constitutional problems and will likely entangle the state in litigation, should S.B. 222 pass as currently written.

Memorandum in Opposition to Alaska Senate Bill 222

The members of Media Coalition believe that both Section 8 of Senate Bill 222 and existing Alaska statute 11.61.128(a) violates the First Amendment rights of producers and retailers and their customers. The trade associations and other organizations who comprise Media Coalition have many members throughout the country including Alaska: book and magazine publishers, booksellers and librarians as well as manufacturers and retailers of recordings, films, videos and video games and their consumers.

AS 11.61.128(a) bars the distribution by a computer of any "indecent material" by an adult to anyone under 16 years old or someone the adult believes is under 16 years old. "Indecent material" is defined to include any depiction of actual or simulated sexual penetration, lewd touching or exhibition of the genitals, anus, or female breast, masturbation, sexual masochism or sadism. S.B. 222 would expand the existing law would broaden it to apply to any type of distribution rather than merely by computer.

Speech is protected unless the Supreme Court tells us otherwise. As the Court said in Free Speech Coalition v. Ashcroft, "As a general principle, the First Amendment bars the government from dictating what we see or read or speak or hear. The freedom of speech has its limits; it does not embrace certain categories of speech, including defamation, incitement, obscenity and pornography produced with children." 535 U.S.234, 241 (2002). Unless speech falls into one of these limited categories or is otherwise tied to an illegal act such as luring or enticing a minor, there is no basis for the government to bar access to make such material illegal.

The restriction on "indecent materials" in the present law and in this bill, without a connection to an otherwise illegal act such as luring or enticing a minor, is almost certainly unconstitutionally overbroad. While minors do not enjoy the protection of the First Amendment to the same extent as adults, the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that "minors are entitled to a significant measure of First Amendment protection, and only in relatively narrow and well-defined circumstances may government bar public dissemination of protected material to them." Erznoznick v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 212-13 (1975). Governments may restrict minors' access to some sexually explicit speech but it is a narrow range of material determined by a specific test. Merely containing sexual content is not enough to make a book, movie, magazine or sound recording illegal. In the case of Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968), the U.S. Supreme Court established a three-part test for determining whether material is "harmful to minors" and may therefore be banned for sale to minors. The material deemed illegal for minors by AS 11.61.128(a) and S.B. 222 does not include any of the three prong test from Ginsberg and would criminalize a far broader range of material than is allowed under the First Amendment. A recent law enacted in Illinois barred the sale of video games with sexual content but without the third prong of the Ginsberg test. The law was permanently enjoined by the U.S. District Court and the ruling was heartily affirmed by the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals. Entertainment Software Ass'n v. Blagojevich, 469 F.3d 642 (7th Cir. 2006) aff'g 404 F. Supp. 2d 1051 (N.D. Ill. 2005).

The existing law's application of these restrictions to Internet communication is almost certainly unconstitutional even if it was limited to material that could be restricted as "harmful to minors" under the three-prong test in Ginsberg. This treats material on the Internet as if there were no difference between a computer transmission and a book or magazine. But cyberspace is not like a bookstore. There is no way to know whether the person receiving the "harmful" material is a minor or an adult. As a result, the effect of banning the computer dissemination of material "harmful to minors" is to force a provider, whether a publisher or an on-line carrier, to deny access to both minors and adults, depriving adults of their First Amendment rights. The U.S. Supreme Court has already declared unconstitutional two federal laws that restrict the availability of matter inappropriate for minors on the Internet. Reno v. ACLU, 117 S.Ct. 2329 (1997); Ashcroft v. ACLU, 534 F.2d 181 (3d Cir 2008), cert. den. 129 Sup. Ct. 1032 (2009). Similar state laws banning sexual speech for minors on the Internet have been ruled unconstitutional. See, PSINet v. Chapman, 63 F.3d 227 (4th Cir. 2004); ABFFE v. Dean, 342 F.3d 96 (2nd Cir 2003); Cyberspace Communications, Inc. v. Engler, 238 F.3d 420 (6th Cir. 2000); ACLU v. Johnson, 194 F.3d 1149 (10th Cir. 1999); Southeast Booksellers v. McMasters 282 F. Supp 2d 1180 (D.S.C. 2003); American Libraries Ass'n v. Pataki 969 F. Supp. 160 (S.D. 1997); ACLU v. Goddard, Civ No. 00-0505 TUC AM (D. Ariz. 2002). The only exceptions to these decisions have been laws that were limited to speech illegal for minors that were intended to be communicated to a person the speaker has specific, rather than general, knowledge is a minor. However, such laws might still be unconstitutional as a violation of the Commerce Clause of the U.S. Constitution. In addition to First Amendment deficiencies, the courts have also ruled that these state laws violate the Commerce Clause, which reserves to Congress the regulation of interstate commerce and prevents a state from imposing laws extraterritorially.

Passage of this bill could prove costly. If a court declares it unconstitutional, there is a good possibility that the state will be ordered to pay the plaintiffs' attorneys' fees. In the successful challenge to the Illinois legislation, the state agreed to pay to the plaintiffs more than $500,000.

If you would like to discuss further our position on this bill, please contact David Horowitz at 212-587-4025 #11 or at horowitz@mediacoalition.org.

Again, we ask you to please protect the First Amendment rights of all the people of Alaska and reconsider the existing law and S.B. 222.

Thanks for writing. I'm a big supporter of independent bookstores.
I think you have raised a valid concern with the bill. I can't promise to adopt the language you suggest, but I will work to make sure that the bill does not expose you and other booksellers to the possibility of criminal prosecution.

Dear Senator French,

As a member of the community, I understand the need to protect children from child pornography, and I appreciate the impetus behind Senate Bill 222. However, as a bookstore owner, I am deeply concerned about the unintended dampening effects this bill as written will have on the legitimate sharing of information.

At our bookstore, we take pride in knowing our books well – but we can't read or review every book we sell, and we cannot, and should not be expected to verify which books might depict, for example, the lewd groping of a woman's breast. The bill as written makes no allowances for broad community standards. Ultimately, a parent has to decide if his or her 16 year old is ready to read "The Piano" or even George Orwell's "Animal House." Farm

I have some of the best, most caring people in the world working for me.
They are in the early stages of their careers as artists, writers, managers. I don't want my staff or myself wondering when we are going to be accused of a Class C felony when we sell a book that has serious literary or scientific value, but which offends some – but not all – people in the community.

I would urge you to insert the Miller test into the bill – at the very least, the qualifying language about lacking "serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value."

Dear Senator Hollis French

Enclosed is a news article showing that your opponent two weeks before your reelection can have a computer hacker put in a viruses of child porn in your computer and you will be prosecuted for files that you didn't know that you had. It is fast and easy to do. You will lose your reelection immediately and you will be paying your attorney $250,000 for your defense.

There must be a way that a law can be put in that would hold the information about the charges you are facing until the police finish a complete full scale investigation on the matter. This would give the police time to track down the perpetrator and prosecute the correct person who did this crime. As you can see, the door is wide open here for injustice with the laws that are on the books at this time. You can't un ring the bell once it has been rung. By putting in a law to deal with this matter, you will be giving a chance for one (or you) and all to have a shot at justice.

Thank you for your prompt and courteous attention.

Viruses can put child porn on anyone's computer

Innocent people prosecuted for files they didn't know they had

By JORDAN ROBERTSON
The Associated Press

Of all the sinister things that Internet viruses do, this might be the worst: They can make you an unsuspecting collector of child pornography.

Heinous pictures and videos can be deposited on computers by viruses — the malicious programs better known for swiping your credit card numbers. In this twist, it's your reputation that's stolen.

Pedophiles can exploit virus-infected PCs to remotely store and view their stash without fear they'll get caught. Pranksters or someone trying to frame you can tap viruses to make it appear that you surf illegal Web sites.

Whatever the motivation, you get child porn on your computer — and might not realize it until police knock at your door.

An Associated Press investigation found cases in which innocent people have been branded as pedophiles after their co-workers or loved ones stumbled upon child pornography placed on a PC through a virus. It can cost victims hundreds of thousands of dollars to prove their innocence.

Their situations are complicated by the fact that actual pedophiles often blame viruses — a defense rightfully viewed with skepticism by law enforcement.

"It's an example of the old 'dog ate my homework' excuse," said Phil Malone, director of the Cyberlaw Clinic at

Ban upheld on offering child porn

The Supreme Court allows a 2003 law dealing with 'virtual' child porn that some thought was too broad.

By Warren Richey Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor posted May 20, 2008 at 12:00 am EDT

Washington —
The US Supreme Court has upheld an effort by Congress to make it illegal to offer or promote child pornography – even when the photographs being offered or promoted don't really exist or involve real children.

In a 7-to-2 decision announced on Monday, the high court said the law was a constitutional effort by Congress to protect innocent children from a thriving form of abuse.

The majority justices upheld the law even though it restricted certain kinds of speech that critics said must be protected by the First Amendment.

Instead, the high court said Congress had struck the correct balance in passing the anti-child-pornography law.

"We hold that offers to provide or requests to obtain child pornography are categorically excluded from the First Amendment," writes Justice Antonin Scalia for the majority.

The PROTECT Act of 2003 is an attempt to shut down a flourishing trade in child pornography over the Internet. It seeks to do it not only by barring the exchange of pictures depicting children in sexually explicit poses, but also by outlawing any attempt to convince another person that offered pictures are of real child pornography involving real children.

In effect, the law makes it illegal to try to dupe other would-be consumers of child pornography into thinking that they are about to receive actual child pornography. The activity is illegal even if the photographs do not involve actual child pornography. In addition, such pandering is illegal even if the photographs don't exist.

The majority justices said the statute was not too broad or too vague to pass constitutional muster.

The law "punishes speech seeking to conclude illegal transactions," Justice Scalia said in a statement from the bench. "Such speech does not get First Amendment protection."

He adds, in the opinion: "Offers to give or receive what it is unlawful to possess have no social value and thus, like obscenity, enjoy no First Amendment protection."

His opinion was joined by Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices John Paul Stevens, Anthony Kennedy, Clarence Thomas, Stephen Breyer, and Samuel Alito.

Justices David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg dissented. Justice Souter writes that prior Supreme Court rulings established that only pornographic photographs of actual children may be prohibited and that virtual child pornography retains First Amendment protections Justices Souter and Ginsburg said the 2003 PROTECT Act violates free-speech protections by allowing a new pandering prohibition aimed at suppressing otherwise protected speech. In other words, if virtual child pornography is protected by the First Amendment, how could an attempt to pander virtual child pornography be illegal?

"Just six years ago the court struck down a statute outlawing particular material merely represented to be child pornography, but not necessarily depicting actual children," Souter writes. "The court is going against the grain of pervasive First Amendment doctrine that tolerates speech restriction not on mere general tendencies of expression, or the private understandings of speakers or listeners, but only after a critical assessment of practical consequences."

The decision comes in the case of Michael Williams of Key Largo, Fla. Mr. Williams was arrested in May 2004 after an encounter with an undercover agent in an adult chat room on the Internet.

He logged into the chat room and posted a message that he had "good" photographs of his 2-year-old daughter that he wished to swap for similar photos. An undercover federal agent responded and engaged Williams in a private Web chat. The agent identified himself as a 30-year-old mother with a 10-year-old daughter.

Williams and the undercover agent swapped photos. The children depicted in the photos were clothed and were not engaged in sexually explicit activities.

According to court documents, Williams tried to get the undercover agent to provide a more sexually explicit photograph. When it did not arrive, Williams posted a warning message in the chat room that the undercover agent was a cop. The undercover agent responded in a chat room message accusing Williams of being a cop.

In response to the accusation that he was an undercover cop, Williams posted a hyperlink to seven sexually explicit photographs of children ages 5 to 15.

Four days later, federal agents executed a search warrant for Williams's trailer in Key Largo. They discovered 22 computer images of children engaged in various forms of sexual activity. They also discovered that Williams lived alone and did not have a 2-year-old daughter.

Williams was charged with possession of child pornography. But federal prosecutors also charged him with violating the federal child-pornography pandering law for his Internet encounter with the undercover agent.

Williams agreed to plead guilty to both charges, but he reserved the right to appeal the pandering conviction. His lawyers said he shouldn't be held criminally liable for false claims made in an adult chat room.

The 11th US Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta agreed with Williams and reversed the pandering conviction.

In overturning the appeals court, the high court said, "The Eleventh Circuit believed it a constitutional difficulty that no child pornography need exist to trigger the statute. In its view, the fact that the statute could punish a 'braggart, exaggerator, or outright liar' rendered it unconstitutional."

The decision continues: "That seems to us a strange constitutional calculus."

Scalia said the 11 Circuit's reading of the law would forbid the government from punishing fraudulent offers to provide illegal products. "We see no logic in that position; if anything, such statements are doubly excluded from the First Amendment," he writes.

Responding to Souter's dissent, Scalia says the high court's holding does not overrule a 2002 decision in a case called Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition.

In that case, the court ruled that Congress could not ban virtual child pornography in an attempt to stamp out actual child pornography. "According to the dissent, Congress has made an end-run around the First Amendment's protection of virtual child pornography by prohibiting proposals to transact in such images rather than prohibiting the images themselves," Scalia writes.

He says an offer to provide or a request to receive virtual child pornography is not prohibited by the PROTECT Act and continues to have First Amendment protection. "A crime is committed only when the speaker believes or intends the listener to believe that the subject of the proposed transaction depicts real children," Scalia writes.

Souter and Ginsburg say the statute must be based on more than mere belief by a speaker or the speaker's desire to foster a belief in another.

"First Amendment freedoms are most in danger when the government seeks to control thought or to justify its laws for that impermissible end," Souter writes, quoting from the court's 2002 Free Speech Coalition decision. "The right to think is the beginning of freedom, and speech must be protected from the government because speech is the beginning of thought."

In contrast, the majority said Congress struck the correct balance in the statute. "Child pornography harms and debases the most defenseless of our citizens," Scalia writes. "Both the state and federal governments have sought to suppress it for many years, only to find it proliferating through the new medium of the Internet."

He adds, "This court held unconstitutional Congress's previous attempt to meet this new threat, and Congress responded with a carefully crafted attempt to eliminate the First Amendment problems we identified. As far as the provision at issue in this case is concerned, that effort was successful."

In other action, the high court upheld a Kentucky program that provided tax exemptions for Kentucky-based municipal bonds.

Voting 7 to 2, the justices ruled that a state may decline to charge taxes on interest earned on its own bonds while taxing residents for interest earned on bonds from other states. Forty-two states offer some form of tax exemption for their bonds, while taxing out-of-state bonds.

In another case, the high court upheld a portion of the conviction of the so-called Millennium Bomber who was allegedly plotting to blow up Los Angeles International Airport. He was arrested attempting to drive into the United States from Canada. Officials found explosives in his car.

The Supreme Court ruled 8 to 1 that Ahmed Ressam was properly charged and convicted under a law prohibiting carrying explosives while committing a felony.

In Mr. Ressam's case, the underlying felony was making false statements on his US Customs form while attempting to enter the US by car in December 1999. At issue was whether the underlying felony must involve committing a crime linked to the explosives not simply possessing the explosives while committing a felony.

A federal appeals court had thrown out a single count of Ressam's nine-count conviction.

On Monday, the Supreme Court reversed that decision. The ruling will make it easier for federal prosecutors to return lengthy prison sentences against suspected terrorists caught in possession of explosives. Oral argument was presented in the case by Attorney General Michael Mukasey, who is now batting 1 000 as an advocate before Supreme Court.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plaintiff, v. RANDY D. WINSLOW, Defendant.	3:07-CR-00072-TMB-DMS ORDER REGARDING DEFENDANT'S MOTION FOR ORDER COMPELLING DISCOVERY OF COMPUTER-RELATED EVIDENCE SEIZED FROM RANDY D. WINSLOW [Doc. 31]

I. INTRODUCTION

A computer was seized from Defendant Randy D. Winslow during the investigation of this matter. The defendant requests that a copy of the HP Pavillion hard drive seized from 109 East 5th Street, Tilton, Illinois, his home, be provided to defense counsel for review by a computer forensic expert. The Government contends that the hard drive contains images that constitute child pornography. The hard drive also allegedly contains evidence of on-line chats and emails between Winslow and an undercover officer, which are relied upon by the Government to prove a charge of attempted aggravated sexual abuse of a minor.

The defense requests that this discovery material be made available as it was in the past, pursuant to a detailed protective order that specified how the copied hard drive would be handled while in the possession of defense counsel for the purpose of discovery. (See U.S. v. Danny Michael Harvey, 3:07-CR-00103-RRB-DMS, Doc. 73-2, Affidavit of Bruce Johnson, Federal Public Defender Investigator, District of Alaska. The parties in this matter stipulated that the evidentiary record in Harvey on the issue of discovery could be incorporated into the record in this matter. U.S. v. Winslow, Doc. 88, 90, 91). The precautions contained in the prior protective orders were taken to insure there was no further copying, viewing or distribution of the images, beyond that necessary to prepare the legal defense. The defense relies upon Fed. R. Crim. P. 16 and United States v. Hill, 322 F. Supp. 2d 1081 (C.D. Cal. 2004), in which the Court approved such a protective order.

The Government refuses to deliver the copy, arguing that the 2006 Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act (hereafter the Walsh Act)—specifically 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m)—directs prosecutors and investigators in criminal cases to retain all child pornography in the Government's care, custody and control. The Government argues that it will provide ample opportunity for the defense examination of the hard drive while in Government custody and, as a result, the Walsh Act prohibits the Court from ordering the Government to produce a copy of the hard drive for delivery to the office of defense counsel.

Winslow responds that 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) is unconstitutional both facially and as applied in this case. He contends that he is entitled to copies of the hard drive under the Fifth Amendment's Due Process clause and the Sixth Amendment's Compulsory Process and Effective Assistance of Counsel clauses.

Other district courts around the country have considered whether this section of the Walsh Act is constitutional when applied to child pornography on a hard drive. No circuit courts have addressed the issue to date. Also, this Court has been unable to locate any precedent which addresses the constitutionality of Section 3509(m) of the Walsh Act when applied to a hard drive that contains not only child pornography but written emails and on-line chats from the defendant, which are relevant to a charge other than possession or distribution of child pornography.

II. STATEMENT OF FACTS

In a superceding indictment August 24, 2007, Winslow was charged with attempted aggravated sexual abuse in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2241(c) and distribution of child pornography in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2252(a)(2) and (b)(1). Federal law enforcement agents arrested Winslow on May 4, 2007 in his Illinois home two weeks before he planned to travel to Alaska. Later that day, federal agents seized a computer and HP Pavillion hard drive from Winslow's Illinois home.

Prior to passage of the Walsh Act, in federal child pornography prosecutions in Alaska, the Government often provided the defense team with a copy of any computer hard drive which contained evidence considered to be child pornography, as long as an appropriate protective order was in place (Harvey Tr. 17, 76, Doc. 73-2, Johnson Affidavit). Since the passage of 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m), the Government no longer abides by this practice.

A. Discovery Procedures Prior to Enactment of the Walsh Act

In Alaska prior to the Walsh Act, the Government provided mirrored hard drives to the defense attorney or expert (Harvey Tr. 107). The attorney and analyst signed an agreement in which the defense team agreed not to publish or distribute the material and to return the hard drive to the Government after the proceedings (Harvey Tr. 107). Agent Laws testified there was never a situation in Alaska when a defense attorney or computer analyst lost or distributed child pornography contained on a mirrored hard drive (Harvey Tr. 106). He was unaware of this ever happening nationwide. The single instance he knew of when a computer hard drive containing child pornography was lost, occurred when it was in the custody of the Government (Harvey Tr. 110-111).

The Federal Public Defender's criminal defense investigator, Mr. Bruce Johnson, stated that prior to the Walsh Act, the Government routinely provided copies of computer evidence to the Public Defender's Office, subject to appropriate protective orders and non-disclosure agreements (Harvey Doc. 73-2, Affidavit of Johnson at 2). Mr. Johnson maintained exclusive control of all computer evidence received and he placed such materials in a secure safe. He and the office administrator were the only two people with the key and security code to the safe, and he was the only person to ever access the safe (Harvey Doc. 73-2, Affidavit of Bruce Johnson at 3). Whenever he had to remove computer evidence from the safe, he documented the chain-of-custody and the date and time of its removal. He was the only person in the office who conducted analyses of the computer evidence, which ran in his secured office (Harvey Doc. 73-2, Affidavit of Bruce Johnson at 4). Upon completion of an analysis, he returned all computer evidence to the Government; permanently removed and deleted files and remnants of the hard drive from his office computer; and certified no copies had been made and all copies were returned (Harvey Doc. 73-2, Affidavit of Bruce Johnson at 5).

B. Problems Presented when Defense Forensic Analysis is Required to Take Place at a Government Facility

At the evidentiary hearing, Marcus Kenneth Lawson from Spokane, Washington testified as the defense computer forensics expert.[1] Mr. Lawson is the President of Global CompuSearch, LLC, which provides forensic computer investigations. Earlier in his career, Mr. Lawson worked for U.S. Customs as an agent specializing in child pornography computer forensic investigations

[1]As noted supra, the parties stipulated that the evidentiary hearing in U.S. v. Harvey on the issue of discovery of a hard drive in a prosecution for aggravated sexual abuse and possession of child pornography could be incorporated by reference in the record of this case. U.S. v. Winslow, Doc. 91. Lawson, who testified, is the defense forensic computer expert in both cases.

(Harvey Tr. 13). Mr. Lawson testified about the steps required for an effective analysis, including the need for specific equipment; access to the tools in his laboratory; access to his experienced colleagues; access to the Internet and access to defense counsel during the analysis.

The defense also relied upon the affidavits of Government agents filed in support of two search warrants in U.S. v. Harvey. The affidavits established the surroundings and circumstances necessary for an effective computer forensics exam (Harvey Doc. 42-3, Affidavit of Special Agent Skinner, Defendant's Exhibit C at the evidentiary hearing) and (Harvey Doc. 40-3, Affidavit of Special Agent Laws, Defendant's Exhibit B at the evidentiary hearing).

In his search warrant application and affidavit, Special Agent Kevin Laws of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) stated that reviewing data on a computer hard drive can take weeks or months; that it is impossible to attempt a computer review at the residence or office being searched; that searching computer systems for criminal evidence is very technical and requires a controlled environment. He added that it is difficult to know before a search what types of hardware and software are located on a computer, and therefore it is hard to know what type of experts and equipment are needed to analyze the computer and its data.

Special Agent Skinner of ICE stated in his affidavit that it is impossible to bring all of the technical manuals and specialized equipment necessary to conduct a thorough search to a search site; that a substantial amount of time is necessary to complete an analysis of a computer and a controlled environment is necessary. During the evidentiary hearing, Mr. Lawson agreed with the statements of both Agents Laws and Skinner (Harvey Tr. 19-22). Mr. Lawson stated that an on-site analysis, away from his laboratory, is difficult because running the required programs can take a long time and extend into the night (Harvey Tr. 22-23).

Mr. Lawson and his staff at CompuSearch, LLC have encountered the following problems when conducting computer analyses away from their office, at a Government facility (Harvey Tr. 19-43; Harvey Doc. 46-2, Affidavit of Lawson, incorporated by reference in evidentiary hearing Tr. 57):

1) Limited hours. Many times the Government will only provide limited hours to conduct an analysis. Government buildings have restricted hours–usually 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.–that prevent his team of experts from running a search or test after hours. Because various diagnostic programs frequently run into the night, if access is cut off at 5 p.m., the analysis can take much longer and may not be as effective.

2) Limited privacy. Frequently the Government will place an agent inside the room with defense experts. In these situations, defense experts are not able to have the requisite privacy and confidentiality needed to talk about the results with other experts and to talk with defense counsel about their findings. Also, the Government agents inside the room are often distracting and noisy, according to Mr. Lawson.

3) Limited contact. Often the Government will not provide phone access to the defense team. The rooms provided are often in the basement where there is no cell service and no telephone land lines (also referred to as fixed phone lines). This deficiency makes it difficult for the experts to consult with their colleagues and the attorneys.

4) No Internet access. Often an expert will need access to the Internet to conduct research to solve problems that occur during an analysis. The Government facilities provided to the defense team usually do not provide Internet access.

5) Inadequate preparation time. Because of the access limitations, both before and during trial, the defense experts cannot be as prepared for trial as they would like to be and this deficiency is often exploited by the prosecution, who then make the defense experts appear unprepared or less knowledgeable about the evidence than the prosecution's experts, according to Mr. Lawson.

6) Damage to equipment. Transporting the expert's machines and tools often damage them and crucial time is spent fixing equipment instead of conducting the required analyses.

Mr. Lawson also testified that forensic computer analysis is crucial for the defense in any case involving child pornography or attempted aggravated assault on a child. Such analyses can reveal evidence of multiple users (Harvey Tr. 25); verify that any Internet chats reported by the Government are correct and presented in the proper context (Harvey Tr. 26, 28); profile the types of users in any chat rooms that may be at issue in the case (Harvey Tr. 28); determine the age of the people in any images involved in the case and whether or not the people in the images are real or virtual (Harvey Tr. 28, 30). It can also find evidence that reflects on whether or not the defendant intended to possess such child pornography (Harvey Tr. 53).

Mr. Lawson and defense counsel stressed that the biggest concern about 18 U.S.C. § 3905(m) is the effect it has on the defense at trial. Mr. Lawson testified that his team will often run tests and check data during a trial and after the trial has ended for the day (Harvey Tr. 33-38, 39). He said he often has associates stay late after a day of trial testimony to conduct tests and look up data (Harvey Tr. 75). According to Mr. Lawson, restrictive access to the copied hard drives during trial is an extreme handicap for the defense team (Harvey Tr. 36-38).

Mr. Lawson testified that since the passage of the Walsh Act, many forensic computer analysts will not work for a defense team because it is too difficult to conduct analyses in a Government office, transporting their diagnostic equipment (Harvey Tr. 83-40). Despite the difficulties, Lawson's company still performs defense computer analyses (Tr. 40). His company has conducted forty to forty-five cases on the road since the passage of the Walsh Act (Harvey Tr. 72). According to Mr. Lawson, he believes that he and his staff did not do an adequate job when testifying in court because of the access limitations (Harvey Tr. 77).

Agent Laws testified as the Government's expert witness on computer forensics. He stated that, in his view, it is possible to do an effective defense forensic computer analysis at a Government office, notwithstanding his comments in his search warrant application about the difficulties of conducting a government forensic examination off-site. He testified that once the initial processing of a computer hard drive is complete, an expert then knows what tools and software will be necessary to complete the forensic analysis (Harvey Tr. 89). He said he did not believe it would give his adversaries insight into his work if the experts knew how often and how long he looked at the computer evidence (Harvey Tr. 103-104).

C. Discovery Procedures to Date in Winslow Case

While the Defendant's Motion for Order Compelling Discovery of All Computer-Related Evidence was pending, to expedite matters, the parties entered into a Stipulation Regarding Forensic Review Procedures Involving HP Pavillion Hard Drive Seized from Defendant (Winslow Doc. 85). The Government agreed to make two copies of a "true forensic, bit by bit E01 image of the HP Pavillion hard drive" available to the defense team to examine at the office of the Spokane Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). This was because expert Lawson's firm, Global CompuSearch, LLC, is located in Spokane. The stipulation stated:

> The Spokane FBI Office will allow the defense team to install a stand-alone > defense forensics review workstation in an interview room monitored by Closed Circuit (CC) TV. The defense team lodges a standing objection to the camera while the forensic review is being conducted. While the non-audio feed will insure the integrity of FBI space and security of its occupants, the Plaintiff represents that the video feed will not be of sufficient detail or at an angle that would reveal defense strategy. The Plaintiff and its agents expressly agree that no attempt will be made to record any audio from the workstation and that no attempt will be made to observe the defense team's work product or computer monitor screen at any time. The defense expert may review the feed to ensure that their strategy is not being compromised at any time while conducting the forensic review.

(Winslow, Doc. 85 at 3).

In addition, the stipulation specifies that:

- The government will make a copy of the seized hard drive "reasonably available to the defendant and provide ample opportunity for the defense team to examine it . . . ."
- The defense team can review the evidence from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday. "The parties may approach the Court if there is a need for after hours access during the course of litigation in the event trial or motion hearings require additional forensic review."
- The defense team will not make any copies of "alleged child pornography contraband." The defense team is defined as the defense attorneys, defense investigator and defense forensic examiner. The word "contraband" is not defined.
- The defense team will not remove any contraband images from the government facility.

- The defense expert will be allowed to copy any file that is not contraband and compile a report without contraband images/videos on removable media at the discretion of the expert.
- The defense reserved all rights to object to the procedure and maintained a standing objection to the constitutionality of the Walsh Act.

U.S. District Court Judge Timothy M. Burgess entered a protective order, which adopted the stipulation (Doc. 87) on November 15, 2007.

On January 14, 2008, defense expert Lawson filed an affidavit with the Court, describing problems encountered during this discovery process. On January 4, 2008, an employee of Global CompuSearch went to the FBI office in Spokane, obtained the hard drive copies, set up her forensic station and attempted to view the media unsuccessfully. She reported that a forensic image "of what appeared to be a Compaq computer" was encrypted and required a password to open. A second forensic image entitled "other media" was also encrypted, and required a password to open. The examiner then returned the hard drive, broke down her forensic station, returned to Global CompuSearch and contacted the defense attorney. This process took one-half day (Doc. 102-2, Affidavit of Marcus K. Lawson).

Defense attorney McCoy then contacted Agent Laws about the matter. Agent Laws reported:

> On or about January 7, 2008, I returned a telephone call to Kevin McCoy. Mr. McCoy inquired about some files on a hard drive sent to his computer expert in Spokane, Washington. Mr. McCoy said he was advised by his computer expert that some of the files on the hard drive where (sic) encrypted. I told Mr. McCoy that some of the files were > encrypted, that the hard drive contained items seized that were not included in the Stipulation and therefore I encrypted the files. I told Mr. McCoy that the hard drive also contained the "image" of several "CD'S" and at least one "media card" and these items where (sic) encrypted. I also told Mr. McCoy that his expert in Spokane was "looking at the files wrong" because the files covered in the court order—those involving the HP Pavillion hard drive—where (sic) in fact not encrypted.

(Winslow Doc. 106-2, Affidavit of Senior Special Agent Kevin J. Laws at 2).

Based upon this conversation, two Global CompuSearch experts again went to the Spokane FBI office on January 7 and repeated the process of obtaining the hard drive copies, setting up their forensic equipment and making screen captures of the encrypted media. This again took most of a morning (Winslow Doc. 102-2, Lawson affidavit at 3).

Further dialogue occurred with Agent Laws that permitted Mr. McCoy to ultimately forward the necessary passwords after receiving them from the Government on January 11. Mr. Lawson also reported that "the Spokane FBI Office has decided that it will no longer accommodate defense forensic examinations under 18 U.S.C. §3509(m) for cases originating outside of the Eastern District of Washington. Such examinations will be permitted only when there is an order by the district court requiring the Spokane FBI to permit the forensic evaluation on its premises." (Winslow Doc. 102-2, Lawson affidavit at 4). Lawson concluded, stating, ". . . [T]he delay described in this affidavit illustrates and underscores the time consuming difficulties associated with performing a defense forensic examination of computer related media maintained in government controlled facilities."

In its response to expert Lawson's affidavit, the Government did not comment on the assertion that the Spokane FBI office will no longer accommodate a defense forensic exam pursuant to the Walsh Act in the absence of a court order. It is also unclear from the present record whether the FBI is refusing the Global CompuSearch team access at the present time, or whether the Government views Judge Burgess' order enforcing the stipulation to require the FBI to cooperate.

III. ANALYSIS

A. Rule 16(a)(1)(E) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure

The Walsh Act became effective on July 27, 2006. Prior to that date, Rule 16(a)(1)(E) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure governed whether or not the prosecution provided the defense team copies of hard drives containing alleged child pornography. Winslow asserts that under Rule 16(a)(1)(E), this Court can order the Government to produce a mirror-image of the hard drives, citing United States v. Hill, 322 F. Supp.2d 1081 (C.D. Cal 2004) for the proposition that it is not an abuse of discretion to order production of contraband such as child pornography with an appropriate protective order in place.[2] However, the Government asserts that Rule 16(a)(1)(E) is no longer controlling in child pornography cases since the passage of the Walsh Act.

Title 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) states as follows:

> (m) Prohibition on reproduction of child pornography.--

---

[2]Hill was decided by Judge Alex Kozinski of the Ninth Circuit, who was sitting as the district court judge by designation pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 291(b). In that case, Judge Kozinski, rejected the Government's argument that the computer hard drives containing child pornography had to remain in the Government's offices. He ordered the hard drives be turned over to the defense team pursuant to a detailed protective order. Hill was decided prior to enactment of the Walsh Act.

> (1) In any criminal proceeding, any property or material that constitutes child pornography (as defined by section 2256 of this title) shall remain in the care, custody, and control of either the Government or the court.
> (2) (A) Notwithstanding Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, a court shall deny, in any criminal proceeding, any request by the defendant to copy, photograph, duplicate, or otherwise reproduce any property or material that constitutes child pornography (as defined by section 2256 of this title), so long as the Government makes the property or material reasonably available to the defendant.
> (B) For the purposes of subparagraph (A), property or material shall be deemed to be reasonably available to the defendant if the Government provides ample opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination at a Government facility of the property or material by the defendant, his or her attorney, and any individual the defendant may seek to qualify to furnish expert testimony at trial.

Section 3509(m)(2)(A) clearly nullifies the copying requirements of Rule 16 as applied to child pornography.

B. Constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m)

Winslow challenges 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) as it applies to computer evidence. He argues that in situations where computer evidence is involved, the statute violates a Defendant's Fifth Amendment Due Process rights and Sixth Amendment Compulsory Process and Effective Assistance of Counsel rights.

To date, it appears no appellate court has reviewed the constitutionality of § 3509(m). However, district courts around the country have addressed the issue. All have ruled that the statute is constitutional. See United States v. Sturm, No. 06-CR-00342, 2007 WL 1453108 (D. Colo. May 17, 2007) (rejecting defendant's constitutional challenges to the Walsh Act, both facially and as applied, holding that the requirements of Subsections (2)(A) and (2)(B) of § 3509(m) are "consistent, if not coterminous, with the due process guarantee that [defendant] be afforded a 'fair opportunity to defend against the [Government's] accusations,'" and holding that because the defendant made no attempt to reach an accommodation with the United States, his as-applied challenge also fails); United States v. Doane, 501 F. Supp. 2d 897 (E.D. Ky. 2007) (finding that the case law does not support the defendant's position that requiring defense expert to examine a computer hard drive at a Government facility interferes with defendant's constitutional rights to investigate charges and to have assistance of counsel and due process because such access is "ample opportunity" under the statute); United States v. Renshaw, No. 05-CR-00165, 2007 WL 710239 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 6, 2007) (finding that although "Section 3509(m) may inconvenience trial counsel and [d]efendant's experts, it does not preclude defendant from preparing his case for trial" and because the statue provides a safety valve permitting the court to order the production of evidence where the Government does not make it reasonably available, there is no basis for a due process challenge and therefore the statute does not necessarily deny defendant a fair trial); United States v. O'Rourke, 470 F. Supp. 2d 1049, 1054-55 (D. Ariz. 2007) (rejecting defendant's constitutional challenges to the Walsh Act, both facially and as applied, holding defendant was not deprived of due process by any Government refusal to give defense experts private access to the Internet when performing their analysis of the hard drive taken from defendant's computer); United States v. Knellinger, 471 F. Supp. 2d 640, 650 (E.D. Va. 2007) (noting that such an evaluation to compel duplication of materials should be made on a case-by-case basis, and holding that while the statute was constitutional, the Government had not given ample access to defense experts); United States v. Johnson, 456 F. Supp. 2d 1014, 1019-20 (N.D. Iowa 2006) (finding that the statute did not, as applied, unduly burden defendant's Fifth Amendment rights to due process and fair trial and Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel, and the statute did not unreasonably restrict defendant's access to services of computer forensic expert); United States v. Spivack, No. 05-CR-98, 2007 WL 4593475 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 29, 2007) (finding the statute constitutional and holding that defendant provided no evidence that Government failed to provide ample opportunity); United States v. Battaglia, No. 07-CR-0055, 2007 WL 1831108 (N.D. Ohio June 25, 2007) (finding the statute constitutional and finding that Government provided ample opportunity); and United States v. Flinn, No. S-05-314, 2007 WL 3034932 (E.D. Cal. Oct. 16, 2007) (finding the statute constitutional and finding that defense had not presented any case-specific concerns to establish the lack of ample opportunity).

In the O'Rourke case, the court rejected the defendant's as applied and facial challenges to 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m). While the defendant challenged the statute under both the Fifth and Sixth Amendment, the court addressed the statute's constitutionality under the Fifth Amendment's due process framework, finding that the Fifth Amendment's Due Process clause provides broader protections for a fair trial than the Sixth Amendment. O'Rourke, 470 F. Supp. 2d at 1054, fn 2 (citing Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 56 (1987)). The Court found that the statute does not provide for an absolute denial of a defense team's possession of alleged child pornography. Instead, the court noted that § 3509(m)(2)(A) denies the defense team possession of the material only if the Government otherwise makes the material "reasonably available" to the defendant. O'Rourke, 470 F. Supp. 2d at 1055. The court noted that subsection 3509(m)(2)(B) provides that the material is "reasonably available" to the defendant if "the Government provides ample opportunity for inspection, viewing , and examination at a Government facility" of the material by the defense team. Id. Therefore, according to the court, if the Government does not provide "ample opportunity" to analyze the material at a Government facility, the court can order the Government to provide a copy to the defendant. Id. The court concluded that "ample opportunity" is coterminous with the requirements of due process because it requires the Government to provide defendants the same access to material that due process mandates, otherwise the court can order the Government to give the defense team a copy of the hard drive. Id. at 1055-56.

In Knellinger, the court applied similar reasoning and found that the term "ample opportunity" could be construed to, at a minimum, protect the constitutional rights of defendants. 471 F. Supp. 2d 640, 644 (E.D. Va. 2007). It therefore held that 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) was facially constitutional. Id. at 645. The court also held that the statute would not be unconstitutional as applied either because the statue permitted the court to remedy insufficient "ample opportunity" through a court order, thus rendering any as-applied challenge moot. Id. at 646. Applying the facts, the court found that the defense needed digital video experts to establish the defense that the images on his computer were virtual and not real. Id. at 647. The digital video experts who testified in the Knellinger case noted that they do not move the equipment needed to run digital video analysis and that it would be a great cost and effort to do so. They testified that they would not agree to service the defense team because their ability to do the job would be compromised. Id. at 646-48. The court ultimately found that the Government did not provide the defense team with an ample opportunity to inspect, view, and examine the child pornography because the experts needed to assert a "virtual-child" defense and could not conduct an analysis at a Government facility. Id. at 650. Therefore, the court ordered the Government to turn over a copy of the hard drive to the defense. Id.

In Sturm, the court adopted the reasoning of O'Rourke and Knellinger, and determined that 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) is not facially unconstitutional. No. 06-CR-00342, 2007 WL 1453108 (D. Colo. May 17, 2007), at *7. It also determined that the defense did not present with precision any actual or anticipated problems because the defense has not yet attempted to examine the images or work out an accommodation with the Government. Id. The court refused to rule for the defense based on hypothetical scenarios that could arise in any case, considering that witnesses suggested solutions to any hypothetical problems presented. Id. at *7-*8.

This Court finds the reasoning applied in O'Rourke, Knellinger, and Sturm persuasive. There is no indication of the purpose of § 3509(m) in the legislative history accompanying the Walsh Act.[3] See O'Rourke, 470 F. Supp. 2d at 1056 (citing 152 Cong. Rec. H676 (daily ed. Mar. 8, 2006) (statement of Rep. Conyers) and 152 Cong. Rec. H705-31 (daily ed. July 25, 2006)) (stating that § 3509(m) was added to the Walsh Act without consideration in committee and with virtually no explanation in the legislative history).

[3]There is a statement of purpose for the statute. However, there is no legislative history related to § 3509(m).

Nevertheless, it is the Court's responsibility to construe a statute to avoid a ruling of unconstitutionality, if possible. See Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Building & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988) (citing Grenada County Supervisors v. Brown, 112 U.S. 261, 269 (1884)) (stating that a statute should be given a reasonable construction so that it is not ruled unconstitutional); United States v. Ray, 375 F.3d 980, 988-89 (9th Cir. 2004) (applying doctrine of constitutional avoidance); Abner J. Mikva & Eric Lane, An Introduction to Statutory Interpretation and Legislative Process 6-16, 23-27 (1997). Therefore, the term "ample opportunity" in 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) must be read to at least include the same opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination that is required by Fifth and Sixth Amendments of the Constitution. In other words, Winslow's opportunity to view, inspect, and examine the evidence must afford him a fair opportunity to defend against the Government's accusations as required by due process. If the Government is not providing a fair opportunity consistent with the Due Process clause, this Court can order the Government to turn over a copy of the evidence. This Court's ability to order the production of evidence and correct any situation that does not amount to "ample opportunity" renders any as-applied challenge moot. Instead, this Court must examine the facts to determine if the requisite access to the evidence will be provided to Winslow's defense team.

C. Adequacy of Opportunity to Review Computer Hard Drive

In this situation, expert Lawson testified that defense experts examining a hard drive in a Government facility encounter a number of problems that make inspection, viewing, and examination difficult, if not impossible. These problems involve limited hours to access the evidence; limited privacy; limited contact with colleagues and defense attorneys because of a lack of phone reception; no Internet access to conduct research; inadequate preparation for trial, and possible damage to equipment when traveling. Winslow argues that because of these problems, when computer evidence is at issue, access to the computer at a Government facility is never going to amount to ample opportunity. The existence of these problems cause this Court concern about a defendant's right to a fair trial as encompassed in the Fifth and Sixth Amendments.

Winslow correctly argues that under constitutional jurisprudence he is entitled to access to evidence. See California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984) (citing United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 867 (1982))(stating that to safeguard a criminal defendant's right to be afforded a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense, the Court has developed "'what might loosely be called the area of constitutionally guaranteed access to evidence'").

Winslow also correctly argues that he has a right to the assistance of experts. See e.g., Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68, 83 (1985) (noting that indigent defendants have a right to receive the assistance of experts necessary for an adequate defense and holding that when sanity is to be an issue in trial, the state must assure the defendant access to a competent psychiatrist to conduct examinations and help prepare for the defense's preparation and presentation of the evidence).[4]

Underlying Winslow's argument as to why he does not have "ample opportunity" to view

[4]This right to expert assistance does not confer a constitutional right to choose a specific expert. Id. In this case, there is no evidence to suggest that Winslow will not be able to obtain an expert. In the Knellinger case, there was testimony from the digital video experts indicating that they would not take the case, leaving the defendant without expert assistance. 471 F. Supp. 2d at 647. In this case, while Lawson testified that many computer forensic experts are no longer taking cases similar to this one because of the restrictions imposed by 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m), he said his company still conducts computer analyses at Government facilities. In Knellinger, the digital video experts testified about the increased costs and impossibility of moving their equipment. 471 F. Supp. 2d at 647. According to the testimony of Lawson, his company has been moving equipment in order to conduct analyses off-site and nothing presented to this Court suggests that the equipment cannot be moved safely.

the hard drive is concern about the lack of privacy and the resulting disclosure of defense strategies and weaknesses. One of the questions presented by this case is whether the defense has a constitutional right to have defense experts view the evidence in private or whether it is acceptable for government agents to maintain video surveillance while discovery is underway. Here, the Government has conditioned access to the evidence upon an agreement that the experts remain under video surveillance. The Government promised that no audio recording would be made during discovery. No representation was made that the video images would not be recorded.

In United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225 (1975), the Court considered the qualified work product privilege in the criminal context (ruling that the privilege protecting a defense investigator's report is waived if the investigator seeks to testify on behalf of the defendant.) In describing the work product privilege, the Court stated:

> 'Historically, a lawyer is an officer of the court and is bound to work for the advancement of justice while faithfully protecting the rightful interests of his clients. In performing his various duties, however, it is essential that a lawyer work with a certain degree of privacy, free from unnecessary intrusion by opposing parties and their counsel. . . .
> Although the work-product doctrine most frequently is asserted as a bar to discovery in civil litigation, its role in assuring the proper functioning of the criminal justice system is even more vital. The interests of society and the accused in obtaining a fair and accurate resolution of the question of guilt or innocence demand that adequate safeguards assure the thorough preparation and presentation of each side of the case.

* * * * * *

> . . . [T]he doctrine is an intensely practical one, grounded in the realities of litigation in our adversary system. One of those realities is that attorneys often must rely on the assistance of investigators and other agents in the compilation of materials in preparation for trial. It is therefore necessary that the doctrine protect material prepared by agents for the attorney as well as those prepared by the attorney himself.

United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 238-9 (1975).

At least one district court has ruled that the Constitution requires that a defense expert be given private space to conduct a forensic examination of a hard drive allegedly containing child pornography. "Private space" was defined by the court as space where the expert "can conduct analyses of his choosing without purposeful or otherwise direct surveillance of those activities." United States v. Flinn, 2007 WL 3034932 at *7 (E.D. Cal. Oct. 16, 2007)

The Government's requirement that the discovery room remain under surveillance by closed circuit television, with the promise that the camera will not be trained on the computer monitor, does not provide "ample opportunity" to conduct discovery as required by the Constitution. Even without access to the final report of the expert, such surveillance can intrude upon the attorney work product privilege in meaningful ways. This is very troubling, particularly in light of the reason given by the Government for the surveillance. The stipulation of the parties states it is necessary "insure the integrity of FBI space and security of its occupants." The Court is confident that the FBI can accomplish this important goal by means that do not impermissibly infringe upon the constitutional rights of the defendant.

The effective examination by defense experts is further hampered in this case because the Government did not make phone lines available in the room and no cell phone reception was possible (Harvey Tr. 32, 73). Also, no internet access was possible (Harvey Tr. 72, 73). This makes communication with defense counsel impossible without leaving the building and stopping the forensic examination, causing significant delay in completion of discovery (Winslow Doc. 102, Affidavit of Marcus K. Laws).

As noted supra, Agent Laws testified that prior to the Walsh Act, mirrored hard drives containing copies of child pornography were delivered to defense attorneys and experts for discovery purposes. With a protective order in place, there had never been an instance in Alaska's history when the contraband was copied or illicitly distributed (Tr. 106). He also testified he was unaware of any instance in the country when that occurred. The single time a hard drive with contraband on it disappeared, it had been in the custody of the Government, he said (Tr. 110-111).

The Walsh Act greatly increases the inconvenience, difficulty, and expense connected with both the prosecution and defense of child pornography offenses. In this matter, the Government perceives the statute to require the monitoring of the discovery room by closed circuit TV while defense experts examine the hard drive and prepare for trial—a process that can require days or weeks. Similarly, defense expert time is spent traveling to the Government facility and returning to his lab as needed for equipment and expert consultations. This drives up the cost for the parties. United States v. Flinn, No. S-05-314, 2007 WL 3034932, at *5 (E.D. Cal. Oct. 16, 2007) (stating that the statute causes extra costs to be incurred). When a defendant is represented at taxpayer expense, the increased costs charged by the defense forensic examiner are ultimately paid by the taxpayer. See 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(e). When considering the new statute, one judge stated:

> One could reasonably argue that §3509(m) is legislation by anecdote, and is an overreaction to an infrequent problem, the burdens of which outweigh the possible benefits. However, Congress gets to make its judgments on less than empirically perfect data. Except in the most arbitrary situations, concerns about the wisdom of legislation are to be raised before Congress.

Flinn, 2007 WL 3034932, at *6.

In United States v. Harvey, 3:07-CR-00103-RRB-DMS, to accomplish discovery, the Government offered the defense a private room in a government facility, a basement room at Immigration and Customs Enforcement. The room was made available 24-hours a day both before and during trial, and phone access and internet access were provided. A government agent was posted outside the room but did not enter it. This Court ruled that these discovery conditions addressed all the significant problems set forth by defense expert Lawson, and provided ample opportunity to review the hard drive under circumstances coterminous with the constitutional requirements embodied in the Fifth and Sixth Amendments (Harvey, Doc. 104).

The same conclusion cannot be reached in the instant case. No phone or internet access is provided (Harvey Tr. 32, 72, 73). And, most importantly, privacy is not permitted. These restrictions impermissibly intrude upon both the defendant's Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights and are insufficient to "assure the thorough preparation and presentation of each side of the case" allowing for a "fair and accurate resolution of the question of guilt or innocence." U.S. v. Nobles, Id. As a result, this Court orders the Government to produce a copy of the hard drive to the defense team pursuant to the conditions described infra.

D. Ability to Copy Non-pornographic Files on Hard Drive

The hard drive in question also contains online chats and emails between Winslow and an undercover officer. This evidence is relevant to prove the charge of attempted aggravated sexual abuse. Defense expert Lawson testified that a forensic examination of such materials could reveal multiple users; determine whether the Internet chats reported by the Government were correctly reported and presented in the proper context; and profile the types of users in any chat rooms that may be at issue in the case.

In his motion, Winslow requests a copy of the computer files contained on the hard drive, which are not visual depictions of child pornography. See 18 U.S.C. §3509(m) (incorporating the definition of child pornography found at 18 U.S.C. §2256). The defense makes this request pursuant to Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, United States v. Hill, 322 F. Supp. 2d 1081 (C.D. Call 2004), and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to the Constitution.

It is unnecessary to resolve the question in the present case because the Court is directing that a copy of the hard drive be provided to defense counsel. Also, the stipulation of the parties states that the defense team can copy any file that is not contraband. If it is necessary for the expert to download copies of non-pornographic materials to complete his report, and this can be done without compromising the forensic integrity of the hard drive, this is permissible pursuant to Rule 16 and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to the Constitution. There is nothing in the plain language of § 3509(m) to prohibit it.

In Flinn, the court considered the expert request to remove downloaded materials which were not child pornography from the custody of the Government facility. The Court ruled:

> With the exception of materials which would be considered child pornography > under federal law, the expert may take off site that electronic or electronically derived information necessary for his examination or report; the expert will certify in writing that he has taken no materials which would be considered child pornography under federal law; and that he has not caused any such child pornography to be sent off site.. . .

Flinn, 2007 WL 3034932, at *6.

IV. CONCLUSION

This Court finds that the conditions for review offered by the Government in this case do not meet the Constitutional requirements of due process and a fair trial. The conditions also intrude on the defendant's Sixth Amendment rights. Thus, ample opportunity for review pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) has been denied. Therefore, Defendant Winslow's Motion for Order Compelling Discovery of All Computer-Related Evidence Seized from Randy D. Winslow is HEREBY GRANTED.

In light of the Government's failure to provide ample opportunity to review the hard drive, this Court orders that a copy of the HP Pavillion hard drive seized from the home of the defendant be immediately provided to defense attorney Kevin McCoy under the following terms and conditions:

1) The hard drive copy will be delivered to and remain in the exclusive control of defense investigator Bruce Johnson and will be maintained in a secure safe at the Federal Public Defender Agency in Anchorage.

2) Whenever the evidence is removed from the safe, the chain-of-custody will be documented and the date and time of its removal. Any analysis of the hard drive will occur in a locked, secure room. Only the defense attorney, investigator and expert may have access.

3) Any individual who handles or views any portion of the hard drive must sign a non-disclosure agreement, agreeing to refrain from copying or publishing any material which would be considered child pornography under federal law.

4) With the exception of materials which would be considered child pornography under federal law, the defense investigator and/or expert may download files or portions of files as long as the forensic integrity of the hard drive is not altered. He may take off site that electronic or electronically-derived information necessary for his examination or report; the expert will certify in writing that he has kept no materials which would be considered child pornography under federal law and that he has not caused any child pornography to be sent off site.

5) Upon completion of the hard drive examination, the hard drive will be returned to the Government.

6) The defense expert and/or investigator will certify that, upon completion of the hard drive examination, all files and remnants of the hard drive are permanently removed and deleted from the defense computer equipment.

DATED this 28th day of January, 2008, at Anchorage, Alaska.

Worden v. State
213 P.3d 144
Alaska App.,2009.
May 22, 2009

213 P.3d 144

Court of Appeals of Alaska.
Christopher J. WORDEN, Appellant, v.
STATE of Alaska, Appellee.

No. A-10005.
May 22, 2009.

Renee McFarland, Assistant Public Defender, and Quinlan Steiner, Public Defender, Anchorage, for Appellant.

Blair M. Christensen, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Special Prosecutions and Appeals, Anchorage, and Talis J. Colberg, Attorney General, Juneau, for Appellee.

Before: COATS, Chief Judge, and MANNHEIMER and BOLGER, Judges.

OPINION

COATS, Chief Judge.

After a jury trial, Christopher J. Worden was convicted of three counts of sexual abuse of a minor in the first degree,[FN1] six counts of sexual abuse of a minor in the second degree,[FN2] four counts of possession of child pornography,[FN3] and one count each of indecent exposure in the second degree [FN4] and unlawful exploitation of a minor. [FN5] Superior Court Judge Charles T. Huguelet sentenced Worden to a composite sentence of 37 years and 6 months' imprisonment with 21 years and 6 months suspended.

FN1. AS 11.41.434(a)(1).

FN2. AS 11.41.436(a)(2), (4).

FN3. AS 11.61.127.

FN4. AS 11.41.460(a).

FN5. AS 11.41.455(a)(6).

Worden appeals, arguing that Judge Huguelet erred in denying his motion to dismiss the indictment and in refusing to grant Worden's motion for a continuance when the State presented an expert witness without appropriate notice under Alaska Criminal Rule 16. Worden also argues that the evidence presented at trial was insufficient to support his conviction for possession of child pornography. Finally, Worden argues that Judge Huguelet imposed an excessive sentence.

We conclude that Judge Huguelet did not err in refusing to grant Worden's motion to dismiss the indictment and did not err in denying Worden's motion for a continuance. However, we conclude that the State did not present sufficient evidence to convict Worden of possession of child pornography. Because this latter decision affects Worden's sentence, we remand for resentencing and do not decide whether Worden's sentence was excessive.

Factual background

On May 27, 2002, Juanita Thirlwell was visiting her son and daughter-in-law, Gene and Shari Conner, and her grandchildren, including C.C. (age eleven) and S.B. (age nine) at their home in Kenai. Worden, a family friend, was also at the house. At some point, Worden, C.C., and S.B. went into another room to watch a movie. In a reflection in a window, Thirlwell saw Worden rubbing and squeezing S.B.'s buttocks and touching her vaginal area over her clothes. The next weekend, Thirlwell, Shari Conner, S.B., and C.C. reported the assault to the Kenai police.

On June 3, 2002, Kenai police officers interviewed Worden. Worden admitted to having engaged in some inappropriate conduct with C.C. and S.B. and was arrested. Worden's wife, Renee, gave the police permission to seize and search two computers from her home that Worden had used. Police department employee Virgil Gattenby conducted a forensic examination of the computers. He found multiple images of child pornography in the computer's cache files. Worden was indicted on numerous felony charges.

At trial, S.B. testified that Worden had touched her on her breasts, buttocks, and genital area numerous times, including the incident on May 27, 2002. She also stated that Worden digitally penetrated her vagina and anus, and made her masturbate him. C.C. testified that Worden had touched her buttocks and breasts on a few occasions. Worden was convicted and he now appeals.

Worden's motion to dismiss the indictment

Prior to trial, Worden moved to dismiss the indictment. Worden's motion was based on a factual inaccuracy. He argued that it was improper for Shari Conner, S.B.'s mother and C.C.'s stepmother, to sit on the grand jury panel that indicted him. In its opposition, the State pointed out that, although Conner was a member of the grand jury venire which had been called to hear cases over a three-month period, she did not sit on the panel that indicted Worden. In denying Worden's motion to dismiss the indictment, Judge Huguelet noted that Conner was not on the panel that indicted Worden and that Worden had not presented "particularized circumstances establishing the likelihood of a significant influence on the grand jury as a whole." FN6

FN6. Judge Huguelet was quoting from Patterson v. State, 747 P.2d 535, 537 (Alaska App.1987).

On appeal, Worden argues that, at the grand jury proceeding, the State "should have conducted a more searching inquiry into the grand jury's ability to impartially and fairly assess [Conner's] testimony." But Worden concedes that he did not raise this issue in the trial court. He must therefore establish plain error. Because Worden never raised this issue in the trial court, there is simply no record to indicate whether the grand jurors might have been prejudiced by their association with Conner. Further, even if Worden had established prejudice and Judge Huguelet had granted the motion to dismiss the indictment, the State could have easily reindicted Worden because the case against him was strong.FN7 There is simply no basis to find plain error.

FN7. See Gaona v. State, 630 P.2d 534, 536-37 (Alaska App.1981).

Worden's motion for a continuance

Worden argues that the State called an expert witness at trial without giving him the notice required by Alaska Criminal Rule 16. Rule 16(b)(1)(B) requires the prosecutor to inform the defendant, no later than forty-five days before trial, of any expert witnesses the prosecutor is likely to call at trial. Among other things, the prosecutor is to furnish the defendant with "a written description of the substance of the proposed testimony of the expert, the expert's opinion, and the underlying basis of that opinion." FN8

FN8. Alaska R.Crim. P. 16(b)(1)(B).

The witness in question was Virgil Gattenby. Gattenby worked at the Kenai Police Department as the communications supervisor. This job entailed running the 911 center, working as the system administrator, and occasionally doing computer forensics work. Gattenby was not a law enforcement officer but had previously been an information management officer in the military. In addition to maintaining computer networks for the Department of Defense, Gattenby's military experience included doing computer forensic analyses and testifying at court martials based on those analyses. Gattenby performed the computer forensic analysis on Worden's computer.

At trial, after the State asked Gattenby if he found child pornography on Worden's computer, Worden objected, apparently because he believed that the State would be eliciting an expert opinion from Gattenby. After a mostly inaudible bench conference, Judge Huguelet stated: "I won't allow [Gattenby] to give any expert opinions."

Worden did not make any further objections during Gattenby's testimony. But after Gattenby testified, Worden argued that portions of Gattenby's testimony constituted expert testimony and that the State had violated Rule 16 by not giving notice that it was calling Gattenby as an expert witness. Worden asked Judge Huguelet to strike Gattenby's testimony or to grant the defense a continuance. Worden represented that if the State had given notice that Gattenby would be called to testify as an expert, he would have obtained his own expert to analyze the information presented by Gattenby and might have called the expert as a witness at trial.

Judge Huguelet observed that Gattenby had testified before the grand jury. He concluded that Worden had known about the nature of Gattenby's testimony and that he had copies of the exhibits that Gattenby had relied upon for a long time. Worden conceded that he had possessed this information "for years." But Worden's attorney argued that it was not his job to ask "the State to hurry up and get their expert notice in so they can convict my client."

Judge Huguelet denied Worden's motion for a continuance. He concluded that Worden was on notice of the type of testimony that Gattenby was going to give and the issues that would be raised by that testimony. This conclusion is supported by the record. Furthermore, when Worden moved for a continuance, he never gave any indication of how long of a continuance he would need or what he specifically intended to accomplish if the court granted the motion for a continuance. Accordingly, we conclude that Judge Huguelet did not abuse his discretion in denying Worden's motion for a continuance.

In addition, we find that Worden has waived this objection. When Worden initially objected to Gattenby's testimony, Judge Huguelet ruled that he would not allow Gattenby "to give any expert opinions." This ruling alerted Worden that if he believed that Gattenby was testifying as an expert during some portion of his testimony, Worden should object. Judge Huguelet's implication appeared to be that if Worden could show that Gattenby was giving expert testimony, Judge Huguelet would sustain Worden's objection. But Worden never objected on this ground during Gattenby's testimony. And he cross-examined Gattenby on several technical portions of his testimony. By his inaction, Worden has waived this objection.

The State did not present sufficient evidence to convict Worden of possession of child pornography

Gattenby testified that when he examined Worden's computer, he found images of child pornography that Worden had accessed and viewed on the Internet. Gattenby's testimony supported the conclusion that Worden had intentionally accessed the child-pornography sites because his examination showed that: (1) Worden had visited certain websites containing child pornography more than once, and (2) it would have taken Worden's computer several minutes to load the images, and the images recovered had loaded completely.

But Gattenby testified that even though the images of child pornography were found amongst the cache files on the hard drive of Worden's computer, there was no indication that Worden had any intent to permanently store the images-his intent was simply to view the images on his computer screen for the time he was at a given website. Gattenby explained that when a person uses a computer to access a site on the Internet, the computer automatically stores the images from the web page in the browser cache. This enables the computer to load the web page more quickly when you revisit it, because data is accessed directly from the computer's hard drive rather than loading that data over the Internet. FN9

FN9. See United States v. Romm, 455 F.3d 990, 993 n. 1 (9th Cir.2006) ("Most web browsers keep copies of all the web pages that you view ... so that the same images can be redisplayed quickly when you go back to them." (quoting Douglas Downing et al., Dictionary of Computer and Internet Terms 149 (Barron's 8th ed. 2003))); see also Ty E. Howard, Don't Cache out Your Case: Prosecuting Child Pornography Possession Laws Based on Images Located in Temporary Internet Files, 19 Berkeley Tech. L.J. 1227, 1229-30 (2004) (explaining basic operation and purpose of cache).

Most people do not know that these temporary internet files are being stored on their computer when they access the Internet.FN10 A user would need a high level of computer knowledge to locate and access these images.FN11 Computer forensic experts like Gattenby often use specialized software to access the cache files.FN12

FN10. See, e.g., United States v. Kuchinski, 469 F.3d 853, 862 & n. 24 (9th Cir.2006) (noting government expert's agreement with statement that "most sophisticated-or unsophisticated users don't even know [the cache files are] on their computer").

FN11. See Giannina Marin, Possession of Child Pornography: Should You be Convicted When the Computer Cache does the Saving for You?, 60 Fla. L.Rev. 1205, 1213-14 (2008) ("A user needs advanced computer skills to directly access files in the cache while the computer is offline.").

FN12. See, e.g., Barton v. State, 286 Ga.App. 49, 648 S.E.2d 660, 661 (2007) (where State's expert testified that "no one using the computer can retrieve information stored in the temporary internet file folders without special forensic software").

In the present case, the State did not present any evidence that Worden had this specialized knowledge-that he was aware that images were stored in his computer's browser cache or that he might have the ability to access those images-at the time of the alleged offense. As Gattenby testified, the evidence supported the inference that Worden had viewed child pornography on certain websites at some point in the past. But there was no evidence that Worden knew that the images from these websites were being stored in his computer's cache or that he intended to save them on his computer.

The State's case, therefore, rested upon proof that Worden intentionally accessed and viewed images of child pornography over the Internet. But we conclude that AS 11.61.127, the Alaska Statute prohibiting the knowing possession of child pornography, does not criminalize merely viewing images of child pornography on a computer. The statute prohibits the "possession" of "material that visually or aurally depicts conduct [constituting child pornography]." FN13 Another section of the statute provides that "[e]ach film, audio, video, electronic, or electromagnetic recording, photograph, negative, slide, book, newspaper, magazine, or other material" depicting child pornography that is knowingly possessed by the defendant constitutes a separate crime.FN14

FN13. AS 11.61.127(a).

FN14. AS 11.61.127(c).

It is questionable whether the act of possessing material encompasses viewing an image on a computer screen. If Worden had gone to a movie depicting child pornography, it could not be said that he possessed the child pornography depicted in the movie, even though it might be clear that he had intentionally set out to view those images. Interpreting the former version of the federal statute criminalizing the possession of child pornography,FN15 which is similar to AS 11.61.127(c), federal courts have concluded that merely viewing child pornography on a computer, as opposed to saving it on the computer, was not prohibited by the statute.FN16 The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit interpreted the former federal statute to criminalize only the knowing possession of files on a hard drive or other computer storage device.FN17 It follows that where a defendant is not aware of the existence of the cache files, he has not committed a crime.

FN15. Former 18 U.S.C. 2252A(a)(5)(B) (2006) (making it a crime to "knowingly possess[ ] any book, magazine, periodical, film, videotape, computer disk, or any other material that contains an image of child pornography that has been ... transported in interstate or foreign commerce by any means, including by computer"), amended by Enhancing the Effective Prosecution of Child Pornography Act of 2007, Pub.L. No. 110-358, Title II § 203(b), 122 Stat. 4001, 4003-04 (2008) (inserting "or knowingly accesses with intent to view" into the operative language of 18 U.S.C. 2252A(a)(5)(B)).

FN16. See, e.g., United States v. Stulock, 308 F.3d 922, 925 (8th Cir.2002) (noting with approval the district court's holding that "one cannot be guilty of possession for simply having viewed an image on a web site, thereby causing the image to be automatically stored in the browser's cache, without having purposely saved or downloaded the image").

FN17. Kuchinski, 469 F.3d at 863 ("[W]here a defendant lacks knowledge about the cache files, and concomitantly lacks access to and control over those files, it is not proper to charge him with possession and control of the child pornography images located in those files, without some other indication of dominion and control over the images."); Romm, 455 F.3d at 1000 ("[T]o possess the images in the cache, the defendant must, at a minimum, know that the unlawful images are stored on a disk or other tangible material in his possession.").

Some state courts have construed their statutes prohibiting the possession of child pornography to criminalize the use of a computer to access images of child pornography over the Internet.[FN18] But those states' statutes are much broader than AS 11.61.127.[FN19]

FN18. See, e.g., Ward v. State, 994 So.2d 293, 301-02 (Ala.Crim.App.2007); Tecklenburg v. Superior Court, 169 Cal.App.4th 1402, 87 Cal.Rptr.3d 460, 472-73 (2009); Commonwealth v. Diodoro, 932 A.2d 172, 174-75 (Pa.Super.2007), cert. granted, 595 Pa. 537, 939 A.2d 290 (2007).

FN19. See, e.g., Cal.Penal Code § 311.11 (West 2008) (criminalizing possession or control of "any matter, representation of information, data, or image, including, but not limited to, any film, filmstrip, photograph, negative, slide, photocopy, videotape, video laser disc, computer hardware, computer software, computer floppy disc, data storage media, CD-ROM, or computer-generated equipment or any other computer-generated image that contains or incorporates in any manner, any film or filmstrip," that depicts minors engaging in or simulating sexual conduct).

A basic rule of statutory construction "is that statutes imposing criminal liability should be construed narrowly." [FN20] Therefore, "[w]hen the scope of a criminal statute is unclear, courts should normally construe the statute against the government-that is, construe it so as to limit the scope of criminal liability." [FN21] At best, AS 11.61.127 is ambiguous as to whether it criminalizes viewing a digital image of child pornography over the Internet. Because we must interpret the statute narrowly, we conclude that it does not prohibit viewing child pornography on a computer screen. Since this is the only conduct the State proved Worden knowingly engaged in, insufficient evidence existed to convict Worden of possession of child pornography.

FN20. State v. ABC Towing, 954 P.2d 575, 579 (Alaska App.1998).

FN21. Id.

Conclusion

We AFFIRM all of Worden's convictions except his convictions for possession of child pornography. Worden's convictions for possession of child pornography must be REVERSED and a judgment of acquittal must be issued. We do not decide whether Worden's sentence is excessive because Worden must be resentenced based on the reversal of his convictions for possession of child pornography.

The judgment of the superior court is AFFIRMED in part and REVERSED in part. The superior court shall resentence Worden within 90 days and transmit a copy of the judgment to this court. After the distribution of the amended judgment, Worden shall have 30 days to renew his sentence appeal. We retain jurisdiction.

STATE OF TENNESSEE v. RE'LICKA DAJUAN ALLEN

No. E2007-01018-CCA-R3-CD

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS OF TENNESSEE, AT KNOXVILLE

2009 Tenn. Crim. App. LEXIS 114

March 26, 2008, Session
February 12, 2009, Filed

SUBSEQUENT HISTORY: Rehearing denied by State v. Allen, 2009 Tenn. Crim. App. LEXIS 359 (Tenn. Crim. App., Mar. 9, 2009)
US Supreme Court certiorari denied by Allen v. Tenn., 2010 U.S. LEXIS 265 (U.S., Jan. 11, 2010)

PRIOR HISTORY: [*1]

State v. Butler, 2005 Tenn. Crim. App. LEXIS 302 (Tenn. Crim. App., Mar. 30, 2005)

DISPOSITION: Judgment of the Criminal Court Reversed and Remanded.

CASE SUMMARY:

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: The State sought review of a judgment of the Criminal Court for Knox County (Tennessee), which suppressed certain evidence it did not provide to defendant after being ordered to do so and which dismissed the indictment against defendant.

OVERVIEW: Defendant was indicted on two counts of aggravated exploitation of a minor and one count of sexual exploitation of a minor. The State refused to comply with requests for discovery by withholding the contents of defendant's computer hard drive and other computer materials alleged to contain incriminating evidence. The State refused to disclose the requested discovery despite the trial court's issuance of two protective orders, the ruling of the court on interlocutory appeal, and a third protective order by the trial court requiring disclosure. The court held that 18 U.S.C.S. § 3509 was not applicable to state prosecutions and even if it were, the difficulties of discovery only in a law enforcement facility and the compromise to the effectiveness of the defense expert justified the orders of production and the protective orders. In light of the prosecution statements to the trial court and the assurance of the attorney for the State at the appellate oral argument that the prosecution was ready to comply with the discovery orders, the court concluded that exclusion of the computer images in question and dismissal of the prosecution were erroneous under Tenn. R. Crim. P. 16.

OUTCOME: The court reversed the trial court's judgment, reinstated the indictment, and remanded the matter for trial.

[HN2] The police powers of a state are not to be preempted by federal legislation unless that is Congress's clear and manifest purpose. Congress's intent to preempt state laws must either be expressly stated in a federal statute or be implicit in the statute's structure and purpose.

Criminal Law & Procedure > Discovery & Inspection > Discovery by Defendant > Tangible Objects > General Overview
[HN3] Title 18, § 3509(m) of the United States Code does not explicitly refer to state prosecutions. The law references Fed. R. Crim. P. 16 in superceding that rule's discovery procedures. The statute also refers to the prosecution as the Government, a term typically used in federal statutes to denote the government of the United States not the government of a state. Finally, the statute is part of Part II of Title 18 of the United States Code which is dedicated to Criminal Procedure. Section 3509(m) does not apply to proceedings in Tennessee state courts. Further, the statute does not criminalize any conduct that was not already illegal under 18 U.S.C.S. §§ 2251, 2252 and 2252(a) long before the passage of § 3509.

Criminal Law & Procedure > Discovery & Inspection > Discovery by Defendant > Tangible Objects > General Overview
[HN4] Even if 18 U.S.C.S. § 3509 were applicable to state proceedings, the statute has been interpreted to allow disclosure of offending materials where a defendant has shown that an analysis of the material at a government facility would be cost prohibitive; doubt about the reliability of an expert's equipment would be raised if the expert were forced to move the equipment; or that the expert's ability to analyze the material is so compromised that he is of no effective service to Defendant or Defendant's attorney.

OPINION

Defendant, Re'Licka Dajuan Allen, was indicted on two counts of aggravated exploitation of a minor and one count of sexual exploitation of a minor. The State refused to comply with Defendant's requests for discovery by withholding the contents of Defendant's computer hard drive and other computer materials alleged to contain incriminating evidence. The State refused to disclose the requested discovery despite the trial court's issuance of two protective orders, the ruling of the appellate [*2] court on interlocutory appeal, and a third protective order by the trial court requiring disclosure. After a final hearing, the trial court suppressed the evidence and dismissed the indictment against Defendant. The State argues on appeal that the trial court erred in suppressing the evidence based upon the perceived threat of federal prosecution to defense counsel. Following our review of the parties' briefs, the record, and the applicable law, we reverse the judgment of the trial court, reinstate the indictment and remand for trial.

OPINION

I. BACKGROUND

Defendant was charged in a three-count indictment alleging sexual and aggravated sexual exploitation of a minor stemming from the possession of child pornography. Defendant's case was consolidated with another case presented by the State on interlocutory appeal. The facts of Defendant's underlying offenses were summarized in the appellate court's opinion as follows:

> [The defendant] was charged by the Knox County Grand Jury on June 17, 2003, with one count of sexual exploitation of a minor for possessing materials that included a minor engaged in sexual activity, and with two counts of aggravated sexual exploitation of a minor for possessing, [*3] with the intent to transport and with the intent to distribute, materials that included a minor engaged in sexual activity, in violation of Tennessee Code Annotated section 39-17-1004. Both cases involved material located on Defendants' computers. In [the defendant's] case, the material was originally discovered by a computer repair technician at a store where [the defendant] had taken his computer for repair. The technician informed his manager of his discovery, and the manager in turn contacted Knox County law enforcement.

*State v. Richard Allen Butler, No. E2004-00359-CCA-R9-CD, 2005 Tenn. Crim. App. LEXIS 302, 2005 WL 735080, at 1 (Tenn. Crim. App., at Knoxville, Mar. 30, 2005) perm. app. denied 2005 Tenn. LEXIS 687 (Tenn. Aug. 22, 2005), abrogated by State v. Pickett, 211 S.W.3d 696 (Tenn. Jan. 22, 2007).

After the charges were filed, Defendant filed a motion for discovery, which included a request that the State provide him with copies of the computer hard drive and other computer materials. The State refused Defendant's discovery request but offered instead to make Defendant's computer hard drive available for inspection at the Sheriff's Department. Thereafter, Defendant filed a motion to compel discovery. At a hearing on his motion [*4] to compel, Defendant's computer expert testified that simply being allowed access to Defendant's computer hard drive at the Sheriff's Department would not permit him to conduct a sufficient evaluation. The defense expert's testimony was summarized in this court's opinion as follows:

> In [Defendant's] case, a hearing on his motion to compel was held at which the State presented one witness, Carlton Bryant, an attorney employed at the Knox County Sheriff's Department. Bryant testified that his understanding of the law was that the sheriff's department could not allow counsel to take a copy of the computer hard drive from the department because the sexual exploitation statute did not contain any exemption for defense counsel to be given child pornography. He said they would, however, accommodate counsel and counsel's computer experts by mirror-imaging the hard drive and allowing them to examine the copy while it remained in the "custody and control" of the department. He testified that they contemplated setting aside a conference room for that purpose and would arrange a schedule that was convenient for counsel and his experts.
> Herbert Mack, [Defendant's] expert computer witness, described [*5] in detail the various programs and viruses by which material can be both deliberately and inadvertently downloaded into a computer and estimated that it would take him approximately one week of intensive twelve-to fourteen-hour days to complete an examination of [Defendant's] computer hard drive. He testified he would probably require the assistance of support personnel from his office and, in addition, would need to consult regularly with counsel with respect to whether any sexually explicit files he found on the computer qualified as child pornography. He said that, given the large number of images allegedly contained on the computer, he would not be able to remember the specifics of the information without taking the computer hard drive from the sheriff's department.
> Mack expressed concern about working from a "mirror image" rather than the hard drive itself, testifying that the computer programs in existence did not create true mirror images:
> A. Well, the question-what I heard before was providing me with a mirror image. Okay. If we're talking about me working on the original computer, no, I don't need another computer as long as I can, you know, load my tools and take my tools off. [*6] If what you're going to give me is a mirror image, my concern there is that I'm not getting all of the data that's there.

> Q. And why is that? If it's a mirror image wouldn't you just get everything that's in the mirror?
> A. No, sir.
> Q. Why not?
> A. A mirror image is a misnomer, okay. The computer programs that you have right now, okay, are for the purpose of recovering good data. Okay. So if a file has been ordered damaged or erased it's not going to be on the image.
> Mack conceded that his examination of the actual hard drive would entail reconnecting the original personal computer equipment, turning the computer on, and loading his software file-searching tools, and he agreed that in the process of booting up the Windows operating system the contents of the hard drive would be changed. However, according to his testimony, booting the computer would not alter either the file creation date or last accessed date of the images in question. Mack testified he was familiar with "EnCase," a forensic examination software utility available exclusively to law enforcement, but he was not aware that it had been approved by several federal district and appellate courts as a "non-invasive forensic examination [*7] tool."

In addition to the testimony above, Mack further testified that the risk of transmitting inaccurate information was high if defense counsel was dependent upon Mack to tell defense counsel what he had seen on a computer disk image. Mack stated that there was an increased risk of disclosing non-discoverable information because the State's expert would be able to determine what tools had been run on Defendant's computer hard drive and what information had been recovered before Defendant was obligated to disclose its expert report. Mack also stated that Defendant would have no choice but to involuntarily disclose information that was not subject to discovery and that Defendant did not intend to use at trial.

At the conclusion of the hearing on the motion to compel, the trial court issued a protective order requiring disclosure of a mirror image of the computer hard drive. However, the State refused to comply. Defendant filed a "Renewed Motion to Suppress" as a result of the State's noncompliance with the court's order. In response, the trial court issued a second protective order requiring disclosure of the discovery materials to Defendant.

After the issuance of the second [*8] protective order by the trial court, the State filed an interlocutory appeal under Rule 9 of the Tennessee Rules of Appellate Procedure. The State argued that compliance with the discovery request violated Tennessee sexual exploitation statutes. At the conclusion of the interlocutory appeal, this court found that the trial court did not err in ordering the State to comply with Defendant's discovery request.

> [We] conclude that the possession, copying, or distribution of child pornographic materials does not constitute a violation of Tennessee's sexual exploitation of a minor statutes so long as it occurs in the context of the prosecution or defense of a case under the statute. . . . [T]he trial court[ ] entered protective orders to keep the evidence secure and to confine its dissemination to defense counsel and counsel's agents and employees in the preparation of their defense. We find these orders reasonable and appropriate, especially given [Defendant's] computer expert's testimony with respect to the extensive and exhaustive work entailed in his examination of [Defendant's] computer hard drive. Accordingly, we conclude that the trial courts did not err in granting Defendant['s] motion [*9] to compel the production of the evidence.

*Richard Allen Butler, 2005 Tenn. Crim. App. LEXIS 302, 2005 WL 735080, at 11. This Court affirmed the trial court's issuance of the two previous protective orders. However, the State continued to deny Defendant's discovery request. Thereafter, Defendant filed a "Second Renewed Motion to Suppress," again requesting suppression of the evidence. The State filed a response to Defendant's motion and argued that enactment of an amendment to federal law, known as the "Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act" ("the Adam Walsh Act"), now prevented the State from granting Defendant's discovery request to provide copied images of the alleged child pornography taken from Defendant's computer. The trial court entered a third protective order, which again instructed the State to provide copies of the discovery material requested by the defense. In its order, the court stated:

> In its March 30, 2005 decision, the Court of Criminal Appeals clearly contemplated the State's proposal of mirror-imaging Defendant's hard drive and allowing counsel to examine the copy while it remained in the "custody and control" of the Sheriff's Department. *State v. Butler, No. E2004-00359-CCA-R9-CD, 2005 Tenn. Crim. App. LEXIS 302, at 6 (Tenn. Crim. App. Mar. 30, 2005). [*10] The Court also considered the State's argument that the sexual exploitation statute provides no exception allowing possession of such material by defense counsel or experts. *Id. at 26. Despite taking these arguments under advisement, the court held "that the possession, copying, or distribution of child pornographic materials does not constitute a violation of Tennessee's exploitation of a minor statutes so long as it occurs in the context of the prosecution or defense of a case under the statute." *Id. at 33 (emphasis added). The Court clearly stated that both the Allen and Butler Trial Courts' Protective Orders were "reasonable and appropriate" under Tenn. R. Crim. P. 16(a)(1)(C). Id. In upholding the Butler and Allen Orders, the Court specifically relied upon computer expert testimony detailing the extensive and exhausting work involved in examining a computer hard drive. Id.

> The state has continued to refuse to provide [Defendant] with an independent examination of the evidence against him. The State has persisted in allowing [Defendant] access to his hard drive and other evidence only while it is under the "custody and control" of the Sheriff's Department, despite the fact that [*11] the Criminal Court of Appeals found this Court's . . . Order to be reasonable and appropriate. *Butler, No. E2004-00359-CCA-R9-CD, 2005 Tenn. Crim. App. LEXIS 302, at 33.

In response to the issuance of the trial court's third protective order mandating disclosure of discovery, the State filed a "Motion to Reconsider and/or Motion to Clarify the Court's Protective Order." In this motion, the State argued that the enactment of the Adam Walsh Act "unequivocably bann[ed]" the distribution or dissemination of child pornography to defense counsel during litigation, thereby reversing the appellate court's ruling in Butler on the basis that the Adam Walsh Act, under the doctrine of federal preemption, superseded Tennessee criminal procedural rules governing discovery. Defendant filed a memorandum in response to the State's motion. In Defendant's response memorandum, Defendant detailed cases in other jurisdictions which held that the Adam Walsh Act did not preempt those States' discovery rules.

A hearing was held on the State's motion to reconsider. At the hearing, the State informed the court that it had contacted the U.S. Attorney's office, as it believed it was obligated to do, and disclosed [*12] that a copy of the mirror image of the computer hard drive would be provided to defense counsel and their experts. The State informed the court that defense counsel, any defense expert, as well as court staff and others could be at risk of federal prosecution for possession of child pornography in violation of the Adam Walsh Act if the discovery material was turned over to Defendant. At the hearing, the following exchange occurred between the trial court and the State:

> [Prosecutor]: I'm here and ready, Judge. I can't make any promises about what would happen in - I mean there's dual jurisdiction in child pornography cases. They know that.
> The Court: What happens if my court reporter takes it? Is she subject to federal prosecution? Is the court clerk and Miss Phillips subject to federal prosecution?
> [Prosecutor]: Judge, I have absolute immunity in my prosecutorial functions. This is a prosecutorial function. I don't know about anybody else.
> The Court: Well, there's another alternative. And that is because I have ordered this be turned over at least three times and the appellate court has too, I can suppress the evidence and you can appeal that to the appellate court and see if we can't [*13] get the appellate court to tell us how they'd like to approach these cases because the State of Tennessee is going to have to do something.
> . . . .
> [Prosecutor]: I'm here and ready to comply with the order, Judge, the initial order where you'd have me turn it over. We appealed that to the Court of Appeals and it came back down.
> The Court: Yes, and they told you to turn it over, and I told you to turn it over.

[Prosecutor]: You re-ordered me, and then I filed a Motion to Reconsider based on the Adam Walsh case, and you haven't ruled on the Adam Walsh case yet. Today is the day that you rule on Adam Walsh -

. . . .

The Court: Did you notify the U.S. Attorneys?

[Prosecutor]: Yes, I did.

The Court: Then - then I want the disc lodged with the court reporter to be sealed and filed under seal. I hereby suppress the evidence in this case, and the State is free to appeal the suppression of evidence. I hereby suppress the evidence that's on the disc; let's put it like that. I don't know what other evidence the State wants to offer . . . .

. . . .

The Court: Well, I'm suppressing the evidence based upon what Mr. Bell just said, that they cannot - they're totally chilled from being able to evaluate their [*14] own - evaluate the evidence against them.

[Prosecutor]: So you're suppressing it because I notified the U.S. Attorney that they were taking possession -

The Court: No. I'm suppressing it because they can't get it under federal law because - you know, that's up to you whether you notified the U.S. Attorney because I think you - there are certain things you have to do under the law as well. But I don't see how you can proceed with a prosecution with regard to this, turn that over to them, and not - and them not be able to do what they need to do, which was what the whole issue was about.

The disc had to be a mirror image because any manipulation of the computer disc changes the evidence, and that was the whole point. And they need to have their expert evaluate it. So how can they do that? They can't not without violating the law.

And as attorneys, they're standing up and saying to me, as officers of the court, they don't wish to violate the law, and I respect that.

So I'm going to suppress the evidence as a result of that disc, but I'm locking it up so that we have that disc. And I think you ought to consult with whoever you consult with to deal with the suppression issues -

. . . .

[Prosecutor]: [*15] The contents of that hard drive are - contain all of the counts in the indictment. So if you're suppressing . . . the actual child pornography that's contained thereon, then you're in effect -

The Court: In effect, dismissing -

[Prosecutor]: - dismissing -

The Court: - the case.

. . . .

The Court: If you'd like me to go ahead -

[Prosecutor]: - so that we could -

The Court: - and do an outright dismissal, then I dismiss it.

[Prosecutor]: Yes. So that we could Rule 3 it.

The Court: It's hereby dismissed.

After the trial court suppressed the evidence and dismissed the case against Defendant, the state filed a timely notice of appeal.

II. ANALYSIS

Risk of Federal Prosecution

As noted, the State argued in the trial court that Section 3509(m) of Title 18 of the United States Code, part of the Adam Walsh Act, effectively preempts discovery in child pornography cases and that conducting discovery in violation of the act could subject defense counsel to federal prosecution for possession of child pornography. 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) provides:

> [HN1] (1) In any criminal proceeding, any property or material that constitutes child pornography (as defined by section 2256 of this title) shall remain in the care, > custody, [*16] and control of either the Government or the court.

> (2)(A) Notwithstanding Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, a court shall deny, in any criminal proceeding, any request by Defendant to copy, photograph, duplicate, or otherwise reproduce any property or material that constitutes child pornography (as defined by section 2256 of the title), so long as the Government makes the property or material reasonably available to Defendant.
> (B) For the purposes of subparagraph (A), property or material shall be deemed to be reasonably available to Defendant if the Government provides ample opportunity for inspection, viewing and examination at a Government facility of the property or material by Defendant, his or her attorney, and any individual Defendant may seek to qualify to furnish expert testimony at trial.

The question we must initially address is whether this statute preempts our own state rules regarding discovery in state prosecutions for crimes involving child pornography. This is a question of first impression in this state.

[HN2] "The police powers of a state are not to be preempted by federal legislation unless that [is] Congress's clear and manifest purpose." State v. Scott, 678 S.W.2d 50, 51 (Tenn. 1984). [*17] Congress's intent to preempt state laws must either be expressly stated in a federal statute or be implicit in the statute's structure and purpose. Id.

It can readily be seen that [HN3] Section 3509(m) does not explicitly refer to state prosecutions. The law references Fed. R. Crim. P. 16 in superceding that rule's discovery procedures. The statute also refers to the prosecution as the "Government," a term typically used in federal statutes to denote the government of the United States not the government of a state. Finally, the statute is part of Part II of Title 18 of the United States Code which is dedicated to "Criminal Procedure." In the case of State ex rel. Tuller v. Crawford, 211 S.W.3d 676 (Mo. Ct. App. 2000), the Missouri Court of Appeals relied on these factors in concluding that Section 3509(m) is a procedural provision applicable only to federal courts. Id. at 679. We agree with the reasoning of Crawford and hold that Section 3509(m) does not apply to proceedings in Tennessee state courts. Further, the statute does not criminalize any conduct that was not already illegal under Sections 2251, 2252 and 2252(a) of Title 18 of the United States Code long before the passage of Section 3509.

We [*18] have been unable to find a single state or federal criminal prosecution of defense counsel anywhere in the country based on counsel's possession of child pornography as part of a state's discovery procedures. We think the likelihood of federal prosecution of defense counsel in this case for possession of child pornography is remote at best and did not justify the suppression of evidence and dismissal of the prosecution of Defendant.

Moreover, [HN4] even if Section 3509 were applicable to state proceedings, the statute has been interpreted to allow disclosure of offending materials where a defendant has shown that an analysis of the material at a government facility would be cost prohibitive; doubt about the reliability of an expert's equipment would be raised if the expert were forced to move the equipment; or that the expert's ability to analyze the material is so compromised that he is of no effective service to Defendant or Defendant's attorney. See United States v. Knellinger, 471 F.Supp. 2d 640, 647-48 (E.D.Va. 2007). In Richard Allen Butler the trial court and this Court found that forcing the defense expert to conduct the "extensive and exhaustive work" entailed in examining Defendant's [*19] computer hard drive in a law enforcement facility would compromise significantly the expert's usefulness to the defense. *2005 Tenn. Crim. App. LEXIS 302, 2005 WL 735080, at 11. Consequently, we held the trial court's orders compelling production of evidence along with protective orders to restrict the dissemination of the offending material solely in the preparation of the defense were reasonable and proper. Id. We believe this case is analogous to Knellinger and that even if Section 3509 were applicable to this prosecution the difficulties of discovery only in a law enforcement facility and the compromise to the effectiveness of the defense expert justify the orders of production in this case as well as the protective orders. Therefore, we hold that the trial court erred in dismissing this case out of fear that defense counsel would be subject to a federal prosecution under §3509.

Dismissal for Failure to Comply with Tennessee Rule of Criminal Procedure 16

[HN5] Tennessee Rule of Criminal Procedure 16 governs most discovery issues in Tennessee criminal cases. The record in this case also reflects that the trial court was to some extent concerned about the prosecution's obstinate refusal to comply with the orders of both [*20] the trial court and this Court regarding discovery in this case. The dismissal of the indictment could be interpreted as punishment for the prosecution's pertinaciousness in the failing to follow the discovery orders. [HN6] Although under certain circumstances exclusion of evidence and dismissal of a criminal prosecution is proper under Tennessee Rule of Criminal Procedure 16 for failure of the State to comply with discovery orders, that power should be used sparingly and only when necessary to avoid irremediable prejudice to Defendant from discovery violations. See State v. Garland, 617 S.W.2d 176, 185 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1981). In light of the prosecution statements at the hearing in the trial court on this matter and the assurance of the attorney for the State at the appellate oral argument that the prosecution is now ready to comply with the discovery orders of this Court and trial court, we hold that exclusion of the computer images in question and dismissal of the prosecution were erroneous. If the prosecution is now willing to comply, the potential prejudice to Defendant is not irremediable.

We understand the frustration of the trial court over the persistent refusal of the prosecution [*21] to comply with court orders. However, exclusion of the evidence in question and dismissal of the indictment was not the proper method to punish the prosecution once a willingness even grudgingly expressed was made to at last comply with the discovery orders. Any further refusal to comply with the orders of the trial court should be punished with the court's contempt powers. Garland, 617 S.W.2d at 185.

CONCLUSION

In light of the foregoing the judgment of the trial court is reversed, the indictment is reinstated and the case is remanded for trial.

JERRY L. SMITH, JUDGE

DISSENT BY: J.C. MCLIN

DISSENT

J.C. MCLIN, Judge, dissenting.

Because the state, as the appellant, failed to meet its burden of proving that the trial court committed an abuse of discretion by suppressing the evidence, I must respectfully dissent from the majority.

The state's refusal to disclose the discovery material it was obligated to provide was a violation of the rules of discovery. Specifically, the rule states that: "[u]pon a defendant's request, the state shall disclose to the defendant . . . (I) the defendant's relevant written or recorded statements, or copies thereof . . . ." Tenn. R. Crim. P. 16(a)(1)(B). "'[S]uppression by the prosecution [*22] of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution.'" Sample v. State, 82 S.W.3d 267, 270 (Tenn. 2002) (quoting Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 87, 83 S. Ct. 1194, 10 L. Ed. 2d 215 (1963)). A defendant may be accorded certain remedies based upon the state's noncompliance. Rule 16(d)(2)(A)-(D) of the Tennessee Rules of Criminal Procedure provides as follows:

> If a party fails to comply with this rule, the court may: (A) order that party to permit the discovery or inspection; specify its time, place, and manner; and prescribe other just terms and conditions; (B) grant a continuance; (C) prohibit the party from introducing the undisclosed evidence; or (D) enter such other order as it deems just under the circumstances.

The exchange of discovery matters is regulated by our Tennessee Rules of Criminal Procedure. Specifically, Rule 16(d)(2)(D) governs the exchange in criminal matters:

> Although Rule 16 of the Rules of Criminal Procedure does not explicitly provide as one of the sanctions the dismissal of the indictment after failure to comply with a discovery request or order, the rule [*23] does provide that the court may enter such sanction "as it deems just under the circumstances." Tenn. R. Crim. P. 16(d)(2)(D). This opened-ended language of the Rule authorizes the dismissal of an indictment in certain circumstances when a court would otherwise have "no effective sanction for failure to comply with its order." State v. Collins, 35 S.W.3d 582, 585 (Tenn. Crim. App. 2000); see also State v. Freseman, 684 S.W.2d 106, 107 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1984) (suggesting that if a trial court has the authority to dismiss a case as a sanction for failure to comply with discovery orders, it is implied authority pursuant to Tenn. R. Crim. P. 16(d)(2)). However, the Rule provides the court with many other methods for assuring compliance without resorting to such extreme measures. A trial court has wide discretion in fashioning a remedy for non-compliance with a discovery order, and the sanction should fit the circumstances of the case. See Collins, 35 S.W.3d at 585.

*State v. Downey, 259 S.W.3d 723, 2008 WL 3540371 at 9 (Tenn. 2008). After providing this analysis, the court held that "[g]iven the discretion afforded the trial court in fashioning the penalty, we [*24] conclude that the trial court's decision to suppress . . . was sufficient penalty for the State's discovery violation." Id. Furthermore, "[i]t is well settled that decisions with regard to pre-trial discovery matters rest within the sound discretion of the trial court. The decision of the trial court in discovery matters will not be reversed on appeal unless a clear abuse of discretion is demonstrated." Benton v. Snyder, 825 S.W.2d 409, 416 (Tenn. 1992). "The abuse of discretion standard contemplates that before reversal the record must show that a judge 'applied an incorrect legal standard, or reached a decision which is against logic or reasoning that caused an injustice to the party complaining.'" State v. Coley, 32 S.W.3d 831, 833 (Tenn. 2000) (citations omitted) overruled on other grounds by State v. Copeland, 226 S.W.3d 287 (Tenn. 2007).

In the instant case, the hearing on the state's motion to reconsider arose from the trial court's issuance of a third protective order requiring disclosure of the requested discovery materials under Rule 16 of the Tennessee Rules of Criminal Procedure. The state's blatant, continued refusal to disclose the requested discovery created the very [*25] problem which forced the trial court to suppress the evidence. The trial court issued a total of three protective orders requiring disclosure, and the state refused to comply each time. The third order came after the appellate court, upon interlocutory appeal, affirmed the trial court's two previous orders. The state had ample time to comply, and its failure to do so is evidence of its intentional bad faith. The period of time ranging from the trial court's issuance of the first protective order to the passage of the Adam Walsh Act was more than two-and-half years. Assuming the state was entitled to excuse its delay in part based upon its reliance on the appellate court's interlocutory ruling, the state still refused to turn over the requested discovery for a period of more than one year and four months before the passage of the Adam Walsh Act. Even more importantly, the state has offered no justification for its failure to comply with the court's orders at any point in time. I would also note that the trial court's decision was further complicated by the state's eleventh-hour willingness to provide the discovery to the defendant only under threat of potential federal prosecution. [*26] Based on the passage of the Adam Walsh Act, it appeared that anyone, including defense counsel, its staff, or experts retained by the defendant, faced possible federal prosecution once they took possession of the discovery material. Given the precarious position that both the defendant and the court were placed in by the state if they accepted the discovery material, it is my view that the trial court did not err when it found that it had "no other reasonable alternative" but to suppress the evidence. See State v. Smith, 926 S.W.2d 267, 270 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1995).

As identified previously, the state, as the appealing party, has a duty to demonstrate that the trial court abused its discretion by suppressing the evidence. Snyder, 825 S.W.2d at 416. The state is unable to show how, or in what manner, the trial court committed such abuse. The state argues without citation to legal authority, that there was "no need for the trial court to take the drastic measure of sua sponte suppressing the evidence" and further contends that there was "no lawful basis" for suppression. As noted above, the trial court clearly had the discretion to suppress the evidence. *See Downey, 259 S.W.3d 723, 2008 WL 3540371, at 9. [*27] It is the state who has appealed, and it is the state that has failed to meet its burden of showing that the trial court abused its discretion by suppressing the evidence or abused its inherent powers to dismiss a case for failure to comply with discovery. Iverson v. Xpert Tune, Inc.., 553 So. 2d 82, 87 (Ala. 1989).

I agree with the majority that the trial court could have and should have sanctioned the state by holding it in contempt for its willful non-compliance with the court's repeated orders. However, this remedy, in my view, is not one that the trial court was necessarily required to employ. Furthermore, arguing that the trial court erred because it did not exhaust all possible remedies before suppressing the evidence erroneously shifts the burden from the state as the appellant, whose obligation it is to show an abuse of discretion, by the trial court. The majority opinion imposes an affirmative duty upon the trial court to show why it did not hold the state in contempt or institute any other remedies before suppressing the evidence. Because the function of this appellate court is to act as a court of error, it is my opinion that the majority opinion exceeds this court's authority [*28] by requiring that the trial court first exhaust all other remedies before finding that it acted within its discretion under Rule 16 by suppressing the evidence in this case.

For the reasons stated above, I would affirm the judgment of the trial court.

J.C. McLIN, JUDGE

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA
Richmond Division

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

v. Criminal No. 3:06cr126

DAVID LEROY KNELLINGER

MEMORANDUM OPINION

This matter is before the Court on the Supplemental Brief in Support of Motion to Dismiss (Docket No. 46) filed by the defendant, David Leroy Knellinger, in which Knellinger asserts that 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) is both invalid and unconstitutional. For the following reasons, Knellinger's motion is denied. However, Knellinger's request for a mirror image copy of his computer hard drive, which contains the child pornography images listed in the Superseding Indictment (Docket No. 14), is granted subject to the entry of an appropriate protective order and a certification by counsel for Knellinger that he will use that copy for assessment and preparation of a defense.

BACKGROUND

Knellinger stands charged with seven counts of transporting, attempting to transport, receiving, and possessing child pornography (Docket No. 14). The statutory maximum sentence faced by Knellinger is twenty years imprisonment on each count. On July 17, 2006, Knellinger filed a Motion for Independent Analysis of Physical Evidence and Protection Order (Docket No. 21), in which he requested a copy of the computer hard drive that was seized during a search of his residence and that now is in the possession of law enforcement authorities. That hard drive contains the images of child pornography at issue in this case, and Knellinger's counsel sought a copy of the hard drive so that computer experts could examine it, and the images contained therein, to help counsel ascertain therefrom the basis for a defense to the pending charges. During a telephone conference on July 26, 2006, the United States agreed to provide Knellinger with a mirror image copy of his computer hard drive and, accordingly, the Court denied as moot Knellinger's Motion for Independent Analysis (Docket No. 31).

However, the very next day, on July 27, 2006, the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, Pub. L. No. 109-248, 120 Stat. 587 (2006), was signed into law. A provision of that statute, codified at 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m), requires that child pornography remain in the custody of the United States or the Court, and prohibits a defendant from obtaining copies thereof so long as the United States provides the defendant "ample opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination" of the child pornography "at a Government facility." Because of this new law, the United States told Knellinger that it could not honor its agreement to turn over a mirror image copy of his computer hard drive, and the United States has been in sole possession of the child pornography images ever since.

At a hearing on August 28, 2006, Knellinger raised a challenge to the constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m). Knellinger claimed that he is constitutionally entitled to copies of the child pornography that will be presented as evidence against him and that 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) violates the Constitution by preventing him from having those copies. The Court asked the parties to brief the issue, invited amicus briefs from the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, the Federal Public Defender, and the University of Richmond Law School, and held an evidentiary hearing on November 6, 2006 to determine whether 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) violates Knellinger's rights under the United States Constitution.

DISCUSSION

As described above, Knellinger's primary objection to 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) is that it prevents him from obtaining a copy of the child pornography in this case for independent examination. Section 3509(m) reads as follows:

> (M) Prohibition on reproduction of child pornography. --
> (1) In any criminal proceeding, any property or material that constitutes child pornography (as defined by section 2256 of this title) shall remain in the care, custody, and control of either the Government or the court.
> (2)(A) Notwithstanding Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a court shall deny, in any criminal proceeding, any request by the defendant to copy, photograph, duplicate, or > otherwise reproduce any property or material that constitutes child pornography (as defined by section 2256 of this title), so long as the Government makes the property or material reasonably available to the defendant.

> (B) For the purposes of subparagraph (A), property or material shall be deemed to be reasonably available to the defendant if the Government provides ample opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination at a Government facility of the property or material by the defendant, his or her attorney, and any individual the defendant may seek to qualify to furnish expert testimony at trial.

18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) (emphasis added). As Knellinger correctly points out, the effect of the statute is to prevent the Court from ordering the United States to provide Knellinger with a copy of the child pornography in this case so long as the United States makes that material "reasonably available" to Knellinger in a Government facility. The upshot is that Knellinger's counsel has not been able to conduct the type of examination that he feels is necessary to assess effective defenses to the very serious charges that Knellinger now faces. For that reason, Knellinger challenges the validity of § 3509(m). He first argues that § 3509(m) is an invalid amendment to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. He also asserts that § 3509(m) is unconstitutional, both facially and as applied in this case. Knellinger seeks either dismissal of the indictment or a copy of the child pornography that will be presented as evidence against him.

A. Knellinger's Assertion That § 3509(m) Offends The Rules Enabling Act

Knellinger contends that § 3509(m) is invalid because it promulgates a rule of criminal procedure, thereby amending a current rule, without following the requirements of the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2071 et seq. This challenge to the power of Congress lacks merit. Congress at all times retains the authority to enact statutes affecting federal rules of procedure. As the Fifth Circuit summarized in Jackson v. Stinnett:

> It has long been settled that Congress has the authority to regulate matters of practice and procedure in the federal courts. ... Congress delegated some of this power in 1934 by passing the Rules Enabling Act, which gave the Supreme Court the power to promulgate rules of practice and procedure for United States courts. ... Although Congress has authorized the Court to exercise some legislative authority to regulate the courts, Congress at all times maintains the power to repeal, amend, or supersede its delegation of authority or the rules of procedure themselves.

102 F.3d 132, 134-35 (5th Cir. 1996) (citations omitted). Indeed, Congress often has enacted statutes that repeal, amend, or supercede existing rules of federal procedure, and courts consistently upheld the power of Congress to do so. See, e.g., Floyd v. United States Postal Service, 105 F.3d 274, 277-78 (6th Cir. 1997) (upholding provisions of the Prison Litigation Reform Act which conflicted with the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure); United States v. Mitchell, 397 F. Supp. 166, 170

(D.D.C. 1974), aff'd sub nom, United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (upholding authority of Congress to extend the life of a federal grand jury beyond the expiration date prescribed by Rule 6 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure). Given the ultimate Congressional authority over the federal rules of procedure, there is no merit to Knellinger's argument that Congress ran afoul of the Rules Enabling Act by passing a subsequent statute that also affects the rules of federal criminal procedure.

B. Knellinger's Constitutional Challenges To § 3509(m)

1. Separation of Powers

In ways that are neither adequately explained nor readily apparent, Knellinger asserts that § 3509(m) offends the constitutionally-imposed separation of powers between the legislative and the judicial branches of government. The argument amounts to an assertion that Congress cannot tell "an Article III court how to rule on a motion before it." (Def's Reply to United States' Resp. in Opp. to Def.'s Supp. Br. in Supp. of Mot. to Dismiss "Def.'s Reply" at 15.) This contention appears to be predicated on the arguments respecting the Rules Enabling Act, and, to that extent, is meritless for the reasons explained above.

In any event, this argument, which was unaccompanied by citation in Knellinger's Supplemental Brief in Support of Motion to Dismiss (Docket No. 46), and was accompanied only by indiscriminate inapposite citation in his Reply (Docket No. 50), was not raised during or after the evidentiary hearing on November 6, 2006, and, quite frankly, appears to have been abandoned. Hence, it will not be further considered.

2. Knellinger's Constitutional Arguments Respecting The Rights Of Criminal Defendants

Knellinger also argues that § 3509(m) deprives criminal defendants of their right to a fair trial under the United States Constitution.[1] (See Def.'s Supp. Br. in Supp. Of Mot. to Dismiss at 16-17; Def.'s Reply at 6-11.) The constitutional rights which produce a "fair trial" are implicated by the restrictions imposed by § 3509(m) on the custody and reproduction of child pornography that is the subject of a criminal proceeding. However, while those restrictions are serious and significant, they have limited reach. Defendants, including Knellinger, may obtain, by court order, copies of child pornography when the United States cannot provide an "ample opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination at a Government facility." Consequently, § 3509(m) is not an absolute prohibition on copying child pornography for inspection outside a Government facility. That being the case, Knellinger's facial challenge to the statute can succeed only if he can demonstrate that no application of the statute's safety valve provision ("ample opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination at a Government facility") would be sufficient to protect the constitutional rights of any criminal defendant. See United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 745 (1987). Knellinger's argument therefore turns on the definition of "ample opportunity."

While the statute does not define "ample opportunity," that term must be read to include at least every opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination required by the Constitution. If read in that way, any opportunity for inspection that falls short of that mark would enable a court to order a copy given to the defendant for inspection outside a "Government facility." Long-established canons of statutory construction require the Court to read "ample opportunity" in just this way. As the Supreme Court reiterated in Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. V. Florida Gulf Coast Building & Constr. Trades Council:

> '[t]he elementary rule is that every reasonable construction must be resorted to, in order to save a statute from unconstitutionality.' This approach ... also recognizes that Congress, like this Court, is bound by and swears an oath to uphold the Constitution. The courts will therefore not lightly assume that Congress intended to infringe constitutionally protected liberties or usurp power constitutionally forbidden it.

485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988) (citing Grenada County Supervisors v. Brown, 112 U.S. 261, 269 (1884)). Because Knellinger does not explain why "ample opportunity" cannot reasonably be read to, at a minimum, protect the constitutional rights of defendants, the Court need not further address Knellinger's facial constitutional challenge.[2]

Moreover, "ample opportunity" may, in some circumstances, include greater access than what the Constitution alone would require. In interpreting this same statutory provision, another district court noted that "[t]he word 'ample' means 'generous or more than adequate in size, scope, or capacity.'" United States v. O'Rourke, No. CR 05-1126-PHX-DGC, 2007 WL 104901, *4 (D. Ariz. Jan. 17, 2007) (citing Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary 39 (1981)). As discussed above, the opportunity to inspect, view, and examine contemplated by § 3509(m)(2)(B) requires, at a minimum, whatever opportunity is mandated by the Constitution; therefore, an opportunity that is "generous" or "more than adequate" may, in some circumstances, require more access than what would be mandated by the Constitution alone.[3] Under that interpretation of "ample

[2] To the extent that Knellinger contests this reading of the statute, he does not explain why this reading is unreasonable, nor does he offer an alternative definition for "ample opportunity." (See Def.'s Reply at 6.) Indeed, even after the evidentiary hearing in this matter, which focused largely on the meaning of "ample opportunity," Knellinger has never adequately explained why the Court cannot order production of the child pornography if the Government has failed to provide an ample opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination at a Government facility. (See Def.'s Post-Hearing Br.; Def's Post-Hearing Reply Br.)

[3] The O'Rourke court similarly construes "ample opportunity." While, in rejecting the defendant's constitutional challenges to § 3509(m), the court noted that "ample opportunity" might be "coterminous with the requirements of due process," and that "ample opportunity" requires "due-process-level access" to evidence, the court ultimately held that the defendant was not entitled to a copy opportunity," the Court need not necessarily resolve Knellinger's as applied constitutional challenge in order to determine whether Knellinger has been afforded an "ample opportunity" to access his hard drive. If the statutorily required ample opportunity to access his hard drive has not been provided, the Court may order production of the hard drive without deciding whether the Constitution would also compel its production.

As the United States correctly argues, whether there is ample opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination is a factual issue that must be resolved on the record in each case. Thus, the threshold task here is to assess, on the record made in this case, whether Knellinger has been afforded an ample opportunity to inspect, view, and examine the hard drive at a Government facility. If the Court finds that the statutorily required ample opportunity has been provided, Knellinger's constitutional rights will, by definition, have been protected.[4] If ample opportunity has not of his computer hard drive because his particular concerns did not "amount to a denial of due process or of an ample opportunity to inspect the hard drive." 2007 WL 104901, *6 (emphasis added). If "ample opportunity" were necessarily "coterminous" with the requirements of due process, there would have been no need for the court to have considered the defendant's alleged difficulties with § 3509(m) under the requirements of both due process and "ample opportunity." Thus, the O'Rourke court, like this Court, concluded that "ample opportunity" means, only at a minimum, the opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination required by the Constitution.

[4] This conclusion accords with those reached by the only courts to have previously considered the constitutionality of § 3509(m). See United States v. Johnson, 456 F. Supp. 2d 1016 (N.D.

been provided, the statute itself renders Knellinger's as applied constitutional challenge moot because the statute permits the Court to provide a copy of the materials to the defense. Here, as discussed below, the Court finds that ample opportunity has not been provided on the facts of this case, so there is no need further to consider Knellinger's as applied challenge to the statute.

C. Knellinger's Opportunity To Inspect, View, And Examine The Child Pornography In This Case

The United States contends that it has afforded an adequate opportunity for inspection, viewing, and examination by offering to provide a private room in the Richmond, Virginia offices of the Federal Bureau of Investigation where counsel and his experts can access the hard drive. Knellinger disputes that contention.

An evidentiary hearing was held on November 6, 2006 to resolve this factual dispute. In support of his position, Knellinger presented expert testimony from one computer forensic expert, two digital video experts, and a trial attorney with extensive experience handling child pornography cases.[5] The United States

Iowa 2006); O'Rourke, No. CR 05-1126-PHX-DGC, 2007 WL 104901; United States v. Butts, No. CR 05-1127-PHX-MHM, 2006 WL 3613364 (D. Ariz. Dec. 6, 2006).

[5] The United States challenges the relevance of the testimony provided by Knellinger's digital video experts because they do not have extensive experience in child pornography cases. (See United States Resp. in Opp. to Def.'s Post-Hearing Br. Concerning the Constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) at 20-22.) However, while the experts have minimal experience in child pornography cases, presented no evidence.

Knellinger's first witness, Mark Vassel, is a computer forensic expert who already has conducted an analysis of Knellinger's hard drive in this case. Vassel, however, does not need to view images of child pornography to conduct the sort of analysis in which he specializes, so, while he expressed some frustration with the strictures of § 3509(m), the statute apparently did not prevent him from doing his job. (See Evidentiary Hr'g Tr. ("Hr'g Tr.") 9, 33, Nov. 6, 2006.)

Knellinger's second witness, Louis Sirkin, is a trial lawyer based in Cincinnati, Ohio. Sirkin has extensive experience as a defense attorney in child pornography cases, and was primary counsel in Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002). (Hr'g Tr. 75.) In Ashcroft, the Supreme Court of the United States struck down certain provisions of the Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996 as overbroad. 535 U.S. at 258. The provisions were overbroad because they proscribed images that were neither obscene nor produced with real children. See id. at 250. Therefore, Sirkin noted, a defendant like Knellinger, who is not charged with violating obscenity laws, may argue that the child pornography he they have extensive experience in the sort of analysis that would be conducted in a child pornography case. The experts are therefore qualified to assist the Court in understanding the type of analysis that Knellinger seeks to undertake. If the United States had wanted to challenge the substantive testimony of these two experts, it could have put on testimony from its own experts. The United States chose not to do so.

possessed was not produced using real minors.[6] (Hr'g Tr. 83.) Sirkin himself has pursued that "viable defense" and has had child pornography analyzed by experts in order to determine whether or not the children depicted were real. (Id. at 120.) According to Sirkin, such an analysis is "absolutely essential" where a defendant intends to pursue that line of defense.[7] (Id. at 87.)

Knellinger's final two witnesses were the types of digital video experts who could conduct the analysis described by Sirkin as "absolutely essential" in a case like Knellinger's. Both described the great cost and effort that would be required to conduct their analyses in a Government facility. Tom Owen, the third witness, testified that he would normally charge approximately $135,000 to analyze the child pornography in this case, but that he would charge approximately $540,000 if he had to analyze those materials away from his offices in a Government facility. (Id. at 163-64.) That figure does not include the cost of transporting the quite extensive collection of equipment that is necessary to his analysis, which would take approximately one week and three men to

[6] Knellinger is charged in this case with transporting, attempting to transport, receiving, and possessing child pornography made only with real minors. See 18 U.S.C. § 2256(8)(A). That, of course, does not foreclose the defense that the images are not real minors but, instead, are computer-generated images.

[7] Sirkin also testified at length about many practical problems that § 3509(m) will create for defense attorneys. While helpful to the Court, a recitation of his testimony is not necessary here.

move, and which would require "a box truck... 20 feet long and 10 feet wide."[8] (Id. at 152-53.)

Moreover, even if Owen were able to move his equipment to a Government facility, he would have concerns about its reliability after the move. (Id. at 165.) And, even if he thought his equipment was functioning properly, his personal ability to analyze the evidence thoroughly and carefully would be compromised to such a degree that he "wouldn't be able to service the client or the attorney" effectively. (Id. at 165-66.) The practical consequence of all these difficulties is that, while Owen's testimony indicates that it would be conceptually possible for Owen to conduct his time-consuming analysis in a Government facility, Owen would not agree to work on a case like Knellinger's because he could not feasibly move his equipment to, or properly do his work in, a Government facility. (Id. at 165.)

Knellinger's final witness, James Griffin, testified similarly. Griffin has never moved all of his digital video analysis equipment from his offices to another location, but he calculated that such an effort would take more than "several days" each time he was required to disassemble and transport his equipment. (Id. at 232.) Like Owen, Griffin testified that he would also have to charge significantly more for his services if he conducted an analysis of child pornography outside his offices in a Government facility, even if transportation of his equipment were possible. (Id. at 235.) Finally, Griffin also testified that, although it might theoretically be possible to bring his own equipment to a Government facility and analyze the child pornography images outside his offices, he would not agree to work on a case like Knellinger's because of the difficulty associated with moving equipment to, and adequately performing his analytical work in, a Government facility. (Id. 242.)

[8] It would be necessary for Owen or any other expert to bring his own equipment because the United States has not offered to provide the requisite equipment in a Government facility for the expert's use. (See Hr'g Tr. 268-69; United States' Resp. in Opp. to Def.'s Post-Hearing Br. Concerning the Constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) at 22-23.) This is not surprising, because Owen's equipment costs approximately $350,000. (Hr'g Tr. 167.)

In sum, Knellinger's witnesses established that assessment and presentation of a viable legal defense in Knellinger's case requires expert analysis and testimony, and that qualified experts could not reasonably be expected to agree to conduct the required analysis given the extremely burdensome practical effects of § 3509(m) on the reliable discharge of their obligations. The United States presented no witnesses or other evidence to controvert that offered by Knellinger.

Although the United States put on no evidence of its own, it was able, on cross-examination, to make two salient, but ultimately non-dispositive points: (1) that none of Knellinger's technical witnesses were aware personally of a case in which child pornography had been produced using entirely virtual children; and

(2) that the analysis sought by Knellinger could, in abstract theory, be conducted in a Government facility. The United States therefore argues that Knellinger is pursing a "fairy tale" defense and that he has not made sufficient efforts to comply with § 3509(m). (United States' Resp. in Opp. to Def's Post-Hearing Br. Concerning the Constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) ("United States' Resp.") at 5.)

The first point asks the Court to foreclose to Knellinger the opportunity to explore a potentially viable legal defense simply because it is novel. The United States has cited no authority to support the principle that a district court is empowered to intrude into the investigation and preparation of potential defenses in a criminal case at such a preliminary stage and, in so doing, to peremptorily preclude the development of a potential defense.[9]

Moreover, in Ashcroft, the United States argued that "the possibility of producing [child pornography] images by using computer imaging makes it very difficult for it to prosecute those who produce pornography by using real children," and that experts "may have difficulty in saying whether the pictures were made by [9] Of course, it always is appropriate for a district court to assess whether requested evidence may be relevant to the case and to the defense thereof when deciding whether the evidence must be made available to the defense. The United States has conceded that point by agreeing to make the hard drive available to Knellinger's counsel before § 3509(m) was enacted. Moreover, the record developed since then shows that the hard drive could form the basis for a viable defense. Neither § 3509(m) nor any other principle of law cited by the United States or known to the Court requires more.

using real children or by using computer imaging." 535 U.S. at 254. The rather obvious implication of that argument, of course, is that improvements in technology may make it increasingly difficult for laymen to distinguish pornography produced with real children from pornography produced with virtual children. Furthermore, the Supreme Court has recognized the potential availability of the defense that Knellinger wishes to develop. Id. at 254-55. And, this record establishes that a respected and competent lawyer has pursued this defense and has had child pornography analyzed by experts in assessing the availability of that defense. For the foregoing reasons and on this record, the Court is loath to foreclose to Knellinger the opportunity to explore the possibility that the child pornography at issue here was produced without the use of real children.[10]

As to the second point, the record here establishes that the defense theory being pursued by Knellinger requires a kind of analysis that cannot be conducted feasibly by outside experts in the facility as offered by the United States. Even though, as the United States pointed out, it is theoretically possible for outside experts to transport their equipment to a Government facility and conduct their analyses on-site, the practical reality is that experts would not agree to such terms and that Knellinger ultimately would be prevented from conducting his analysis at all. Considering the testimony from the legal and technical experts in this case and the absence of any opposing evidence, the Court concludes that, at least in this case, the record permits no other factual conclusion.

[10] After Ashcroft, Congress amended its child pornography statutes in a manner that still proscribes certain computer-generated images of child pornography. See 18 U.S.C. 2256(8)(b). As noted above, however, Knellinger is not charged under that definition of child pornography, so Knellinger's proposed "virtual child" defense is viable in this case.

The United States also argues that Knellinger's request to analyze the child pornography in this case is "disingenuous." (Id. at 3.) The United States argues that Knellinger has not yet hired an expert like Owen or Griffin to conduct the analysis, and that Knellinger has not contacted the United States about conducting such an analysis in a Government facility were an expert like Owen or Griffin hired. (Id. at 3-5.) A simple explanation for this, however, is that, as far as the Court can tell from the record, a reasonable expert would not agree to conduct the analysis required in this case because of the cost and difficulty of moving the necessary equipment to, and adequately providing the appropriate services in, a Government facility. Therefore, it would make sense that Knellinger has not yet hired an expert because Knellinger has not known whether or not he will be given a copy of the child pornography in this case. Moreover, the record provides good reason to conclude that Knellinger is not, as the United States puts it, simply engaging in "litigation for litigation's sake" because of the great cost associated with conducting the analysis that the evidence shows to be appropriate here. (United States' Resp. at 5.)

Because the United States did not present evidence that contradicts the evidence put forth by Knellinger, and because Knellinger's witnesses were both credible and relevant, the Court accepts the showing made by Knellinger's experts as true. On this record, which includes the evidence from Knellinger's legal and technical expert witnesses, the Court finds that technical expert witnesses are a necessary component of the assessment and presentation of a viable legal defense that is available to Knellinger, and that the United States has not provided Knellinger an ample opportunity for those experts, or counsel in conjunction with the experts, to conduct the required analysis of the child pornography in this case at a Government facility. The Court further concludes that the analysis described by Owen and Griffin at the evidentiary hearing constitutes an "examination" within the plain meaning of 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m)(2).[11]

Thus, under the terms of § 3509(m), it is necessary to order production of a copy of the hard drive to the defense. Production is necessary to ensure Knellinger an ample opportunity to conduct the examination described by Owen and Griffin at the evidentiary hearing, and to give his counsel an opportunity to participate in [11] To "examine" means "to test by an appropriate method," and an "examination" is "the act or process of examining." Webster's Third New International Dictionary 790 (1961).

that examination in order to evaluate its ramifications for the legal defenses Knellinger might raise.[12]

However, the Court also is mindful that Knellinger has not yet advised that he has retained expert witnesses to examine the copy of the hard drive here at issue. And, the record establishes that a copy of the hard drive is of no use to the defense unless there is a defense expert to examine the copy. Therefore, it would be contrary to the provisions of § 3509(m) to require delivery of a copy of the hard drive unless the defendant promptly advises the Court that it has retained an expert witness for that purpose.

In sum, the statute, § 3509(m), can be given a reasonable construction which avoids the need for a constitutional decision in this case. That construction simply requires the Court to ascertain on the basis of a record whether the statutorily required ample opportunity to examine, view, and inspect the hard drive has been given. If not, the statute permits a copy to be supplied. On this record, the ample opportunity has not been provided, and production of a copy, on certain terms, will be required.

[12] The United States has conceded that "[a]mple opportunity also requires that the defense is able to prepare any exhibits it deems necessary to be used in support of their case." (See United States' Resp. at 17.) That issue is not presently before the Court, so a mirror image copy of Knellinger's hard drive will not be allowed, at this point, to be used by Knellinger's experts or counsel to produce exhibits. That issue will be taken up, as necessary, at a later time.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Knellinger's motion to dismiss the indictment based on the unconstitutionality of § 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) (Docket No. 46) is denied. However, because the Court also concludes that the United States cannot provide Knellinger an ample opportunity to inspect, view, and examine the child pornography listed in the Superseding Indictment, the Court, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3509(m)(2), will order a mirror image copy of Knellinger's hard drive provided to Knellinger's counsel and made available to either Tom Owen or James Griffin if counsel for Knellinger certifies to the Court that the copy will be used for the assessment or presentation of a defense as discussed by Owen, Griffin and Sirkin during the evidentiary hearing held on November 6, 2006. Custody and use of that copy will be subject to an appropriate protective order that, inter alia, will punish any distribution or publication not authorized.

The Clerk of the Court is directed to send a copy of this Memorandum Opinion to all counsel of record.

It is so ORDERED.

Re: Senate Bill 222 – relating to sexual offenses and domestic violence

Dear Senator French:

I am writing to respectfully request that you schedule Senate Bill 222 for a hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee at your earliest convenience. SB 222 is one of several bills that the Governor has introduced to confront and help reduce the alarming and discouraging rate of sex offenses and crimes involving domestic violence in our state.

The bill makes important changes to several criminal laws. For example, it clarifies that accessing child pornography with and intent to view it is a crime. A recent court decision found that our statute requires more than viewing child pornography on a computer to be a crime. The bill responds to this decision. The bill also requires a person to register as a sex offender in our state if they are required to do so in another state. Alaska should not be a friendly destination to persons hoping to avoid sex offender registration by moving to our state.

A sectional analysis is attached that describes each provision of the bill.

Thank you for your consideration of this request.

Sincerely,

Daniel S. Sullivan
Attorney General

SENATE BILL 222
SEXUAL ASSAULT AND DOMESTIC VIOLENCE
Sectional Analysis

Sections 1 and 2 correct an error made in 2007 when the legislature enacted AS 11.56.759, that adopted a class A misdemeanor if a sex offender violates specific conditions of probation or parole. One of the requirements of the crime is that the person have served the entire period of incarceration imposed for the crime. This is effective for probationers, but not for parolees, because a person is never on parole if he or she has served the entire period of incarceration. A member of the Parole Board brought this issue to our attention, because the statute has caused problems for the board in dealing with parolees. These sections remove parolees from the statute.

Section 3 rewrites AS 11.56.840, failure to register as a sex offender in the second degree. Although the proposal is similar to current law, it removes the requirement that the state prove a culpable mental state for the conduct of not registering or otherwise filing the required notices and information. The state would still be required to prove that the person knew he or she was required to register and failed to do so. The section also adopts an affirmative defense that unforeseeable circumstances outside the control of the person prevented him or her from registering, and that the person contacted the Department of Public Safety immediately upon being able to do so.

Section 4 would raise a form of harassment in the second degree (that is, with intent to harass or annoy another person, the person subjects the other person to offensive physical contact) to harassment in first degree if the offensive physical contact is by the offender touching the other person's genitals, anus, or female breast. Harassment in the first degree is a class A misdemeanor; the second degree offense is a class B misdemeanor. There have been prosecutions recently involving offensive touchings that occurred so quickly that the court concluded that the victim did not have time to convey lack of consent to the offender. The court reduced these charges from sexual assault to harassment in the second degree. This conduct is more serious that a class B misdemeanor; the bill would raise it to a class A misdemeanor.

Sections 5, 6, and 7 address a problem with Alaska law prohibiting possession of child pornography that was raised by a recent decision of the Alaska Court of Appeals, Worden v. State, 213 P.3d 144 (Alaska App. 2009). Worden held that our current statute does not prohibit a person from viewing child pornography on a computer; rather, the statute requires that the person must also save it on the computer to be considered to possess it. In response to this decision, the bill adopts the federal approach. It prohibits possession of child pornography, and it also prohibits a person from knowingly accessing child pornography on a computer with the intent to view it.

The bill also proposes an affirmative defense that is similar to federal law. The affirmative defense would address a situation where a person finds child pornography on their computer, and did not obtain it themselves. The defense requires that there are three or less depictions, and the person, without showing the material to another person except law enforcement, destroys the depictions or contacts law enforcement and turns it over to them.

Sections 8, 9, and 10 amend the crime that prohibits the electronic distribution of indecent material to minors by expanding the offense to prohibit any distribution of indecent material to minors.

Section 11 adds the crimes of human trafficking in the first and second degrees, distribution of child pornography, possession of child pornography, and distribution of indecent materials to minors to the crimes that are not eligible for a suspended imposition of sentence.

Section 11 also includes an amendment that removes "substantially" when describing a crime in another jurisdiction that may be a predicate conviction that would disallow the use of a suspended imposition of sentence for other offenses. This conforms with other statutes that require that a predicate offense in another jurisdiction be only similar to an offense in Alaska. Examples include AS 12.55.145(a) (presumptive sentencing), AS 11.41.320(a)(5) (third degree assault), and AS 11.41.110(a)(5) (murder in the second degree).

Section 12 adds to the conditions of probation that may be imposed on a person convicted of a sex offense. It gives the court discretion to order the person to submit e-mail addresses and other networking addresses to his or her probation officer, who would be required to give this information to the Troopers and to the local law enforcement agency. If the person was convicted of sexual abuse of a minor or an offense related to child pornography, it gives the court discretion to prohibit the person from using an Internet site, communicating with children under 16 years of age, or possessing or using a computer.

Section 13 amends the aggravating factor at sentencing that allows the court to increase a sentence above the sentencing range if the defendant knew that the victim was particularly vulnerable. It does this by adding the consumption of alcohol or drugs as factors that might make a victim particularly vulnerable.

Section 14 adds two new aggravating factors to the sentencing law. First, it allows the court to increase a sentence above the sentencing range for a crime against a person (AS 11.41) committed against a person that the defendant was dating or with whom the defendant has engaged in a sexual relationship. Second, it allows the court to increase the sentence if the defendant is convicted of sexual abuse of a minor in the second degree under AS 11.41.436(a)(2) (a person 16 years of age or older having sexual contact with a child under 13 years old), if the defendant is 18 years old or older.

Section 15 adds a new provision to sex offender registration law that requires a person present in Alaska, who is convicted of an offense out of state that requires registration in that jurisdiction, to register in Alaska. This requirement would apply even if Alaska does not have a criminal provision similar to the crime in the other state that requires registration there.

Section 16 amends Rule 16(b)(1)(A) by prohibiting the copying of child pornography as part of the discovery process in a criminal prosecution. It would allow defense counsel, the defendant, and defense experts to examine the material, but it must be kept in the custody and control of a law enforcement agency or the prosecuting authority. Federal law has a similar provision. 18 U.S.C.A. § 3509(m).

Sections 17 and 18 include the applicability and effective date provisions.

DATE: March 19, 2010
RE: SB 239: Correction on number of ignition interlock devices issued in Alaska in 2009

After the March 11th Senate Judiciary Hearing on SB 239, there was some concern expressed over the presentation of the 218 limited licenses issued as compared to over 3,513 court orders for ignition interlock devices in 2009.

I did contact DMV again to verify the count. In my correspondence with Kerry Hennings, Drivers License Manager for the Department of Motor Vehicles, she stated that there were 218 applications for limited licenses of which 193 were approved. These are licenses which require proof of an ignition interlock device installation.

According to Cindy Cashen at the Highway Safety Office, there were 1,245 IIDs installed in the state in 2009. Cashen contacted four interlock providers. A breakdown of the companies and numbers of IID's installed is provided below.

Smart Start	570
Draeger Safety Diagnostics	500
Autosense International	130
LifeSafer Interlock	45
Total:	1,245

I also contacted two IID providers. The first provider, located in Fairbanks, stated that in 2009 he installed approximately 500 devices and gave anecdotes of people keeping the IID after the required court ordered time. The second provider, located in Anchorage, stated that he installed 130 IIDs, he gave anecdotes of more female drivers being compliant than male drivers.

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to ignition interlock devices, to refusal to submit to a chemical test, and to driving while under the influence."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 11.76.140(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person commits the crime of avoidance of ignition interlock device if the person knowingly

(1) circumvents or tampers with an ignition interlock device in a manner intended to allow a person on probation under AS 12.55.102, with a condition of sentence under AS 12.55.102 or another section, or who has an ignition interlock limited license to avoid using the device;

(2) rents a motor vehicle to a person and with criminal negligence disregards the fact that the person is on probation under AS 12.55.102, has a condition of sentence under AS 12.55.102 or another section, or has an ignition interlock limited license, unless the vehicle is equipped with an ignition interlock device described in AS 12.55.102; or

(3) loans a motor vehicle to a person and knowingly disregards the fact that the person is on probation under AS 12.55.102, has a condition of sentence under AS 12.55.102 or another section, or has an ignition interlock limited license, unless the vehicle is equipped with an ignition interlock device described in AS 12.55.102.

 Sec. 2. AS 28.35.030(b) is amended to read:

(b) Except as provided under (n) of this section, driving while under the influence of an alcoholic beverage, inhalant, or controlled substance is a class A misdemeanor. Upon conviction,

(1) the court shall impose a minimum sentence of imprisonment of

(A) not less than 72 consecutive hours, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege, including any limited privilege, to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of six [12] months [DURING THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $1,500 if the person has not been previously convicted;

(B) not less than 20 days, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege, including any limited privilege, to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 12 [24] months [DURING THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $3,000 if the person has been previously convicted once;

(C) not less than 60 days, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege, including any limited privilege, to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 18 [36] months [DURING THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $4,000 if the person has been previously convicted twice and is not subject to punishment under (n) of this section;

(D) not less than 120 days, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege, including any limited privilege, to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 24 months [THROUGHOUT THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $5,000 if the person has been previously convicted three times and is not subject to punishment under (n) of this section;

(E) not less than 240 days, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege, including any limited privilege, to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 30 months [THROUGHOUT THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $6,000 if the person has been previously convicted four times and is not subject to punishment under (n) of this section;

(F) not less than 360 days, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege, including any limited privilege, to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 36 months [THROUGHOUT THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $7,000 if the person has been previously convicted more than four times and is not subject to punishment under (n) of this section;

(2) the court may not

(A) suspend execution of sentence or grant probation except on condition that the person

(i) serve the minimum imprisonment under (1) of this subsection; [AND]

(ii) pay the minimum fine required under (1) of this subsection;

(B) suspend imposition of sentence; or

(C) suspend the requirement for an ignition interlock device;

(3) the court shall revoke the person's driver's license, privilege to drive, or privilege to obtain a license under AS 28.15.181, and may order that the motor vehicle, aircraft, or watercraft that was used in commission of the offense be forfeited under AS 28.35.036; and

(4) the court may order that the person, while incarcerated or as a condition of probation or parole, take a drug or combination of drugs intended to prevent the consumption of an alcoholic beverage; a condition of probation or parole imposed under this paragraph is in addition to any other condition authorized under another provision of law.

 Sec. 3. AS 28.35.030(g) is amended to read:

(g) Notwithstanding (b) of this section, [IF THE COURT IMPOSES PROBATION UNDER AS 12.55.102] the court may reduce the fine required to be imposed under (b) of this section by the cost of the ignition interlock device.

 Sec. 4. AS 28.35.030(n) is amended to read:

(n) A person is guilty of a class C felony if the person is convicted under (a) of this section and either has been previously convicted two or more times since January 1, 1996, and within the 10 years preceding the date of the present offense, or punishment under this subsection or under AS 28.35.032(p) was previously imposed within the last 10 years. For purposes of determining minimum sentences based on previous convictions, the provisions of (u)(4) of this section apply. Upon conviction, the court

(1) shall impose a fine of not less than $10,000, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 60 months [THROUGHOUT THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a minimum sentence of imprisonment of not less than

(A) 120 days if the person has been previously convicted twice;

(B) 240 days if the person has been previously convicted three times;

(C) 360 days if the person has been previously convicted four or more times;

(2) may not

(A) suspend execution of sentence or grant probation except on condition that the person

(i) serve the minimum imprisonment under (1) of this subsection; [AND]

(ii) pay the minimum fine required under (1) of this subsection; [OR]

(B) suspend imposition of sentence; or

(C) suspend the requirement for an ignition interlock device;

(3) shall permanently revoke the person's driver's license, privilege to drive, or privilege to obtain a license subject to restoration of the license under (o) of this section;

(4) may order that the person, while incarcerated or as a condition of probation or parole, take a drug or combination of drugs, intended to prevent the consumption of an alcoholic beverage; a condition of probation or parole imposed under this paragraph is in addition to any other condition authorized under another provision of law;

(5) shall order forfeiture under AS 28.35.036 of the vehicle, watercraft, or aircraft used in the commission of the offense, subject to remission under AS 28.35.037; and

(6) shall order the department to revoke the registration for any vehicle registered by the department in the name of the person convicted under this subsection; if a person convicted under this subsection is a registered co-owner of a vehicle or is registered as a co-owner under a business name, the department shall reissue the vehicle registration and omit the name of the person convicted under this subsection.

 Sec. 5. AS 28.35.030(t) is amended to read:

(t) Notwithstanding (b) or [,] (n) [, OR (r)] of this section, the court shall waive the requirement of the use of an ignition interlock device when a person operates a motor vehicle in a community included on the list published by the department under AS 28.22.011(b).

 Sec. 6. AS 28.35.032(g) is amended to read:

(g) Upon conviction under this section,

(1) the court shall impose a minimum sentence of imprisonment of

(A) not less than 72 consecutive hours, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of six [12] months [DURING THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $1,500 if the person has not been previously convicted;

(B) not less than 20 days, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 12 [24] months [DURING THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $3,000 if the person has been previously convicted once;

(C) not less than 60 days, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 18 [36] months [DURING THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $4,000 if the person has been previously convicted twice and is not subject to punishment under (p) of this section;

(D) not less than 120 days, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 24 months [THROUGHOUT THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $5,000 if the person has been previously convicted three times and is not subject to punishment under (p) of this section;

(E) not less than 240 days, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 30 months [THROUGHOUT THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $6,000 if the person has been previously convicted four times and is not subject to punishment under (p) of this section;

(F) not less than 360 days, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 36 months [THROUGHOUT THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a fine of not less than $7,000 if the person has been previously convicted more than four times and is not subject to punishment under (p) of this section;

(2) the court may not

(A) suspend execution of the sentence required by (1) of this subsection or grant probation, except on condition that the person

(i) serve the minimum imprisonment under (1) of this subsection; [AND]

(ii) pay the minimum fine required under (1) of this subsection; [OR]

(B) suspend imposition of sentence; or

(C) suspend the requirement for an ignition interlock device;

(3) the court shall revoke the person's driver's license, privilege to drive, or privilege to obtain a license under AS 28.15.181, and may order that the motor vehicle, aircraft, or watercraft that was used in commission of the offense be forfeited under AS 28.35.036;

(4) the court may order that the person, while incarcerated or as a condition of probation or parole, take a drug or combination of drugs intended to prevent the consumption of an alcoholic beverage; a condition of probation or parole imposed under this paragraph is in addition to any other condition authorized under another provision of law; and

(5) the sentence imposed by the court under this subsection shall run consecutively with any other sentence of imprisonment imposed on the person.

* Sec. 7. AS 28.35.032(k) is amended to read:

(k) Notwithstanding (g) of this section, [IF THE COURT IMPOSES PROBATION UNDER AS 12.55.102] the court may reduce the fine required to be imposed under (g) of this section by the cost of the ignition interlock device.

* Sec. 8. AS 28.35.032(p) is amended to read:

(p) A person is guilty of a class C felony if the person is convicted under this section and either has been previously convicted two or more times since January 1, 1996, and within the 10 years preceding the date of the present offense, or punishment under this subsection or under AS 28.35.030(n) was previously imposed within the last 10 years. For purposes of determining minimum sentences based on previous convictions, the provisions of AS 28.35.030(u)(4) apply. Upon conviction,

(1) the court shall impose a fine of not less than $10,000, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 60 months [THROUGHOUT THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a minimum sentence of imprisonment of not less than

(A) 120 days if the person has been previously convicted twice;

(B) 240 days if the person has been previously convicted three times;

(C) 360 days if the person has been previously convicted four or more times;

(2) the court may not

(A) suspend execution of the sentence required by (1) of this subsection or grant probation, except on condition that the person

(i) serve the minimum imprisonment under (1) of this subsection; [AND]

(ii) pay the minimum fine required under (1) of this subsection; [OR]

(B) suspend imposition of sentence; or

(C) suspend the requirements for an ignition interlock device;

(3) the court shall permanently revoke the person's driver's license, privilege to drive, or privilege to obtain a license subject to restoration under (q) of this section;

(4) the court may order that the person, while incarcerated or as a condition of probation or parole, take a drug, or combination of drugs, intended to prevent consumption of an alcoholic beverage; a condition of probation or parole imposed under this paragraph is in addition to any other condition authorized under another provision of law;

(5) the sentence imposed by the court under this subsection shall run consecutively with any other sentence of imprisonment imposed on the person;

(6) the court shall order forfeiture under AS 28.35.036, of the motor vehicle, aircraft, or watercraft used in the commission of the offense, subject to remission under AS 28.35.037; and

(7) the court shall order the department to revoke the registration for any vehicle registered by the department in the name of the person convicted under this subsection; if a person convicted under this subsection is a registered co-owner of a vehicle, the department shall reissue the vehicle registration and omit the name of the person convicted under this subsection.

* Sec. 9. AS 12.55.102(e)(2) and AS 28.35.030(r) are repealed.

(2) the court may not

(A) suspend execution of the sentence required by (1) of this subsection or grant probation, except on condition that the person

(i) serve the minimum imprisonment under (1) of this subsection; [AND]

(ii) pay the minimum fine required under (1) of this subsection; [OR]

(B) suspend imposition of sentence; or

(C) suspend the requirement for an ignition interlock device;

(3) the court shall revoke the person's driver's license, privilege to drive, or privilege to obtain a license under AS 28.15.181, and may order that the motor vehicle, aircraft, or watercraft that was used in commission of the offense be forfeited under AS 28.35.036;

(4) the court may order that the person, while incarcerated or as a condition of probation or parole, take a drug or combination of drugs intended to prevent the consumption of an alcoholic beverage; a condition of probation or parole imposed under this paragraph is in addition to any other condition authorized under another provision of law; and

(5) the sentence imposed by the court under this subsection shall run consecutively with any other sentence of imprisonment imposed on the person.

 Sec. 6. AS 28.35.032(p) is amended to read:

(p) A person is guilty of a class C felony if the person is convicted under this section and either has been previously convicted two or more times since January 1, 1996, and within the 10 years preceding the date of the present offense, or punishment under this subsection or under AS 28.35.030(n) was previously imposed within the last 10 years. For purposes of determining minimum sentences based on previous convictions, the provisions of AS 28.35.030(u)(4) apply. Upon conviction,

(1) the court shall impose a fine of not less than $10,000, require the person to use an ignition interlock device after the person regains the privilege to operate a motor vehicle for a minimum of 10 years [THROUGHOUT THE PERIOD OF PROBATION], and impose a minimum sentence of imprisonment of not less than

(A) 120 days if the person has been previously convicted twice;

(B) 240 days if the person has been previously convicted three times;

(C) 360 days if the person has been previously convicted four or more times;

(2) the court may not

(A) suspend execution of the sentence required by (1) of this subsection or grant probation, except on condition that the person

(i) serve the minimum imprisonment under (1) of this subsection; [AND]

(ii) pay the minimum fine required under (1) of this subsection; [OR]

(B) suspend imposition of sentence; or

(C) suspend the requirements for an ignition interlock device;

(3) the court shall permanently revoke the person's driver's license, privilege to drive, or privilege to obtain a license subject to restoration under (q) of this section;

(4) the court may order that the person, while incarcerated or as a condition of probation or parole, take a drug, or combination of drugs, intended to prevent consumption of an alcoholic beverage; a condition of probation or parole imposed under this paragraph is in addition to any other condition authorized under another provision of law;

(5) the sentence imposed by the court under this subsection shall run consecutively with any other sentence of imprisonment imposed on the person;

(6) the court shall order forfeiture under AS 28.35.036, of the motor vehicle, aircraft, or watercraft used in the commission of the offense, subject to remission under AS 28.35.037; and

(7) the court shall order the department to revoke the registration for any vehicle registered by the department in the name of the person convicted under this subsection; if a person convicted under this subsection is a registered co-owner of a vehicle, the department shall reissue the vehicle registration and omit the name of the person convicted under this subsection.

 Sec. 7. AS 12.55.102(e)(2) and AS 28.35.030(r) are repealed.

MEMORANDUM March 12, 2010

SUBJECT: Sectional Summary - CSSB 239( ), "S" Version
(Work Order No. 26-LS1210\S)

TO: Senator Kevin Meyer
Attn: Christine Marasigan

FROM: Gerald P. Luckhaupt
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional summary of the above-described bill. As a preliminary matter, please note that a sectional summary of a bill should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill -- the bill itself is the best statement of its contents.

Section 1 amends AS 11.76.140(a) to provide criminal liability in relation to ignition interlock devices regardless of whether the requirement to use the ignition interlock devices arises under AS 12.55.102 or another statute.

Section 2 amends AS 28.35.030(b), misdemeanor drunk driving, to provide that the requirement for an ignition interlock device for drunk drivers applies regardless of whether the offender receives probation; starts at a minimum of six months for a first offender and increases by six months for each offense (this is a minimum period for use of an interlock the court may impose a greater period); and provides that the ignition interlock requirement may not be suspended by the court.

Section 3 amends AS 28.35.030(g) to conform to sec. 2, as ignition interlock is no longer tied to probation.

Section 4 amends AS 28.35.030(n), the felony drunk driving statute, in a manner similar to sec. 2, by no longer tying imposition of ignition interlock to probation. In addition, this section requires the use of an ignition interlock device for a minimum of five years for anyone convicted of felony drunk driving and provides that the ignition interlock requirement may not be suspended.

Section 5 makes a technical change to correspond to the repeal of AS 28.35.030(r) in sec. 9 of the bill.

Section 6 amends AS 28.35.032(g), misdemeanor refusal to submit to a chemical test, by making the same changes that are made in sec. 2 of the bill for misdemeanor drunk driving.

Section 7 amends AS 28.35.032(k) to conform to sec. 6, as ignition interlock is no longer tied to probation.

Section 8 amends AS 28.35.032, felony refusal to consent, by making the same changes that are made in sec. 4, felony drunk driving.

Section 9 repeals AS 12.55.102(e)(2) and AS 28.35.030(r).

Sec. 2. AS 15.13.030

Page 2, after line 27, there would be another paragraph:

(11) make available to the public information contained in a report filed under AS 15.13.040(e) within 24 hours after filing of the report with the commission.

Sec. 4. AS 15.13.040(e)

Page 3, line 5 after "commission." There would be another line:

If the report is filed by a person that is not an individual, the report must be certified as correct by the treasurer of fiscal officer of the person.

Page 3, line 14, after address, insert nationality

Sec. 13. AS 15.13.090(a)

Page 7, line 10, it would identify the person's three largest contributors, not five

Sec. 14. AS 15.13.090(c)

Page 7, line 25, there would be an additional section:

(c) The provisions of this subsection apply to a person who makes an independent expenditure for communication described in (a) of this section. If the person making the independent expenditure is not an individual, the responsible officer or officers of the person shall be held personally, jointly, and severally liable together with the person for the payment of all civil damages for which the person may be liable as a result of the communication.

Sec. 15. AS 15.13.110(g) would require filing with the commission not later than 24 hours after expenditure has been made.

Section 21. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

SEVERABILITY. Under AS 01.10.030, if any provision of this Act, or the application of it to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of this Act and the application to other persons or circumstances are not affected.

SENATOR KEVIN MEYER
SENATE DISTRICT O

SPONSOR STATEMENT FOR SB 239

"An Act relating to ignition interlock devices, to refusal to submit to a chemical test, and to driving while under the influence."

SB 239 would clarify the sentencing statutes regarding the use of ignition interlock device (IID).

Effective in 2009, legislation was passed mandating an IID as part of the sentencing for driving while under the influence of an alcoholic beverage, inhalant, or controlled substance.

In 2009, there were 3,513 court orders requiring IID. In 2009 only 218 limited licenses for IID were actually issued. There have been some reports of the IID being suspended in sentencing and of people "waiting out" the probationary period so as not to be required to install an IID.

SB 239 would seek to remedy these loopholes by 1) requiring an IID whenever a person regains and exercises their driving privilege and 2) lists an IID as a condition of sentencing that cannot be suspended.

According to the National Conference of State Legislatures January 2010 Legisbrief, research shows that installation of an IID reduces recidivism between 50 and 90 percent.

Dear Senator Meyer:

On behalf of the Alaska Peace Officers Association (APOA), I would like to thank you for introducing Senate Bill 239, an act relating to ignition interlock devices, to refusal to submit to a chemical test, and to driving while under the influence.

The APOA State Board of Directors recently reviewed this proposed legislation and decided to unanimously support this bill.

We thank you for addressing this issue. Please contact the APOA office in Anchorage at 277-0515, if there is anything our organization can do to assist in the passage of this bill.

Sincerely,

John Lucking, Jr.

COMPARISON OF FEDERAL INNOCENCE PROTECTION ACT TO SB 241, SEC. 6

Most of the provisions of section of 6 of SB 241 were drawn from the federal Innocence Protection Act (IPA), 18 U.S.C. § 3600. (A copy of the IPA is attached.) The following is a comparison of the provisions of the IPA and section 6 of SB 241, which would establish procedures for postconviction DNA testing.

Innocence Protection Act – 18 U.S.C. § 3600	HB 241, sec. 6 – AS 12.73
The IPA authorizes postconviction DNA testing for applicants who have been convicted of any federal crime and received a sentence of death or imprisonment. § 3600(a)(1)(A). (The IPA also applies (with some additional limitations) to a state conviction evidence of which was admitted at a federal death-sentencing hearing when exoneration of the state offense would entitle the applicant to a reduced sentence or resentencing. § 3600(a)(B)(i).)	HB 241 would apply only to persons who have been convicted of a felony offense against a person under AS 11.41. AS 12.73.010(a)
The IPA requires the applicant to assert under penalty of perjury that he is innocent of the offense for which he is imprisoned. § 3600(a)(1)(A).	HB 241 would require the applicant to attest that he did not (1) commit the offense for which he was convicted or any lesser included offense or (2) solicit another person to commit, or aid and abet another person in planning or committing the offense or any lesser included offense. AS 12.73.010(b)(1).
The IPA limits testing to only specific evidence obtained in relation to the investigation or prosecution of the offense for which the applicant claims to be innocent. § 3600(a)(2).	HB 241 would require that the evidence to be tested have been obtained as part of the investigation or prosecution of the offense for which the applicant claims to be innocent. AS 12.73.020(4).

COMPARISON OF FEDERAL INNOCENCE PROTECTION ACT TO SB 241, SEC. 6

If the evidence to be tested was not previously subjected to DNA testing, the IPA requires that the applicant did not knowingly or voluntarily waive the right to request testing after the enactment date of the IPA or knowingly fail to request DNA testing of that evidence in a prior motion for postconviction DNA testing. § 3600(a)(3)(A).	If the evidence to be tested was not previously subjected to DNA testing, HB 241 would require that the applicant did not waive or that his lawyer did not forgo for tactical reasons the right to request DNA testing. AS 12.73.020(5)(A).
If the evidence was previously subjected to DNA testing, the IPA requires that the testing currently sought be based on a new technology that is substantially more probative than the prior DNA testing. § 3600(a)(3)(B).	If the evidence was previously subjected to DNA testing, HB 241 would require that the testing currently sought be based on a method or technology that is substantially more probative than the prior DNA testing and that the applicant did not waive or that his lawyer did not forgo for tactical reasons the right to request DNA testing whose probative value was similar to the method to be used in the requested testing. AS 12.73.020(5)(B).
The IPA requires that the evidence to be tested must be in the government's possession, has been subject to a chain of custody, and retained under conditions that ensure the integrity of the evidence. § 3600(a)(4).	HB 241 would impose the same requirements of chain of custody and retention. AS 12.73.020(6). (HB 241 does not expressly require that the evidence be in the government's possession, but that requirement is implied by AS 12.73.020(4), which requires that the evidence to be tested must have been obtained as part of the investigation or prosecution of an offense.)
The IPA requires that the proposed testing be reasonable in scope and involves scientifically sound methods consistent with forensic practices. § 3600(a)(5).	HB 241 has an identical requirement. AS 12.73.020(7).

Innocence Protection Act – 18 U.S.C. § 3600	HB 241, sec. 6 – AS 12.73
The IPA requires the applicant to identify a theory of defense that is not inconsistent with an affirmative defense presented at trial and that would establish the applicant's actual innocence of the offense for which he seeks exoneration. § 3600(a)(6).	HB 241 has an identical requirement. AS 12.73.020(8).
If the applicant was convicted after a trial, the IPA requires that the identity of the perpetrator must have been an issue at the applicant's trial. § 3600(a)(7).	HB 241 would require that the identity of the perpetrator must have been a disputed issue at the applicant's trial. AS 12.73.020(9).
The IPA requires that the requested DNA testing of the evidence "may produce new material evidence" that would support the theory of defense identified by the applicant and would "raise a reasonable probability that the applicant did not commit the offense." § 3600(a)(8).	HB 241 would require that the requested DNA testing of the evidence "will produce new material evidence" that would support the theory of defense identified by the applicant and "could conclusively establish that the applicant is innocent." AS 12.73.020(10).
The IPA requires that the applicant consent to provide a DNA sample for comparison purposes. § 3600(a)(9). The IPA also requires that any results of testing relating to the applicant's DNA be submitted to the National DNA Index System (NDIS). § 3600(e)(2).	HB 241 would impose a similar requirement. HB 241 would require the defendant to consent to entering the results into the DNA identification registration system (AS 44.41.035) and any other law enforcement database. AS 12.73.020(11).

Innocence Protection Act – 18 U.S.C. § 3600	HB 241, sec. 6 – AS 12.73
The IPA requires that the request for testing be timely. § 3600(a)(10). Timeliness is determined by two rebuttable presumptions:	HB 241 would require that the request for testing be timely. AS 12.73.020(12). Timeliness would be determined by two rebuttable presumptions:
(1) a motion made within the later of 5 years after enactment of the IPA or 3 years after conviction is presumed to be timely; this presumption may be rebutted by showing (a) the motion is based solely on information used in a previously denied motion or (b) by clear and convincing evidence that the motion is solely for the purpose of delay or harassment;	(1) an application filed within 3 years after the date of conviction would be presumed to be timely; this presumption may be rebutted by showing that the application is based solely on information used in a previously denied application;
(2) a motion filed after the above deadlines is presumed to be untimely; this presumption may be rebutted by showing (a) that the applicant is incompetent and that incompetence substantially contributed to the delay in filing, (b) the evidence to be tested is newly discovered evidence, (c) the motion is not based solely on the applicant's own assertion of innocence and, based on all relevant facts and circumstances surrounding the motion, denial of the motion would be manifestly unjust, or (d) "upon good cause shown." § 3600(a)(10).	(2) an application filed after the above deadline would be presumed to be untimely; this presumption may be rebutted by showing (a) that the applicant is incompetent and that incompetence substantially contributed to the delay in filing, or (b) "other good cause" for the delay. AS 12.73.040.
When an applicant files a motion under the IPA, the court must notify the government, direct the government to preserve the specific evidence referred to in the motion, and may appoint a lawyer for the applicant. § 3600(b).	HB 241 would require an applicant to serve the application on "the prosecuting authority responsible for obtaining the conviction." AS 12.73.010(a).

Innocence Protection Act – 18 U.S.C. § 3600	HB 241, sec. 6 – AS 12.73
The IPA requires that any DNA testing ordered by carried out by the FBI, but the court may allow testing by another qualified laboratory so long as integrity of the evidence and reliability of the testing is ensured. The cost of testing shall be borne by the applicant, but if the applicant is indigent, the government will bear the cost. § 3600(c).	HB 241 would require that testing by performed at a laboratory operated or approved by the Department of Public Safety and at the state's expense. A court could order additional testing at the applicant's request, but that would be at the applicant's expense. In addition, the laboratory selected by the applicant would have to satisfy national quality-assurance standards. The applicant would also have to pay any reasonable costs for retrieving the evidence from storage before testing. AS 12.73.050(c).
Under the IPA, if the results of the new DNA testing are inconclusive or show that the applicant was the source of the evidence, then the applicant's sample may be retained in the NDIS. § 3600(e)(3)(A). If the results of the new DNA testing exclude the applicant as the source, but the applicant's DNA matches evidence of another offense, then the Attorney General must notify the appropriate agency and preserve the applicant's sample. § 3600(e)(3)(B). If the results of the new DNA testing exclude the applicant as the source and there exists no match with evidence of another offense, then the applicant's sample shall be destroyed and no information may be retained in the NDIS absent some other basis for retention. § 3600(e)(3)(C).	HB 241 would require that results of any testing of the applicant's DNA be entered in the DNA identification registration system under AS 44.41.035. While HB 241 makes no provision for destruction of samples or retention of information, AS 44.41.035(i) authorizes a court to order destruction of DNA material included in the system.

Innocence Protection Act – 18 U.S.C. § 3600

HB 241, sec. 6 – AS 12.73

Notwithstanding any other limitations that may exist, the IPA authorizes an applicant to file a motion for new trial if the new DNA testing excluded the applicant as the source of the evidence. § 3600(g)(1). The court must grant the motion if the DNA test results, "when considered with all other evidence in the case (regardless of whether such evidence was introduced at trial), establish by compelling evidence that a new trial would result in an acquittal of the offense for which the applicant is imprisoned. § 3600(g)(2)(A).

HB 241 does not address what would happen if new DNA testing were to exclude the applicant as the source of the evidence. However, a favorable test result would form the basis for an application for postconviction relief based on the existence of new, material facts "that requires vacation of the conviction . . . in the interest of justice," AS 12.72.010(4).

Section 6 of SB 241 includes provisions that find no analogue in the IPA. Both the IPA and section 6 authorize postconviction DNA testing only when a court makes the specific findings set forth in the statutes. See § 3600(a); AS 12.73.020. Those findings implicitly establish the factual allegations an applicant must make in the motion under the IPA or the application under section 6. Section 6 goes a step further and requires an applicant to submit affidavits from (1) the applicant, attesting that he did not admit or concede guilt in any official proceeding for the offense that was the basis of the conviction or any lesser included offense, AS 12.73.010(b)(1)(C) (CSHB 316 (Jud) amended this provision by defining admission or concession of guilt to exclude the entry of a guilty or no contest plea); (2) the applicant or his lawyer, describing (a) the results of any DNA testing performed on evidence used in the prosecution and conviction of the applicant and (b) all previous efforts to obtain DNA testing and any previous application filed under AS 12.72 or AS 12.73, AS 12.73.010(b)(2), (3); and (3) the lawyer who represented the applicant in the criminal trial resulting in conviction, describing why DNA testing was not sought before or during the trial, AS 12.73.010(b)(4).

*This element of HB 316 is unheard of among post-conviction DNA testing access statutes. And rightly so, as it permits a judge to take into account any and all evidence of guilt in deciding a motion for mere testing, without requiring the judge to assume exculpatory results. In essence, the judge could cite "overwhelming evidence of guilt" in denying a motion for post-conviction DNA testing. This—despite the fact that appellate judges found harmless error in the appeals of ten percent of 133 DNA exonerees, citing overwhelming evidence of guilt.[1] Put differently, 13 exonerees in this cohort of 133 would likely still be in prison had they been subjected to this aberrant provision.

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to the preservation of evidence and to the DNA identification system."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 12.36 is amended by adding a new section to read:

Article 2. Preservation of Evidence.

Sec. 12.36.200. Preservation of evidence. (a) Notwithstanding AS 12.36.010 - 12.36.090, the Department of Law, the Department of Public Safety, the Alaska Court System, or a municipal law enforcement agency shall preserve

(1) all evidence that is obtained in relation to an investigation or prosecution of a crime under AS 11.41.100 - 11.41.130, 11.41.410, or 11.41.434 for the period of time that the crime remains unsolved;

(2) biological evidence in an amount and manner that is sufficient to develop a DNA profile from any material contained in or included on the evidence that was obtained in relation to the prosecution of a person convicted of, or adjudicated a delinquent for, a crime under AS 11.41.100 - 11.41.130, a person convicted of a crime after being indicted under AS 11.41.410 or 11.41.434 while the person remains a prisoner in the custody of the Department of Corrections or subject to registration as a sex offender, or a person adjudicated a delinquent for a crime after the filing of a petition alleging a violation of AS 11.41.410 or 11.41.434 while the person remains committed to a juvenile facility or subject to registration as a sex offender.

(b) Under (a) of this section, an agency is not required to preserve physical evidence of a crime that is of a size, bulk, quantity, or physical character that renders preservation impracticable. When preservation of evidence of a crime is impracticable, the agency shall, before returning or disposing of the evidence, remove and preserve portions of the material likely to contain relevant evidence related to the crime in a quantity sufficient to permit future DNA testing. In making decisions under this section, an agency shall follow written policies on evidence retention.

(c) Upon written request of a person convicted of a crime and a prisoner, adjudicated delinquent for a crime and committed, or subject to registration as a sex offender, an agency shall prepare or provide an inventory of biological evidence that has been preserved under (a)(2) of this section in connection with the person's criminal case.

(d) An agency required to preserve biological evidence under (a) of this section may destroy biological evidence before the expiration of the time period in (a)(2) of this section if

(1) the agency is not required to maintain the evidence under another provision of state or federal law;

(2) the agency mails a certified delivery of notice of intent to destroy evidence to

(A) each person who remains a prisoner or committed or subject to registration as a sex offender for the crime for which the evidence was preserved under (a)(2) of this section;

(B) the attorney of record for each person listed in (A) of this paragraph;

(C) the Public Defender Agency;

(D) the district attorney responsible for prosecuting the crime;

and

(3) no person who is notified under (2) of this subsection, within 120 days after receiving the notice,

(A) files a motion for testing of the evidence; or

(B) submits a written request for continued preservation of the evidence.

(e) Upon receipt of a request for continued preservation of biological evidence under (d)(3)(B) of this section, an agency may petition the court for permission to destroy the evidence. The court may grant the petition if the court finds that the request is without merit or that the evidence has no significant value for biological material.

(f) When an agency is required to produce biological evidence required to be preserved under this section and the agency is unable to locate the evidence, the chief evidence custodian of that agency shall submit an affidavit, executed under penalty of perjury, describing the evidence that could not be located and detailing the efforts taken to locate the evidence.

(g) If a court finds that evidence was destroyed in violation of the provisions of this section, the court may order remedies the court determines to be appropriate.

(h) A person may not bring a civil action for damages against the state or political subdivision of the state, their officers, agents, or employees, or a law enforcement agency, its officers, or employees for any unintentional failure to comply with the provisions of this section.

(i) In this section,

(1) "agency" means the Department of Law, the Department of Public Safety, the Alaska Court System, or a municipal law enforcement agency;

(2) "biological evidence" means

(A) the contents of a sexual assault forensic examination kit;

(B) semen, blood, hair, saliva, skin tissue, fingernail scrapings, bone, bodily fluids, or other identifiable human bodily material, collected as part of a criminal investigation;

(C) a slide, swab, or test tube containing material described in

(B) of this paragraph; and

(D) swabs or cuttings from items that contain material described in (B) of this section;

(3) "DNA" means deoxyribonucleic acid;

(4) "prisoner" has the meaning given in AS 33.30.901.

 Sec. 2. AS 44.41.035(g) is amended to read:

(g) A person from whom a sample has been collected under this section

(1) may inspect and obtain a copy of the identification data regarding the person contained within the DNA identification registration system; and

(2) may request the Department of Public Safety to destroy the material in the system regarding the person under the provisions described in (i) of this section.

 Sec. 3. AS 44.41.035(i) is amended to read:

(i) The Department of Public Safety shall [, UPON RECEIPT OF A COURT ORDER,] destroy the material in the system relating to a person or minor on the written request of the person or minor, if the request is accompanied by a certified copy of a court order making the written findings required by this subsection. The court may [SHALL] issue an [THE] order under this subsection if the person's or minor's DNA was included in the system under

(1) (b)(1) or (2) of this section, and the court order establishes [DETERMINES] that

(A) the conviction or adjudication that subjected the person to having a sample taken under this section was [IS] reversed; and

(B) the person

(i) was [IS] not retried, readjudicated, or convicted or adjudicated for another crime that requires having a sample taken under this section; or

(ii) after retrial, was [IS] acquitted of the crime or, after readjudication for the crime, was [IS] not found to be a delinquent, and was [IS] not convicted or adjudicated for another crime that requires a sample under this section;

(2) (b)(6) of this section, and the court order establishes [DETERMINES] that

(A) the person arrested was released without being charged; [OR]

(B) the criminal complaint, indictment, presentment, or information for the offense for which the person was arrested was dismissed, and a criminal complaint, indictment, presentment, or information for an offense requiring submission of a DNA sample was [IS] not refiled; or

(C) the person was found by the trier of fact to be not guilty of the offense for which the person was arrested and was not convicted of another offense requiring submission of a DNA sample under (b)(1) or (2) of this section.

 Sec. 4. AS 44.41.035 is amended by adding a new subsection to read:

(r) A DNA sample collected or placed in the DNA identification registration system, that was taken or retained in good faith, may be used as provided by law in a criminal investigation. Evidence obtained from a match from a data collection system may be used in a criminal prosecution if the DNA sample was taken or retained in good faith, even if the DNA sample is later removed from the DNA identification registration system.

 Sec. 5. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

TASK FORCE ON STANDARDS AND TRAINING OF EVIDENCE TECHNICIANS. (a) The Task Force on Standards and Training of Evidence Technicians is created in the Department of Law. The task force consists of the following persons appointed by the governor:

(1) the attorney general;

(2) the public defender;

(3) the director of the office of public advocacy;

(4) a chief of a municipal police department not on the state's interconnected road system;

(5) the commissioner of public safety;

(6) a chief of a municipal police department;

(7) a representative of the Alaska Innocence Project; and

(8) a representative of the state crime lab.

(b) There shall be three ex officio members of the task force as follows:

(1) a member of the House Judiciary Committee selected by the speaker of the house of representatives;

(2) a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee selected by the president of the senate; and

(3) the victims' advocate.

(c) Persons appointed under (a) of this section or identified under (b) of this section may select a designee from the same agency or organization to act on the person's behalf as a member of the task force.

(d) Not later than December 31, 2011, the task force shall

(1) devise standards regarding the proper collection, retention, and cataloging of evidence, for ongoing investigations and prosecutions;

(2) recommend practices, protocols, models, and resources for the cataloging and accessibility of preserved evidence.

 Sec. 6. The uncodified law of the State of Alaska is amended by adding a new section to read:

APPLICABILITY. AS 12.36.200, enacted in sec. 1 of this Act, applies to all evidence in the possession of an agency listed in AS 12.36.200(a) on the effective date of this Act for crimes committed before the effective date of this Act and all evidence collected on or after the effective date of this Act.

 Sec. 7. Section 5 of this Act is repealed January 1, 2012.

Proposed amendments to SB 241 recommended by the Alaska Innocence Project

I organized these proposed amendments in order of their appearance in the current bill. The number in parentheses is the order of importance of the amendment to the Alaska Innocence Project.

1. (3) Strike page3 lines 29 – 31 deleting the language "(d) The person who requests evidence that has been preserved under this section shall pay reasonable costs incurred in the retrieval of the evidence from storage

This provision requires an inmate claiming innocence, who has likely been incarcerated for years, if not tens of years, to pay for a police evidence custodian to retrieve evidence. It makes no exception for indigency. The burden is even greater when the law enforcement department is inefficient in keeping its evidence. This term will, literally, restrict DNA testing access on the basis of poverty. In the very few cases where testing will occur the law enforcement agency should collect the evidence without cost to the petitioner, especially since that agency is required by this statute to provide an inventory of the evidence it has, which will undoubtedly require they confirm each piece of evidence exists. Not one other state in the nation charges petitioners to locate evidence. This term should be stricken from the bill.

2. (1) Strike page 8 lines 5 – 7 deleting the language "(C) the applicant did not admit or concede guilt in any official proceeding for the offense that was the basis of the conviction or any lesser included offense:"

Despite the state's claim to the contrary, the language as drafted would include all those who pled guilty or confessed to a charge. The language "admit or concede guilt" would clearly cover a guilty plea, even if made through a lawyer and not out of the defendant's mouth, and a change of plea hearing is clearly an official proceeding. Even if this were clarified to mean only admissions of guilt out of a defendant's own mouth, this restriction turns a blind eye to the real life situation that admissions are made, especially by the younger or disabled defendants, to crimes they did not commit. Post-conviction DNA testing is the only opportunity for an individual to correct this wrong. If a person can meet the standard that evidence exists which, if it returned a favorable result, would create a reasonable probability that the person would not have been charged or convicted, they should not be prevented from obtaining testing because they admitted guilt. This term should be deleted. 45 of the 250 DNA exonerees across the nation confessed to crimes they did not commit. 19 plead guilty to crimes they did not commit. This amounts to 25% of those individuals proven innocent through DNA testing. Only one state explicitly excludes individuals who pled guilty from seeking testing. Not one state explicitly excludes individuals who confessed. This term should be deleted.

3. (4) At page 8 line 11, Strike "an affidavit by the applicant or the applicant's lawyer describing all previous efforts to obtain DNA testing and", add instead "a statement describing"

This removes a process which restricts DNA testing depending on tests performed or not performed at the trial level. It s removal correctly places the focus on the existence of DNA testing which could provide a reasonable probability of indicating the person would not have been charged or convicted. The language remaining in the statute informs the court of previous post-conviction actions filed by the applicant, consistent with current post-conviction procedures.

4. (2) Strike page 8 lines 14 – 17 deleting "(4) an affidavit by the applicant's lawyer in the criminal trial stating the reason that DNA testing was not sought before or during trial, or an affidavit by the applicant or the applicant's lawyer describing the efforts made to obtain the affidavit from the criminal trial lawyer and the reason the applicant was unable to obtain it.

As with the previous section, deletion of this section places attention on the proper information, the existence of evidence which could meet the standard set in this statute. The process contained in this section is terribly burdensome. It also allows a mistake made by trial counsel to be compounded by allowing the attorney to prevent post-conviction testing through this affidavit. This section should be deleted in its entirety.

5. (1) Strike page 8 lines 29 – 30 deleting "(3) the applicant has not in an official proceeding admitted or conceded guilt for the crime that was the basis for the conviction."

See # 2 above as it deals with essentially the same language and should be deleted in its entirety for the same reasons.

6. (1) Strike page 9 line 3 beginning with "and" deleting "and the applicant did not waive, or the applicant's lawyer did not forgo for tactical reasons, the right to request DNA testing:"

This restriction prevents an innocent person from obtaining testing if their trial lawyer made a bad decision and didn't get testing at the trial level, or if the individual paid for his or her own defense and couldn't afford testing. An error by the trial attorney resulting in an innocent person being convicted would be multiplied by then denying that person access to the very evidence which could prove their innocence. In addition, if the evidence was not subjected to DNA testing at the trial level, it means the prosecution, in its search for the truth, also did not test the evidence. Rather then trying to parse out responsibility for the terrible oversight at the trial level, this statute should allow testing to those individuals who can meet the criteria. This language should be deleted.

7. (1) Strike page 9 line 9 beginning with "and" through line 13 deleting "and (ii) the applicant did not waive the right to request , or the applicant's lawyer did not forgo for tactical reasons, DNA testing using a method whose probative value was similar to the method to be used in the requested testing:

See # 6 above. The language restricting testing if it was not done at the trial level is basically the same in this section. The same reasoning applies. This section should be deleted in its entirety.

8. (2) Strike p. 9 lines 24 – 29 deleting "(10) there is a reasonable probability, in light of all available evidence, regardless of whether the evidence was introduced at the applicant's trial, that the requested DNA testing will produce new material evidence that (A) would support the theory of defense described in (8) of this section; and (B) could conclusively establish that the applicant is innocent;" and replace it with "(10) a reasonable probability exists that the petitioner would not have been prosecuted or convicted if exculpatory results had been obtained through DNA testing."

The deleted language removes the need for the trial judge to guess at what the testing results might be. The proposed language is the most common language used in other DNA testing statutes throughout the country and focuses, correctly, on what the effect would have been at the trial level if testing had been done with exculpatory results. That test properly focuses on the DNA evidence and its impact, not on a judge trying to guess what the DNA testing will produce. The existing language will be asking the impossible of judges. It should be replaced with the more common language.

9. (1) Strike p. 10 lines 11 – 23 deleting all of proposed "Sec. 12.73.040. Timeliness"

Innocence claims should not be subject to an arbitrary time limit. Incarcerating an innocent individual is no less wrong four years after conviction then three years. Or five years, or six. If an individual can meet the standard set out in # 8, and provides the other information in a reasonably drafted testing statute, that person should obtain testing of the evidence regardless of when the petition is brought. The finality argument put forward for time restrictions on testing statutes is really a red herring, since what finality is there for anyone if an innocent person is incarcerated and the actual perpetrator remains unidentified. Certainly the original victim would rather have the right person caught and convicted no matter when that happens. The people of the State of Alaska want the same. Such arbitrary time limitations should be deleted from the bill. Thirty-five of the nations 47 laws contain NO time bars. Most others focus on deadlines on the effective date and none contemplate anything this restrictive.

10. (3) Strike page 11 line 17 beginning with "The" through line 18 deleting "The applicant shall pay the reasonable costs incurred in the retrieval from storage of the material to be tested."

See # 1 above discussing an almost identical term. The same reasons for deletion apply here.

11. (5) On page 15 add after (8) on line 24
(9) A member of the Alaska Senate
(10) A member of the Alaska House of Representatives
(11) The Public Defender
(12) A representative of the Office of Public Advocacy
(13) A representative from the Alaska Native Justice Center
(14) A representative of the Alaska Innocence Project

As set out in # 12, below, the charge of the task force set up by this bill should be expanded to address the real issue of evidence retention and preservation. When this is done, the membership of the task force should be expanded to include all groups that have an interest in the issue and likely have unique perspectives and expertise to contribute. The three groups proposed here certainly meet those criteria. Without this input, an incomplete report would be produced by an incomplete task force.

12. (5) At page 16 line 3 after "cataloging" add "retention", before retrieval delete "and" and after "retrieval" add "and disposal"

Much of what the task force created by the current language in HB 316 is asked to look at does not require a task force created by statute. They are law enforcement issues regarding the handling of evidence. The real questions raised by this bill are what collection, retention, retrieval and destruction issues will best carry out the intent of this bill. These are questions best addressed by a diverse group who all come to the table with significant and useful information impacting these important issues. Adding the words retention and destruction charge this task force with looking at what the real and significant impact of this statute is and how to best deal with those impacts.

13. (1) Strike page 16 line 28 - 30

See # 9 above, as this section also deals with an arbitrary time limit within which to bring a request for post-conviction DNA testing.

I would also urge the addition of language that addresses what happens after the test results are returned. This should include, at least, the following three sections.

I. APPEAL

The applicant shall have the right to appeal a decision denying post-conviction DNA testing.

II. ORDERS FOLLOWING TEST RESULTS

A. If the results of ordered DNA testing are favorable to the petitioner, the court shall schedule a hearing to determine the appropriate relief to be granted. Based on the result of the testing and any evidence or other matter presented at the hearing, the court shall thereafter enter any order that serves the inters5s of justice, including any of the following:

1. An order setting aside or vacating the applicant's judgment of conviction or adjudication of delinquency;
2. An order granting the applicant a new trial or fact-finding hearing;
3. An order granting the applicant a new sentencing hearing or dispositional hearing;
4. An order discharging the applicant from custody;
5. An order specifying the disposition of any evidence that remains after the completion of the testing;
6. An order granting the applicant additional discovery on matters related to DNA test results or the conviction or sentence under attack including, but not limited to, documents pertaining to the original criminal investigation or the identities of other suspects; and
7. An order directing the state to place any unidentified DNA profiles obtained from post-conviction DNA testing into state and federal databases.

B. If the results of the tests are not favorable to the petitioner, the court:

1. Shall dismiss the petition;
2. Provide that the parole board or probation department be notified of the test results;
3. Make any further order it deems appropriate.

III. REACTIVATION OF VICTIMS SERVICES

When post-conviction DNA testing is being considered by the court, the State shall, upon request, reactivate victim services for the victim of the crime being reinvestigated during the reinvestigation of the case, the pendency of the proceedings, and , as determined by the court after consultation with the victim and/or victim advocate, following final adjudication of the case.

ALASKA INNOCENCE PROJECT

ANALYSIS BY WILLIAM B. OBERLY,
EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR ALASKA INNOCENCE PROJECT
OF SB 241 – AN ACT RELATING TO POST-CONVICTION DNA TESTING
FEBRUARY 19, 2010

Post-conviction evidence preservation and access to post-conviction DNA testing are the two most important legislative issues for the Alaska Innocence Project at this time. We thank Governor Parnell for recognizing the importance of these issues by proposing a bill dealing with them. However, the Alaska Innocence Project cannot support SB 241 as it is currently written. The effect of SB 241 as currently written is to drastically limit access to DNA testing in Alaska. A number of modifications will need to be made before this bill is in line with the current approach to DNA testing accepted in the rest of the country.

The major concern of the Alaska Innocence Project with this legislation is the restrictive nature of the access to DNA testing provided in this bill. In its current form this bill would establish the most restrictive procedure to obtain post-conviction DNA testing in any state and would be more restrictive than the current process available in Alaska without a specific statute. It is particularly troubling to consider how this restrictive procedure would negatively impact rural Alaskans, especially Alaskan Natives seeking post-conviction DNA testing.

This analysis will try and describe the specific parts of SB 241 which serve to deny DNA testing to individuals with innocence claims in the state of Alaska. The sections of the bill will be addressed in the order of their significance and impact on innocence claims. If these sections are removed from the bill or amended, SB 241 will then provide a procedure for wrongfully convicted Alaskans to obtain post-conviction DNA testing to establish their innocence.

The first area of concern is the prohibitions on testing contained in this bill. I have included with this analysis a chart that compares this bill with other bills currently before the Alaska Legislature, the bill passed in recently in Mississippi, the federal post-conviction DNA testing bill, and bills from other states generally. The combined effect of these prohibitions is to deny virtually every person currently in prison who would seek DNA testing. This approach flies directly in the face of current thinking, which was described by Senator Patrick Leahy when he sponsored the federal Innocence Protection Act. "The criminal justice system should err on the side of permitting testing, in light of the low cost of DNA testing and the high cost of keeping the wrong person locked up."

The most serious prohibition on testing in HB 316 is contained on page 10, lines 11 through 23 of the bill in Sec. 12.73.040, entitled Timeliness. This section establishes a presumption of untimeliness if an application for post-conviction testing is not filed within three years. This restriction will prohibit most, if not all, innocent individuals who are currently incarcerated from obtaining the testing necessary to establish their innocence. This section would make post-conviction DNA testing claims in Alaska much more limited then under the current process of post-conviction claims based on newly discovered evidence. Time limitations ignore the fact that without proper preservation standards and requirements, as well as state of the art identification methods, exculpatory DNA evidence may only be located after years have elapsed. It should be remembered that, unlike other forms of evidence, DNA evidence is not less reliable as time goes by, one of the main reasons for limiting the time within which to bring new evidence motions based on other evidence. A workable solution to this concern is to differentiate between those convicted before the effective date of the statute and those convicted after. Those convicted before the effective date of the statute should not have an arbitrary time limit placed on their claims. The three year presumption could become effective for convictions arising after the date of this law.

Page 9 section (5) at lines 2 through13. This section prohibits an individual from seeking testing if evidence was not subjected to DNA testing at the trial level or a more probative method of DNA testing was not used, and the applicant waived the testing or the applicant's lawyer did not test for tactical reasons. This section denies the reality of the real world that bad lawyering is one of the most common causes of wrongful convictions. Since we are dealing with claims of actual innocence, it would be improper to deny an individual the opportunity to perform the most accurate tests on evidence to establish innocence because a trial lawyer made a bad decision, or couldn't afford a test. The problem is compounded in this bill by allowing the trial lawyer to cover the bad decision by requiring an affidavit from the trial lawyer explaining their actions. It is presumed under this bill that if a lawyer chooses to spend the limited resources available in a defense case on other then DNA testing, this decision will preclude post-conviction testing to establish that an individual is innocent. In our system of justice, innocence should not be able to be waived.

Page 8 subsection (C) at lines 5 through 7 and section (3) at lines 29 through 30. These sections make post-conviction DNA testing unavailable to anyone who admits or concedes guilt in any official proceeding or whose statement of guilt was the basis of the conviction. This section, again, denies hard facts we have learned from the 250 DNA exonerations nationwide, that 25% of those exonerations have involved an innocent individual who admitted their guilt or pled guilty to the crime. This category of wrongfully convicted individuals is largely represented by the most vulnerable in society; young people, people with mental disabilities, those most susceptible to suggestion. Rather then protecting the vulnerable in our society, this bill aims to take advantage of them. The State has indicated its willingness to make a distinction between those who pled guilty or no contest, which they would exclude from this restriction, and those who admitted guilt in some official proceeding. A better distinction, and more the goal of the State's inclusion of this restriction, would be to say "the applicant did not admit or concede guilty in a parole hearing or the equivalent of a parole hearing."

Page 9 section (10) at lines 24 through 29. This section of the bill calls for the court considering a post-conviction DNA testing request to guess at the outcome of the requested testing based on the court's view of other evidence. Other states and the federal government, when establishing a standard for the court to apply to the requested evidence, reasonably assume a favorable result of the testing for the petitioner, and then have the court decide if that would establish a reasonable probability that the petitioner would not have been convicted. This long established standard does not require a judge to try and guess what the result of the requested DNA testing might be. Rather, it reasonably asks a court to decide whether a favorable test result would be significant in the outcome of the case.

Page 3 section (d), lines 29 through 31. Also page 11, lines 17 through 18. This term of the bill calls for the person requesting evidence be tested pay for its retrieval. This is a concept totally unique to the Alaska post-conviction DNA testing process. Not one statute passed by any other state or the federal government imagines such a requirement. An irony in including this section where it is in the bill is that it follows a section which requires an agency holding preserved evidence to produce an inventory of that evidence. It must be presumed that the agency will actually confirm they have each of the items on the inventory before providing it. Under this bill, after physically confirming they have each piece of evidence, the holding agency will then get to turn around and charge for going back again and collecting it. A more reasonable approach would envision the agency putting the evidence in a convenient place at the time of preparing the inventory, thus performing their work more efficiently, while doing away with the need to charge to collect evidence. A serious impact of this section will be that some individuals will be precluded from obtaining the evidence due to an inability to pay this tax on their right to DNA testing. The section is particularly offensive since evidence does not belong to one side or the other, but rather to the people. Charging a person claiming innocence to collect the evidence is inconsistent with this concept.

Page 15 section (a) at lines 16 through 24. This section establishes a task force to recommend standards and protocols regarding evidence preservation issues. Unlike a similar section in SB110, this version excludes any representative from the criminal defense bar, like the public defender or office of public advocacy, or any member from the innocence community, like from the innocence project, or any member from the legislature. The task force established by this section would not receive a wide range of information in order to produce the most balanced report based on the best information. The task force created by this bill will be limited to information from one part of the criminal justice community and will thus produce a report that is less then complete and so will be that much less effective. The mandate for the task force should also be expanded to address the issues likely raised by this legislation. It should also look into "retention" and "disposal" of evidence.

Page 2 lines 25 through 31 through page 3 lines 1 through 6. This section sets deadlines for destruction of evidence obtained during the investigation of a case rather then allows the Task Force which is established at the end of the bill to study the issue and make recommendations. SB110 also established a task force with a wide ranging mandate to study evidence preservation issues, including the issue of proper retention. Reasonably, one of the issues that task force was to report back on was destruction deadlines. SB241 also establishes a task force but, without any study, also creates time limits for destruction. This does not seem to be making the best use of the task force created. As an example of why more study might be necessary, this section also seems to allow for destruction of evidence if a challenge to the conviction is filed in federal district court. The section defining "direct review" mentions only judgment on appeal, petition for hearing and review by the United States Supreme Court. A task force studying this issue and making recommendations would most likely recommend evidence be retained during the pendency of a habeas action filed in federal district court.

The concerns listed above set out serious shortfalls in the contents of SB241. If these sections are allowed to remain in the bill, unchanged, not only would post-conviction DNA testing be more difficult for the wrongfully convicted in Alaska to obtain then it currently is, it would be more difficult then anywhere else in the country. I urge the committee to correct these problems by removing the language of SB241 set out above before the bill is passed out of committee. If the sections I have identified are removed from SB241, the bill will then actually provide innocent individuals with a procedure to obtain post-conviction DNA testing of potentially exculpatory evidence. Alaska will have a bill that works.

Thank you for allowing me to address this very important legislation. If the committee has any questions on any matters arising from SB241 which I might help answer, please don't hesitate to contact me.

WRITTEN TESTIMONY OF REBECCA BROWN
POLICY ADVOCATE, INNOCENCE PROJECT
BEFORE THE ALASKA HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITEE
RE: SB 241 – AN ACT RELATING TO POST-CONVICTION DNA TESTING
FEBRUARY 22, 2010

Thank you for the opportunity to speak before you today and submit written comments for your consideration of SB 241, which seeks to create statutory access to post-conviction DNA testing.

The Innocence Project assists persons in proving their innocence through post-conviction DNA testing. To date there have been 251 men and women exonerated by post-conviction DNA testing nationwide, one exonerated just yesterday. The emergence of forensic DNA technology changed the fabric of the criminal justice system. Whereas prior to the advent of forensic DNA there were few clear ways to assess prisoners' claims of wrongful conviction, DNA testing of crime scene evidence can provide the criminal justice system with significant and enduring proof of innocence or guilt, from the initial stages of an investigation to years after a conviction. With the ability to transcend fallible human judgment, DNA testing – and particularly post-conviction DNA exonerations – have proven the potential for error that exists in our criminal justice system, and that our appeals processes are not sufficient for identifying those errors.

Our policy agenda is a pro-law enforcement agenda, win-win reforms that protect the innocent and help identify the guilty. It is precisely because of the dual nature of our work – both the efforts to exonerate the innocent and the constructive efforts to strengthen the capacity of the criminal justice system to make more accurate guilt/innocence determinations – that we may be able to provide a somewhat unique and hopefully helpful perspective on the complicated issue you are addressing today.

Having worked in this field for thirty years, the co-founders of our organization often remark that perhaps the most significant lesson they have learned is that in matters of crime and justice humility is important because even the most experienced among us are often wrong. They have reviewed hundreds of cases. In most, they have pored over reams of court transcripts, scrutinized piles of police reports, dissected crime lab analyses, sifted through evidence and property logs, and studied scores of witness statements, and have strongly suspected some men's guilt, only later to discover they were wrong. No less often, someone they strongly suspect is innocent turns out to be guilty. Indeed, because every one of us is human and all of us are actors in a fact-finding mission, if just one of us makes an error, jumps to a conclusion, or acts on a false assumption, an innocent man can be condemned to a guilty man's fate.

Congress recognized DNA's potential for justice, and it was bi-partisan support that led to passage of the Innocence Protection Act contained in the Justice for All Act of 2004. Then-President George W. Bush noted in his 2005 State of the Union address: "In America we must make doubly sure no person is held to account for a crime he or she did not commit. So we are dramatically expanding the use of DNA evidence to prevent wrongful conviction."

The preservation of biological evidence and access to post-conviction DNA testing – fundamental elements of the IPA's innocence protections – are as important today as ever. The Innocence Project continues to unearth cases where post-conviction DNA testing proves the innocence of those convicted in both the relatively recent and distant past.

Unfortunately, when forensic DNA testing was first made available, it provided little help to the truly innocent who were facing charges like rape or murder, or who had been previously convicted. For these men and women, hope existed only later, with the potential of the performance of DNA testing on the crime scene evidence connected to their cases. For many, if not most of them, such testing represented a last chance to prove their innocence, as they had already exhausted all available state remedies, as well as federal habeas corpus relief. Yet without the benefit of state statutes providing access to post-conviction DNA testing, they faced daunting, if not unattainable, paths to such testing.

The scales of justice began to tilt when states started to pass laws allowing convicted persons access to post-conviction DNA testing. These laws not only allowed DNA testing to be performed on genetic material that was never tested at trial; it also allowed more modern, sophisticated technology to be utilized on previously tested evidence that had yielded inexact or unreliable conclusions.

Over time, newer DNA technologies have emerged, enabling us to create perpetrator DNA profiles from physical evidence that was previously useless. The amount of evidence items that are being successfully tested now, but could never have been tested successfully only a few years ago, is enormous. As DNA testing methods continue to emerge, they reveal new information about even those crimes committed in the distant past. Post-conviction DNA testing statutes have begun to contemplate these technological advances and many now include provisions that permit additional testing in cases where previous testing using older testing methods could not produce conclusive results.

The passage of post-conviction DNA testing statutes also explicitly exempted DNA testing motions and related proceedings from the procedural bars that govern other forms of post-conviction relief. Before the emergence of this discrete statutory avenue that allowed petitioners to seek post-conviction DNA testing, the innocent were forced to rely upon processes that put the burden on the petitioner to effectively solve the crime and prove that the DNA evidence promises to implicate another individual. In states without post-conviction DNA testing laws, many efforts to achieve testing were stymied, egregiously delayed or flatly denied.

Consider the following case of justice denied in the absence of a post-conviction DNA testing law. In March of 1989, New Jerseyan Larry Peterson was convicted of the sexual assault and murder of a woman in Burlington County. Although three men originally indicated to police that they were with Mr. Peterson at the time the murder took place, they later changed their accounts during interrogations and told law enforcement that Mr. Peterson confessed to them that he had indeed committed the crime. One forensic scientist testified at trial that her hair comparison analysis tied Mr. Peterson to the murder and another analyst with the New Jersey State Police testified that there was seminal fluid on the victim's jeans and sperm on her underwear. No seminal fluid or sperm was found in her rape kit. All tests on these items of evidence were inconclusive at the time of trial.

Mr. Peterson testified in his own defense at trial. Alibi witnesses supported his whereabouts during the time of the crime. Work records also showed that he did not work on the day that the victim was found – the day he supposedly confessed to the crime on his way to work. The jury convicted Mr.

Peterson of felony murder and aggravated sexual assault in March 1989. He was sentenced to life plus twenty years in prison.

Although there was no post-conviction DNA testing law in New Jersey, Mr. Peterson first sought access to DNA testing in 1994 under the state's existing post-conviction review process. When the court finally heard his motion in 1998, it denied his petition. In 2000, the Appellate Division affirmed the denial of his petition for post-conviction relief ruling that there was overwhelming evidence of guilt in his case. In March of 2001, the Supreme Court denied his Petition for Certification.

Mr. Peterson was without hope until New Jersey passed a statute granting access to post-conviction DNA testing. The law was made effective on July 7, 2002. On July 8, 2002, Larry Peterson became the first New Jerseyan to file a petition for post-conviction DNA testing under the new law and ultimately testing was granted, after an appeal of an initial denial.

In February of 2005, the Serological Research Institute (SERI) reported the results of testing: Mr. Peterson was excluded as a contributor of any and all of the biological evidence. Although the New Jersey State Police Laboratory had reported that there was no semen in the victim's rape kit, SERI identified sperm on her oral, vaginal, and anal swabs. Two different male profiles were found. One of the males was one of the victim's consensual partners, and his profile was also found on her underwear, jeans, and rape kit. The other unknown male was found on all of the swabs in her rape kit. Based on this evidence, Mr. Peterson's conviction was vacated in July 2005. On May 26, 2006, the prosecution decided to drop all charges against Mr. Peterson. Without the passage of New Jersey's post-conviction DNA testing law, Mr. Peterson would have perished in prison.

Today, 47 states have post-conviction DNA testing laws, which vary in substance and scope. In some states with laws, the "right" to DNA testing remains illusory for many categories of potentially innocent defendants. That said, the proposal under consideration in SB 241 more affirmatively denies post-conviction testing than any other statute we have ever seen.

We offer this perspective based on our breadth of experience litigating claims of innocence all across the nation. We have worked closely with legislatures around the country to establish meaningful post-conviction DNA access, most recently in South Carolina, Mississippi and Nevada, which chose last year to expand its statute to additional categories of deserving applicants. We have learned that seemingly innocuous provisions can spell a dead end for justice for many deserving applicants and wish to spare Alaska such a fate. While there are many provisions that create barriers to meaningful access to post-conviction DNA testing in this proposal, in the interest of time, I will focus on the most problematic areas.

Timeliness

Perhaps the most restrictive provision in this proposal can be found in Section 12.73.040, which effectively puts a three year statute of limitations from the time of conviction on filing a post-conviction claim of innocence. As I mentioned earlier, nearly every single individual who was able to prove innocence through post-conviction DNA testing had already exhausted all available state remedies, as well as federal habeas corpus relief before seeking testing. Not one of these individuals would be eligible for testing under the framework contemplated in this proposal. There is not one law in the nation that includes such a restrictive timeliness provision. Indeed, 35 of 47 statutes possess no time limitation on the filing of a post-conviction DNA testing petition whatsoever. Perhaps more concerning, the inclusion of such a provision in a post-conviction testing law would make claims more difficult to bring than under the current post-conviction review process.

Barring Testing to Individuals Whose Attorneys Did Not Previously Seek Testing
Traditionally, a defendant seeking post-conviction DNA testing might be able to accomplish such testing under the post-conviction relief process. Unfortunately, though, that framework has proven illusory, given the fact that not a single Alaskan has achieved post-conviction DNA testing to date. If properly structured, a post-conviction DNA testing framework would correct this and allow an Alaskan access to testing under such a framework. Unfortunately, however, the framework proposed also effectively blocks access to post-conviction DNA testing.

A provision inserted into the existing post-conviction review law, located in Section 12.72.010(4), indicates that if an individual seeks post-conviction DNA testing to support his claim of innocence, the person's "exclusive method for obtaining that testing is an application under the post-conviction DNA testing statute," yet Section 12.73.020(5)(A), a provision in the proposed, new post-conviction DNA testing framework, bars an individual from seeking post-conviction DNA testing if the evidence "was not subjected to DNA testing, and the applicant did not waive, or the applicant's lawyer did not forego for tactical reasons, the right to request DNA testing." This provision is made worse by the requirement, in Section 12.73.010(4), which requires an affidavit by the applicant's lawyer stipulating to the reasons DNA testing was not sought before or during trial.

These sections effectively bar innocent individuals who were victimized by poor representation, a common cause of wrongful conviction, from post-conviction DNA testing. Put simply, this proposal requires an individual seeking DNA testing to abandon the post-conviction relief process for the purposes of accessing post-conviction DNA testing in favor of the newly created avenue for post-conviction DNA testing. Once the defendant seeks DNA testing under the post-conviction DNA testing framework, however, which is his "exclusive method for obtaining that testing," he is at the mercy of his trial attorney to disclose potential incompetence in order to be granted that post-conviction DNA testing. Therefore, he must rely upon his trial attorney, the same trial attorney who ineffectively represented him, to admit to his negligence or indolence to obtain access to post-conviction DNA testing under the post-conviction DNA testing framework.

It is improper to deny an individual the opportunity to test scientific evidence to establish innocence because a trial lawyer failed to explore DNA testing, made a poor decision, or could not afford a test. It is difficult to conceive that the same trial attorney who made a poor decision would be willing provide an affidavit to this effect. Put simply, these provisions deny the most vulnerable – those who were represented poorly or ineffectively – the ability of proving innocence through DNA testing.

Barring Individuals Who Admitted Guilt
There are three areas of the proposal that would foreclose the possibility of post-conviction DNA testing to an individual who admitted or conceded guilt to the crime for which he was convicted. Section 12.73.010(b)(1)(C); 12.73.020(3); and 12.73.020(9). While it is counterintuitive to most, the innocent, with great regularity, plead guilty, falsely confess and otherwise provide admissions to crimes they did not commit.

Researchers who study this phenomenon have determined that the following factors contribute to or cause such admissions or false confessions:

- Real or perceived intimidation of the suspect by law enforcement
- Use of force by law enforcement during the interrogation, or perceived threat of force
- Compromised reasoning ability of the suspect, due to exhaustion, stress, hunger, substance use, and, in some cases, mental limitations, or limited education
- Devious interrogation techniques, such as untrue statements about the presence of incriminating evidence
- Fear, on the part of the suspect, that failure to confess will yield a harsher punishment

Some populations, including youth and individuals with mental limitations, are particularly vulnerable, but we have uncovered many cases that involve individuals who do not fall into these "at risk" categories. Nearly 25% of the nation's wrongful convictions proven through DNA testing reveal involved an admission or confession. The proposal currently under consideration would have barred all of these people from seeking testing.

Requiring Courts to Anticipate the Outcome of Testing
Section 12.73.020(10) requires the court to assess whether there is a reasonable probability, in light of all available evidence, including even evidence that was not introduced at trial, that the requested DNA testing would demonstrate innocence. In essence, this provision would allow the courts to guess the outcome of testing rather than to just accomplish that requested testing. We have learned in the course of our work, that only DNA can provide definitive answers about guilt or innocence. Time and again, we have uncovered cases which contain multiple elements seemingly pointing to the defendant's guilt only to learn through DNA testing that the defendant is, in fact, innocent. As I described earlier, at our office, we have reviewed cases where we were fairly confident in a defendant's guilt only to learn later of his innocence and vice versa. Therefore, it is simply irresponsible to place such a burden on the court, and it certainly sets the stage for irreparable mistakes that any one of us, placed in that same position, would make.

Requiring the Petitioner to Pay for the Retrieval of Evidence
Section 12.36.200(d) of the proposal requires the defendant seeking biological evidence connected to his case to pay for its retrieval. There is no other state in the country that places this burden on the defendant. In light of all of the other barriers to meaningful post-conviction DNA testing contained in this proposal, this additional burden – particularly for an indigent defendant – could effectively bar deserving individuals from seeking testing.

We believe the Governor put forward this proposal in the hopes of helping the truly innocent who are languishing behind bars in the state of Alaska. Unfortunately there are many provisions in this bill that would prevent access to post-conviction DNA testing from being meaningful. In essence, their hopes of demonstrating their innocence will be forever prohibited. Our office would appreciate the opportunity to offer our perspective to the Alaskan legislature with the goal of crafting a statute that provides meaningful access to testing in the way we believe Alaskans want.

Thank you for the opportunity to share these views with you. I hope you will contact me if there is any additional information that I can provide on the subject.

*This element of HB 316 is unheard of among post-conviction DNA testing access statutes. And rightly so, as it permits a judge to take into account any and all evidence of guilt in deciding a motion for mere testing, without requiring the judge to assume exculpatory results. In essence, the judge could cite "overwhelming evidence of guilt" in denying a motion for post-conviction DNA testing. This—despite the fact that appellate judges found harmless error in the appeals of ten percent of 133 DNA exonerees, citing overwhelming evidence of guilt.[1] Put differently, 13 exonerees in this cohort of 133 would likely still be in prison had they been subjected to this aberrant provision.

SENATE BILL 241
EVIDENCE RETENTION AND POST-CONVICTION DNA TESTING
Sectional Analysis

Sections 1 and 2 are conforming amendments to clarify that the evidence retention provisions in the bill take precedence over the provisions of AS 12.36.010 – 12.36.090 that address disposition of evidence in various circumstances, including disposal of unclaimed property.

Section 3 proposes a new statute in AS 12.36, Preservation of Evidence, that would require municipal police departments, the Department of Public Safety, the Department of Law, and the Alaska Court System to preserve both physical evidence and biological evidence for the periods described below. The highlights include:

- The retention requirements apply to an investigation and prosecution of homicide (murder, manslaughter, and criminally negligent homicide), sexual assault in the first degree, and sexual abuse in the first degree.

  Because this is a new (and unfunded) duty imposed on municipal agencies in addition to state agencies, the bill was drafted to apply to a limited number of offenses; the offenses are the most likely to include evidence with DNA as part of the investigation and prosecution.

- Requires evidence (not including biological material) to be retained until the expiration of the prosecution, including the time for completing an appeal (including time for applying for review to the United States Supreme Court) or the litigation of any post-conviction relief application.

  The bill allows agencies to preserve samples of evidence if the item itself is impractical or hazardous to preserve. It recognizes that municipal police agencies will have varying storage capacity; that is, a rural agency will have a smaller storage ability that a larger municipality. The bill requires each agency to adopt written policies addressing removal and preservation of samples.

- Requires biological material to be retained by an agency until the defendant is unconditionally discharged for the crime (including any period of probation or parole), or until the period for retention of physical evidence have expired, whichever is longer.

  Biological material is defined to include the contents of a sexual assault examination kit, all human bodily material collected in the investigation, slides, swabs, or test tubes containing human bodily material, and swabs or cuttings from other evidence that contain human bodily material.

- The bill adopts a procedure for an agency, after notice to the parties and their attorneys, to dispose of or return evidence or biological material if no party objects to the disposal or return of the evidence or biological material. If there is an objection, it allows the agency to request the court to allow the disposal or return of evidence or biological material.

- The remedy for an agency's failure to preserve evidence and biological material is left to the court. However, a court may not reverse or otherwise vacate a conviction based solely on a violation of the new law.

- The bill prohibits a person from bringing a civil action against an agency for a good faith failure to abide by the new requirements.

Section 4 requires that a person who seeks post-conviction DNA testing to support a claim of innocence bring the application for testing under AS 12.73, proposed in the bill.

Section 5 clarifies practice in the area of post-conviction relief by putting in statute the common law rule that requires an applicant to plead a prima facie case for post-conviction relief, and the court make a finding that a prima facie case has been pled before the state responds. Then the parties may pursue discovery on the matter. State v. Jones, 759 P.2d 558, 565-566.

Section 6 adopts procedures for post-conviction DNA testing. These include the following:

- Sec. 12.73.010 sets out the information that must be included in an application for post-conviction DNA testing. The applicant must file
    - An affidavit by the applicant that states
        - that the applicant did not commit the crime for which he was convicted or any lesser included offense;
        - that the applicant did not solicit another person to commit, or aid or abet another person in planning or committing, the offense or any lesser included offense;
        - that the applicant did not admit or concede guilt for the offense in any official proceeding;

- An affidavit by the applicant or the applicant's lawyer stating the results of each DNA test already performed on evidence in the prosecution of the defendant;

- An affidavit by the applicant or the applicant's lawyer describing previous efforts to obtain DNA testing;

- An affidavit by the applicants trial lawyer stating the reason the DNA testing was not requested at the trial level, or a affidavit stating the efforts taken to obtain this affidavit.

- Sec. 12.73.020 provides the standards for when a court may order post-conviction DNA testing. These include:

  - The applicant was convicted of a felony against a person (AS 11.41);

  - Completion of the affidavits required by AS 12.73.010 have been submitted;

  - The applicant has not admitted or conceded guilt in an official proceeding;

  - The evidence was obtained as part of an investigation of the crime;

  - Either

    - The evidence has not been tested or the right to test the evidence was not waived for tactical reasons; or

    - The evidence has been previously tested, the applicant is requesting a more probative test, and the applicant did not waive for tactical reasons a similarly probative test;

  - The evidence has been retained under conditions that ensure that it has not changed in a way that would undermine the accuracy of the test;

  - The applicant proposes a defense theory not inconsistent with the defense at trial, and that would establish innocence;

  - If the defendant was convicted at trial, the identity of the perpetrator was an issue;

  - There is a reasonable probability that the testing requested will produce new evidence that would support the new defense theory and could conclusively establish innocence;

- The applicant consents to give a DNA sample and to have that sample entered into the DNA identification registration system; and

- The application is timely.

- Sec. 12.73.030 allows for summary dismissal by the court if the application does not include the information required. If the application is not summarily dismissed the prosecuting authority has 45 days to file a response.

- Sec. 12.73.040 adopts presumptions regarding timeliness. There is a presumption that filed an application within three years after conviction is timely. There is a presumption that an application filed later is untimely; this may be rebutted by a finding that the applicant was incompetent or for any other good reason.

- Sec. 12.73.050 adopts procedures for collecting DNA samples. It also provides that the testing must be performed at a laboratory operated by the state or approved by the state. The cost of testing will be paid for by the state; if the applicant requests additional testing, the applicant must pay for it, and it must be performed at an accredited laboratory or one approved by the Department of Public Safety.

- Sec. 12.73.060 clarifies that the prosecution and an applicant may stipulate to DNA testing without following the procedures in the bill.

- Sec. 12.73.070 includes definitions for the new chapter.

Section 7 provides that an indigent applicant is entitled to representation by the Public Defender Agency in bringing an application for post-conviction DNA testing.

Sections 8 – 12 make clarifying amendments to the DNA identification registration system statutes. The bill clarifies that a minor must be 16 years of age or older at the time of offense for the minor's DNA to be entered into the database. It also requires that the Department of Public Safety remove a DNA sample entered into the database if the individual was found not guilty for the offense that was the basis of the DNA entry. The bill also makes several draft changes to improve the readability of the law.

Section 13 provides that a DNA sample from the registration system may be used in a criminal investigation if it was mistakenly in the system, if the error was made in good faith. Section 13 also clarifies that if a sample does not include sufficient material to obtain an accurate identification, another sample may be taken.

Sections 14 and 15 note the effect the bill has on Rule 35.1, Alaska Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Section 16 creates a task force to consider and recommend standards for preservation of evidence. The task force would consist of the attorney general, the commissioner of public safety, a chief of police from a community not on the state's road system, a chief of police from a municipal department, the state medical examiner, representatives from the crime laboratory and the court system, and the victims' advocate.

The task force's work would be to recommend standards for collection, storage, organization, cataloging, and retrieval of evidence; identify sources of financial help for implementing the standards; recommend minimum qualification and training of persons responsible for storing evidence. After completing its work, the task force will report its recommendations to the legislature.

Sections 17 – 19 include applicability and effective date provisions.

Re: Senate Bill 241 – post-conviction DNA testing and evidence retention

Dear Senator French:

I am writing to respectfully request that you schedule Senate Bill 241 for a hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee at your earliest convenience. SB 241 is one of several bills that the Governor has introduced to confront and help reduce crime in our state, and to provide for evidence retention and for post-conviction DNA testing.

The bill adopts standards for law enforcement agencies to retain evidence. This is important for later testing of the evidence for both cold case prosecutions and for people who claim they were wrongfully convicted. The bill adopts standards for post-conviction DNA testing. The bill also makes drafting and other minor changes to the DNA identification system.

Attached is a sectional analysis that explains the bill in detail.

Thank you for your consideration of this request.

Sincerely,

Daniel S. Sullivan
Attorney General

MEMORANDUM March 4, 2010

SUBJECT: Senate Bill 244: would the measure, if enacted in its current form, support a successful complaint under the Executive Branch Ethics Act against a governor spending less than half of his or her time in Juneau? (Work Order No. 26-LS1322\P)

TO: Senator Hollis French

FROM: Jack Chenoweth
Assistant Revisor

AS 39.20.060 provides that "state personnel laws relating to hours of employment, annual leave, sick leave, overtime, compensatory time, and travel allowances" are inapplicable to the governor and lieutenant governor. As introduced, Senate Bill 244 proposes to add an exception to that general exemption with reference to the governor that would formally declare that the governor's duty station[1] during term of office is Juneau and that would

[1] Although it appears in the Alaska Statutes, the term "duty station" is not defined there. The bill draft was prepared with an eye to the definition of the term as it is set out in Alaska Administrative Manual § 60.020:

> The duty station of a traveler includes the city, town, or village within 50 miles of where the traveler spends the major portion of their working time, or the place to which the traveler returns to duty on completion of special assignments. On a case-by-case basis, commissioners may identify a radius or commuting area that is broader than 50 miles within which per diem will not be allowed for travel within one calendar day.

The same rule also sets out a related definition of the term "residence":

> The residence of a traveler is the location, or within 50 miles thereof, where the traveler maintains the primary dwelling.
> If a traveler maintains multiple residences, the commissioner of the department shall designate the residence that bears the most logical relationship to the traveler's duty station as the traveler's primary residence. Factors to be considered in determining the primary residence include: the time ordinarily spent performing duties at each location; the degree of business activity at each location; the relative amount of state wages earned at each location. . . . .

explicitly preclude the governor's claim of lodging allowance "when staying in the governor's personal residence while in travel status away from [that] designated duty station."

The measure does not propose an amendment to the Executive Branch Ethics Act (AS 39.52). While an ethics charge certainly may be initiated against a governor who spends inordinate time away from the duty station designated in the measure, if that assertion is the whole argument offered in support of the claim or complaint, then, in my judgment it would be a complaint without merit.

In some instances, the decision by the governor and his or her family not to use and occupy the residence may be one compelled by reality. For example, an extended period of medical care (such as the state's first governor, Bill Egan, required) may result in absence from the seat of government. Similarly, if major renovation or repairs to the residence are scheduled, it may prove impractical for the governor's family to remain while the work is being undertaken. In other instances, the governor may conclude that attention to duties on site requires temporary station for an extended period in another part of the state.

The decision on where to conduct day-to-day business has been, for more than 50 years, and would remain, under the proposed measure, committed to the governor's discretion. However, I see nothing in the Executive Branch Ethics Act to support a conclusion that the governor violates the Act due just to his or her spending extraordinary amounts of time away from Juneau without additional evidence that the governor has violated another provision of the chapter. I've looked particularly at provisions of the Act that address "misuse of official position" (AS 39.52.120) and it doesn't seem that any of the activities identified in (a) and (b) of that section[2] -- provisions that appear to me to be the

---

A related provision, Alaska Administrative Provision § 60.240, ties these provisions together by directing, in relevant part,

> Travelers are not entitled to a lodging allowance when staying in their own residence(s).

The language of the statute, without the language of the proposed amendment, negates application of this provision to the governor and lieutenant governor.

[2] These subsections provide:

> Misuse of official position. (a) A public officer may not use, or attempt to use, an official position for personal gain, and may not intentionally attempt to use, an official position for personal gain, and may not intentionally secure or grant unwarranted benefits or treatment for any person.

most directly relevant to the performance of the state's chief executive -- would support the claim.

Nothing in SB 244 appears to be intended to alter the ability of the governor to maintain his or her own schedule in order to fulfill the constitutional obligation that the governor has to see to the faithful execution of the laws. A governor who determines to exercise authority from a location other than the seat of government may do so, and his or her decision on how to allocate time between the state capital and other locations remains a matter committed to the governor's discretion and is not, and should not be, the basis of a claim of violation of AS 39.52.

to undertake obligations in and to reside at the seat of government during the executive's term of office is not an exceptional requirement. The mandate appears as a constitutional provision or in state statutes in just over half the states.

Of those, about 18 jurisdictions include the requirement or an explicit reference to a requirement in the state constitution --

Alabama, art. V, sec. 118: The governor [and other statewide elected officers . . .] shall, except the lieutenant governor, reside at the state capital during the time they continue in office, except during epidemics. . . . .

Arizona, art. V, sec. 1(C): The officers of the executive department during their terms of office shall reside at the seat of government where they shall keep their offices and the public records, books, and papers.

Arkansas, art. V, sec. 1: Executive department . . . . A. The executive department shall consist of the governor [and other specified officers].

C. The officers of the executive department during their terms of office shall reside at the seat of government where they shall keep their offices and the public records, books, and papers. . . . .

Idaho, art. IV, sec. 1: The executive department shall consist of a governor [and other designated officers] . . . . Their official office shall be located in the county where the seat of government is located, there they shall keep public records, books and papers. . . . .

Illinois, art. V, sec. 1: Officers. The Executive Branch shall include a Governor [and other designated officers] elected by the electors of the State. They shall keep the public records and maintain a residence at the seat of government during their terms of office.

Indiana, art. VI, sec. 5: Residence of state officers. (a) The Governor [and other designated officers] shall severally keep the public records, books, and papers, in any manner relating to their respective offices, at the seat of government.

(b) The Governor shall reside at the seat of government.

Maryland, art. II, sec. 21: Residence of Governor. The Governor shall reside at the seat of government . . . .

Michigan, art. V, sec. 24: Executive residence. An executive residence suitably furnished shall be provided at the seat of government for the use of the governor. He shall receive an allowance for its maintenance as provided by law.

Montana, art. VI, sec. 1: Officers. (1) The executive branch includes a governor [and other designated elected officers].

(3) Each shall reside at the seat of government, there keep the public records of his office, and perform such other duties as are provided in this constitution and by law.

New Mexico, art. V, sec. 1: The executive department shall consist of a governor [and other elected officers specified]. . . . The officers of the executive department, except the lieutenant governor, shall during their terms of office, reside and keep the public records, books, papers and seals of office at the seat of government.

New York, art. IV, sec. 3: . . . The governor shall receive for his or her services an annual salary to be fixed by joint resolution of the senate and assembly, and there shall be provided for his or her use a suitable and furnished executive residence.

North Carolina, art. III, sec. 5: Duties of Governor. (1) Residence. The Governor shall reside at the seat of government of this State. . . . .

North Dakota, art. V, sec. 1: The executive power is vested in the governor, who shall reside in the state capital and shall hold the office for the term of four years beginning in the year 2000, and until a successor is elected and qualified.

South Carolina, art. IV, sec. 20: Residence of Governor. The Governor shall reside at the Capital of the State except in case of epidemics, natural disaster, or the emergencies of war; but during the sittings of the General Assembly he shall reside where its sessions are held.

Texas, art. IV, secs. 5 and 13:

-- Compensation of Governor. The Governor shall, at stated times, receive as compensation for his services an annual salary in an amount to be fixed by the Legislature, and shall have the use and occupation of the Governor's Mansion, fixtures and furniture.

-- Residence of Governor. During the session of the Legislature the Governor shall reside where its sessions are held, and at all other times at the seat of Government, except when by act of the Legislature, he may be required or authorized to reside elsewhere.

Virginia, art. V, sec. 4: Place of residence and compensation of Governor. The Governor shall reside at the seat of government. . . . .

Washington, art. III, sec. 24: Records, where kept, etc. The governor, secretary of state, treasurer, auditor, superintendent of public instruction, commissioner of public lands and attorney general shall severally keep the public records, books and papers relating to their respective offices, at the seat of government, at which place also the governor, secretary of state, treasurer and auditor shall reside.

West Virginia, art. VII, sec. 1: The executive department shall consist of a governor [and other designated officers]. . . . They shall reside at the seat of government during their terms of office, keep there the public records, books and papers pertaining to their respective offices and shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by law.

Another half dozen states prescribe residence at the state capital or seat of government by law --

Florida, Fla. Stat. § 14.01: Governor; residence; office; authority to protect life, liberty, and property. The Governor shall reside at the head of government, and the Governor's office shall be in the capitol. The Governor may have such other offices within the state as he or she may deem necessary. . . . .

Georgia, O.C.G.A. § 45-12-6: Executive office; Governor's residence. The executive office of the Governor shall be in the capitol. If from any cause there is no capitol or if it is abandoned, then the executive office shall be at such place at the seat of government as the Governor may direct, and not elsewhere, unless made necessary by invasion, insurrection, pestilence, or rebellion. The Governor shall reside at the state capital during his term of office.

Louisiana, La. Rev. Stat, § 49.208: The governor shall be entitled to the use and occupancy of the governor's mansion as his official place of residence during his term of office; . . . .

Maine, 2 Maine Rev. Stat. § 1: Residence; office hours; . . . . The Governor shall have his official residence at Augusta during his term of office, and shall keep his office at the State House open for the transaction of the business of the State during all normal working hours of the State House.

Nevada, Nev. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 223.040: Office and residence. The governor shall keep his office and reside at the seat of government.

Wyoming, Wyo. Stat. Ann. § 9-1-101(b): The governor, secretary of state, state treasurer, state auditor and state superintendent of public instruction shall reside and maintain their offices at the seat of government.

Another handful of jurisdictions explicitly direct the governor to maintain an office or principal office at the seat of government during the term of office without also specifying a place of residence or abode at that location. In some few instances, that directive appears in the state constitution --

Kansas, Constitution of the State of Kansas, § 6: Offices at capital. The governor [and other enumerated state officials] shall keep their respective offices at the seat of government.

Oklahoma, Okla. Const. art. VI, § 1(A): Executive officers enumerated--Offices and records--Duties. The Executive authority of the state shall be vested in a Governor [and other designated public officers] provided by law and this Constitution, each of whom shall keep his office and public records, books and papers at the seat of government, and shall perform such duties as may be designated in this Constitution or prescribed by law.

Oregon, Oregon Const., art. VI, § 5: Offices and records of executive officers. The Governor, Secretary of State, and Treasurer of State shall severally keep the public records, books and papers at the seat of government in any manner relating to their respective offices.

In others, it is a mandate imposed by law --

Colorado, Colo. Rev. Stat. § 24-20-101: Office at seat of government - secretary. The governor shall keep his office at the seat of government, in which shall be transacted the business of the executive; and he shall keep a secretary at said office during his absence.

Iowa, Iowa Code § 7.1: Office -- secretary. The governor shall keep the governor's office at the seat of government, in which shall be transacted the business of the executive department of the state. The governor shall keep a secretary at the office during the governor's absence.

In the roughly 20 remaining jurisdictions apart from Alaska, while there are often statutory references to an "executive residence," "governor's mansion," or a similar phrase, indicative that the state government furnishes an "official residence" at or near the state's seat of government for the governor's use during a term of office, they appear without a corresponding requirement or mandate that the governor shall occupy the space provided.

SPONSOR STATEMENT

SB 244 – GOVERNOR'S DUTY STATION

SB 244 will clarify state law regarding the governor's duty station and travel allowance. Currently in statute, there are no provisions that require the governor to reside in the capital city and occupy the governor's mansion during his or her term of office. The bill specifies that the governor's duty station, defined as the location where the governor spends the major portion of time assigned to fulfill the duties of office, is considered to be Juneau.

The proposed law does not prohibit the governor from maintaining a personal residence in another part of the state, but if he chooses to reside there and not in the governor's mansion, he will not be entitled to a travel allowance when away from the capital.

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS

SB 244

"An Act providing that, during the governor's term of office, the duty station of the governor is Juneau, and prohibiting payment of certain travel allowances for use of the governor's personal residence."

Sec. 1 Amends AS 39.20.060 by removing the exemption in state law enjoyed by the governor and lt. governor with respect to the calculation and payment of travel allowances.

Sec. 2 Adds a new subsection to AS 39.20.060 declaring Juneau to be the governor's designated duty station and makes conforming amendments to the calculation and payment of travel allowances that apply to the governor.

Sec. 3 Satisfies AS 39.20.070 which requires modifications to AS 39.20.050 or AS 39.20.060 be done so expressly.

AAM 60.010 Introduction to Travel (07-05)

The travel policies of the State of Alaska are adopted by the Commissioner of the Department of Administration in accordance with AS 39.20.160. State agencies and travelers are required to comply with these policies whenever traveling on state business. Department heads may approve policy exceptions on a trip-by-trip basis for subordinate personnel within their departments based on documented circumstances or unique business requirements. Policy exceptions for department heads must be approved by the Commissioner of the Department of Administration.

The purpose of the travel policies is to provide approval to travel on state business, and to provide reimbursement for actual and necessary expenses incurred by travelers while traveling on state business. The policies apply uniformly to all travelers unless otherwise provided for by a collective bargaining agreement. When there is a conflict between these policies and a collective bargaining agreement, the relevant provisions of the collective bargaining agreement supersede.

The travel policies of the state are generally intended to be in compliance with current IRS regulations as an accountable plan. See AAM 320 for tax implications related to state travel reimbursement policies.

AAM 60.020 Travel Definitions (01-10)

Commercial Lodging Facility

A commercial lodging facility is a licensed entity that is in the business of selling lodging to the general public and includes hotels, inns, motels, apartments, and campgrounds.

Department Travel Administrator

Travel administrators are department personnel responsible for maintaining the travel profiles for their department. They may or may not also be the department's travel coordinator.

Department Travel Coordinator

Employee designated within a department to oversee the travel function. Department travel coordinators assist and train travel planners, monitor travel operations, and make recommendations on statewide travel policy.

Duty Station

The duty station of a traveler includes the city, town, or village within 50 miles of where the traveler spends the major portion of their working time, or the place to which the traveler returns to duty on completion of special assignments. On a case-by-case basis, commissioners may identify a radius or commuting area that is broader than 50 miles within which per diem will not be allowed for travel within one calendar day.

Emergency

An emergency is defined as an unforeseen set of circumstances that calls for immediate action. Emergencies include those that are the result of business-related occurrences, as well as personal situations. Personal emergencies generally do not affect travel status, except in the following cases:

- Traveler suffers a serious health condition (as defined by AS 39.20.550(5) while in travel status
- Death of an immediate family member [as defined by 2 AAC 08.999 (c)] occurs while traveler is in travel status
- Other situations deemed by department management as severe enough to affect travel status

E-Travel

Managed travel program for the State of Alaska Executive Branch.

E-Travel Management Team (ETMT)

The ETMT is comprised of the State Travel Manager and Assistant, as well as others from the Division of Finance that support this program.

E-Travel Office

The E-Travel Office is a section within the Division of Finance that manages the travel function for the Executive Branch. Staffed by the State Travel Manager and Assistant, this office serves as the liaison between state agencies and the contracted travel agency.

E-Travel Online

The online booking tool for travel arrangements, provided by the contracted travel agency and powered by RESX.

Lodging Allowance

Lodging allowance is the portion of per diem that covers lodging, generally the actual cost of the traveler's hotel room unless otherwise stated in individual bargaining unit agreements.

M&IE

Meals and incidental expense allowance. The portion of per diem that reimburses travelers for the cost of meals and incidental expenses including discretionary tips, laundry expenses, and other personal costs of travel.

Note: Any incidental expenses charged to a State credit card will be deducted from M&IE paid to the traveler.

MCAAK Credits

Cash equivalent credit received for purchases of MCAAK airfares from the contract travel agency. These credits are no longer accrued, but remaining balances may be used as a form of payment for airfare.

Non-Commercial Lodging Facility

A non-commercial lodging facility may include, but is not limited to, a public facility in a rural setting such as a community building or school, motor home, or private home.

Per Diem

Per diem allowance is a daily payment instead of reimbursement for actual expenses for lodging, meals, and incidental expenses. It is separate from transportation expenses and other miscellaneous expenses.

Residence

The residence of a traveler is the location, or within 50 miles thereof, where the traveler maintains the primary dwelling.

If a traveler maintains multiple residences, the commissioner of the department shall designate the residence that bears the most logical relationship to the traveler's duty station as the traveler's primary residence. Factors to be considered in determining the primary residence include: the time ordinarily spent performing duties at each location; the degree of business activity at each location; the relative amount of state wages earned at each location. Agencies may also contact the Division of Finance for assistance.

Tourist Class

The least costly class of accommodations on a regularly scheduled airplane, ship, or train.

Travel Planners

Individuals within each department that support travelers by making travel arrangements, explaining policies, ensuring travel is approved prior to purchase, and ensuring reimbursement occurs timely after travel is complete.

Traveler

Throughout these policies, traveler usually means a state official or a person employed by a state agency. At times, an agency may require board or commission members, volunteers, wards of the state, or other nonemployees to travel on state business. The agency must generally apply the same travel policies for nonemployees, except when travel reimbursement terms under a professional service contract differ as discussed in AAM 60.200.

Travel Expenses

- Transportation expenses consist of commercial carrier fares, vehicle mileage allowances, taxi fares, bus fares, and other essential transportation expenses while on official state business.
- The per diem consists of two parts, meals and incidental expenses, and lodging.
- Other expenses consist of charges for business telephone calls, internet, parking fees, emergency purchases of supplies, and other charges necessary to conduct official business.

Travel Status

Travelers shall be considered in travel status from the time an authorized trip begins until it ends. An "authorized trip" is a trip approved in accordance with administrative manual guidelines and where a traveler travels outside the boundaries of the duty station. An authorized trip begins when a traveler is leaving the duty station and:

- A traveler leaves the normal work location during normal work hours; or
- A traveler leaves the residence outside normal work hours.

An authorized trip ends when:

- A traveler returns to the normal work location during normal work hours; or

- A traveler returns to the residence if the trip ends outside normal work hours; or
- A traveler accepts voluntary denied boarding compensation. Refer to AAM 60.080 Interruption or Deviation of Travel for Traveler Convenience.

Refer to:

http://dop.state.ak.us/docpool/pdf/sop/Ch08TravelasTimeWorked/traveltimeworkSOPrev1.pdf for policies on compensation for travel as time worked.

Travel status is either short-term or long-term and per diem allowances vary according to status. The determination of short-term or long-term is based upon the duration and type of lodging facility provided to the employee. See AAM 60.240 for further guidance. A brief return of the employee to their duty station for business or personal convenience does not disrupt the long-term status of the trip.

A traveler is not in travel status for local travel or day trips. The following are some examples of travelers who would not be considered in travel status under the local travel or day trip provision:

- A state trooper while on patrol in his/her assigned territory.
- A safety inspector whose normal duties include driving from his/her normal duty station to a construction site for purposes of conducting an inspection.
- A health inspector whose normal duties include driving from his/her normal duty station to various communities to inspect facilities.

A mileage reimbursement form may be used to reimburse transportation costs when the criteria for travel status are not met.

AAM 60.030 E-Travel (01-10)

The Department of Administration has established E-Travel as the managed travel program serving the State of Alaska Executive Branch, including employees, members of boards and commissions, inmates, witnesses, and other individuals that travel on official State business.

E-Travel is comprised of:

- Travel policies contained in AAM 60
- E-Travel Online, which is the online booking tool RESX configured for State of Alaska travel policies
- Travel management contractor

- Other contracts with vendors in the travel industry including airlines, hotels, and rental car agencies
- E-Travel Management Team (ETMT)
- Travel coordinators, travel administrators, and travel planners within each department
- Employees and others traveling on official State business

Travel Management Contract

The State's travel management contract contains performance measures that affect the fees charged by the contractor. Measurements are performed quarterly and the fees are adjusted +/- 20% from a base amount.

Service standards for performance under the contract are available on the Division of Finance travel web site.

All contracted travel personnel are required to sign and adhere to a confidentiality agreement. The confidentiality agreement prohibits contracted personnel from discussing state travel arrangements with anyone that does not have a valid State of Alaska-related business need to know. The agreement includes a liquidated damage clause for breach of confidentiality.

Traveler Profile

An electronic traveler profile is required for booking travel. The state information in these profiles is maintained by department travel administrators. Optional information such as mileage number or seat preference may be entered by the traveler. Traveler profile instructions are available on the Division of Finance travel web site.

Department Travel Policies

Within the confines of this section, agencies may establish more specific travel policies.

Travel Purchase Process

Travel may be purchased using the E-Travel Online booking tool or by calling the contracted travel agency.

Travel planners should confirm the details of the itinerary before purchasing. After purchase, the agency is responsible for the carrier's change fee and any additional service fees to cancel and reissue the ticket. The traveler is personally responsible for the change fee when the change is for personal convenience.

Travel purchases must include the name of the approving official authorizing the purchase.

Fare Increases

Fares may increase before purchase. The state agency pays the increased fare unless it is due to a contractor delay, in which case the contractor will absorb the fare increase.

24-Hour Hold

A reservation should only be placed on a 24-hour hold when it is certain it will be purchased within that time frame. If the held reservations can not be purchased within 24 hours, the reservation must be cancelled.

Multiple or duplicate 24-hour held reservations are not allowed and run the risk of the ticketed reservation being cancelled by the airlines as a duplicate or debit memos from the airlines that are the responsibility of the state agency.

Refunds

Departments may request a refund for a refundable ticket at any time by replying to the final itinerary asking the contractor to refund the ticket. Any unused refundable ticket will be refunded 60 days after the return date on the ticket by the contractor and the state agency will be notified.

AAM 60.040 Travel Approvals (10-09)

All travel shall be approved in advance. The request for approval shall be in writing and must document essentials of the travel including purpose, destination, dates and times, a total not-to-exceed amount, any related leave requests, and whether an advance is authorized. The approval required depends on the location of the travel:

Travel within Alaska

Prior approval is required within the department and shall at a minimum have the approval of the traveler's immediate supervisor or designee.

Travel to the Contiguous United States, Hawaii, British Columbia, and Yukon Territory

Prior approval is required by the department and by the department's commissioner or designee.

Travel Outside the United States

Prior approval is required by the department, the department's commissioner and the Governor's Office.

Travel Completion Approvals

Following completion of travel, all travel related expenses and any deviation from the originally approved travel arrangements must be documented in the travel authorization. If the total cost of travel exceeds the amount approved in advance by more than 10%, the same level of approval must re-approve the travel, before the traveler reimbursement is approved by the appropriate agency authority.

General Travel Approval Policies

- All state travel shall be work-related and essential for state business.
- Agencies may document pre-approval for certain types of travel that does not fit the specific trip-by-trip approval process.
- Personal travel plans of the traveler shall not influence the approval of state-funded travel. Refer to AAM 60.080 Interruption or Deviation of Travel for Traveler Convenience.
- Travel status should be confined to the minimum amount of time required to conduct the business of the state. As a general rule, a traveler may travel the day prior if the only available flights depart prior to 7:00 a.m. and a traveler may stay an extra night if the only available flights make scheduled home arrival occur after 10:00 p.m. Supervisors may approve exceptions to these travel times when circumstances justify.
- When the required travel period exceeds 15 consecutive days, division directors may authorize employees to return home on days off at state expense. Such trips shall not curtail productive work time, and shall be limited to no more than one per month. Authorized costs for such trips are limited to the amount of avoided per diem.
- Whenever a traveler and the state opt to share the cost of business travel, the agreement will be documented in advance, including the duration of state business within the travel period. For bargaining unit members, such agreements require the concurrence of the union and must be authorized by the Division of Labor Relations.

AAM 60.050 Travel Purchase Policies (01-10)

Alaska Statute 39.20.140(b) requires that the state pay no more than "the lowest tourist class fare for the most direct route" unless specific exemptions are met:

- tourist class accommodation is not available;
- waiting for tourist class accommodation would cause a delay harmful to the state; or
- the Department of Administration finds that travel by tourist class accommodation is not in the best interest of the state, and authorizes other accommodation.

First or business class is allowed if it is offered to the traveler on a complimentary basis because of frequent flyer status and upgraded by the airline involved.

The statutes require purchasing the best fare for the most direct route that meets the state's business needs. This requirement also applies to contractors traveling on behalf of the state, regardless of whether the state is paying the travel expenses directly or reimbursing the contractor. The best fare does not require the purchase of nonrefundable tickets; agencies should make this business decision based on the nature of the travel.

Travelers and approvers are required to document reasons for declining savings where the lowest available airfare is not purchased. Variances from State of Alaska travel policy may be reported to the departments for analysis.

Electronic ticketing is the method preferred by the state. Paper tickets will be issued only when necessary.

Travel planners must confirm the name on the traveler's government-issued ID card before an airline ticket is issued using a generic profile. The airline ticket must be issued in the name on the driver's license or government-issued ID card.

Alaska Airlines EasyBiz miles will be tracked by the travel management contractor for each agency. State agencies will direct the contractor on use of EasyBiz miles that will ensure maximum value upon redemption.

All air and ferry travel must be ticketed using E-Travel except as noted in the service standards.

Travelers are generally required to use State of Alaska contracted / preferred travel providers. The Department of Administration, Division of General Services has negotiated travel contracts as listed in the Contract Award Manual. Use of these providers ensures travelers receive the best fares, rates, and insurance coverage. Exceptions to required use of contracted / preferred providers are limited to:

- Contracted / preferred provider is not available.
- Contracted / preferred provider does not meet a specific business need (requires pre-trip department approval).
- Space or scheduled flights are not available from the contracted / preferred provider to accomplish the purpose of the travel.
- Use of the available contract / preferred provider service would require the traveler to incur unnecessary costs which would increase the total cost of the trip.
- A traveler is inconvenienced more than three hours by using the contracted / preferred airline provider.

State contract airfares are not available for travel by consultants and contractors, even if their travel is reimbursed by the state.

If an airline lowers a fare and a state-purchased ticket is reissued to a lower fare, the difference in fare belongs to the state. Airlines sometimes issue a nonrefundable electronic discount code credit (e-certificate) in lieu of refunding the form of payment used to purchase the original ticket. This e-certificate belongs to the state. State travelers are not allowed to use these e-certificates for personal travel, even if deposited in their personal account by the airline. The e-certificate number must be given to the traveler's department to be used for future state travel.

Excess costs, circuitous routes, delays, or luxury accommodations unnecessary or unjustified in the performance of official state business travel are not acceptable. The traveler will not be reimbursed for any additional costs that result from unauthorized travel arrangements.

AAM 60.060 Payment Methods for Transportation and Expenses (01-10)

The State of Alaska uses two primary methods to purchase transportation for individuals traveling on official state business:

1. One Card Alaska Corporate Credit Card (Card) – Agencies shall issue corporate credit cards to employees who travel. Employees with Cards are required to use them for purchases when the state pays actual costs, as in the case of transportation and actual lodging expenses. These purchases are expenditures from the state to vendors and are generally tax-exempt under local Alaska tax ordinances when purchased with the Card or other means of direct payment by the state.

2. Central Travel System (CTS) Accounts - The State of Alaska has established CTSs, which are used to purchase airfares and pay for rental cars for travelers without Cards. CTSs are ghost accounts for which plastic cards are not issued.

There may be occasions when neither the Card nor the CTS can be used to purchase transportation. In these cases, it should be purchased using EDI or a state warrant.

Additional charges, such as taxes, resulting from purchasing with the traveler's personal resources are the responsibility of the traveler unless none of these payment methods were available to the traveler.

Mileage and MCAAK Credit

Agencies no longer accrue mileage or MCAAK credits for airfare purchases. Agencies accrued MCAAK credits from the contracted travel agency when purchasing MCAAK fares, for which no mileage was available from the airline. Accumulated mileage and MCAAK credits are tracked for the purchasing department, and may be used in lieu of money to purchase airfare.

Mileage may be used to reduce travel costs with Alaska Airlines. Miles are worth slightly less than $0.02 each, which should be a standard for deciding whether to use miles to purchase tickets. For example, 25,000 miles should be considered when the value of the ticket purchased is at least $500.

MCAAK credits can be used to pay for any airline tickets purchased using E-Travel.

Both mileage and MCAAK credits remain available to the purchasing agency for one year after they are earned. At that point, they revert to a statewide pool for use by agencies that have used their mileage and MCAAK credits.

Alaska Marine Highway

Transportation on state ferries may be authorized when in the best interest of the state. All ferry transportation will be paid by the employee using their Card, or by the department through use of the CTS or an interdepartmental billing. Staterooms may be paid in advance utilizing the Card only if the appropriate authorization has been obtained in advance. Meals are to be paid directly by the traveler. The traveler may be eligible for reimbursement of lodging expenses and/or M&IE in accordance with AAM 60.240 and AAM 60.250.

Lodging

Hotel charges paid directly by the state are generally exempt from local taxes within Alaska. Frequent travelers should use their Card to pay for lodging. When the Card is not available, departments may choose to use direct billing as the method of payment. When taxes are charged on direct payments, state agencies should contact the vendor for refunds as appropriate and reflect this action on the travel authorization.

This policy does not apply to lodging purchased by employees who are reimbursed a per diem allowance for lodging per the terms of their labor contract. This lodging is a purchase of the employee, not a direct state purchase, and is therefore subject to hotel and sales tax under local ordinances.

Meals and Incidental Expenses

For meals and other out-of-pocket expenses, the traveler receives a meals and incidental expense allowance as described in AAM 60.250. These actual costs are purchases of the traveler, and are therefore taxable transactions under local tax ordinances. The Card should not be used for such purchases to avoid improper tax exemption. Personal expenses for meals, phone calls, and entertainment should not be commingled with purchases for lodging expenses on the state Card.

AAM 60.070 Travel Advances (10-09)

An advance of the estimated per diem allowance may be made to a traveler before the traveler enters travel status. Departments may choose to pay travel advances using EDI, or through use of the Card at an ATM.

All travel advances require employee notification that any monies owed the State of Alaska by the traveler may be deducted from the employee's paycheck. The Travel Advance Authorization form, available on the Division of Finance web site, needs to be signed only once by a traveler for recovering all subsequent advances through payroll deductions. These forms should be kept on file by travel planners.

A traveler shall not receive an additional travel advance until the previous travel advance and trip has been reconciled and closed out.

Agencies may make exceptions to policies in this section when circumstances justify.

AAM 60.080 Interruption or Deviation of Travel for Traveler Convenience (01-10)

Any interruption or deviation from the most direct and efficient means of travel for traveler convenience requires prior approval at the agency level by the appropriate supervisor or designee. Any additional time or expense resulting from an interruption or deviation for traveler convenience shall be borne solely by the traveler. See AAM 60.140 for clarification on travel involving privately owned vehicles.

When a traveler interrupts business travel for personal reasons, the following apply:

1. Per diem, travel allowances, and reimbursements may not exceed such charges as would have been incurred if traveling by the most direct and efficient means.

2. Per diem, travel allowances, and reimbursements stop the hour a traveler interrupts business travel for personal reasons and resumes the hour the traveler returns to duty or resumes route of travel required by state business. For example, a traveler (Anchorage duty station) is traveling on state business (in Seattle) and the business is concluded at noon on Wednesday. For personal reasons the traveler will not return to the duty station until the following Monday. In this example, the traveler's entitlement to per diem, mileage, and other travel expenses reimbursements end at noon on Wednesday and would start two hours before flight time from Seattle to return to the duty station, subject to the limitations in 1 above.

3. Any additional time away from the traveler's duty station that may be required for such indirect travel will be charged to annual leave, personal leave, or leave without pay. In the example 2 above, the employee's leave status would begin at noon when business travel was interrupted for personal reasons. Leave in conjunction with business travel must be documented in prior approval and copies of leave slips shall be submitted upon completion of the trip.

4. Per diem is allowed when a traveler is granted leave due to illness. However, the per diem allowance shall not be authorized for a period of illness exceeding three calendar days in any one period of absence. Per diem is not authorized if the traveler is hospitalized or otherwise has no actual and necessary business expenses requiring reimbursement.

5. Rental cars obtained for official state business must be returned.

6. State exemption for hotel taxes does not extend to lodging.

7. Personal travel segments cannot be purchased at state contracted rates.

8. A traveler on official state business requesting approved personal air travel deviation for an alternate routing, personal discount coupons to purchase companion travel, or travel that increases airfare, will make their own travel arrangements. These arrangements will be purchased by the traveler using a personal form of payment instead of a state form of payment. A state-authorized fare quote must be obtained for a price comparison to determine traveler reimbursement. Once travel is completed the traveler must present a copy of the ticket receipt or itinerary showing payment and the state-authorized fare quote to obtain reimbursement. The fare quote may be obtained and saved in E-Travel Online with the research option (no fee), or by calling the contracted travel agency (fee applies). After travel is complete, the state will reimburse the lesser amount of either the ticket or the state-authorized fare quote obtained prior to travel. If the only deviation is an extension of dates on either end of the state-authorized dates, departments may opt to pay for the combined airfare when purchased if the personal portion can be recovered from the traveler's reimbursement after travel is complete.

9. Agencies must ensure that employees combining business and personal travel are well-informed and cautioned that airfares may result in a liability to the employee, should the reason for the business travel be cancelled. Employees leaving on vacation in conjunction with the business event will become responsible for all costs should the business event be cancelled. Employees opting not to travel if the business event is cancelled will be responsible for the cost of travel that the state cannot recover that was attributable to the personal portion of the airfare. The employee may be reimbursed, at the department's option, for the business portion of unused tickets. The business portion of unused tickets paid to employees must be monitored by the department as state assets until they are used or expire. Employees leaving the department prior to the expiration of such a ticket are required to return the state payment for any business portion that is still available for use by the employee.

10. Voluntary denied boarding compensation where the traveler voluntarily vacates his/her seat and takes a later flight may be retained by a traveler (viewed as an insignificant personal travel credit under ethics rules). A traveler cannot volunteer for denied boarding on an outbound flight unless the traveler has previously approved personal travel for the beginning of the travel period. Nor may a traveler volunteer for denied boarding if it may cause a delay in return to work. By accepting a voluntary bump on the return portion, the traveler puts himself on personal travel rather than state business. Travel status ends, no further per diem is allowed, and all state insurance coverage ceases for the duration of the trip. The traveler is responsible for any additional travel expenses caused by the voluntary action.

AAM 60.090 Unused Transportation and Accommodations (01-10)

When travelers' plans change, travelers shall release air, car, and hotel reservations within the required time limits. Travelers may contact vendors directly or contact the travel management contractor to cancel reservations. The state shall not reimburse travelers for charges incurred as a result of failure to release reservations.

Travelers shall submit any unused portion of air or ferry tickets with the travel authorization to their travel planner. Travel planners may forward unused tickets to the travel management contractor to process refunds or the department may retain them for reissuing later.

AAM 60.100 Airline Delays, Rescheduling, and Overheading (01-07)

When an airline assumes the cost of a traveler's lodging and/or meals due to airline delays or overheading, the traveler shall be paid a per diem allowance up to the originally scheduled arrival time. When the airline does not assume the cost of a traveler's lodging and/or meals, the traveler shall be paid the per diem allowance that applies for the actual trip.

Involuntary denied boarding compensation is payable to the state, not to the individual employee. If a traveler is performing official travel and a carrier denies a confirmed reserved seat on a plane, the traveler must submit to the department any payment received for liquidated damages. The traveler must ensure the carrier shows the "State of Alaska" as payee on the compensation. Any such compensation must be submitted with the travel authorization.

AAM 60.110 Excess Baggage (04-05)

The state will only pay for excess personal and state baggage necessary to carry out official state business. Such baggage shall be transported by the most economical method (checked as excess baggage, shipped via airfreight, etc.).

AAM 60.120 Rental Cars (01-10)

When necessary, the rental of a car may be authorized for travelers in travel status. The estimated cost for the rental car must be included in the prior approval process required under AAM 60.040 Travel Approvals. The cost and intended use of the car must be considered in determining the size and type of car to rent. The State of Alaska supports a mid-size or less car rental. Rental of a car larger than mid-size may be allowed when several travelers are traveling together or circumstances require the use of a larger car. Such situations must also be documented on the completed travel authorization.

- All car rentals must be reserved using E-Travel.
- Travelers cannot upgrade their rental cars at the airport.
- Travelers are responsible for refueling rental cars prior to returning them to the rental car companies. If the rental car company refuels the vehicle, a justifiable business purpose must be provided for incurring the additional cost.

All insurance offered by car rental companies must be declined by state travelers. By most state laws, auto liability insurance (covering third party damage or injury claims) is provided by the car-rental company as owner of the vehicle. Excess auto liability coverage is provided through Risk Management for authorized business travel.

Collision or Physical Damage Waiver for any damage to the rental car (collision, comprehensive coverage, and related loss of use claims) is often offered by the car-rental company at the counter at the time of hire and should be refused by the State of Alaska employee on business travel status. Risk Management will respond and resolve any physical damage claims to rental cars while used on state business related travel.

Rental cars may be driven on state business only, and Risk Management self-insurance coverage applies only where the car is used on state business. State business includes usual travel related activity (restaurants, hotels, etc.), but does not extend to any personal deviations for individual traveler convenience. Refer to AAM 60.080 Interruption or Deviation of Travel for Traveler Convenience.

If there is damage to any rental car:

- Travelers are cautioned to never accept responsibility or admit liability.
- If the lessor requests information or payment, advise the lessor to contact the Department of Administration, Division of Risk Management.
- If there is personal injury or an accident, telephone the Division of Risk Management as soon as possible.

See AAM 60.350 for use of rental cars connected with an employee move.

AAM 60.130 Airport Shuttle, Courtesy Van, and Taxi Service (01-07)

When a traveler in travel status requires transportation either to or from an airport or ferry terminal, an airport shuttle, courtesy van, taxi or limousine service is allowed. When departing on state travel, if a traveler uses a privately owned vehicle for transportation to or from an airport or ferry terminal, the amount of reimbursement for mileage, parking, and other costs is limited to the equivalent cost of a taxi.

AAM 60.140 Privately Owned Vehicles (04-09)

A traveler may use a privately owned vehicle, such as auto, snowmobile, motorcycle, or boat when it is in the best interest of the state. The approving official shall be responsible for substantiating that use of a privately owned vehicle is in the state's best interest. The traveler shall receive a mileage reimbursement equal to the established rates published on the Division of Finance web site at: http://fin.admin.state.ak.us/dof/travel/resource/POV_Rate_Table.pdf.

When a traveler uses a privately owned vehicle, the amount of reimbursement shall be limited to what the lowest available commercial alternative would have cost. Per diem, actual hotel expenses and meal allowances, or other travel reimbursements shall not exceed the amounts that would have been incurred had the traveler used common carrier transportation. Only mileage incurred while engaged in official state business is reimbursable.

Mileage incurred for commuting between an employee's residence and normal work location is not reimbursable. Mileage incurred for commuting to/from a temporary worksite is reimbursable to the extent that it exceeds the distance from the employee's residence to the normal work location.

Any additional regularly scheduled work time away from the duty station required as a result of using a privately owned vehicle for personal convenience will be charged to annual leave, personal leave, or leave without pay.

When two or more state travelers are traveling in the same direction, and it is possible to share a privately owned vehicle or airplane, the state will reimburse the total mileage only once (AS 39.20.130).

AAM 60.150 Privately Owned Aircraft (10-07)

When a state employee, who is a qualified pilot, rents an aircraft or uses a privately owned aircraft for state business, the following items must be filed with the Department of Administration or the agency administrative officer before using the aircraft:

- A copy of a valid pilot's license.
- A copy of current medical certification.

- Proof of aircraft liability insurance with limits not less than $1,000,000 combined single limit for bodily injury and property damage per occurrence/annual aggregate.

It is the responsibility of each agency to ensure these documents are on file before authorizing, or reimbursing a traveler for the use of a privately owned aircraft. No passengers are permitted to accompany a pilot except other state employees who are also traveling on state business to the same destination.

For state travelers who do not have the required $1,000,000 aircraft liability insurance coverage, the Division of Risk Management has an insurance policy to provide the required coverage for travelers who meet certain minimum pilot qualifications. This coverage is a separate aircraft liability policy for $1,000,000 combined single limit liability, for bodily injury and property and may be purchased on a per-flight basis with individual coupons. In the event the aircraft owner has liability insurance, the state policy applies as excess insurance over any other valid and collectible policies.

To obtain individual trip coupons for this per-flight, aircraft liability insurance, contact Risk Management at:

Division of Risk Management
Department of Administration
P.O. Box 110218
Juneau, AK 99811-0218
Phone (907) 465-2180
Fax (907) 465-3690

The cost is $30 per aircraft per round trip flight. The first order for coupons must be accompanied by a copy of the Pilot Qualification Certification (note minimum flight hour requirements on this form), a copy of the pilot's license, and current medical certification. The coupons may be purchased by the traveler pilot or through a request to transfer the funds via an interdepartmental billing (Journal Entry).

The original completed coupon shall be attached to the travel authorization. A copy of the coupon must be returned to Risk Management to comply with insurance policy requirements.

The reimbursement rate for privately owned aircraft is the lesser of the state-published rate on the Division of Finance web site at: http://fin.admin.state.ak.us/dof/travel/resource/POV_Rate_Table.pdf or the common carrier rate to the same destination. Bargaining unit agreements may supersede this rate.

AAM 60.160 Charters and Group Transportation (01-10)

When it is necessary to hire a boat, aircraft, or other special conveyance, an explanation stating the facts constituting the necessity must be included with the travel authorization. When two or more travelers travel as a group or with a group, the names and business relationship of each member of the group shall be included with the travel authorization of each traveler.

All charters must be handled in compliance with the policies and provisions of AS 36.30, purchasing regulations 2 AAC 12, and the agency's delegation of purchasing authority. E-Travel may be used for chartering transportation.

AAM 60.170 Alternatives to Travel (04-05)

Agencies are to develop and implement alternatives to travel, as well as less expensive means of travel. These methods should include, but are not limited to:

- Teleconferencing and video conferencing.
- Video recordings and published reports.
- Reduced frequency of regularly scheduled out of town meetings.
- Restrictions on the number of staff traveling to the same destination.
- Coordinating between agencies for joint travel arrangements when more than one agency is involved.

If an agency determines that a seminar, workshop, or training program is essential to staff development for five or more employees, the agency will investigate the option of bringing the trainer on-site instead of authorizing employees to travel to an off-site location. The agency will document the comparative cost of an on-site session and retain such documentation on file with the agency's travel records. The agency must also explore the practicality of fulfilling the desired staff development goals through use of video teleconferencing or web-based conferencing where these options may be more cost-effective.

AAM 60.180 Boards and Commissions (01-07)

Except for those board and commission members specifically covered in statute, each state board and commission member is entitled to the same reimbursement for lodging and M&IE allowances as provided to state officials and employees in this section of the administrative manual.

When the meeting or other business takes place in the vicinity of the member's residences (see definition at AAM 60.020), members are not in travel status and are not entitled to reimbursement or a per diem for lodging. However, the commissioner of the department with oversight authority of the board may authorize reimbursement of such lodging expenses when deemed necessary and in the best interests of the state. For example, it might be authorized if the travel home would present a hardship due to the age and health of the board member. When such payments are authorized, approval must be noted on the travel authorization.

A board or commission member, who is not a state employee, attending a board or commission meeting is entitled to a prorated M&IE if meals are not provided. To be eligible for each meal period allowance requires the member to be in attendance for at least three consecutive hours within that meal period as defined in AAM 60.250. See AAM 320 for when this allowance may be taxable to board and commission members.

State employees serving as board or commission members as part of their official duties are not entitled to an M&IE allowance or reimbursement for lodging expenses when the board or commission meeting is in the vicinity of their residence and/or duty station. (AS 39.20.180, AS 39.20.185)

AAM 60.190 Health and Safety of Travelers (01-10)

The health and safety of travelers is a top priority in the conduct of state travel related activities. It is advantageous to the state for agencies to establish and alter travel plans and itineraries with consideration of hazardous weather and other situations that could threaten the health and safety of state personnel. When this occurs, travelers should note the reason for any additional expense on the travel authorization.

Travelers with Physical and Medical Conditions

The impact of the medical conditions of travelers on state travel should be considered on a case-by-case basis. For travelers weighing over 300 pounds, the state can pay for two seats in coach class or one first class ticket, whichever costs less. Similar accommodations can be made for travelers weighing less than 300 pounds if the airline requires the purchase of a second seat.

Compliance with the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) is mandatory. Each department has the authority to provide reasonable accommodations during state travel for travelers with disabilities. Decisions regarding specific situations not addressed by policy shall be made and documented by the department, conferring with the Division of Personnel and Labor Relations as necessary.

All state personnel are to be afforded equal opportunity to perform travel for official state business even if the travel costs for disabled travelers will exceed what would normally be most economical to the state. For example:

- When a traveler uses a wheelchair and it is necessary to pay more for an airline ticket so the traveler can fly on a larger airplane that can accommodate the wheelchair.
- When a traveler has hearing or vision impairments and there is a cost of providing auxiliary aids and services to enable the traveler to successfully accomplish the purpose of the travel.

All special needs of travelers should be documented in their travel profile.

The extra travel costs required to comply with the ADA shall be documented and reviewed by the Division of Personnel and Labor Relations. ADA supporting documentation should remain confidential with no details on the travel authorization beyond a statement added indicating the agency file location.

AAM 60.200 Travel Related to Contracts (10-08)

Agencies are encouraged to require the policies of AAM 60 in the terms of their professional service contracts which include travel. When the state reimburses a contractor for travel under these policies, the travel account codes in AKSAS may be used because the travel reimbursements are excludable under the rules governing IRS accountable plans.

When contract terms for travel reimbursement differ from the policies of AAM 60, or the contractor does not account to the state for travel costs, the services account codes must be used to ensure that travel reimbursements are reported as taxable income to the contractor.

AAM 60.210 Completion of the Travel Authorization (01-10)

Each agency will prepare their employees' travel authorizations, and bill other agencies via adjusting journal entry when appropriate. Exceptions to this policy may be agreed to between agencies.

All travel expenses incurred by State of Alaska employees will be reimbursed based upon bargaining unit contracts, Alaska Statutes, and this section of the Alaska Administrative Manual. Lack of adherence to State of Alaska travel policies may result in non-reimbursement.

Within five business days after travel is complete, the traveler, or someone acting for the traveler, is required to complete a travel authorization in a form approved by the Department of Administration. The travel authorization summarizes the trip details, including actual costs, and calculates reimbursement due. Required receipts and evidence of pre-approval must be included.

If the traveler is due an additional amount, final payment shall be made within ten business days of the receipt of a properly completed travel authorization. However, if the final amount to be reimbursed is $.49 or less, no reimbursement will be processed. If the final amount to be reimbursed is $.50 or more, the amount to be paid will be rounded up to $1.00.

Reimbursements to the traveler will be deposited directly into the traveler's bank account unless the traveler chooses non-electronic payment. Any monies owed the State of Alaska by the traveler may be deducted from employee paychecks. When money is owed the State of Alaska and no payroll deduction is done, a personal check or money order must accompany the travel authorization.

If, in an emergency situation, it is necessary for an employee to book travel outside of the E-Travel Office, written documentation will be necessary to explain the circumstances in the travel authorization. This documentation is required for reimbursement.

AAM 60.220 Travel Expenses – Required Receipts and Documentation (07-09)

The following shall be attached to the travel authorization when submitted for final payment:

- A copy of the final itinerary
- Itemized commercial lodging facility receipts (short-term per diem)
- Receipts for expenses exceeding $25
- ATM receipt for any cash advances on state credit cards
- A copy of the rental car agreement
- Leave slips, if the trip includes leave

Though receipts for expenses of $25 or less are not required, total reimbursement for which receipts are not available shall not exceed a cumulative total of $30 per trip.

Receipts are strongly encouraged. All expenses claimed are subject to review. Reimbursement of unsupported expenses may be disallowed. Fraudulent claims may be subject to disciplinary action.

The following travel-related expenses are not reimbursable:

- Lost or stolen articles
- Alcoholic beverages
- Damage to personal cars, clothing, or other items
- Services to gain entry to a locked car
- Movies charged to hotel bills
- All expenses related to the personal negligence of the traveler, such as fines, parking tickets and traffic citations
- Entertainment expenses
- Tips and gratuities
- Towing charges
- Expenses for children, spouses, and companions while in travel status
- Personal phone calls or faxes

The above list is not all-inclusive.

AAM 60.230 Third Party Reimbursements (01-07)

Occasionally a third party (outside entity) may agree to pay all or a part of a traveler's travel expenses. In such cases, the travel authorization will indicate the third party's involvement in the trip. The traveler is only entitled to reimbursement for travel expenses, per diem or other expense allowances, etc., in accordance with state policies and is to be paid by the state agency for which they are traveling and/or employed. Travelers may not accept honorariums as long as they are traveling for and representing the state.

The third party should be instructed to reimburse the state directly for the travel expenses to reduce potential tax consequences to the traveler. When this is not possible, any third party reimbursement made directly to the traveler for travel expenses, per diem, and/or meal allowances shall be turned over to the traveler's state agency for deposit into the state treasury.

Payments by a third party for state agency travel expenses must be recorded appropriately in the state accounting system. If the travel is material to the agency's travel budget and is part of the agency's regular duties or is connected with carrying out the purpose of the agency, the costs must be recorded as an expenditure with an offset recorded as a revenue. If the state incurs the expenditure and is reimbursed by the third party, the reimbursement is to be recorded as revenue.

However, if the travel is not directly related to the state agency's program, is not a recurring event, or is immaterial to the agency's travel budget, this transaction does not need to be recorded as an expenditure and a revenue of the state agency. If the state incurs the expenditure and is reimbursed by the third party, the reimbursement may be recorded as an abatement. If the third party pays directly for state expenses, such as purchasing the airline ticket for the state traveler, these expenses do not need to be recorded. However, any receipts obtained by the traveler showing the cost of the airline ticket or lodging must be attached to the travel authorization.

Any time a third party is paying for a state traveler's travel expenses, the state agency must avoid the appearance of or the fact of any conflict of interest. The agency should also ensure the transaction does not violate the code of ethics and if there is any question, the Department of Law should be consulted on the matter.

AAM 60.240 Lodging Types and Rates (04-07)

Travelers are permitted actual costs or an allowance for lodging and an allowance for meal and incidental expenses (M&IE). Refer to AAM 60.250 for policies on M&IE. The combined costs for lodging and M&IE are referred to as the per diem allowance. Where applicable, travel provisions of collective bargaining agreements supercede AAM per diem allowance policies and rates.

A traveler is not entitled to a lodging allowance when provided lodging by the state or a third party with whom the state is conducting business. Travelers are not entitled to a lodging allowance when staying in their own residence(s).

The term of a stay (short- or long-term), type of lodging facility, and location of overnight lodging determine applicable lodging types and rates. Agencies should take into consideration the length of stay in one location in determining the type of lodging accommodations.

For current lodging rates, refer to the State of Alaska Per Diem Rates published on the Division of Finance web site at: http://fin.admin.state.ak.us/dof/travel/index.jsp#trav_acct.

In- and Out-of-State, Short-Term Lodging (Actuals or Allowance)

Travelers on short-term travel status in or outside of Alaska are eligible for reimbursement of actual lodging expenses. Actual costs for short-term lodging are authorized for moderately priced commercial lodging. Each agency must ensure that lodging costs are reasonable and necessary and that government or other discount rates are used. Travelers must submit original itemized commercial lodging receipts with their travel authorizations.

Actual lodging expenses that exceed $300 room rate per night must be approved in advance by the director of the Division of Finance, or, the commissioner of the Department of Administration may delegate this approval to department commissioners. All requests shall include justification that clearly demonstrates the lodging is a government rate and cannot be acquired for less than $300 per night. Quotes from at least three moderately priced hotels in the same vicinity should be included with the justification.

Travelers on short-term travel status in Alaska are eligible for a daily noncommercial allowance when the travelers are required to stay in a community or location where commercial lodging facilities and state- or vendor-provided facilities are not available.

In-State, Long-Term Lodging (Allowance)

Agencies should provide in-state long-term lodging accommodations when the assignment is expected to be longer than 30 days at any one location.

- The long-term commercial lodging allowance rate is authorized when a traveler stays in commercial lodging facilities.
- The long-term noncommercial lodging allowance rate is authorized when a traveler is required to stay in a community or location where commercial lodging facilities and state- or vendor-provided facilities are not available.

These rates apply beginning the first day of travel status. Brief interruptions for business or personal convenience do not change the status from long-term.

Out-of-State, Long-Term Lodging (55% of Federal Lodging Allowance)

The long-term lodging rate outside Alaska is 55 percent of the federal lodging allowance. A link to the federal per diem rates is located on the Division of Finance web site at:
http://fin.admin.state.ak.us/dof/travel/index.jsp#trav_acct.

Required Approvals for Short- and Long-Term Travel Assignments

The short-term lodging allowance rate may not be used after a traveler's 30th consecutive day in one location unless a continuation has been approved in advance by the director of the Division of Finance, Department of Administration.

When travel status is expected to extend beyond six consecutive months in one location, the traveler's agency must receive advanced approvals for the assignment and for use of the long-term lodging rate from the department's administrative services division and the director of the Division of Finance. The approvals are requested on the Long-Term Travel Assignment form. Refer to the form for specific information required for the approvals. Page 2 of this form is used to request continued travel status that extends beyond a year and requires the requestor(s) to justify why it is in the state's best interest to pay per diem rather than move the traveler to the project location. This form is published on the Division of Finance web site at: http://fin.admin.state.ak.us/dof/travel/resource/longterm.pdf.

See AAM 320 for a summary of tax implications related to state travel reimbursement policies.

AAM 60.250 Meals and Incidental Expense Allowances (01-10)

Meal and incidental expense (M&IE) allowances and prorated M&IE allowances are provided to the state traveler to cover the cost of meals and incidental expenses such as discretionary tips, laundry expenses, etc. Where applicable, M&IE provisions of collective bargaining agreements supercede AAM M&IE allowance policies and rates.

There are two types of M&IE allowances, short-term and long-term/noncommercial. The appropriate M&IE allowance rate for a day is the rate established for the community in which the traveler is required to obtain overnight lodging. On the day of return, a traveler is entitled to the M&IE allowance rate applicable for the preceding day. When travel involves crossing the International Date Line, the M&IE allowance shall be calculated based on the total number of hours in flight.

For current M&IE allowances, refer to the State of Alaska Per Diem Rates published on the Division of Finance web site at: http://fin.admin.state.ak.us/dof/travel/index.jsp#trav_acct.

In-state M&IE rates are reviewed annually and adjusted as appropriate.

Short-Term M&IE (Allowance)

Travelers on short-term travel status in Alaska are eligible for a daily M&IE allowance.

Travelers on short-term travel status outside of Alaska, including travel to Hawaii and foreign destinations, are eligible for the federal M&IE rate for the location.

A traveler is eligible for the short-term M&IE allowance rate in two circumstances: when a traveler in short-term travel status is expected to incur expenses from dining at commercial establishments; and when a traveler in long-term travel status will incur expenses from dining at commercial establishments because the traveler is required to stay in a lodging facility that does not provide cooking facilities to its guests.

Long-Term/Noncommercial M&IE (Allowance)

Travelers on long-term travel status in Alaska are eligible for a daily M&IE allowance.

Travelers on long-term travel status outside of Alaska, including travel to Hawaii and foreign destinations, are eligible for 55% of the federal M&IE rate for the location.

A traveler is eligible for a long-term/noncommercial M&IE allowance in two circumstances: when a traveler in long-term travel status, is expected to prepare meals; and when a traveler is in short-term travel status in a location where there are no commercial dining establishments.

M&IE Rules for Specific Situations

Whenever a traveler is in travel status and is entitled to reimbursement for lodging under both the short-term and long-term/noncommercial per diem rules, the traveler is entitled to only the M&IE allowance that applies to the location where the traveler is staying.

If a traveler maintains a dwelling at their destination and it is available to them, they will be entitled to only an M&IE allowance for normal workdays. An M&IE allowance for other than normal workdays is not allowed.

If a traveler is temporarily returned to the traveler's duty station while on a long-term assignment and is continuing to receive a long-term lodging per diem, the traveler is not entitled to any M&IE allowance while at the duty station.

Prorated M&IE Allowances

The normal meal periods are published on the Division of Finance web site at: http://fin.admin.state.ak.us/dof/travel/resource/rates.pdf, and a table of the prorated short- and long-term M&IE rates for Alaska and out-of-state travel are published at: http://fin.admin.state.ak.us/dof/travel/resource/M&IE_AK_&_CONUS_Rates.pdf.

A traveler must be in travel status at least three consecutive hours during a meal period to be entitled to the M&IE for that meal.
