The Cost of Crime: Could The State Reduce Future Crime and Save Money by Expanding Education and Treatment Programs?

By Stephanie Martin and Steve Colt

Alaska's prison population is among the fastest-growing in the U.S., with five times more inmates in 2007 than in 1981. Spending for the state justice system has nearly doubled since 1981—but the crime rate has dropped only about 30%.

Here's the dilemma for the state, given the pattern shown in Figure 1: what can it do to hold down the number of inmates and stem the rising costs—while at the same time keeping the public safe and using tax dollars effectively?

Senator Hollis French asked ISER to project growth in the number of Alaska inmates and the associated costs—and then evaluate whether the state could reduce that growth by expanding intervention and prevention programs for people already in prison or at risk of ending up there. Alaska currently spends about $17 million a year for such programs, but they aren't available to many of those who might benefit from them.

There are a wide range of such programs. But it is programs for adults who are already in prison or jail that have the most potential to save money and reduce crime in the next 20 years. That's because they can reach the most people.

We know that without any intervention, about two-thirds of those who serve their sentences and are released commit new crimes. Stopping at least some of them from committing more crimes would not only help improve public safety but also reduce growth in both the number of inmates and in spending.

Also, most of those released committed misdemeanors (Figure 2). Those who commit the most serious crimes serve long sentences and make up a small share of those released in any given year.

To analyze which programs have the most potential to reduce crime and save the state money, we worked with the Alaska Criminal Justice Working Group and the Washington State Institute of Public Policy. That institute did a similar analysis for Washington state and provided us with data it collected from program evaluations nationwide (see back page). What did our study show?

Source: Alaska Department of Corrections

- With no change in policies, the number of Alaska inmates is likely to double by 2030, from 5,300 to 10,500.
- If the state spent an additional $4 million a year to expand programs it already has, the prison population in 2030 might be 10% smaller than projected—about 1,050 fewer inmates.
- The state would spend about $124 million for expanded programs through 2030 but would avoid $445 million in costs—a savings of $321 million. It would save money by incarcerating fewer people and by delaying prison construction costs. (Figures 3 and 8).
- Education and substance-abuse treatment programs—in prison, after prison, and instead of prison—save the state two to five times what they cost and reach the most people. Programs for teenagers are also very effective at reducing crime and saving money, but they reach fewer people.

Why Consider Expanding Programs?

In 1980, 2 in 1,000 Alaskans were behind bars; today that share is approaching 10 in 1,000. The sharp increase started in the 1980s, when the state government began collecting large oil revenues. The state used some of that money to expand police agencies, courts, and other parts of the criminal justice system statewide. Also in the 1980s, it made sentencing for the most serious felonies more uniform and stiffened sentences.

The crime rate in Alaska has declined since the 1980s. But the number of Alaskans in prisons, jails, and halfway houses has increased much faster, as have costs for the state justice system. Alaska's prisons are full, and the 1,500-bed prison scheduled to open in 2012 is projected to be full soon after it opens.

Locking people up is expensive, whether their crimes are major or less serious. Alaska spends on average $44,000 a year per inmate in prisons, jails, and halfway houses. Adjusted for inflation, that's actually less than in the 1980s—but it's still a lot (Figure 4).

Studies in other states have shown that some intervention and prevention programs can help cut both costs and crime, either by keeping people who have served their sentences from committing new crimes after they're released, or preventing some people from going to prison in the first place.

What Programs Did We Analyze?

The Alaska Criminal Justice Working Group gave us a list of programs to analyze. We looked for programs with the biggest potential payoff for the state—those that could reduce growth in both numbers of inmates and in spending for corrections, at a reasonable cost for the state.

Alaska already has a number of programs in place, and we found that expanding some of those would be most cost-effective. Table 1 lists the programs in our final analysis. As a guideline for what was a "reasonable" expansion, we used 10% to 20% of the eligible people not already served—except for very small programs that can't easily be expanded that much.

These programs would serve inmates, at-risk juveniles, and young children. They are all intended to reduce future crime in some way. Programs that treat substance-abuse or mental heath disorders have been shown to reduce recidivism—and as Figure 5 shows, almost all current inmates have those disorders.

Table 1. Current Size and Potential Expansion of Intervention and Prevention Programs[a]

Programs	Currently serve	Reasonable expansion	Potentially eligible (2008)
Prison-based programs
Education (adult basic; vocational)	More than 1,000	500	Almost all inmates (4,500)
Substance-Abuse (residential; intensive outpatient)	Close to 500	500	90% of inmates (approximately 4,000)
Sex-offender treatment[b]	0	50	10% of 500 eligible inmates
Transition from prison
Transition for inmates with mental health disorders (Institutional Discharge Project)	70	100	36% of inmates (1,600)
Alternatives to Incarceration	500	500	Approximately 5,000[c]
Mental health, drug, alcohol courts; electronic monitoring; residential substance-abuse treatment
Juvenile offenders	Approximately 500	1,000	Approximately 3,000
Aggression replacement training; family therapy; residential treatment; institutional transition
Prevention	3,025	450	Approximately 8,000[e]
Head Start for 3- and 4-year olds from low-income families[d]

[a]Programs included in our final analysis are those for which we found evidence that expansion would have significant pay-offs for the state at a reasonable cost. We evaluated additional programs not included here, either because there wasn't sufficient evidence to assess their effectiveness or because they weren't feasible to implement in Alaska at this time.
[b]To effectively reduce crime, sex offender treatment programs need to be offered in both prison and the community. Treatment is currently available only in the community, so the number served in prison is currently zero—but there are proposals to add treatment in prison.
[c]People facing low-level charges and with substance-abuse problems.
[d]Head Start is a federal program, but the state supplements federal money and Governor Sarah Palin has proposed additional state funding.
[e]We assume all children from families with up to double the poverty-level income would be eligible.

We looked at but excluded other programs from our final analysis. The criminal justice working group decided that a few programs, while effective elsewhere, wouldn't be feasible to implement in Alaska at this time. For other programs, there wasn't enough available evidence to judge how effective they were in saving money or reducing crime, or the available evidence showed them to be largely ineffective.

How Do the Programs Compare?

As Figure 3 (front page) shows, expanding programs to serve more of the eligible people would save the state about $321 million and reduce the projected number of inmates 10% by 2030. Figures 6 and 7 show how the various programs contribute to costs, savings, and reductions in the number of Alaskans behind bars.

- Education and substance-abuse treatment programs for inmates save two to four times what they cost, reduce recidivism by about four percentage points, and can reach the most people.

- Intervention programs for juveniles who have committed crimes are very effective at saving money and reducing recidivism, but they serve a much smaller number of people.

- Programs that set up transition services for inmates with mental-health disorders coming out of prison are among the most effective—but they can't readily be expanded to serve the many people who could benefit from them.

- Alternatives to prison for some people charged with lesser offenses save the state money right away, and almost all reduce recidivism. The exception is electronic monitoring, which is inexpensive but hasn't been shown to reduce future crime.

- Treatment programs for sex offenders do reduce crime, but they are very expensive and so don't save the state money.

- Programs that prevent future crime by helping very young at-risk children are the most effective. But the effects of spending for those programs aren't apparent until many years later.

Pre-school programs for at-risk children cost about $1,000 per child but save many times that much, by reducing future crime. The effects of the spending aren't apparent for years, until the children grow up.

Programs for juveniles offenders cost an average of about $2,500 per person, but save almost 10 times that much by keeping kids out of prison. They serve only a subset of the population of 12- to-17-year-olds.

Transition programs for people with mental health disorders are extremely effective, add about $2,000 per person to inmate costs, and save about four times that much. But the programs currently serve very few people and can't readily be expanded to serve large numbers.

Programs that treat inmates for substance abuse add about $2,000 a person to inmate costs, but over time save about twice as much. They are effective, but can't readily be expanded to reach all the people who need them.

Education and job training programs in prison add about $1,000 to inmate costs, but they reach the most people and save about four times more than they cost. Because they are offered in every facility, they can easily be expanded and can reach more people. (Reductions in the number of inmates as a result of the sex-offender treatment program are also included here, but are only one or two people a year.)

Programs that keep people out of prison save the state money right away, because they cost much less than the $44,000 per person the state spends to lock people up. They include therapeutic courts for substance abuse and mental health disorders, electronic monitoring, and residential substance-abuse treatment.

Conclusion

In conclusion, Figure 8 shows how Alaska's corrections system got where it is and where it's likely to go—if intervention and prevention program are kept at their current levels, and if the most effective programs are expanded to serve more of the eligible people.

We found that the state could both reduce the number of Alaskans in prison or jail and save considerable money over the next 20 years, by adding about $4 million a year to the $17 million it currently spends to keep people from returning to prison— or prevent them from ever going there at all.

Spending more for these programs even as oil prices and state revenues are falling may not seem like a good idea. But Alaska also needs to look to the future—and over time the benefits of strategically expanding those programs that reduce crime and keep more Alaskans out of prison far outweigh the costs.

Method of Analysis

Our job was to assess whether specific programs could reduce long-term state spending for corrections by reducing growth in the number of inmates. As a starting point, we needed evaluations of how effective various programs are at reducing future crime.

But except for some of the therapeutic court programs, most programs in Alaska have not been rigorously evaluated. Therefore, we used results of a Washington state assessment that systematically reviewed 571 program evaluations from around the country.

To be included, evaluations had to have carefully designed control groups, replicable results in multiple settings, and long-lasting effects. This method is evidence-based public policy, which merges research and practice. It is similar to clinical trials in medicine. Keep in mind that this is a new field, and only about 10% of programs in place nationwide have been evaluated at this standard.

With data from rigorous evaluations, the Washington State Institute of Public Policy created a model that estimated the effects of programs on recidivism—and then combined those results with a cost-benefit analysis to estimate the long-term effects on state spending and inmate populations.

We combined the institute's estimates of recidivism with Alaska data on program costs, eligible groups, and state population to estimate long-term effects on crime and state spending.

The authors thank the members of the Alaska Criminal Justice Working Group for their help in identifying programs to evaluate and for comments on drafts of this publication. The Alaska Legislature funded this group in 2007 and authorized the Alaska Judicial Council to act as its staff.

The group is chaired by a justice of the Alaska Supreme Court and Alaska's lieutenant governor. Other members include top policymakers from the departments of Corrections, Public Safety, Health and Social Services, and Law, as well as the Alaska Mental Health Trust Authority; the heads of the Alaska Public Defender Agency and the Office of Public Advocacy; the administrative and deputy directors for the Alaska Court System; the executive director of the Judicial Council, the U.S. attorney, and Anchorage's police chief.

This group meets monthly to talk about long-term justice issues, as well as to resolve any inter-branch issues that come up among the many agencies and organizations that deal with aspects of Alaska's justice system.

The authors also thank Elizabeth Drake and Steve Aos of the Washington State Institute of Public Policy for developing the methods and models we used and for helping us apply them to Alaska. For more information go to www.wsipp.wa.gov.

Dear Mr. Chairmen:

As you know, the Criminal Justice Working Group is an interagency, inter-branch group that collaborates to improve Alaska's criminal justice system. For the past year, the group has been meeting monthly to resolve day-to-day operational issues, and to focus on longer term improvements. This letter summarizes the group's work in the past year.

Following the models of similar groups over the past thirty years, the present CJWG includes the commissioners of the state departments of Corrections, Health and Social Services, Public Safety, and Law; the Administrative Director of the Alaska Court System and the Deputy Court Directors; the Judicial Council Executive Director; the Director of the Mental Health Trust Authority; the heads of the Public Defender and Office of Public Advocacy agencies; and the Chief of the Anchorage Police Department. The group includes the Directors of the Divisions of Juvenile Justice and Behavioral Health. For the first time, the group is co-chaired by the Lieutenant Governor and a Justice of the Alaska Supreme Court.

The legislature provided funding to the Alaska Judicial Council to staff the CJWG, providing meeting coordination, doing research, and developing materials for use by the committees. The group adopted as its mission statement the constitutional directive (Article 1, Section 12) that "Criminal administration shall be based upon . . . the need for protecting the public, community condemnation of the offender, the rights of victims of crimes, restitution from the offender, and the principle of reformation."

The CJWG's two committees – Efficiencies in the Criminal Justice Process, and Prevention and Recidivism – started by establishing baseline arrest rates and recidivism for both the adult and juvenile systems. The work broke new ground by relying on extensive cooperation among agencies to make use of their combined data, and by analyzing existing data for the juvenile system in ways similar to those commonly used in the adult system. The committees then undertook separate projects focused on issues of concern to their members:

Efficiencies Committee: The committee's members have done extensive work to identify and address the causes of delay in the criminal justice process. At the group's direction, the Judicial Council examined the need for a system to electronically exchange discovery materials. Council staff interviewed prosecutors, defense attorneys, judges, and police officers in Anchorage and Fairbanks. The Council published its report at the end of 2008. Based on the report, the committee agreed to pursue the project. The legislature provided funding to the MAJIC group that will be used to retain technical assistance in designing and implementing a system that will enable electronic exchange of discovery. The committee also asked the Council to examine possible delay associated with presentence reports, by analyzing data from the Alaska Court System and the Department of Corrections, and by interviewing judges about their reasons for ordering presentence reports.

Prevention and Recidivism Committee: This committee's goal is to identify ways to reduce criminal activity and recidivism. The committee began its work by identifying existing or proposed programs for adults and juveniles that could be shown, on the basis of evidence, to reduce recidivism. The Prevention and Recidivism subcommittee has assisted the Institute for Social and Economic Research in completing its report on cost-effective approaches to crime. A copy of ISER's report is enclosed.

ISER found a number of approaches that effectively reduce crime and recidivism. Each is already in place in Alaska. Based on ISER's findings, the Criminal Justice Working Group recommends that the legislature consider the following policy approaches:

Early Childhood Education: Maximum cost effectiveness occurs when future possible crimes are prevented. Early childhood education programs are among the best ways to reduce crime in the long run, despite the fact that the payoff occurs ten to twenty years after the children are served. Studies suggest that pre-kindergarten education for 3 and 4-year-olds lowers crime by about 16%, and saves the state six times in future expenditures compared to the amounts spent for the programs. The governor has proposed new funding for early childhood education in her FY 10 budget.

Intervention for At-Risk Youth: Intervention programs for at-risk youth and for juvenile offenders also carry high cost/benefit ratios. A 1999 report from the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention in the U.S. Department of Justice stated that "Allowing one youth to leave high school for a life of crime and drug abuse costs society $1.7 – 2.3 million." Aggression replacement training, family therapy and institutional transition programs all have been shown to reduce recidivism by 8% to 9%, while saving the state about ten times in future expenses what they cost to operate. More importantly, Alaska must do more to keep our youth in school and off the streets, BEFORE criminal activity occurs. In this regard, school resource officers in Anchorage have been shown to reduce crime. We must encourage cooperation between schools, neighborhoods and community-based organizations to expand mentoring, tutoring and community building opportunities for our youth who need them.

Prisoner Transition: For the 5,300 incarcerated offenders in Alaska's institutions, and the 6,000 felony offenders on probation and parole, reducing recidivism means providing them with the tools to make the transition to a law-abiding productive life. Proven programs to help in prisoners' re-entry into society and success on probation and parole include substance abuse treatment while offenders are incarcerated and afterwards, education, therapeutic courts, vocational training and job placement. These programs can reduce recidivism by 4% to 5%, while saving the state two to four times in future expenses what they cost to operate. In addition, monitoring of offenders also reduces recidivism by keeping offender problems in check and by helping offenders recognize that they will be held accountable for their behavior.

The committee work we've described represents our long-term projects. However, the group also sets aside time at each meeting to work out immediate problems between the agencies and branches of government. These have included providing access for defense counsel to offenders at institutions, improvements to courthouse security, better access to committing magistrates for bail and warrant decisions, and addressing delays in recording judgments in APSIN. Many such issues have been resolved after discussion at the meetings.

The Criminal Justice Working Group members plan to focus their efforts in the coming year on a more in-depth look at these emerging issues, and at aligning more private sector effort with public policy initiatives. The Working Group will also pay special attention to programs that can help reduce the numbers of chronic inebriates, whose disproportionate use of resources reduces the state's ability to serve others.

We are happy to report on the Criminal Justice Working Group's accomplishments and we look forward to continued collaboration.

Sincerely,

RE: ISER Research Summary: "Cost of Crime: Could the State Reduce Future Crime and Save Money by Expanding Education and Treatment Programs?"

Attached is a Research Summary recently released by ISER. This study was funded by the legislature and the Mental Health Trust Authority last year to take an evidence-based look at which rehabilitation programs offered by the Department of Corrections actually work to reduce recidivism. As you may know, over 65 percent of Alaskan inmates return to prison within 3 years of their release. Even small changes in the numbers of prisoners who do not reoffend make a substantial difference over time to Alaskans, both in terms of prison costs and, more importantly, in terms of public safety.

This study is not meant to be an exhaustive list of programs that work. In cooperation with the administration's Criminal Justice Working Group, the study focused on programs that currently exist within the Department of Corrections to determine the cost-effectiveness of each program as measured by reductions in recidivism. In other words, ISER looked at national studies to see if the programs actually affected behavior once the inmate was released.

I hope you will find the study of interest. ISER staff presented this information in a hearing on February 2, and can be contacted for further information.

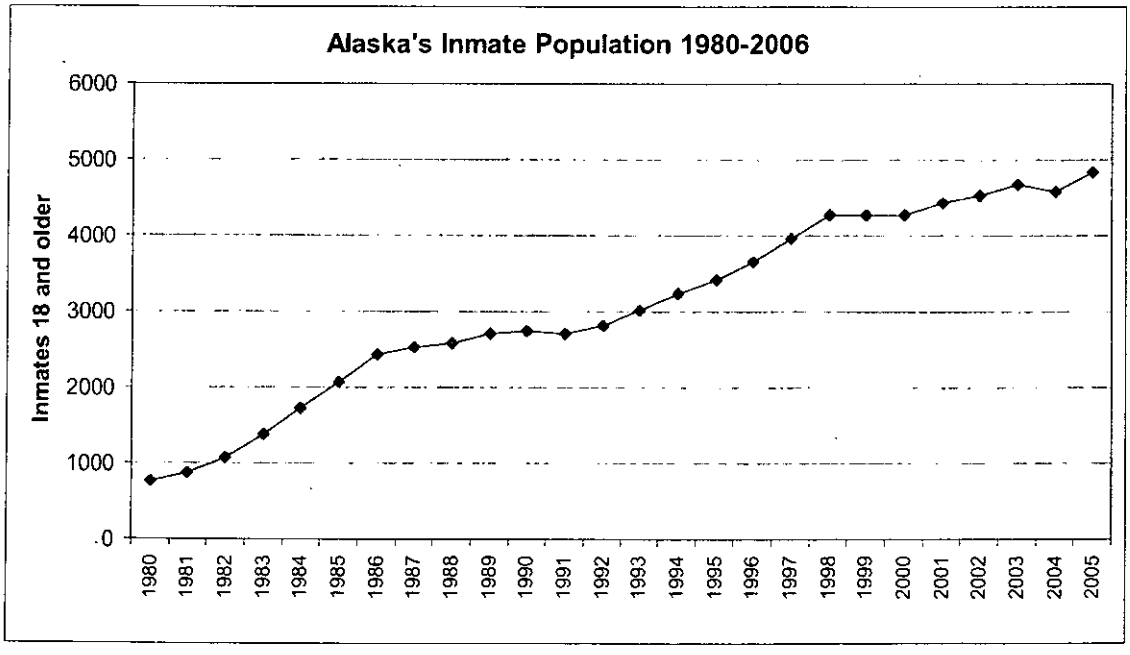
Abstract

Alaska's prison population continues to grow. Although an effective measure for reducing crime, incarceration is expensive. Other states are considering expanding prevention and intervention programs as a means to curb the growth in prison populations while continuing to lower crime rates. Would similar measures work in Alaska? Could we reduce the future need to build new prisons and save money, while continuing to lower crime rates? The Institute of Social and Economic research proposes to forecast growth in Alaska's prison population and prison expenditures, and to evaluate the potential for expanding prevention and intervention programs in Alaska in a way that saves money, curbs prison growth, and continues to reduce crime.

Problem statement

According to Alaska Department of Corrections, the state's inmate population[1] has risen by over 600% over the past 26 years, increasing from fewer than 800 in 1980 to almost 5,000 in 2006. Currently, one out of every 100 Alaskan adults is incarcerated[2]. Researchers estimate that by 2011 Alaska can expect 1 new inmate for every three currently in the system[3].

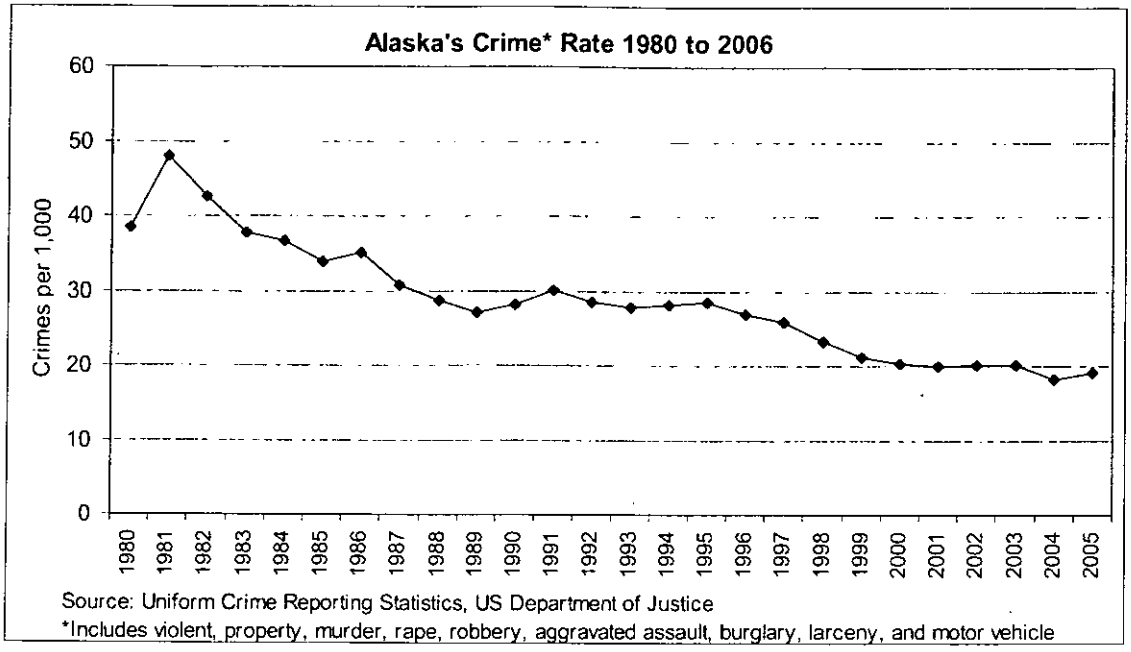


[1] Source: Alaska Department of Corrections

[2] Alaska's incarceration rate equals the number of people in state facilities (including Correctional Centers and Community Residential Centers) on any given day divided by the population age 18 and older.

[3] Public Safety Performance Project, 2007, Public Safety, Public Spending: Forecasting America's Prison Population. Pew Charitable Trusts

As incarceration rates have gone up, crime rates have gone down. Other studies estimate[4] that increasing incarceration rates by 10 percent reduces crime rates by 2 to 4 percent. Results vary by state. Incarceration is more effective for reducing certain types of crime.



Reducing crime by increasing incarceration comes at a cost. Alaska's justice operating expenses[5] increased from $101 million in 1981 to almost $479 million in 2006.[6] After adjusting for inflation, expenses nearly tripled during this period. These do not include capital expenditures. In 2001, Alaska's cost per inmate was $36,730[7]. The estimated cost to build a new prison in the Mat-Su borough is $330 million dollars.[8] In addition, the crime-reducing effect of incarceration can logically be expected to run into diminishing returns as more and more criminals are locked up.

In a recent study, the Washington State Institute for Public Policy estimated that by expanding crime prevention and intervention programs, the State of Washington could save as much as $1 billion over the next 25 years and avoid building two new prisons. These savings could occur without increasing the crime rate. Could Alaska benefit in a similar way by expanding crime prevention and intervention programs? A recent evaluation of Alaska's therapeutic court programs showed that graduates of the programs had lower recidivism rates than comparison groups who did not attend programs.[9] The report recommends extending the analysis to understand the costs and benefits of Alaska therapeutic courts.

We propose an analysis for Alaska, similar to that done in Washington State[10]. Results could provide Alaska legislators and policy makers with new options for lowering or stabilizing criminal justice costs while maintaining or further reducing crime rates.

Research Questions

- How fast is Alaska's incarcerated population expected to grow?
- At what point(s) in the future will Alaska need to build new prisons?
- By how much does incarceration reduce crime in Alaska?
- How does this vary by type of crime?
- What programs have been shown to work to reduce crime rates?
- How do these compare to similar programs in place in Alaska?
- How many people would be eligible for prevention and/or intervention programs?

- Could Alaska save money and reduce crime by expanding existing programs and implementing new ones?

Research tasks

- Forecast Alaska's prison population.
- Determine capacity of current correctional facilities.
- Estimate the cost of housing additional inmates.
- Estimate the relationship between incarceration and crime in Alaska and for different types of crime.
- Compare programs shown to be effective with those in place in Alaska.
- Estimate the share of the population who could benefit from such programs.
- Estimate the cost savings to Alaska of implementing additional crime prevention and invention programs.

The "Take Home" Message?

The "Magic" of Compound Interest!

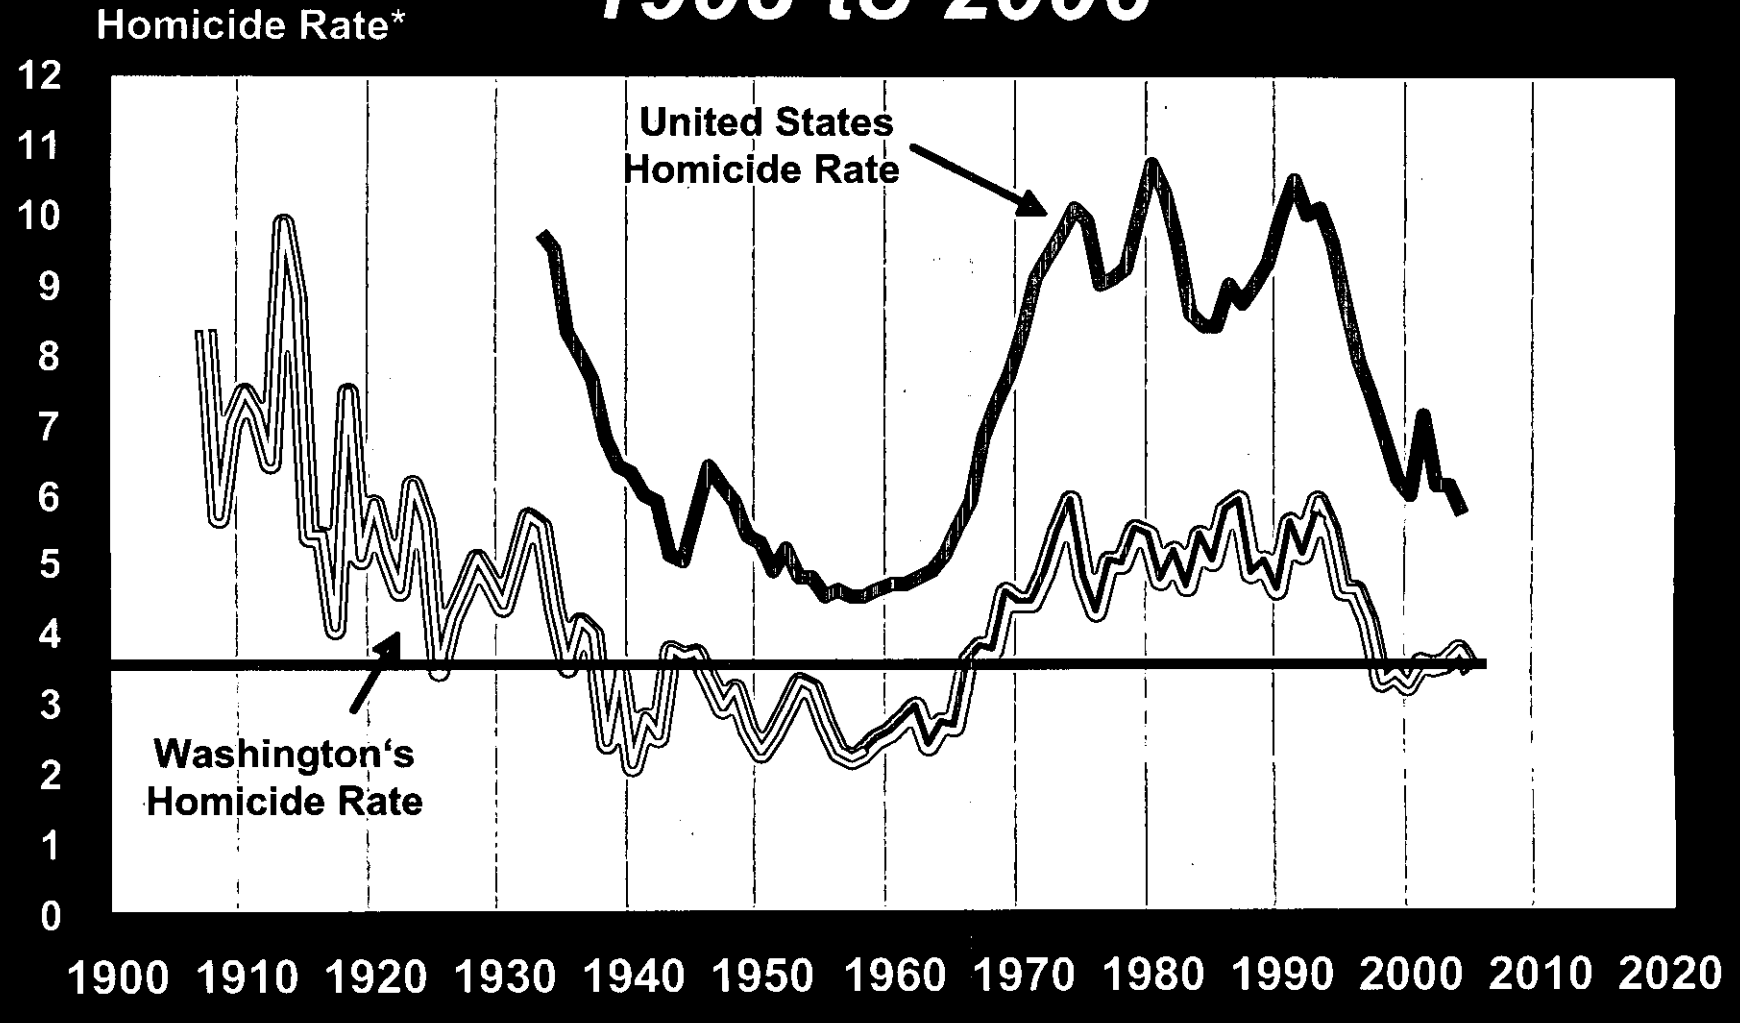
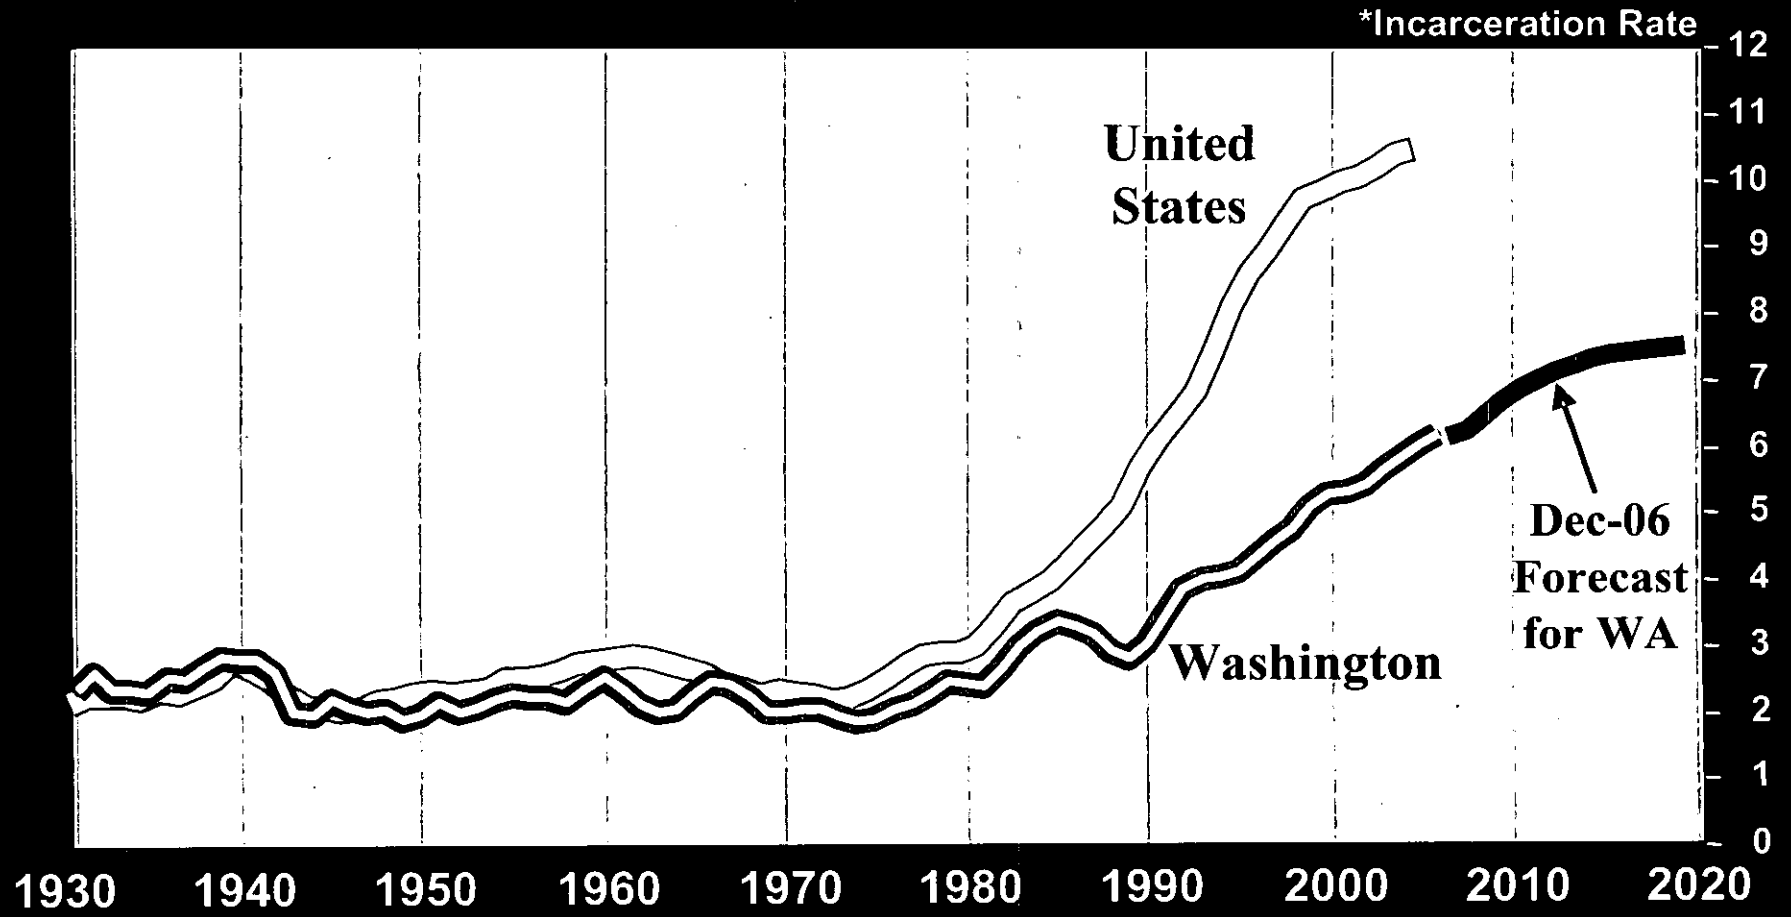
Homicide Rates: 1908 to 2006



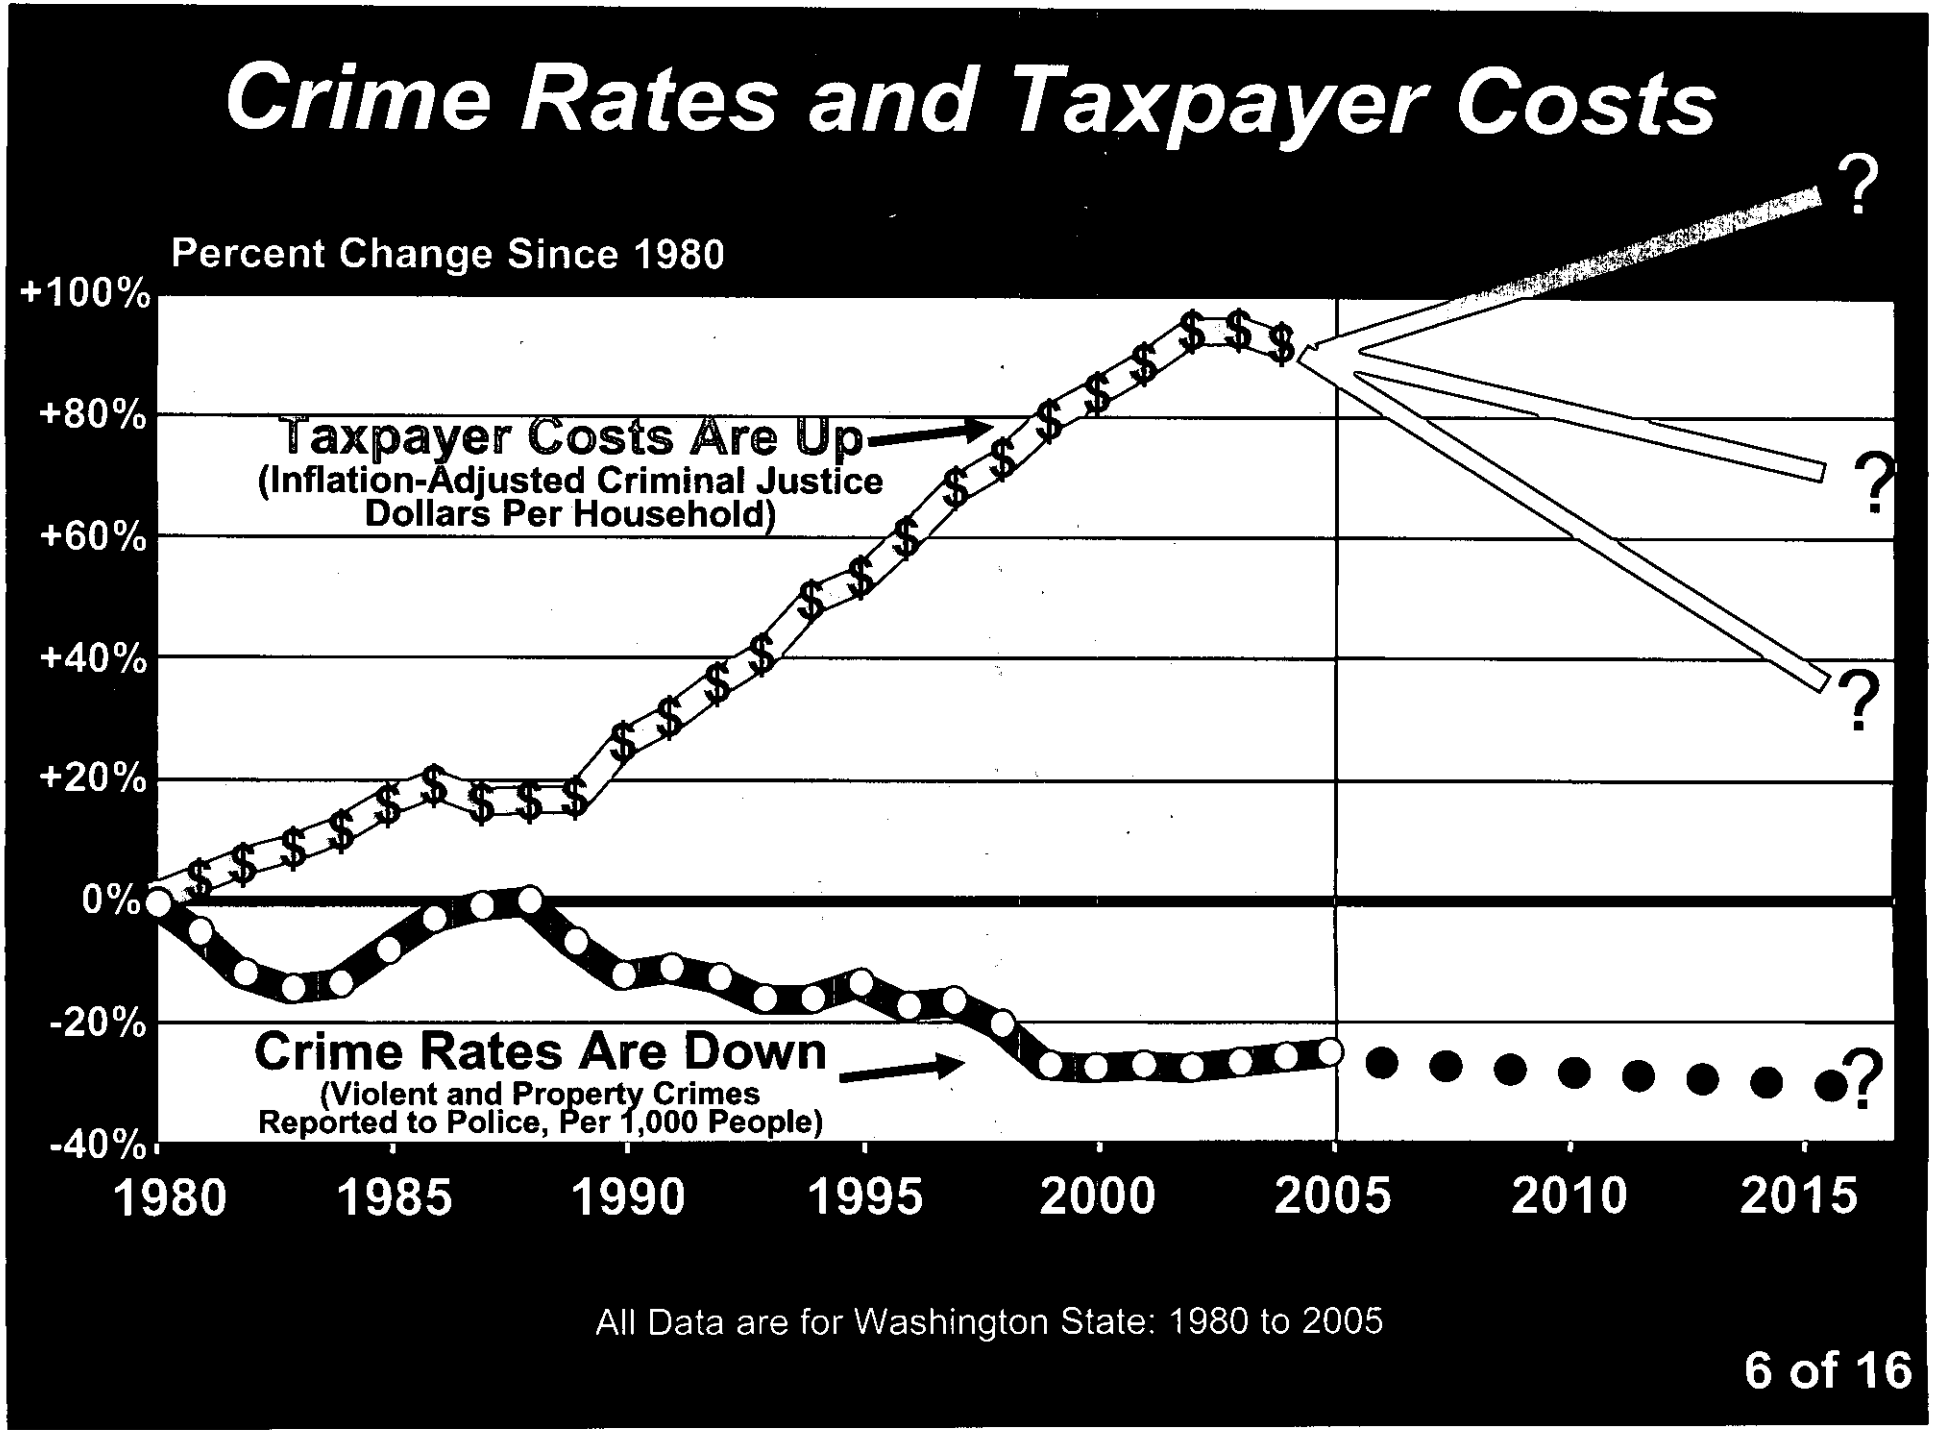
*Homicide rate defined as the number of deaths (classified as homicides by coroners) per 100,000 population.

Adult Prison Incarceration Rates: 1930 to 2005



*The incarceration rate is defined as the number of inmates in state prisons per 1,000 18- to 49-year-olds in Washington or the United States.

Crime Rates and Taxpayer Costs



All Data are for Washington State: 1980 to 2005

2005 Legislative Direction (ESSB 6094):

- ✓ "Study options to stabilize future prison populations."
- ✓ "Study the net short-run and long-run fiscal savings to state and local governments of implementing…
  - evidence-based treatment human service and corrections programs and policies, including prevention and intervention programs,
  - sentencing alternatives,
  - and the use of risk factors in sentencing."
- ✓ "Project total fiscal impacts under alternative implementation scenarios."

We published our report in October, 2006

Our Research Approach
3 Steps

1. What works & what doesn't?

- ✓ We located 571 rigorous (comparison group), real world evaluations of adult and juvenile corrections programs, & prevention

2. What are the economics of each option?

- ✓ We estimated the taxpayer and crime victim benefits and costs to people in Washington

3. How would alternative "portfolios" affect future prison demand, spending, & crime?

- ✓ We assessed market potential & developed Current Level, "Moderate" & "Aggressive" portfolios

October 2006

Evidence-Based Public Policy Options To Reduce Future Prison Construction, Criminal Justice Costs, and Crime Rates‡

Current long-term forecasts indicate that Washington will need two new prisons by 2020 and possibly another prison by 2030. Since a typical new prison costs about $250 million to build and $45 million a year to operate, the Washington State Legislature expressed an interest in identifying alternative "evidence-based" options that can: a) reduce the future need for prison beds, b) save money for state and local taxpayers, and c) contribute to lower crime rates.

The 2005 Legislature directed the Washington State Institute for Public Policy (Institute) to report, by October 2006, whether evidence-based and cost-beneficial policy options exist.

If economically sound options are available, then the Legislature also directed the Institute to project the total impact of alternative implementation scenarios.[1]

This report describes our results to date. We begin by providing background information on historic and projected incarceration rates in Washington, as well as a history of crime rates and fiscal costs of the criminal justice system. We then describe the process we use to determine if evidence-based and economically sound options exist and we present our findings. This is followed by our projections of the impact of alternative implementation scenarios. We conclude by discussing some implications of the findings and next steps. For technical readers, appendices begin on page 18 and describe our research methods and results in greater detail.

Summary

Under current long-term forecasts, Washington State faces the need to construct several new prisons in the next two decades. Since new prisons are costly, the 2005 Washington Legislature directed the Washington State Institute for Public Policy to project whether there are "evidence-based" options that can:

a) reduce the future need for prison beds,
b) save money for state and local taxpayers,
c) contribute to lower crime rates.

We conducted a systematic review of all research evidence we could locate to identify what works, if anything, to reduce crime. We found and analyzed 529 rigorous comparison-group evaluations of adult corrections, juvenile corrections, and prevention programs, most of which were conducted in the United States. We then estimated the costs and benefits of many of these evidence-based options. Finally, we projected the degree to which alternative "portfolios" of these programs could affect future prison construction needs, criminal justice costs, and crime rates in Washington.

We find that some evidence-based programs can reduce crime, but others cannot. Per dollar of spending, several of the successful programs produce favorable returns on investment. Public policies incorporating these options can yield positive outcomes for Washington.

We project the long-run effects of three example portfolios of evidence-based options: a "current level" option as well as "moderate" and "aggressive" implementation portfolios.

We find that if Washington successfully implements a moderate-to-aggressive portfolio of evidence-based options, a significant level of future prison construction can be avoided, taxpayers can save money, and crime rates can be reduced.

- 2. Financial Crime

One Sergeant (Trooper)

Two Investigators (Trooper)

Two Long Term Non-Perm positions (recently funded by Legislature)

- CFCU expected to cover the entire State of Alaska and investigate all Financial Crime and Technology related offenses
- Expected to provide assistance to smaller Police Agencies
- Expected to Provide training and support
- Few "white collar" or "corruption" cases are actually being worked due to case load

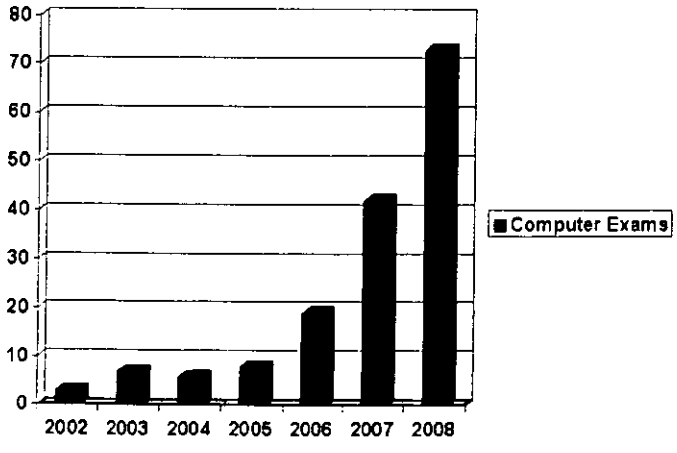
AST Response to ICAC Task Force

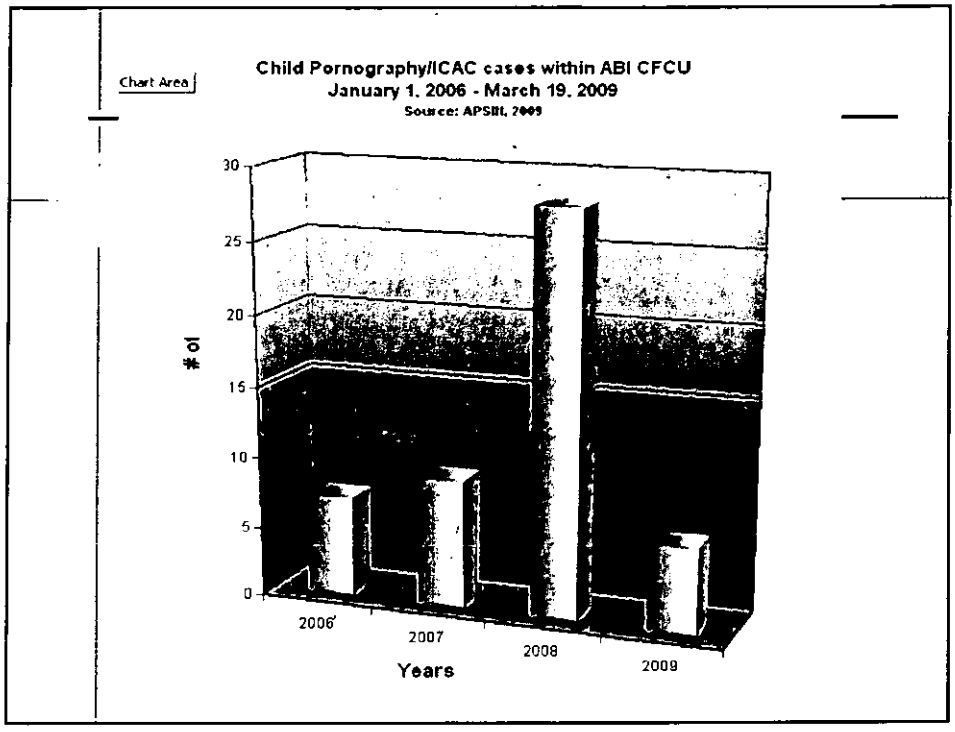
- Joined Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force last year
- Co-Located with Federal Agents, to include ICE, soon with FBI & USPIC
- Investigators trained in Peer to Peer Investigations, Forensics
- Recently hired one new investigator and one criminal justice tech II because of Legislature funding

- Invested heavily in Computer Forensic training to increase competency
- Invested heavily in equipment, to include software, forensic computers, cell phone analysis tools, server storage of evidence
- Conducted multi-agency search warrants
- Public Education, presentations
- Partnered with small police departments to provide assistance and training

Results

CFCU Computer Examinations





- 400% increase in Child Exploitation Cases being investigated between 2006-2008
- We found the tip of the iceberg
- Problem is growing exponentially

Successes

- NCMEC tip received by ABI for Palmer resident
- Defendant was arrested for distributing and possessing child pornography images
- Investigators found defendant was taking pictures with telephoto lens of neighbor children
- Recently sentenced to 12/4 years (8 years)

- Talkeetna man, a registered sex offender was found to be chatting on-line through game with 13 Y.O. in CA
- He was grooming victim
- He was previously arrested by APD for Child Pornography possession
- ABI found more Child Pornography, continued behavior

- Soldotna man, was arrested for possessing CP images, was found to be actively abusing autistic boy
- What cases are falling through the cracks?

What is needed?

- Additional support for more ABI Investigators, including Forensic Computer Examiners
- Separate Financial Crime and Computer Crimes Units
- More directed response to rural residents of Alaska, they are not being adequately represented by LE

Conclusion

- ICAC is very necessary
- Co-location of agencies is key
- We are headed in the right direction
- We must continue to protect Alaska's children with pro-active investigation
- More Investigators are required
- Disparity of LE response to Rural residents
- We are not there yet...

2008 Alaska ICAC Task Force Frequently Asked Questions

- What undercover tactics are used?
  - We cannot release details of our tactics because investigations are still underway using the same undercover techniques. Those details will probably not be available until they come out at trial.

- Are the search warrant affidavits public records?
  - Affidavits are sealed by the courts because the investigations using these same techniques are continuing.

- Are these investigations into chat rooms and social networking sites?
  - Many avenues of cyberspace, including but not limited to chat rooms and social networking sites were investigated during this year.

- Are these investigations into P2P file sharing?
  - Many avenues of cyberspace, including but not limited to P2P sources were investigated during this year.

- Where on the Internet were the suspects found?
  - We cannot release that information because investigations are still pending using the same undercover tactics. Those details will not be available until trial.

- Was this an organized ring of people working together?
  - At this time the evidence does not indicate that the offenders know of each others activities.

- What training did the investigators have in order to work on these cases?
  - The average investigator assigned to conduct these investigations has received over several hundred hours of specialized training specific to Internet crimes and/or computer forensics coursework.

- Are the images and videos available for viewing pursuant to a public records request?
  - No - Images depicting the sexual exploitation of minors are contraband. Even in a courtroom setting, the prosecutors try to protect the gallery, the media and everyone but the judge, jury, defense and prosecution from seeing the images.

- Can citizens go on-line and volunteer to go undercover like they did on Dateline with Perverted Justice?
  - Citizen cyber-vigilantism is not supported by the agencies involved in this enforcement operation.

- Can the media "ride along" and accompany the cyber crime investigators?
  - Because child pornography is contraband, we do not permit anyone except those investigating or prosecuting the offenses to be exposed to the images.

- Media exposure of our undercover investigative tactics will make our jobs more difficult by making offenders aware of the techniques we use.

- What Internet safety tips can you provide to citizens about unlawful images?
  - Homeowners: Pay attention to what is occurring on your home computer. Take responsibility for the control of your computer.
  - Business owners: Watch what your employees are doing on their work computers. Law enforcement intervention can result in an embarrassing disruption of services to your customers.
  - Parents: Monitor your child's use of cell phone cameras. A troubling number of minors are using cell phone cameras to create felony images depicting the sexual exploitation of themselves and others. The images are then being shared throughout cyberspace and the images will never be retrieved.

- What Internet safety tips can you provide to citizens about luring/enticement?
  - Parents: Closely monitor your child's use of the computer and know who your child is contacting on line. Be aware that some children have multiple on line profiles. They may show one profile to their parents while keeping another secret profile that they use to communicate with friends and strangers.
  - Also, while you are protecting your children at home, be aware that some children go to places where free Internet access is provided to communicate with others. Coffee shops, libraries and colleges offer free Internet service where young people may be communicating with predators.

- Were any "hands on" contact victims discovered as the result of these investigations?
  - Yes – We also have encouraged the families and friends of other suspects to call us if they wish to report contact offenses. We know that victims are understandable reluctant to come forward for fear of embarrassment and because they do not wish to relive the abuse by subjecting themselves to the criminal justice system. We know from the scientific research conducted on the subject of unlawful images that a significant number of possessors are also contact offenders. We encourage victims to report abuse so that we can bring offenders to justice. Complicating our investigative endeavors is the fact that it is impossible for some of the victims, who are as young as infants, to notify the police. How can you call 911 when you are not yet old enough to count or to use a telephone?

- Are women ever arrested for Internet crimes against children?
  - Sometimes, but 99% of the offenders in theses cases are men. During this time period, no women were arrested.

- Where can I go on-line for more information?

AK ICAC Task Force 2008

Background

Over the past decade, the tremendous proliferation of computers connected to the Internet led to a skyrocketing number of Internet crimes against children. In the year 2008, the Alaska Internet Crimes Against Children (ICAC) Task Force recorded the following:

- 176 investigations involving unlawful images of the sexual exploitation of minors.
- 56 incidents of Internet crimes against children reported from the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children's Cybertip hotline.
- 29 cases of the Internet facilitated luring of minors for sexual exploitation.
- 7 reported incidents of Internet related child prostitution.

Alaska Internet Crimes Against Children

In the twelve months between January 2008 and December 2008, a joint task force of Alaska and Federal investigators conducted a series of proactive Cyber crime enforcement operations targeting Internet criminals committing sex crimes against children; including the trafficking of unlawful images depicting the sexual exploitation of minors. This was done in conjunction with an education effort geared towards Internet crime prevention and awareness.

Law Enforcement Agencies

Investigators and Prosecutors affiliated with 16 law enforcement agencies partnered with the Alaska ICAC Task Force in a cooperative effort during 2008. Agencies participating included (alphabetically):

- Alaska Adult Probations- Sex Offender Unit (Investigations)
- Alaska Bureau Investigations (investigations and training)
- Alaska District Attorney Office (education and training)
- Anchorage PD - (investigation and enforcement)
- Fairbanks PD - (investigation and enforcement)
- F.B.I. - (investigation and enforcement)
- I.C.E. - (investigation and enforcement)
- Juneau PD (investigations)
- Kenai PD - (investigation and enforcement)
- Kodiak PD - (investigation and enforcement)
- Military Investigators (investigations)
- Sitka PD (investigations)
- Soldotna PD - (investigation and enforcement)
- Unalaska PD - (investigation and enforcement)
- U.S. Attorney's Alaska Office - (prosecution)

- U. S. Postal Inspection Service - (investigations)
- UAA PD (facilitation / support)
- UAF PD (investigations)

The Investigators' Work

Trained investigators endured witnessing disturbing cyber images and videos depicting brutal sexual torture of actual children. They use sophisticated computer investigative techniques combined with undercover tactics to identify offenders. They conducted surveillance operations, requested subpoenas, and wrote and executed dozens of search warrants. They seized thousands of items of computer evidence. Detectives and special agents conducted computer forensics examinations to identify contraband images. They interrogated offenders and interviewed witnesses. They conducted exhaustive searches of dwellings and wrote voluminous reports on their activities.

The proactive investigators agreed to participate in this undercover operation in addition to their regular duties that involve responding to citizens' complaints of Internet crimes. Through their proactive efforts investigators and special agents sought justice for thousands of children who could not call 911. Their fine efforts are greatly appreciated. They will work closely with prosecutors to prepare for trials.

Cases pursued by local agencies under Alaska State Law have been submitted to the local Alaska District Attorney's Office. Cases pursued by federal agencies under the US Code have been submitted to US Attorney's Office for the Alaska District. The justice system considers all suspects innocent until proven guilty in court.

Penalties

Unlawful images depicting the Sexual Exploitation of minors are described under Alaska State law in AS 11.41.455. Possession of these images is a class C felony under Alaska State law AS 11.61.127.

The luring and enticement of minors for sexual exploitation is described under Alaska State law in AS 11.41.452. It is a class C felony.

Training and Education

During the 2008 calendar year, members of the Alaska ICAC Task Force have attended training, funded in large part by the Alaska ICAC Grant.

Examples of the training classes attended during 2008:

- ICAC Training & Technical Assistance Program (ICAC T&TA) – Investigative techniques course
- ICAC T&TA- Undercover Chat Investigations Program

In January 2009, several AK ICAC Members attended the International Consumer Electronic Show, the premier showcase of all the new digital media products that are being developed and marketed.

On March 3-6, 2009, APD Cyber Crimes Unit conducted Peer 2 Peer training for ABI Investigators. This training allows ABI investigators the ability to go on-line proactively to target individuals who are collecting and trading electronic images depicting Child Sexual Exploitation. Alaska ICAC members also conduct public safety presentations bringing the message of Internet safety to children and adults.

More Information

Alaska ICAC Task Force

The Alaska Internet Crimes Against Children (ICAC) Task Force efforts are partially funded by grants from the US Department of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. The ICAC program is a nationwide network of 59 state task forces representing 1,800 local and regionally affiliated agencies engaged in investigations, forensics examinations, prosecutions and community education. We are pleased to know that the recently announced Federal stimulus package provides a much needed $50 million dollar nationwide boost to the program. We hope to see some of those funds in Alaska.

Within Alaska, the ICAC Task Force is affiliated or partnered with 16 law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies statewide. Since 2008, Alaska detectives and special agents have conducted over 176 investigations resulting in the incarceration of 28 offenders.

Unlawful Images

Images depicting the sexual exploitation of minors are commonly called child pornography. The images and videos are contraband. The images that investigators found were not of babies in bathtubs. Some of the unlawful videos included acts of bestiality between minors and animals including the horrible audio sounds of human suffering. Detailed descriptions of the images will not be fully provided here.

AK ICAC TF Training

- American Prosecutors Research Institute conducts SAFETY NET training at Microsoft Headquarters in Redmond, WA.
- Team based training class combining Investigator; Examiner; and Prosecutor.
- AK ICAC Team comprised of APD Cyber Crime Examiner; A.B.I. Investigator; and Asst. D.A. for Prosecutor.
- Part of the training included mock courtroom settings with participants having to present evidence and instruct juries on such topics as Internet Chatting and File Sharing.

Training Results

- First conviction by a jury under Alaska's On-line Enticement Statute.
- Suspect had solicited minors- under the age of 16- for sex, and had electronically transmitted Indecent Images to the minors. The minors were actually undercover APD Investigators.
- 12/8/08- James Clifton Moore-age 42- was convicted by an Anchorage Jury - Moore was found guilty on two counts of Online Enticement of a Minor and one count of the Electronic Distribution of Indecent Material to a Minor.
- ADA Prosecutor Aaron Sperbeck and the lead investigator had attended recent training in Redmond, WA, for courtroom presentations.
- Significant fact discussed during the proceedings: Investigators were following National ICAC Guidelines designed to catch online predators.

Dynamics of a Peer 2 Peer Investigation

- Investigator goes online with proper training and equipment.
- Identifies Alaska based suspect who is actively sharing suspected Child Sexual Exploitation images.
- Records and downloads the images.
- Obtains Search warrant for identifying suspect from ISP.
- Conducts surveillance / field work on suspect.
- Obtain search warrant for suspect residence / work / interview.
- Plan / prepare / execute search warrant- seize evidence.
- Conduct forensic examination of digital media- sometimes this is done in field, at suspect's location.
- Analyze data- submit to NCMEC CVIP program.
- Consult with DA / AUSA for appropriate charges.
- Arrest and prosecute Suspect.

Peacock Case Study
APD #08-26835

- 6/13/08- Anchorage Investigator generated a new Peer To Peer case involving an Alaskan suspect actively sharing child pornography on the internet.
- 6/20/08- Anchorage Investigator continues to work up the Peer-to-Peer file sharing case, with the suspect, JESS PEACOCK, Age 24, identified in Barrow. PEACOCK works on the Slope at Kuparak Oil Field. Working directly with Conoco Phillips, transportation is secured from Anchorage to Kuparak for a search warrant. North Slope Police Department is contacted for assistance conducting the Barrow residential Search warrant.
- 6/27/08- Two Anchorage Investigators travel to Kuparak Oil Field Camp on the North Slope, courtesy of Conoco Philips transportation. Suspect is contacted, and after some initial denials, when confronted with his documented online activity, he provides a detailed confession. PEACOCK'S laptop computer was discovered in his sleeping quarters, turned on and actively downloading and sharing Child Pornography titled internet files, while he worked his shift. North Slope Borough PD served a search warrant at PEACOCK'S home in Barrow, resulting in over 75 items of evidence being seized, and shipped to Anchorage. Conoco Phillip's has expressed that they were impressed with the professionalism displayed by the Investigators.

- 08/08/08- Investigators conduct computer forensics on the seized evidence.
- 08/22/08- Forensic component is completed. Investigators now coordinate with ADA Rural Prosecutor.
- 09/05/08- Charging documents filed on Peacock.
- 12/5/08- JESS PEACOCK- accepts Plea Deal 6 years 4 suspended- one count Possession of CP.
- 3/4/09- Peacock sentenced.

Danny M. Harvey- 47yo

California man faces 55 years in prison

- The Associated Press
- November 23rd, 2008 12:13 AM
  A federal jury has convicted a California man who faced several child exploitation charges.
- Federal prosecutors say Danny Michael Harvey, of Lancaster, Calif., was convicted of: attempted aggravated sexual abuse, which carries a mandatory minimum 30 years in prison; attempted manufacture of child pornography, carrying a maximum term of 15 years in prison; and possession of child pornography, carrying an additional maximum term of 10 years in prison.
- Prosecutors say Harvey came to Alaska intending to sexually abuse a 5-year-old girl.
- The girl was the fictitious granddaughter of a federal agent posing as a grandfather with sole custody.

2009 Considerations

- Mobile Internet Devices
- Sexting
- Public Safety Administration in several Local agencies currently are limiting availability of personnel to attend training, and also conduct proactive investigations, based on personnel shortages.

Alaska ICAC Task Force monthly meetings

- Hosted by the Assistant US Attorney's Office in Anchorage.
- Monthly meetings where ICAC members can also attend telephonically.
- Case review; educational opportunities; industry trends; and requests for assistance are conducted.
- Pooling limited resources to target challenges faced by investigators and prosecutors.

Do we have child porn collectors/traders in Alaska?

Challenges

- A study conducted by APD Cyber Crimes Detectives showed that in January of 2008, there were over 5,000 Internet Protocol (IP) addresses in Alaska, that had suspected known images of Child Pornography.
- In January of 2009, the number has increased to over 11,000 IP addresses unique to Alaska.
- A recent study documented by the Federal Government (Hernandez Study) of convicted sex offenders showed that over 80% of persons arrested for possession of Child Pornography had already committed an undisclosed contact Child Sexual Abuse. The nature of the investigations alone demand attention by Law Enforcement.

MySpace is a social networking website offering an interactive network of photos, blogs, user profiles, groups, and an internal e-mail system. As of February 2006 it is the world's fifth most popular English language website (according to Alexa Internet[1]). MySpace has outstripped competitors such as Friendster and LiveJournal to become the most popular English language social networking website with higher traffic and over 59 million users. It is representative of both internet culture and teenage culture.

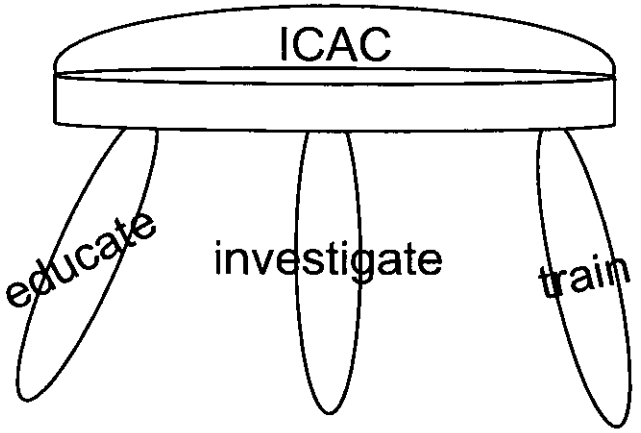
How Do We Fight This?

- NATIONAL ICAC MODEL
- "Three leg stool"

- Education
- Investigation
- Training



What Do We Need?

- Support- These investigations should be at a top priority for agencies involved.
- We need to continue to focus our efforts; pool resources; dedicate personnel; equipment; and funds to this effort.
- Current funding and staffing dedicated to this effort in Alaska is inadequate- realistically, we are targeting less than 1% of the estimated offenders. We will not arrest ourselves out of this problem- education- parental involvement- awareness is the long term solution.

A MESSAGE FROM YOUR STATE

To the parents in Alaska:

The Internet is a powerful tool. As with any tool, we must instruct our children on how to use it safely. A recent study by the University of New Hampshire showed that one in five young people using the Internet received an online sexual solicitation in a one-year period. In an alarming 15% of those cases, the solicitor attempted to meet the child in person.

With the growing risk that the Internet poses to our children, I hope that this site will aid you as you teach your children to protect themselves from Internet predators.

To report a problem anytime, call 1-800-843-5678. This will connect you to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. Or you can visit the Center's website at www.missingkids.com.

Thank you for your commitment to our shared priority of protecting children.

Sincerely,

Governor

Alaska ICAC Task Force 2009

In a three day training period from 3/3-5/09, APD Cyber Crimes Investigators conducted Peer 2 Peer training for 3 Alaska State Trooper / ABI investigators.

During this training, Proactive investigations were initiated with potential suspects located in Fairbanks; Kotzebue; Bethel; and Anchorage.

Summary

- It is evident, based on our experience, that Alaska's interest in safeguarding the physical and psychological well-being of a minor is compelling.
- The victimization of a child continues when that act is memorialized in an image. The materials produced are a permanent record of the children's participation and the harm to the child is exacerbated by their circulation. Unfortunately, the victimization of the children involved does not end when the pornographer's camera is put away.
- Research has shown that the use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is harmful to the physiological, emotional, and mental health of the child.
- The possession of child pornography drives that industry and…the production of child pornography will decrease if those who possess the product are punished equally with those who produce it.
- The law will decrease the production of child pornography if it penalizes those who possess and view the product, thereby decreasing demand.
- The possession of child pornography inflames the desires of child molesters, pedophiles and child pornographers. Alaska has more than a passing interest in forestalling the damage caused by child pornography: preventing harm to children is one of its most important interests.

Standard UCR Cautions

- UCR Statistics exclude:
  - Rapes not reported to law enforcement,
  - Statutory rapes,
  - Incapacitated rapes,
  - Rapes with male victims,
  - Other sex offenses,
  - Rapes with more serious offenses (homicide).
- Rankings are invalid assessments (ignore variables that affect crime).

Violent Death Reporting System

- 117 Homicides in Alaska (2003-2005):
  - 19% of all violent deaths
  - 22% of homicides were related to intimate partner violence (IPV):
    - 37.5% of IPV homicide victims were male
    - 62.5% of IPV homicide victims were female
  - Among victims who tested positive for alcohol, 78% tested above legal limit (0.08 mg/dL)

Effective Strategies

- Enhancing local paraprofessional police presence (VPSO, VPO, TPO):

- Reduces rates of serious injury caused by assault by 40%
- Increases likelihood of prosecution in sexual assault cases by 2.5 times

- Need greater focus on hiring, training, and retention

André B. Rosay, Ph.D.
Associate Professor and Interim Director

Effective Strategies

- Strengthening local alcohol prohibitions

- Rates of serious injury from assault are 36% lower in dry villages
- Prosecution of sexual assault cases hindered by alcohol use
- Lifetime victimization increases with alcohol use

- Need greater focus on prevention, treatment, control, and interdiction

Effective Strategies

- Enhancing investigation capacity

- Locating and interviewing witnesses
- Gaining victim cooperation
- Having time to investigate and close cases

Effective Strategies

- Promoting access to sexual assault nurse examiners

- Medical-forensic exams more than double the likelihood of accepting cases for prosecution
- Documentation of physical injury is particularly important
- Offers the best standard of care

- Need greater focus sustainability

Effective Criminal Justice Responses Identified by UAA Justice Center

Enhancing local paraprofessional police presence (VPSO, VPO, TPO)

- Villages with a local paraprofessional police presence had rates of serious injury caused by assault that were 40% less than those villages without a local paraprofessional police presence (Wood and Gruenwald, 2006).
- Sexual assault cases with adult victims that were originally reported to police paraprofessionals were 3.5 times more likely to be prosecuted than sexual assault cases originally reported directly to State Troopers (Wood, Rosay, Postle, and TePas, 2007).

Strengthening local alcohol prohibitions

- Alaska Native villages that were dry from 1991 to 2000 had serious assault injury rates that were 36% less than rates of villages that did not prohibit alcohol at all during that time frame (Wood and Gruenwald, 2006).
- Drinking significantly increased the risk of assault victimization in a sample of Alaska Native women in the Copper River Basin (Magen and Wood, 2006).
- AST sexual assault cases with a victim who had used drugs or alcohol were less likely to be referred for prosecution (Wood, et al., 2007; Postle, Rosay, Wood, and TePas, 2007).
- AST sexual assault cases with a victim who had used drugs or alcohol were less likely to be accepted by prosecutors (Postle, et al., 2007).
- Alaska SANE patients were less likely to have their cases accepted for prosecution if they were intoxicated at the time of the assault (Rosay and Henry, 2007).

Enhancing investigation capacity

- AST sexual assault cases where witnesses had been located and interviewed were over three times more likely to be referred for prosecution (Wood, et al., 2007).
- AST sexual assault cases where troopers had time and resources to gain victim cooperation were 3.5 times more likely to be referred for prosecution (Wood, et al., 2007).
- AST sexual assault cases that were closed within 16 days of the report were over three times more likely to be accepted for prosecution than AST sexual assault cases that were not (Postle, et al., 2007).

Promoting access to Sexual Assault Nurse Examiners

- AST sexual assault cases with a forensic exam were over two times more likely to be accepted for prosecution than AST sexual assault cases without a forensic exam (Postle, et al., 2007).
- The documentation of physical injury in Alaska SANE cases increased the likelihood of referring cases for prosecution (Snodgrass and Rosay, 2007; Rosay and Henry, 2007).
- The documentation of physical injury in Alaska SANE cases increased the likelihood of accepting cases for prosecution (Rosay and Henry, 2007).
- The documentation of physical injury in Alaska SANE cases increased the likelihood of obtaining a conviction (Rosay and Henry, 2007).
- Sexual assault cases are more likely to be referred to prosecution if the victim can report to a SANE within 48 hours of the assault (Rosay and Henry, 2007).
- The documentation of spermatozoa significantly increased the likelihood that SANE cases in Alaska would be referred for prosecution (Snodgrass and Rosay, 2007).

Abstract: This study examined 989 cases with a sexual assault or sexual abuse of a minor charge reported to Alaska State Troopers in 2003 and 2004, and excluded any sexual assault cases reported to local or municipal departments.

- Forty-eight percent of reports came from C Detachment (Western Alaska - Kodiak to Kotzebue), and 58% were reported from communities off the road system.
- In 69% of cases, the identity of at least one suspect was known. While most suspects (87%) were adults, most victims (73%) were juveniles. Sixty-one percent of victims were Alaska Native and 38% were White. Intra-racial victimizations were much more prevalent than inter-racial victimizations. The most common suspect was a friend or acquaintance of the victim, followed by a relative. Forty-three percent of suspects and 27% of victims had used alcohol.
- Sexual penetration occurred in 60% of assaults. Weapons were very rarely used. Most assaults occurred inside private residences. Nineteen percent of victims experienced general physical pain and 10% suffered bruising or swelling. Most victimizations were reported quickly to Troopers and Troopers were quick to respond. Ninety-six percent of victims were interviewed, with 48% interviewed on the day of the report and 80% interviewed within one week of the report.
- Forty-six per cent of reported cases were referred for prosecution, 60% of referred cases were accepted for prosecution, and 80% of accepted cases resulted in a conviction. Overall, however, only 22% of reported cases resulted in a conviction. In some cases, the conviction may be for a non-sexual offense. The highest level of attrition occurred from report to referral.

The final sample in this study included 989 cases with a sexual assault or sexual abuse of a minor charge, reported to Troopers in 2003 and 2004, and closed by the time of the study. It is important to note that this study did not include any sexual assault cases reported to local or municipal departments. In addition, this study did not include cases specific to child pornography or online enticement of minors.

Report Characteristics

Almost half of the reports included in the study (48%) came from C Detachment, which covers western Alaska, from Kotzebue to Kodiak (Table 1). The C Detachment headquarters is in Anchorage, with the remaining posts in Aniak, Bethel, Dillingham, Emmonak, King Salmon, Kodiak, Kotzebue, Nome, and St. Mary's. The Bethel post handled 17 percent of all sexual assault and sexual abuse of minor cases reported to Troopers in 2003 and 2004. Thirty percent of the reports came from the Alaska Bureau of Investigation (ABI), whose Major Crime Unit is responsible for investigating sexual assaults and other person offenses statewide. The Alaska Bureau of Investigation has posts in Anchorage, Palmer, Fairbanks, and Soldotna. ABI posts in Palmer and Fairbanks handled 16 percent of all sexual assault and sexual abuse of minor cases reported to Troopers in 2003 and 2004. Together, C Detachment and ABI handled 78 percent of all reports. Forty-two percent of the reported cases originated in communities connected to the State of Alaska highway system, and 58 percent were reported from communities off the road system.

Most reports (86%) were made directly to troopers. The remaining 14 percent were reported to Village Police Officers, Village Public Safety Officers, or Tribal Police Officers. Few of the initial complaints (21%) were made by the victims themselves. Most initial reports to law enforcement (79%) were made by a third party. In over two-thirds of the cases (69%), the identity of at least one suspect was known.

The 989 cases in this study included a total of 1,645 sexual assault charges and 258 non-sexual assault charges (Table 2). The most common sexual assault charges were second degree sexual abuse of a minor, first degree sexual assault, second degree sexual assault, and first degree sexual abuse of a minor—all felonious assaults (Unclassified or Class B). Together, these four offenses accounted for 81 percent of all sexual assault charges. The most common non-sexual assault charges included assaults (in the second, third, or fourth degree), burglary (in the first or second degree) and kidnapping. Together, these three offenses accounted for 50 percent of all non-sexual assault charges.

Despite the geographical distance that is often present between victims and Troopers, most victimizations were reported quickly to Troopers, and Troopers were quick to respond. Sixty-two percent of cases were reported within 72 hours, which, at the time of the study, was the benchmark for initiating a call to the Sexual Assault Response Team (SART) and collecting evidence with a sexual assault evidence kit. Seventy-seven percent of suspects were interviewed by Troopers (recall that the identity of the suspect was known in 69% of cases). Fifty-seven percent of suspect interviews occurred within one week of the report. Ninety-six percent of victims were interviewed, with 48 percent interviewed on the day of the report and 80 percent interviewed within one week of the report. Ninety-one percent of victim interviews were conducted in-person. On average, cases were closed 18 weeks after they were reported (Table 3). More specifically, 30 percent of cases were closed within three weeks, 50 percent were closed within eight weeks, and 75 percent were closed within 24 weeks.

A majority of cases (61%) were closed and referred for prosecution. These included cases closed by arrest (32%), closed and referred (26%), and closed but declined (3%). The remaining cases were closed after investigation (23%), closed as unfounded (15%), or closed by exception (1%). These latter groups of cases (excluding those closed by exception) were all closed without a suspect being arrested and in some cases without a suspect being identified. Cases that were closed as unfounded were more likely to be reported by third parties who were concerned that a sexual assault may have occurred.

Suspect and Victim Characteristics

From the 989 reports included in this study, we gathered information on 1,050 suspects and 1,082 victims. Most suspects (97%) were male and most (87%) were adults. Conversely, most victims (89%) were female and most (73%) were juveniles. The average age of suspects—29.2—was 13 years greater than the average age of victims—16.2 (Table 4).

Figure 1 displays the number of victim-suspect combinations on the horizontal axis, by victim age on the vertical axis, for five different suspect age groups, in horizontal bars. The top five age group combinations were (1) suspects 31 years old or older and victims 0 to 12 years old (N=137); (2) 16 to 20-year-old suspects and 13 to 15-year-old victims (N=113); (3) 21 to 30-year-old suspects and 13 to 15-year-old victims (N=89); (4) suspects 31 years old or older and victims 31 years old or older (N=76); and (5) suspects 31 years old or older and 13 to 15-year-old victims (N=75). Together, these five age group combinations accounted for 48 percent of the assaults for which both the age of the suspect and victim were known.

Most suspects were Native (59%) or White (37%) and most victims were also Native (61%) or White (38%) (Table 4). Intra-racial victimizations were much more prevalent than inter-racial victimizations, with 91 percent of Native victims assaulted by Native suspects and 84 percent of White victims assaulted by White suspects. Slightly less than half (43%) of the suspects had used alcohol; few (7%) had used drugs. Substance use was most frequent among suspects age 21 to 30, followed by suspects age 31 to 40 and suspects age 16 to 20. Among victims, 27 percent had used alcohol and 5 percent had used drugs. Substance use was most frequent among victims age 13 to 15, followed by victims age 21 to 30 and victims age 31 or older.

Most victims (all but one) were not homeless, nor were most suspects (99%). Most victims (71%) were not living with the suspect at the time of the assault, but overwhelmingly, the victims reported knowing the suspect in some fashion (98%) (Table 5). Only 2 percent of all victim-suspect relationships involved complete strangers. Nearly half (46%) involved friends or acquaintances, 35 percent involved relatives, 12 percent involved current or past intimate partners (including married couples), and 4 percent involved suspects that were in a position of authority over their victims. Together, friends, relatives, and intimate partners accounted for 94 percent of the victim-suspect relationships in the study sample.

The nature of the victim-suspect relationship varied substantially by the age of the victim. In particular, minor victims were substantially more likely be assaulted by relatives than adult victims. While 17 percent of adult victims were assaulted by relatives, 41 percent of minor victims were assaulted by relatives. Minor victims were slightly less likely to be assaulted by friends or acquaintances (43%) than adult victims (57%) and slightly less likely to be assaulted by current or former partners (10%) than adult victims (17%).

Assault Characteristics

The five most common ways that victims and suspects came into contact with each other prior to the assault were by living together (32%); the suspect inviting the victim somewhere (20%); the suspect attacking the victim indoors (15%); the victim inviting the suspect somewhere (10%); and the victim and suspect meeting up with each other at a party (9%). Together, these five pickup methods were used in 86 percent of the assaults (Table 6).

The five most common pickup and assault locations were identical, differing only in terms of rank. These locations included mutually shared residences (25% of pickups and 25% of assaults), the suspect's residence (25% of pickups and 30% of assaults), the victim's residence (20% of pickups and 17% of assaults), someone else's residence (14% of pickups and 14% of assaults), and outdoors (10% of pickups and 7% of assaults). Private residences accounted for 84 percent of pickup locations and 87 percent of assault locations (Table 7).

The reported use of weapons by suspects was very rare in this sample of sexual assault cases. The one major exception, however, was suspects' use of their hands and/or arms to restrain or strike their victims during the assaults. In slightly less than one-third of the incidents, suspects used their hand and/or arms to restrict victims' movement or to assault victims physically beyond the sexual assault. Other weapons such as knives, guns, drugs, or blunt objects were reported to have been used in less than 1 percent of the incidents.

Sexual penetration, as defined by Alaska law, was documented in 60 percent of the assaults. On average, suspects engaged in just over two sexual acts (2.16) per assault (Table 8).

As a result of the assault, 19 percent of victims experienced general physical pain. In addition, 10 percent suffered bruising or swelling. Lacerations, bite marks, and bone fractures were rarely reported or documented (less than 3% of victims). Overall, very few victims received any type of emergency medical treatment for injuries suffered as a result of the sexual assault. Only 4 percent of victims received emergency medical care for genital injuries; 2 percent received emergency medical care for non-genital injuries; and less than 1 percent received emergency medical care for alcohol or drug intoxication.

Physical evidence from the victim (e.g., clothing) and victim sexual assault evidence collection kits were the most commonly collected types of evidence, gathered in 22 percent and 20 percent of cases respectively (Table 9). Suspect sexual assault kits were collected in only 7 percent of cases, and physical evidence from the suspect was gathered in only 13 percent of cases. In the majority of cases, there was no physical evidence recovered from the scene (84% of cases) and in 87 percent of cases, the scene was not photographed. Search warrants were obtained in 36 percent of cases. The most common warrants were for the victims' medical records (26% of cases) and glass warrants (13% of cases). Forensic exams of evidence were requested in only 16 percent of cases, with forensic DNA exams the most commonly requested (14% of cases).

Photographs of suspect injuries and the recovery of a weapon were the least common types of evidence collected (also the least available) during investigations.

Overall, evidence collection appeared to be somewhat low, although the statistics represent only what was included in the reports (Table 10). This is an important limitation with this study because evidence was counted as collected only if it was included in the report. This is particularly problematic with photographs. In some cases, photographs were taken, but were kept separately from the report (i.e., stored electronically but not printed to include with the report). In these cases, we counted the evidence as not collected because it was not found within the report. The statistics reported here therefore underestimate how frequently evidence was collected by Troopers.

Future analyses will be necessary to determine how these types of evidence impact legal resolutions. Two main factors determine the applicability and availability of evidence: one, the nature, or severity, of the reported incident; two, the timeliness of the report. Both factors impact what evidence is applicable and what evidence is available to be collected.

Legal Resolutions

We examined data from the Alaska Department of Law (DOL) to determine the legal resolution for cases in the study which were referred to DOL. We did not examine referrals to other agencies, such as the Division of Juvenile Justice. From the sample of 989 reported cases, 46 percent (N = 452) were referred to DOL for prosecution. Sixty percent of the cases referred to DOL (N = 273) had at least one charge accepted and filed with the court for prosecution (Table 11). Of those cases with at least one charge accepted by DOL, 80 percent resulted in a conviction. The highest level of attrition occurred from report to referral. Once cases were referred, the likelihood of at least one charge being accepted and resulting in a finding of guilt was quite high.

Additional analyses showed that attrition was less likely in cases with one or more witnesses than in cases without witnesses and was less likely among rural cases than among urban cases (rural cases were defined as those emerging from locations not connected to the State of Alaska highway system). (See "Case Attrition of Sexual Violence Offenses: Empirical Findings" in this issue.)

From the 989 reports, a total of 1,171 charges were referred to DOL. Sixty-six percent of these charges were accepted by DOL. Thirty-one percent were declined with a required dismissal and 3 percent were declined without a required dismissal. The most frequently cited reasons for not accepting charges as referred were evidentiary reasons, with the two most common evidentiary reasons being inadequate corroboration and insufficient evidence.

Because evidentiary reasons were the most common reasons for not accepting charges that were referred and because evidence collection was somewhat low, it is imperative that we improve the capacity to collect evidence, when it is available. In "Sexual Assault Nurse Examinations in Alaska," also in this issue of the Forum, the importance of documenting non-genital injuries is discussed. In this study, victim injury photos were taken in only 55 percent of applicable cases. Again, this estimate may be low because some victim injury photos are kept separately from the reports. Nonetheless, there is room for improving evidence collection and resources should be provided for these improvements.

The findings presented here constitute a first look at the problem of sexual assault in smaller communities across the state—those served predominately by the Troopers. Further research will undoubtedly provide a more detailed picture.

Case Attrition of Sexual Violence Offenses: Empirical Findings

Abstract: This report examined the legal resolutions for 1,184 contact sexual violence cases reported to Alaska State Troopers in 2003 and 2004, and excluded results from other law enforcement agencies. We determined whether cases were founded with an identifiable suspect, were referred to the Alaska Department of Law for prosecution, were accepted for prosecution, and if the case resulted in a conviction. We only examined whether any conviction on any charge was obtained. In some cases, the conviction may be for a non-sexual offense.

- Seventy-five percent of cases were founded with at least one identifiable suspect, 51% of founded cases were referred to the Alaska Department of Law for prosecution, 60% of referred cases were accepted for prosecution, and 80% of accepted cases resulted in a conviction on at least one charge. The greatest point of attrition was from the founding to the referral decision.
- For the most part, cases of Alaska Native victims were as likely, or even more likely, to be processed by the criminal justice system relative to the cases of non-Native victims.
- Cases of sexual violence in the most rural portions of Alaska had an equal or greater chance of being subject to legal sanction when compared with cases from Alaska's less rural areas, and were as likely or more likely to receive full enforcement and prosecution. Unfortunately, the percentage of founded cases that resulted in a conviction never exceeded 30%.

The State of Alaska's response to violence in Alaska Native villages has faced increased scrutiny over the past decade, with criticism coming from a number of sources, including the Alaska Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, the Alaska Inter-Tribal Council (in AITC v. Alaska, 110 P.3d 947, 2005), and, most recently, Amnesty International. In general, allegations have been made that the state discriminates on a geographic and racial basis in the provision of criminal justice services to Alaska Native villages that are isolated from the main road system. For example, in AITC v. Alaska (2005), plaintiffs argued that their equal protection rights were violated by the state's deployment of police resources in a discriminatory fashion that favored those living along the main highway system. Similarly, in a 2007 report on police and court responses to violence against American Indian and Alaska Native women (Maze of Injustice: The Failure to Protect Indigenous Women from Sexual Violence in the USA), Amnesty International singled out Alaska for what it considers to be a discriminatory, two-tiered deployment of police into the isolated areas of the state, said to be indicative of the state's "failing to exercise due diligence when it comes to sexual violence against . . . Alaska Native women." Amnesty International argued that with this two-tiered deployment of police resources, villages without a trooper post receive less effective police response than villages with a trooper post.

The evidence put forth in the many critical reports is based primarily upon the written and oral testimony of criminal justice agency personnel as well as Alaska Native crime victims, political leaders, and legal advocates. Although compelling, the case made against the state is largely anecdotal, failing to demonstrate a systematic lack of criminal justice system response to sexual violence against Alaska Natives. In this article we consider information gathered from the case files of the Alaska State Troopers (AST) and the Alaska Department of Law (DOL) to determine if there is an empirical basis for claims of unequal enforcement of sexual violence statutes. Specifically, we consider multiple decision-making points within the criminal justice process to compare the outcomes of cases involving Alaska Native victims with cases of non-Native victims.

The results presented below allow for an examination of case attrition of instances of sexual violence reported to AST and prosecuted by DOL. Case attrition is a term used to describe the process by which only a portion of offenses reported to the police are eventually dealt with through criminal prosecution. At each specific decision-making point the number of cases deemed worthy of official attention is reduced, with some cases carried forward for additional processing while others are no longer subject to prosecution.

The attrition of sexual violence cases reported to AST in 2003 and 2004 is shown in Figure 1. Overall, there were 1,379 reports of sexual offenses made to AST during those two years. Of those original reports, 1,184 were contact sexual violence cases involving forcible rape, sexual assault, or sexual abuse of a minor. Among the other 195 cases were offenses that occurred outside of AST's geographic area of responsibility, offenses that occurred before 2003, offenses committed by children too young to form criminal intent, and non-contact sexual offenses such as indecent exposure or possession of child pornography.

In the next step in the process the police decide if the reported offense is founded (i.e., that it actually occurred) and if there is a suspect responsible for the offense to be subject to prosecution. Roughly three-fourths (74.7%) of the 1,184 reported contact sexual violence cases were deemed by AST to have occurred and to have at least one identifiable suspect.

After the police decide that an offense has indeed occurred and also identify a suspect, the next decision is whether to refer the case for prosecution in criminal court. Half (50.8%) of the 884 founded cases with identified suspects were referred to DOL for prosecution in adult criminal court. The cases excluded from the analysis at that point included those juvenile cases that were not waived into adult court (a sixth—16.6%—of founded cases with suspects) and those that were not referred for reasons such as a lack of evidence or uncooperative victims (a third—32.6%—of founded cases with suspects).

Once referred by the police, prosecutors decide which cases to prosecute; three-fifths (60.4%) of contact sexual violence cases referred by AST to DOL were accepted for prosecution. Cases that are prosecuted eventually result either in a conviction or an acquittal. Of the cases of sexual violence accepted for prosecution by DOL, most (80.1%) resulted in a conviction. Ultimately, only 18 percent of reported cases, 25 percent of founded cases with suspects, and 48 percent of cases referred by AST to prosecution resulted in a conviction—i.e., guilty plea or conviction at trial.

Apart from this general consideration of the winnowing of reported sexual violence offenses as they proceed through the system, it is also possible to examine relative case attrition of offenses involving Alaska Natives versus those of non-Natives. Doing so allows for a determination of the extent to which there is systematic under-enforcement of laws against contact sexual violence in cases with Alaska Native victims. Greater degrees of attrition of Alaska Native victims' cases when compared to that for non-Native victims would lend credence to the anecdotal evidence used in reports critical of the state's provision of policing and prosecution to Alaska Native communities.

Comparisons of attrition of cases of sexual violence are made on a number of levels. First, case attrition for offenses involving Alaska Native victims is compared with attrition of non-Native victims' cases. Next, case attrition in communities located in the rural regions of Alaska is compared with case attrition in communities located outside of the state's rural regions. Finally, the attrition of cases that occurred in isolated villages is compared with the attrition of cases that occurred in less-isolated locations. At each of these levels comparisons are made on the basis of the total of all contact sexual violence offenses, and for rape/sexual assault and sexual abuse of a minor (SAM) separately. Four different decisions are considered: the Troopers' decision on whether reported cases are founded; the Troopers' decision to refer founded cases for prosecution; the prosecutors' decision to accept referred cases for prosecution; and the final court decision in cases accepted for prosecution—i.e., whether a conviction was obtained. These results are presented as a comparison between Alaska Native and non-Native victims in terms of the number and percentage of cases that were chosen to be carried forward in the criminal justice process. The results of chi-square tests of statistical significance—a test which measures the likelihood that differences in the percentage of cases carried forward are the result of chance alone and not indicative of an underlying association—are also provided.

Differences in the processing of cases involving Alaska Native and non-Native victims are shown in Table 1. For the most part, these results indicate that the cases of Alaska Native victims are as likely, or are even more likely, to be processed by the criminal justice system relative to the cases of non-Native victims. For the total of all sexual violence offenses, cases involving Alaska Native victims were just as likely as cases with non-Native victims to be founded or to result in a conviction and they were more likely to be referred by AST to prosecutors and to be accepted by DOL for prosecution. Considering only cases involving the offenses of rape and sexual assault, there were statistically significant differences between Alaska Native and non-Native victims at the founding decision and at the decisions to refer cases and accept cases for prosecution; at each of these decision-making points the cases of Alaska Native victims were more likely to be carried forward. In terms of SAM cases, those cases involving Alaska Native victims were less likely to be founded. Otherwise, none of the differences in the processing rates of Alaska Native and non-Native victims' SAM cases were statistically significant.

A second set of analyses was conducted to consider the processing of cases occurring in the largely Alaska Native communities of the most rural areas of the state. The dichotomy for these analyses was drawn between cases occurring either inside or outside of what the Department of Health and Social Services in its Alaska Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System has termed the "Bush Stratum"—comprising the boroughs and census areas north and west of the Railbelt. Comparisons of case processing from these bush communities with cases from non-bush communities are reported in Table 2. These results indicate that cases of sexual violence that occur in the most rural portions of Alaska have, depending upon the decision, an equal or greater chance of being subject to legal sanction when compared with cases from Alaska's less rural areas. Similar to what was found when comparing attrition in Alaska Native victims' cases versus non-Native victims' cases, victims from bush communities of sexual violence in general and of rape/sexual assault were more likely to have their cases referred to prosecutors by AST and to have DOL accept those cases for prosecution.

The final set of analyses considers attrition of cases coming from the most isolated villages compared to places that are less isolated. For these analyses a village was considered isolated if it lacked a local AST post or if Troopers were unable to reach the village by automobile. The premise of this dichotomy is that travel to villages that cannot be reached by highway is more difficult and, because of that hindrance, it could be expected that conducting investigations would be more difficult—thus increasing case attrition. From the perspective behind the allegations against the state, it is in these disconnected villages that lack a locally-posted police agency certified by the Alaska Police Standards Council where the greatest disparities in the enforcement and prosecution of cases of sexual violence would be expected to occur.

The results comparing attrition of cases occurring in villages defined as isolated with cases occurring in places more easily reached are presented in Table 3. As with the previously discussed comparisons of cases, case attrition in isolated villages is no more prevalent than in places that are better connected to AST posts. The results presented in Table 3 indicate that cases from isolated villages are instead actually more likely to receive full enforcement. Cases of rape/sexual assault in isolated villages were more likely to be founded, more likely to be referred for prosecution by AST, and more likely to be accepted for prosecution by DOL. Likewise, across the total of all sexual violence offenses, cases from isolated villages were referred and accepted for prosecution at a rate greater than cases from non-isolated locations. No differences were found in the attrition of SAM cases.

Overall, the results presented in this article provide little empirical support for allegations of discrimination in the processing of sexual violence cases by AST or DOL on a racial or geographic basis. With the exception of SAM cases against Alaska Native victims being less likely to be founded, cases of sexual violence against Alaska Native victims were just as likely or actually more likely to receive full enforcement and prosecution when compared with cases against non-Native victims. On the basis of geography, cases occurring in locations with predominately Alaska Native populations believed to be underserved by AST were actually more likely to be dealt with by AST or DOL when compared with cases from outside those geographic areas. Our results indicate that the anecdotal evidence found in reports critical of the state's response to sexual violence against Alaska Natives does not accurately reflect the actual processing of cases of rape, sexual assault, and SAM reported to AST and prosecuted by DOL. Ultimately, these results do not support claims of unequal enforcement by the state in response to the victimization of the Alaska Native population. However, Alaska continues to experience high rates of forcible rape, and the prosecution of sexual violence continues to be difficult: the percentage of AST-founded cases that resulted in a conviction never exceeded 30 percent.

Abstract: This report compared the rates of recidivism for 232 male sex offenders to 232 randomly selected male non-sex offenders. All were released from the Alaska Department of Corrections in 2001 and their recidivism was tracked for three years.

- Overall, 70% of all offenders were remanded, 61% were rearrested, and 40% were convicted on some charge.
- Sex offenders were less likely to be rearrested than non-sex offenders. There was no significant difference between sex offenders and non-sex offenders for remands or convictions. In addition, there was no significant difference between sex offenders and non-sex offenders in rearrests for sex crimes.
- Those originally incarcerated for sexual abuse of a minor were less likely to be remanded than other sex offenders, less likely to be rearrested, and less likely to be reconvicted.

A recent study of sexual offenders released from incarceration in Alaska shows that for the three years after the offenders left prison in 2001, the rates of recidivism for sexual offenders were, by most measures, no higher than for offenders in general. The study, which was done by the Alaska Justice Statistical Analysis Center, a subdivision of the Justice Center, compared recidivism for sexual offenders released from prison in 2001 with a random sample of non-sex offenders also released in 2001. The analysis used the three measures most commonly used to determine recidivism: incidents of remand to custody, rearrest, and reconviction on any new offense. The results are similar to those found in an earlier study done by the Alaska Judicial Council. (See Alaska Felony Process: 1999, Alaska Judicial Council, 2004.)

The following analysis is based on data from the Departments of Corrections and Public Safety and the Alaska Court System. The Alaska Department of Corrections released 232 male sex offenders in 2001. This analysis focuses on offender recidivism over the three-year period following release. Recidivism is calculated for remand—reentry to prison as a result of probation/parole/technical violations, rearrest, or reconviction for any type of crime. Overall recidivism rates and frequencies for all sex offenders and for a randomly sampled cohort of other types of offenders also released in 2001 are presented. Also given are rates according to the types of sexual offense involved in the original conviction: sexual assault or sexual abuse of a minor.

Overall, during the three-year period, 70 percent of all offenders were remanded (68% of sex offenders and 72% of non-sex offenders), 61 percent were rearrested (54% of sex offenders and 68% of non-sex offenders), and 40 percent were convicted on some charge (39% of sex offenders and 35% of non-sex offenders).

For the categories of sex offense, 63 percent of those convicted of sexual abuse of a minor were remanded, 50 percent were rearrested and 36 percent were convicted of another offense—although not necessarily a sexual offense. For offenders convicted of sexual assault, the rates were 79 percent, 63 percent, and 45 percent respectively.

In the case of rearrest for a new sex offense, there was a slight but statistically insignificant difference between the sex offender group—3.4 percent—and the non-sex offender group—1.3 percent.

(DOC) provided the Alaska Justice Statistical Analysis Center (SAC) with a data set of all releases from DOC facilities in 2001. SAC personnel filtered the set for state statutes that identify a sexual offense and require registration on the state's sex offender registry. Once the sex offenders were identified, an equivalent number of offenders from the remaining pool were randomly sampled to provide a comparison group. Current and past information on status, movements, court cases, etc. involving the offender was also obtained from DOC.

The Alaska Department of Public Safety (DPS) provided the SAC with criminal histories for the sampled offenders and the Alaska Court System provided record access to court records through the web-based interface, Court View (CV).

For this report, only first release cases were used—that is, if an offender was initially released some time prior to 2001 and returned for some reason, such as a probation violation, and then released again in 2001, that case was excluded. Also, some offenders were released more than once during 2001. The first release constituted the base measure; a subsequent release was an indication of a new arrest event.

In the rare instances of discrepancy, the date of the first event was used in the analysis. For instance, DOC and CV might have had the same date for an arrest/filing that did not appear in the criminal history. This situation generally indicated a remand to custody that did not get reported as a new court case and resulted in incarceration under the original court case—such as for parole, probation, and technical violations.

Demographics

Table 1 shows racial categories for the groups of offenders. Alaska Natives constituted 49 percent of the sex offender group and 46 percent of offenders overall. Whites were 32 percent of sex offenders and 39 percent of the overall offender pool. Table 1 also presents the breakdown for the two sex offense categories.

Table 2 shows a comparison of age and number of prior arrests and convictions for the groups of offenders. The average age of the sex offenders was significantly lower than that of the non-sex offenders. For the two sex offender categories, however, there was no significant difference in age.

An analysis of prior convictions shows a significant difference between sex offenders and non-sex offenders for any prior conviction but not for sex offense convictions. The non-sex offenders had significantly more prior convictions than the sex offenders.

Rearrests for Any Crime

Table 3 shows recidivism rates for remands, rearrests, and reconvictions for the sex offenders and non-sex offenders. Non-sex offenders were more likely to be rearrested than sex offenders but for remands and convictions there was no significant difference between sex offenders and non-sex offenders.

Table 3 also shows the recidivism rates for the two sex offender categories. Those originally incarcerated for sexual abuse of a minor were less likely to be remanded than other sex offenders, less likely to be rearrested, and less likely to be reconvicted.

Rearrests for a Sex Crime

Table 4 shows the recidivism rates for the sex offenders and non-sex offenders for new sex crimes. While there is a slight difference in rearrests—3.4 percent for the sex offender group vs. 1.3 percent for the non-sex offender group—this difference is not statistically significant.

Table 4 also shows the equivalent analysis for the sex crime category grouping. Again, there is a slight but non-significant difference between the two groups.

Revisiting Alaska's Sex Offender Registration and Public Notification Statute

Deborah Periman

In Alaska and throughout the country sex offender registration requirements have become more inclusive. Almost all convicted sex offenders now must register for very extended periods; the registry is available over the Internet; and more details on the current status of the offender are available to the public. The intent of the registries is to protect the public from convicted offenders, but it can be argued that the increasingly stringent demands placed on offenders may, in fact, be counterproductive. The severity of the registration requirements may prohibit the rehabilitation of offenders and their reintegration into the community, and the increasing burden on law enforcement to monitor and maintain very broad registries may prevent police from focusing on the more serious sexual predators.

Abstract: This article examines the background and judicial interpretation of Alaska's sex offender registration and public notification statute, the new federal requirements for state sex offender registries and public notice under the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, and weaknesses in both Alaska's existing system and the enhanced requirements of the new federal legislation. These weaknesses include:

- Absence of incentives for offenders to seek therapy or treatment;
- Failure to provide for individualized risk assessment that would differentiate between those offenders who pose a negligible or very low risk of re-offending from those who pose a continuing public risk – a failure that causes unwarranted marginalization of low risk offenders and diminishes the overall effectiveness of the public notification system;
- Public notice provisions so broad as to substantially impede offenders' reintegration into their families, their community, and the workforce, and potentially chilling family reporting;
- Internet posting requirements associated with severe stigmatization and public harassment, and concomitant emotional destabilization and isolation of offenders – factors that may actually increase the risk of recidivism and community harm.

Because the Walsh Act conditions state receipt of Byrne Grant funds on compliance with its enhanced registration and notice requirements, there is little Alaska can do to remedy the above weaknesses and still remain eligible for Byrne funds. However, the article concludes with a recommendation for limited changes to our statute that would minimize, to the extent possible, its adverse effect on offenders' ability to find employment; omit the lowest risk offenders from internet posting requirements; and provide those incentives for treatment permissible under the Walsh Act.

Background

The Alaska Sex Offender Registration Act, which was enacted in the wake of extensive publicity over the tragic rape and murder of Megan Kanka in New Jersey, rests on specific legislative findings that (1) "sex offenders pose a high risk of reoffending after release from custody" and (2) release of information about sex offenders to the public "will assist in protecting public safety" (1994 Alaska Sess. Laws 41, § 1).

The state legislature's findings were premised on testimony reflecting the commonly held belief that sex offenders as a class are different from other offenders—that they will inevitably reoffend and that they are not receptive to treatment. In light of this testimony, the legislature did not attempt to distinguish among types of offenders or to evaluate which offenders were most likely to recidivate. Instead, it simply divided all offenders into two groups, aggravated and nonaggravated offenders, based on the severity of the offense. These two categories cover offenders ranging from the 18-year-old who has consensual sex with a 14-year-old to the perpetrator of a violent rape and murder.

The registration statute that emerged was, at the time of its enactment, one of the most stringent in the country. In a 2003 case closely watched by state and federal lawmakers, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld its terms against an ex post facto challenge. Justice John Paul Stevens, dissenting, summarized the statute's effect:

> In Alaska, an offender who has served his sentence for a single, nonaggravated crime must provide local law enforcement authorities with extensive personal information—including his address, his place of employment, the address of his employer, the license plate number and make and model

Author's Note

This is an extremely abbreviated look at a complex federal initiative and at how specified aspects of the initiative relate to weaknesses in Alaska's sex offender registry. Issues of federalism and due process are not addressed, nor does this piece attempt to identify how the statutory elements of sex and kidnapping offenses under Alaska's code fit within the Walsh Act offender tiers. Finally, the reader should draw no inferences regarding Alaska's overall level of compliance with the Walsh Act requirements. A longer version of this piece, with complete legal citations, is available on the Justice Center website at http://justice.uaa.alaska.edu/workingpapers/.

of any car to which he has access, a current photo, identifying features, and medical treatment—at least once a year for 15 years. If one has been convicted of an aggravated offense or more than one offense, he must report this same information at least quarterly for life. Moreover, if he moves, he has one working day to provide updated information. Registrants may not shave their beards, color their hair, change their employer, or borrow a car without reporting those events to the authorities. Much of this registration information is placed on the Internet. In Alaska, the registrant's face appears on a webpage under the label "Registered Sex Offender." His physical description, street address, employer address, and conviction information are also displayed on this page. (Smith v. Doe, 538 U.S. 84, 111 (2003))

At the time of its passage, Alaska's statute far exceeded the minimum requirements imposed on the states by the federal Jacob Wetterling Act. This legislation, adopted in 1994, required every state to enact a sex offender registration program meeting certain minimum guidelines or face a reduction in federal grant funding for law enforcement (42 U.S.C.A. § 14071 (West 2008)).

Unlike Alaska, many states attempted to tailor the reach of their registration statutes to the actual risk posed by individual offenders. The Connecticut legislature, for example, adopted a system using individualized clinical assessment to determine which offenders would be subject to registration requirements. Offenders were required to register only if such assessment demonstrated that they were found to pose a high risk of recidivism. This type of classification system has come to be known as an offender-based system, reflecting the emphasis on the individual. Alaska's system, in contrast, is offense-based, with classification resting solely on the conviction and no individual risk assessment undertaken.

Alaska was one of the relatively few states to require Internet dissemination of registration information for all offenders. Other states attempted to strike a balance between the stigmatization and collateral consequences of public notification and the risk of recidivism. New Jersey, for example, classified its offenders by risk and required no public disclosure for those who posed the least risk of reoffending, a percentage estimated at 45 percent of the entire sex offender class. Widespread disclosure was required only for those at the highest risk of reoffending (approximately five percent) of the whole.

Some of the flexibility afforded states under the original Wetterling Act was reduced through subsequent amendment; the flexibility to utilize individualized risk assessments will disappear almost completely as the provisions of the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, PL 109-248, become binding on the states. This act represents an extensive revision and expansion of federal sex offender legislation. One of its many purposes is to standardize and increase minimum registration requirements nationwide. It imposes on the states highly detailed requirements for sex offender registration and public notification—requirements the states must in general implement by July 27, 2009. A state's failure to meet the implementation deadline will trigger a mandatory ten percent reduction in Byrne Justice Assistance Grant funding.

Key provisions of the Walsh Act include broadening the classes of sex offenses for which registration is required and extending it to cover juvenile offenses; requiring covered offenders to consistently remain registered in any jurisdiction in which they live, work, or attend school; expanding the scope of registration information required; imposing a national requirement for periodic in-person appearances by registrants; standardizing the required duration of registration; and widening the availability of information concerning registrants available to the public through required Internet posting. The act adopts an offense-based, three-tiered classification for offenders. It does not authorize the states to implement an offender-based classification using individualized risk assessment, nor, with limited exceptions, does it authorize the states to implement ameliorative programs that would allow offenders to avoid or shorten registration based on treatment and rehabilitation. The net effect of the new federal legislation will be to bring all cooperating states closer to Alaska's registration and publication requirements.

Alaska's Statute and its Federal Counterpart Rest on Disproved Assumptions

The myth of the incorrigible sex offender, all but guaranteed to reoffend, has been largely refuted. A study by the Alaska Justice Statistical Analysis Center of sex offenders released from Alaska corrections facilities in 2001 found that non-sex offenders were more likely to be rearrested than sex offenders. (See "Recidivism of Alaska Sex Offenders Released from Corrections Facilities in 2001" in this issue of the Forum.) With respect to sex crimes specifically, the study found no statistically significant difference between the rates at which sex offenders were rearrested for a new sex crime and the rates at which non-sex offenders were arrested for a first sex crime. These patterns are consistent with the results of studies elsewhere finding that sex offenders as a class are somewhat less likely than other categories of offenders to re-offend.

Moreover, recent studies conclude that treatment programs are, in fact, effective in reducing the overall rate of recidivism for many offenders. A Canadian study published in late 2007, for example, found that high-risk sex offenders who participated in a community-based treatment project had lower rates of reoffending of any type than did offenders who did not participate (Wilson, et al., 2007). Although sex offender treatment remains a controversial issue, these results are consistent with the general findings of studies conducted over the last decade or so—studies that refute the earlier belief that sex offenders are impervious to treatment.

The foregoing is particularly true with respect to juvenile offenders. Although offenders as young as 14 are subject to registration and public notification requirements under the Walsh Act, research establishes that recidivism rates for juvenile sex offenders are substantially lower than the rates for other types of juvenile offenders. Juvenile offenders have, in addition, proven highly amenable to treatment.

Problems with the Existing System

The Walsh Act and its antecedents rest on the premise that state registration and notification systems advance public safety, but empirical evidence disproves this premise. Studies show that after more than ten years of national registration and public notice, sex offender registries have made no discernable difference in sex offender recidivism rates (Tewksbury & Lees, 2007). (Although the registries have not curbed the commission of sex offenses, it should be noted that law enforcement officials in Alaska do view the offender database as a useful investigatory tool after an offense occurs.)

The weaknesses of Alaska's registration and notice system are well documented. Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg, in a dissenting opinion in Smith v. Doe, 538 U.S. 84, 116–117 (2003), put it simply—the statute is excessive in relation to its purpose:

> The Act applies to all convicted sex offenders, without regard to their future dangerousness. And the duration of the reporting requirement is keyed not to any determination of a particular offender's risk of reoffending, but to whether the offense of conviction qualified as aggravated." Moreover, "the Act makes no provision whatever for the possibility of rehabilitation: offenders cannot shorten their registration or notification period, even on the clearest demonstration of rehabilitation or conclusive proof of physical incapacitation. However plain it may be that a former sex offender currently poses no threat of recidivism he will remain subject to long-term monitoring and inescapable humiliation.

Of course, no matter how excessive the reach of the statute in relation to its goals, many would argue that the disabilities imposed on low-risk or rehabilitated offenders are warranted if the system serves to protect even one child. The difficulty, however, is that Alaska's registration and notification system, and others like it, do not demonstrably make the public safer. To the contrary, they are likely to trigger a host of consequences antithetical to the public interest.

Unemployment, Instability and Enhanced Risk of Recidivism

After ten-plus years of national experimentation with sex offender registries, the destabilizing effects of being listed on a sex offender registry are well understood. They include profound humiliation and social isolation, loss of employment and housing, and destruction of family ties. Registrants and their families have experienced vigilantism in the form of harassment, threats of violence, physical attacks and arson.

In Doe v. State, 92 P.3d 398, 410 (Alaska 2004), the Alaska Supreme Court made note of the severity of these consequences. Citing examples of Alaska registrants who had lost their jobs, been forced to move their residences, and received threats of violence, the Court observed that "the potentially destructive practical consequences that flow from registration and widespread governmental distribution of disclosed information" are grave. "[O]utside Alaska, there have been incidents of suicide by, and vigilantism against, offenders on state registries, and offenders listed on registries often have unique difficulties locating places to reside and work. Offenders are sometimes subjected to protests and group actions designed to force them out of their jobs and homes." Registrants have suffered neighborhood rallies staged to protest their presence, bricks thrown through windows, and harassing calls to employers.

Of these negative consequences, employment difficulties are perhaps most significant. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that Alaska's system of putting offenders' employment information on the Internet is likely to make registrants "completely unemployable" (Doe v. Otte, 259 F.3d 979, 988 (9th Cir. 2001), rev'd, Smith v. Doe, 538 U.S. 84 (2003)). The system "creates a substantial probability that registrants will not be able to find work, because employers will not want to risk loss of business when the public learns that they have hired sex offenders." The court cited the experience of one Alaska business owner who suffered community hostility and damage to his business after print ads from the Alaska sex offender registry web site were publicly distributed and posted on a bulletin board.

It may be tempting to dismiss these adverse consequences as the just result of the offender's own conduct, but these consequences also disserve the community in several important ways. First, study after study has identified stress as one of the antecedents to sex offender relapse. Chronic torment and hostility from the public, fractured social relationships, lack of stable housing, and unemployment are likely to cause the registered offender heightened stress, anxiety and resentment, all of which may erode an offender's self-restraint (Cohen & Jeglic, 2007). Lack of social support, in particular, and the accompanying stress on the offender has been identified as a key trigger in sex offense recidivism (Levensen & Cotter, 2005).

These problems are particularly acute for juvenile offenders. Young persons subject to registration have been harassed at school; some have dropped out. The stigma associated with the public notice system causes a loss of social networks, which in turn increases the risk of anti-social behaviors.

The extreme length of the registration period may exacerbate these problems. Under the Walsh Act, states must require a minimum of 25 years registration for mid-level offenses and lifetime registration for the most serious offenses. Studies show, however, that offenders who view punishment as too severe or inescapable may be more likely to reoffend and that many offenders subject to the lifetime registration requirement feel states have opened the door to endless harassment and stigmatization.

The majority of offenders surveyed report that they have experienced first-hand social or psychological effects resulting from the public registries. The consequent shame, isolation, fear, and hopelessness all interfere with an offender's reintegration and recovery.

Lifetime Registration as a Disincentive to Therapy or Recovery

In Alaska, a sex offender "cannot escape the [registration] Act's grasp no matter how clearly he may demonstrate that he poses no future risk to anyone, and no matter how final the judicial determination that he has been successfully rehabilitated..." (Otte, 259 F.3d at 994). Alaska's failure to provide any avenue for relief from or mitigation of the registration requirement is one of its statute's failings.

In a recent sampling of individual sex offender perceptions, several offenders observed that the ability to have a risk evaluation completed while on the registry would provide an incentive and motivation "to pursue treatment, to avoid problematic situations, and . . . [maintain] a crime free lifestyle" (Tewksbury & Lee, 2007, p. 400). Another study looking at the social and psychological effects of registration on sex offenders found many experiencing feelings of despair and hopelessness in the absence of individualized assessment. One respondent stated, "no one believes I can change, so why even try?" (Levensen & Cotter, 2005, p. 52).

As written, the statute fails to recognize the possibility of rehabilitation and provides offenders considering treatment no hope that their efforts might eventually reduce the stigma associated with the registry's public notification system.

Mandatory Internet Publication and Chilled Reporting

The inability to avoid publication of an offender's personal information on the internet and the ensuing social obloquy may also discourage family members of some offenders from reporting offenses. The spouse of an offender, particularly of an offender who may be the family's primary source of economic support, faces a terrible dilemma in reporting: While the report may protect the spouse herself or himself, or a child, the report may consign the entire family to a lifetime of poverty, to loss of the family home if the offender is evicted, and to shared shame and harassment once the offender's personal information is placed on the Internet. Studies suggest that reporting may be equally difficult for the parent or sibling of an offender. Thus, to the extent that mandatory Internet publication acts as a disincentive to reporting intra-family offenses, Alaska's notification statute ill-serves Alaska's abused children and spouses.

Obfuscation of More Dangerous Offenders

The extraordinarily broad reach of Alaska's publication requirement has ramifications beyond its collateral consequences to the offender and his or her family. Indiscriminate posting of information on all offenders tends to obscure from the public pertinent information relating to very dangerous sexual predators. Including low-risk offenders also places an unnecessary administrative burden on state officials responsible for establishing and maintaining the posting, with a concomitant increase in public expense. In addition, the greater the number of postings, the more difficult and expensive it is for the state to ensure accuracy and respond to noncompliant offenders.

Possible Changes

During the 2008 session, the Alaska legislature passed and the governor signed into law CSSB 185, which extends the reach of existing sex offender registration requirements. The new law adds the requirement that offenders provide the Department of Corrections with every email or instant messaging address or other Internet communication identifier they use—information mandated by the Walsh Act. This type of legislative fine-tuning, however, will not solve the most fundamental problems with the statute—overbreadth and the absence of treatment incentives.

Recent data show that those states whose legislation is most narrowly drawn to focus on the highest-risk offenders are most likely to achieve their legislative goals. A sex offender registration system is most effective where it uses actuarial risk-assessment measures to ascertain which sex offenders are at the highest risk of reoffending, distinguishes among offenders based on risk, and imposes the disabilities of registration and publication only on those most likely to recidivate. This type of registration and publication system allows the public to readily identify the most dangerous individuals and allows law enforcement to focus its resources on the most likely threats to the community (Cohen & Jeglic, 2007).

Unfortunately, the Walsh Act, with its offense-based tier structure, has foreclosed to a significant extent the states' ability to implement a true risk assessment scheme and retain eligibility for full Byrne Grant funding. There are, however, a few windows left open for small improvements to Alaska's statute.

Minimize the impact on employment. For reasons stated above, Internet publication of an employer name and address is one of the consequences of registration most likely to de-stabilize an offender socially and psychologically. The risk of consigning an offender to a lifetime of unemployment may also be a factor in deterring some family reporting.

The public interest associated with making employment available to released offenders is implicitly recognized under the new federal guidelines. The Walsh Act authorizes the states to exclude from their websites the name (though not the address) of a sex offender's employer. To facilitate offender reintegration and to protect the economic welfare of offenders' families, Alaska could avail itself of this option. While it is argued that knowing the name of an offender's employer enhances public safety, there is no empirical evidence to support this claim.

Omit the lowest risk offenders from internet publication. Another option granted the states under the new federal guidelines pertains to offenders classified under the statute as "Tier I Sex Offenders." Tier I offenders include those whose registration offense is not punishable by imprisonment for more than one year, whose offense is receipt or possession of child pornography, or whose offense is a sexual assault against an adult that involves sexual contact only.

The Walsh Act provides the states discretion to omit offenders in this category (other than those convicted of specified offenses against a minor) from placement on the state sex offender web site. With respect to this grant of discretion, Alaska legislators should do one of two things: Either adopt an individualized risk assessment program for offenders within this category and exclude from web publication those deemed to pose a low community risk or simply exclude these offenders as a class. The first approach would strike the optimal balance between the competing goals of providing adequate public notice and promoting offender reintegration and rehabilitation. It would also be much more expensive to administer, leaving the second approach a reasonable alternative with respect to these low-level offenders.

Include the limited treatment incentives authorized under the Walsh Act. The new federal requirements also offer states some latitude to include treatment incentives in their registration statutes. The Walsh Act generally requires the states to register Tier I offenders for 15 years, Tier II offenders for 25 years, and Tier III offenders for life. However, Section 115(b) provides that Tier I offenders' registration periods may be reduced by five years if they maintain a clean record within the statutory definition of that term, which includes successful completion of an approved treatment program. No reduction is authorized for offenders classified as Tier II or Tier III (73 Fed. Reg. at 38068). (Tier III offenders whose conviction stemmed from a delinquency proceeding are eligible for a reduction in term. In Alaska, however, a conviction triggering registration is defined as a conviction of an adult or a juvenile charged as an adult (AS 12.63.100(3).)

This window of opportunity for offering reduction of the registration period as a treatment incentive is very small. Nevertheless, in light of recent data showing that treatment is often effective in deterring future offenses, Alaska should take advantage of this limited opportunity to encourage released offenders to seek treatment.

Conclusion

There are ways to refine the current sex offender registration system to ensure that it better protects the public. The revulsion and anger that most of us feel toward those convicted of sex crimes should not blind us to the safety interest served by affording released offenders treatment incentives and the opportunity to live stable and socially productive lives. Within the confines of the federal funding mandates, Alaska can strike a more effective balance between warning the public of the most dangerous sexual predators and promoting the reintegration and rehabilitation of the larger class of offenders.

Abstract: This study examined the characteristics of all sexual assaults reported to the Anchorage Police Department from 2000 through 2003. Key descriptive findings are summarized.

- Victims tended to be young and female, with Native women victims in over 45% of reported sexual assaults.
- In a majority of the assaults – over 62% - the assailant was not a stranger to the victim. The most common non-stranger relationships included friends and acquaintances.
- A majority of the assaults occurred indoors, with 45% taking place at the residence of one or both of those involved.
- Sixty-five percent of victims had used alcohol prior to the assault and 74% of suspects had also.
- While assaults occurred all over the Municipality of Anchorage, they happened with more frequency in Spenard, Fairview, and Downtown.

Information from four years of police files shows that the problem of sexual assault in Anchorage has discernible contours: most assaults take place indoors, between people who are not strangers to each other, with either or both parties having consumed alcohol. The attached tables, figures and map provide an overview of reported sexual assaults in the city from 2000 through 2003. The data come from a recently-completed report by the Justice Center that updates an earlier study released in 2003. The new study was undertaken by the Center in collaboration with the Anchorage Police Department.

The Justice Center study revealed that victims have tended to be young and female, with Native women victims in over 45 percent of reported sexual assaults. In a majority of the assaults—over 62 percent—the assailant was not a stranger to the victim. A majority of the assaults occurred indoors, with 45 percent taking place at the residence of one or both of those involved. Over 65 percent of the victims had used alcohol prior to the assault and close to 74 percent of suspects had also. While assaults occurred all over the city, they happened with more frequency in certain areas of town—particularly in Spenard, Fairview, and Downtown.

The data presented here are already two years old, but figures released by the FBI's Uniform Crime Reporting (UCR) program indicate that the rate of reported forcible rape (a more tightly defined offense than that reflected in the tables presented here) in the Municipality of Anchorage was 96.1 per 100,000 people in 2004. The national rate was only 32.2. These UCR figures are not directly comparable to those presented in the Justice Center study, but they show that the sexual assault rate in Anchorage continues to be extremely high. With the problem of sexual assault, it is also important to note that national data show that many assaults are not reported to the police, so it is possible that the figures collected represent only a limited picture of the problem.

Sexual Assault Case Processing: A Descriptive Model of Attrition and Decision Making

Abstract: This study examined the outcomes of sexual assault cases reported to the Anchorage Police Department between January 2000 and December 2003. The data include 1,052 cases involving one suspect and one victim (85% of all reported sexual assaults). Cases and charges were tracked through the Alaska Department of Law to determine what was referred, accepted, and convicted.

- Overall, 18% of cases were referred for prosecution. The most common referred charge was a sexual assault in the first degree. Seventy-nine percent of referred charges were sexual assault charges.
- Overall, 12% of cases were accepted for prosecution. The greatest point of attrition was from report to referral. Once referred, 68% of cases were accepted for prosecution. Sixty-eight percent of charges were accepted by the Department of Law as referred. The most common reasons for not accepting a charge as referred were evidentiary reasons. The most common accepted charge was also a sexual assault in the first degree. Seventy-five percent of accepted charges were sexual assault charges.
- Overall, 11% of cases resulted in a conviction. Once accepted, 87% of cases resulted in a conviction. Although convictions were common in accepted cases, accepted charges were often dismissed. While 87% of accepted cases resulted in a conviction, 59% of accepted charges were dismissed. Ninety percent of guilty findings were a result of plea bargaining. With plea bargaining, some charges were dismissed but a conviction was still secured. Fifty-six percent of convicted charges were sexual assault charges. The most common convicted charge was for assault, followed by sexual assault in the second degree.

A recent Justice Center examination of sexual assault case processing shows that close to 60 percent of cases referred by the Anchorage Police Department to the Alaska Department of Law result in a conviction on some charge—although not necessarily the original charge. The number of cases referred, however, is less than 20 percent of those reported.

Anchorage has a very high incidence of reported rape. Between 2000 and 2003, the rate of reported forcible rape in Anchorage was 163 percent higher than in the U.S. as a whole. Over the past twenty years, Anchorage has been consistently at or near the top of U.S. metropolitan statistical areas for rates of reported forcible rape.

The Justice Center examined the outcomes of all sexual assaults involving one suspect and one victim reported to the Anchorage Police Department (APD) between January 2000 and December 2003. In this article we summarize how the Alaska Department of Law disposed of these reported assaults, detail case and charge outcomes and discuss the reasons given by prosecutors for these outcomes.

Overall, 1,235 sexual assaults were reported to APD from January 2000 through December 2003. We sampled all 1,074 sexual assaults committed by one suspect against one victim (87.0% of all sexual assaults reported from January 2000 to December 2003). Data were collected on 1,052 (98%) of these reports. Of these 1,052, 188 (17.9%) were referred for prosecution and had reached final disposition prior to data collection. Offenses in these 1,052 reports included sexual assaults, forcible rapes, attempted sexual assaults, and attempted forcible rapes. As defined by the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Uniform Crime Reports, forcible rape is "the carnal knowledge of a female forcibly and against her will." Sexual assault is a less restrictive state-defined offense that does not consider the gender of the parties involved and does not require carnal knowledge.

For this article, we consider three stages of prosecution: referral, acceptance, and conviction. These stages can be thought of as formal decision points at which prosecutors record what has transpired with the case, and why that outcome resulted. Referral is the forwarding of charges by APD to the DOL. This is the initial stage of prosecution and the first stage at which prosecutors officially become aware of a report. Once a case has been referred to the DOL, it is screened for acceptance. More specifically, prosecutors will screen each charge within each case for acceptance. The prosecutor's initial screening decision for each charge is recorded with a screening disposition code which indicates in what fashion the charge did or did not move forward. At this decision point, in addition to disposition codes, reason codes are given to charges that are not accepted as referred by law enforcement. The reason code indicates the formal reason that prosecutors gave for the disposition of the charge in that manner.

Acceptance can be considered the second stage of prosecution, or the second formal prosecutorial decision point. At this stage prosecutors formally agree to move forward with criminal prosecution. Once a final outcome has been established, a final disposition code and potentially a reason code are attached to each individual accepted charge within a case. The final disposition code indicates the final outcome of an accepted charge. The reason code associated with this final disposition reflects the prosecutor's reason for the final disposition of the charge. A conviction is an accepted charge resulting in a finding of guilt. A finding of guilt can occur through plea bargaining or being found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt by either judge or jury.

Table 1 describes the number of cases reported, referred, accepted, and convicted. Of the 1,052 reported cases, 188 (17.9%) were referred to DOL and 127 (67.6%) were accepted. Finally, 111 (87.4%) of these 127 cases resulted in a conviction. Obviously, the point with the greatest attrition is from report to referral.

For the purposes of this article, two separate levels of analysis are used: a case-level analysis and a charge-level analysis. For case-level analysis, a case as a whole is the unit of analysis. With this level of analysis, we are concerned only with the most serious outcome at a particular stage. The second level of analysis, at the charge level, considers individual charges within a case, using the individual charge as the unit of analysis. Using this level of analysis, we are concerned with all charges at each decision point, not simply the single charge that received the most serious outcome. This distinction is important for understanding many of the results of this project.

From referral to acceptance, there is often cross-movement of charges within a case. While it is necessary that at least one charge be referred for any case to be accepted, the number of charges within a case need not be static from referral to acceptance or from acceptance to conviction. Law enforcement may refer many charges to prosecutors, but upon review of the case, prosecutors agree to move forward with prosecution on a subset of the referred charges (i.e., the number of accepted charges is less than the number referred). Similarly, it is possible that when law enforcement refers only a single charge to prosecutors, upon review, prosecutors feel that additional charges are appropriate (i.e., they create an accepted charge that was not referred).

As mentioned earlier, of the 1,052 reported sexual assault cases, 188 (17.9%) resulted in a referral to the DOL. Fewer than half (41.5%) of the referred cases included one charge; 76.5 percent had three or fewer charges. Overall, the 188 referred cases contained 434 referred charges. Table 2 shows the distribution of these 434 referred charges by charge type. One hundred and eighty (41.5%) of the referred charges were sexual assaults in the first degree. Further, 290 (66.8%) of the 434 referred charges were sexual assaults of some degree. Fifty-two (12.0%) of the referred charges were for sexual abuse of a minor; 38 (8.8%) were assault charges; 17 (3.9%) were kidnapping charges; and 37 (8.5%) were other charges. Examples of other charges included contributing to the delinquency of a minor, driving under the influence, and possession of child pornography.

Table 3 is a breakdown of referred charges by class. Over 90 percent (n = 394) of the referred charges were felonies. Almost half of the charges (48.6%) were referred as unclassified felonies, that is, the gravest crimes under Alaska statutes, carrying with them the harshest penalties. Under the statutes, sexual assault is taken very seriously. Further, when a report results in a referral, the charges referred for prosecution are at a high level of class severity and carry with them some of the most significant penalties exacted by the justice system.

All charges referred to the DOL receive screening disposition codes. Table 4 indicates the disposition codes that were attached to the 434 referred charges. Prosecutors agreed to prosecute 68.2 percent of charges as referred by law enforcement. "Prosecution declined" disposition codes were attached to 24.0 percent (n=104) of referred charges. Interestingly, 92.2 percent (n=400) of charges were either accepted as referred by law enforcement or declined.

Here we make claims about charges, not cases. As stated earlier, a majority of cases (58.5%) have more than one charge. It is therefore possible that at least one charge in a case progresses forward, while others are dismissed.

Only charges that were not accepted as referred receive reason codes. Thus, in our sample, the 138 charges not accepted as referred received reason codes. Reasons for not accepting charges as referred are shown in Table 5. What is important to note is the proportion of reasons, by type, given by prosecutors for a charge not being accepted as referred. At this stage, evidentiary reasons were the most typical reasons (45.7%) for not accepting a charge as referred. Discretionary reasons were the second most common reasons for not accepting a charge as referred—32.6 percent.

Of the 434 charges that were referred for prosecution, 330 (76.0%) were accepted, either as referred or as a different charge, while the remaining 104 (24.0%) were dropped. Also, 83 new charges were created by prosecutors from referral to acceptance. This means that there were a total of 517 charges at some stage of prosecution within these 188 cases (see Table 6).

We now briefly focus on the 104 charges that were declined for prosecution and the 83 new charges that were added by prosecutors. Half (n=52) of the 104 charges not accepted by the DOL were sexual assaults in the first degree and an additional 21.2 percent (n=22) were sexual assaults in the second degree. Over half of the charges that were not accepted by prosecutors were unclassified felonies and an additional 27.9 percent were class B felonies. Of the 83 charges added by prosecutors, 32 (38.6%) were sexual assault charges, 20 were sexual abuse of a minor charges, 6 were assault charges, 2 were kidnapping charges, and 23 were other charges. New charges added by prosecutors were most commonly class B felonies or unclassified felonies.

Acceptance

We now turn our attention to the 413 charges that moved forward from referral to acceptance. Within the case-level analysis, 127 cases of the original 188 moved forward from referral to acceptance (see Table 1). Stated differently, prosecutors agreed to move forward on 67.6 percent of the cases referred to them. Of the 127 accepted cases, 28.3 percent contained one charge and 70.8 percent contained three or fewer charges. Overall, 413 charges moved forward between referral and acceptance. Table 7 shows the charge type of these 413 charges. As with referral, the most common accepted charge was sexual assault in the first degree—36.6 percent (n=151) of the accepted charges. Further, 58.8 percent of all accepted charges were sexual assaults in some degree.

Table 8 shows exactly how charges moved from the referral stage to the accepted stage, for the 330 charges which were both referred and accepted. What is interesting here is the remarkable consistency with which charges fall on the table's diagonal: A charge referred and accepted as the same charge type will fall on a diagonal line from the upper-left to lower-right corners. We see that the vast majority of charges (92.4%) fall on this diagonal.

Table 9 provides the charge class frequencies for the 413 charges that were accepted by the DOL. Most charges were accepted as unclassified felonies. Furthermore, 86.9 percent of the charges in our sample were accepted at the felony level. Knowing that the vast majority of charges are accepted as referred, we could reasonably expect charge class to remain relatively constant from referral to acceptance—as Table 10 shows. For charges that were both referred and accepted, there is a great degree of class congruency between referral and acceptance.

Final Disposition

Once a final outcome has been determined for a charge, prosecutors attach a final disposition code. Table 11 shows the final disposition codes that were attached to the 413 accepted charges in our sample. What is immediately apparent is the large of proportion of charges that are dismissed by prosecutors. Of the 413 accepted charges, 243 (58.8%) were dismissed by prosecutors. Taken as a whole, 61.7 percent of accepted charges were later dismissed, including those for which no true bill was returned. Another point becomes clear from Table 11: For 124 of the 138 accepted charges that resulted in a finding of guilt, the conviction was a result of plea bargaining. This means that plea agreements were responsible for 89.9 percent of guilty findings in our sample. To state this differently: Only 10 percent of guilty findings were a result of court action.

Charges that were dismissed by prosecutors or charges for which prosecutors allowed a plea to an amended charge are given a final disposition reason code. These reasons are shown in Table 12. The most striking result in Table 12 is the degree to which discretionary reasons are cited by prosecutors. Of the reasons given by prosecutors for dismissing a charge or allowing a plea to an amended charge, 70.5 percent were discretionary in nature. Among discretionary reasons for charge dismissal can be the choice of another charge as more accurate, the consolidation of charges, or the suspect pleading to the essence of the offense.

Conviction

Of the 127 cases that were accepted by DOL, 16 cases (12.6%) resulted in no conviction. Most cases (87.4%) resulted in a conviction on at least one charge. When examining the charge-level analysis, 138 (33.4%) of the 413 accepted charges resulted in a finding of guilt. Table 13 is a frequency table of convicted charge types. Table 14 presents the changes in the types of charges between acceptance and conviction. We see much more variation about the diagonal than we did in earlier crosstabulations.

This is an indication that charge types are shifting between acceptance and conviction. Given that a large proportion of cases are disposed of by plea bargaining, this is not surprising.

There is a shift in charge class similar to the shift in charge type we observed between acceptance and conviction. Table 15 presents the convicted charge class, and Table 16 demonstrates the way charge class shifted between acceptance and conviction.

Sexual assaults in some degree formed 60.8 percent of charges that were accepted but failed to result in a conviction.

Conclusions

As we have seen, the picture of sexual assault case processing that emerges depends, in large part, on the level of analysis. Conclusions about the prosecution of sexual assaults by the DOL vary substantially depending on which level of analysis we consider. Figure 1 succinctly illustrates the points and rates of attrition for sexual assault cases and charges at the three formal prosecutorial decision points considered in this project. Figure 1 shows that a higher proportion of charges than offenders are being removed from the system at each decision point. Furthermore, results indicate that most offenders whose cases reach prosecutors are being held accountable in some degree; that is, they receive criminal sanctions. Another fact becomes clear when looking at Figure 1: The point of highest attrition is prior to prosecutorial involvement, with 82.5 percent of reported sexual assaults not referred for prosecution. This is by far the largest filtering that occurs at any formal decision point studied in this research. However, determining what precisely is happening between report and referral is beyond the scope of the present project.

In addition to the rates of attrition shown in Figure 1, there is a substantial change in the types of charges that flow through the three decision points examined in this research (Tables 8, 10, 14, and 16). The distribution of charges by type is relatively constant from referral to acceptance, but there is a demonstrable shift in the distribution between acceptance and conviction. The most dramatic shift is observed for the sexual assault in the first degree charges. At referral, charges for sexual assault in the first degree constitute 41.5 percent of all charges. At acceptance, this proportion is relatively unchanged at 36.6 percent. However, sexual assault in the first degree constitutes only 8.7 percent of convicted charges.

Upon first inspection, this result may be startling, but it becomes readily explainable when viewed in light of previous results. We stated earlier that the vast majority (89.9%) of convictions in our sample are a result of plea bargaining, which commonly results in convictions on less serious charges. We could therefore reasonably expect that many charges in our sample would result in convictions on charges that are less severe than those originally referred or accepted.

While the reason codes may not capture all possible reasons for charge dispositions, they offer useful insight into prosecutorial decision making. A comparison of reason codes between those given from referral to acceptance (Table 7) and those given from acceptance to conviction (Table 12) shows that there is a perceptible shift in the reasons attached to case dispositions at the respective decision points. From referral to acceptance, evidentiary reasons account for 47.5 percent of reasons given for a referred charge not being accepted as referred. From acceptance to conviction, this proportion drops substantially to 10.8 percent of reasons given by prosecutors. The opposite happens for the proportion of total reasons that are discretionary in nature. Between referral and acceptance, discretionary reasons account for 32.6 percent of the reasons given by prosecutors. This proportion jumps to 70.5 percent of reasons given for a dismissal or plea agreement to an amended charge.

Overall, we began with a total 1,074 sexual assaults reported to the Anchorage Police Department between January 2000 and December 2003 involving one suspect and one victim. Data were collected on 1,052 (98%) of these 1,074 reports. These 1,052 reports to APD resulted in the referral of 188 cases and 434 charges to DOL. These 188 referred cases resulted in the acceptance of 127 cases that included 413 charges. Prosecutors obtained convictions in 111 cases on 138 charges. Thus, the majority of cases resulted in a conviction on at least one charge. For referred cases, a majority of respondents were held accountable for their actions to some degree.

It remains true, however, that a heavy majority of reported sexual assaults are not referred for prosecution. More examination of this point in case processing—between reporting and referral—is urgently needed.

Since the greatest source of case and charge attrition is from report to referral, enhancing offender accountability may depend on increasing the proportion of reported sexual assaults that are referred to the Department of Law.

Abstract: This study examined the characteristics of all sexual assaults reported to the Anchorage Police Department from 2000 through 2003. Key descriptive findings are summarized.

- Victims tended to be young and female, with Native women victims in over 45% of reported sexual assaults.
- In a majority of the assaults — over 62% — the assailant was not a stranger to the victim. The most common non-stranger relationships included friends and acquaintances.
- A majority of the assaults occurred indoors, with 45% taking place at the residence of one or both of those involved.
- Sixty-five percent of victims had used alcohol prior to the assault and 74% of suspects had also.

Alaska generally, and Anchorage specifically, have been plagued by a high incidence of forcible rapes and sexual assaults. For the first time, solid data on victim and suspect characteristics, time and location of assaults and other details have been assembled and studied. These data contradict some of the more common assumptions regarding Anchorage's rape problem.

The data are important to designing effective rape prevention efforts. The Anchorage Police Department has recently secured new funding sources directed at reducing the occurrence of forcible rapes and sexual assaults: a $2 million federal grant and a $500,000 municipal grant. The question now is how to best allocate these resources. As discussed in the criminological literature, problem-oriented policing offers a promising approach.

Problem-oriented policing is a strategy in which police (1) define the problems to be solved, (2) diagnose these problems to identify their causes, (3) develop and implement interventions that address these causes, and (4) assess the efficacy of their interventions.

As defined in the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Uniform Crime Reporting (UCR) Program, forcible rape is "the carnal knowledge of a female forcibly and against her will." Attempted forcible rapes are also included in the UCR's measure. Figure 1 displays the rates of forcible rape reported to police from 1982 to 2002 for the United States, Alaska, and Anchorage. In 2002, the state of Alaska had the highest rate of reported forcible rape among the 50 states (79.4 per 100,000) and Anchorage had the second highest rate of reported forcible rape among metropolitan statistical areas in the U.S. (95.0 per 100,000). In 2002, the rates of reported forcible rape were 141 percent higher in Alaska and 188 percent higher in Anchorage than in the U.S.

In addition to forcible rapes, Anchorage also has a high rate of reported sexual assaults (although national comparisons are not available). The definition of a sexual assault is less restrictive than that of a forcible rape: sexual contact with another person, male or female, without the consent of that other person. In 2002, there were 254 forcible rapes and 85 sexual assaults reported to the Anchorage Police Department, for a total of 339 forcible rapes and sexual assaults. Furthermore, according to analysis done by Callie Marie Rennison for the Bureau of Justice Statistics, national statistics indicate that only 36 percent of forcible rapes, 34 percent of attempted forcible rapes, and 26 percent of sexual assaults are reported to the police. In light of this, the forcible rape and sexual assault problem in Anchorage is probably worse than that indicated by police statistics.

A joint project of the UAA Justice Center and the Anchorage Police Department has focused on gaining a better understanding of the parameters of the rape problem in Anchorage. Researchers collected data from all sexual assaults and rapes reported to the Anchorage Police Department in 2000 and 2001. These data contain detailed information on the assaults, victims, and suspects. The findings presented here reflect a quantitative perspective on those assaults that have been reported. It is important to note again that many sexual assaults go unreported.

The key findings from this study suggest that interventions will be successful in Anchorage only insofar as they take into account:

- Geographical and temporal concentration of reported sexual assaults and rapes;
- Demographic characteristics of victims and suspects;
- Types of victim-suspect relationships;
- Locations of assaults; and
- Use of alcohol.

Like all criminal activity, sexual assaults and rapes are neither geographically nor temporally random. In the data studied, reported sexual assaults and rapes were most likely to occur in five community council areas—Downtown, Fairview, Spenard, Mountain View, and, to a lesser extent, Northeast Anchorage (see Figure 2). More specifically, 10.1 percent of the sexual assaults and rapes reported in 2000 and 2001 occurred Downtown, 10.1 percent in Fairview, 13.4 percent in Spenard, 10.1 percent in Mountain View, and 9.0 percent in Northeast. Of the 424 assault locations reported in 2000 and 2001, 52.7 percent were in these five community council areas. Temporally, reported sexual assaults and rapes were most likely to occur on the weekends and from 10 PM to 6 AM. More precisely, 49 percent of sexual assaults and rapes reported in 2000 and 2001 occurred on weekends and 60 percent occurred between 10 PM and 6 AM.

and rapes occur is an important step in defining the problem to be solved. These results provide reliable evidence of the geographical and temporal concentration of sexual assaults and rape—rather than unreliable evidence based on hunches, experience, or common sense. This evidence suggests that police efforts to combat sexual assaults and rape ought to be concentrated on the weekends from 10 PM to 6 AM in Downtown, Fairview, Spenard, Mountain View, and Northeast.

At the same time, police efforts to combat sexual assault and rape need to take into consideration the demographic characteristics of both victims and suspects. The vast majority (95.5%) of victims were female, with most (93.2%) residing in Anchorage. Almost all suspects (99.4%) were male and, again, most (94.3%) resided in Anchorage. Most victims were Caucasian or Native, with Native victims vastly overrepresented (see Table 1). For reported sexual assaults and rapes, Natives were 7.6 times more likely than others to be a victim.

Suspects were more racially diverse than victims (see Table 2). Most suspects were Caucasian, but Native and African-American suspects were overrepresented in proportion to the general population.

The age of victims and suspects is shown in Figure 3. On average, victims were 5 years younger than suspects. For victims, the highest rate of reported sexual assault and rape was for 15-to-19-year-olds (6.76 per 1,000) while for suspects, the highest rate of reported sexual assault and rape was for 20-to-24-year-olds (3.75 per 1,000).

With these demographics characterizing those involved in sexual assaults, interventions should primarily focus on Anchorage residents rather than visitors. Furthermore, it is clear that victim-focused interventions must occur at an earlier age than suspect-focused interventions. The daily routines of 15-to-19-year-olds are substantially different than those of 20-to-24-year-olds. In particular, 15-to-19-year-olds are likely to be in school during the week, making schools an attractive intervention partner for victim-focused interventions. Developing suspect-focused interventions in schools, however, makes little sense as most suspects are beyond school age.

It would also make little sense to develop interventions without considering the relationships between victims and suspects. These relationships are described in greater detail in Table 3. According to the 2002 National Crime Victimization Survey, only 32.5 percent of sexual assaults nationwide and rapes are stranger assaults. In Anchorage, however, stranger assaults are far more common. In 2000 and 2001, 44.3 percent of victims who reported a sexual assault or rape to police did not know the offender beforehand. Among non-stranger assaults, the most common were assaults between casual acquaintances (30.4%) and those between well-known friends (27.1%). Unfortunately, little is known about the differences between stranger and non-stranger assaults. Consequently, the implications of this important finding are still unclear. It is likely, however, that important differences between stranger and non-stranger assaults do exist, requiring separate approaches to reduce occurrence. For example, it is possible that non-stranger assaults are more likely to occur in private places than stranger assaults.

Though we have not yet investigated these differences, our analyses clearly reveal that most sexual assaults reported to police (over 67.7%) occurred indoors (see Table 4). The most common indoor locations included the victim's residence and the suspect's residence. Of the sexual assault locations, 45.3 percent were the victim's residence or suspect's residence (or both), and an additional 9.9 percent took place in some other residence. In comparison, fewer sexual assaults occurred outdoors (22.0%). Common outdoor locations included fields, woods, parks, roads, streets, and parking lots. Few assaults occurred in vacant lots (5.3%), city parks (1.9%), or along park trails (0.5%). Overall, our data show that only 4.3 percent of reported sexual assaults originated in parks, fields, or woods and that only 7.3 percent occurred in these places. Most of these places were vacant lots. Moreover, while only one assault was reported as occurring in a bar, the original pick-up in 54 cases (13.6%) occurred in a bar—a finding that should be seen in relation to the figures on alcohol involvement in sexual assaults.

Consequently, strategies that target outdoor places, particularly ones that target parks or trails, will not appreciably affect the rates of sexual assault and rape in Anchorage. Although the municipality's Trail Watch Program instituted in September 2003 may reduce the fear of crime among trail users (and may reduce other forms of crime), it will probably have negligible effects, if any, on the occurrence of sexual assaults and rapes if these patterns continue. Different strategies must be used to lower the rates of sexual assault and rape in Anchorage, since most rapes occur indoors, in residences.

Finally, interventions must take into account that alcohol use was very frequent among both suspects and victims. During 2000 and 2001, 76.2 percent of suspects and 59.9 percent of victims had used alcohol. Table 5 displays victim and suspect alcohol use for 176 cases (cases with only one victim and one suspect and cases where both victim and suspect alcohol use was known). Both the suspect and the victim had used alcohol in 59.7 percent of these cases. Only the suspect had used alcohol in 13.1 percent of these cases. Only the victim had used alcohol in 1.7 percent of these cases and neither the suspect nor the victim used alcohol in 25.6 percent of these cases. Stated differently, almost 75 percent of these cases involved alcohol—either by the suspect, the victim, or both.

Overall, we have come a long way towards defining the problems to be solved, diagnosing these problems, and identifying their causes. Though the analyses are neither finished nor definitive, we nonetheless now have some reliable information that can be used to enhance the success of community and police rape prevention efforts. We ought to make sure that all interventions take into consideration that:

- Reported sexual assaults and rapes occur mostly on the weekends from 10 PM to 6 AM in Downtown, Fairview, Spenard, Mountain View, and Northeast;
- The highest victimization rates are for 15-to-19-year-olds while the highest offending rates are for 20-to-24-year-olds;
- 44.3 percent of victims are assaulted by strangers;
- 59.6 percent of known assault locations are private residences; and
- Alcohol use is very frequent among both suspects and victims.

It must be understood that police alone cannot solve the sexual assault and rape problem that has plagued Anchorage for well over 20 years. The data suggest that effective solutions to this problem need to be both suspect-focused and victim-focused (as well as event-focused). Many have dismissed the idea of victim-focused interventions for fear that it leads to victim blaming. The reality, however, is that we can educate about sexual assault and rape without blaming victims for sexual assault and rape: we educate homeowners about burglary prevention without blaming them for burglaries and we educate business owners about shoplifting without blaming them for shoplifting.

Disposition of Sexual Assault Cases

It is not possible to correlate the figures on reported sexual assaults in Anchorage in 2000-2001 presented in the first article in this issue of the Alaska Justice Forum with figures on felony case processing as examined in the Judicial Council felony study, but the Judicial Council felony case study does contain figures specifically related to cases involving sexual offenses that give an idea of how these cases are handled.

According to the Judicial Council study, a sexual offense constituted the most serious charge in 12 percent of the cases studied. Table 1 shows the dispositions for these cases. The data reveal that disposition charges are often lower, sometimes at the misdemeanor level. A majority of all cases, however, resulted in a conviction on a felony charge—and on a sexual offense charge, a disposition that results in placement on the sexual offender registry.

The statistical analysis presented in the Judicial Council study shows that cases involving sexual offenses were handled even-handedly, with no effects associated with ethnicity in charge reduction, pre-disposition incarceration or sentence. Some disparities did appear in association with case location and with type of attorney.

Abstract: This article summarizes findings on cases involving sexual offenses from the Alaska Judicial Council study Alaska Felony Process: 1999 (February 2004). (The full Judicial Council report is available online at http://www.ajc.state.ak.us/reports/Fel99FullReport.pdf.) The study examined the original single most serious charge and determined its final disposition. Twelve percent of felony cases included a sexual offense as the original single most serious charge. Charges for sexual abuse of a minor were more likely to be convicted as sexual offenses than sexual assault charges (and were less likely to be convicted as misdemeanors).

- The most frequent original single most serious charges included sexual abuse of a minor in the second degree (Class B felony), sexual assault in the second degree (Class B felony), sexual assault in the first degree (Unclassified felony), and sexual abuse of a minor in the first degree (Unclassified felony).
- Eighty-one percent of charges for sexual abuse of a minor in the second degree were convicted as sexual offense charges. Forty-one percent were convicted as sexual abuse of a minor in the second degree. Thirteen percent were convicted as misdemeanors.
- Fifty-five percent of charges for sexual assault in the second degree were convicted as sexual offense charges. Seventeen percent were convicted as sexual assault in the second degree. Thirty-four percent were convicted as misdemeanors.
- Fifty percent of charges for sexual assault in the first degree were convicted as sexual offense charges. Nine percent were convicted as sexual assault in the first degree. Twenty-two percent were convicted as misdemeanors.
- Eighty-four percent of charges for sexual abuse of a minor in the first degree were convicted as sexual offense charges. Twenty-one percent were convicted as sexual abuse of a minor in the first degree. Five percent were convicted as misdemeanors.

Assaults in Domestic Violence Incidents Reported to Alaska State Troopers

Abstract: This study examined 1,281 cases with an assault charge involving domestic violence reported to Alaska State Troopers in 2004, and excluded any cases reported to local or municipal departments.

- Eighty-two percent of reports were handled by three detachment areas: 32% in C – Western Alaska, 29% in D – Interior Alaska, and 22% in B – Southcentral Alaska. Troopers received 80% of the reports, while 20% were received by Village Police Officers, Village Public Safety Officers, or Tribal Police Officers. Eighty-one percent of the assault charges were in the fourth degree. Eighty-four percent of assaults were reported within 24 hours, and 89% of victims and 81% of suspects were interviewed on the day of the report.
- Seventy-six percent of suspects were male and 24% were female. On average, suspects were 33 years old and victims were 32 years old. The majority of assaults in domestic violence incidents (86%) were intra-racial. Fifty-seven percent of suspects and 32% of victims used alcohol. Overall, alcohol was involved in 59% of domestic violence incidents reported to Troopers.
- Most assaults in domestic violence incidents (75%) occurred between victims and suspects who were staying or living together. The most common forms of violence (disclosed by victims and documented by officers) included pushing, grabbing, or shoving the victim (in 48% of incidents), punching the victim (in 29%), and slapping or hitting the victim (in 28%). Weapons such as knives or guns were rarely used. The most common injuries included bruising (for 38% of victims), lacerations or bite marks (for 27%), bloody nose or lips (for 10%), and black or swollen eyes (for 10%). Forty-three percent of incidents occurred in the presence of children.
- Eighty percent of cases were referred to the Alaska Department of Law for prosecution, 68% were accepted for prosecution, and 54% resulted in a conviction. Overall conviction rates were slightly lower for female suspects, but conviction rates were generally not affected by victim gender or victim-suspect relationship.

Researchers, criminal justice system professionals, victim advocates, and policymakers agree that domestic violence is an undeniable urban and rural problem in Alaska and the nation. Detailed data on domestic violence incidents in the state are sparse, except for ongoing data collection by the Municipality of Anchorage. Now, a recent joint study by the Justice Center, the Alaska State Troopers, and the Alaska Department of Law looks for the first time at reports of assaults in domestic violence incidents made to Troopers for populations outside of Anchorage. Focusing on reports made in 2004 from communities served primarily by the Troopers, the study reviews a final sample of 1,281 cases with an assault charge involving domestic violence. Only reports to the Troopers were included in this study; reports to local or municipal police were not reviewed.

Some preliminary findings mirror national and Anchorage statistics: the majority of domestic violence assault incidents occur between victims and suspects of the same race, and the victim's home is the most common location of the domestic violence incident. On the other hand, both Anchorage data and the data from this study show a much higher use of alcohol by suspects and victims in Alaska than is reported nationally.

Report Characteristics

The majority of reports to Troopers (82%) were handled by three detachment areas: C—Western Alaska (32%), D—Interior Alaska (29%), and B—Southcentral Alaska (22%) (Table 1). While fifty-eight units received at least one report in 2004, over 90 percent of reports came from roughly 18 units or geographic areas (Table 2). Fairbanks Alaska State Trooper (AST) Enforcement and Investigation Units received the highest number of reports (23%) with Palmer AST Enforcement and Investigation Units and Soldotna AST Enforcement and Investigation Units having the second and third highest percentage of reports (19% and 9% respectively). Units in Nome received seven percent of reports while units in Bethel, Aniak, Kotzebue, and Kodiak each received four or five percent of all reports.

Troopers received 80 percent of reports while the remaining 20 percent were received by Village Police Officers, Village Public Safety Officers, or Tribal Police Officers. Reports of assaults in domestic violence incidents were most likely to come from victims (57%), though third parties, including family members, friends, officials, strangers and others, initiated 43 percent of reports.

The 1,281 cases in this study included a total of 1,803 assault charges and 604 other charges. The most common assault charges (81%) were for fourth degree assaults and fewer charges were leveled for third through first degree felony assaults. Thirty-one percent of cases involved other charges. The most common other charges included interfering with a report of a crime involving domestic violence, criminal mischief, reckless endangerment, misconduct involving a weapon, DUI/reckless driving, resisting arrest, misconduct involving a controlled substance, and criminal trespass.

The time interval between the incident, the report to Troopers, and the Troopers' response was short, even with transportation and distance issues. The majority of reports (84%) were made the day of the domestic violence assault incident and 97 percent of reports were made within one week.

From the 1,281 cases included in this study, we gathered information on 1,356 suspects and 1,523 victims, though information was not always available for every suspect or every victim. Over three-quarters of the suspects were male while only 24 percent were female. Victim ages ranged from under one year to eighty-four years old. Most victims were in the following age groups: 21–30 years (26%), 31–40 years (22%), and 41–50 years (19%). Suspect ages ranged from 10 years old to eighty-eight years old. The majority of suspects were adults (94%). Starting with the group of suspects 21 or older, the number of suspects in each age group decreased as age increased. More specifically, 21–30 year olds made up 31 percent of suspects, 31–40 year olds made up 28 percent of suspects, 41–50 year olds made up 19 percent of suspects, and suspects 51 years or older made up 7 percent of suspects. Most suspects were White (50%) or Native (47%) and most victims were also White (51%) or Native (47%) (Table 3).

The average age of suspects (33) was quite similar to the average age of victims (32). Thirty-nine percent of assaults in domestic violence incidents took place between suspects and victims in the same age group while 61 percent took place between suspects and victims in different age groups. The age groups most commonly shared by suspects and victims involved in assaults in domestic violence incidents included 21 to 30 year olds (38%), 31 to 40 year olds (27%) and 41 to 50 year olds (19%).

In contrast to the age groups of suspects and victims, the majority of assaults in domestic violence incidents (86%) were intraracial (occurring between suspects and victims of the same race). Of all intraracial assaults in domestic violence, 51 percent occurred between White suspects and White victims and 48 percent occurred between Native suspects and Native victims.

We examined alcohol and substance use among victims. Over a third of female victims (35%) and 27 percent of male victims used alcohol prior to the assault in domestic violence incident, but only two percent of female victims and less than one percent of male victims used illicit drugs (Table 4). We also examined alcohol and substance use among suspects. Fifty-eight percent of male suspects and 54 percent of female suspects used alcohol prior to the assault. Only three percent of male suspects and two percent of female suspects used an illicit drug prior to the assault. Overall, alcohol was involved in 59 percent of domestic violence incidents reported to Troopers. Nationally, for the period 2001–2005, 42 percent of victims reported the presence of alcohol or drugs during a domestic violence incident, while in Anchorage for the period 1989–2002 there was documented involvement of alcohol in 49 percent of the reported cases.

Many of the suspects (79%) remained at the location of the assault. Specifically, 76 percent of male suspects and 86 percent of female suspects were still at the scene of the assault when Troopers arrived. Troopers were able to interview 76 percent of male suspects and 89 percent of female suspects.

Eighty-one percent of suspects were interviewed on the day of report. Ninety-six percent of all suspect interviews occurred within one week of the report. Troopers interviewed 95 percent of the victims, with 89 percent being interviewed on the day of the report, and 98 percent of the interviews being completed within one week.

The total number of charges per suspect (including both assault and other charges), the number of assault charges, and the number of other charges are summarized in Table 5. On average, each suspect received a total of 1.78 charges, including an average of 1.33 assault charges and 0.45 other charges. Of the 1,356 suspects, 200 (15%) had multiple assault charges and 401 (29%) had at least one other charge. As a result, 580 (43%) of the suspects therefore had a total number of charges greater than one. Overall, the 1,356 suspects generated a total of 2,407 charges, including 1,803 assault charges and 604 other charges.

Despite the number and types of offenses suspects were charged with as a result of the assaults in domestic violence incidents, few suspects (just over 1%) had an existing domestic violence protection order filed against them by the victim at the time of the offense (Table 6). Likewise, few suspects were violating conditions of release or probation. Specifically, two percent of suspects were documented as violating a condition of release with their current charges. Another four percent of suspects violated documented conditions of their probation with the current charges. It is important to note that the percentage of suspects violating conditions of release may be greater than those reported here, because these conditions are not always documented in APSIN (Alaska Public Safety Information Network) and are not readily available to Troopers, or for our analysis.

Incident Characteristics

The presence of children during a domestic violence incident continues to be a serious concern. In this study, the victim's or suspect's children under the age of 18 were witnesses to 43 percent of the incidents (Table 7). In Anchorage during 1999–2002, 42 percent of domestic violence incidents occurred with children under the age of 18 present. Nationwide, in 43 percent of the incidents with female victims during 2001–2005, children under the age of 12 were residing in the household where the incident took place. Studies discussed by John L. Worrall in Crime Control in America: An Assessment of the Evidence highlight concern regarding children who are present during domestic violence. Exposure to such violence is associated with both child abuse and later delinquency.

Most assaults in domestic violence incidents (75%) occurred between victims and suspects who were staying or living together at the time of the incident. For the remaining quarter of incidents that occurred between suspects and victims who did not stay or live together, 34 percent occurred between victims and suspects who met in a public place, and 32 percent resulted from invitation by the suspect or victim. In 25 percent of incidents (where suspects and victims were not living together) the suspect was uninvited or forced entry, and in nine percent of these incidents the suspect entered through an open window or unlocked door.

The use of a traditional weapon such as a knife or a gun was extremely rare; each weapon was used in fewer than four percent of assaults in domestic violence incidents. While still fairly infrequent, suspects were more likely to throw something at the victim (9% of incidents) or hit the victim with an object (10%) rather than use a traditional weapon. Nationwide in 2001–2005, 19 percent of domestic violence incidents with a female victim reported a traditional weapon present, while 31 percent of incidents with a male victim reported a weapon.

We also gathered information about the presence of nine specific violent acts and seven types of threats in the assaults in domestic violence incidents. Only forms of violence that were documented as a result of victim disclosure or officer inquiry, rather than all forms of violence that occurred, were included for analysis. The three most common forms of violence disclosed by victims or documented as a result of officer inquiry included pushing, grabbing or shoving the victim (48%), punching the victim (29%), and slapping or hitting the victim (28%). Documented sexual assault of the victim occurred in only one percent of the cases.

Documented injuries to victims and emergency medical treatment data were also collected and analyzed. The percentage of victims who sustained the most common types of documented injuries included the following: bruising (38%), lacerations or bite marks (27%), bloody nose or lips (10%) and black or swollen eyes (10%). Overall, few victims (12%) received any type of emergency medical treatment for their injuries.

Legal Resolutions

Mandatory arrest in domestic violence cases has been in effect in Alaska since 1996. This law places additional requirements on law enforcement when investigating a domestic violence report and provides criteria for assessing whom to arrest if there are cross complaints "arising from the same incident." (See "Mandatory Arrest in Domestic Violence Cases" accompanying this article.)

Most of the cases (96%) were closed and referred for prosecution including cases that were closed by arrest (79%), and those closed and referred (13%). The remaining cases were closed after investigation (2%) or closed as unfounded (2%) in cases where a suspect was not arrested. On average, it took 6.30 weeks to close a case after it was reported, and 87 percent of cases were closed within 90 days.

An important component of this study involved tracking assaults in domestic

Mandatory Arrest in Domestic Violence Cases

Alaska's mandatory arrest statute was passed as part of the Domestic Violence Prevention and Victim Protection Act of 1996 with the support of prosecutors, law enforcement, and advocates for domestic violence victims in the state. Alaska Statute 18.65.530, "Mandatory arrest for crimes involving domestic violence, violation of protective orders, and violation of conditions of release," sets out conditions for arrest and minimum sentencing requirements. A law enforcement officer is required to make an arrest with or without a warrant:

> if the officer has probable cause to believe the person has, either in or outside the presence of the officer, within the previous 12 hours, (1) committed domestic violence, except an offense under AS 11.41.100-11.41.130, whether the crime is a felony or misdemeanor; (2) committed the crime of violating a protective order in violation of AS 11.56.740; (3) violated a condition of release imposed under AS 12.30.025, 12.30.027, 12.30.029....

The statute provides criteria for an officer to use when determining who is the "principal physical aggressor." A "principal physical aggressor" evaluation must be made in domestic violence cases if there are cross complaints "arising from the same incident." In rare circumstances, an officer may determine that no arrest should be made. An "authorization not to arrest" must first be granted by a prosecutor from "the jurisidiction in which the offense under investigation arose," and the officer must later report in writing why an arrest was not made. A prosecuting attorney is on call and available by phone to law enforcement in all parts of the state to provide an officer with an authorization, if needed.

Under Alaska law, there is a 20-day minimum sentence if the defendant is in violation of a domestic violence protection order, a 30-day minimum sentence if the defendant has a prior conviction for assault or domestic violence assault, and a 60-day minimum sentence if the defendant "has been previously convicted two or more times of a crime against a person or a crime involving domestic violence, or a combination of those crimes." Aggravating factors that can increase the length of the normal minimum sentence required by the statute include the presence of a child under the age of 16 during a felony crime involving domestic violence, as well as a domestic violence offense committed at a shelter or facility providing services to domestic violence and sexual assault victims. In addition, recent legislative changes have upgraded certain misdemeanor assaults to a Class C felony and have added a new provision to the animal cruelty statute dealing with "intent to intimidate, threaten or terrorize another person." Some domestic violence convictions also carry federal legal consequences. Under federal law it is "unlawful to sell or dispose of a firearm" to a person convicted of a qualifying domestic violence misdemeanor.

The terms "domestic violence and "crime involving domestic violence" have a broad meaning under AS 18.66.990(3) & (5). "Acts of domestic violence" as defined under the statute go beyond physical assault; acts of domestic violence also include burglary, criminal trespass, arson or criminally negligent burning, criminal mischief, terrorist threatening, violating a protective order, and harassment. In addition, the statute defines domestic violence as an offense committed "by [one] household member against another household member." The definition of household member encompasses more than persons living in the same residence. It includes many people who do not live together: "adults or minors who are current or former spouses, adults or minors...who have lived together, adults or minors who are dating or have dated, adults or minors who are engaged in or who have engaged in a sexual relationship, adults or minors who are related to each other up to the fourth degree of consanguinity..., adults or minors who are related or formerly related by marriage, persons who have a child of [their] relationship, and minor children in a relationship that is described [in the statute]."

violence incidents from reports to Troopers through case resolution by the Department of Law. Because we only examined referrals to the Department of Law (and excluded, for example, referrals to the Division of Juvenile Justice), the following statistics are not directly comparable to the ones reported in the previous paragraph.

When examining case processing with Department of Law data, we find that after Troopers close a case, the next decision is whether to refer the case for prosecution. Results show that 80 percent of the 1,281 cases reported to Troopers were referred for prosecution, 68 percent were accepted for prosecution, and 54 percent resulted in a conviction (Figure 1). Once cases were referred for prosecution, they had a high likelihood of being accepted for prosecution. Specifically, 84 percent of referred cases (N=1,030) were accepted for prosecution, and 67 percent resulted in a conviction (Table 8). Cases accepted for prosecution (N=869) had an 80 percent conviction rate.

In addition to examining case resolution rates for all assaults in domestic violence incidents reported to Troopers, we reviewed case resolution rates separately for male and female suspects comparing cases that had at least one male suspect to cases that had at least one female suspect. In our sample of 1,281 cases, 974 cases included at least one male suspect and 259 included at least one female suspect. Cases with at least one female suspect were slightly less likely to be referred for prosecution, to be accepted for prosecution, and to result in a conviction than cases with at least one male suspect. Of the 259 reported cases with at least one female suspect, 75 percent were referred for prosecution (versus 82% with a male suspect), 56 percent were accepted for prosecution (versus 73% with a male suspect), and 44 percent resulted in a conviction (versus 58% with a male suspect) (Figure 2).

Once referred for prosecution, 89 percent of cases with at least one male suspect (N=707) and 76 percent of cases with at least one female suspect (N=146) were accepted for prosecution. Once accepted for prosecution, the likelihood of cases resulting in a conviction did not vary greatly by suspect gender. Upon acceptance for prosecution, 80 percent of cases with at least one male suspect (N=568) and 78 percent of cases with at least one female suspect (N=114) resulted in a conviction (Table 9).

In addition to examining case resolution rates separately for male and female suspects, we examined case resolution rates separately for male and female victims. In our sample of 1,281 cases, 352 cases included at least one male victim and 925 included at least one female victim. Cases with at least one female victim were as likely to be referred for prosecution, as likely to be accepted for prosecution, and as likely to result in a conviction as cases with at least one male victim. Of the 925 reported cases with at least one female victim, 80 percent were referred for prosecution (versus 81% with a male victim), 59 percent were accepted for prosecution (versus 65% with a male victim), and 54 percent resulted in a conviction for both female and male victims (Figure 3 and Table 10). Although cases involving male suspects had higher case processing and conviction rates, case processing rates were quite similar for victims of both genders. No discernable pattern was found in case processing rates for domestic violence victims based on their gender.

Another variable examined in relation to case processing of assaults in domestic violence incidents was the relationship between the victim and the suspect. We examined the relationship between the victim and suspect separately for male and female victims. Most of the assaults in domestic violence incidents occurred between intimate partners. The most likely relationship identified was current or former intimate partner as seen in 67 percent of assaults in domestic violence incidents with female victims and 38 percent with male victims. The next most likely relationship was parents or children comprising 16 percent of the assaults in domestic violence incidents with female victims and 25 percent with male victims. Another 12 percent of assaults in domestic violence incidents with female victims and 22 percent with male victims took place between other family members (including siblings and extended family). Six percent of assaults in domestic violence incidents with female victims and 13 percent with male victims took place between roommates. Overall, most assaults occurred between intimate partners, and this was particularly true for female victims.

An examination of case processing for the different relationship types revealed some differences in the earlier stages of case processing. Regarding referral rates for assaults in domestic violence incidents, 88 percent of cases involving roommates, 86 percent of cases involving intimate partners, 72 percent of cases involving other family members, and 63 percent of cases involving parents or children were referred for prosecution (Table 11). Cases involving victims and suspects who were roommates or intimate partners were more likely to be referred for prosecution than cases involving other family members or parents and children. Of all referred cases, 87 percent of cases involving intimate partners, 82 percent of cases involving parents or children, 81 percent of cases involving other family members, and 74 percent of cases involving roommates were accepted for prosecution. Referred cases involving intimate partners were most likely to be accepted for prosecution, and cases involving roommates were least likely to be accepted for prosecution. Although some differences were found in referral and acceptance rates for different relationship types in assaults in domestic violence incidents, conviction rates for accepted cases were remarkably similar. Eighty-one percent of cases involving intimate partners, 81 percent of cases involving other family members, 80 percent of cases involving parents or children, and 77 percent of cases involving roommates resulted in a conviction, once accepted for prosecution. Despite differences in referral and acceptance rates for assaults in domestic violence incidents involving various relationships between victims and suspects, conviction rates for accepted cases were similar across the different relationship types.

In another examination of assaults in domestic violence incidents, we assessed the combined influence of gender and relationship on case processing. In this examination, cases were classified as intimate partner violence or non-intimate partner violence incidents. Incidents of intimate partner violence were defined as taking place between intimate partners and involving a male suspect and a female victim. Non-intimate partner violence incidents included all other combinations of suspect and victim gender and the various relationship types. (Few cases—1.5%—involved same-sex intimate partner violence. The characteristics of these cases will be included in a future study.) Results showed higher case processing rates for intimate partner violence incidents in the earlier stages of case processing. Specifically, 85 percent of intimate partner violence incidents and 75 percent of non-intimate partner violence incidents were referred for prosecution (Table 12). Once referred, 90 percent of intimate partner violence incidents and 79 percent of non-intimate partner violence incidents were accepted for prosecution. Again, no discernable differences were found in conviction rates for intimate partner and non-intimate partner violence incidents once they were accepted for prosecution. Eighty-one percent of accepted cases involving intimate partner violence incidents resulted in a conviction, and 79 percent of accepted non-intimate partner violence incidents resulted in a conviction. Conviction rates based on the total number of reports to Troopers of intimate partner violence incidents were higher (62%) than for all reported cases to Troopers of non-intimate partner violence incidents (47%).

A more detailed examination of legal resolutions explored differences in case processing rates for male and female victims in various relationships with suspects. Just as cases with male suspects tended to have higher case processing rates at each stage of prosecution, male victims tended to experience higher case processing rates across different relationship types. One exception to this trend was higher rates of acceptance for referred cases involving intimate partners with female victims (76%) relative to male victims (67%). Similarly, cases involving intimate partners with female victims had higher conviction rates (61% of accepted cases) than cases with male victims (53% of accepted cases) (Table 13). In sum, cases of assaults in domestic violence incidents investigated by Troopers had relatively high referral, acceptance and conviction rates overall, despite variation in rates by gender of the suspects and victims and relationships between them.

The findings presented in this article provide an initial description of case processing and conviction rates for assaults in domestic violence incidents in smaller communities across the state of Alaska. The full report containing more detailed descriptive analyses is published on the Justice Center website. Future studies may focus on comparisons of the data from the Anchorage analysis, this study, and nationwide reports. An important area to examine in more depth is factors affecting legal resolutions. More complex analyses involving multiple predictor variables are required to understand the many influential factors in case processing and conviction of assaults in domestic violence incidents. A growing body of data about domestic violence incidents will enable policymakers to focus on improving ways to deal with this critical issue.

Abstract: This study examined 267 cases with a stalking charge reported to Alaska State Troopers from 1994 to 2005, and excluded any cases reported to local or municipal departments. We also examined the legal resolutions for cases that were reported from1999-2004.

- Over 50% of reports occurred in B detachment (Southcentral Alaska) and D detachment (Interior Alaska). Three units (Fairbanks AST Enforcement, Palmer AST Enforcement, and Soldotna AST Enforcement) handled 49% of reports. Thirty-five percent of the charges were for stalking in the first degree and 65% were for stalking in the second degree.
- Most suspects (91%) were male and most victims (89%) were female. Most suspects (78%) were White and most victims (86%) were also White. On average, suspects were 36 years old while victims were 33 years old. Twenty percent of suspects had used alcohol, but only 2% of victims had used alcohol. Fifty-four percent of suspects were, or had been, in a romantic relationship with the victim. An additional 35% of suspects were friends or acquaintances of the victim.
- The most common forms of stalking included standing outside or visiting the victim's home (in 54% of charges), making unsolicited phone calls to victims (in 51% of charges), following the victim (in 39% of charges), threatening to physically assault the victim (in 36% of charges), harassing the victim's family and friends (in 28% of charges), trying to communicate with the victim in other ways (in 27% of charges), standing outside or visiting the victim's work (in 20% of charges), physically assaulting the victim (in 19% of charges), sending the victim unsolicited mail (in 15% of charges), and vandalizing the victim's home (in 13% of charges). Forty-five percent of behaviors occurred primarily at the victim's home, while 27% occurred primarily in cyberspace.
- Seventy-five percent of the cases reported between 1999-2004 were referred for prosecution, 55% were accepted for prosecution, and 40% resulted in a conviction on at least one charge. Cases with suspects who violated protective orders were 20% more likely to be referred for prosecution, were 19% more likely to be accepted, and were 41% more likely to result in a conviction.

Although the available data are limited, a recent Justice Center examination of Alaska State Trooper case files has revealed that the crime of stalking is probably greatly underreported by victims as well as underrecognized by law enforcement and hence not charged often enough in Alaska. A charge of stalking can be applied in a wide range of situations, and its parameters as a crime can be somewhat ambiguous for both victims and law enforcement. The available data show that a stalking charge is often made in conjunction with other charges, particularly when there has been a prior relationship—which is often the case, with stranger stalking fairly rare.

Stalking, by its nature and its legal definition, induces fear. Statistics from the National Violence Against Women Survey showed that even after the stalking ended, 68 percent of victims thought their personal safety had gotten worse, 42 percent were very concerned about their personal safety, 30 percent were very concerned about being stalked, and 45 percent carried something to defend themselves. Psychological counseling was sought by 30 percent of female victims and 20 percent of male victims.

Moreover, other studies have shown links between stalking and intimate partner homicide among female victims. For example, according to an analysis published in Homicide Studies in 1999, 76 percent of female intimate partner homicide victims had been stalked by their intimate partner in the past. Furthermore, 89 percent of female intimate partner homicide victims that were physically abused had also been stalked by their intimate partner in the past. Of all female intimate partner homicide victims, 54 percent had previously contacted police to report they were being stalked.

With funding from the National Institute of Justice, the Justice Center is working with the Alaska State Troopers and the Alaska Department of Law to learn more about the characteristics of stalking in Alaska.

In the first quantitative examination of the crime, data from all stalking incidents reported to Alaska State Troopers from 1994 to 2005 were collected to gather descriptive information. The research provides a first overview of a specific crime whose characteristics are not widely known beyond the justice community. The Alaska statutes defining the crime of stalking are presented on page 5.

Methodology

To conduct this study, Justice Center researchers examined the total 267 cases with a stalking charge reported to Alaska State Troopers from 1994 to 2005. (Alaska stalking statutes went into effect in 1993.) The final sample for analysis comprised 210 cases (Table 1) covering a total of 222 stalking charges, 211 suspects, and 216 victims. Case outcome data were gathered directly from the Alaska Department of Law for a sub-sample of the stalking cases—only those reported from 1999 to 2004 ($N = 92$).

Results

For the first four years included in this investigation (1994 to 1997), the number of reports averaged 22 per year. After that, the average number of reports dropped significantly, to 15 per year. Figure 1 displays the trend of reporting over time, from January 1994 to December 2005, using a three-month moving average. Seasonal variations from January to December in the trend of reporting were not quite statistically significant, but 23 percent of the reports were made in the months of June and October.

Over 50 percent of reports occurred in B and D detachments. B detachment includes five Alaska State Trooper posts (Wasilla, Palmer, Glennallen, Big Lake, and Talkeetna) while C detachment includes nine Alaska State Trooper posts (Coldfoot, Galena, Fairbanks, Nenana, Healy, Cantwell, Delta Junction, Tok, and Northway; see Figure 2). The units with the highest number of stalking reports included Fairbanks AST Enforcement (with 19% of reports), Palmer AST Enforcement (with 18% of reports), and Soldotna AST Enforcement (in E Detachment, with 12% of reports). Together, these three units had 49 percent of all stalking reports. Additional details are shown in Table 2.

Most cases (67%) were closed by arrest, meaning that at least one person was criminally charged, by a physical arrest, summons, warrant, or criminal complaint (see Table 1). Other cases (10%) were closed with a referral to the district attorney for a charging decision. Sixteen percent of cases were closed after the investigation because there were no suspects or because evidence was lacking. Only four percent of cases were closed unfounded (because there appeared to be no basis for the complaint). Finally, only three percent of cases were closed because the prosecution declined to pursue the case, even though a suspect was known.

The 210 stalking incidents reported to troopers from 1994 to 2005 included a total of 222 stalking charges. Seventy-seven (35%) of the 222 stalking charges were for stalking in the first degree (AS §11.41.260) and 145 (65%) were for stalking in the second degree (AS §11.41.270). For each stalking charge, thirty different forms of behavior were examined, shown in Table 3. On average, four forms of stalking behaviors were found per charge. The most common forms of stalking behaviors included standing outside or visiting the victim's home (found in 54% of charges), making unsolicited phone calls to victims (found in 51% of charges), following the victim (found in 39% of charges), threatening to physically assault the victim (found in 36% of charges), harassing the victim's family and friends (found in 28% of charges), trying to communicate with the victim in other ways (found in 27% of charges), standing outside or visiting the victim's work (found in 20% of charges), physically assaulting the victim (found in 19% of charges), sending the victim unsolicited mail (found in 15% of charges), and vandalizing the victim's home (found in 13% of charges).

The primary location for stalking behaviors was most often the victim's residence. As shown in Table 4, 45 percent of stalking behaviors occurred primarily at the victim's home. Cyberspace was also a common location for stalking behavior, with 27 percent of charges occurring primarily in cyberspace. An additional 10 percent of charges occurred primarily on public roads and parking lots.

The 210 stalking incidents reported to troopers from 1994 to 2005 included a total of 211 suspects and 216 victims. Most suspects (91%) were male and most victims (89%) were female. As shown in Table 5, most suspects (78%) were white and most victims (86%) were also white. On average, suspects were 36 years old while victims were 33 years old; with 13 percent of suspects and 20 percent of victims under 21, 18 percent of suspects and 22 percent of victims between 21 and 30, 37 percent of suspects and 33 percent of victims between Relationships between suspects and victims are shown in Table 7. Half (54%) of the suspects were, or had been, in a romantic relationship with the victim, as an ex-boyfriend or ex-girlfriend (29%) or current spouse (15%). In addition, 35 percent of suspects were friends or acquaintances of the victim, with acquaintances as the more prominent category. Very few suspects (4%) were currently living with the victim. Slightly over half of the relationships (55%) had ended prior to the stalking, and 58 percent had ended by the time the stalking was reported to law enforcement (these statistics were not calculated for strangers or family members).

Most suspects (55%) were not charged solely with a stalking offense. Stalking charges were often accompanied by other charges (Tables 8 and 9). On average, suspects had a total of 2.32 charges, including an average of 1.05 stalking charges and an average of 1.27 other charges. Overall, the 211 suspects were charged with 489 offenses (i.e., 222 stalking offenses and 267 non-stalking offenses). The most common additional non-stalking charges included assault, violating a protective order, and harassment. In addition to these additional charges, 38 percent of suspects had at least one aggravating factor (Table 10). The most common aggravating factors included violating protective orders and prior arrests for stalking the victim—present for 20 percent and 12 percent of suspects respectively. In addition, 22 percent of suspects had a prior arrest for stalking, assaulting, or harassing the victim. More specifically, 12 percent of suspects had a prior arrest for stalking the victim, 8 percent had a prior arrest for assaulting the victim, and 5 percent had a prior arrest for harassing the victim. Almost three quarters (74%) of the victims had previously contacted law enforcement to report harassing behavior by the suspect (e.g., to seek a protective order).

Overall, 75 percent of the 92 cases reported between 1999 and 2004 were referred; 55 percent were accepted; and 40 percent resulted in a conviction (Table 11). The likelihood of referring, accepting, and convicting varied substantially by legal factors (Table 12)—whether suspects violated protective orders, violated conditions of release, violated conditions of probation, had prior arrests for assaulting the victim, had prior arrests for harassing the victim, had multiple stalking charges, or had additional non-stalking charges. In general, these legal factors enhanced the likelihood of referral, acceptance, and conviction.

In particular, violating protective orders and having additional non-stalking charges were important legal factors. Cases with

Stalking Cases

The following individual case summaries, drawn from the sample studied in the accompanying article "Stalking in Alaska" illustrate a range of situations and circumstances in which the Alaska State Troopers issued a stalking charge. The details were taken from the AST case file. The initials of those involved have been changed.

B.W. reported receiving phone calls from S.M.; she reported being frightened for herself and for her family. S.M. had previously pled "no contest" to harassment charges and had been ordered to have no contact with her. At the time of the reported phone calls, he was on probation for the previous harassment offense. During the phone calls, S.M. stated that he was in trouble and needed B.W., that he loved her and found her perfect. In response to this report, the troopers charged him with first degree stalking.

T.K. reported that she was being stalked and harassed by her boyfriend's ex-wife, M.D. An order forbidding contact between M.D. and her former husband, P.D., was in place, but there was no provision forbidding contact with the girlfriend T.K. The two former spouses were involved in a child custody case.

T.K. reported that M.D. was making threatening phone calls; that she had destroyed T.K.'s personal property—including cutting up clothes—and had followed T.K. and P.D. to a mall and attempted to force her way into their vehicle. On another occasion she had followed the couple on a berry-picking trip.

M.D. was charged with second-degree stalking, criminal mischief involving personal property and misdemeanor assault.

N.C. called the troopers to report that P.M., her ex-boyfriend, was in her home yelling and causing a disruption. Another man, who was spending the night, and two of N.C.'s children were present in the house at the time P.M. arrived. She also reported that P.M. had been following her to her workplace and other locations. She had reported to the troopers at least once before. She said she had previously obtained protective orders against P.M. but had let them drop.

N.C.'s employer and a co-worker confirmed that P.M. would regularly appear at the workplace.

N.C. stated that she had made it clear that she no longer wanted a relationship with P.M. He maintained that they still had an active sexual relationship and that he often came to her house late at night. The two have a child together.

P.M. was charged with third degree assault, fourth degree criminal trespass, and second degree stalking.

L.K. reported that her ex-husband S.K. had telephoned her several times that day, leaving threatening messages on her voice mail. He had been served with a protective order two days previously. L.K stated that S.K. could be violent and that he had been trying to obtain a gun.

When contacted by AST, S.K. said he had only been trying to contact his daughter. He was charged with violating a protective order and stalking in the second degree.

E.R. called to report that her ex-boyfriend V.L. was pounding on her door and refused to leave. He ran off just before the troopers arrived and was caught shortly afterward.

He had been previously arrested for a crime involving domestic violence against E.R., stalking and criminal trespass. She had had several protective orders against him. She stated that he was violent when drinking and had assaulted her in the past.

The couple had lived together off and on for nine years but not for three years prior to this incident, although they had recently been sexually intimate and he had done work on her property. She stated she had told him she did not want a relationship with him.

For this incident, V.L. was charged with fourth degree assault and second degree stalking.

I.W. reported to the VPSO that she was being harassed and threatened by her ex-boyfriend J.T. He had been sending her obsessive letters for some time and was threatening to kill her. (Copies of some of the letters are in the AST file.) The two have two children together. They had last lived together three years previously, and she had indicated she no longer wanted a relationship with him.

It appeared that he had followed her from one community to another over a period of time. There had been previous incidents in other towns, including at least one in which the local police were called when J.T. attempted to take one of the children from I.W.

A witness confirmed that J.T. had made threats to kill others if I.W. would not be intimate with him again.

J.T. was charged with second degree stalking.

and were 139 percent more likely to result in a conviction. In other words, cases that included additional non-stalking charges were 2.4 times more likely to result in a conviction than cases that did not include additional non-stalking charges.

It is important not to over-interpret these results because some categories are represented by extremely low sample sizes (e.g., only two suspects had a prior arrest for harassing the victim). Nonetheless, it is interesting to see the variation in the likelihood of cases being referred, accepted, and convicted. For example, although only six cases had suspects who had a prior arrest for stalking the victim, all six were referred for prosecution, all six were accepted, and all six resulted in a conviction. By comparison, only 34.6 percent of other cases resulted in a conviction. When suspects had a prior arrest for stalking the victim, they were 2.9 times more likely to be convicted.

Comparisons with National Data

Few national statistics on stalking are available. The current primary source of information on the offense is the National Violence Against Women Survey (NVAWS). While the numbers are not directly comparable, in looking at the NVAWS statistics and the Alaska figures presented here, we can note several points. First, stalking seems even more underreported and, possibly, underrecognized by law enforcement in Alaska than in the country as a whole. Second, it is likely that this is particularly true among Alaska Natives. Third, it is likely that the prosecution of stalking is more effective in Alaska than nationally.

Based on NVAWS results, an estimated 2.2 percent of men and 8.1 percent of women in the United States have been stalked at some point in the past (for a total of over two million men and over eight million women). Annual stalking estimates (rather than lifetime estimates) are obviously much lower, with 1.0 percent of women and 0.4 percent of men stalked per year. Nationally, this equates to over one million women and over 370,000 men stalked in a given year. Although we must do so with great caution, we can use these statistics to estimate the prevalence of stalking in Alaska.

Using the annual NVAWS statistics that 1.0 percent of women and 0.4 percent of men are stalked (derived from a sample of 8,000 women and 8,000 men), and assuming that annual rates in Alaska would be similar to annual rates in the U.S., we can estimate that around 2,100 adult women and 900 adult men are stalked in Alaska in a given year (see Table 13). Further NVAWS estimates suggest that nationally 55 percent of female stalking victims and 48 percent of male stalking victims report to law enforcement. If similar reporting patterns emerged in Alaska, around 1,100 women and over 530 men in Alaska would report a stalking incident in a given year (see Table 14). Alaska's numbers are much lower than those for the rest of the country, something that may be a factor of underreporting by victims or underrecognition by law enforcement.

More accurate estimates of stalking prevalence and reporting patterns will be available only through additional research; nonetheless, even in the absence of this additional research, it is clear that stalking is greatly underreported in Alaska. In 2005, only 17 stalking incidents were reported to the Alaska State Troopers, and statewide from all jurisdictions only 30 stalking cases were referred to the Alaska Department of Law.

The underreporting may be particularly true among Alaska Natives. NVAWS statistics show that "American Indian/Alaska Native women reveal significantly more stalking victimization than women of other racial and ethnic backgrounds." While 8.2 percent of white women reveal being stalked at some point in their lifetime, 17.0 percent of American Indian/Alaska Native women revealed being stalked at some point in their lifetime. American Indian/Alaska Native women (and men) were the most likely persons to indicate having been stalked at some point in their lifetime—over two times more likely than for whites. This was true for both women and men. (It is important to note that the NVAWS figures do not represent actual reports to law enforcement, but rather self-disclosure of incidents that may or may not have been reported to the police.) By comparison, according to the study, the rates of stalking reported to Alaska State Troopers were 6.6 times higher for white women than for Native women and were 9.1 times higher for White men than for Native men (see Table 15)—rates contradicting national figures. Although these statistical extrapolations are fraught with untested assumptions, it is nonetheless clear that stalking is underreported in Alaska, particularly for Alaska Natives.

But, while stalking may be underreported in Alaska, prosecution seems to be somewhat more effective. The Alaska Department of Law secured convictions in the cases accepted more often than occurred nationally: while NVAWS results showed that 54 percent of accepted cases resulted in a conviction, 72 percent of the 51 cases accepted by the Alaska Department of Law between 1999 and 2004 resulted in a conviction.

Reporting and Early Intervention

While we do not have any data on why stalking is so underreported, law enforcement hypothesizes that stalking may be underrecognized by victims. NVAWS statistics show other factors may also come into play. Of the victims that did not report to police, 20 percent believed it was not a police matter, 17 percent believed that police could not help, and 16 percent were afraid of reprisal from the stalker. Of the victims that did report to police, 50 percent were not satisfied with police actions and 46 percent thought that police actions did not improve the situation.

Law enforcement might be trained to capitalize on opportunities for early recognition of stalking patterns. Efforts might also be undertaken to raise public awareness of stalking as a crime and report it as such and to further train law enforcement to recognize the signs of stalking. This will increase the likelihood that suspects who violate stalking statutes are reported to law enforcement and are appropriately charged.

Tensions mount over Palin's pick for attorney general

By Rena Delbridge

Published Thursday, April 16, 2009

JUNEAU — Legislators are expecting an impassioned argument today as they decide whether to confirm Gov. Sarah Palin's controversial choice for attorney general.

Many Democrats were outspoken already against the pro-gun, anti-abortion Wayne Anthony Ross, but the opposition became bipartisan and more vehement Wednesday morning after learning more about Ross' involvement Palin's pick for an open Senate seat.

Palin's office and Ross confirmed the governor consulted him before sending a list of three candidates to Senate Democrats to fill a vacant seat in that body. But a legal opinion issued Wednesday said that's not complying with state law.

Soon after, Ross told reporters in Juneau that the most important business before lawmakers was to stop worrying about what is and is not within the law and simply appoint a Juneau senator.

"It's conceivable (Ross) may be failing his first big test as an attorney general," said Sen. Hollis French, D-Anchorage. French requested the legal opinion. "In my view, it's damaging to his credentials as an independent attorney general."

The matter isn't as serious to others.

"I'm not going to make my decision based on something somebody said they heard," said Sen. Gene Therriault, R-North Pole. "Certainly, the areas of the statute that deal with this are a little bit murky. They are subject to some interpretation."

Sen. Joe Thomas, D-Fairbanks, said Ross' comments to reporters will influence votes, although he sees deeper issues.

"I did have concerns as we went along about his limited legal experience regarding constitutional law and petroleum tax laws," Thomas said. "I asked him about that directly, and he said he had none, basically. That verified my concerns."

Thomas said he's inclined to vote against confirmation.

"I strongly believe the governor has the right to pick somebody that's of the same philosophical opinions as she is," he said. "But I also have my concerns for where the state is headed, depending on some of those opinions the attorney general may have."

He and other legislators aren't sure Ross will be confirmed. Sen. Joe Paskvan, D-Fairbanks, said the prospective attorney general's comments on Palin's Senate seat appointees should be "a cause of concern to not just the Democrats, but Republicans, as to whether the appropriate procedure is being followed."

"I expect there to be objection," Therriault said. "It could be a very close vote."

Rep. Jay Ramras, R-Fairbanks, chairs the House Judiciary Committee, which also held confirmation hearings on the Ross appointment.

"The murmurs around the building is that his confirmation is in jeopardy, but at this point, I still intend to be a yes vote for him," Ramras said. "But I think this foretells the larger than life relationship that he is going to have with the governor and with the state. We're in for a colorful, bumpy ride."

Legislators will meet in joint session today to vote on a long list of Gov. Palin's appointments to state boards and commissions.

Some are expected to prove controversial, particularly a nominee to serve on the state's fish board.

Brent Johnson of Clam Gulch doesn't sit well with some people in the Interior, who fear they would be left without regional representation on the board and who would tip the board's balance in favor of commercial, instead of sport fishing, groups.

Therriault said the appointment upsets a traditional, but not required, board balance between regions, which makes the nomination "contentious."

He said he'll make a decision how to vote after the "impassioned arguments" on the floor today.

Senate vacancy flap entangles AG nominee

ROSS: Nominee's advice on filling seat threatens confirmation.

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com

JUNEAU -- Gov. Sarah Palin late Wednesday reappointed Tim Grussendorf to the open state Senate seat in spite of Senate Democrats already rejecting him for the job. The ongoing war between lawmakers and Palin over the seat is now spilling into other areas, including her choice for attorney general.

Palin's appointee for Alaska attorney general, Wayne Anthony Ross, is up for a confirmation vote of the Legislature today. Lawmakers said Wednesday that Ross' chances are being jeopardized by his role in the fight over the Senate seat, and that they now expect the vote on his confirmation to be close.

"The conversation (about Ross) in the halls today has changed as a result of the legal advice he supposedly provided Gov. Palin with respect to this Senate vacancy replacement. ... It brings the question back up again as to whether the attorney general ought to be neutral and serve on behalf of Alaskans as opposed to serving at the pleasure of the governor," said Anchorage Republican Sen. Lesil McGuire, who said she will still likely vote in favor of Ross.

The conflict is over a state Senate seat vacant since March 2, when longtime Juneau Democratic Sen. Kim Elton resigned for a job in the Obama administration. The law says Palin needs a majority of the nine Senate Democrats to approve her pick for Elton's replacement. They rejected her first two picks, Grussendorf and Joe Nelson. Palin then re-submitted the names of Grussendorf and Nelson on Tuesday night, along with that of Alan Wilson, a Juneau contractor opposed in part because he just became a Democrat on March 4. The governor said Senate Democrats could choose among them.

But legislative lawyer Pam Finley wrote a memo Wednesday saying "the governor's presenting more than one name at a time to fill a vacancy in the state Legislature does not comply with state law." Ross signed off on Palin submitting multiple names and he raised eyebrows in the Legislature with his reaction to a reporter Wednesday morning when first shown the memo calling it illegal.

"It seems to me the most important thing that can be done by the Senate is not argue with legal or illegal but to appoint somebody to represent Juneau," he said.

Anchorage Democratic Sen. Hollis French gave a speech on the Senate floor calling that a "very troubling suggestion from the attorney general that we ignore the law."

Ross also said Wednesday morning he needed to review the memo that said Palin's submission of multiple names wasn't legal. Then, late Wednesday, Palin sent a new letter to the Senate saying she wanted to "eliminate confusion" and make clear that she meant to forward the names of the three candidates in order of her preference -- not as one batch.

Palin said in her new letter that she was re-appointing Grussendorf. And said that, if the Senate Democrats reject him again, then she was appointing Nelson. And -- if Nelson is rejected again -- Palin said she was appointing Wilson.

The Legislature's legal opinion said it was unclear if Palin could appoint someone previously rejected, although it said if state law "were interpreted in line with the clear intent that the governor appoint someone who has not already been rejected, a second appointment of Mr. Grussendorf would also be improper."

It was also not clear Wednesday night if Senate Democrats might now vote on Grussendorf -- or if he has any more support than he did when they rejected him in a closed door meeting March 31. Some opposed Grussendorf because he was a registered Republican until just a few weeks ago, although Grussen- dorf says that was a mistake by the Division of Elections and he had meant to be registered as undeclared before switching back to Democrat so that he could qualify for the appointment to the state Senate.

Grussendorf is chief of staff to Bethel Democratic Sen. Lyman Hoffman, one of the most influential senators as a budget writer. Hoffman argues Grussendorf has experience with legislative work and could be ready to step in right away. He gave a little smile when asked if Grussendorf now has enough support.

"I don't know," he said.

There are just four days remaining before the Legislature is to adjourn for the year. The issue today will be whether Ross has majority support in the full Legislature needed to be confirmed as attorney general. Ross conceded his involvement in the flap over the open state Senate seat is going to make it harder.

"I get involved in this kind of donnybrook, I probably won't get any votes from the people that disagree with me. So I may be through tomorrow afternoon, who knows?" Ross said Wednesday morning. "But I'm hoping I'll get a chance to be confirmed."

Ross said a 1987 legal opinion indicates the method of Senate Democrats' rejection of Grussendorf and Nelson wasn't valid. The 22-year-old opinion challenges existing state law on confirmations -- which is the way many currently serving in the Legislature were confirmed, including Palin appointee Rep. Wes Keller.

Palin is not pressing the 1987 legal issue, but Ross said she is giving senators a chance to reconsider the rejections, as well as consider the new name of Wilson.

"One of the things I'd like to do as attorney general is, if confirmed, is to get more dialogue going between the people and quit having barbs thrown at the governor all the time when she's trying to get representation for the people of Juneau," Ross said.

Senate Majority Leader Johnny Ellis said Ross' confirmation is now in question.

"It's an open question in the minds of most people," said Ellis, an Anchorage Democrat. "It had looked like he would have plenty of votes to be confirmed in spite of some of the feelings. But this is Exhibit A against his statement that he would be an independent attorney general and stand up for the law."

There are more Republicans than Democrats in the Legislature, though. Republican Senate President Gary Stevens said he thinks the Republicans will stick with Ross. McGuire said she still believes it is a governor's prerogative to select an attorney general.

Re: Confirmation for the Position of Attorney General

Date: 15 April 2009

I have been advised that there is now a rumor circulating that I have advocated or implied that the law should be ignored when the Senate takes up the issue of approving the Governor's appointment to fill the vacant Senate seat for Juneau. I am also advised that someone indicated on the floor of the Legislature that I made such a statement. That rumor is totally false.

Since assuming the responsibilities as Attorney General I have been kept quite busy meeting with as many of you as I can before confirmation to answer any questions you may have. I have, unfortunately, been unable to meet with all of you. I am sure you would not vote to confirm an Attorney General nominee who advocated ignoring the law. That is why I have chosen to send you this memo attesting to the fact that I never made any statement that the law should be ignored.

Despite the hectic schedule of the last few weeks, I did read a legislative attorney's opinion on the Governor's submitting names to the Senate as well as the current law, and a 1987 Informal AG's opinion upon which the Governor has relied. The legislative attorney's opinion is interesting and contains some good points. I am not sure I agree with everything therein however.

I can assure you that if and when I am confirmed, this entire area of the law will be thoroughly analyzed and I will issue a report on my findings and opinion. I look forward to the chance to do so and set the issues, raised by the current vacancy in the Alaska Senate, to rest once and for all.

Be assured again, however, that I DID NOT and would not advocate ignoring the law.

I have worked in the field of the law for almost 45 years. I love the law and I love America's and Alaska's legal system. I have vigorously and zealously represented many different clients who have had legal problems large and small. Now Governor Palin has given me the opportunity to represent our great State. I bring to the task integrity, knowledge of the law and the legal system, the desire and ability to work hard for all of the people of Alaska, and a real love of this State. One other important attribute I have is a good sense of humor, sometimes a rare commodity these days.

I truly look forward to meeting the challenge Governor Palin has given me. I also look forward to working with you in the future in the best interests of our Alaska.

I ask that you give me the chance to do so by voting for my confirmation.

Dear General Ross:

According to the Daily News this morning, Sharon Leighow states that you have "signed off" on the submission by the Governor of three names, two of which have already failed confirmation, as legal under AS 15.40.350.

Is this a correct statement of your legal position on this issue?

Sincerely,

Senator Hollis French

MEMORANDUM April 15, 2009

SUBJECT: Appointment of three people to fill a vacancy in the state senate

TO: Senator Hollis French

FROM: Pam Finley
Revisor of Statutes

You have asked about the legality of the governor's presenting three names to fill a vacancy in the state senate. The short answer is that the governor's presenting more than one name at a time to fill a vacancy in the state legislature does not comply with state law.

AS 15.40.320 requires the governor to appoint "a qualified person" to fill the vacancy. AS 15.40.330 describes the qualifications of "the" appointee. If an appointee is rejected, AS 15.40.350 requires the governor to appoint "another qualified person." None of these statutes authorize the governor to present a list of persons for legislators to select, and all of them use language implying that only one person would be appointed at a time.

However, it is not the use of the singular in the text of AS 15.40.320 -15.40.350 that is important.[1] The problem with the governor's presenting three names is that the process set out in AS 15.40.320 - 15.40.350 is one of appointment by the governor and confirmation by members of the same house and party as the predecessor in office.[2] If the three names are just suggestions, then the governor has not "appointed" anyone. If the governor claims to have "appointed" all three as a unit, then the appointment would violate the state constitution because our constitution authorizes only one senator per senate district. Constitution of the State of Alaska, art. II, sec. 1, and art. VI, sec. 2. Essentially, the governor is using a process whereby she submits a list of names, and the Senate Democrats choose the person, i.e., make the "appointment."[3] This is not the process established by AS 15.40.320 - 15.40.350.

[1] In fact, in general in the Alaska Statutes, the singular number includes the plural. AS 01.10.050(b).

[2] Strictly speaking, the governor's "appointment" is a "nomination" because the person does not take office until confirmed. AS 15.40.340. However, the terms "appointment" and "nomination" are often used interchangeably.

[3] A similar process---appointment from a list---is provided for in some statutes, except that the appointment is made by a member of the executive branch. See AS 14.40.150(b),

The situation is further complicated by the fact that two of the three names (Mr. Grussendorf and Mr. Nelson) have already been appointed to fill this vacancy and those appointments have been rejected by the Senate Democrats. The appointment of Mr. Nelson---the most recent appointee---is clearly improper because AS 15.40.350 requires the governor to appoint "another" qualified person after one has been rejected, and Mr. Nelson is the same person, not "another." It is not as clear that the same applies to Mr. Grussendorf, but if AS 15.40.350 were interpreted in line with the clear intent that the governor appoint someone who has not already been rejected, a second appointment of Mr Grussendorf would also be improper.[4]

[4] If the appointment of a rejected appointee were allowed, the governor could simply alternate appointments between two persons.

MEMORANDUM April 14, 2009

SUBJECT: Confirmation of persons appointed to serve as head of an executive branch department

TO: Senator Hollis French

FROM: Jack Chenoweth
Assistant Revisor

As a follow-up to my memo of yesterday on filling a legislative vacancy, Kate Herring has asked for a memo that summarizes the legislature's role in the review of the appointment of persons for positions in the executive branch that are subject to legislative confirmation.

Constitutionally, the underpinnings of the legislature's role in the confirmation of certain executive branch appointees to hold the office are to be found in two sections of article III of the Alaska Constitution, sections 25 and 26:

> Department Heads. The head of each principal department shall be a single executive unless otherwise provided by law. He shall be appointed by the governor, subject to confirmation by a majority of the members of the legislature in joint session, and shall serve at the pleasure of the governor, except as otherwise provided in this article with respect to the secretary of state. The heads of all principal departments shall be citizens of the United States.
> Boards and Commissions. When a board or commission is at the head of a principal department or a regulatory or quasi-judicial agency, its members shall be appointed by the governor, subject to confirmation by a majority of the members of the legislature in joint session, and may be removed as provided by law. They shall be citizens of the United States. The board or commission may appoint a principal executive officer when authorized by law, but the appointment shall be subject to the approval of the governor.

(Emphasis added.)

There is substantially more history as to these two sections than is available for the legislative vacancy provision. The constitution reflects what one writer has called "unity in the executive" with responsibility assigned to the governor to ensure faithful execution of the laws. The check on the executive's authority rests with the legislature through its confirmation authority. In a challenge to the scope of the legislature's ability to confirm appointees to subordinate positions, in Bradner v. Hammond, 553 P.2d 1 (Alaska 1976), the Alaska Supreme Court reached the conclusion that > . . . the appointment of executive officers is an executive function; for without such a power, the responsibility for executing executive duties would be diffused and the goal of separation of branches of government, avoiding too great a concentration of power in one branch, would be defeated.

and, further that

> . . . under Alaska's constitution confirmation is a specific attribute of the appointive power of the executive. Other courts which have been called upon to resolve this issue have been unanimous in their holdings that confirmation is not a distinct legislative power, but rather a part of the executive power of appointment which has in turn been delegated in some specific instances by constitution to the legislative branch of government.

Bradner, at 6 - 7 (emphasis added; notes omitted).[1] What this has meant, through

[1] Key provisions of the Bradner decision examined executive and legislative authority:

> Appellee [the executive] contends that the appointment of executive officers is an executive function. We find appellee's contention most persuasive. In addition to vesting the executive power of the state in the governor, Section 16 of Article III provides that "the governor shall be responsible for the faithful execution of the laws." In view of the responsibilities imposed by Section 16, and the authority granted by Section 1, the governor is necessarily clothed with the power to appoint subordinate executive officers to aid him in carrying out the laws of Alaska. Thus, we conclude that the appointment of executive officers is an executive function; for without such a power, the responsibility for executing executive duties would be diffused and the goal of separation of branches of government, avoiding too great a concentration of power in one branch, would be defeated.
> . . .
> Given our conclusion that under Alaska's constitution the appointment of subordinate executive officers by the governor is an implementing legislation discussed later in this memo, is that the powers of an executive branch office subject to confirmation vest in an executive appointee once the person appointed has been issued a commission of office,[2] has taken the required oath,[3] and, if > executive function, it is then necessary to determine the nature of the legislature's confirmation powers. Here we are in agreement with appellee's analysis that under Alaska's constitution confirmation is a specific attribute of the appointive power of the executive. Other courts which have been called upon to resolve this issue have been unanimous in their holdings that confirmation is not a distinct legislative power, but rather a part of the executive power of appointment which has in turn been delegated in some specific instances by constitution to the legislative branch of government.

> In light of the nature of the legislature's power of confirmation, the question whether Sections 25 and 26 of Article III describe the outer limits of the legislature's confirmation authority, or whether the legislature may by statute require confirmation of other high-level, policy making officials within the executive branch, admits of but one resolution. As to this issue, we think the provisions of Sections 25 and 26 of Article III are clear and unambiguous. Thus, we conclude that Sections 25 and 26 mark the full reach of the delegated, or shared, appointive function to Alaska's legislative branch of government.
> The lack of ambiguity in Sections 25 and 26 of Article III of the Alaska Constitution mandate that this court interpret these express provisions as embodying not only the maximum parameters of the delegation of the executive appointive authority through the legislative confirmation function but, further, that they delineate the full extent of the constitution's express grant to the legislative branch of checks on the governor's power to appoint subordinate executive officers. In our view, the separation of powers doctrine requires that the blending of governmental powers will not be inferred in the absence of an express constitutional provision.

Bradner, at 6 - 7 (notes and citations omitted; emphasis added).

[2] See AS 39.05.035:

> Commission of office. After each appointment of a state officer, the governor shall execute a commission, which states that the person to whom it is issued is appointed and sets out the office to and the term for which the officer is appointed. The attorney general shall prescribe the form of the commission.

applicable, has furnished the required surety bond.[4] At that point, the individual may claim the office and exercise powers assigned to it, subject to the legislature's ability, in joint session, to confirm (i.e. to veto or disapprove) the governor's appointment.[5]

[3] The requirement of the oath is constitutionally mandated. Under article XII, sec. 5:

> Oath of Office. All public officers, before entering upon the duties of their offices, shall take and subscribe to the following oath or affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of Alaska, and that I will faithfully discharge my duties as . . . . . to the best of my ability." The legislature may prescribe further oaths or affirmations.

[4] The bond requirement is also statutory. See AS 39.05.050:

> Surety bonds. The principal executive officer of each department and subordinate officials shall furnish corporate surety bonds in the instance and amount required by law or determined by the governor upon recommendation of the commissioner of administration. The state shall pay the cost of the bond. The attorney general shall approve the form of the bond.

[5] See, also, Cook v. Botelho, 921 P.2d 1126 (Alaska 1996):

> The constitution delegates a part of the appointment power to the legislature. Bradner, 553 P.2d at 7. This delegation implies both a power, and a duty, to investigate the status of appointed offices. As stated by the Kansas Supreme Court:
> > Under all the circumstances, the Senate cannot shut its eyes to the facts as to whether the respective offices are filled; whether they are functioning under the law, or whether there is a vacancy therein. The Governor's communication sending the appointment to the Senate raises the question: What is the status to which the appointment refers? That question the Senate is obliged to determine for itself, and to make its own investigation in order to discharge its duty. If the investigation reveals the fact that the Governor has already made an appointment of an officer who has qualified, is in possession, is discharging the duties, and is receiving the emoluments of the office, the Senate must determine the course it will pursue in light of that fact. The Senate, which has official knowledge of all of the acts of another state department,

Procedurally, the legislature's role in confirmation is spelled out almost entirely in AS 39.05.080, the text of which is set out in full below:

> Procedure for all appointments. Except as otherwise provided in a law relating to the positions or memberships on a specific board or > may not close its eyes to an existing fact merely because the executive has failed to transmit a communication giving it the advice. The fact that the Senate is called upon to consent to or confirm appointments presupposes an investigation upon which to base its judgment as to whether or not it should confirm or reject the named appointee. It is a matter of common knowledge that the Senate of Kansas, likewise the Senate of the United States, may, and frequently does, investigate the character, fitness, and ability of the appointee submitted for its consideration. The Senate must be permitted to investigate on its own initiative, and without communication from the Governor, the status of offices; otherwise the Governor could fill and refill them at his pleasure by simply failing to advise the Senate. No other branch of the government exercises the power of investigation to the same degree as does the legislative branch. . . . We conclude that the Senate did not go beyond its powers in making the investigation concerning the offices held by the defendants, and, having satisfied itself, that it could properly exercise its judgment thereon. While it is the usual and customary courtesy of the executive to transmit such facts to the Senate, we believe it the better view to hold that the Senate may, on its own initiative, if it so desires, ascertain the facts upon which to base its deliberate and final judgment in confirming or rejecting appointees of the Governor.

> We find the reasoning of the Kansas court convincing. The legislature holds broad powers of investigation necessary to its law-making activities. The constitutional grant of the confirmation power implies a coincident power and duty to investigate the status of the appointed offices as well as the qualifications of the individuals appointed to those offices. . . . .

commission, appointment to a position or membership shall be made in the following manner:

(1) Each governor shall present to the legislature the names of the persons appointed by that governor; each governor may present the name of a person appointed by a previous governor; only presentment that occurs during the time that the legislature is in regular session constitutes presentment under this section. The governor shall, within the first 15 days after the legislature convenes in regular session, present to the legislature for confirmation the names of the following persons: (A) persons appointed to a position or membership who have not previously been confirmed by the legislature, and (B) persons to be appointed to fill a position or membership the term of which will expire on or before March 1 during that session of the legislature. If an appointment is made after the first 15 days after the convening of the regular session but while the legislature is in regular session, the governor shall immediately present to the legislature for confirmation the name of the person appointed.

(2) When appointments are presented to the legislature for confirmation,

(A) the presiding officer of each house shall assign the name of each appointee to a standing committee of that house for a hearing, report, and recommendation; standing committees of the two houses assigned the same person's name for consideration may meet jointly to consider the qualifications of the person appointed and may issue either a separate or a joint report and recommendation concerning that person; then

(B) the legislature shall, before the end of the regular session in which the appointments are presented, in joint session assembled, act on the appointments by confirming or declining to confirm by a majority vote of all of the members the appointments presented.

(3) When the legislature declines to confirm an appointment, the legislature shall notify the governor of its action and a vacancy in the position or membership exists which the governor shall fill by making a new appointment. The governor may not appoint again the same person whose confirmation was refused for the same position or membership during the regular session of the legislature at which confirmation was refused. The person whose name is refused for appointment by the legislature may not thereafter be appointed to the same position or membership during the interim between regular legislative sessions. Failure of the legislature to act to confirm or decline to confirm an appointment during the regular session in which the appointment was presented is tantamount to a declination of confirmation on the day the regular session adjourns.

(4) Pending confirmation or rejection of appointment by the legislature, persons appointed shall exercise the functions, have the powers, and be charged with the duties prescribed by law for the > appointive positions or membership. However, the duration of an appointment made during the time period between regular sessions of the legislature by a person who is not still the governor on the first day of the next regular session ends on the date during the next regular session that the sitting governor presents for confirmation an appointment to the office. For the purpose of applying laws that limit the number of terms or parts of terms that may be served by a member of a board or commission, the part of the term of office that is served under an interim appointment immediately before the member is reappointed under this paragraph is considered to be merged with the part of the term of office that is served immediately after reappointment so that the two periods of service constitute only one part of a term. The duration of an appointment made during a regular session of the legislature and not presented to the legislature by the governor during that session ends no later than the last day of that session. The duration of an appointment made during an interim by a governor who is not in office at the beginning of the next regular session of the legislature ends no later than the last day of that regular session unless the governor who is in office during that session presents the person's name for confirmation. The same governor may not appoint the same person to the same position or membership if the person's appointment ends because of the governor's failure to present the person's name for confirmation.

In my view, compliance by the legislature with subparagraph (2)(B) of this section is essential. Under that subparagraph, even if a standing or special committee to which an appointment has been referred has failed to make or has withheld making a recommendation regarding confirmation of the person appointed, legislative leadership (i.e. the majority leader assigned to maintain the order of presentation of nominations in the joint session called to confirm these appointments) is duty bound not to be diverted by the committee's failure or neglect of its duty. Instead, under the statute, the majority leader must move confirmation of the nomination so that the joint session may "act on the appointments by confirming or declining to confirm by a majority vote of all the members the appointments presented." In other words, once an appointee's name has been transmitted for confirmation consideration, the legislature is obliged to act; its consideration of a confirmation cannot be defeated by a standing committee's failure to recommend concerning the appointee. The exception would, of course, be if the joint session were, by proper motion, to table consideration or if the joint session were to adjourn before consideration of the nominee's confirmation and no other provision was made before final session adjournment for further consideration of the appointment.

I don't know whether it is material to your deliberations, but I have been asked to speak to the role a committee of referral to which an appointee's name is assigned should play, and I'll include those observations.

AS 39.05.100 suggests that the committee -- and, by extension, the legislature collectively in its joint session -- should evaluate the appointee's qualifications. Article III, sections 25 and 26, says only that appointees must be "citizens of the United States." For persons appointed to the State Board of Education and Early Development, a so-called section 26 board in that it is at the head of a principal department or agency, AS 39.05.065(a) additionally requires that "[e]ach member . . . shall . . . have been a resident of Alaska for at least three years."[6]

Individual executive department appointees may have other qualifications specifically required by law. So, for example, AS 16.05.010 directs that the commissioner of fish and game "shall be a qualified executive with knowledge of the requirements for the protection, management, conservation, and restoration of the fish and game resources of the state." Alone among department heads, educational requirements attach to the qualifications of the commissioner of education and early development (not an appointee subject to legislative confirmation), who, under AS 14.07.145(b),

> . . . shall be appointed without regard to political affiliation and shall have at least a master's degree with five years' experience in the field of education since receiving it, with at least three of the five years in an exclusively administrative position.

Under AS 26.05.160(a), the adjutant general, who heads the Department of Military and Veterans' Affairs:

> . . . must be a citizen of the state and must be a federally recognized general-grade officer in the Alaska National Guard or an officer who has the qualifications to gain federal recognition as a general-grade officer either in active status or in retirement status eligible for reappointment as a general-grade officer. . . . .

For the position of attorney general,[7] because that officer has broad power under

[6] For other regulatory boards and commissions, AS 39.05.100(a) directs in addition that

> (a) A person appointed to a board or commission of the state government shall be and have been before the last general election, (1) a registered voter in the state, if the appointment is made at large or (2) a registered voter from the judicial district, if the appointment is made from a specific judicial district. . . . .

These residency requirements do not apply to commissioners appointed to head the executive branch departments.

[7] The position of attorney general was an elected post in territorial days. A proposal made in the Alaska Constitutional Convention to maintain the tradition of a popularly elected attorney general under Statehood was rejected by the delegates.

AS 44.23 to represent the state in civil actions, to prosecute criminal matters, and to administer state legal services, though it is not explicitly so provided by law, I would submit that the appointee almost surely must have, and at all times maintain in good standing, an active license to practice law in the courts of this state.[8]

Evaluation of compliance with these various formalities aside, state law also contains several references to the following standard, which, if not entirely applicable to appointments to head the executive branch departments, provides some basis for guiding the legislature as it evaluates appointments:

> The governor shall appoint each member on the basis of interest in public affairs, good judgment, knowledge and ability in the field of action of the department for which appointed, and with a view to providing diversity of interest and points of view in the membership. . . . .

AS 39.05.060(b).[9] The specific requirements of "basic interest," "good judgment," and

> (a) A person may not engage in the practice of law in the state unless the person is licensed to practice law in Alaska and is an active member of the Alaska Bar. . . . .

and (b):

and Alaska Bar Rule 63 setting out that referenced definition:

> For purposes of AS 08.08.230 (making unauthorized practice of law a misdemeanor), "practice of law" is defined as
> (a) representing oneself by words or conduct to be an attorney, and, if the person is authorized to practice law in another jurisdiction but is not a member of the Alaska Bar Association, representing oneself to be a member of the Alaska Bar Association; and
> (b) either (i) representing another before a court or governmental body which is operating in its adjudicative capacity, including the submission of pleadings, or (ii), for compensation, providing advice or preparing documents for another which affect legal rights or duties.

[9] This language appears in AS 39.05.060(b). It may, arguably, apply only to the governor's appointments to multimember boards and commissions (rather than individual "knowledge and ability in the field of action" surely applies generically as a common standard for evaluation of all appointments.

After that, legislators are left to their own devices.

As to reasons for which legislative confirmation has been withheld, because I have generally not been involved in these discussions, either before a committee or in a caucus, I am not the best source of information; incumbent legislators who were present at past joint sessions in which appointments were challenged can better provide detail.

That said, I cannot recall an instance in which an appointee for "the principal executive officer" of a state department was not confirmed. In May 1991, Jack Phelps, one of Governor Hickel's appointees to the then-entitled State Board of Education, a section 26 board "at the head of a principal [executive branch] department," was not confirmed by a vote of 19 yeas to 40 nays. 1991 Senate Journal, pp. 1391 - 1392 (May 16, 1991). I believe that may well be the only individual whose appointment to a section 26 posts at the head of executive agencies). Substantially the same language appears in AS 16.05.221(a) with respect to appointment of members of the Board of Fisheries:

> (a) . . . there is created the Board of Fisheries composed of seven members appointed by the governor, subject to confirmation by a majority of the members of the legislature in joint session. The governor shall appoint each member on the basis of interest in public affairs, good judgment, knowledge, and ability in the field of action of the board, and with a view to providing diversity of interest and points of view in the membership. The appointed members shall be residents of the state and shall be appointed without regard to political affiliation or geographical location of residence. . . . .

(emphasis added) and AS 16.05.221(b) with respect to appointment of the members of the Board of Game:

> (b) . . . there is created a Board of Game composed of seven members appointed by the governor, subject to confirmation by a majority of the members of the legislature in joint session. The governor shall appoint each member on the basis of interest in public affairs, good judgment, knowledge, and ability in the field of action of the board, and with a view to providing diversity of interest and points of view in the membership. The appointed members shall be residents of the state and shall be appointed without regard to political affiliation or geographical location of residence. . . . .

department executive position or a section board position at the head of a state agency was defeated, at least in the recent past.[10] I do recall that the reason voiced about failure to confirm Phelps is that he was closely associated with promotion of home schooling and not particularly supportive of state public education initiatives. There may be some truth to that because the six other persons whose appointments to the State Board submitted by Governor Hickel at the same time were approved without objection.

[10] In this count, I do not include members appointed to the Board of Fisheries or to the Board of Game, who are not section 25 appointees, nor are they technically section 26 appointees; I do not count appointees for other regulatory or quasi-judicial boards and commissions, although I can recall several instances of fisheries board and game board members whose appointments were rejected.

Finally, I also can very distinctly remember the defeat of the confirmation of Governor Knowles's nominee, David Norton, to a vacancy on the well-remunerated Alaska Oil and Gas Conservation Commission in May 1996 (1996 House Journal, pp. 4574 - 4575) on a 30 - 30 tie vote, principally because, in furtherance to the court's observation in Cook v. Botelho that the legislature has a "duty to investigate the status of the appointed offices as well as the qualifications of the individuals appointed to those offices," many legislators questioned Mr. Norton's standing under AS 31.05.009(1) as a "qualified . . . petroleum engineer" as those legislators evaluated and applied Mr. Norton's credentials.

REPORT ON CONFIRMATION OF APPOINTMENTS

April 13, 2009

The Honorable Gary Stevens
President of the Senate
State Capitol
Juneau, Alaska 99801-1182

Dear President Stevens:

In accordance with AS 39.05.080, the Senate Judiciary Committee reviewed the following name with regard to confirmation:

Attorney General
Wayne Anthony Ross

There were no stated objections to the named individual. This does not reflect an intent by any of the members to vote for or against the individual during any further sessions.

Respectfully,

Senator French, Chair

Senator Wielechowski

Senator Therriault

Senator McGuire

Wayne Anthony Ross confirmation hearing

Tell us about yourself

What is your greatest strength going into this job

And your greatest weakness?

Who's your client as AG?

How do you handle a conflict between your duty to the Governor and your duty to the law?

Do you believe that the legislature has the authority to conduct investigations?

Have the authority to issue subpoenas?

You can put 50 lawyers to work on any legal problem .. which would you choose?

What is the number one public safety issue facing Alaska, in your view

What is your plan about that issue

SEX ASSAULT/SAM

Where does sex assault and sex abuse of a minor fit on that list?

You are aware that we have a rate of SA that is about two and a half times the national average?

Your department will be prosecuting both APD and AST cases

Aware that of the 1379 cases reported to AST, we're only producing about 217 convicted sex offenders.

What those number suggest to me is that we must do more than focus on the defendant who is charged and who is convicted. For every one of those there are some four rapes that take place without legal consequences.

What do you plan to do to improve the prosecution rate of SA and SAM cases both in urban areas like Anchorage and rural areas like Bethel and it's surroundings

FAMILY LAW/ DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

You were a divorce lawyer. Which side did you typically represent?

Do you think it's too easy to get a restraining order?

Do you plan to introduce legislation to change that?

How would you describe the cycle of domestic violence

Who's to blame for domestic violence

You will oversee lawyers in the Child Protection System

Think we have too many, too few?

Ever tried a case of child sexual assault

How about child pornography – ever had to defend one of those cases?

Most children are not abused by strangers – agree or disagree?

Do you think that state workers at what we used to call DFYS and now call OCS "work to destroy family unity"?

Think that DFYS workers are "frightening"?

NATIVE ISSUES / SUBSISTENCE/ANILCA

Do you think there are tribes in Alaska?

SB 148 refers to the federally recognized tribes in Alaska :

Should the state work with tribes on child custody matters

SB 96 "state" means a state of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the United States Virgin Islands, or any territory or insular possession subject to the jurisdiction of the United States; the term "state" includes an Indian tribe and a foreign jurisdiction that has enacted a law or established procedures for issuance and enforcement of support orders that are substantially similar to the procedures under this chapter or under the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act or the Revised Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act

Junkyard dogs? Is it your intention to "take on the feds and regain control of this state?" The feds have xx percent of Alaska: under what possible legal theory could you hope to take control of that land?

Why do Native people not support you?
Did you consider apologizing after Ted Nugent said during a fundraiser for you, "Can an Alaska Native look at me with a straight face and say he needs 20 caribou to feed dogs on a chain all day? I'd like to smash that SOB in the temple." A D N 8/26/02.

When you applied to be a Supreme Court Justice in 2007, you listed him as an example of the type of people that you can get along with.

While we're on that topic, you've put your name forward to be a judge twice, correct

I have two ratings sheets from those attempts, relating to your bar polls. For those who do not know, a bar poll is a survey conducted of other lawyers about their view of the qualifications of those who are applying to be judges.

The answers come from one to five, with one being Poor, two deficient, three acceptable, four good and five excellent. You were rated overall at 2.9 in one survey and 2.8 in the other. That's below acceptable.

According to the Judicial Councils statistics, 14% of applicants received an overall rating below 3. None were ever appointed to the bench.

LEGISLATIVE SUBPOENAS

You represented an state employee subpoena'd to testify before the Judiciary Committee
Did you file any objection to the subpoena?
File a lawsuit?
And your client did not appear
You simply did nothing
What is your view of a legislative subpoena?

MALPRACTICE AGAINST YOUR FIRM? twice.

Have you ever been sanctioned by a court?
Ever had an order to show cause issued against you?

You've never been publicly reprimanded by the Bar,,,are you willing to sign a waiver to release any bar complaints against you?

What is your view of DFYS (now called OCS) and their handling of child custody and child support order enforcement

Are you planning on hiring some junkyard dogs?

Are you planning on doing any house cleaning in the DOL?

RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT
What will be your role in resource development issues?
Do you have lawsuits in mind?
Changes to current statutes?
What can you tell us about the direction you intend to take the Dept?
You have campaigned in the past over fewer regulations to development –
What about – the BP spill?

FISHING
You've said you oppose IFQ's or any allocations for processors. A D N 4/4/02. Do you still adhere to that view? Will you act on it as AG?

DEATH PENALTY
You are opposed to the death penalty. Your new boss has indicated that she is in favor. How would you reconcile that difference should the death penalty be instituted in Alaska.

GAY RIGHTS

I want to ask about a letter to the Bar Association Newsletter in May of 1993, regarding the passage of a gay rights ordinance: "IT is a shame that you folks don't have some causes you could become involved in that are of benefit to society in general. Instead, you support degenerates." (Someone considered to be of a debased mentality or character)

Are homosexuals 'degenerates' in your view?

The Sup. Ct of Alaska in ACLU v. State held that it was a violation of the equal protection clause of our Constitution to deny the extension of job related benefits to same sex couples. Agree or disagree?

Here's some language from that case: "Irrelevant to our analysis must be personal, moral, or religious beliefs – held deeply by many—about whether persons should enter into intimate same-sex relationships or whether same-sex domestic partners should be permitted to marry. It is the duty of courts to "define the liberty of all, not to mandate their own moral code."

You claimed in a subsequent letter that you weren't calling anyone a name, that you were speaking of conduct.

None of you has done anything publicly (to my knowledge) to attempt to protect the millions of lives of innocent children killed each year through abortion, yet you collectively contribute $5000 to the cause of sexual perversion."

Hi Kate,

Here is Wayne Anthony Ross' application for the supreme court in 2007. He used the same application for the court of appeals in 2008. Also attached are his bar survey scores from 2007 and 2008. Ratings are defined as follows:

1 - poor
2 - deficient
3 - acceptable
4 - good
5 - excellent

The bar survey is one tool among many that Council members use. We also solicit comments in the bar survey. Comments are confidential and are not released publicly. They are typically very helpful. Survey respondents have the option of signing their comments and most do. The Council may not consider unsigned comments unless the comments are substantiated, corroborated, or acknowledged by the applicant. The Council shares each applicant's comments with each applicant after editing the comments to remove any information that might compromise the anonymity of the survey respondents. Applicants are told which comments were signed and which were not signed. Please let me know if you need more info or if you have any questions.

Nonlegal Employment

8. Describe major nonlegal working experience. If you had a business or association that has been discontinued, please note whether there are unpaid debts or claims pending litigation.

I have worked continuously since I was 12 years of age (except for four weeks in 1968 when I drove to Alaska). I averaged 20-30 hours per week in college and law school and 40-60 hours per week during the summers. I worked for the City of West Allis, Wisconsin, Department of Forestry and Public Grounds; Sears; U. S. Post Office; and Kohls Food Stores. Since graduating from law school all my employment (other than brief periods of State Military active duty) has been in the legal field although I hold an Alaska Assistant Guides License (No. 1519).

Legal Experience

9. Describe chronologically your legal employment since admission to law school. Please provide dates, name of employer, name of supervisor or person who can verify employment, addresses, the reason you left the position, and a brief description of type of practice (i.e., insurance defense, criminal, appellate, general, litigation, etc.) for each position listed below.

The Council will ask for comments from your current and former employers about your employment and your judicial qualifications. You may choose to list other persons as character and professional references in response to Question 20 of this application.

If the supervisor or contact person asks (in writing) that the letter be shared with the governor, the Council will send designated letters for each nominee. The applicant should not request a copy of the letter from the reference. References or letters not solicited by the Council are considered public (with few exceptions) and will be sent to the governor for all nominees.

15. Have you ever held public or political office, elective or appointive? ☐ Yes ☑ No

If so, state office, manner selected, and when and where held.

16. Please provide the Council with information that you would like the Council to consider about other legal and nonlegal organizations and clubs of which you are a member, including civic, charitable, religious, educational, social and fraternal organizations. Please indicate whether you participate in the organization's activities, or simply hold a membership. Your involvement in the community is one of the criteria the Council uses in its evaluations. The Council does not use affiliation with a particular group as a criterion except to the extent that it might raise questions of conflict of interest or would affect an applicant's ability to impartially apply the law.

See attached.

17. Indicate (Yes or No) whether you have ever:

(a) been arrested, charged with, pled guilty or nolo contendere to, or been convicted of the violation of any law or ordinance, or been requested to appear before any prosecuting or investigative agency in connection with any matter in any jurisdiction, including all traffic offenses, unless the fine was less than $50 and there were no other sanctions?

Writing Sample

21. Attach one example of a brief, memorandum of law, or legal opinion or similar example of legal writing (10-20 pages in length; 15-25 pages for appellate positions) prepared solely by you within the last five years. Please choose a sample that reflects your ability to do legal research and analysis. If you do not have a good sample of this length, include an excerpt from a longer writing. Make sure the sample contains sufficient facts to make it understandable. (Some reply briefs may not meet these requirements.) I do not write lengthy briefs or memorandums solo. Like the current justices, I regularly utilize law clerks if writing extensive briefs. I have attached an example or two of briefs done solely by me.
Please do not submit: (a) coauthored writing samples, (b) samples with confidential information unless redacted to remove such information, (c) longer writing samples.

22. Has any public sanction been imposed against you in response to a complaint, charge or grievance brought against you as an attorney or a judge? ☐ Yes ☑ No
Have formal grievance procedures been brought against you? ☐ Yes ☑ No
See Bar Rule 22(b) & (e) concerning public grievance procedures against attorneys, and AS 22.30.011(b) and .060(b)(3) concerning public grievance procedures against judges.
Have you ever been held in contempt of court? ☐ Yes ☑ No

23. I believe that I can bring a substantial amount of experience in a large number of areas to this position. I have been continuously employed since I was twelve years of age. My longest period of unemployment was the period of four weeks beginning after graduation from law school, admission to the Wisconsin Bar, my marriage, and our honeymoon drive to Alaska. I started as a newspaper delivery boy with the Milwaukee Journal, and since then have worked at the following jobs through high school, 4 and 1/2 years of college, and law school:
Bagger for Kohl's Food Store (one of my then bosses was Herb Kohl who is now US Senator from Wisconsin), Grounds Tender for the Milwaukee County Park Commission, Grounds Tender for the City of West Allis (Wisconsin) Department of Forestry and Public Grounds, "Momback[1]" for the City of West Allis Sanitation Department, chain link fence repairer and painter for the City of West Allis, Shoe Salesman for Sears (I had to face "da feet" every day), and Mail Handler for the United States Post Office. As a newsboy, I earned $6-$10 per week, plus tips, for working part time every day of the week. I started for the City of West Allis at, I believe, $1.10 per hour. Eventually I was making the princely sum of $2.65 per hour. As a shoe salesman, I made $2.10 per hour or 8% commission, whichever was more. When I started in private practice, I was billed at $45 per hour. When hourly rates were raised to $60 per hour, I had a real problem realizing that anybody could be worth $1 per minute! Now I am billing almost $4 a minute. It took me ½ a week when I began working to earn as much as I now make per minute. As a result of my experiences in earning a living while paying for my way through school, I have a real empathy for the average wage earner who finds himself or herself involved in my beloved legal system. That system is simply too expensive for the average person and I would like to work with the other justices and court administration to streamline court procedures and thereby reduce the expense of being involved in legal process. This State could use more judges who have had to make a payroll regularly, who know the real value of money, and understand the cost of litigation.

I was the first and only member of my generation in our family (including cousins, brother, and sisters) to attend and graduate from college. I taught courses at UAA entitled "Juveniles and the Law" (1973-74) and "Introduction to Criminal Justice" at the University of Alaska, Anchorage, for several semesters. I've been a guest lecturer at Marquette University Law School, the University of Alaska, Anchorage, and at Wayland Baptist College and I served as a member of the Board of Trustees (Secretary) for Lumen Christi High School from 1999 to 2001. One of our sons is a teacher, another is teaching for the USMC at Annapolis, and my wife is a former teacher. As a result, I have a deep appreciation for education, and the cost of such education.

I've been a member of the Alaska Peace Officers Association since 1970, have a daughter in law enforcement (Spokane Police Department) and, as stated, I have taught courses in criminal justice. In years past, I have represented Correctional Officers seeking to improve their lot with the DOC, as well as other police officers, and I believe that I have a good knowledge of the criminal justice system.

As a Family Court Master, I learned children's procedures and as a Court Trustee, I helped establish the computerized collection of child support that has developed into the Child Support Services Division of today.

I served as a Federal appointee to the Alaska Land Use Council Advisors' Committee as Vice-Chairman and Chairman and learned about land use in Alaska including management plans, and RS2477 problems. My firm handled the first McDowell case which guaranteed Alaskans equal hunting and fishing rights under our Constitution. I have traveled extensively in the Bush, and have conducted a number of trials there. I know and understand the problems of rural Alaska and Alaskans.

Alaska has an extensive population of military personnel and Veterans. I serve as Area Defense Counsel for the State Defense Force. I have served as a director for various veterans groups. Several years ago, I was told that I was the first civilian defense counsel to win a Court Martial case at Elmendorf Air Force base in 20 years. One of our sons is a Major in the USMC, having served in Iraq on 3 occasions. As a result, I understand the large percentage of Alaskans who have served or are serving now.

I have served on the Board of Directors of the National Rifle Association of America for over 20 years with people of widely divergent backgrounds. For example, I serve with Roy Innis (Executive Director of the Congress of Racial Equality) who has stayed in our home on occasion, Ted Nugent (Rock Star), and Charleton Heston (Actor). My clientele, too, is widely divergent. This has provided a plethora of experiences to a fellow like me who came from a quiet, Mid-Western background. As a result, I believe I understand people quite well and appreciate their varied background and philosophies. I am a good listener and have a good sense of humor, attributes that are too often lacking in today's society.

I enjoy writing, have an English Minor, and have written many published articles. A list is attached to this application.

I was told that when I was admitted, I was the 232nd attorney in Alaska. Now we have over 2800 practitioners. I have seen many changes over the years, the most notable being the increase in women attorneys. When I attended law school, there were only one or two females in my entire class. Now I understand that the number of women practicing law is approaching 50%. The increase in numbers of women involved in our profession is one of the real beneficial changes I have noticed over the years.

I believe that I have a reputation for honesty and integrity. I have had an enjoyable and stable life. I have been married to the same wonderful wife for 39 years and we have raised 4 great kids, all of whom are doing well. We have 3 sons (a teacher, a career Infantry officer, and an Engineer) and a daughter (a Policewoman). Alaska has been good to all of us and in the closing years of my legal career, I would like to try and give something back to the legal system I love.

I would appreciate your consideration.

Wayne Anthony Ross

JUBILATION AND FEAR - INDIAN COUNTRY

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Saturday, July 5, 1997

Author: Tom Kizzia Daily News Reporter ; Staff

One weekend last December, the sky above northern Cook Inlet buzzed with small planes. Native leaders and seven dance troupes from around the state were flying to a potlatch at the last isolated Dena'ina Indian village in Alaska's most populated region.

A banner was hung in the high school gym: "Welcome to Tyonek's Victory Celebration."

It was a double-barreled celebration.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals had just ruled, in a case involving the northern Indian village of Venetie, that village-based tribes in Alaska may have territorial jurisdiction over "Indian country." Only weeks earlier, a federal judge had upheld Tyonek's claim to be a historical tribe, the end of a 15-year legal battle.

"We were celebrating recognition of our sovereignty," said Tyonek council president Peter Merryman. "We had it all the time, but now they recognized it."

On an alcohol-free weekend, the villagers and their guests danced all night.

"The jubilation that greeted this Indian country decision was amazing to me. It was like a rebirth," said John Sky Starkey, attorney for the Association of Village Council Presidents in the Yup'ik region around Bethel.

But jubilation was far from universal.

In Juneau, the Legislature set to work assembling a $1 million legal fund to fight the Venetie decision. Critics said tribal governments would ultimately hurt Natives, economically and socially, and would segregate Alaska into Native and non-Native camps.

"When I first came up here 30 years ago, everyone was proud to be an Alaskan," said Anchorage attorney and sportsmen's advocate Wayne Anthony Ross. "Now the impression is people are being taught to be more proud of being a Native than of being an Alaskan."

With state lawyers predicting chaos and Rep. Al Vezey, R-North Pole, calling tribal sovereignty an "absolute evil" during a House floor debate, the battle over tribal government in Alaska was far from over.

For now, all attention is on the state's appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. Beyond that, both sides are talking about carrying their case to Congress. But thoughtful leaders on both sides are also beginning to worry about the difficulties that victory for their side would bring.

There may be no return to the political landscape that existed in rural Alaska before the Venetie decision.

Supreme Court to listen

Last November, Native rights lawyers won a stunning victory at the 9th Circuit. But now they face reinvigorated legal opposition and a Supreme Court that has not appeared inclined to expand the powers of Indian tribes.

In June, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the state's challenge of the Venetie decision. The state succeeded in getting the court's attention with a fusillade of legal arguments, supported by briefs from the Legislature, Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and 20 other states.

GET OUT OF TOWN - INDIAN COUNTRY

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Wednesday, July 2, 1997

Author: Tom Kizzia Daily News Reporter ; Staff

Tribal police officers escorted Jimmy Boan past the bell in front of the Moravian church and out of the village. In all directions, the tundra and the sea were a single flat line of white. The only civilization was at Boan's back.

An airplane waited. Boan didn't want to go.

He had been banished.

He was a white man living in Kipnuk with his Eskimo girlfriend -- until two years ago, when the Yup'ik tribal court expelled him as a troublemaker. Tribal officials said he pointed guns at people, brought in drugs and refused to follow the rules in the conservative, straight-laced village on the Bering Sea coast.

Boan said he was targeted because he refused to comply with an unconstitutional search of his baggage at Kipnuk's airport. He said they were after his girlfriend because she dared to criticize tribal leaders. He told the council they had no right to expel an American citizen.

They surrounded his house with snowmachines at night and cut off his electricity. When he finally left, he took a civil rights complaint to state and federal officials.

In Indian country, no issue cuts to the heart of self-determination like the power to decide who gets to live there.

For Indian country advocates, it is a fundamental right under federal Indian law and an essential tool of local control.

"Why do some of the villages have crime problems? It's because they leave it to an outside source -- they want the troopers to take care of them instead of taking on those problems themselves," said John Amik, administrator of the Kipnuk Traditional Council.

For Indian country opponents, the power to expel allows a tribe to set itself up as a foreign nation inside Alaska's borders.

"We moved out there for my girls to learn their language," said Boan, who now lives in Bethel. "I said, 'If this is the way you people are, I don't want them to learn your culture.' "

The ultimate power

Banishment was a traditional practice in many Alaska Native cultures before white civilization came, anthropologists and Native elders say.

In a world without prisons, it was the final solution for people who would not bend to the will of the community. After time alone in the wilderness, the exile might return, presumably contrite, or try to negotiate his way into another village. In times of war between tribes, banishment was a death sentence.

In the Lower 48, the power to exclude people and businesses from Indian reservations colors all relations between a tribal government and the outside world. It invigorates commercial and civil regulation: anyone crossing into Indian country agrees to play by the local rules or leave.

The Supreme Court has said a tribe "agrees not to exercise its ultimate power to oust the non-Indian as long as the non-Indian complies with the initial conditions of entry."

Before the federal appeals court recognized Indian country last November in Venetie and Arctic Village, tribal governments in Alaska appeared to have no clear authority to exclude anyone.

That was the legal hang-up in Alaska's best-known banishment case, in the Dena'ina Indian village of Tyonek across Cook Inlet from Anchorage.

In 1982, the Tyonek traditional council attempted to expel two white families, invoking a 40-year-old rule that read in part: "Any white men except government men or outsider coming in is allow to stay only 24 hrs. if weather permits them to go."

Tyonek's lawyers protested that it was really an issue of outsiders living in tribal housing without permission from the tribal council. But the white families' lawyers called it a "racial purification law." For many urban Alaskans, the Tyonek case became a powerful and damning symbol of Native sovereignty.

The eviction suit and a countersuit ground through the federal courts for more than a decade, climbing all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We thought Tyonek was going to be the case on Indian country and tribal status," said Kari Bazzy-Garber, who picked up the lawsuit in midstream and remains the village council's attorney.

Years of wrangling in the Tyonek case eventually focused on whether tribes in Alaska could be recognized under federal law. But the lawsuit was finally resolved last October, in Tyonek's favor, without the court having to face the difficult question of Indian country and the power to enforce that 24-hour ordinance.

Some Native rights lawyers say that's just as well. Aware of the publicity at stake in the Native sovereignty movement, they acknowledge that the power to exclude can paint tribes in an unfavorable light.

"I think there were some aspects to that case that made it not sympathetic," said Heather Kendall-Miller, a lawyer for the Native American Rights Fund. Kendall-Miller represented Venetie in the tax case that won recognition of Indian country in Alaska. "It's hard to be a sympathetic case to educate a state, when the issue involves what many people would consider racism."

Only serious power

Uncertainty over Indian country has not kept traditional councils from invoking the banishment tradition in rural Alaska. In fact, given the state's refusal to recognize tribal criminal authority, many villagers consider banishment the only serious power a village has to enforce its rules.

Two dozen expulsions have been debated by Indian tribal courts in the Interior in the past five years, according to William Walters, tribal court facilitator for the Tanana Chiefs Conference in Fairbanks. Eleven people were banished, most of them Indians.

"Tribes believe there's been Indian country here all along and have been acting accordingly," Walters said.

Most of the cases involved people shipped out of their own villages because they threatened domestic violence or refused to comply with local alcohol rules, he said. In a case involving a non-Indian who abused village elders, the threat of expulsion proved sufficient.

"It's not really for punishment, but to protect the health, safety and welfare of the tribe," Walters said. "The power is very rarely invoked, and in my experience there's always been a series of events that have been very disturbing to the community."

On the Kuskokwim Delta, a Native bootlegger who had been in and out of state courts brought booze home to the village of Quinhagak whenever he got out of jail, said village tribal administrator Anthony Caole. It was a hard decision, but the council finally ordered the bootlegger put on a plane, Caole said.

"Whenever he brought in alcohol, we had domestic violence, people drunk in public, people hurting themselves," he said. "The state didn't fix the problem, so we had to do something."

After a year, Caole said, the bootlegger's family asked that he be allowed to return. He has been back several months, performing community service projects. So far, there have been no repeat problems, Caole said.

Charges of racism

The power to exclude is used most often within the tribe. But when white people are banished, it can catch the outside world's attention.

In two cases that made newspaper headlines -- the 1995 expulsion from Kipnuk and the 1982 case in Tyonek -- non-Natives claimed to be the victims of racism and the cynical abuse of tribal law.

Such charges fell like sparks on dry tinder.

In Kipnuk, Jimmy Boan contends the dispute arose partly because his Yup'ik fiancee, Mary Tirchick, dared to speak out against the tribal council's leaders, questioning how they spent government grants and accusing them of hiring close relatives for all the best jobs. As a result, he said, the council cracked down on them during the tribe's airport searches for booze -- until Boan declared the whole search unconstitutional and refused to comply.

"If they had any proof of me selling drugs or booze," he said recently, they should have called in the Alaska State Troopers. "They said I was white guy and didn't belong there. They said they didn't have to listen to what the U.S. government said."

He stormed out of a court hearing before five tribal judges, complaining he wasn't allowed to cross-examine his accusers. He said he didn't bother to appeal, since the appeal would have ended with the traditional council.

"Everyone in that village is afraid of the tribal council," Boan said.

"Ridiculous," responded John Amik, the Kipnuk Traditional Council administrator.

"The only reason Jim Boan was kicked out was because of his actions that are against the rules and regulations of the community," Amik said. "All he wanted to do was whatever he wanted, freely, without respecting our laws."

Village leaders say Boan argued with neighbors, waved guns angrily and spurned tribal efforts to intervene when his behavior got out of bounds. Yup'ik tradition calls for leaders to counsel violators, Amik said, to "talk to a person over and over until they understand. . . . State statutes say they can't charge someone unless they see it (happen). We try to keep things from happening, before they occur."

In tribal court, Boan would have had a chance to cross-examine, but he kept interrupting while witnesses tried to tell their stories, Amik said.

"I think the larger issue was one of Mr. Boan not being willing to march to their drummer," said trooper Dan Donaldson, who found himself in the middle of the dispute.

Exile is a familiar custom in Kipnuk, a coastal village with 600 residents, though it hadn't been seen in a while. Amik's 75-year-old father, Luke Amik, who holds Kipnuk's elected chief-for-life position, said two brothers were banished years ago for keeping an especially good source of blackfish to themselves. Others were expelled, and later allowed to return, for making homebrew or consistently taking another person's dog team without asking.

The Boan expulsion triggered a small constitutional crisis. The traditional council cut off electricity to Boan's house for several months. Power was restored only after a state Superior Court judge ruled the local utility was subject to regulation by the Alaska Public Utilities Commission, which had received a complaint. Amik said the council couldn't find a lawyer at the time to argue that the utilities commission lacked jurisdiction in Indian country.

Donaldson said Kipnuk had a few "hotheads" but most of the leaders seemed "very intelligent and level-headed and willing to compromise."

On the other hand, a trooper investigation into village complaints against Boan never led to charges, Donaldson said. In February, however, Boan was sentenced to 20 days in jail for shoving Amik, spitting on him and punching him in the face when they ran into one another at a store in Bethel.

"Any time anyone from the Kipnuk Traditional Council came into Bethel, he would harass them," said former assistant district attorney Jim Valcarce, who prosecuted Boan. "He wanted to let them know they weren't welcome on his turf."

As for complaints about violations of his civil rights in the airport search, Donaldson said, the troopers applied a version of the Clinton administration policy known as "Don't ask, don't tell."

"We were supportive of the traditional council's effort to stop the flow of alcohol and drugs into their community," Donaldson said. "If that's their goal, it's righteous."

The Federal Bureau of Investigation also looked into Boan's charges and forwarded the results to the United States attorney and the civil rights division of the U.S. Justice Department, according to Anchorage FBI agent Bill Bounds.

The investigation has not been made public, but federal officials didn't step in. It would have been an especially tough call given the uncertainty about tribal powers in Alaska, said U.S. Attorney Bob Bundy.

"In Indian country, they have authority to throw anybody out. If there's no Indian country, people are free to exercise the right to travel," he said. "I don't even come close to knowing the answers to a lot of this, and I don't think anybody does."

Alaska Attorney General Bruce Botelho said the state usually doesn't intervene when adults complain that a government agency has violated their civil rights.

"I have fairly limited lawyer resources," Botelho said. "The policy call is largely dictated by whether an individual is able to vindicate his rights by himself" through a lawsuit.

"That's the typical weak response of a weak administration," said Wayne Anthony Ross, an Anchorage attorney and sovereignty opponent. Ross contends that the state should intervene in villages like Kipnuk where civil rights may be abused.

"They've taken it upon themselves almost vigilante style to search people. That's totally improper. The state needs to teach the village how to search for alcohol without trampling on other people's constitutional rights," Ross said. "There are Native lawyers who say the constitution doesn't apply in the village. That's as outrageous as bringing alcohol into a village that has outlawed it."

Trespassing or racism?

In Tyonek, villagers still wince at the mention of the expulsion case that started in 1982.

For years, they say, they were called racists when they left the village. In Anchorage, they say, they were refused hotel rooms and ordered out of taxis. Wear a Tyonek hat, the local saying goes, if you want to get in a fight in Anchorage. But they still insist they were misunderstood, that the case was about trespassing, not race.

"If I go to your house I've got to have permission to come into your house," said traditional council president Peter Merryman. Visitors to Tyonek should show the same respect, he said.

Erna "Bernie" Puckett, on the other hand, still insists it was a case of racial discrimination, at least on the part of a few village leaders. She winces, too, recalling her family's two-year battle to remain in their home in the village, including vandalism and anonymous late-night calls.

Puckett had worked at the Tyonek school for several years as a substitute teacher and tutor while her family lived in a nearby logging camp. When the camp closed, the family received village council permission to move into Tyonek and finish the school year. The Pucketts rented a house from a tribal member, who later sided with them in court. When the principal offered her the job of school secretary, they decided to stay beyond the agreed-upon year.

"The stories I could tell. I would not want anyone else to go through what I went through," said Puckett, who lives in Wasilla now. "It was discrimination. It wasn't OK for me as a white person to have the secretarial job."

Council members said the tribal housing was needed for tribal members in the village of 250 people. But others said the eviction was about the school job.

Jobs were few in Tyonek. Some tribal officials felt the school secretary should be a villager, according to Puckett.

For two years Puckett hung on to her job and her house, until troopers advised her to go.

"I want to think it was just a handful of people," Puckett said. "I had people come to my door saying they were no part of it, they didn't think it was right."

Puckett said her family has many happy memories of Tyonek. Her children starred in sports at the local high school. One of her sons is now married to a Yup'ik woman and lives in Dillingham, she said.

Some Indian country opponents continue to see the Tyonek case as a cautionary tale -- if not of anti-white racism unleashed by Native sovereignty, then of a village clique invoking the tribe's ultimate power of exclusion to achieve a small and divisive end.

In Tyonek, villagers refused to comment on any internal differences of opinion. But as the lawsuit evolved into a challenge to Tyonek's ability to govern itself under tribal law, the village closed ranks.

"They were just trying to protect what little they had," said Bazzy-Garber, the council's lawyer.

Tyonek once had a lot: a 29,000-acre land reserve, withdrawn by the federal government for the village in 1915 to fend off encroachments by commercial fishing traps. The reserve paid off in the 1960s with the discovery of Cook Inlet oil.

Leasing on the reserve made Tyonek rich by rural standards of the time -- though the council had to sue the Bureau of Indian Affairs to get control of a $12 million bank account. Some of the money was used to help launch the Alaska Federation of Natives. The village also built its own school and 60 houses for tribal members. The council passed a law that the new houses could not be leased or sold without council permission.

Those housing rules became central to the Tyonek banishment case.

The courts finally decided Tyonek has the right to set rules for tribal housing and that tribal officers enforcing those rules are immune from discrimination lawsuits. This was an internal tribal matter, the court said, whether or not Tyonek was in Indian country. The only remaining question was whether Tyonek had been a tribe in 1982, before the BIA issued a formal list of tribes. The U.S. District Court ruled last October that it had been.

In December, with a "Victory Celebration" banner still hanging in the log community hall from a weekend-long potlatch, council president Merryman told visitors that Tyonek's motivation has been to defend itself against the encroaching outside world.

That was the motivation in 1915, when Tyonek's land was protected in a federal reserve. That was what Tyonek's lawyers said they were attempting in 1982, when the 24-hour rule for whites hit the newspapers.

And that is the motivation cited today in Kipnuk -- and in Akiachak and Venetie, and many of the other villages hoping Indian country will give them the tools they need to defend their way of life.

Merryman said the people of Tyonek don't want to see their corner of Cook Inlet swallowed by the white Western society, as happened to their Dena'ina cousins across the Inlet in Kenai.

The village has shrunk in the past decade, from 250 to 150 residents. Some of the tribal houses are boarded up, their owners moved away to find work. But coal fields, natural gas development, state land disposals and the industrial plans of Tyonek's own village corporation all will bring people to the west side of the Inlet, Merryman said.

"We need to keep control over here," Merryman said. "Everybody knows the west side is going to be a boom town."

TWO DESTINIES, ONE LAND - INDIAN COUNTRY

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Sunday, June 29, 1997

Author: Tom Kizzia And Don Hunter Daily News Reporters ; Staff

One morning last summer, at the height of the king salmon run, Granville Brinkman awoke to find himself in Indian country.

The avid angler was staying in a big private camp on the Kanektok River in Southwest Alaska, where dozens of similar camps crowd gravel bars when the salmon run thick. Anglers from around the world pay guides thousands of dollars a week to cast into the clear, cold water.

But for the 540 Yup'ik Eskimo residents of Quinhagak, whose ancestors have lived near the river mouth for centuries, the tourist boom has been a bust. It has meant no money for the tribe -- just competition for fish and drinking water polluted by fishermen's feces.

Now the village is doing something about it -- and making history in the process. Quinhagak's leaders are coolly asserting jurisdiction as a sovereign Native American tribe over outsiders camped on the riverbanks they call Indian country.

Brinkman, a Seattle businessman, was alone in camp last June when the entire Eskimo tribal council showed up in boats with a summons to tribal court.

"I just went up there to fish," Brinkman said. "All of a sudden there was a problem."

Last November, all of Alaska suddenly found itself in Brinkman's boots. A federal appeals court upended conventional wisdom, ruling that village tribes in Alaska may have jurisdiction over their traditional lands.

Now the U.S. Supreme Court is considering whether to uphold that decision. But as sportfishermen near Quinhagak have discovered, this is not just a dispute among lawyers. In the eyes of many rural Alaska Natives, Indian country already exists on the Kanektok River and in pockets across the state.

Villages are setting up tribal courts, imposing tribal taxes, hiring tribal police officers, and enacting tribal laws that affect villagers and non-Native visitors aike.

Tribal councils are ignoring state gaming laws and running their own bingo and pull-tab operations. One tribal government even envisions a casino in downtown Anchorage.

Citing the special powers of Indian tribes, local councils skirt the Constitution and routinely search incoming visitors for alcohol and drugs. Troublemakers, both Native and white, have been kicked out of villages by tribal edict.

Tribal governments in Alaska say they are doing all this to save a culture on the brink of destruction. And they are doing it even though state and federal policy-makers have said they have no legal right.

The state's lawyers argue that Alaska's Natives don't have the powers of tribes in the Lower 48. Alaska has a bigger percentage of Native Americans than any other state. But their legal status was supposedly different -- the very word "tribe" evoked a history of treaties and Indian wars that had little to do with Alaska's isolated Eskimo, Indian and Aleut villages.

Above all else, Indian country opponents say, the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, which created the state's unique system of Native-owned corporations and awarded them $962 million and 44 million acres of land, did away with any possibility of Indian country here.

But last November, in a landmark ruling that stunned many Alaskans, a federal appeals court said yes, Indian country does exist in Alaska.

Alaska is now watching for the outcome of the state's appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

In Juneau, legislative leaders said the stakes over tribal sovereignty make every other issue, even subsistence hunting and fishing rights, pale by comparison. Indian country, they say, would create a chaotic patchwork of jurisdictions and deepen racial divisions.

The state's lawyers have been joined by 20 other states worried about the spread of a new tribes-without-reservations concept to the Lower 48.

Alaska Natives, speaking with increasing unity, respond that tribal government has never disappeared from the Bush. They say the decade-long tribal revival in rural Alaska is too far advanced to be stopped by court rulings or backstop acts of Congress.

"It drives me crazy when I hear people say the 9th Circuit has 'granted the right' for tribes to exist in Alaska," said Will Mayo, president of the Fairbanks-based Tanana Chiefs Conference. "This is not something that just suddenly appeared."

Both sides are raising practical arguments about how Indian country could hurt the state's broader interests or what it could do for rural communities. Underlying these concerns is a profound philosophical debate over race and history.

On one side is the national ideal of minority-group assimilation and the Alaska constitution's insistence on equality before the law. On the other is the historical right of America's first inhabitants to govern themselves and maintain a measure of control over their collective fate.

Suddenly, on the eve of the 21st century, the people of Alaska are faced with resolving one of the oldest unsettled arguments in American history.

It begins with a tax

Five months after Granville Brinkman was summoned to tribal court in Quinhagak, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals handed down the decision that touched off the wider debate over Indian country in Alaska.

The 9th Circuit case involved a tax imposed by the joint tribal government of Venetie and Arctic Village, the two northernmost Indian communities in the United States. The federal appeals judges concluded that the land claims act and transfer of land to village Native corporations had not, by itself, removed the land from the authority of Alaska's village-based tribes.

The land around Venetie -- and any other land in Alaska that could meet the 9th Circuit's new test -- was Indian country, where tribes had jurisdiction and the state did not.

The ruling appeared to sanction village tribal activity that had spread rapidly for a decade, often under the carefully averted gaze of state officials who may oppose tribal government in principle but find it the only practical way to administer modern life in much of rural Alaska.

But to many Alaskans, the ruling came as "a bolt out of the blue," as the state's lawyers said when they asked the Supreme Court to hear an appeal.

Suddenly, under the Venetie decision, the most basic social and political relations in Alaska have been called into question.

The state's lawyers predict chaos if all 226 recognized tribal councils in Alaska invent their own rules for taxation and regulation independent of the state. They quoted one of the 9th Circuit's judges, who glumly anticipated "a blizzard of litigation" as villages like Quinhagak test whether they, too, have tribal powers.

"In practically every area of government, Alaskans -- Native and non-Native alike -- must now ask themselves the basic question: who is in charge?" the state told the Supreme Court.

Native rights lawyers have tried to spin the issue the other way, saying the state's alarms are overblown. They say the 9th Circuit's test for Indian country is a good fit only for remote villages and is unlikely to affect most Alaskans.

Instead of demonizing tribes, they say, the state should be working with local councils to address the worries that gave rise to the Indian country movement: the future of subsistence, the absence of effective rural law enforcement, the unraveling of Native culture in a spiral of alcohol abuse, suicide, and powerlessness.

In remote villages where few non-Natives live, objections to tribal self-government can indeed seem harsh and overwrought. Even so, recognition of Indian country would bring profound change to Alaska.

An examination of state-tribal conflicts in the Lower 48 and dozens of interviews with Alaska tribal leaders, state officials and experts in federal Indian law suggest that Indian country would permanently alter ways of doing business here: shifting power away from Juneau, authorizing new kinds of taxes and regulations, and creating parallel legal systems that would be complicated to synchronize.

As Alaskans wait to hear what the Supreme Court will say, an ever-widening rift is opening on the Last Frontier.

The Legislature quickly passed a special $1 million appropriation to fight what legislators said was a challenge to the state's sovereignty. Republicans in the legislative majority cited such concerns as inconsistent fish and game rules and tribal taxes that they said might discourage rural development.

But many also expressed an underlying sense that Indian country is somehow un-American.

Sen. Robin Taylor, R-Wrangell, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said extra-constitutional baggage searches for alcohol, no matter how effective, were marks of a tyrannical dictatorship, potentially unfair to tribal members as well as outsiders. "Let's set up Juneau as a dictatorship and I'll bet you it would work real good," he said.

Native leaders responded that the concept of Indian self-determination is as old as the U.S. Constitution. In villages like Quinhagak and Venetie, the response has been bitter to the $1 million appropriation by legislators who could otherwise talk of nothing but budget cuts.

On the wall of the tribal office in Quinhagak is a picture of Gov. Tony Knowles, smiling in the midst of black-suited Quinhagak tribal police officers. Knowles, a Democrat, was narrowly elected with overwhelming support from rural Alaska. His opposition to Indian country since last November has stirred especially strong feelings of betrayal, said Frank Fox, 54, Quinhagak's tribal natural resources manager.

"If we'd known what was going to happen," said Fox with a rueful smile, "we'd have taken him hostage."

'The river is everything'

Many of the forces that brought Indian country to rural Alaska can be seen in a hand-painted plywood sign by the river in Quinhagak, 70 miles south of Bethel on the Bering Sea coast.

Faced by the unregulated growth of sportfishing on the Kanektok River, Yup'ik villagers put up the sign warning: "To Avoid Stray Bullets From Seal Hunters Do Not Sport Fish Beyond This Point." Anglers sometimes crowd upstream of the sign as if it were a Fish and Game marker.

The Kanektok River has sustained the Yup'ik people of Quinhagak for centuries. Today the river provides a small cash economy, salmon for the drying racks in summer, rainbow trout through the ice in winter, boat access to the mountains for caribou and firewood, water for drinking.

"This river is everything for us," Fox said.

The river and its low-water gravel bars belong to the state. The surrounding land belongs to the Native corporation and individual Native allotment owners.

Since 1980, sportfishing on the Kanektok has grown from nearly nothing to 5,800 user days in 1996, according to the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. The growth has meant trespassing on Native land, pollution, and development of permanent private and commercial camps on state riverbars that are supposed to have a three-day camping limit.

Nothing was being done about it, villagers say.

State troopers say they are too busy to attend to non-emergencies on the river.

Trespass complaints had to be filed in Bethel court. Few complaints were ever filed, and the offending campers were long gone before anything could be done.

The state could afford to send Department of Natural Resources officials to the river only once or twice a summer. Even then, visiting state officials had no authority to cite the long-term gravel-bar camps. Like the corporation, state officials could only file complaints in a distant state court.

Federal jurisdiction begins 20 miles upriver at the Togiak National Wildlife Refuge. But federal rangers who patrol the lower river said they were there only to provide information, which the illegal camps ignored.

In 1987, villagers charged upriver in their skiffs in a futile protest. They were angry their commercial fishery had been shut down but the outsiders could continue to sportfish.

"They just grabbed their rods and reels and ran off into the willows," Fox said.

Villagers asked the state Board of Fisheries without success to close the Kanektok to catch-and-release fishing, citing local cultural and religious beliefs. The practice of releasing fish may be high-minded conservation to anglers, but Yup'ik elders said playing with food insults the fish and drives them away from men.

"We've been treated just like the birdwatchers and rafters," said Anthony Caole, Quinhagak's tribal administrator. "Without a government-to-government relationship, we get no special standing."

Lately injury has been added to insult, as elderly people fell sick with diarrhea during the salmon runs. River water samples taken by tribal police and tested in Anchorage found high levels of human waste, with fecal coliform measurements spiking during the popular silver salmon season and in the spring, when high water reclaimed the gravel bars for the state.

Quinhagak has faced internal turmoil as well. Like the external modern problems on the river, the problems of cultural breakdown helped nudge the village toward tribal government.

A Quinhagak teenager died in 1987 after a drinking party featuring punch spiked with toxic cleaning fluid stolen from a school copier machine. Four years ago, another teenager was killed in a high-speed snowmachine accident after he'd been sniffing gasoline.

The village has voted itself dry under state alcohol law, and state courts took care of the worst alcohol-related crimes. But nobody was around to handle the smaller daily tragedies, the public drunkenness and senseless accidents and domestic violence, that can turn life in some villages into a battle zone.

"Predictions of chaos are one perspective," said Tanana Chiefs president Mayo, recalling the state's description of the consequences of sovereignty. "But from the village perspective, chaos already is occurring. I can't tell you how many potlatches we've had for our dying children."

Village officials found support for tribes in the work of a blue ribbon panel appointed by Congress in 1990 to investigate the cultural disintegration in many rural Native communities. The Alaska Native Review Commission concluded that tribal jurisdiction over alcohol control, community matters and law enforcement would strengthen village culture by allowing "Native solutions to Native problems."

"If you travel in Alaska, you find that the places acting the most like tribes are the places that are the most functional," said John Sky Starkey, a lawyer for the Bethel-based Association of Village Council Presidents who has represented Quinhagak in subsistence cases. "So if you really want a functional rural Alaska, it seems to me that Indian country is the way you get there."

In Juneau, however, legislators insisted that Native demands for greater local control be channeled through the state's own institutions.

"They'll do a better job there than we do here. I support them on that," Taylor said. "But run it through a municipal government. The only muster they have to pass is does it pass the constitution of the state of Alaska, which demands equal rights.

"The U.S. Constitution allows and encourages discrimination. The Alaska constitution demands equality," said Taylor, who appeared before the Alaska Federation of Natives in February to argue the case against Indian country. "This will all be thrown out. It could take 50 years. It cannot withstand the test of the Bill of Rights."

But in an era of state budget cutting, Quinhagak's leaders say their search for government help with village problems has brought empty rhetoric from the state.

Both Quinhagak's state magistrate and its village public safety officer, who reports to the troopers, have resigned. The magistrate isn't being replaced, and replacing the VPSO won't be easy: that program is chronically underfunded, with no money to hire an officer in one of four villages authorized. In Quinhagak, local law enforcement is now in the hands of five tribal police officers.

The Department of Environmental Conservation was unable to respond to years of village complaints about fecal pollution. "We've lost 50 percent of our general fund budget in the last five years. We cannot deliver that kind of public health service everywhere it's needed," said DEC commissioner Michele Brown. The tribe went to the federal Environmental Protection Agency for money to do its own water testing.

The Department of Fish and Game was unable to monitor spawning escapements in the Kanektok, despite biologists' concerns about increased fishing pressure. So the tribe assembled federal grants worth $75,000 to build a salmon-counting tower, which will be staffed by villagers with technical oversight from the state Department of Fish and Game.

"For a long time, the state has wanted to do an escapement count on the Kanektok, but we didn't have enough money," said Fish and Game research biologist Doug Molyneaux. "With this and other cooperative projects on the Kuskokwim, we've more than doubled the number of escapement projects we have."

And as state revenue sharing to municipalities shrank each year, new sources of money opened to tribal governments through federal self-determination programs.

When the Quinhagak tribal council was formally revived in 1993, the major goal at first was to tap federal grants for village jobs, concedes council president Wassilie Bavilla.

In a typical turn of events, the initial push came from a local resident, Bavilla, who had attended boarding school in Oklahoma and was familiar with tribal governments in the Lower 48.

The tribe hired as its administrator a non-Native married to a villager. Anthony Caole, who had studied the new tribal movement as part of a rural development program at the University of Alaska Fairbanks, started drafting personnel policies and ordinance codes.

From an initial $30,000 administrative grant, the tribe has grown to handle a payroll of more than $1 million a year. The city council has been eclipsed, contracting with the tribe to handle all local services.

The tribe soon turned its attention to illegal sportfishing camps like the one where Granville Brinkman was a guest.

The camp had been set up by Mark Smith, an Anchorage fishing guide. Smith had been told by a tribal police officer that he was camped on Native corporation land.

"I said I beg to differ. They have no right to go in on state property and kick us out," Smith said. "Everything used to be fine out there, but then the village goes from municipal government to tribal rule and things started to get ugly."

Eventually a state official flew out from Anchorage and said the tribe was right about the gravel bar being above the high-water line, making it Native land. By that time, however, Smith had left the Kanektok. He'd had a second run-in with tribal police -- this time over alcohol and a fistfight with another guide at a hot fishing hole.

So it was left to Brinkman to settle a $900 account with the tribe and move the camp.

"The first encounter was a little tense, but we came to an agreement," Brinkman said. "To me, police are police. But with the corporation and the tribe, that is somewhat confusing."

Another tribal law required honeybuckets for human waste in camps along the river. Most fishermen happily agreed to drop their waste at the airport, Caole said. In what could be an interesting test of Indian country, the tribe will cite violators on state-owned gravel bars this summer.

This summer, one of the "informational" federal rangers on the lower river will be a deputized tribal police officer. The refuge had tried to hire a villager, Caole said, but ran into a local stigma against anyone from Quinhagak wearing a federal uniform.

Eventually, through signed three-way agreements with the state and federal governments, Quinhagak hopes to be able to enforce state and federal rules along the river, Caole said.

"Nobody's talking about trying to assume exclusive management of resources," Caole said. "We just want a meaningful role."

Meanwhile, the new tribal court has been busy with internal matters. Judges banished a repeat-offender bootlegger and clamped down on public drinking. Domestic violence cases have practically disappeared because people are mortified showing up before tribal judges, said Curtis Abalama, who resigned in May after serving six years as the village public safety officer.

"It used to be when the weather is warming up, we'd see more drunks," said John Smith, a former state magistrate who was appointed the tribe's chief justice. "I used to see families, their kids crying. I don't see it now."

A few villages with a more radical interpretation of their sovereignty have had well-publicized clashes with state troopers over the handling of more serious crimes. But Jim Hibpshman, a state trooper who occasionally visits Quinhagak, said this tribal court pays close attention to proper procedure and the tribal police cooperate with troopers.

"I know there are some people in the state who have some heartburn with it, but I think it's a good thing," said Hibpshman. "These are smart people and they know what works and doesn't work. If you were living out here and the river was out of control, what would you do?"

Tribal officials say they have no plan to ban sportfishing on the Kanektok, even if they could. In fact, they say, they are lucky to have some economic base for the future.

For three years, the Qanirtuuq Corp. has operated its own guided fishing camp upriver, having first won approval for the idea in a villagewide vote. Young Native guides have learned to fish with fly rods, and other guides taught a fly-tying class for village children.

"I guess you could call it technology transfer," said Qanirtuuq's top guide, Willard Church, who had seen little interaction between sportfishing camps and villagers before that. "Native people have been adapting for 200 years," he said.

The corporation is promoting catch-and-release fishing to protect fish populations -- despite the continued grumbling of village elders.

"This is a challenging thing to keep the camp going, having objections from the elders," said Joshua Cleveland, head of the fish camp subsidiary.

But the corporation's effort has lost money so far. And when Quinhagak guides went to sports shows in the Midwest last winter to promote the camp, they said they met hostility spilling over from an Indian treaty battle over spearfishing.

"They would peek over there and see Native people and go away," Cleveland said.

In the future, Caole said, the tribal council may get even more involved on the river. That could mean barring alcohol from river camps, since Indian country is automatically dry under federal Indian law. Council members also have discussed zoning in Indian country -- including the many individual Native allotments along the river -- to limit the size of commercial operations, he said.

That may be where Indian country finally rubs someone the wrong way on the Kanektok River.

Alaska West, one of the biggest commercial operators on the river, has a camp on a Native allotment and hosts as many as 18 anglers a week, at $3,500 apiece. Guides there stressed that they keep human waste off the gravel bars and pick up trash when they see it.

John Rupp, a four-year river veteran from California, concedes there has been little communication between the village and their camp, located just one bend up the river. But with a little imagination, he said, he can put himself in the local Natives' shoes.

"It's especially poignant for them because it's their special place and they hate to see it change. But change is happening everywhere," Rupp said. "The river is here for everyone. It doesn't belong to any one person. Any of the villagers can move to California and go fishing there, just like here. This is still the United States."

Who will govern

Indian country is part of the United States, too, subject to the laws of Congress. It will be up to the Supreme Court to decide whether Alaska's Native villages have the power to act as governments in the way Quinhagak has.

Opponents of Indian country say the main thing inherent in tribal sovereignty is its unfairness. They say it would create ethnic enclaves in Alaska where one racial group gets to make the rules for everybody else.

"It's a giant leap backwards into the 19th century," said Anchorage attorney Wayne Anthony Ross, who represented sport hunters in the 1989 lawsuit that overturned as unconstitutional the state's subsistence preference for rural residents. "They want to see Alaska balkanized into little fiefdoms where these self-proclaimed Native leaders will reign supreme with help from the Great White Father."

Tribalism pushes Alaska Natives away from full citizenship into being wards of the federal government, some critics say. They contend the economic assimilation model of the land claims act is still Natives' best hope for the future. Sovereignty, they say, creates a natural conflict between powerful Native institutions: the corporation and the tribe.

But in contrast to the early 1980s, when tribal sovereignty first became a political issue, there are few Native voices making those anti-sovereignty arguments today.

The Indian country debate has injected a frank new discussion of race into Alaska politics.

"Congress has created institutionalized racial polarization. You couldn't think of a better way to do it," said Larry Long, deputy attorney general of South Dakota, where a checkerboard of Indian and private land has brought decades of litigation. "Where you have a substantial mix of non-Indians and Natives, I predict those areas are going to be the hotbeds."

Unconstitutional searches can seem more sympathetic in remote villages than in mixed-race communities, said Sen. Rick Halford, R-Eagle River, one of the Legislature's more outspoken critics of tribal sovereignty.

"Put that same village on the road system and that's where all the conflicts come up," Halford said.

Native leaders and their attorneys respond that it's not a matter of race, but of the historical relationship between Native American tribes and the federal government. The tribes are sovereign not because they get special minority favoritism, but because they never surrendered all their sovereignty to the United States.

"One disadvantage Indians have is you can't understand their position without understanding a long and complex history," says University of Colorado law professor Charles Wilkinson, one of the nation's pre-eminent authorities on Western land use and Indian law.

"To get a fair hearing, the Indians have to have the state's leaders or a portion of the public take the time to understand that context. Because when you take it out of its historic context, it does seem race-based and arbitrary. Unfortunately, most people don't have the time to do that."

Many Natives see racism not in tribal self-government but in the presumption of critics that tribal justice will be mean-spirited, tribal regulation shortsighted and tribal taxation extreme.

"Are tribal governments incapable of wise business practices?" asked Tanana Chiefs Conference president Mayo. "Are they, you know, some rabid dogs behind the fence that you've got to keep contained or eliminate?

"They don't even realize what they're doing, do they? They don't realize that the rhetoric, to paint those hook-nosed Indians, so to speak, greedy, stupid -- they don't realize what messages come from that rhetoric."

In the court's hands

It is June now, and schools of king salmon are again holding in the clear pools of the Kanektok River.

The state's lawyers are trying to convince the Supreme Court that the appeals court misunderstood the history of Native-white relations in Alaska.

If they fail, years of litigation may be necessary to sort out the extent of tribal powers in Alaska. For example, tribes such as Eklutna in Anchorage or the Kenaitze in Kenai, or even tribes in regional hubs like Bethel and Nome, would face a tough challenge qualifying under the 9th Circuit test, Native rights lawyers concede.

Meanwhile, Congress, which has the final word over Indian matters, could intervene and eliminate Indian country in Alaska -- or create a new, narrowly defined version of tribal power here. Already, Alaska's congressional delegation is hinting such a compromise may be possible, despite vows of national Indian organizations to fight efforts to limit inherent tribal rights.

But at least one Lower 48 skeptic warns that the prospect of a congressional fix is a mirage.

"Congress isn't going to answer any of these questions for you. We've been litigating this stuff since the '40s and Congress has not stepped in," said Long, the South Dakota deputy attorney general. "You folks are going into a brave new world."

Assembly member Kevin Meyer said he asked the mayor this week to consider Warner for the deputy chief's position if Udland is confirmed by the Assembly.

"I think it would be a win-win situation since she's so popular with the rank and file," Meyer said.

Last Wednesday, Mystrom announced Udland as his choice to replace O'Leary. The Assembly was to vote on whether to confirm him this past Tuesday. However, initial Assembly opposition prompted Mystrom to postpone Udland's confirmation vote until Jan. 28.

Some Assembly members have withheld support because of employees' concerns about Udland's authoritarian management style.

Assembly member Pat Abney said she was "amazed" at the number of negative calls about Udland she's received from police department employees. Mystrom said they were upset because, as deputy chief, Udland was required to implement unpopular decisions. The most controversial was the mayor's decision to switch patrol officers from a 10-hour, four-day work week to eight hours and five days.

The mayor also said Assembly member Joe Murdy was heading a police union effort to derail Udland's nomination.

"A number of Assembly people have said to me, 'I need Joe's vote on some things,' " Mystrom said Thursday. "That's a real sad thing."

Murdy said he hasn't talked to any of the union representatives, but many police officers and other employees have contacted him and expressed concerns. He denied trying to influence other Assembly members.

"I haven't called any chits in," Murdy said. "If the mayor had done the nomination the right way, he wouldn't be in the mess he's in. It's a shame he has to blame it on someone else."

Assembly member Charles Wohlforth said the mayor's attempt to paint employee opposition as only a union concern was wrong.

"It's not a union thing," Wohlforth said. "There's definitely legitimate unhappiness from many of the employees. It's something they really feel."

The police union has decided to remain neutral during the confirmation process, said union president Rob Heun.

Some National Rifle Association members also have expressed concerns about Udland because as deputy chief he testified against a successful bill in the Legislature allowing Alaskans to carry concealed handguns.

Assembly member Meyer said he received several calls from NRA members and questioned Udland about his opinions during a private conversation this week.

"I'm convinced he doesn't have any strong opinion against the right to carry weapons and I think opposition will deteriorate on that issue," Meyer said.

Anchorage attorney Wayne Anthony Ross, who is a national board member for the National Rifle Association, wrote Meyer a letter expressing his personal support for Udland.

Minority groups have sent the mayor a mixed message on his nomination.

The board of the Minority Community Relations Police Task Force voted 7-1 to endorse Udland's nomination. The president of the board, William Greene, wrote in a letter that he was concerned about Udland's record of promoting and hiring minorities and said he could not personally endorse him.

NAACP Anchorage chapter president Celeste Graham-Hodge said she has received several phone calls from department employees who believe they have been discriminated against. Graham-Hodge said the NAACP wanted more information before it takes a position.

The Cook Inlet Tribal Council and the Alaska Native Justice Center have written letters supporting Udland.

Udland said Thursday that he has tried to maintain a "tough skin" and realizes the nomination process will result in a lot of criticism. Allegations that he's a racist, however, are the most hurtful, he said.

STATE LOSES SUBSISTENCE FIGHT

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Tuesday, May 14, 1996

Author: DAVID HULEN Daily News reporter ; Staff

The U.S. Supreme Court refused Monday to consider further appeals in the Katie John subsistence lawsuit, clearing the way for federal agencies to take control of some fisheries in Alaska starting next year.

Without comment, the court refused to consider the state government's appeal in the 6-year-old case. The suit had become the main battleground in the long, tangled dispute over who should have subsistence hunting and fishing rights in Alaska.

The court's decision Monday was a victory for Katie John, the Mentasta Lake grandmother whose attempts to fish for salmon at a camp on the Copper River mushroomed into a massive lawsuit involving government agencies, Alaska's biggest Native organization and the thorny question of whether the federal government can claim jurisdiction on navigable waters inside a state.

John happened to be in the Mentasta Lake tribal council office Monday morning when a lawyer from the Native American Rights Fund called with the news, said a niece, Lottie Wolf.

"She said, 'Ah good. Now we've got to go to work setting up camp this year and drying our fish,' " Wolf said.

In broader terms, the decision adds momentum to the court-ordered federal takeover of subsistence fishing and hunting on federal waters and lands across the state. Hearings on the plan are being held around Alaska this week and next, but the soonest the takeover could occur would be January, federal officials said Monday.

Federal officials have said the takeover could cost more than $20 million. Alaska's congressional delegation wrote a provision into law earlier this year blocking the program from taking effect until at least Oct. 1.

In Juneau, Gov. Tony Knowles said the state would fight the takeover, but would not say how.

"We are very strongly protesting that direction by the federal government and we are prepared to go to court," Knowles said.

Knowles, a Democrat, again asked the Republican majorities in the Legislature, now meeting in special session on the budget, to consider a package he says would allow the state to keep control of subsistence. Among the administration's ideas: amend the state's constitution to restore the state's old subsistence priority for rural Alaskans.

There was no sign the idea is going anywhere with the Republicans, who argue that the rural preference discriminates against urban hunters and anglers and that the real problem is the federal law.

"My solution is to get the feds the hell out," said Rep. Al Vezey, R-North Pole.

The state's appeal to the Supreme Court argued that "no current issue involving Alaska and its resources is of greater significance . . . because it determines the extent to which federal agencies will take over the management of Alaska's fisheries, and to a lesser extent, its wildlife."

Eleven other states filed briefs supporting Alaska.

But lawyers for the Clinton administration urged the court to reject the state's appeal, saying the case "does not present any issue of importance outside the state of Alaska."

The federal takeover was ordered last year by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals after Native-rights lawyers argued the state was failing to protect John and other rural residents' subsistence rights. The issue is based in the 1980 Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act.

Subsistence hunters and fishermen enjoy a priority over other consumers of wild fish and game, sometimes with more liberal catch limits and seasons. ANILCA says only Alaskans living in rural areas are entitled to subsistence rights, and that the federal government can take over management if state law didn't give the same rural priority.

In 1989, the Alaska Supreme Court ruled the rural preference violated the state constitution's provision that resources belong to all Alaskans. Federal agencies took control of subsistence hunting, but argued they had no authority over waters. After the state stopped her from fishing at her camp, John and others sued. The federal appeals court ruled that Washington must take control of subsistence on waters that cross federal lands.

Federal officials have said repeatedly they don't really want control of fisheries. It would require a big effort cataloging catches around the state, said Deborah Williams, the top Interior Department official in Alaska. If commercial or sport fisheries cut into subsistence takes, federal agencies would go to court to cut those catches, she said. The solution, she said, is the state amending the constitution and keeping control.

Heather Kendall, a lawyer for the Native American Rights Fund, argued that such conflicts would be rare, and that the federal takeover isn't necessarily a bad thing. "It certainly won't result in mass chaos, as the state has been claiming," she said.

The subsistence salmon catch, statewide, is less than 3 percent of the total harvest, Kendall said, and the takeover would simply ensure that share.

Others, though, argue that any more control of Alaska salmon fisheries by Washington is bad. Republicans in Juneau want Congress to repeal the rural preference in ANILCA altogether. Natives have strongly resisted, as have the state's Republican congressional delegation.

"Why is the delegation afraid of that? It's because they have a big Native constituency and they don't want to incur their wrath," said Wayne Anthony Ross, an Anchorage lawyer and Republican national committeeman.

Four Republican candidates battle to lead the state - Candidates vie for governor's office

Author: TIMOTHY INKLEBARGER ; THE JUNEAU EMPIRE © 2002

In the Aug. 27 primary, an Anchorage attorney and two political newcomers will find out how they stack up against Frank Murkowski. Lawyer and National Rifle Association director Wayne Anthony Ross and political newcomers Eric Wieler and Brad Snowden are challenging the state's junior U.S. senator in the GOP primary for governor.

Murkowski, a 22-year member of the U.S. Senate, has spent about half of the $946,000 he's raised so far this year in campaign contributions. Ross has raised about $79,000 and neither Wieler nor Snowden are actively raising money.

All four candidates oppose moving legislative sessions from Juneau.

Stating that thousands of jobs have been lost in resource industries in the past eight years, Murkowski said he will push for development of Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, increase access to oil and gas resources, restore fisheries, and develop timber and other natural resources.

He opposes implementing statewide taxes, instead proposing cutting inefficiencies in state government and working with the Legislature to address the $1 billion fiscal gap that threatens to exhaust the state's Constitutional Budget Reserve Fund by 2004.

"If we enter into this fiscal crisis with the idea that the only hope is to increase taxes, I think it's a self-defeating mechanism," Murkowski said.

While not disclosing much detail on his fiscal strategy, Murkowski said more development of resources would help slow the fiscal gap.

"If we could increase oil and gas exploration in this state by just 5 percent a year, in about four years we would equalize what we currently anticipate as our needs associated with our current budget," he said. "Let's face it, 80 percent of our revenue comes from oil. That's where you have to focus in to pick up your greatest percentage of revenue."

Murkowski, like Ross, has made public safety a priority in his campaign. He has pledged to provide more training for village public safety officers, expand state prisons and appoint members to the state's Judicial Council who will nominate judges that won't "coddle criminals." Murkowski did not specify which judges he thinks have gone easy on criminals.

Ross, Murkowski's top opponent, is an Anchorage lawyer, 22-year director of the NRA and former assistant attorney general for the state.

It's Ross' second run for the governor's office; he ran in 1998, receiving 16 percent of the vote in the Republican primary.

"A vote for Wayne Ross is a vote for two great Alaskans," he said, in an effort to convince voters Murkowski would be more effective in Washington, D.C., where he can continue to promote state issues such as opening ANWR for oil exploration. "It's absolutely foolish for Murkowski to run for governor and give up that seniority in Congress."

Clive Thomas, a political science professor at the University of Alaska Southeast, said if Republicans don't regain control of the U.S. Senate in November, Murkowski would not necessarily be in a strong position to move legislation.

"He'll be in a stronger position than some people, but he won't be a committee chair," Thomas said.

Upcoming primary coverage

Tuesday's Empire will profile candidates running for governor in the Alaskan Independence, Libertarian, Green and Republican Moderate party primaries. Wednesday's articles will examine lieutenant governor candidates. Coverage of candidates running for the state Legislature and U.S. House and Senate will run Sunday through Thursday, Aug. 22.Ross, who has criticized Murkowski for not stating firm positions on issues such as the fiscal gap, proposes cutting state spending by $375 million to $500 million. Not going into specifics about what budget cuts he would make, Ross did say three "sacred areas" would not see reductions: law enforcement, education and services for veterans.

He proposes hiring 100 new state troopers, raising teachers' salaries and securing property tax exemptions and other benefits for veterans.

To solve the fiscal gap, Ross said he would push for the creation of an endowment fund made up of all state savings accounts and operate government from the account's earnings. This "super permanent fund," as he calls it, would use permanent fund earnings to pay dividends and balance the state's budget.

Ross estimates that this plan would result in a temporary reduction in dividends, with annual checks ranging from $500 to $750 per person.

He said getting lawmakers to agree on such a plan would be easier with so many seats opening up in the Legislature next year.

"The Legislature has been leaderless," Ross said, noting that he looks forward to working with "new Turks coming in who are willing to grab the reins."

Ross opposes implementing taxes as well as establishing a rural priority for subsistence hunting and fishing. Murkowski has said the state needs a more specific definition of rural.

"A lot of people really don't know," Murkowski said. "There are definitions that suggest the Kenai is rural and yet the state subsistence board has reviewed it on a second review and said that it's not necessarily rural."

Ross' law firm successfully argued the McDowell case before the state Supreme Court in 1988, which gave all Alaskans equal access to fish and game resources. Putting the state in violation of federal subsistence law, the decision prompted the federal government to take control of subsistence on federal lands.

Ross said he would push the state's congressional delegation to take back control of subsistence resources.

"We'll have to go to court if they can't get it done," Ross said, adding that he would appoint a "junkyard dog attorney general" to argue the case.

The other two candidates in the Republican primary, Eric Wieler and Brad Snowden, are running marginal campaigns with little or no budget.

Snowden, a 51-year-old hotel owner in Seward, already has conceded, saying he has abandoned the campaign to focus on priorities at home.

"First things first," Snowden said. "You've got to take care of your home front. Whatever support I may have had I want to throw to Frank Murkowski."

Eric Wieler, a 57-year-old Anchorage resident, is running with his twin brother Paul, who is seeking the Republican lieutenant governor's nomination.

"I don't know what kind of chance I have, but I thought I'd try to get some ideas out there," he said.

Wieler said people are "ticked off" about the way the state is being governed and the federal government's control over business. As an example, Wieler said the federal government took control of Kantishna mine claims in Denali National Park that rightfully belong to his family.

Wieler said he is pro-development and would like to see the state government tighten its belt in the face of a $1 billion budget deficit. He did not give specifics on where he would cut the state budget, noting that he would have to take a look at it first. He opposes taxes and strict environmental regulations.

Fish dominate governor debate - FORUM: Candidates face off on subsistence, farmed fish, marketing.

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Thursday, April 4, 2002

Author: Dan Joling The Associated Press ; Wire

If it had to do with fish, it was fair game for debate at the first gubernatorial candidate forum of the political season.

Five Alaskans who want to be governor sounded off on topics from subsistence to farmed fish to ways to aid the state's ailing fishing industry at the forum sponsored by United Fishermen of Alaska and the Kodiak Chamber of Commerce.

Lt. Gov. Fran Ulmer, considered to be the leading Democrat, and U.S. Sen. Frank Murkowski, the highest profile Republican, called for better marketing of Alaska salmon. Fellow Republican Wayne Anthony Ross, an Anchorage attorney, questioned where they would get the money to spend on that purpose considering the state's fiscal problems.

Former state Sen. Nels Anderson Jr., a Democrat from Dillingham, called for a region-by-region analysis of fishing problems and legislation to address them. Alaskan Independence Party hopeful John Wayne Glotfelty of North Pole called for fishing to be returned to the control of small Alaska operators rather than larger ships controlled by Outside interests.

Candidates answered questions from a panel of journalists and one another. The latter gave Ulmer and Murkowski opportunity to trade barbs on solving the subsistence issue.

Ulmer said Murkowski has told some people he favors a subsistence preference for rural residents and has told others that he would like to see changes in federal law that requires the preference.

She also said he had the opportunity -- and still has the opportunity -- to "lean" on members of his party in the state Senate to allow a vote by Alaskans on changing the state constitution to allow a rural priority. That would allow state officials to again manage fish and game in the state.

"We'd sure like your help," Ulmer said. "The session isn't over yet."

Murkowski said that he supports the change to the Alaska Constitution but that the federal law needs clarification -- perhaps before the statewide vote. As is, the federal law is too vague, he said.

"I would be very interested in knowing the lieutenant governor's definition of 'rural,' " Murkowski said.

Ulmer called for changes on the Board of Fisheries, a panel that she said has an impossible task. There are simply not enough seats on the board to address the concerns of the various regions and various fishing methods, she said. Ulmer called for a system of regional fisheries boards to make decisions closer to the affected fishery.

"To me that just builds the bureaucracy," Murkowski said in response. "I don't think we need to Balkanize Alaska."

The fishing industry would be better served with a renewed emphasis on quality control and creative marketing to emphasize it, Murkowski said.

"Folks in the media can sell virtually any kind of mousetrap if it's dressed up right," he said.

Ross laid claim as the most conservative candidate among the five.

On solving the subsistence problem, Ross said he would hire a band of "junkyard dog" assistant attorneys general to challenge the federal law that requires a subsistence preference or seek changes in the law through Congress.

He strove to place Alaska's commercial fishing problems in the context of the state's fiscal challenges.

"Other candidates are going to tell you we have money to spend," he said, but he questioned where they would find the money to do so given the gap between state income and spending.

Asked about the governor's influence on the Board of Fisheries, Ross said he would appoint the best people available and keep politics out. He said he opposes individual fishing quotas or any allocations for processor.

"I believe the free market system will eventually take care of the problem," Ross said.

Democrats Bruce Lemke of Anchorage and Michael Beasley and Alaskan Independence Party hopeful Don Wright of North Pole did not appear in Kodiak.

Anderson makes bid for governor - Murkowski sheds light on reasons for seeking office

Juneau Empire (AK) - Wednesday, October 24, 2001

Author: KATHY DYE and BILL McALLISTER ; THE JUNEAU EMPIRE

The pool of Democrats running for governor has grown to include a third candidate, who has vied for the seat before.

Former state legislator Nels Anderson Jr. of Dillingham announced on Tuesday that he will make another bid for governor in the 2002 election.

Anderson, 61, competed for the seat in 1998 but lost in the primary to incumbent Gov. Tony Knowles, who took nearly 39,000 votes compared with about 3,300 for Anderson.

In a written statement, Anderson said he is the only candidate with the broad political background needed to mend hard feelings between rural and urban residents.

"I have lived most of my life in rural Alaska," said Anderson, noting he also has lived in Fairbanks and Anchorage.

Anderson was majority leader during three terms in the state House from 1975-81. He also served in the state Senate from 1982-83. He will compete in the primary against Anchorage resident Bruce Lemke and Lt. Gov. Fran Ulmer, who announced her candidacy Saturday.

Ulmer, although considered an underdog against Republican U.S. Sen. Frank Murkowski, who quietly announced his candidacy Monday, is seen as the presumptive Democratic nominee.

"I think that Fran Ulmer is a really great, fantastic candidate and a great campaigner," said Scott Sterling of Wasilla, state Democratic chairman.

"I believe she has more fire in the belly than Frank does," said Juneau Democratic activist Rich Listowski, noting that Murkowski has considered a gubernatorial campaign for years.

The suddenness of Murkowski's announcement, made through a faxed news release and without the usual political fanfare, surprised some political watchers. But Murkowski said today it was not necessary to hold a press conference to announce his candidacy.

"I think the most significant thing was the question of whether we were going to run or not, and that was easily answered by a press statement," said Murkowski.

Murkowski lost his chairmanship of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee this year when Democrats took control of the Senate, and the 21-year political veteran said he considered the setback when deciding to run for governor.

"It wasn't the (only) consideration but it was a reality that lends you to look at other alternatives," said Murkowski, who estimated he would have to wait eight years for a finance committee chairmanship.

Although a formidable fund-raiser, Murkowski will have to start from scratch because no money from his Senate campaign war chest can be used for his gubernatorial campaign.

Murkowski acknowledged that it may be difficult for him to campaign while the Senate is in session, but he anticipates visiting Alaska and buying plenty of television ads.

"He'll probably play the Washington, D.C., card," said Clive Thomas, political science professor at the University of Alaska Southeast. That is, Murkowski might say he's too busy with national business to engage in direct debate with Ulmer, Thomas said. "It might be hard to pin him down" on state issues.

Murkowski said his priorities include working out a long-term fiscal plan for the state, but he didn't provide specifics.

"After all, we've only been in this mode for less that 24 hours," he said.

Ulmer also declined to endorse specific solutions to the state's fiscal gap.

Murkowski said he wants to work to resolve the state's subsistence dilemma, but said he was not prepared to spell out how he would do that.

Republican candidate Wayne Anthony Ross, an Anchorage attorney and 1998 gubernatorial candidate who isn't dropping out of the 2002 party primary, said: "Frank Murkowski, God bless him, hasn't been much help to us in Washington, D.C., on those (subsistence) issues."

Ross opposes federal intervention in creating a rural subsistence priority.

Alaska's U.S. Rep. Don Young and Sen. Ted Stevens, both Republicans, said they strongly support Murkowski's decision and said his move won't hamper efforts to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas development. Under his party's seniority rules, Murkowski will have to give up his post as top Republican on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee next year.

Young also said he is not interested in assuming Murkowski's seat if he leaves the Senate.

"I am pleased to be chair of the transportation committee, which is probably one of the most influential in the House," Young said. "I think the House is where I belong."

An appointment by the governor would be required to fill the vacancy. Whether that governor would be Murkowski or the incumbent, Democrat Tony Knowles, is a topic of hot debate. Murkowski said he can name his own successor upon being sworn in for governor. In any case, by state law only a Republican could be named to fill the two years left on Murkowski's term.

Two Republicans, state Sen. Robin Taylor of Wrangell and former Anchorage Mayor Rick Mystrom, said Tuesday they might be interested in the Senate appointment. But Taylor said he was looking seriously at vying with former House Speaker Gail Phillips of Homer for the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor.

Phillips said she would provide good geographical balance, as she has lived in both Southcentral and the Bush, and Murkowski has lived in Fairbanks and Southeast. Taylor said Murkowski privately encouraged him to run, although he said he expects Murkowski to remain publicly neutral in the contest for the No. 2 spot.

Outdoorsman discovered his home in Alaska

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Sunday, September 9, 2001

Author: Natalie Phillips Anchorage Daily News ; Staff

Name: Wayne Anthony Ross

Age: 58

Occupation/profession: attorney at law

Q. When and how did you end up in Alaska?

A. "It's a long story but, in summary, I ended up in Alaska because I realized I couldn't play basketball. At the urging of the coach, I decided to look for other sports ... and eventually got involved in hunting and fishing. Coming from Wisconsin, where opening day for walleye and deer season(s) are almost state holidays, I always hoped someday to visit Alaska.

"One day in law school, the professor referenced a case decided by the Supreme Court of Alaska and, with a mind like a steel trap, I suddenly realized that if Alaska had a Supreme Court, it had to have lawyers!

"From then on, I thought about moving to Alaska. I even sent some 40 letters to law firms here looking for a summer job but without success.

"During final exams in my junior year, a fellow student told me he had heard I was interested in going to Alaska and he was driving up the following Monday. He and I drove to Alaska that summer (1967) in a 1961 Volkswagen beetle. When I saw my first snowcapped mountains, I was hooked. I spent the summer as a law clerk and sightseeing bus driver in Anchorage and returned to Milwaukee to finish law school. In the spring of 1968, four days after Barb and I were married, we drove back here to make Alaska our home."

Q. What do you do if you can't be outdoors?

A. "I collect books and guns and was one of the founders of the Alaska Gun Collectors Association, which sponsors various gun shows in the area. I am also one of the founders of the Alaska Territorial Cavalry, a group that restores antique military vehicles and exhibits them at parades and shows throughout the state. In my spare time, I'm a national director for the National Rifle Association, have been chairman of the Alaska Land Use Council Advisors Committee, was Republican National Committeeman, served almost 12 years in the Alaska State Defense Force, ran for governor in 1998 and am doing so again."

Ross said he specifically collects variations of the Colt Model 1911. The pistol was used by the American military for more than 70 years. Ross sold much of his gun collection to pay for his children to go to college and to buy his candy-red Hummer. Its personal licence plates bear his initials: WAR.

"I drive it every day," he said. "It's like a four-wheel-drive Lincoln Towncar. Every vehicle I ever owned was the stripped-down model; this has every jim crack but a wood-burning stove. It's even got screen windows, a button to push to let air out of the tires and a fantastic stereo. I put on John Phillips Sousa when I'm on my way to court."

Q. What's your outdoor passion?

A. "Spending time with my family enjoying Alaska's outdoor experiences, especially hunting and fishing. I started teaching our kids firearms safety and got them involved in the shooting sports at an early age."

On the wall at home is a moose with an impressive 70-inch antler span. In an alcove next to the fireplace is a full-body mount of a 10-foot-6-inch brown bear shot by one of his sons.

"Greg, our oldest, is now a teacher at Mears Middle School. He got his first caribou at age 13 and, two years ago, bagged a record-book caribou with a .45 Colt revolver.

"Brian, now a U.S. Marine Corps captain, got his first moose with a .44 Magnum when he was 9 and was captain of the U.S. Naval Academy rifle team, the only captain to beat Army four years in a row.

"Tim, an engineer working for Wilder Construction, got his first moose with a .30-30 when he was 8.

"And Amy, our daughter, started taking small game when she was 6 and finally got her first moose when she was 17, a week before she left for college. Incidentally, Amy is a police officer with the Spokane (Wash.) Police Department and was the top tactical shooter out of 29 officers at her police academy even though she was the youngest officer there.

"Even my wife, Barb, has bagged a moose. She got it after hunting only eight minutes, and we were home putting the moose in the freezer by noon. As a result, Barb still cannot understand why I feel I need to go hunting for longer than a day at a time."

Q. What was your scariest or most memorable outdoor moment?

A. "The scariest was when I was charged by a brown bear near Cordova and had to shoot it. The bear dropped at 11 steps from the end of my rifle.

"And I've had some 'interesting' small-plane adventures, as most Alaskans have had.

"My most memorable hunt was with Ed Shavings of Nunivak Island, who guided me for musk ox. Ed is a wonderful guide and a real gentleman. I was able to take a musk ox with a .45 semi-automatic pistol as it ran past me at 35 yards. Hunting with Ed is like going back in time 10,000 years, although his equipment is first class. Ed Shavings is one of the finest men I have ever hunted with."

Q. What's next?

A. "Well, I'm running for governor so I expect that I won't have too much time to hunt and fish in the next several years. Alaskans are seriously divided over subsistence and between urban and rural philosophies. Having the outdoor experiences I have had, I think I can, and want to, bring us all back together again and make us all proud to be Alaskans."

Q. Got an Alaska hero?

A. "My boyhood home was on the site of the estate of Gen. Billy Mitchell, who helped run the telegraph north out of Valdez. So he is one.

"I really liked Edward Pagano, who was born in the Aleutians, joined the Army as a private and rose to the rank of major general serving as Alaska's Adjutant General.

"And I have a fondness and deep respect for Mitch Abood, Jay Hammond and Wally Hickel.

"In truth, however, there are so many wonderful people living in Alaska that it really is unfair to single any one out for special mention."

GOP candidates oppose subsistence amendment

Juneau Empire (AK) - Monday, August 17, 1998

Author: MARK SABBATINI ; THE JUNEAU EMPIRE

All three Republican candidates for governor oppose a state constitutional amendment to resolve the subsistence issue, but each has his own idea of a solution.

Senate Majority Leader Robin Taylor of Wrangell says fish and wildlife should be managed better so there's more to catch and eat. Anchorage attorney Wayne Anthony Ross maintains the real problem for Natives is their lack of control over Native corporations. Anchorage businessman John Lindauer favors a proposal that would essentially declare the entire state a rural area eligible for subsistence.

A Dec. 1 federal takeover of subsistence fishery resources is planned because the Alaska constitution is in conflict with a federal law requiring rural residents get subsistence priority. The state constitution guarantees equal access to all residents and attempts to place a constitutional amendment on the fall ballot were thwarted by conservative Republicans who said the federal law should be challenged.

A lawsuit by the Legislative Council and some lawmakers challenging the rural provision in the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act was dismissed in July. The judge cited procedural reasons, including the statute of limitations for challenging the law had expired, but an appeal is expected.

Taylor said it's erroneous to assume there will be a Dec. 1 takeover, since he believes "the governor could stall it with one phone call." He also said the federal government lacks the financial resources needed to take effective action until next October, and that Alaska's congressional delegation should pursue both a delay in the takeover and measures to keep it from being funded.

"I don't believe that my congressional delegation will fund the federal takeover of Alaska," he said.

Taylor said the subsistence provisions of ANILCA must be overturned so fish and game can be managed locally. He predicts the U.S. Supreme Court will rule the federal government does not have the authority to take over subsistence management.

He said he favors boosting the population of moose, birds and other animals by means such as reducing predators, although environmental groups object to such proposals.

"The true answer to subsistence is abundance," he said.

Ross said he also favors a lawsuit against ANICLA and pressure on the congressional delegation, but believes the real area of discontent among Natives is the lack of control they have over their corporations. He said giving them full control and ownership over those organizations will help solve much of the divisiveness currently surrounding Native and rural issues.

Although Natives rallied at the Capitol during various legislative sessions demanding the provisions in ANILCA be upheld, Ross said he believes that may be the view of activists more than the rank-and-file.

"I don't believe the Native people are saying that," he said. "I believe their leaders are saying that."

Ross said local provisions could be passed to discourage subsistence hunting in certain areas, such as stating no one can be in the air 96 hours before a hunt. He said if the lawsuit loses he would probably allow a federal takeover as governor, believing that a new presidential administration in 2000 would reverse the action.

Lindauer said both an amendment to the constitution and the lawsuit favored by Taylor and Ross are unacceptable.

"Rural preference means that the urban Natives - of which Juneau, Fairbanks and Anchorage have large numbers - would be forever cut off from their cultural and historical traditions," he said. The lawsuit will likely take years to resolve and "if it is successful it eliminates subsistence for all of the Natives in Alaska (and) there is no reason to do that."

Lindauer said his proposal is to meet the letter of the federal ANILCA law by establishing broad subsistence regions "and if there is a shortage in the region then all fish taken in the region must be eaten in the region. That is de facto rural preference."

The regions would include the entire state, including urban communities such as Anchorage and Fairbanks, he said. He said he didn't expect support for the plan from leaders of organizations such as the Alaska Federation of Natives, claiming they are supporters of Knowles.

"My own feeling is very few additional fish will be needed if everybody gets subsistence preference," Lindauer said. "It seems like everyone who wants salmon is eating it."

Trio takes on Knowles, each other

Juneau Empire (AK) - Sunday, August 16, 1998

Author: MARK SABBATINI ; THE JUNEAU EMPIRE

This is the first of five articles examining the upcoming governor's race in the Aug. 25 primary.

The way the three major Republican contenders see it, the election of Gov. Tony Knowles was a fluke that can be easily corrected with the right candidate.

Whether any of them is it is still an open question.

The trio is far behind the Democratic incumbent in at least one opinion poll and many are predicting the November election is Knowles' to lose. But the GOP contenders are looking at the governor's 536-vote win in 1994 and concluding they can win, especially if they can lure some of the 28,000 Alaskan Independence Party votes cast that year.

"I have talked to a number of political strategists and their opinion is if Knowles is at 48 percent (in the polls) he has lost the election because he has a record," said John Lindauer, an Anchorage businessman who is the current GOP front-runner. "Forty-eight percent is the absolute top he'll get."

Fine, except the three Republican candidates got a combined total of 32 percent of the vote in the recently conducted poll, with the rest undecided. Lindauer led the Republicans with 16 percent, followed by state Senate Majority Leader Robin Taylor of Wrangell at 10 percent and Anchorage attorney Wayne Anthony Ross at 6 percent.

The Republican who many said had the best chance of defeating Knowles, longtime U.S. Sen. Frank Murkowski, kept party officials waiting for months before announcing in January he would instead seek a fourth term in office.

Even so, Knowles isn't taking anything for granted.

"I don't think there's any question that it's going to be a close election," he said. "That's certainly something I've always experienced in races I've been in and that's the nature of Alaska elections."

Knowles faces only token opposition in the Aug. 25 primary from Democrats Nels Anderson of Dillingham and Don Wright of Fairbanks. The main contest is which GOP candidate will win the right to oppose Knowles.

The incumbent is running on a theme of state prosperity; his opponents portray Alaska and its government as being in disarray.

Knowles, 55, is a native of Tulsa who worked for an Oklahoma drilling company and moved to Alaska when they started drilling on the North Slope in 1968. He later opened an Anchorage restaurant and was the mayor of Alaska's largest city from 1982 to 1987.

His well-worn slogan for four years has been "jobs and families" and he is continuing to talk about developing partnerships between the state and various industries.

"People have asked me 'Aren't there other important values?' but without jobs we won't have the resources to pay for other services," he said.

Lindauer, 60, said he's running because he wants to leave a legacy and is prepared to spend $1 million to secure that place in Alaska history. Opponents accuse him of trying to buy the election.

"I know that man is mortal and I would like to leave something good and constructive behind when I'm gone," he said.

A single term in the state House from 1983 to 1984 is the limit of his political experience, but he said he is "probably the most highly qualified person who has ever run for office" because of other work.

Lindauer was the first chancellor at the University of Alaska Anchorage in 1976, owned a chain of state newspapers and radio stations in mostly small communities, and was the 1990 AIP nomination for governor until he stepped aside at least partially due to his first wife being diagnosed with a terminal illness.

He wants to solve the subsistence issue by, in essence, declaring all of Alaska a rural area eligible for subsistence preference under federal law. He disputes that Alaska has a budget crisis, saying no cuts or new revenues are needed.

Taylor, 55, is a former state District Court judge who came to Alaska in 1961 and has lived in Wrangell for 22 years. He said he's "basically trained all my life for this job" and says he's the only major candidate with extensive legislative experience.

He was elected to the state House in 1984 and served four terms before being appointed to the state Senate in 1992. He was elected to the Senate later that year and reelected in 1996.

Taylor blames the Knowles administration and environmental groups for policies that have crippled Southeast Alaska's timber industry, has frequently sought a statewide advisory vote on the death penalty and tried last session to make knowing transmission of the HIV virus a felony. Most of his attacks have been against the Knowles administration, but he is increasingly targeting Lindauer as well.

"The only reason John's ahead of me is the millions of dollars he has and will spend," Taylor said.

Ross, 55, moved to Alaska in 1967 and has worked as a state attorney, a court trustee and a family court master. He is a board member of the National Rifle Association and has for years donated legal services to pro-gun and pro-life causes.

He said he is running for governor because the Legislature "is the art of the compromise" and he never was much of a horse-trader. He said he is bothered by what seem to be widening gaps between urban and rural areas, and Native and non-Native issues.

"I'd say the campaign motto is "Make the Great Land great again," he said.

Ross said he opposes federal management of subsistence and the real solution for appeasing Natives is allowing them full ownership rights of Native corporations. He favors further cutbacks in public assistance, wants the state to dispose of much of its land and thinks too many unnecessary environmental regulations are impeding businesses.

The fuss over political signs in store windows and whether they violate the state's new campaign contributions law is over. The Alaska Public Offices Commission says most of them are legal.

The new law bans all contributions to candidates from corporations, including what's called "in-kind" contributions, meaning things other than cash. The puzzle was how it affected businesses that let candidates stick signs in their windows during the campaign season.

That is a long-standing practice that no one publicly questioned during last April's Anchorage municipal election. But most communities hold their local elections in October, and the signs became an issue last month in Fairbanks, Juneau and the Matanuska-Susitna Borough.

The APOC staff suggested candidates and store owners set a nominal sign-posting fee until the commission had a chance to consider the issue at its November meeting. Fee deals ranged from $10 in Fairbanks to a reported $1 in Juneau.

At its meeting last week, the commission ruled that "permission of a property owner allowing someone to post signs is not a contribution unless it's something the owner would normally charge a fee for," said Jenifer Kohout, APOC assistant director.

"Otherwise, if you're just sort of Joe's Garage, then it's not considered a contribution."

A memo issued Wednesday by Kohout says the ruling also applies to bumper stickers.

The ruling gets the commission "out of the business of trying to regulate political signs, which was something they didn't want to be doing," Kohout said.

Mike Frank, a lawyer who led the drive to reform Alaska campaign financing, was happy with the APOC decision.

"I think signs are kind of insignificant in the grand scheme of things," Frank said, "and I don't think they're a problem."

The commission will probably wait until two lawsuits challenging the constitutionality of the new law are resolved before turning their informal ruling into formal regulations, Kohout said.

The Alaska Civil Liberties Union has asked a state court judge to throw the law out. A hearing is scheduled for Dec. 8, said attorney Jon Rubini. Trial is tentatively set for March.

Lawyers Wayne Anthony Ross and Ken Jacobus, and Libertarian activist Scott Kohlhaas are doing essentially the same thing in federal court. They want the campaign contribution law overturned on the grounds that it abridges freedom of speech and the right to political association, Jacobus said.

The state law does not affect federal election rules, which also ban any contributions by corporations. Kelly Huff, a spokeswoman for the Federal Election Commission in Washington, D.C., declined to assess the legality of the big campaign signs that pop up in Midtown every so often on behalf of Alaska's congressional delegation.

If the property is commercial or owned by a corporation, "it could be considered an in-kind contribution, Huff said. "If someone wants to file a complaint we would take a look at it."

This election, soft money is without limit - CAMPAIGN: Donations for party building aren't capped, reported.

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Saturday, February 23, 2002

Author: Don Hunter Anchorage Daily News ; Staff

The state Republican Party can thank President Bush for drawing high-rollers to a fund raiser last weekend and a federal judge for making it easier for some of those guests to write big checks.

Decisions handed down by U.S. District Judge James Singleton last April and June said it's unconstitutional for the state to limit contributions to political parties unless the money is going to be used to support candidates. Donations for party building -- voter registration drives, advocating on issues and the like -- now can't be limited and don't have to be reported, according to the Alaska Public Offices Commission.

Still intact, as Alaska heads into an intense election season, are limits and reporting requirements on contributions to candidates themselves or to groups formed to promote or oppose ballot initiatives.

The state is appealing the court decision.

Soft money is money donated to national or state political parties that is not directly related to electing or promoting candidates and is not regulated. Hard money is money donated for the purpose of promoting and electing candidates and is regulated.

Alaska Democrats, who say they don't like the court rulings, are also using the opportunity to raise soft money contributions.

"We've taken (soft) money only to be competitive" with the Republicans, said Tammy Troyer, the executive director of the state Democratic Party.

Troyer estimated the Democrats have received $45,000 to $50,000 in soft money contributions. Donors have included Native corporations, Alaska Communications Systems, and fuel companies Tesoro and Williams, she said.

Randy Ruedrich, chairman of the Republican Party of Alaska, wouldn't say how much soft money the party has collected since Singleton's rulings, although he said party leaders are considering how to respond to questions about that and may be more forthcoming later in the year.

Some of the guests at the fund-raiser that Bush headlined made soft money contributions to the Republicans Victory 2002 fund for noncandidate programs, he said. Others made reportable donations to the party's Governor's Fund, which will be used to support candidates.

Ruedrich said the decision is good for Alaska politics and predicted voters will notice little difference.

"The judge's ruling allows the citizens of Alaska to have an opportunity to build stronger parties, which are basically volunteer organizations, and in that context I think it's an absolutely great step for democracy and for giving people a better understanding of the political process and participation in that process," he said.

In any event, he said, the Republicans have no plans at present to use soft money to finance any issue advocacy. The party will, however, use it to pay for voter registration drives, absentee ballot mailing and tracking, and for phone banks to encourage people to vote, he said.

Ruling in a lawsuit filed by political activists who donate their services to the Republican and Libertarian parties,

Singleton recognized the state's authority to impose $5,000 limits on donations to parties for nominating and electing candidates. But he said the state can't limit or regulate money donated to parties for other purposes -- advocating issues, paying the rent or buying office equipment, for example.

Singleton also ruled that the state's ban on political contributions by corporations cannot apply to such soft money donations to parties.

State attorneys have appealed the ruling to the 9th U.S. District Court of Appeals, and oral arguments are scheduled for early next month. A ruling is not expected for months.

For now, any person, group, corporation or union can give any amount of money to a state political party, as long as the money is not used to help elect candidates, said Brooke Miles, the executive director of the Alaska Public Offices Commission. The soft money donations don't have to be reported to APOC, and neither the political parties nor the donors have to disclose who gave it.

Still unclear is exactly what "issue advocacy" amounts to, Miles said. The APOC may try to define that term when it meets next month, if commissioners decide they still have the authority to do so.

Decisions in prior federal cases suggest that an issue advertisement can be almost anything that doesn't include words like "vote for" or "defeat" in discussing candidates, or that a reasonable person would conclude were in support of candidates, she said.

Mike Frank, an attorney who spearheaded the citizen campaign finance reform effort in the mid-1990s that ultimately led to the Legislature tightening Alaska's campaign finance laws, predicted the APOC will have a hard time defining when an issue ad is advocating a candidate and when it isn't.

"There just isn't any good way to distinguish between party building and issue ads and candidate advocacy," Frank said.

Before the 1996 Alaska law, there were no limits on donations to parties, but donations had to be publicly reported.

In its appeal to the 9th Circuit, the state argues: "All party activities, including issue advocacy, ultimately further the political party's primary purpose of influencing the nomination and election of party members to office."

The three who challenged the law -- Republican Party counsel Ken Jacobus, Republican attorney Wayne Anthony Ross and Libertarian Party official Scott Kohlhaas -- say its plain language imposes limits only on donations "made for the purpose of influencing the nomination or election of a candidate" or passage or defeat of a ballot proposition.

The state has no business regulating donations made to help parties pay other kinds of expenses that have nothing to do with candidates, they say in their response.

MILLER AIMS TO LIMIT GUBERNATORIAL FUND RAISING

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - Thursday, February 5, 1998

Author: Liz Ruskin Daily News Reporter ; Staff

Saying he wants to make the race to the Governor's Mansion fair for all, Senate President Mike Miller introduced a bill Wednesday that would stop Gov. Tony Knowles from raising campaign funds until the legislative session ends this spring.

"My purpose is just -- with whoever the governor is -- to even the playing field," Miller said.

But the Alaska Democratic Party is complaining that the Republicans are trying to change the rules in the middle of the game.

Miller's bill would prohibit the incumbent governor and all challengers from raising money during legislative sessions, generally from early January until early May.

As it stands now, Knowles and all other gubernatorial candidates are free to take in campaign donations during the session.

Except for Robin Taylor.

That's because Sen. Taylor, R-Wrangell, is a sitting legislator. A campaign reform law the Legislature passed in 1996 bans legislators -- no matter what state office they are running for -- from fund raising during the session. But it allows the incumbent governor to continue raising money throughout the election year.

"When we passed the campaign finance reform, nobody anticipated that was going to happen," said Miller, R-North Pole. "It was just an oversight."

Deborah Bonito, chairwoman of the Alaska Democratic Party, says the Republican-led majority is trying to carve out a loophole to benefit one person: Taylor.

"It's the specialest of special-interest legislation," she said.

If the bill becomes law soon, it would also affect John Lindauer, one of three Republican candidates for governor. Lindauer, though, says he thinks the bill is great.

"It's a really good idea to level the playing field," said Lindauer, who was campaigning in Ketchikan on Wednesday.

Sure, it'll make it harder for challengers to raise money, the former newspaper publisher said, "but that's a small price to pay."

Lindauer hasn't held any fund-raisers yet. He said Wednesday that he plans to spend a million dollars of his own money on the race.

Wayne Anthony Ross, an Anchorage lawyer and another Republican candidate for governor, said it's no wonder Lindauer likes the bill.

"He's rich," said Ross. "I would call it a rich man's bill."

The campaign finance reform law has already restricted fund raising significantly, he said, noting that no candidate can start raising money until Jan. 1 of the election year.

"I would be opposed to further restriction on raising funds," said Ross, who was in Washington, D.C., Wednesday for a National Rifle Association board meeting. "It limits candidates to those who are rich, who can afford to bankroll their own campaign."

It won't have much effect on Knowles, Ross said, since the incumbent has a much easier time raising a lot of money quickly.

The candidates don't have to disclose how much money they have raised until 30 daysbefore the primary election. Donors, though, are required to report their contributions within 10 days.

According to reports filed by individual donors to the Alaska Public Offices Commission as of last week, Knowles has raised about $41,000 this year. Taylor's contributors reported donations of $21,000, and Ross' sum came to nearly $10,000. No one reported giving to the Lindauer campaign. These totals, though, may be less than the amount the candidates actually collected. They do not include group or party donations, or individual donations less than $250. Also, in past years the reporting requirement for contributors was rarely enforced and frequently ignored.

Miller's bill would be effective as soon as it becomes law. If the Legislature passes it, Knowles would have 15 days to exercise his veto power. His spokesman, Bob King, said Knowles' policy is to not announce what he is going to do until the bill hits his desk. But even if he vetoes the bill, the majority can override his veto. That means the bill could become law before the end of the session.

Alaska Campaign Finance

campaign finance law

n Every candidate could raise money year-round.

n Ethics law of 1992 restricted legislators from receiving funds during the legislative session.

After passage of the 1996 campaign finance law n Prohibits all legislative candidates -- incumbents and challengers -- from raising money during the session.

n Prohibits legislators who are running for governor from collecting money during the session.

n Allows the governor and lieutenant governor to raise money for their re-elections during the session.

n Allows a gubernatorial candidate not in public office to raise campaign money during the session.

Miller's bill, SB 275, would:

n Prohibit the incumbent governor from raising campaign money during the session.

n Prohibit all gubernatorial challengers -- even those not now in public office -- from raising campaign money during the session.

To the individual members of the Alaska State Senate:

Dear Senator:

Our State employees are hard working folks who do the best job they can to serve the people of the State of Alaska. They should not have found themselves involved in what certainly appeared to be a political vendetta between some members of the Legislature and our Governor.

The expenditure of up to $100,000 by the Legislature to investigate the Governor's handling of the so-called Troopergate matter seems excessive and unwarranted given the State's current economic status. But some legislators chose to hire Steve Branchflower to handle that investigation and, as you are aware, he subpoenaed a number of State employees to give testimony on the issue.

After receiving the subpoenas, these employees received a memorandum from the Attorney General which indicated that a legal issue existed as to the validity of the subpoenas. The issue of the validity of the subpoenas was eventually litigated.

This office was retained to give advice to State employee Ivy Frye. We advised our client to let the litigation proceed and allow the courts to decide the validity of the subpoenas before giving any testimony.

Under such circumstances, Mr. Branchflower should have simply continued the date on which the employees and Mr. Palin were to supposed to testify until after the legal issues were resolved. Because Mr. Branchflower was under an artificial deadline tied intrinsically to the pending election (the legislators wanted his report released before the election for reasons of their own), he did not do so.

Mr. Branchflower, however, did provide a list of written questions to which the witnesses responded.

Now the Senate, without notice or hearing, has found our client, and others including Mr. Palin, in criminal contempt. Such a finding is a serious violation of those State employees' and Mr. Palin's right to due process. It is unwarranted and embarrassing to each person named, wrongfully damages their reputation, and constitutes an insult to their integrity.

The principal purpose of civil contempt is to compel compliance with an order while the purpose of criminal contempt is primarily to punish individual for past noncompliance with an order. Moss v. State, 834 P.2d 1256 (Alaska App.1992). It is clear, therefore, that the Senate's finding of contempt was a finding of criminal contempt, not civil contempt.

A person facing contempt has the right to notice of the charges against him. Taylor v. District Court, 4th Judicial District, 434 P.2d 670 (Alaska 1967). Our client, and the others, were not given notice that the Senate contemplated a contempt finding or what charges were to be leveled against any of them.

The Senate could not have ascertained the wilfulness of any of these employees failure to abide by its subpoena from its own observations. Had it been able to do so, such contempt would have been direct contempt. Since it could not do so, such contempt would have been indirect contempt. Stadler v. State, 813 P.2d 270 (Alaska 1991).

However little distinction is drawn between direct and indirect criminal contempt; and a person charged with either is entitled to the same procedural rights that exist in other classes of criminal prosecution. That is, a person facing either such criminal contempt finding is entitled to all procedural safeguards which are consistent with the interest of the Senate in upholding its efficiency, dignity and authority. Weaver v. Superior Court, 3rd Judicial District, 572 P.2d 425 (Alaska 1977).

No procedural safeguards were provided to our client, to any of the other State employees, or to Mr. Palin when the Senate issued its contempt finding.

Furthermore, the premise in the Senate's findings that the subpoenas were ignored is a false premise in that, once the legal challenges were determined, all subpoenaed persons complied by furnishing the requested information to the best extent possible.

Our hard-working State employees, and Mr. Palin, should have never been put in the position that they found themselves in.

The Senate should not have ordered, and paid for, an investigation by outside counsel for what appeared to be political purposes. Once that was done, however, Mr. Branchflower should have simply continued the time of their testimony until the court litigation was over and the issue, raised by Mr. Colberg, on the validity of the subpoenas was legally determined.

Although the conclusion reached by Mr. Branchflower's report, in the opinion of many, lacks any factual or rational basis, in fairness to Mr. Branchflower he did allow the questions to be answered in writing even if it appears that he did not utilize those answers in formulating his report.

In short, the State employees DID NOT ignore any subpoenas!

Loyal, hard-working State employees, and the Governor's husband Mr. Palin, do not deserve such treatment, especially from such an August body as the Alaska State Senate.

The Senate's finding of contempt was unwarranted and improper and we request that it be immediately set aside.

Thank you for your prompt attention to this request.

Sincerely,
Law Offices of Ross & Miner, P.C.

Wayne Anthony Ross was born 25 February 1943 in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. He graduated from Marquette University High School in 1960.

EDUCATION: After attending the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee for two years, Mr. Ross transferred to Marquette University, where he graduated with a Bachelor of Science Degree in Business Administration in 1965, and a Doctor of Law (Juris Doctoris) Degree in 1968.

EMPLOYMENT HISTORY: Mr. Ross first came to Alaska in June 1967 between his junior and senior years of law school. He spent that summer serving as a law clerk for a local Anchorage attorney, and driving a sightseeing bus on weekends for American Sightseeing Company.

From 1968 to 1969, Mr. Ross served as an Assistant Attorney General for the State of Alaska. In 1969 he was appointed by Superior Court Judge Harold J. Butcher to be Court Trustee and Standing Master for the Family Court. During the next four years, sitting as a judicial officer, Mr. Ross heard over 90% of all dependency, child in need of supervision, and delinquency cases arising in the Third Judicial District, and also enforced child support orders entered by the Superior court. During Mr. Ross's tenure, a computerized system of collection was instigated, which has developed into the Child Support Services Division which exists today.

In 1973, Mr. Ross left State service to enter the private practice of law. He was an associate of Edward J. Reasor and Associates in Anchorage, Alaska and a partner in law firms in Cordova, Alaska and Glennallen, Alaska. In 1977, Mr. Ross opened his own office in Anchorage, Ross & Associates, now known as the law office of Ross & Miner, P.C. Mr. Ross's practice emphasizes family law, criminal defense, plaintiff's personal injury and business law. Some years ago, Mr. Ross obtained one of the highest settlements in a wrongful termination of employment case ever obtained in the United States.

BAR ADMISSIONS: Mr. Ross was admitted to the Wisconsin Bar in 1968 and the Alaska Bar in 1969. He is admitted to practice in the state courts of Wisconsin and Alaska and in the federal courts of the Eastern District of Wisconsin, the District of Alaska, the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, and the United States Supreme Court.

MILITARY SERVICE: Mr. Ross was a Colonel in the Alaska State Defense Force. COL Ross was Commander of the Professional and Technical Detachment of the ASDF from 1986 to June 1987. He was Chief of Civil-Military Operations (G-5) from June 1987 until July 1988, and then took command of the Field Forces Teams. Several months later, he was appointed Judge Advocate General. From April of 1990 until May 1992, COL Ross was Chief of Operations and Training (G-3). In May, 1992, he was appointed Acting Chief of Staff. In March, 1993 he was appointed Chief of Staff. From July, 1994 until June 1996, he held the position of Inspector General. COL Ross was given command of the ASDF Rifle Team in September, 1989. COL Ross also served as Acting Commander, and was on the Officer Promotion and Selection Board. He participated in Mobex 88, Brimfrost 89, and Alcan Convoy 92 operations. Colonel Ross is now Area Defense Counsel for the ASDF. He founded, and was President of the 49th Territorial Guards Regiment, Inc. from 1987-1994, an organization established to support the Alaska State Defense force, its officers and soldiers, and was re-elected to that position in April, 1995, serving until August 1996. In 2007 he was again elected to the Regiment's Board of Directors and later elected to the position of Vice President and presently serves in that position.

COL Ross was awarded the Alaska State Service Medal, the Alaska State Defense Force Achievement Medal, the Alaska State Defense Force State Service Medal twice, the Alaska State Defense Force Drill Attendance Ribbon, the Alaska State Defense Force Training Achievement Ribbon, and the State

Guard Association of the United States Membership Ribbon. He was named 1988 Good Samaritan Attorney Of The Year by Veterans Living and Health, Inc. In 1990 he was knighted by the Polish Government and awarded the Commander's Cross of the Order of Polonia Restituta for services rendered to the cause of freedom.

TEACHING EXPERIENCE: Mr. Ross taught courses entitled "Juveniles and the Law" (1973-74) and "Introduction to Criminal Justice" at the University of Alaska, Anchorage, for several semesters. He has been a guest lecturer at Marquette University Law School, the University of Alaska, Anchorage, and at Wayland Baptist College. Mr. Ross served as a member of the Board of Trustees (Secretary) for Lumen Christi High School from 1999 to 2001.

POLITICAL EXPERIENCE: Mr. Ross first became involved in politics in 1960 when his father, Ray E. Ross, ran for the office of Alderman (City Councilman) of West Allis, Wisconsin's fourth largest city. Ray E. Ross was elected and held the Alderman's position for 3 four year terms. Wayne Ross was Campaign Chairman for two of those campaigns. He also participated in the Nixon campaign of 1960 and the Goldwater campaign of 1964 with less satisfactory results. Upon coming to Alaska, he was an alternate delegate to District 11's convention in 1972 and 1976. Mr. Ross has been involved in the Republican Party from precinct to national levels. Mr. Ross served as Parliamentarian at the 1980, 1982, and 1984 District 8 Republican Conventions and was Parliamentarian Pro Tem for the Republican State Central Committee in 1983. In 1984 he was Parliamentarian for the State Republican Convention and was an alternate delegate to the Republican National Convention in Dallas, Texas, where as a seated alternate, he was able to cast his ballot for Ronald Reagan for the Republican Party nominee for President of the United States. Mr. Ross was elected Vice Chairman of the District 8 Republican Party in 1982 and served as Chairman of that District from 1985 to 1988. As such, he was a member of the Alaska State Republican Party Central Committee. Mr. Ross was a member of that party's Elephant Club and was Chairman of the Rules committee from 1985-1988 and Co-Chairman of the 1988 State Convention's Candidate Recruitment Committee. In 1988, he was Alaska Chairman, Lawyers for Bush/Quayle. Mr. Ross was Republican Party National Committeeman, Alaska from 1992-1998. He attended the Republican National Convention in Houston 1992 as National Committeeman-elect and the 1996 National Convention in San Diego as National Committeeman. From 1995-1996, he served as Co-Chairman, Alaskans For Gramm. In 1997, Mr. Ross was a member of a delegation representing the United States and the Republican National Committee to the Republic of China (Taiwan's) 15th Kuomingtang National Congress in Taipei, Taiwan, China. Mr. Ross sat on the Republican State Central Committee from 2000-2001 as the Bonus Vote for District 18. He served as Secretary for Precinct 357 from 2000-2001. He also served as a member of the Republican Party Special Events Committee from 2000-2002. Mr. Ross was a Republican Candidate for Governor of Alaska in 1998 and 2002. In 2006 he served as Honorary Co-Chairman of the Sarah Palin for Governor campaign.

PUBLIC SERVICE: Mr. Ross was appointed to serve on the Alaska Land Use Council Advisors' Committee by the United States Department of Interior in January, 1984, and was re-appointed each year thereafter. In April, 1987, Mr. Ross was elected Chairman of that Committee. He served as Chairman from 1987-1988. He was elected Vice Chairman in 1988, and from 1989-1990, Mr. Ross held the position of Acting Chairman. Mr. Ross was appointed to the Advisory Council for the Commission On Privatizations and Delivery of Government Services by the Alaska Legislature in 1999, and assigned the Chairmanship of the Advisory Sub-committee to study the Office of the Governor.

Mr. Ross was appointed and served as an Alaskan Marriage Commissioner in 1969, 1970, 1971, 1972, 1973, 1976, 1984, 1985, 1994, 1997, 2003, and 2005.

AWARDS: Mr. Ross and his law firm have received awards from the National Rifle Association of America, the Alaska Outdoor Council, and the Alaska Christian Sportsman's Club for services on behalf of sportsmen. Mr.

Ross has been awarded the NRA Affiliated Gun Collectors Award of Merit for the Promotion of Gun Collecting. Mr. Ross has also received patriotism awards from the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Alaska Sea Cadets, the National Commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and Anchorage VFW Post 9981.

Mr. Ross is listed in Who's Who in American Law, 1st- 9th, 14th, and 20th editions; Who's Who in American Politics, 15th, 16th, 17th and 20th editions; Personalities of the West and Midwest, 8th edition; Who's Who in Society, 1st and 2nd editions; Who's Who in America, 46th-49th and 55th-57th editions; International Who's Who of Contemporary Achievement, 1984/85 edition; Marquis Who's Who in the West (1996-1997); and Who's Who in the World, 12th and 18th and 21st editions.

PUBLICATIONS: Mr. Ross was a biweekly columnist for the Anchorage Times (FROM THE ARENA, every second Sunday) from 1986 until 1992. He later wrote for the Voice Of The Anchorage Times in the Anchorage Daily News from 1992-1993, and for The Anchorage Chronicle in 2003. He served as contributing editor (firearms) for the Alaska Bar Rag, the official newspaper of the Alaska Bar Association for which Mr. Ross received the coveted Stanley Award for Heroic Journalism. Mr. Ross also has had outdoor and firearms articles printed in the Congressional Record, Alaska Outdoors, Supply Line, Soldier of Fortune, Wild Sheep, the Message, the Washington Arms Collectors Gun News, the Missouri Arms Collectors newsletter, the National Firearms Museum Quarterly, and Gun Week magazines. He also has written articles for Army Motors and was book review editor for that magazine.

HOBBIES AND INTERESTS: Mr. Ross was a holder of a Federal Firearms Dealers License for twenty-five years and specializes in collecting large caliber Colt and Smith and Wesson handguns. He has testified before Congressional Committees in Alaska and Washington, D.C. on lands and hunting issues, and has lobbied the Alaskan Legislature for equal access to fish and game for all citizens. He has also appeared on numerous television and radio programs supporting hunting and the Right to Keep and Bear Arms. Mr. Ross has conducted seminars and given speeches on hunting and gun collecting in many parts of the country. He is listed on the NRA Gun Collectors Speakers Bureau.

Mr. Ross's hobbies include hunting (especially with a .45 caliber handgun), fishing, and gun-collecting and he is a licensed assistant guide. He has taken two moose, and three caribou, with a .45 Colt revolver; three Sitka deer and a musk ox with a .45 semi-automatic pistol; and numerous other large game with a rifle including Dall sheep, whitetail deer, moose, caribou, sika deer, black bear, and brown bear. He has been qualified as an expert witness on firearms in both Alaska and Texas State Courts and in the Federal District court for the State of Alaska, both in Anchorage and Fairbanks. He is also a bibliophile, collecting books by Robert Service, Rex Beach, James Oliver Curwood, Don Blanding, and Theodore Roosevelt, as well as possessing the largest library on firearms in the State of Alaska.

RELIGIOUS PREFERENCE: Mr. Ross is a Catholic. He, along with his wife, Barbara, participated in the Anchorage Archdiocese Pre-Cana Program as instructors from approximately 1972 until 1985. In 1988, he was Advanced Gifts Chairman of the St. Elizabeth Ann Seton Church building program. In 1991 he was Building Fund Committee Chairman for that church. In October, 1991, Mr. Ross and his wife were named, by the Vatican, to be a Knight and Lady in the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulcher of Jerusalem. In 1998, Mr. Ross was awarded the Saint Gabriel Possenti Medallion by the Saint Gabriel Possenti Society. Mr. Ross served as Secretary on the Board of Trustees of Lumen Christi High School, Inc. from 1999 until 2001 and helped in the transition of that school from a private corporation to a parish school under the auspices of the Catholic Archdiocese of Anchorage.

FAMILY INFORMATION: Mr. Ross was married to Barbara L. Froelich of Elkhart, Indiana in 1968. They reside in Anchorage and have four children: Gregory, age 38, Brian, age 35, Timothy, age 32, and Amy Katherine Ross, age 30 years, and six grandchildren. Gregory graduated from Pre-Law at Marquette University, was a commercial fisherman, obtained his masters degree in education from the University of Alaska, Anchorage, is now a teacher for the Anchorage School District and coaches high school hockey. For several years, he served on the Anchorage Fish and Game Advisory Committee. Greg is married to Shelli, and has one son, Oberon and two step-children, Ryan and Tristen. Brian graduated 13th in his class, the top Marine Corps officer (Class of 1994), from the United States Naval Academy, and is a Major in the U.S.

Marine Corps, having served 3 tours in Iraq. Brian recently obtained his Masters Degree at Marquette in Milwaukee and currently is assigned by the Marine Corps as an Instructor (Naval History) at the Naval Academy. Brian and his wife, Tracy, have two sons, Andrew Charles Ross and Matthew Edward Ross, and a daughter, Emily Louise Ross. Tim graduated with a degree in Mechanical Engineering from Marquette University and is working in Alaska as a project supervisor for ANC. Amy graduated from Gonzaga University in Spokane, Washington with a degree in Criminal Justice. She is police officer with the Spokane Police Department, and is a Spokane Police Department Firearms Training Officer. She was recently commissioned as a Special Deputy U.S. Marshall. Barbara and each of the Ross children and grandchildren are NRA Life Members. Barbara was the librarian at St. Elizabeth Seton Catholic Elementary School, was a member of that school's Service Club Board, and was President of its School Board. She worked for the Anchorage School District as a librarian's assistant, and is now retired. Barbara served for several years as Program Director for the Anchorage Republican Women's Club, was District Chairman for Republican District 32, and as Secretary for Alaska Right To Life, Inc. Currently she is a Director of Alaska Right To Life, Inc. (Eff. 1 Feb 09)

I can be reached at (206) 522-6314 this evening during the public testimony confirmation hearing if there is a need to contact me.

Respectfully Submitted,

April 7, 2009

My name is Leah Burton. My father is former Commissioner of Public Safety, Richard L. Burton, who served under both Governor Hammond and Governor Hickel. I grew up in a law enforcement environment. Mr. Ross testimony today in response to Senator Hollis' questions about domestic violence and sexual assault victims enhances my testimony as to his prejudice on this very serious topic, especially given that, "Alaska rates among the top 5 states in the nation for per capita rates of domestic violence." (FBI/UCR 2007)

From 1989 through 1997 I lobbied on behalf of families and children in Alaska with regard to child support, custody, abuse, abandonment and neglect. In the course of that time my efforts put me in conflict with a group known then as the Dads Against Discrimination (DADS), and later renamed the Alaska Family Support Group.

Mr. Ross is one of the most successful attorneys in Alaska in his representation of the members of this organization and others who sought to avoid payment of child support through several means, not the least of which was to fight for custody.

In 1991, the DADS group held an area wide meeting at a Denny's Restaurant in Anchorage near DeBarr & Bragaw. I chose to go and sit in the main area of the restaurant near the opening of the meeting room where they convened so I was able to hear what they had to say and find out what plans they had for the upcoming legislative session.

At that point they still did not know what I looked like so I was able to sit there unnoticed. The meeting was well attended, Steve Strube was the head of the group at that time and another known member, John Grames (who Strube referred to as his Lt.), was also in attendance along with enough other members to fill the room. They were delighted to have Wayne Anthony Ross in attendance as a guest speaker.

Numerous comments were made that were appalling, not the least of which were remarks by Mr. Ross which included the following; "If a guy can't rape his wife...who's he gonna rape?" and "There wouldn't be an issue with domestic violence if women would learn to keep their mouths shut."

Other members made their own contributions such as, "We have the right to discipline our wives and children without the interference of government in our lives!"

These comments were greeted with laughter and affirmative responses by the group. Given the fact that they had referred to me in recent months as a "femi-nazi", the comments I was witness to at this meeting, while abhorrent, were unfortunately not surprising.

This announcement by Governor Palin is a slap in the face to all single parents who have no choice but to rely upon the State Department of Law to support court orders for child support, as well as those persons who need the Department to enforce criminal laws against sexual assault and domestic violence. Mr. Ross is the antithesis of the type of person that should be the Attorney General. This has been clearly demonstrated by his own words and actions in public.

In closing, I am not alone in my assessment that anyone who condones, and contributes to that type of hateful and harmful discourse clearly does not have the judgment necessary to represent the people of the State of Alaska as their Attorney General.

Given his other special interests and his stated opposition to subsistence rights and other Alaska Native issues, I have brought this forth as yet another dimension of Mr. Ross' demonstrated inability to represent all the people of the State of Alaska fairly and impartially.

His clear racial and gender prejudice raise serious concerns with regard to his ability to represent all residents of the State of Alaska fairly and impartially as their Attorney General.

Re: Letter Dated 7 April 2009 Purportedly From One Leah L. Burton

I am in receipt of a letter which purports to be from one Leah L. Burton. The letter is unsigned and I have been advised that it has been circulated to members of the Legislature. When I left my wife, Barbara, in Anchorage she cautioned me that "they are going to say bad things about you". "They will have to lie!" I responded, in an attempt to allay her fears. We have been happily married for more than forty years and like the tremendous lady she is, Barbara worries about me and doesn't like people criticizing her husband. (I thank the Lord for her every day.)

Apparently Barbara and I were both right. Not content to discuss my record, someone has now chosen to circulate this unsigned memo which is replete with totally false statements. I would call Ms. Burton a liar but, since the letter is unsigned and therefore may not have actually come from her, I will not do so. Instead, I am sending the response to you and referring to the letter, hereafter, as the "Burton" letter.

I believe I have heard of the Dads Against Discrimination and I have heard of a group known as the Alaska Family Support Group. Since I have practiced law in Anchorage in the private sector for over 35 years, I have given talks to many groups. I may have even spoken to this group although I do not recall having done so. If either group is the one I am thinking of, I had an unusual experience with one of its officers. On one occasion I received a call from a video store located on Lake Otis complaining about my "boorish behavior" to one of the store clerks. After ascertaining where and when this boorish behavior occurred, I advised the caller that I had never even been in his store. Intrigued by the caller's story, I asked if he had a videotape of the person who claimed to be Wayne Ross. It turned out that he had. I went to the store, viewed the video, and recognized the person who had claimed to the clerk that he was me. The imposter was, if I recall, one of the founders of the above referenced group.

I will leave it to your imagination as to what occurred in the "Come To Jesus" meeting I had with this fellow when I was able to track him down. To my recollection, that was the last time I ever heard of either of these groups. They avoided me and I them, thereafter.

If I recall correctly, the only time I ever addressed this group, if indeed I ever did address them, was at a Denny's restaurant on either Benson and Denali or on Dimond and the Seward Highway. To my best recollection the only time I have been in the Denny's on Benson and DeBarr was to attend meetings of the Armed Services YMCA (I served on its Board and later as its Chairman) or to provide legal training for several concealed carry classes given at that location.

I do not believe I know a Steve Strube or a John Grames. I don't recall ever hearing such names before the Burton letter.

I have never ever stated to anyone "If a guy can't rape his wife... who's he gonna rape?"

I don't talk like that!

I don't believe in that!

I totally abhor such a thought and I totally reject it!

Indeed, if I ever heard such a comment from anyone, that person would have faced a serious confrontation with me. Rape is a serious crime; it is not something to joke about; it is not something I joke about; and I have no sympathy with anyone who does. Indeed, as AG I intend to pursue rapists with the full power of my office and put them behind bars for as long a time as possible.

Nor have I ever stated "There wouldn't be an issue with domestic violence if women would learn to keep their mouths shut!"

Such an allegation that I uttered those words is outrageous! Indeed, it is almost as outrageous as the words themselves!

I confess that I am a bit old fashioned when it comes to women. My dad taught me that the greatest honor that a father could show another man was to let that man date his daughter. If a guy was granted that honor, the absolutely worst thing a guy could do was to breach the trust given to him by that father. I still believe that to this day. My wife and I learned about love-making only after we were married and we have been faithful to one another exclusively. She is my partner and I rely upon her completely.

The idea of "disciplining" a wife is outrageous! Wives are not children; they are partners (or at least should be). Any man who speaks to me about "disciplining his wife" deserves not to have one. And again, if I ever heard such a comment from anyone, that person would have faced a serious confrontation with me.

Both Barbara and I have "disciplined" our children. They have all turned out well. We are proud of them and they (all four of them) love their parents totally. Indeed, our children have turned out so well that I joke that they all take after their mother.

With regard to child support, I served as Court Trustee from 1969 to 1973. During my tenure, we developed the computerized system of collecting child support which has expanded into the Child Support Services Division with exists today. I have no patience or sympathy for any parent who fails to properly support his (or her) child.

In my practice of law when involved in divorce work, more often than not I represented the mother/wife. Ninety-five of my cases settled; only five percent went to trial. Divorces are sad situations for both spouses, and also for the attorneys who handle them. I have often said that the only reason I handled such cases is because I could go home at night to my beloved Barbara and realize how wonderful our life together is. I have always felt bad that many others cannot enjoy a marriage such as ours.

As I said above, I am old-fashioned. I take my hat off inside if a lady is present. I try to rise as often as possible when a lady enters the room. I always try to treat women like I would like my wife to be treated. Call me a dinosaur, if you will, but that is how I was raised.

I have had a good time during these conformation proceedings and I have met many interesting people. It matters not to me whether we agree or disagree on issues; what matters is that we can talk with one another and that we don't become disagreeable with one another.

The Burton letter, however, crosses the line. Now I am a bit angry! Whoever wrote that letter should be thoroughly ashamed of themselves. I do not deserve such treatment no matter how much the writer disagrees with me!

And since I am writing, let's deal with another issue. I am in receipt of a second memo dated 9 April 2009 referencing a lady who testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee on 8 April 2009.

The lady referenced my attendance at a UAA Forum in October 2005. She alleged that she heard me "argue that DV victims are liars".

I do not recall the date of such forum but I do recall attending such a forum. We were shown a movie about domestic violence. When it became my time to speak, I criticized the movie because it gave the misimpression that only men committed domestic violence on women.

I believed that I had been invited because of my years of experience in the field. I simply pointed out that men too could be victims of domestic violence. I also stated that on occasion people who sought domestic violence protective orders did so because they wanted to use the process "as a sword rather than as a shield". I said that in my experience I had seen cases in which people lied to get such protective orders and that our domestic violence system was sometimes abused.

Quite obviously the lady who attended the UAA forum heard only what she wanted to hear.

My remarks that day were accurate and based on almost four decades of experience in the field. The lady's recollection of the event, however, was not accurate.

Please feel free to contact me if you have any questions.

Sincerely,

Wayne Anthony Ross
Attorney General

LETTERS OF OPPOSITION TO THE CONFIRMATION OF ROSS

Testimony of Robert W. Loescher
Before the Alaska State Senate Judiciary Committee Regarding Confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross as Attorney General

My name is Bob Loescher. I am a lifelong Alaska citizen and also a tribal member of the Central Council of the Tlingit and Haida Indians Tribes of Alaska, a federally-recognized tribal government located in southeast Alaska. Today I am representing and speaking on behalf of 26,000 tribally enrolled members and at the request of the Tribal President Bill Martin. I serve on the Judiciary Committee of the Tribe and am also speaking on behalf of the Alaska Native Brotherhood Camp # 2 of Juneau. The ANB is the oldest Native American fraternal organization in America and has stood up for Civil Rights of Alaska Natives and others.

I want to thank you Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee for the opportunity to speak on the matter of the confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross as the Attorney General for the State of Alaska. This year marks the 50th Anniversary of Alaska Statehood and the implementation of the Alaska State Constitution. This last year, we witnessed the importance of the position and person of the Attorney General when the possibility of our Governor becoming the Vice President of the United States and our Lt. Governor's bid to become the US Congressman for Alaska arose. In this situation, the Attorney General would have become the Acting Governor until an election was held. All this did not happen- but the importance of the role of the Attorney General in our Alaska governance structure was highlighted.

The Attorney General is the highest ranking non-elected official. Over the 50 years of statehood, this position has had tremendous influence over the direction and administration of public policy within the State of Alaska and with regard to federal and tribal government policy and relationships.

Since the early days of Alaska Statehood through this year, Alaska Natives as tribal members and through their tribal governments, ANSCA corporations and affiliated institutions have made social, economic and political progress- as the State of Alaska has made equal and similar progress. The Alaska Natives cooperated with the State and Federal government to settle the Alaska Native Land Claims. This event opened the way for the right of way and construction of the Alaska Oil Pipeline and the unprecedented prosperity for all Alaskans.

The existence of Alaska Natives as "tribal members" has provided multi millions of dollars of federal transfer funds for health, education and welfare and other programs not only for Alaska Natives, but also for the benefit of all Alaskans.

The businesses and ANSCA lands have contributed billions of dollars to Alaska commerce, the economy and for job creation everywhere in our State.

Native institutions have brought modern services and benefits that have "offset" substantial impact to the State operating budgets.

Notwithstanding this progress and benefits to the total Alaska community due to the existence of Alaska Natives and tribal entities- participation has come at a high cost to the Alaska Native community. For the most part, Alaska Natives and tribal progress has come through litigation with the State of Alaska over equal education in rural Alaska, hunting, fishing, and gathering rights, children and family matters and another dozen issues that affect the well-being of Alaska Natives and tribal members.

Some progress has been made between the State of Alaska and the tribal community. There is cooperation on environmental protection, development of transportation infrastructure, land and resource development, coastal zone management and a myriad of other matters. However, the cooperation develops and exists based upon mutual need and financial contribution that are able to be committed to benefit all parties. The difficulty or impasses that are encountered and underlie determent of progress as a general matter is the issue of sovereignty of the state and that of federally-recognized tribes. The myth that the Attorney General Office advances at every turn that "Indian Tribes" do not exist in Alaska because of the Venetie case that asserts "Indian Country" does not exist in Alaska ignores the reality that tribes do exist as a result of federal recognition of the existence of tribes based upon tribal member enrollment.

As a result, the State Attorney office has litigated against Alaska Natives and tribes on children and family matters, and other similar issues. The State of Alaska has lost much of such litigation, but continues to oppose the recognition of tribes and tribal jurisdiction to administer and oversee the "inherent internal affairs" of tribal members as recognized under the US Constitution and federal law.

Wayne Anthony Ross has a long documented public record of advocacy against the recognition of tribal entities in Alaska. He has taken public positions against the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act and its amendments. He is opposed to Title 8 of ANILCA, the subsistence provision wherein a rural Alaskan priority preference for the gathering, hunting, and fishing is provided under federal law on federal lands in Alaska. Many of us in the Alaska Native community leadership have looked forward to the time when "constructive engagement" with the Governor of Alaska can be started and undertaken between the Alaska Native community and the State. The Confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross would not assist or usher in this opportunity. It would continue the ongoing question by many Alaskans "who speaks and maintains the public policy relationships between the State of Alaska and the Alaska Native community and Tribes?" Is it the Governor with the Legislature or the State Attorney General?

The Confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross would represent the extreme extent the State of Alaska would go to in order to prevent progress and relationships between the State of Alaska and Alaska Natives and their tribal institutions. Therefore, we urge you to oppose the Confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross as Attorney General for the State of Alaska.

Robert W. Loescher Biography

Robert W. Loescher has served in executive capacity of many private and public corporations over the last forty (40) years. He was born and raised in Juneau, Alaska. He graduated from Fort Lewis College at Durango, Colorado. He started his career by working with Alaska Legal Services – a poverty law office. From there he worked in the Central Council of the Tlingit and Haida Indian Tribes of Alaska, a federally recognized tribal government, in the Office of Development Planning doing strategic planning and economic development. Statement of Nelson N. Angapak, Sr.
Vice President, Alaska Federation of Natives

Testimony Before the Alaska State Legislature Senate Judiciary Committee
On the Confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross
As Attorney General of Alaska
April 8, 2009

Good afternoon, Chairman French and members of the Senate Judiciary Committee. My name is Nelson N. Angapak, Sr., and I am Vice President of the Alaska Federation of Natives ("AFN"). Thank you for the opportunity to testify on the confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross as Attorney General of Alaska. Seated with me is George Irvin, Senior Assistant to the President of AFN.

AFN EMPHATICALLY OPPOSES THE CONFIRMATION OF MR. ROSS FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL.

On Tuesday, March 30, AFN's Legislative Committee unanimously adopted a motion to oppose this nomination. I will highlight for you some of the reasons behind that decision.

Subsistence: Mr. Ross has been quite vocal in his opposition to recognition of a rural subsistence priority in state and federal law. His opposition to the rural priority found in federal law demonstrates a profound disrespect for Alaska Native peoples, for whom subsistence activities are an imperative. Subsistence hunting, fishing and gathering are the very core of Alaska Native life, as they have been for thousands of years. The vast majority of an estimated 125,000 Natives in Alaska practice subsistence regularly in order to put food on the family dinner table. Fish constitute 59% of the statewide rural subsistence diet -- subsistence activities take only 2% of all the fish annually harvested in Alaska. The other 98% go to commercial, personal use, and sport users. Most subsistence activities occur on federal lands and waters, where Congress has unequivocally enacted a rural priority (in Title VIII of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of 1980).

If subsistence cannot be protected against overwhelming competition from other users, most residents living in rural villages will not be able to feed themselves, and will gradually be forced to abandon their homes and villages to move into urban areas. Such an enormous out-migration to Alaska's cities would create a socio-economic crisis that would be detrimental to all Alaskans - especially urban residents. A rural priority is not just humane, it is the intelligent thing to do in the interest of all Alaskans.

In his most recent gubernatorial bid, Mr. Ross stated that, if elected, he would hire "...a band of junkyard dog assistant attorney generals to challenge the law [Title VIII of ANILCA] ...." [1] This approach has already failed, however - many times. Opponents to the rural subsistence priority contained within Title VIII of ANILCA have challenged the constitutionality of this federal law time and time again in the federal courts. Each and every time, the courts have consistently upheld the rural subsistence priority on federal lands and waters in Alaska. It is well-settled law. Further litigation will simply waste time, human resources, and precious state monies that could be spent on other matters.

AFN wonders why any Attorney General would want to hire "junkyard dog" assistant attorneys general for any purpose?

Tribal Sovereignty: Mr. Ross's contempt for Native leaders and their governing institutions is patently obvious. He opposes the very existence of tribal governments, which continue to exercise their governmental authority as they have since time immemorial. Millions of federal dollars come into this state to serve Alaska Natives simply because the United States has a government-to-government relationship with the tribes in Alaska. These monies flow to tribal governments and non-profit tribal consortia to deliver vital human services, such as health care. If Mr. Ross actually wants to deprive 125,000 Alaskans of their health care, the surest way to achieve that is to attack the tribes enumerated within the Federally Recognized Indian Tribe List Act.[2] If Mr. Ross does not know about or understand the connection between the recognition of tribal governments and the many millions of federal dollars that come into Alaska to serve Alaska Native peoples, he is ignorant and uninformed. If he simply does not care, he is irresponsible.

Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act: Mr. Ross has often opposed the 1971 Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act ("ANCSA"), and the 1988 congressional amendments thereto. In 1987, he wrote that implementation of ANCSA had been a waste of public resources by Congress, claiming that: "...[w]e average Americans, native and non-native alike, haven't got much to show for the expenditure...and transfer of land."[3]

That statement is not true. By settling Alaska Natives' claims to the land, Congress cleared the right-of-way for construction of the oil pipeline. The enactment of ANCSA, more than any event since Statehood, created modern Alaska. Everything that we have here today was made possible by that 1971 real estate sale between Natives and the United States. If it had not happened, the pipeline, the oil and the resulting economic boom would have been held up for decades in the federal courts. Mr. Ross's view also completely disregards the abiding legal principle of aboriginal land title, which descends from colonial times. Mr. Ross does not understand ANCSA's history and legal foundation any more than he recognizes the benefits it provided to everyone in Alaska.

Mr. Ross also criticized the 1991 Amendments to ANCSA, noting that they would both promote tribal authority in Alaska, and allow "flim-flam artists [to] gain control of native lands..."[4] The truth, however, is the exact opposite of Mr. Ross' statement. Most of the tribes in Alaska opposed the 1991 amendments because the statute failed to give tribes sufficient authority over subsistence. Mr. Ross is clearly uninformed, and uneducated, about the laws that govern subsistence, and simply waves the term "tribal sovereignty" as a scare tactic to agitate the citizens of Alaska. His actions are nothing more than political shenanigans, and reflect his ignorance of the law that governs in this state.

Respect for Government Institutions: Mr. Ross was among several candidates for the Alaska Supreme Court seat vacated by Justice Bryner in 2007, and for the Court of Appeals seat vacated by Judge Stewart in 2008. He did not make the "short list" of qualified applicants sent to the Governor for either seat.

The Alaska Judicial Council handles nominations for the state judiciary, which rates all candidates by means of a Bar Survey sent to attorneys who are members of the Alaska Bar Association. To encourage frank, honest answers, the survey is anonymous. In a letter recently published by the Alaska Bar Association, Mr. Ross strongly objected to the anonymity of the Bar Survey as he wanted to know who had said-what about him. The secret ballot, however, is an axiom of political process in our democratic Republic. Mr. Ross's objection to the use of this process as part of an assessment for judicial fitness demonstrates a certain disregard for democracy, itself.

I reiterate AFN's opposition to confirmation of Mr. Ross as the Attorney General for Alaska. The Attorney General's responsibilities include representation of all citizens of Alaska, including those of us who are Alaska Natives. Mr. Ross holds strident beliefs in opposition to the two core issues that affect the survival of our Native communities and people: subsistence and tribal sovereignty. This raises a major concern about his ability to represent Alaska Natives on an equal footing with other citizens of Alaska.

Thank you for giving me this opportunity to present this testimony on behalf of AFN.

I ask that my written statement and comments be incorporated into record of this meeting.

RESOLUTION NO. # 01-09

Title: Requests that Executive Committee Grand Camp oppose the confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross to Attorney General for the State of Alaska.

WHEREAS, the Alaska Native Brotherhood and Sisterhood, Glacier Valley Camp #70 in a special session took up the subject of the appointment of Wayne Anthony Ross by Governor Sarah Palin of the State of Alaska, and

WHEREAS, Camp 70 recognizes it is not in the best interest of Alaska Native people and Alaska to have Wayne Anthony Ross as Attorney General for the State of Alaska, and

WHEREAS, Camp 70 believes Wayne Anthony Ross does not and will not honor subsistence agreements already agreed to by Alaska Natives and the state, but will also actively work against enforcement of subsistence rights and will not fairly represent their interest in future disputes between Alaska Natives, Commercial, Commercial Sport, and Sport users, and

WHEREAS, Camp 70 believes Wayne Anthony Ross will not work towards ending the energy price disparity that exists between predominantly Native rural communities and urban non-Native communities that seem to enjoy comparatively low cost of energy, and

WHEREAS, Camp 70 believes these issues are of regional and statewide concern that can best be addressed by testimony and evidence being provided by Grand Camp on behalf of all Camps organized in favor of ending discrimination and diminishment of Native rights, and

WHEREAS, Camp 70 knows the Attorney General for the State of Alaska has tremendous impact over the day-to-day life of Alaska Natives and therefore must be an individual who understands Native rights and honors the State of Alaska's obligation to treat all Alaskans fairly within the proper framework, jurisdiction and attitude, and

WHEREAS, Camp 70 believes Wayne Anthony Ross does not comprehend, understand and has demonstrated no interest in the special relationship between Alaska Natives, Tribal entities, the United States and the State of Alaska, and

NOW THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED, that the Camp 70 requests that Grand Camp of Alaska Native Brotherhood and Sisterhood take all actions necessary to prevent the confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross by taking actions including:

1. Providing direct testimony against his appointment
2. Calling all Local Camps to action and requesting written and oral testimony against his appointment
3. Providing a copy of this Resolution to Senators Albert Kookesh and Bert Stedman for further distribution to all State Senators
4. Providing a copy of this Resolution to Representatives Beth Kerttula, Cathy Munoz and any other Representative who is a member of the Alaska Native Brotherhood and Sisterhood for further distribution to all State Representatives
5. Authorizing the ANB and ANS Grand Presidents provide written and oral testimony at the Judiciary Committee hearings of each chamber on behalf of all members of the ANB and ANS

RESOLUTION 2009-03

A RESOLUTION IN OPPOSITION TO THE CONFIRMATION OF WAYNE ANTHONY ROSS AS ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

WHEREAS, Kawerak, Inc. is a tribally authorized non-profit consortium whose mission is to assist, promote and provide programs and services to improve the social, economic, educational, and cultural well being of the people within the Bering Strait region; and

WHEREAS, the communities within the Bering Strait region include: Brevig Mission, Council, Diomede, Elim, Gambell, Golovin, King Island, Koyuk, Mary's Igloo, Nome, Savoonga, Shaktoolik, Shishmaref, Solomon, Stebbins, St. Michael, Teller, Unalakleet, Wales and White Mountain; and

WHEREAS, Governor Palin appointed Wayne Anthony Ross to serve as Attorney General for the State of Alaska on March 26, 2009 and the legislature will confirm or not confirm the appointment on April 16, 2009; and

WHEREAS, the Governor's news release, dated March 26, 2009 stated, "As Attorney General, Ross will work with the governor on issues surrounding development of Alaska's rich natural resources as the state continues its efforts to provide energy security for America and lower energy costs for Alaskans. As Attorney General, Ross also will help the governor protect Alaskans' right to bear arms, and he will work tirelessly to manage Alaska's fish and game resources for abundance through science and not politics. Governor Palin added, "Now more than ever, it is essential that Alaska's sovereignty be protected, that there is unity in Alaska, and that we all stand together to see Alaska's potential fulfilled with energy security contributions to ourselves and the nation, while protecting the Constitution"; and

WHEREAS, subsistence is central to our regions existence and vital to the health and welfare of regional residents; and

WHEREAS, Kawerak, Inc. supports a rural subsistence preference over sport and commercial interests to insure residents within the Bering Strait region can harvest fish and game for their health and welfare; and

WHEREAS, Subsistence has priority over sport and commercial interests in the State of Alaska; and

WHEREAS, Govenor Palin's Attorney General must insure that subsistence take priority over other interests as prescribed in law and regulation; and

WHEREAS, Wayne Anthony Ross, represented sport hunters in the 1989 lawsuit that overturned as unconstitutional the state's subsistence preference for rural residents; and

WHEREAS, in a Anchorage Daily News, August 13, 1998 article titled "Fed up, Ross stages battle for guns, family and Alaska pride," Wayne Anthony Ross was quoted as saying, "Rural preference is wrong and not necessary to ensure subsistence foods;" and

WHEREAS, tribal governments in Alaska are recognized under federal law; and

WHEREAS, tribal governments provide valuable leadership, resources, processes and tools to address the socio-economic, educational, and cultural needs of the Bering Strait region; and

WHEREAS, Governor Palin, with her authority to appoint key positions such as the Attorney General, has an opportunity to address rural concerns, namely the rural subsistence priority and tribal sovereignty; and

WHEREAS, Wayne Anthony Ross' stance regarding tribal sovereignty is reflected in his comments in the article titled "Indian Country: 2 Destinies, 1 Land" by Tom Kizzia in the Anchorage Daily News, June 29, 1997 in which Mr. Ross was asked to comment on the issue pending in the Venetie Indian Country case. He said "It's a giant leap backward into the 19th century...They want to see Alaska balkanized into little fiefdoms where these self-proclaimed Native leaders will reign supreme with the help from the Great White Father;" and

WHEREAS, Governor Palin's candidate for appointment of Attorney General should be an individual who exemplifies leadership skills that will seek collaboration with all local governments to resolve vital issues which would lead to safe, economically viable AND healthy communities; and

WHEREAS, Wayne Anthony Ross' record and professional stance on rural subsistence priority and tribal sovereignty exemplifies an extreme bias which will further exacerbate the process to resolve vital issues to our regional communities.

NOW THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED THAT the Kawerak Board of Directors oppose the confirmation and appointment of Wayne Anthony Ross to serve as Attorney General for the State of Alaska.

By: _____
Robert Keith, Chairman

CERTIFICATION

I, the undersigned Secretary of the Kawerak, Inc. Board of Directors, hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was adopted by majority vote of the Board of Directors of Kawerak, Inc. during a duly called meeting on this ____ day of April, 2009.

Subject: Ross Confirmation

Dear Representatives and Senators of the State of Alaska Judiciary Committee,

I belong to a very conservative family in the Mat-Su Valley and may be rocking the boat for some; however, in light of the testimony put forth during confirmation hearings for Wayne Ross for Attorney General, I'm compelled to urge you to ask the Governor to provide an alternate candidate that would prove capable of serving all Alaskans.

Some of the testimony given during the hearings is deeply disturbing especially the testimony of Leah Burton, but even if Ms. Burton's allegations turn out to be false other issues have also been brought to attention that cannot be disputed. This is an attorney that has in the past demonstrated a disregard for basic freedoms given to Americans through our constitution such as freedom of speech, and in all honesty his displays of general contempt towards other people, even during these proceedings, leads me to believe that this man is probably not the most stable person the Governor could have chosen for this position. In replacing Talis Colberg, Alaskans deserve better than Wayne Ross.

Thank you,

Subject: Public Comment Re: Vote NO on Confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross as Attorney General

Please add my comment below to the public record.

Dear Members of the House and Senate Judiciary Committees,

I am writing to urge you strongly to vote NO on the appointment of Wayne Anthony Ross as Alaska's Attorney General.

I have followed the political aspirations of Mr. Ross throughout the twenty years that I have lived in Alaska. I must say that I have been appalled many times by his divisiveness, his racist and misogynistic overtones, and with the degree of bullying language that he has often used. It is very clear that Mr. Ross has strong and sometimes extreme political beliefs, including those regarding native sovereignty rights, domestic violence issues, and gay rights.

A person who serves as Attorney General must protect the rights of ALL citizens of Alaska, without prejudice. Objectivity and deference to federal and state law are required of anyone serving in that capacity, by definition of the position. It is clear that Mr. Ross' personal beliefs would preclude his ability to be objective in that position. His appointment would disenfranchise a huge proportion of the Alaska population. The potential for the Attorney General to make politically-biased decisions and court appointments could undermine the rights of many citizens of this state.

I also take exception to this appointment based on the fact that Mr. Ross appears to have no previous administrative experience, and the fact that he does not seem to have experience in other areas of law, including tax law and land use law, which are issues primary to this state.

I hope that you will choose to uphold the rights and concerns of ALL the citizens of the state that you represent, and vote "NO" on this appointment.

Sincerely,
Barbara Hanson

Subject: AG nomination

Dear Ms. Smith:

This comment is for Senate Judiciary Committee (I made an earlier comment today but things seem to be happening quickly).

I just read Mr. Ross's letter responding to Leah Burton's statements.
This letter may be read at:

http://media.adn.com/smedia/2009/04/10/11/4-10-09
_Letter_from_AG_Ross.source.prod_affiliate.7.pdf

Note he also attacks the credibility of a SECOND person who witnessed his remarks at ANOTHER meeting. This meeting was more recent-- he can't deny it occurred, or his presence there, like he denied the 1991 meeting. So apparently the only thing left he can do is attack the credibility of the witness.

Also, in his letter, what's that video store story all about?

This letter entirely seems a bit strange.

I hope we won't feel rushed to decide on Mr. Ross's nomination. If a special session is necessary, so be it. If we Alaskans need more time for answers, let's take it.

I would like to register my severe disapproval of Sarah Palin's pick,Wayne Anthony Ross, for Alaska Attorney General. He shows a blatant disregard for native rights in Alaska. Dear Representative Holmes and Senator French,

I am a registered voter in the Spenard/Turnagain area of Anchorage. I'm writing to ask that you take action to ensure that the appointment of Wayne Anthony Ross is not confirmed. I am fully supportive of "big" personalities and of our governor's right to appoint someone who shares her views on many issues, however I feel that Mr. Ross is not an acceptable choice for Alaska. I do not believe, as he claims, that he will be a different person representing the state versus private citizens.
A vote to confirm him would be an insult to women, Native Alaskans, indeed-- to all Alaskans. Please urge the governor to find a more suitable candidate.

Dear Ms. McGuire & Representative Johnson:

I am writing you to request that you do not confirm Mr. Wayne Anthony Ross for the position of State Attorney General.

I believe that Mr. Ross does not have the disposition to be able to carry out the duties of the State Attorney General in a fair and impartial manner and for the benefit of ALL Alaskans. The obvious disdain with which Mr. Ross' holds people who disagree or who live lives unlike his own make it impossible to for me to think that he will carry out the responsibilities of the Attorney General.

Mr. Ross' opinion that there should be no subsistence preference bizarre and offensive, since there is literally no other way for people in rural Alaska to subsist. The opinions he has stated are one straw short of outright bigotry. His statements (for example testimony at yesterdays hearing) betray his view of the world: WAR. He likens the Federal government to a bear or giant out to devour Alaskans, and likens himself to a general at war (with the Feds?). He finds gays "degenerate," dismisses tribal sovereignty, and opposes the women's rights movement. If these are the people he does not represent, who are left? Is this really the best person Alaska can find to stand up and fight for our rights when we have been victims of violence or a miscarriage of justice?

Thank you for considering this opinion,

Dear Senator,

I urge you to vote NO on the confimation of Wayne Anthony Ross as Attorney General. His record and his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee both indicate that he is unsuited to be the State of Alaska's chief legal officer.

He is unfit to serve as Attorney General because of

1. His opposition to the subsistence rights given to rural residents by ANILCA;
2. His characterization of the US government as Alaska's "enemy";
3. The racism expressed in his public statements over the past 20 years, including his statements to the Senate Judiciary Committee; and
4. His statements in public meetings that "If a guy can't rape his wife…who's he gonna rape?" and "There wouldn't be an issue with domestic violence if women would learn to keep their mouths shut." that indicate his prejudice against women, as quoted in the testimony of Leah Burton.

As Ms. Burton said, "His clear racial and gender prejudice raise serious concerns with regard to his ability to represent all residents of the State of Alaska fairly and impartially as their Attorney General." I concur with her conclusion, and ask you to vote against his confirmation as Attorney General.

Testimony for the Record

Senators,

I was going to stay out of this until I began to hear more about Mr. Ross. I have observed the Senate Judiciary Committee, and know you to be real By-the-Constitution legislators. I would hope that means you don't really need to hear from me.

However, if you are weighing the opinions of Alaskans I want you to know that I feel it would be outrageously wrong to put anyone in the AG position who can not be trusted to follow Alaska law without bias toward his own personal views. I fear that Mr. Ross has a personal agenda, or would blindly follow his or the governor's lead, without holding it up to the test of Alaska law.

I'm not one of the minority that you are hearing speak tonight, 4/09/09. However, if there is any truth to his wanting to end ANLCA or any other special consideration for any group, he has no business serving as the AG. I'm just a plain old Caucasian. I did learn, much to the distaste of relatives as I grew up in the South, to particularly respect the rights of the individual to equal/fair treatment. I fear that would not be the case by Mr. Ross.

I hope you reject this candidate.

Subject: Confirmation hearings for Wayne A. Ross

Honorable members of the Alaska State Legislature,

I am writing about the confirmation hearings and proposed appointment of Wayne Anthony Ross for Attorney General of Alaska.

First, let me say that I am a resident of this great state, not someone from outside.

Second, while I am sure that Mr. Ross has some fine qualities, I don't believe that he should be confirmed as OUR Attorney General. I say OUR A.G. because, like all civil servants, we the citizens are his employers. As one of his employers, I think he is fundamentally incapable of equally representing the ALL of the citizens of Alaska, let alone ensuring that every citizens basic constitutional rights are not trampled on. Further, I believe that Mr. Ross is incapable of representing the citizens of this state whenever our rights contradict the chosen path of our Governor.

I find it intolerable that a person who has publically stated "If you can't rape your wife, who can you rape?" would be seriously considered for the position of A.G.

I find it unexplainable that a person who has publically supported a group that advocates committing domestic violence against their wives and children as a means of silencing and forcing familial compliance to avoid "governmental interference" (i.e. being forced to share custody and/or pay child support) would be seriously considered for this position.

I find it inexcusable that someone who has publically made racist comments about minorities would be considered for this position.

I find it unbelievable that a person who believes that the federal government is our enemy would be considered for this position.

I find it laughable that a person who has a long standing membership in a paramilitary group treading the narrow line between "self defense" and being a anti-government militia would be considered for a position within the government.

In short, please do not confirm this individual as OUR A.G. Alaska has no dearth of competent lawyers. Let's all encourage the Governor to choose one who is not a misogynist, domestic violence supporting, racist.

Thank you for your consideration and time,
Sincerely,
Lacy Hamner

To Senators French, Wielechowski, McGuire and Therriault:

I am writing to express my deep concern over the appointment of Wayne Anthony Ross to the position of Attorney General.

Mr. Ross's behaviors over time seem to demonstrate a lack of professionalism coupled with at least an insensitivity to the needs of many people in our state whose values and views differ from his own. Unfortunately his actions may well represent intolerance and lack of respect for others. In many instances these are people who are relatively disempowered (e.g., victims of domestic violence) in the political system, and who require an advocate in the person of the Attorney General. Mr. Ross has given us serious reason to doubt his ability to represent the best interests of all Alaskans.

In addition, his antagonistic stance regarding the relationship between the United States Government and the State of Alaska indicates either an unwillingness or an inability to enter into productive, solution-focused dialogue on complex issues that impact the well-being of Alaskans.

I urge you to reject Mr. Ross's appointment to the position of Attorney General.

Dear Senator French:

Wayne Anthony Ross would be an Alaska Attorney General with a strong political agenda, which I believe is not appropriate for the position. Among other things, I'm afraid that we'll wake to the morning news telling us that the State of Alaska has initiated or signed on to various litigation that we, as a body politic, would never have initiated.

Among my many concerns is his attitude toward gay and lesbian people, whom he has called "degenerates," etc. A number of the finest people I know in their capacity as citizens and community members are gay or lesbian. Moreover, I have two gay nephews and a gay cousin, all wonderful people whom I love. Most people, in fact, have gay and lesbian people in their families. These people deserve the respect and rights of all Americans, and of humans in general. As far as I can tell, being gay is something like being left-handed, a condition that falls to a significant minority of people.

I am also concerned about Mr. Ross's attitudes toward subsistence rights. He is a strong voice for the urban-suburban hunter, which is fine in many situations but not in situations where there is a shortage of game and fish, and urban hunters want to hunt in the backyards of rural communities. The survival of Alaska's rural communities, especially, but not only Native communities, is in question now even more than usual. We need to protect a subsistence preference because it is essential to the economies of rural communities and to the psychological and social basis of rural life.

So I hope you will not confirm Wayne Anthony Ross as State Attorney General.

I am writing to express my concerns about the appointment of Wayne A. Ross as Attorney General of Alaska. A confirmation of this appointment will be detrimental to the people of the State of Alaska. Please do not confirm this appointment.

1. Mr. Ross has taken a position that will undermine the subsistence rights of Alaska Natives.

3. Mr. Ross has taken a position will perpetuate and perhaps increase the incidence of domestic violence in Alaska.

To the Senate & House Judiciary Committees of the State of Alaska,

I am writing this letter to voice my concerns about the appointment by Governor Palin of Wayne Anthony Ross as Attorney General of Alaska. I sincerely hope that this appointment will not be confirmed.

I am certain that you have already heard many constituents voice their quite justified concerns about the position that Mr. Ross has taken in regard to the subsistence rights of Alaska Natives.

I am certain that you have already heard many constituents voice their quite justified concerns about the position that Mr. Ross has taken in regard to homosexuals.

I am certain that you have already heard many constituents voice their quite justified concerns about the position that Mr. Ross has taken in regard to the issue of domestic violence.

I am a born and raised Alaskan who does not believe that the subsistence rights of Alaska Natives in any way infringe on my rights as an Alaskan or citizen of the United States of America. I do not believe that one person's choice of life partner infringes on my personal freedoms or ability to lead an honest, productive and happy life, nor does it infringe on that of my children.

However, words cannot express the concern that I have in regard to Mr. Ross' stated position in regard to domestic violence. Alaska leads the nation in domestic violence and rape statistics. How, in good conscience, can our leadership possibly justify having an Attorney General that holds the beliefs of Mr. Ross? How can our state expect to address and ameliorate these problems with Mr. Ross as our Attorney General?

Domestic violence is a generational problem; I speak as the granddaughter of a woman beaten and eventually killed by her husband. My mother, my aunts and uncles, my cousins and I have grown up without the love of my grandmother. Children are shaped by exposure to domestic violence. Families are changed forever. What is the cost to individuals and society when the cycle of domestic violence is not addressed and treated?

Should Mr. Ross be confirmed as Attorney General, Alaskans will get an Attorney General more concerned with undermining the rural subsistence rights of Alaskan Natives than with addressing the prejudices and challenges that they face daily. Should Mr. Ross be confirmed, Alaskans will get an Attorney General committed to abolishing the rights of gay, lesbian and transgendered Alaskans, rather than supporting the rights of each and every Alaskan regardless of their sexual orientation or religious beliefs. Finally, if Mr. Ross is confirmed as Attorney General, Alaskans will continue to reap the sorrows perpetrated and perpetuated by domestic violence and rape as he fights for gun rights instead of human rights.

Please do not confirm Mr. Ross as Attorney General of Alaska.

Sincerely,

Sheila Reynolds

Hello

My name is James Helm. I live in Juneau. I wish to go on record as not supporting the nomination of Mr. Ross to state Attorney General. After having seen his stand on issues like subsistence and reviewing a number of cases that he under took while in private practice I do not think he is an appropriate choice for this important office.

His defense of Rep. Kohring indicates to me that he is not on the right side of the corruption issue. We need an Attorney General that will prosecute not defend government corruption. He may state that he was simply doing his job as a defense attorney but this should still be a red flag to anyone that is concerned with cleaning out governmental corruption.

My next issue is with him comes on his record of respecting personal rights of free speech and demonstration. The specific issue is again his defense of a man in Soldotna that threw water on peaceful anti-war protestors during winter. This man then thought is was so much fun he went back and repeated the action. This time he videoed the incident. This represents an unprovoked assault on people that were peacefully exorcising their constitutionally protected right. Again he may say that he was simply doing his job as a defense attorney, but this once more calls his personal views into question. I do not want an Attorney General that thinks that that kind of behavior in acceptable or defensible. It makes me wonder what he might think was reasonable action to take against people that are protesting actions of the state or it's governor.

I am also concerned about his stance on subsistence. I have not found a single native organization that supports his nomination. His refusal to see the importance and need for a rural priority in the subsistence program makes it seem to me that he does not have a good idea of what it means to live in the bush or to need those subsistence rights to survive. To me this means that he will not be able to truly represent all of the states residents equally. This is a critical issue to many of the villages in western Alaska as it the subsistence fishing and hunting problems as well as the high energy costs that are causing a true crisis in this area.

My final issue with the appointment of Mr. Ross to this post is that he has personally represented Gov. Palin in the past as a personal attorney. Given the number of ethics complaints that have been files against our current Governor and that the Attorney General is directly involved in this process is to me a conflict of interest. The Job of the Attorney General in the ethics process is to help decide if a complaint is valid on its merits, not to simply defend the governor regardless of what is alleged. This post should be totally non partisan and committed to the single purpose of enforcing state law regardless of who is involved. We have all seen what happens when this is not how a governmental legal system is not run this way. The fall out from the Bush justice department should be a clear warning against appointing someone to a post like this if there is any indication that partisan politics will play a part in the way that they run their office or select their staff. The information I have been able to gather on Mr. Ross and public statement that he has made make me worry that he would run his offices in exactly this partisan manner and this in not something that Alaska needs.

Please understand that my objection to Mr. Ross is not based on political party. I am registered as non-aligned / Independent (can't remember exactly how it is on the voter card) and have voted for both Republican and Democratic candidates in elections past. This is strictly about my own personal concerns that Mr. Ross will not be a fair and impartial enforcer of the law, and his possible conflict of interest with Gov. Palin due to prior representation.

Thank you for your time. I may be contacted at (907) 321-4334 if you have questions or would like further comment.

Subject: Ross confirmation

Dear Ms. Pierson and Ms. Smith:
I have written to all the Senators and all but one of the Representatives, and am writing to you just in case those emails aren't read in time, somehow.

I am writing to add my voice to those who ask that the legislature NOT confirm Wayne Anthony Ross as Attorney General for Alaska. I have been an Alaskan for almost thirty years. I am appalled by Mr. Ross's rhetoric, outlook, politics and lack of insight or even common decency - not to mention that even his legal credentials are unimpressive.

I have listened to portions of the senate hearings, and am concerned about Mr. Ross' very personal interpretation of the law to use it to condone racism, misogyny, domestic violence, anti-American violence, interpersonal violence, ecological violence, ignorance of all but his own narrow interests, and a disregard for — ironically — the rule of law.

I write to speak out against confirming Mr. Ross to take on this important position in Alaska's government. This is possibly one of the most important decisions the legislature will make this session, in my opinion. It is not a partisan issue, in spite of the current tendency to make everything partisan, and I fear that if it is viewed as such, without serious reflection, the state of Alaska and all of its people will suffer irreparable damage from making this choice by a partisan vote.

Senators, Representatives, please listen to Mr. Ross very carefully - and ask yourself if this man is the best, fairest, most level-headed, intelligent, virtuous and honest legal mind that you would choose to guide and represent the state of Alaska.

Sincerely,
Carol Ford

Honorable SJUD Chair French and Committee Members,

I am writing to express my concern over the Governor's nomination of Wayne Anthony Ross for Alaska Attorney General. In my view, Mr. Ross is eminently unqualified for this important position.

Mr. Ross has gone to some lengths, over the years, to portray himself as outside the mainstream in his personal views and actions. Former legislators, Alaska news media and even the nominee himself have painted him with this brush. Mr. Ross gives the appearance in his word and deed of being out of step with much of the American public, even advocating discrimination and promoting ownership of concealed weapons. One has good cause to wonder if he will focus on these issues to the detriment of other aspects of the role of Attorney General.

Mr. Ross has served as counsel to the Governor in the past. I have concerns that the Governor may seek to use this to invoke attorney-client privilege to avoid or obstruct prosecution in her multiple ethics-related charges.

Mr. Ross has had some ethics quandaries of his own. As a director for the NRA, he was charged with ethics violations in using his role to promote Republican candidates who had not been endorsed by the NRA leadership. Though the charges were dismissed, certainly there are other, equally capable attorneys in Alaska without the taint of impropriety.

Do we need an Attorney General who has been variously termed by the media and legislators as "the hero of his own life", a "goober candidate" and "someone who hates to be wrong"? With all the scandal and mockery of Alaskan politics nationally and internationally, don't the people of Alaska deserve an Attorney General who remains above the fray, rather than being the source of it?

There have been hints that Mr. Ross has been less-than-favorably rated by the Alaska Bar. In trying to research more on this, I noted that although Mr. Ross touts his pro-bono work (much around gun ownership and advancing his own views) he has never been recognized for this by the bar. That seems interesting, considering Mr. Ross's claims.

Do we need an Attorney General who finds it seemly to debate constitutional issues in "Soldier of Fortune" magazine (and apparently, not entirely on the money when it comes to his interpretation).

I am concerned for the potential conflict-of-interest between Mr. Ross's duties as an Attorney General and that of an attorney for Governor Palin's personal matters. Mr. Ross's first duty is to the State, but he doesn't give reason for much confidence that he will exercise his responsibilities with the proper emphasis.

Mr. Ross's nomination has met with consternation by the Alaska Federation of Natives and the Council of Village Presidents, largely over his very public and long-standing opposition to subsistence. He has only recently said he would not make this a central issue if he was appointed to the Attorney General role. How convenient. I believe his appointment is an affront to Alaska Natives, and would oppose his appointment on this issue alone.

Mr. Ross should have reminded the Governor that he is not yet the Attorney General and the announcement on the State web pages are inappropriate at best.

We don't need an Attorney General who is "good enough". We need an Attorney General who is good, and who can help steer Alaska through the various challenges facing us in the upcoming years.

Respectfully,

Dear Senator French,

I am writing this letter on behalf of the Alaska Women's Lobby to express our concern with the appointment of Wayne Anthony Ross to the position of Alaska's Attorney General and to urge you to vote against his confirmation. There are many reasons to object to this appointment.

Following his appointment, it was brought to our attention that at a panel discussion co-sponsored by Alaska Moms for Custodial Justice and UAA, Mr. Ross' comments regarding domestic violence were anti-victim and lacked any compassion for the difficult situation many women in Alaska face. During this panel, held a few years ago, Mr. Ross made comments alluding to domestic violence being the fault of the women's movement and that many domestic violence victims were liars. We hope that you will ask Mr. Ross about this panel and specifically question his views on domestic violence. We also encourage you to have a conversation with the organizers to learn more about his comments. As you know, Alaska has alarmingly high rates of domestic violence and to have an Attorney General that does not fully understand the gravity of this situation would be a disservice to the citizens of our state.

In addition to this, it was recently reported in the Anchorage Daily News that "during a fight several years ago over gay rights, [Allison] Mendel helped organize Anchorage lawyers in support of an anti-discrimination ordinance. Ross wrote a nasty letter to the Bar Association newsletter, using words like 'immoral', 'perversion' and 'degenerates'. The language went way beyond reasonable disagreement, Mendel and others said." This public display of disrespect for members of our community is of great concern to the Women's Lobby and again, we ask that you question Mr. Ross regarding his feelings about gay rights and equal rights as protected by the constitution of our great state.

The Lobby is also concerned with Mr. Ross' pro-gun, anti-choice and anti-subsistence rights views. Throughout the confirmation process, we hope that you will take a close look at Mr. Ross' expressed views as they are divisive for the Office of Attorney General and may be harmful to our state.

We hope that you will be probing and methodical in your confirmation hearings for Wayne Anthony Ross. We feel strongly that voting to confirm Mr. Ross as Alaska's Attorney General would be a step backward. We believe his views are out of line with a majority of Alaskans and he is therefore not qualified to serve in this position. An appointment of someone with such extreme views is not appropriate for a position of such authority. We thank you for taking the time to look into this matter further and for thinking of the best interest of the state and all its' citizens while going through the confirmation process of Mr. Ross.

Sincerely,

Testimony Against the Nomination of Wayne Allen Ross for Attorney General

I am here to oppose the nomination of Wayne Allen Ross for Attorney General. It has become quite obvious that Mr. Ross is a very divisive person. I do not believe that Mr. Ross will be able to represent ALL citizens of Alaska and therefore in my mind is not qualified to hold this very crucial position.

Mr. Ross obviously has very strong beliefs about the LGBT community and views members of that community as immoral and degenerates.

Mr. Ross will also not represent people that believe in women's rights. Wayne Anthony Ross defended protesters who chained themselves to reproductive health clinic check in counters. Because of the all of the services provided by this clinic this stopped women from also getting birth control and STD testing and is more of an issue with privacy and trespassing than anything else. Mr. Ross has made statements that appear to condone marital rape. Marital rape may be allowed in Afghanistan but not in the United States, it is NOT ACCEPTABLE.

Mr. Ross is hostile to our native population. He is opposed to subsistence priority, tribal sovereignty and ANSCA.

Mr. Ross was among several candidates for the Alaska Supreme Court seat vacated by Justice Bryner in 2007, and for the Court of Appeals seat vacated by Judge Stewart in 2008. He did not make the "short list" of qualified applicants sent to the Governor for either seat. If he is not qualified to hold these seats, how can he possibly be qualified to serve as our next AG?

So, Mr. Ross is unlikely to represent women, natives and LBGT community members. Who will Mr. Ross represent? Apparently, white heterosexual males. This representation is fine if it is in the confines of his private business but not for the entire state of Alaska.

Subject: Regarding Mr Ross as Attorney General

Dear Alaska State Senators,

If I had an Alaska State Senator representing my district, I'd contact them about this, but since I do not, I am contacting all of you.

I have been paying attention to the news relating to Mr Ross's selection as the Governor's choice to be Alaska's Attorney General.
Given the initial information about Mr Ross, I was interested to learn how much was true and how much might not be, and what other people with more knowledge and information thought.

Clearly Mr Ross wants to be Attorney General. But, the hearing testimony and news stories I have read leaves me more than a little concerned. He seems to harbor some deep seated feelings that are at best divisive, and in may cases way outside mainstream views. I do not believe he is capable of fairly representing ALL Alaskans.

Please vote against confirming Mr Ross as Attorney General.

Thank you for reading.

Subject: I Am Against WAR 1

Dear Senators:
My name is Ronald T. Stanek, and I strongly oppose the appointment of Wayne Anthony Ross as Alaska Attorney General!! He does not represent my views or those of most Alaska residents. Please do not confirm his appointment.

I have lived in Anchorage for over 30 years. I moved to Alaska for jobs related to my university degrees in wildlife and parks management.
I worked in those fields in the State and Federal governments for 29 years.
I am an avid outdoorsman, actively participating in hunting, sport and commercial fishing, shotgunning, hiking, birding, boating, and many other outdoor activities.
I am also knowledgeable in the human cultural characteristics of Alaska having been an applied anthropologist for almost all of my working career in Alaska, and additional time in Africa.

Mr. Ross' past actions and current views regarding natural resource laws in Alaska have resulted in very damaging natural resource management practices and relationships among many public interest groups and Government agencies.
His (and his associates') actions in removing the Rural Preference only in times of resource shortages in the Subsistence Law have confounded both Federal and State management of sport and subsistence hunting and fishing activities .
Repealing the Rural Preference took away much of the State's right to manage its resources.
Doing so robbed the State of Alaska of Tens of Millions of dollars in Federal funding for wildlife management.
It created a cumbersome, and often confusing dual management system.
It drove a wedge between rural and urban residents.
Other of Mr. Ross' and his associates' actions influenced the State Legislature to deprive the residents of Alaska the opportunity to their constitutional right to a free and fair VOTE on an issue- (amending the state constitution).
If you attribute these problems to provisions in ANILCA, that is wrong, the people passed the Subsistence Law and this reflects Alaskans' recognition of the importance of natural resources as FOOD and CULTURAL IDENTITY to rural and urban residents.
Mr. Ross and his associates (Mr.Rod Arno and others) claim to represent Alaska Sports Hunters and Fishermen. NOTHING COULD BE FARTHER FROM THE TRUTH. They certainly do not represent me and my hunting and fishing partners and my family. In this regard, by appointing Mr. Ross to the AGs office, you will be laying a red carpet for rabid anti-subsistence sots to influence that office. As you know, or at least you should know or learn, these people have caused untold damage to resource management in Alaska through their positions and influence of committees and the Boards of Game and Fish and the legislature.

Lastly, Mr. Ross can not, as a result of his prejudices, be a fair and unbiased representative the interests of the people of Alaska. He does not currently, nor will he be, representative of even a significant fraction of Alaska residents, but rather of a small, very narrow-minded minority. A number of pending lawsuits challenge decisions made by the Boards of Game and Fish. I fear that

Mr. Ross will not adequately defend the Boards' decisions in these matters. Furthermore, it is likely that Mr. Ross will use the AGs office to advance an effort to remove subsistence provisions in ANILCA, this is wrong and not respectful of the needs of rural and urban residents.
Please vote against Mr. Ross's confirmation as AG. Strive to put forth someone who will fairly and equitably represent and defend the people and laws of Alaska.
Thank You!

Dear Senator Hollis,

I am an Alaskan resident and registered voter. I feel that Wayne Anthony Ross is a very poor choice for the position of Attorney General of Alaska. He has shown himself to be a very divisive person that has little or no respect for women or children. That is just a small reason this person is not a good choice for Alaska.

Re: Hearings on the appointment of Wayne A. Ross as Alaska Attorney General

Earlier this afternoon, Wayne Ross provided information as to how he evaluates people. For the record, and according to his measure, I am not a communist, I am not an anarchist, and I love Alaska. Again using Mr. Ross' words, I hope all of you will consider me courageous when I conclude my testimony.

My name is Barbara Bachmeier. As I am an 80% service-disabled veteran and because the VA in Anchorage does not provide the services I need, I'll be leaving soon on an extended trip to California. Today, I believe, will be my last testimony before the Alaska Legislature. I don't want to leave home, but I must. I'd certainly prefer not to give this testimony this afternoon, but I must. I flew in last night arriving at 9:30 p.m. in order to be here today. This matter is that important.

There was a time that I needed to hire an attorney in order to respond to a legal matter involving my expectation that students in Alaska's public high schools should be required to behave honorably and respectfully during the morning ritual recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance. It seems there were administrative personnel, one mother, and one student who disagreed. The mother contacted an attorney and suddenly I was in big legal trouble (civil not criminal).

Somebody suggested that I hire Wayne Ross. "You'll get your money worth from him", this person said. "He'll work hard for you". So, I met with Wayne Ross in his office and told him the facts of the case. My words and his questions took approximately ten minutes. After this, I listened to his response: rehearsed colorful stories and goofy analogies; considerable information about his successful law career; details about the successful career his son had in the US Marine Corps; his wife's excellent baking abilities; and attempted discussions about various souvenir-type items in his office. I discovered later that Mr. Ross charged me for the time he consumed with his unnecessary attempt at entertainment and his "This is My Life" monologue. My financial situation could only have been made worse if he had charged me at the "usual rate"; this experience caused me to realize that I could not afford even Mr. Ross' "military discount rate" given the way his time accounting served only to benefit him.

Either he responded to my somatic clues or ran out of colorful expressions, he eventually stopped the "chit-chat", shifted gears, and presented the grand strategy he would employ in response to my legal problem. He told me he would arrange for hundreds of veterans to muster at a particular location as a "show of force" in support of my reasonable expectation for all public school students during the Pledge of Allegiance to our country.

Behaviorally, Wayne Ross carried himself as if he were a Flag Officer imposter. Perhaps sensing my response to his weird bravado, he assured me he had sufficient military clout to make such a "big deal" military formation take place. Although he did not discuss anything about the Alaska National Guard, he spoke with such effervescence that I fully expected him to propose the activation of the Alaska National Guard for a "Pass and Review" ceremony at someplace like the Anchorage Park Strip.

In Sean Cockerham's Anchorage Daily News article on April 9, 2009, Mr. Ross characterized himself as a " ... general who carries out campaigns." If I were to conduct a functional behavioral analysis of Wayne Ross (calling on my skills as a former SED special education teacher), there would be significant areas involving communications, interpersonal skills (including cheating), time management, and conflict resolution for which one would recommend intervention leading to improvement. I think Mr. Ross is less than he wants to be and makes every effort to overcompensate. During thoughts such as these and really wanting to run from his office, I focused on my need for an attorney that another veteran recommended. I stayed and wrote a check, but I should have followed my instincts.

Not long after I hired and paid Mr. Ross to serve as my attorney, perhaps when Vic Kohring realized he needed to get an attorney, Ross sent me a very brief note; I accepted it at face value although there was no signature (only initials). The quick note revealed that Wayne Ross had taken on "two serious criminal cases" and would no longer be available to help me with my legal problem. He offered to return part of my retainer and recommended that I hire a different attorney to handle my good case. The problem with the alternative plan he crafted was that the returned portion of the hefty retainer caused me to have insufficient funds to hire a new attorney.

As I am a retired lieutenant colonel in military intelligence, I have seen lots of general officers. I served on military assignments from Camp Casey, Korea (within easy artillery range of North Korea) to the Pentagon. There were no officers at any rank who behaved as pompously as Wayne Ross did when we met that first time, and seemingly continues to behave in the present. Wayne Ross is not the kind of individual that our state needs and deserves as her next attorney general. We need somebody who will observe his commitments, keep his word, and work for the common person, like me. We need an Attorney General who will honor veterans and not take advantage of them for personal and professional glory. Using the words he chooses to connote high praise, Alaska needs an attorney general whose "word [one can take] to the bank".

Wayne Ross is not a role model for professional attorneys and Alaska does not need the "band of junkyard dog assistant attorneys general" that he would hire (according to the ADN article referenced above); he graduated in the bottom segment in his law school class; he was not selected for two judgeships for which he made application; he proudly uses "jury nullification" (persuading a jury to return a "Not Guilty" verdict despite its belief that the defendant is "Guilty" of the violation charged) as a defense strategy when courts throughout our country expressly disallow this practice; with regard to his skills, abilities, and competencies, what he demonstrated to me, was nothing but "smoke and mirrors" and a lot of extraneous joking around; and he is dishonest.

In considering how Wayne Ross described Governor Palin as courageous when she took on her party only to get, initially, an unpleasant letter from the Alaska Department of Law, I ask this committee to hear my testimony and find it worthy of honest consideration. Please do not send me a "poison" letter like the rambling one sent to Leah Burton after she submitted written email testimony (therefore explaining perhaps why Wayne Ross was confused by the lack of an official signature on the actual document. Ms. Burton is a professional writer and her work is regarded highly by her peers of all political persuasions.

My being here this afternoon was the honorable thing to do in this matter. I may not be around to give in-person testimony to the legislature again, but I will keep up on what's happening with state government. Perhaps in the future you will hear from me in the form of my writings. I'll stay in touch.

Thank you for your consideration of my testimony. Wayne Ross called Leah Burton a liar and this is not true. It is appropriate for me to tell you that Wayne Ross absolutely lied to me. And to make matters worse, he cheated Alaskans as he cheated me.

Sincerely,

Barbara Bachmeier

Additional points added April 11, 2009:

a) During the public testimony session on April 10, 2009, House Judiciary Committee Chairperson Ramras announced that he had received complaints of harassment directed at some people who earlier provided testimony by telephone from their home telephone numbers. Apparently, people in disagreement with the opposing testimony, responded by finding the telephone number of the persons offering opposing testimony and placing calls to these people for the sole purpose of engaging in harassing and controversial conversation against them. Ramras did not identify which side of the argument allegedly made the harassing telephone calls or which side received them, but instructed those responsible to stop this behavior forthwith.

b) Today, April 11, 2009, I heard from a legislative staff person that the persons receiving the harassing telephone calls were those who spoke in opposition to the confirmation of Wayne A. Ross. The people allegedly making the harassing telephone calls were supporters of Ross' confirmation.

c) I find this alleged behavior absolutely intolerable and unacceptable. I request an immediate investigation into this matter so as to determine whether egregious partisan harassment actually took place and, if so, valid consequences that would be in order.

Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee,

I am concerned with the appointment of Mr. Ross as Alaska's new Attorney General.

Mr. Ross has called Alaska's gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered population "degenerates," "immoral," and referred to being gay as a "perversion" in the state Bar Association newsletter. I want an Attorney General who represents all of Alaska's diverse population – including my loved ones and myself – with unbiased information and without discrimination and homophobia. This isn't only a gay rights issue, it's a human rights issue. Please listen to my voice as well as others when we ask you to consider his comments and know that all people want representation without any sort of discrimination in our state. This is not someone who myself an others want in such an important position in the State of Alaska.

I am writing in opposition to the confirmation of Governor Palin's appointment of Wayne Anthony Ross as attorney general for Alaska. Mr. Ross is an ideologue, with a record of disrespecting and opposing the federally protected subsistence rights of Alaska Natives.

Likewise, like Governor Palin, Mr. Ross supports predator control, a disreputable practice of dubious scientific merit.

He talks about being "the lawyer for the people of Alaska" but, to the contrary, discounts perfunctorily the views of those whom do not share his personal viewpoint, e.g., persons supportive of Alaska Natives' federally protected subsistence rights, those opposed to the Alaska Department of Fish & Game's predator control program, and those supportive of programs that protect the victims of domestic violence, particularly children and women victimized by the brutality of spouses and partners.

Mr. Ross's ill-considered pronouncements on a wide variety of social and legal issues, plus his extreme views in opposition to and disrespect for the supremacy of federal law, disqualify him, in my view, from holding the position of attorney general for Alaska.

Dear Sen. French,

I know Mr. Ross from a past affiliation. His daughter Amy Ross took excellent care of my daughter for 2 summers after school while I worked. She could not have been a finer person. I congratulate Mr. Ross and his wife for raising such a lovely young woman.

However, I would like to go on record as objecting to the Governor's nomination of Mr. Ross for Attorney General of the State of Alaska. I do not think that in a state as diverse as Alaska someone who calls Alaska's gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered population 'degenerates,' 'immoral,' and who referred to being gay as a 'perversion' in a state Bar Association newsletter can represent all Alaskans. This is not a gay or lesbian issue for me, although I am alarmed at his harsh and judgmental statement – this is a human rights issue.

Mr. Ross also has many other opinions that disturb me because he so vehemently advocates for them. We all have opinions but most public servants don't wear their opinions on their sleeves, or their cars, and do not try to push their agendas onto other people's private lives. I do not think Mr. Ross can be a fair minded AG with such to the right of right opinions. His statement about getting a "ticket" to be able to overturn Roe v. Wade is just one example of the agenda he carries with him.

With this nomination of someone who may be a good father but speaks as an extreme and vocal advocate of the far, far right, it looks like Alaska is headed in a direction that is too extreme for all of Alaska's many different people.

Thank you for recording my statement.

Dear Senator French:

Please do not support Wayne Anthony Ross for the position of Attorney General. He does not possess the qualifications, ethical standards or temperament necessary to be the state's top law enforcement official. He has shown expectations of special privilege on more than one occasion, for example, when he threatened to sue the Permanent Fund Division because his son was denied the PFD since he had not lived in Alaska for fourteen years, and when he was turned down for judicial advancements twice by the Alaska Judicial Council. He has shown intolerance on numerous occasions, such as, during a talk on domestic violence he stated that the women's movement emasculated men and was the cause of domestic abuse, he called homosexuals 'degenerates' and pro-choice people 'baby killers'. Ross does not support subsistence rights which are very important for many Alaskans. Again, because of his mediocre professional ratings, openly expressed prejudice, and lack of concern for constituent needs, please do not support Wayne Anthony Ross for the position of Attorney General.

Subject: My testimony against Wayne Anthony Ross as AG

"Does [Wayne Anthony Ross] have the qualifications, ethical standards and temperament to be the state's top law enforcement official and run such an important, politically sensitive department?" asked an ADN editorial.

Qualifications

- Ross has been up for two separate Judicial advancements in the past two years, for the Alaska Supreme Court in 2007 and the Alaska Court of Appeals in 2008. He was not nominated by the Alaska Judicial Council either time. His mediocre Alaska Bar Association scores were cited as the reason he did not receive a nomination.
- In response, he wrote a letter to the Bar Association newsletter complaining about the judicial selection process and the negative comments made about him in the anonymous Bar Survey used to rate the applicants.

Ethics and Temperament
There is an extensive written record on Ross from his two unsuccessful runs for governor and his long history of political activism. His zealous support for a host of controversial causes and his insulting public statements about those who believe differently show intolerance, bad judgement and the inability to seek common ground. He has a long list of enemies, and even his attorney peers and NRA buddies don't want him in positions of power.

- He called on the governor to fire an Assistant Attorney General for her participation in a peaceful animal rights demonstration. ("Animal Activists Real Enemy")
- He threatened to sue the Permanent Fund Dividend division because they denied a check to his son Brian, who had not lived in Alaska for 14 years.
- During a talk on domestic violence, he said that the women's movement emasculated men and was the cause of domestic abuse.
- He promised to fight the federal law requiring rural subsistence, and opposes tribal sovereignty saying, "If the state wants to deal with tribes, it should treat them as it treats fraternal organizations rather than as governments."
- He did not support Mayor Wuerch for re-election because Wuerch refused to help Ross' friend get into the Anchorage Fire Department after the friend failed a required psychological test.
- He publicly stated that pro-choice people are "baby killers," and called gays and lesbians "degenerates" in an open letter to the state Bar Association.
- He endorsed Rick Mystrom for mayor in 2003 "because he fights the unions."
- He represented without fee, and personally supported, a man who twice poured buckets of water from a passing pickup onto anti-war demonstrators.
- He was a founder of Alaska Right to Life and has provided free legal services to anti-abortion activists since 1972.
- He blamed moderate Republicans for the state's fiscal problems saying, "Moderates are mush."
- He is a former vice president of the National Rifle Association and was in line to become president, but was voted out of office by his peers.
- He is frequently described as "arrogant," uncompromising and attention-seeking.

Do we trust an arrogant political activist with mediocre professional ratings, zealous positions on sensitive state issues, and openly expressed prejudice against groups of Alaskan citizens to be "the state's top law enforcement official and run such an important, politically sensitive department?"

I know you will listen to the concerns of the citizens and do what is best for the state. Thank you.

Sincerely,
E. Ross

Subject: Comments Opposing Confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross as Alaska's Attorney General

Dear Senator French,

I am writing to oppose confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross as Alaska's Attorney General.

First, Mr. Ross's qualifications do not support such an appointment. In fact, he was rejected twice in the past by the Alaska Judicial Council for nominations for lesser positions (Alaska Supreme Court in 2007; Alaska Court of Appeals in 2008) because of his mediocre Alaska Bar Association scores. This record, insufficient even for lesser posts, hardly merits an appointment as Attorney General.

Second, Mr. Ross has repeatedly demonstrated a shocking disrespect for the persons and basic rights of people with whom he disagrees. In an open letter to the state Bar Association, for example, he referred to gays and lesbians as "degenerates," a word that implies an inferior and even less than human status. Mr. Ross's public use of language that expresses flagrant disrespect for a significant number of Alaskans raises serious concerns about his capacity to execute the responsibilities of Attorney General in a fair-minded manner.

His public remarks on domestic violence are just as bad, if not worse. They reflect a shocking ignorance of the pervasiveness of violence against women in Alaska, blaming the victims of such violence so as to avoid addressing the criminal nature of such violence. This rhetoric dehumanizes women so as to justify their unequal treatment under the law.

His threat to dismiss an Assistant Attorney General for her private participation in a political demonstration (not to mention his archiving of evidence of this threat on his firm's own website at http://rossandminer.com/articles/90-12-02.htm) raises even more serious concerns about his ability to exercise the responsibilities of Attorney General in an evenhanded fashion, as it demonstrates a lack of respect for a citizen's right to assemble and to engage in political discourse. Does Alaska really want an Attorney General that feels free to violate the rights of those that disagree with him?

Alaska can surely find an Attorney General whose qualifications are stronger than Mr. Ross's and who—unlike Mr. Ross--has demonstrated a capacity for treating all Alaskans, not just those he happens to agree with, with respect and with equality before the law. For these reasons I strongly urge disapproval of Mr. Ross's nomination.

Sincerely,
Chris Coffman

Please enter this into the Senate Judiciary record.

We are very disappointed in Gov. Palin's nomination of Wayne Anthony Ross for Alaska's attorney general.

We understand the Governor's right to have an attorney general who is aligned with her political positions, but surely she could fine a more appropriate candidate.

Alaska has a highly regarded judicial system that results in only the most qualified condidates becoming judges.

Ross has been submitted for two separate Judicial positions in the past two years, for the Alaska Supreme Court in 2007 and the Alaska Court of Appeals in 2008. He was not nominated by the Alaska Judicial Council either time.
His mediocre Alaska Bar Association scores have been cited as the reason he did not receive a nomination.

If he isn't qualified to be a judge in our state, he certainly isn't qualified to be Alaska's next Attorney General.

Please do not confirm him.

Dear Chairman French:

Please ensure my letter is given to each member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Please vote to confirm Wayne Anthony Ross to be Alaska's next Attorney General.

Mr. Ross is an exceptional individual and attorney. He keeps his word, is a man of principal, and will serve to ensure Alaska's best interests are considered.

Governor Palin has chosen him to serve and he deserves to be appointed to fill the position.

Being the fair and impartial chairman you are, I expect that your disdainful behavior toward and the unprofessional political bias that you demonstrated against Governor Palin during the "Trooper-gate" fiasco a thing of the past. Though you failed to lead fairly then, acted in a ways which brought shame to the state, and wasted precious state money, I have all hopes you have since learned to serve Alaska's interests first and not your own liberal political agenda when conducting business from the chair.

Should you oppose Mr. Ross' confirmation, it will be clearly seen by all that your own interests will have trumped Alaska's best interests.
I truly hope this will not be the case.

Mr. Ross, an outstanding and well-respected attorney, should be given nothing short of a considerate and fair hearing.

Thank you for your service and for supporting Mr. Ross.

Dear Senators French and Therriault,
Please include our statements as testimony into the record of the Judiciary Committee and share it with each person on the committee.
I, Bill, have know Wayne Ross since 1972, when he was a State of Alaska Prosecutor. He is an outstanding choice for Attorney General of this great State of Alsaka, which he loves. He is an honorable, Godly man who is bound by principal and will be an exceptional Attorney General. He has been in the legal profession in Alaska for approximately 40 years with experience as a State Prosecutor and his own law firm. He was a vice president of the NRA. He has strong convictions and says what he means, with no pretence or double meaning. He will have best interests of the State in mind while fulfilling the duties of Attorney General.
We cannot urge you strongly enough to confirm the nomination of Wayne Anthony Ross as Attorney General of Alaska. He will do an excellent job.

Dear Judiciary Committee,

We are unable to be involved in the public testimony time concerning Wayne Ross as Attorney General. We are in complete support of this appointment by Governor Palin as Mr. Ross has served us well in the interior on many Constitutional matters. It is not hard to realize he is the man for the job and he is not easily intimidated when pressured. He is a 2nd Amendment Rights advocate and is principled in every area of our lives. He works as an attorney for Individual Rights and stands firm on the Rule of Law--the Constitution.

Any of you who may have reservations do not know the backbone it takes to protect our state in matters of law but Mr. Ross will successfully do it where others will cower. You can be assured of security with him as attorney general.

Here in the Interior when our First Amendment Rights of peaceful assembly were going to be trampled, he stepped in and wrote a letter for us and gave us his phone number to let him know if it happened again. When our fair board was not going to let us have a pro-life booth even though there was a pro-abortion booth, he wrote a letter citing precedent and the case down in the Mat-su and the fair board backed off.

Most importantly, all it takes is a few good men to run the state government well and one of those needs to be Mr. Wayne Ross.

Sincerely,

RE: Wayne Anthony Ross AG Confirmation – SUPPORT

On behalf of the tens of thousands of National Rifle Association members who live in the State of Alaska, I would like to register strong support for the confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross for Attorney General.

The Right to Keep and Bear arms and the natural right of self-defense are fundamental. There are few issues of greater importance to citizens in the State of Alaska. Wayne Anthony Ross is a staunch defender of Constitutional freedom. Based on his proven dedication and passion for the Second Amendment, Alaskans can rest assured their firearm freedoms and hunting heritage will have a consistent defender in the State Attorney General's office.

The National Rifle Association has been quite surprised to hear some of the things alleged by those who have spoken out in their opposition to this confirmation. Particularly shocking are suggestions that the nominee would be weak in going after perpetrators of domestic violence. It is impossible to believe that Wayne Anthony Ross would coddle any criminals, domestic abusers or otherwise.

In closing I would just reiterate, on behalf of its members, the strong support of the National Rifle Association for the confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross to the office of Attorney General for the State of Alaska.

RE: Attorney General Confirmation

For nearly twenty years I have been an Alaskan resident. In 2002, I chose to leave Alaska to pursue a law degree, since Alaska is the only state to not have a law school. During my second year of law school, in 2004, I sought employment with Mr. Ross' law firm. He was known to me as an advocate of second amendment rights and domestic relations. After the summer, I returned to law school ultimately graduating in 2005. I then returned to Alaska and the position of law clerk at the law firm of Ross & Miner. At the same time, I was employed as an adjunct faculty member at the University of Alaska in Anchorage.

It is usually beyond my desires to engage in political matters through the means presented. However, I feel it is necessary, given the recent allegations and questions of Mr. Ross's character that I provide you with this letter. There is no secret between Mr. Ross and I that we differ in various political and religious views. As Mr. Ross attributes his philosophies to his rearing, as do I. My generation is extremely different in many respects from those of the hat-tipping and door opening generation. Today, we multi-task and often forget the consequences of immediate action. However, as a result, we as a culture have become more resilient and tolerant of one another. Mr. Ross exhibits a practice that is respectful and duty bound. While he is often outspoken, he serves as a guarantee that all respective sides of an issue are discussed. This is exactly what Alaska needs.

As for the recent allegations, they are clearly false. During my term of employment with Mr. Ross, never did I see him treat, act or hint of anything less than full advocacy for the preservation of dignity for both sexes. He has always proved himself to be a strong and capable advocate for both men and women whose rights have been violated or compromised.

According to his reply to the Burton letter, Mr. Ross states that a claim was made regarding statements during a UAA forum. I offer to you that he attended that meeting at my request and I was also at that meeting. The forum was in fact a summary of a study on domestic violence in Alaska. When asked by the panel of what other factors or considerations should be measured, Mr. Ross replied that it may be important to also identify the male victims of domestic violence. He added that it should be determined whether a reporting could be accurate with the likelihood of a stigma being attached to those individuals who do report. Mr. Ross then added, through his professional experience, that restraining orders are sometimes misused by petitioners to immediately secure property and custody. I assure you that Mr. Ross made no sexist comments during this forum. He merely wished the panel to remain objective, view all sides and determine that victims of domestic violence are not limited to a single gender.

In closing, I can offer little more than that which I have already provided as a testimonial of Mr. Ross' character and fitness as Attorney General. It is my sincere belief that as representatives of the public and guardians of the Alaska Constitution that you reject the temptation to allow a difference of opinion guide you away from your duty. There is no question that Mr. Ross is passionate in his personal beliefs. But his sense of duty to Alaska trumps any personal philosophy. That alone will provide the greatest guarantee that individual rights in Alaska will be protected upon his confirmation.

Sincerely,

Christopher M. Cromer

He has showed in the past to be a good man who stands up for Alaska and what is right. His record is as good as it gets. He is a honest man who does not falter to or be corrupted by the media, or other groups but plays it as he sees it, fair and honest. He has been a leader in NRA issues and stands up for the conservative rights my family lives by and live in Alaska for. We are writing to voice our support of Wayne Anthony Ross for Attorney General for the State of Alaska. While we have only spent a little time with him personally, we see his actions at Church and hear statements he has made in the paper and in public, and know people who are good friends of his. What I hear from Mr. Ross is always clearly stated, what you see is what you get. We need people like him in our government that live by principals, even if they aren't always the most popular principals at the time.

Wayne Ross is one who would treat everyone fairly while looking at the law for our state. As a fellow Catholic, I know that Wayne looks at every person with the respect and dignity due to each person by their nature of being created by God (basic Catholic teaching). Wayne Ross is a very ethical and moral man, qualities that are essential for the Attorney General role.

4-8-09 Jake's testimony for the Ak.Senate Judiciary Committee Hearing on Confirmation of Wayne Anthony Ross for Attorney General

I've known Wayne Anthony Ross for many years & accompanied him in many endeavors, from hunting & fishing to political issues.

I've seen him in times of stress & disappointment. He is consistent in good times & bad. He does not panic or succum to knee jerk temptations.

His defense of the water thrower, behavior which neither he nor I approved, was courageous; however, bound to bring him bad PR, but indicative of his devotion to the law.

Every man deserves his day in court & proper defense. The foundation for the US is based upon individual rights, not group or mob rights, as Wayne Ross knows & practices.

It takes courage, at times, to do the right thing, when it is unpopular. Wayne Anthony Ross does not dodge his responsibilities to do the right thing.

His efforts to secure Subsistence rights, equally for all Alaskans is consistent with our State Constitution & the US Constitution, unprosecutably inclusive.

His tireless consistent defense of the Second Amendment - the right to keep & bear arms - is unpopular with some, but part of our Bill of Rights & crucial to the American & Alaskan way of life.

He knows that the Consitutions (both the US & Alaskan) are owner's manuals - which should be read & followed, by all citizens as owner/operators. Without this adherence to our fundamental rights, our society would slip into chaos, like that which we see in some of the radical societies around the world.

As he stated when Frank Murkowski beat him in the primary election for Governor, "This goes to show that the voters know, as I do, that I'm a better lawyer than politician."

We need this lawyer, not a politician as AG !

It is my hope that Wayne Anthony Ross will be confirmed unanimously by the Alaska Legislature. I know he will serve all Alaskans well.

Re: Confirmation of Wayne Ross

Dear Senator French,

I was a former prosecutor For the State of Alaska. My sister has been a social worker for 30 years in Sacramento, California. My brother-in-law was the head of Child Protective Services before he retired. My niece is a social worker in Oakland Califonia. My Niece's husband is a superving social worker in a unit that deals with severely abused children. I am and attorney and was previously a kintergarden teacher who stayed home to raise my child. I have heard of and seen child abuse cases from both sides of the issue of the removal of a child from a home.

The issue to take a child from a family is a delicate balance where wisdom, knowledge of the brain development of a child, awareness of stages of development and cultural awareness, not regulation, is needed. The State's handling of the "best interests of a child" does not mandate or teach these principles.

Mr. Ross has always been known as someone who listens and, with a bit of humor and good intentions chides people into compliance. His methods, manner, good heart and wisdom are severely needed in a young State with unresolved procedures that deal with delicate issues of grave concern.

Simply put Alaska needs the service of Wayne Anthony Ross. The fact that his opinions differ from some should not be the sum total of the objections to his confirmation. His opinions are based upon a solid understanding of the issues and law and a seering desire to be fair and just. He possesses the integrity that can give State government the respect that we all desire.

Mr. Ross is well known and controversial. His confirmation will reflect well on you and those who vote for him. It sits well with the voters that Mr. Ross did not "buy" his nominations. Favoritism shown to financial supporters, partisan selection, selections based upon nepotism are sensitive issues for the public. Mr. Ross is the product of none of these issues.

I urgently request that you move for his confirmation. His service is sorely needed.

Sincerely,
Mary Jane Sutliff, Attorney

MEMORANDUM

Report and Recommendations: Reducing Sexual Assault in Alaska

Introduction:

Alaska has the highest reported rate of sexual assault in the United States. Between 2003 and 2007, Alaska's reported rate of forcible rape was over two and a half times the national average, with Anchorage reports at almost three times the national rate and Fairbanks reports at over five times the national rate. This does not include all sexual assaults in Alaska, since the definition used in the federal reporting system (the Uniform Crime Report) excludes child victims, male victims, and many other forms of sexual assault. Nevertheless, forcible rape is a greater percentage of all violent crimes reported in Alaska than it is nationally, at 12% of all violent crime in Alaska as opposed to 6% of violent crime in the United States on average.

Between 2003 and 2004, the Troopers received 1,184 reports of sexual violence cases involving forcible rape, sexual assault, or sexual abuse of a minor. Of those, some 884 were deemed to have occurred and to have an identifiable suspect. The troopers then turned over 449 cases, or about half, to the Department of Law for their screening. Of these, 271 were accepted for prosecution, and some 217 convictions resulted.

During hearings of the Senate Judiciary Committee conducted during 2009, committee members heard testimony as to what Alaska can do to reduce sexual assault and improve rates of prosecution and conviction.

The following issues were discussed:

A. Inadequate and inaccurate data:

1. The current system for tracking reports of sexual assault is inadequate at best. The Uniform Crime Report (UCR) excludes many kinds of sexual assault, making it unreliable, even for reported crimes. Not all police departments in Alaska provide information to the UCR, though they are statutorily required to do so. According to the Department of Public Safety, 41 local police departments failed to file the data needed for the Uniform Crime Report in 2007.

2. Alaska has never done a victimization study (a survey that includes both reported and unreported cases). Because of this, we do not know if Alaska's rates of sexual assault are higher, or the rate at which reports are made are higher, or both. So, for example, Fairbanks may have a very high rate of sexual violence, or it may be that citizens are simply more likely to report that violence, or it may be that both these things are true. Nationwide, it is estimated that 52% of sexual assaults are not reported to law enforcement. Without a victimization study, there is no way to know if this is also the case in Alaska.

3. Finally, the statistics that are available, largely collected through studies done by the Justice Center of the University of Alaska, show differences in the groups that are most likely to be victimized in various regions. For instance, a review of Alaska State Trooper cases showed that 94% reports are of victims who were 15 years of age or younger, while 73% of reports coming to the Anchorage Police Department are from victims aged 18 and older.

Recommendations:

- The legislature should fund a victimization survey to determine the actual rate of both reported and unreported sexual assaults in Alaska. This survey should be large enough to look at the state by region, so that programs and policies can be tailored to be most effective.

- Legislation should be enacted requiring the Department of Public Safety to collect annual statistics on reported sexual assault in Alaska as defined in state law. This legislation should require local police department participation.

- A data system should be developed to track sexual assaults from report to conviction. This will require interagency cooperation and so should be addressed by a group such as MAJIC or the Criminal Justice Working Group.

B. Certain resources have a disproportionate and positive impact on cases being accepted for prosecution, yet for the most part no consistent state policy has been implemented to ensure that these best practices are followed.

1. UAA Justice Center studies show that certain factors increase the likelihood of prosecution and conviction. These include the presence of a Village Pubic Safety Officer (VPSO), a Village Police Officer or Tribal Police Officer for crimes in villages. In State Trooper cases where a VPSO was available, rates of serious assault went down by 40% and the likelihood of the case being accepted for prosecution went up by three and a half times.

2. When victims received a medical-forensic exam, it more than doubled the likelihood that their case was accepted for prosecution. Documentation of non-genital injury was particularly important in the eventual decision to prosecute a case. However, of the 15 Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner programs that have been instituted in Alaska, only 4 are currently active.

3. In cases where witnesses were located and interviewed, and where appropriate investigative follow-up and victim support was done, the likelihood of prosecution increased by more than three times.

4. Finally, DNA evidence is becoming increasingly critical to sexual assault prosecutions and testimony indicated that there are significant delays and backlogs in getting this evidence processed in a timely way.

Recommendations:

- The legislature should continue to increase the number of villages with local law enforcement through the VPSO program.

- The legislature should consider grant funding for local hospitals to provide qualified Sexual Assault Nurse Examiners and to support the cost of existing programs. In addition, a pilot project which looks at the use of telemedicine in extending SANE services to rural communities without SANE nurses should be explored.

- Law enforcement agencies should prioritize sexual assault investigations so that investigators have the time to contact potential witnesses, work with victims, and collect any other evidence that may be available in these cases.

- The legislature and the Department of Public Safety must address the needs of the State Crime lab and look at methods to process DNA evidence in a timely way.

C. Alcohol use is significantly associated with sexual assault.

1. In a study of Anchorage Police Department cases, over 60% of victims and 70% of suspects had used alcohol just prior to or at the time of the assault. Similar statistics were also found in a study of cases in Alaska's Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner (SANE) program. In Trooper cases, where the victims tended overwhelmingly to be children, the victim use was 27% and suspect use was 42%. In addition, significant numbers of victims report having consumed alcohol to the point of incapacitation (e.g., Anchorage 23%; Fairbanks 31%). This both increases the vulnerability of the victim to an assault and can make cases more difficult to prosecute.

2. The UAA Justice Center reports that rates of serious injury from assault are 36% lower in dry villages and, further, that cases involving alcohol use are less likely to be referred for prosecution and are less likely to be accepted for prosecution when they are referred.

Recommendations:

- Alaska should continue to support programs and policies that reduce alcohol consumption

- Education efforts in sexual assault awareness and prevention should specifically address alcohol use and its potential adverse effects on personal safety.

D. Ongoing efforts to reduce recidivism by known sex offenders is critically important.

1. In a 1988 study (Abel, et al), of offenders who participated and who admitted to child molestations and rapes, 97% were never arrested for these crimes. The lag time for detection of sex offenders ranges from between 6 years to 16 years according to various national studies.

2. Nationally, almost 45% of prisoners serving time for rape or sexual assault committed their crime while on probation or parole.

Recommendations:

- Alaska should continue to fund and expand its sex offender management programs, particularly the current Containment Model, which utilizes offender polygraphs but in prison and on probation.
- Alaska's Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, which locates offenders who are looking for victims using the internet, should be expanded. This program has resulted in arrests and convictions of adults who would otherwise have offended against children.

The Senate Judiciary Committee would like to thank the many experts who provided their time and knowledge to the committee during these hearings. The committee particularly acknowledges the work done by the UAA Justice Center, which has provided vital leadership in its research regarding violence against women in Alaska.

Reducing Violence Against Women in Alaska

Justice Center, University of Alaska Anchorage. (Fall 2009). "Reducing Violence Against Women in Alaska." Alaska Justice Forum 26(3): 5. Alaska has long been plagued by high rates of violence against women. Relative to the average U.S. rate of forcible rapes reported to law enforcement from 2003 to 2008, the average Alaska rate was 2.6 times higher, the average Anchorage rate was 2.9 times higher, and the average Fairbanks rate was 5.0 times higher. Alaska has the highest rate of forcible rape reported to law enforcement out of all U.S states. This article summarizes recent recommendations from the Alaska Senate Judiciary Committee and from Governor Sean Parnell to reduce violence against women in Alaska.

- Violence against women

Alaska has long been plagued by astonishingly high rates of violence against women. National statistics on forcible rapes reported to law enforcement provide one example. Relative to the average U.S. rate from 2003 to 2008, the average Alaska rate was 2.6 times higher, the average Anchorage rate was 2.9 times higher, and the average Fairbanks rate was 5.0 times higher. Alaska has the highest rate of forcible rape reported to law enforcement out of all U.S states. While changing these trends is a daunting task, several initiatives are currently being considered. In chronological order, they include recommendations from the Alaska Senate Judiciary Committee and initiatives from Governor Sean Parnell.

Alaska Senate Judiciary Committee Recommendations to Reduce Sexual Assault in Alaska

Four major areas are outlined in the recommendations: (1) getting better data on sexual assault, (2) increasing the number of successful prosecutions, (3) addressing the alcohol and sexual assault nexus, and (4) reducing recidivism by known sex offenders.

A brief summary of the recommendations follows:

- Improve data systems to track sexual assault cases statewide from report to conviction.
- Fund a victimization study to determine the actual rates of both reported and unreported sexual assaults.
- Increase the number of villages with local law enforcement through the Village Public Safety Officer (VPSO) program.
- Consider grant funding for local hospitals to provide qualified Sexual Assault Nurse Examiners (SANEs) and continue to support the cost of existing programs.
- Review ways to increase the State Crime Lab's ability to process DNA evidence in a timely way.
- Continue to support, as a state, programs and policies to reduce alcohol consumption.
- Address alcohol use specifically, and its potential negative impact on personal safety, in education programs about sexual assault awareness and prevention.
- Continue to fund and expand Alaska sex offender management programs.

- Expand Alaska's Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force which locates offenders who are looking for victims using the internet.

Governor Sean Parnell's Initiative to Reduce Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault

Three major areas are outlined in the initiative: (1) putting abusers behind bars, (2) helping victims heal, and (3) preventing abuse.

A brief summary of the recommendations follows:

- Launch a public education campaign encouraging Alaska's men to "Choose Respect."
- Increase law enforcement presence in every community that desires it, with new Village Public Safety Officers (VPSOs) and Alaska State Troopers.
- Fund specialized domestic violence/sexual assault training across multiple disciplines.
- Toughen penalties for sexual assault crimes, and toughen guidelines for prosecutors.
- Strengthen sex offender registry requirements.
- Expand prisoner re-entry programs to reduce recidivism among offenders.
- Increase support for victims of abuse including funding for shelters and the availability of pro bono legal services.
- Create a position within the Alaska Department of Law to coordinate state, federal, tribal, and non-profit domestic violence and sexual assault programs.
- Work with youth, community leaders, private sector, and religious organizations to raise awareness and develop prevention strategies.

STANDARD UCR CAUTIONS

- UCR Statistics exclude:
  - Rapes not reported to law enforcement,
  - Statutory rapes,
  - Incapacitated rapes,
  - Rapes with male victims,
  - Other sex offenses,
  - Rapes with more serious offenses (homicide).
- Reporting agencies vary by year.
- Rankings are invalid assessments (ignore variables that affect crime).

UAA Justice Center

VICTIMIZATION SURVEYS

- No data on forcible rape or sexual assault for Alaska…
  - Samples often too small
  - No forcible rape / sexual assault questions
- True victimization rates are unknown
- Factors that affect reporting are unknown
- Most vulnerable populations remain hidden

UAA Justice Center

COST OF VICTIMIZATION

- Victim costs are $114,517 per victimization
  - Costs include tangible & intangible victim costs
  - Costs exclude all offender & justice costs
- Total victim costs in 2007:
  - $60.6 Million in Alaska, $29.4 Million in Anchorage, $4.9 Million in Fairbanks
- Reducing the rate by 36% would save:
  - $21.8 Million in Alaska, $10.6 Million in Anchorage, $1.8 Million in Fairbanks

UAA Justice Center

STUDIES ONLY INCLUDE...

- Offenses reported to law enforcement
  - 52% of sexual assaults are not reported to law enforcement (BJS 2003); % in Alaska is unknown
- Information from official reports
  - Document report characteristics rather than offense characteristics; offense characteristics often remain unknown, particularly when victims used alcohol
- Data up to 2006
  - Need time to obtain legal resolutions

UAA Justice Center

INTERPRETING RESULTS

- If rates are higher among 15-19 year olds:
  - 15-19 year olds have higher victimization rates,
  - 15-19 year olds have higher reporting rates, or
  - 15-19 year olds have higher victimization and reporting rates.
- If 15-19 year olds are less likely to use alcohol:
  - 15-19 year olds may just be less likely to report alcohol use.

UAA Justice Center

POLICY IMPLICATIONS...

- Difficult when victimization and reporting differences cannot be specified
- Higher victimization rates:
  - Failing to protect a segment of the population
  - Ultimately a sign of failure
- Higher reporting rates:
  - Effective responses for a segment of the population
  - Ultimately a sign of success

EFFECTIVE STRATEGIES

- Enhancing local paraprofessional police presence (VPSO, VPO, TPO):

- Reduces rates of serious injury caused by assault by 40%
- Increases likelihood of accepting cases for prosecution in sexual assault cases by 3.5 times

Justice Center

EFFECTIVE STRATEGIES

- Strengthening local alcohol prohibitions

- Rates of serious injury from assault are 36% lower in dry villages
- Cases with alcohol use are less likely to be referred for prosecution
- Cases with alcohol use are less likely to be accepted for prosecution

Justice Center

EFFECTIVE STRATEGIES

- Enhancing investigation capacity

- Likelihood to refer cases for prosecution is enhanced by more than three times when:
  - witnesses can be located and interviewed
  - time and resources are available to gain victim cooperation
- Having time to investigate and close cases also increases likelihood that cases are accepted for prosecution

UAA Justice Center

EFFECTIVE STRATEGIES

- Promoting access to sexual assault nurse examiners

- Medical-forensic exams more than double the likelihood of accepting cases for prosecution
- Documentation of non-genital injury is particularly important: increases likelihood of referral, acceptance, and conviction
- Offers the best standard of care

RECIDIVISM

- Examined offenders released from Alaska Department of Corrections in 2001, tracked recidivism for three years:

No difference between sex and non-sex offenders

No difference in re-arrest for sex crimes

RECIDIVISM

- Examined juvenile sex offenders released from Alaska Division of Juvenile Justice in FY05-07:

Found two groups of offenders (high & low delinquency)

Both groups showed signs of desistance by age 17, even when controlling for detentions and institutionalizations

ADDITIONAL RESEARCH NEEDS

- Statewide Victimization Survey:
  - Need reliable and valid victimization estimates
  - Identify factors that hinder reporting
  - Evaluate criminal justice response
- Statewide Surveillance System:
  - Track all sexual assaults from report to conviction
  - Collect basic information from each report
  - Provide real-time information and explanations
- Differentiate between high victimization and high reporting

Department of Public Safety
Commissioner Joe Masters

Commissioner's Comments

- Sex crimes are a priority for DPS
- Sex crimes (sexual assault, child sexual abuse and child exploitation) are one of our highest public safety issues
  - Except our initial response to all of our calls for emergency service
- The problem is extensive and thus requires an extraordinary amount of resources
  - We are not able to give every case all the attention it deserves, but overall we do provide the best possible response and service.
  - Alaska, as a whole, has yet to systemically address the issue.

Commissioner's Comments

- "The problems presented by domestic violence and sexual assault are complex. Solutions require change that must come from Alaska as a society. Individuals, families and communities must all become involved until everyone is clear that domestic violence and sexual assault will not be tolerated." (CDVSA Legislative Task Force)
- Alaska needs to make the decision that we are going to actively collaborate so that we are no longer on the defensive. Until we do this, we will continue to remain reactive. We must go on the offensive.
- Partners: Communities, State of Alaska, Municipal Governments, Tribal Governments, Victim Service Providers, Religious Groups, Medical and Mental Health Providers and Others.

Commissioner's Comments

- To effectively respond and plan we need to understand and know the size and scope of the problem.
- We have been working collaboratively over the last several years to obtain reliable and valid statistics.
  - We need to continue our research efforts so that we have reliable and valid estimates regarding victimization
    - AST's data:
      - Is not statewide data as it is not representative of all police agencies
      - Is not longitudinal
      - Does not evaluate convictions and sentences
    - Anecdotal information is costly in terms of money and resources, because it is not inherently accurate
      - If we underestimate the issue we are not properly serving victims

Commissioner's Comments

- The problem is not just a criminal justice problem
- It is a social and public health problem
- Within DPS, CDVSA is best suited and situated to address the issue within both the public and private sector.
  - Members from Public Safety, Law, Health, Corrections and Education
    - DPS supports CDVSA in all of their efforts
  - CDVSA has developed a strategic plan for a violence free Alaska
    - Prevention, Crisis Management and Intervention, Perpetrator Accountability and Council Effectiveness

Colonel Holloway

- CY 2007 Sexual Assault: 359 cases, 514 offenses with 65 offenses unfounded
- CY 2008 Sexual Assault: 284 cases, 347 offenses with 43 offenses unfounded

- CY 2007 Sexual Abuse of Minor: 353 cases, 565 offenses with 77 offenses unfounded
- CY 2008 Sexual Abuse of Minor: 253 cases, 394 offenses with 36 offenses unfounded

Colonel Holloway
What AST is Not Always Able to Do

- More follow-up with victims
  - Safety checks
  - Follow-up interviews and forensic exams
- Coordination with DOL and timely requested follow-up
- Necessary or more thorough crime scene documentation
- Thorough investigations into prior incidents with the suspect
- Sex Offender Registry (SOR)
- Getting out to communities for “rumors”

Colonel Holloway
What We Are Doing

- All AST authorized positions are filled
  - Less experienced work force
- BHP- 10 Troopers
- Court Service Officer (CSO) hires
- JAG Stimulus Grant (5 ABI and 3 Municipal)
  - Team approach is best practice and successful
- VPSO
  - 22 newly funded positions for FY 10
  - Training, mentoring, case oversight and assisting in recruitment
  - 60% increase in convictions where a VPSO is in the village
- Our response is always dependent on weather and other limiting conditions
  - Aviation services

Katie TePas
What We Are Doing

- With federal funds from the Office on Violence Against Women:
  - Sexual Assault Evidence Collection Kits
  - SART training
  - Equipment for municipal police departments and hospitals
  - Advanced level training
  - Payment of forensic portion of exams for municipal police departments
    - This is an earmark and thus we are concerned about sustainability
    - Cost of the forensic portion of the exam range from $800-$3200. This does not include the cost of transportation or per diem.
  - Funding a DNA analyst position and back log project for unknown offender sexual assault cases
    - 200 unknown previously worked with Polymarker and DQ-Alpha AND 90 backlogged unknown suspect
  - First responder training (pilot project)
  - Data analysis

Katie TePas
Previous Studies

- UAA Sexual Assault, DV and Stalking
  - We desired reliable and valid data as well as an objective critique regarding our response to these crimes
  - OVW and NIJ funds
- Sexual Assault study
  - Enhanced forensic training for rural troopers (OVW funds)
    - Needs to be re-occurring

Katie TePas
Proposed Studies

- Statewide victimization survey
  - Partnering with UAA
  - Partial funding from CDVSA (FY 10)
- Real time data from all police agencies specific to sexual assault
  - Will be seeking funding from NIJ and partnering with UAA
- Legislation for statewide criminal justice statistics to be collected by DPS (AACOP)
  - Based on Alaska criteria and not UCR

Katie TePas
CDVSA Funded Program Data

- Persons who sought services from CDVSA funded programs that identified SA as their primary issue
  - FY 2005: 516
  - FY 2006: 653
  - FY 2007: 740
  - FY 2008: 803

Katie TePas
CDVSA

- CDVSA (FY 10) funded 20 victim service programs
- Despite the significant incremental increase ($1.2 PFD), the Council was unable to fund $1,777,657 of the overall requests by victim service programs.
  - CDVSA has $325, 511 in STOP stimulus funds
    - Services, Training, Officers, Prosecutors
  - CDVSA has $517, 750 in VOCA stimulus funds
    - Victim's of Crime Act
  - CDVSA has $218,00 is SASP funds
    - Sexual Assault Services Programs (direct service)

CDVSA Strategic Plan

- CDVSA Legislative Task Force
  - Overarching recommendation was to develop and implement a strategic plan
- Crisis Management and Intervention
- Prevention
  - RPE (ANDVSA and Public Health)
  - Statewide primary prevention and public awareness campaign with ANDVSA
    - CHANGING OF SOCIAL NORMS
      - Provide knowledge, change attitudes and change behaviors
      - Coaching Boys to Men
    - Increase in awareness of the incidence of violence in Alaska
- Perpetrator Accountability
- Council Effectiveness
  - Define and describe the scope and impact of dv and sa

Commissioner's Comments

- If we do a better job, victims will feel more empowered in reporting and every community and family will be safer.
  - A better job will mean an increase in cases which will impact all departments.
  - Over time, through primary and secondary prevention efforts, the number of assaults should decrease.
- We need to keep asking ourselves if we are doing enough and are we accurately defining and describing the scope of the problem.

Now Is The Time

- If we do not acknowledge the problem and get on the offensive as a statewide team, we will continue to have generations of victims and offenders and we will not make an substantive improvement.
- Now is the time.

Senator Hollis French
716 W. 4th Ave., Suite 420
Anchorage, AK 99501-2133

Dear Senator French:

Thank you for meeting with Lisa, Nancy and myself on October 7, 2009. Enclosed is a copy of the Office for Victims of Crime, Technical and Training Assistance Center's Final Report that the Network contracted to have prepared in 2007. As you will note, the Network has been working on addressing many of the issues raised in the Senate Judiciary Committee Hearing on August 3, 2009 for over 20 years and we are happy to share our expertise on these issues.

The OVC TTAC report is a result of the Network's request for technical assistance and consultation addressing three specific areas to be researched and recommendations to be developed into a strategic plan. First, we requested that the number of sexual assault actually occurring be determined and the rate of intervention; second, we requested an analysis of the use of telemedicine as a possible solution to provide care in remote areas of the state; third, we requested that training and adherence to and improvement of standards of care and state protocols for responding to sexual assault be evaluated. In addition, the Network requested that the consultant chosen to perform this work, have experience in sexual assault issues and in particular, those issues in rural areas. The consultant chosen traveled to Alaska, visited many communities and spoke with many of the key stakeholders. The result is the attached report.

While many of the issues remain the same 12 years later, we have made some progress. In 2009, the legislature appropriated the first monies to the Council on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault for data collection and prevention. The data collection project is helping to fund Dr. Rosay's victimization survey to be conducted later this year. In addition, the Council contracted with the Network to initiate a public messaging campaign and move forward with a social norms campaign that will engage communities in shifting social norms around intimate partner violence. These prevention campaigns are the first step in the long term investment of moving upstream and preventing intimate partner and sexual violence before it occurs.

Further, as we indicated to you, we have continued to watch the promising development of telemedicine in other areas of health care delivery as a possible solution to providing access to victims in the remote areas of the state. While we are encouraged by further enhancements in many other areas of medicine, there are still significant challenges to implementing such a system that would provide forensic examination services to victims of sexual assault. If these challenges and issues could be addressed and all the key stakeholders were willing to make a commitment of providing equipment, training and funding, it would move the ability to increase reporting and to reduce sexual assaults forward.

Finally, as we indicated, we are in the beginning stages of planning a sexual assault mini-summit with federal earmark funds and will be looking at further exploring many of these issues.

If you have any further questions, please contact me.

Sincerely,

Peggy Brown, Executive Director

Final Report
Alaska Network on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault

Nature of technical assistance:

OVC TTAC provided two days of technical assistance to the Network to explore the critical issues facing victims of sexual assault within Alaska, specifically rural Alaska. This technical assistance focused on interviewing and discussing sexual violence with the Network Director and others throughout the state to identify any common threads of concern that might exist. After significant contact with advocates, prosecution, law enforcement, and nurse examiners, it became clear that several themes permeate the state. This report will outline those themes and provide specific recommendations for future action.

Overview of Sexual Assault in Alaska:

The first and most pressing topic is that Alaska has led the nation in its rape rate for over 20 years. Specifically, the rate of adult sexual assault is 2.5 times greater and child sexual abuse is six (6) times greater than any other state. These statistics are based on reported rapes and represent a small percentage of actual assaults. Also troubling is the fact that American Indian & Alaska Native women are 3.5 times more likely to be sexually assaulted than any other race. The constant reality of sexual violence is something that community members and service providers face each day. The issue of sexual assault and certainly the issue of rural sexual assault are often, simply overwhelming.

There are sound services in place, strong leadership on the issues, community concern, a systems response that has significant successes, and a level of coordination and collaboration that surpasses much of the rest of the country. However, even with all of this in place, the shear volume of sexual assaults and the vast, isolated geography of the state make fully meeting the needs of victims an almost impossible task.

Alaska has 20 programs that serve domestic violence and sexual assault victims. Other than Anchorage, these programs are dual in focus. This means that in addition to serving the extensive needs of domestic violence, the programs have responsibility for addressing the critical needs of sexual assault victims. Providing support and services to all areas of Alaska remains a priority although in most cases, these are only available in the larger communities or "hub" areas. These domestic violence/sexual assault hub programs are responsible for their community as well as the surrounding villages. Some programs have as many as 54 villages in their service area, most of which are not connected by a road system. These villages vary in size and can range from 70-80 residents to larger populations of 1,000 or more. Actual services within the outlying villages are sporadic at best. Efforts are made for program advocates to travel to villages as often as possible and each program provides a toll-free crisis line that can be accessed for support and information.

In general, villages do not have on-site medical services, law enforcement services, or mental health services. Most do have Health Aides and Village Safety Police Officers as resources who provide residents with various types of assistance. For sexual assault victims, they are able to provide initial care and comfort but are not trained to perform the forensic exam or investigate a crime. A complicating factor is that the Health Aides and VPSO are generally related to either the victim or the offender in any given community. This creates a significant lack of privacy for victims stepping forward to report the crime.

In cases where victims do decide to report, they are faced with waiting for contact with a state trooper that is generally located in the hub community. In-person contact with law enforcement and being transported to a hub for an examination can take days, depending on weather conditions. Even after crossing these obstacles, there may be difficulties with the existence and expertise level of the SANE/SART program in some hubs.

SART/SANE:

The SART/SANE model began in Alaska in 1998 and there have been centers established in 14 communities over the years. In discussing current issues regarding this model, it is helpful to distinguish between the two acronyms. SART is the sexual assault response team which consists of advocates, law enforcement and medical personnel who have been trained and collaborate to bring a more coordinated, comprehensive response to victims of sexual assault. SART speaks to the overall coordination, action and protocols of responding to sexual assault. This is a three-pronged approach with the advocate, medical personnel and law enforcement personnel being equally critical to addressing the needs to the victim. This model can be established utilizing services that are available in any given community. It may look differently from place to place but the overall goal is a coordinated response for victims. Although this model is preferred by communities, the coordination and supportive response to victims could be established in any community.

SANE speaks directly to the Sexual Assault Nurse Examiners who have received specific training for completing forensic examinations in cases of sexual assault. The SANE is an important part of the three-pronged approach to victims. The SANE component of SART has been a significant focus in Alaska over the past 10 years. Alaska has a few nurse examiners who are leaders on the issues of training, setting standards of care and addressing systematic change in the overall protocols for forensic examinations. These nurses are well known and respected locally, statewide and nationally and bring much skill and insight to the process.

Preliminary findings suggest that both the SART and the SANE structures need to be further reviewed and addressed. There are difficulties in activating and utilizing the SART structure to its fullest. There are concerns that in some communities, local police departments have returned to interviewing the victim alone for a couple of hours prior to contacting others on the team. In some communities, nurse examiners do not call out the advocate as they feel they are able to serve in both roles. These examples have not been documented but were related by those in the field who are experienced and currently active in providing intervention to victims and are aware of how their communities are responding.

The variation in SANE availability and functioning creates a dilemma in using this model at all. The existence of SANE exams in some areas has created a standard within the courts for evidence not attainable in other areas of the state. As a result victims do not receive equal care and opportunity for prosecution based on where they reside. The SANE model is not a realistic option for small communities in its current form. There are significant struggles to recruit, train and maintain nurse examiners in all communities, including the more urban areas of the state. Anecdotally, there appears to be a reduction in prosecution over the years which could be found to reflect the lack of SANE evidence in some communities.

To determine the most effective process for serving those victims who choose to come forward and report, there needs to be a full review of the SART/SANE responses. It would be helpful to assess what is currently happening in each community, identify specific barriers to effectiveness and determine solutions that would create effective responses to victims regardless of where they reside. Many of the existing struggles have been clearly articulated by current responders. The issues of turnover in staffing, extensive training needs to maintain expertise, team members not working together in some cases, cases being pled down in a significant numbers of cases, and the exacerbation of geographic isolation from services are all a part of what needs to be addressed more extensively to make the systems response to sexual assault more effective.

Telemedicine:

In the face of these existing issues, communities have been seeking solutions. One of the most discussed ideas is that of telemedicine. These discussions are, for the most part, just beginning and there are varied views on its efficacy in real practice. Concerns regarding the use of this technology range from the extensive implementation costs, to the disclosure of evidence requirements, to the added demands on victims and the impact on their privacy. To implement telemedicine, there would need to be a large capital budget that could provide computers, digital cameras and other types of equipment to each location as well as a clear, well-developed implementation plan that would ensure victim safety.

There are specific concerns around the requirement to disclose all evidence to defense which would now include videos and phone call conversations. There are also concerns regarding the storage and transport of evidence while complying with the chain of evidence, the added costs to bring in additional witnesses involved in exams at remote location and the need that this creates to have witness training, medical training, and legal training at the village level.

Telemedicine is currently being used effectively in several areas of the state for other medical issues and in one area is being utilized for sexual assault examinations. While telemedicine seems to be an excellent solution to rural isolation in theory, there are many issues to be explored more thoroughly to ensure the protection and prioritization of victims.

Addressing and ending the violence:

Beyond the SART/SANE discussions, the most common topic in the interviews was the continued high levels of sexual assault within the state. The common question was, "What are we going to do with stop this violence from happening to our people?" While the question itself comes from exhaustion, frustration and sadness, the fact that everyone is seeking solution is a positive thing. It is clear that there is a collective consciousness of people throughout the state, in all capacities, that the primary concern for Alaska is ending this on-going violence and the time is now. This collective will throughout the state speaks to the determination and hope that Alaskans have about solving this problem no matter how difficult it is. This speaks to the strength of the service providers and members of the communities.

To interrupt this pattern of violence there must be a grassroots community approach and will need to involve all members of the community. There must be an intolerance developed for this violence at every stage of the community and a solution based plan that is created by each community that fits their specific needs. There can be a basic model of approaches, education issues and community action activities to select from but each community will need to use the information in ways that best fit their individual needs and infrastructure.

There has been significant work done in Alaska through a Center for Disease Control project called Delta that is focused on four (4) specific pilot sites within Alaska. There has been significant success and the Director is looking to expand this model to address prevention of sexual assault. The difficulty has been identifying funding streams that can be directed to this purpose. Existing funds remain dedicated to meeting the needs of those who are being victimized each day.

It is clear that ending violence of this magnitude must be initiated at the micro-level with individuals and communities. It will require a multi-faceted approach to building an environment that does not tolerate, implicitly condone, nor accept sexual violence in its many forms. It requires working with individuals and communities beyond the stages of increasing awareness but rather builds individual and community capacity to address these issues in collective ways. Working to determine community-driven solutions that empower individuals to work together in effective ways to interrupt the cycles of sexual assault will be required to empower each village and community to create a plan that will work for them.

Certainly having the highest rate of rape in the Nation for over two decades has devastated many communities and countless individual lives of Alaskans. Any community work that addresses the continued violence must be able to incorporate the healing of those who have experienced multiple traumas that have remained unaddressed through the years. Without this healing, it would be impossible to ask those community members to step forward to address and change the level of sexual violence that is currently happening.

The communities seem poised to begin this work and the advocates, legal system, medical system and law enforcement are all at the ready to work together. The ultimate issue is the lack of resources. The state has worked diligently to explore funding sources that would support these community-based initiatives without reducing the already limited funds available to those being victimized each day. A complicating factor for funding is that almost all federal grants are population based and Alaska, the size of one-third of the United States, with no road systems to most of its communities, gets the same level of funding as an area the size of the District of Columbia with a total area of 69 square miles. Said differently, Alaska is asked to serve an area that is 429.9 times larger than Rhode Island with basically one-half of the funding resources.

In closing, Alaska has a number of unique barriers that need to be considered. Solutions for addressing victims' needs in Alaska need to include progressive action plans that will identify the immediate and short-term changes that need to be addressed as well as a planned, long-term approach to create sustainable solutions at the community level. While there are strong core services in place that work diligently to address as many needs as possible, the needs far exceed the current resources.

This report provides a very brief overview of the problem areas to be addressed based on informal interviews with a few representatives across the state. It does not intend to serve as a full needs assessment on the issues facing Alaska. The report has recommendations for further support and action steps that could more fully address the issue of sexual assault, specifically rural sexual assault, within Alaska.

Immediate issues that need to be addressed:

I. The Network needs to take a strong leadership role in assessing current responses to sexual assault throughout the state to ensure that all responses are best for victims.

- Network-directed assessment of current responses to SA victims to include:
  - Rural response
  - Law enforcement availability and response
  - Medical and SANE/SART response
  - Prosecution Response
  - Development of effective solutions for victims

II. Determine if and how the SART/SANE model is an effective model for Alaska and for victims by researching data on:

- The usage and availability of SART/SANE
- The impact on cases
- The cost of maintaining SART/SANE in Alaska
- Discrepancies in level of care based on location of victim

III. Explore the possibility of telemedicine as a safe, supportive option for victims of sexual assault to:

- Determine technology currently available
- Access safety of this approach for victims
- Identify resource needs, personnel needs and training needs for implementing this tool on a statewide basis
- Create graduated levels of response based on these findings to ensure all victims receive some response
- Develop policies and procedures for utilizing any technological solutions for gathering forensic evidence prior to implementation

Short-Term Needs Identified:

- Address levels of turn-over in key SART positions
- Develop and provide additional witness testimony training for nurse examiners to provide needed support and reduce turnover

- Standards of SART/SANE evidence not consistently available through state. Determine ways of minimizing this reality such as:
    - Training
    - Graduated system of care for all victims
    - Prosecutor training to manage cases without SANE exam
- Address the status of cases:
    - Being reported
    - Having forensic exams
    - Being prosecuted
    - Being pled out

Long-Term Priorities:

I. Develop and implement a statewide strategy to address the overwhelming incidents and impact of sexual assault in Alaska, specifically rural Alaska.

- With full community in-put and direction, create grassroots efforts to:
    - Increase awareness of incidents and impact of sexual assault on community members
    - Develop a no tolerance mentality that supports victims and holds perpetrators accountable with respect to cultural norms
    - Address and heal the multiple and generational issues of trauma that community members have experienced
    - Activate community to take lead on solutions, responses and prevention of sexual assault based on their individual needs and strengths
    - Spread effective models of solution to other communities throughout the state

Alaska Intimate Partner Violence and Sexual Violence Prevention Plan 2010-2016

Alaska

Intimate Partner Violence and Sexual Violence

Primary Prevention Plan

2010 - 2016

DRAFT

This plan was initially developed to complete the Center for Disease Control requirement for Domestic Violence Prevention Enhancements and Leadership Through Alliances (DELTA) Program. A statewide sexual violence prevention plan is being developed and will be fully incorporated into this primary prevention plan.

Forward

Intimate partner and sexual violence in Alaska is frequently referred to as an "epidemic," but the true extent of its damaging effects goes unrecognized. These effects include developmental delays of children being reared in violence, child abuse, substance abuse, self harm, high intentional and unintentional injury rates, and other negative health outcomes. Perhaps most significantly, unaddressed intimate partner violence in families and communities leaves Alaska's young people at risk for unbroken intergenerational patterns of intimate partner violence that spans decades and destroys lives. Intimate partner violence is a devastating reality for many Alaskans. Many organizations and agencies from private media to governmental agencies devote significant resources to address intimate partner violence or the chronic health and safety issues that are shaped by violence within our state.

Nationally, there is a growing movement to work towards preventing violence before it ever occurs by addressing the root causes of violence, using effective prevention principles, strengthening protective factors for our youth and communities, and by using proven or promising practices. Through this document, and emerging efforts around the state, Alaska has begun to join this national movement to work towards building healthier and safer relationships for all Alaskans.

In 2007, Alaska Intimate Partner Domestic Violence Needs and Resource Assessment was conducted by this Statewide Steering Committee and compiled by ANDVSA. Extensive efforts have been made to bring together all available information on prevalence of intimate partner violence, teen dating violence, and the risk and protective factors prevalent within Alaska. While clearly, additional state-specific data is needed, we were able to draw on the existing data and community-based knowledge to shape the goals and outcome of this plan.

Within this context, building on Alaska-specific and national resources to promote healthy relationships, we have developed a plan to prevent intimate partner and sexual violence and to promote healthy relationships.

This plan establishes a framework within which we can organize and coordinate a range of prevention and promotion efforts over the next 8 years. When working in tandem with one another, the seven goals put forward in this plan, act as a foundation, in which we can organize our efforts to collaboratively achieve our vision.

DRAFT

Vision

As Alaskans, we reinforce the social and cultural norms that promote equitable and respectful relationships across the lifespan thereby creating violence-free lives for all Alaskans.

This plan asserts that intimate partner violence and sexual violence is preventable. Successful strategies will embrace these approaches:

- Establish a strengths-based approach to community building, youth empowerment, and healthy relationship / sexual health promotion throughout the state.
- Employ new and innovative approaches to build strong individuals, relationships, and communities.
- Empower youth to take an active role in developing and implementing IPV prevention.
- Ask difficult questions to create dialog and develop potential solutions.
- Develop gender-specific, culturally relevant, and regionally-appropriate approaches to engaging communities throughout Alaska.
- Build on prevention successes of partner agencies within the state and nationally.
- Learn from evidence-based practices in a statewide, national and international context.
- Expand collaborative efforts to strengthen protective factors and reduce risk factors of Alaskan individuals, relationships, and communities.
- Prioritize resources for IPV/SV prevention to create healthy, safe, educationally and economically thriving individuals and communities.
- Develop primary IPV / SV prevention systems to complement secondary prevention and intervention approaches throughout Alaska.

Over the course of the next six years, it is the intention of the SSC to work towards achieving the goals and outcomes within this document, to measure the effectiveness of the prevention/promotion strategies, and to determine how well this plan has been translated into action that results in measurable results.

On behalf of the Statewide Steering Committee, we hope that this plan is a resource for your agency and community and thank you in advance for supporting these efforts to ensure healthy and safe individuals, relationships, and communities for all Alaskans.

Introduction

Preventing Intimate Partner Violence (IPV) and promoting healthy and safe relationships involves the convergence of complex issues, policies, and systems. An effective plan of action brings together diverse voices to work collaboratively and comprehensively to supporting a range of prevention efforts.

With funding support from the Center for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) and coordination by the Alaska Network on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault (ANDVSA), more than 20 individuals participated in the development of a comprehensive approach to promote healthy relationships and prevent IPV/ SV before it occurs.

The Statewide Steering Committee (SSC), worked together for an 18 month period from 2007-2009 to develop an Alaska Prevention Plan. These voices represented diverse professions, regions, cultures, and experiences.

We thank the representatives for their commitment and dedication to building safer relationships and communities in Alaska.

More than 30 individuals, youth and adults, took their time to respond to surveys, phone calls, and individual meetings to provide feedback to this plan. We know that this plan is stronger as a result of the contributions from across the state. Please accept our gratitude for your assistance in developing this document.

This Plan was supported by the ANDVSA DELTA Project which is funded through Cooperative Agreement US4CE02285-6 with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). The contents of this document are solely the responsibility of the authors and do not necessarily represent the official views of ANDVSA or the CDC.

Shared Definitions

There has been considerable discussion about the terminology of intimate partner violence prevention and healthy relationship promotion. To use a common a language for the purposes of this document we have defined healthy relationships, healthy sexuality, and intimate partner violence in the following ways:

Healthy Relationship

A healthy relationship consists of a connection between people that increases well-being, is mutually enjoyable, and enhances or maintains each individual's positive self-concept. Healthy relationships are frequently characterized by:

Mutual Support	Compromise	Trust	Respect
Mutually Fair	Self-Confidence	Honesty	Equality
Understanding/ Empathy		Good communication

Healthy Sexuality

Healthy sexuality implies experiencing sexuality in a state of physical, emotional, social, and cultural well-being while having the capacity to enjoy and control one's own sexual and reproductive behavior in accordance with personal and social ethics.

Intimate Partner Violence

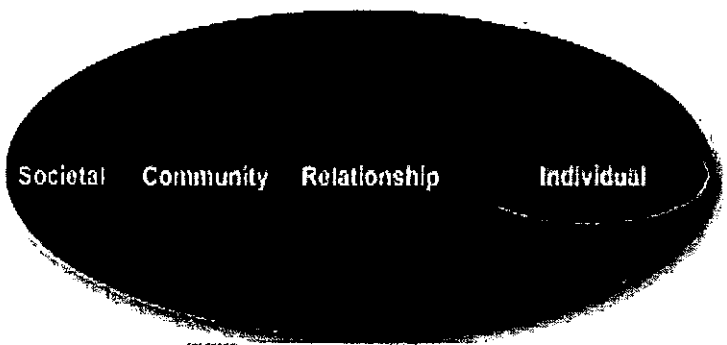
A pattern of assault and coercive behaviors including physical, sexual, economic and psychological abuse that adults or adolescents use against their intimate partners. Intimate partner violence can be seen in both same sex as well as heterosexual relationships.

Sexual Violence

Sexual violence refers to sexual activity where consent is not obtained or freely given.

Primary Prevention of IPV and Promotion of Healthy Relationships

Across the nation, there is growing recognition that reversing health disparities in communities share many commonalities regardless of health concern. First and foremost, successful strategies rely upon prevention, rather than intervention, often primary prevention. Primary prevention efforts seek to bring about change in individuals, relationships, communities, and society.



The focus of primary prevention is to prevent intimate partner violence before it occurs and it is distinguished from secondary prevention because it explicitly focuses on action before there is a threat of violence. Primary prevention efforts foster social norms and environments in which intimate partner violence and sexual violence does not occur. The primary prevention of IPV: 1) Promotes the factors associated with healthy relationships and healthy sexuality, and 2) Counteracts the factors associated with the initial perpetration of sexual violence and intimate partner violence. This work values and builds on the strengths of diverse individuals, cultures, and communities to eliminate the root causes of intimate partner violence, to create healthier social environments.

Purpose of the Prevention Plan

The social, health, educational, and economic costs of intimate partner violence (IPV) are far too great within Alaska. This plan seeks to reverse this trend and to ultimately reduce risk and build strengths to prevent violence before it ever occurs. We know that the impacts of strengthening individuals and relationships in Alaska will positively impact each and every one of us and will influence business, health, education, public safety, and the cultural well-being of all our neighbors across Alaska.

This plan is merely a first step in statewide efforts to prevent violence by reinforcing the social and cultural norms that promote equitable and respectful relationships across the lifespan.

Ultimately, we hope that this plan can support your efforts in creating a healthier and safer Alaska

Whether you become involved in prevention where you work, worship or play, your efforts to promote healthy relationships can make a lasting impact on the lives of many Alaskans.

SSC Recruitment

Original SSC membership included representatives from each DELTA pilot site, university representatives, health and tribal health consortium, tribal justice organizations, rural workers, ANDVSA member programs, local government and others. The SCBT intentionally incorporated diverse perspectives including individuals active in an administrative and managerial capacity, direct services, and research-based work. Geographical, experience-base, and cultural backgrounds were also considerations. Agency retention and make up of the Statewide Steering Committee remained fairly consistent from inception to present.

SSC History

Since September of 2007, the Statewide Steering Committee has collaborated on every aspect of this plan through in-person quarterly meetings and periodic participation in IPV prevention subcommittee work groups. Subcommittees assisted in these key areas: Alaska Profile and Direction (needs and resource assessment), public-used plan, develop evaluation, communication and dissemination, and document preparation. In 2008, the SSC also developed subcommittees to support plan development and implementation around each key goal area: infrastructure, media, youth, education, root causes, data, and community engagement.

SSC Processes

To examine intimate partner violence in Alaska, the Alaska DELTA Project Profile and Direction Subcommittee examined local intimate partner violence prevention and intervention efforts taking place statewide. The communities are geographically and ethnically diverse, and range in size from urban to rural, or geographically isolated. Most communities in Alaska remain inaccessible by road.

DRAFT

To better understand efforts to prevent intimate partner violence around Alaska, the Profile and Direction subcommittee developed and conducted key informant interviews and co-developed a statewide telephone-based survey with individuals in 12 communities, as well as representatives of other statewide organizations and agencies, public and private. Information sought in the key informant interviews and statewide surveys included: perceptions of intimate partner violence, prevalence, consequences of, and individual and community efforts to address intimate partner violence and intimate partner violence prevention.

In addition to the literature review, crime statistics, and key informant interviews, the entire SSC committee participated in an environmental scan that reviewed the Strengths, Weaknesses, Opportunities, and Threats (SWOT) of IPV prevention and healthy relationship promotion across Alaska. This scan identified resources and strengths from which we can build our prevention efforts on.

The review of data reinforced that there is a dearth of information on adequately evaluated primary prevention strategies for preventing IPV nationally, and specifically for rural, remote, and Alaskan Native communities. The data limitations provided direction for future research priorities including: Alaska-specific IPV risk and protective factors, effective prevention strategies for Alaska, and root causes of the statewide health disparities.

These research priorities have been included in the AK plan to promote healthy relationships and prevent intimate partner violence.

Finally, the Profile and Direction Subcommittee gathered and analyzed state and national data related to intimate partner violence from a variety of sources:

1. Alaska Council on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault data
2. Alaska Division of Juvenile Justice case data
3. Alaska-specific Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System (BRFSS) data
4. Alaska Youth Risk Behavior Survey 2003
5. Kids Count Alaska 2006-2007
6. Descriptive Analysis of Sexual Assault Incidents Reported to Alaska State Troopers: 2003-2004
7. Initial Report and Recommendations of the Alaska Rural Justice and Enforcement Commission

GOALS TO PREVENT INTIMATE PARTNER VIOLENCE IN ALASKA 2009-2015

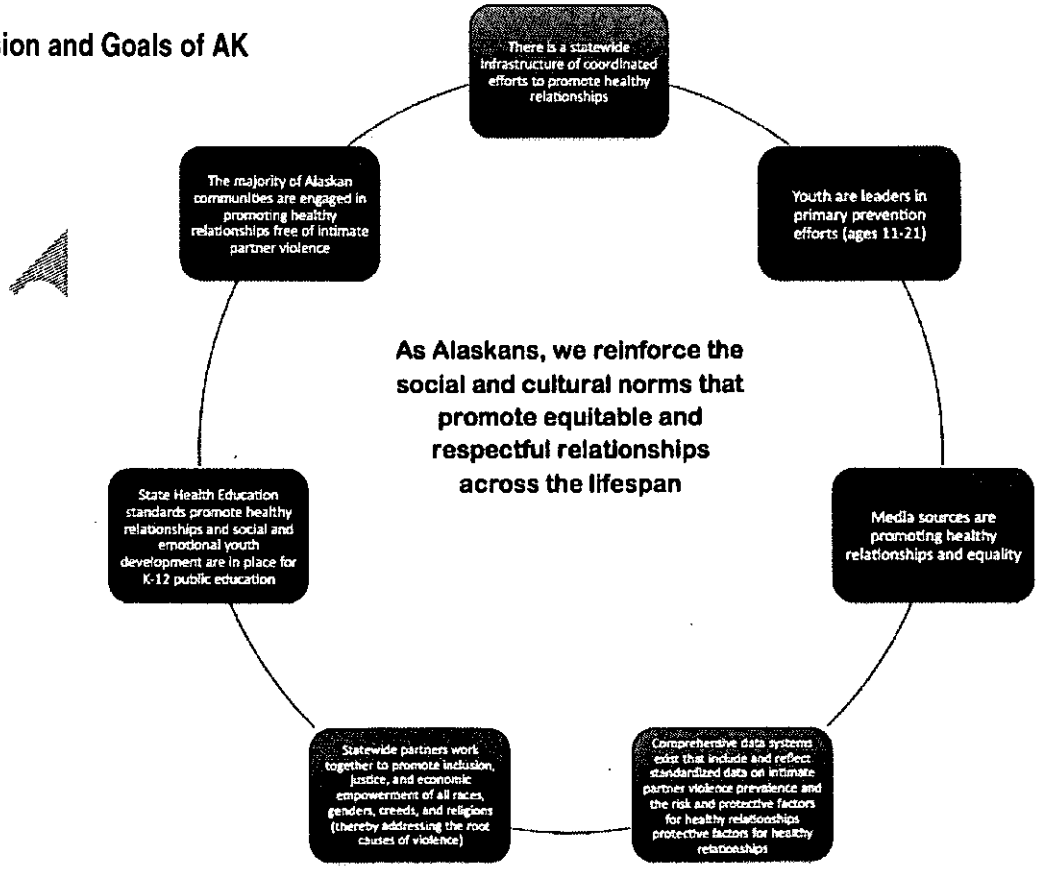
Introduction

Based on the needs and resource assessment, the SSC has developed a shared vision, and a framework for IPV prevention and healthy relationship promotion within AK. The goals and outcomes were generated by the entire statewide steering committee. These are broad goals and measurable outcomes that will support healthy relationship development and prevent IPV.

Contributors to this plan, worked together to review evidence or promising strategies. The number of IPV-specific evidence-based strategies is limited, and those appropriate for Alaska communities, even fewer. In response, this plan prioritizes both research efforts of IPV prevention strategies (currently being used in communities and promising strategies nationally) and support for local community adaptation of promising practice from related fields.

Many of the specific actions and strategies put forward within this document are to be carried out at a statewide level, lending support and establishing an infrastructure for community-driven strategies. The SSC has also prioritized developing a cache of prospective strategies for community level consideration. As we move prevention efforts forward, we anticipate that additional partners will help to establish this cache, building on various prevention, marketing, research, or community expertise.

Vision and Goals of AK



Goal 1) There is a statewide infrastructure of coordinated efforts to promote healthy relationships

Rationale: Intimate partner violence prevention and healthy relationship promotion has had limited coordination and resource allocation in Alaska. These prevention efforts are complex and require comprehensive, coordinated, well-resourced approaches to ensure successful programming at a state and local level. Through increased resource designation to IPV prevention, seamless training and support, and meaningful prevention policy, we can provide a support structure to support the goals and outcomes within this plan and IPV prevention in Alaska.

Outcomes:

Resources

1.1 By January 2010, funding for existing primary prevention programming and initiatives is maintained

1.5 ANDVSA, CDVSA, DHSS, and SSC partners have identified funding strategies (2010) and secured a 20% annual increase in funding for "intimate partner violence prevention plan" implementation.

1.6 From 2010 to 2015, there will be a minimum 10% annual increase in human resources dedicated to the ongoing support of IPV primary prevention at state organizations, as compared to baseline

1.2 Starting in January , there will be a minimum of 10% annual increase in new funding sources (local, state, federal, tribal) for IPV prevention throughout Alaskan communities.

1.3 By January 2011, new primary prevention programming and initiatives will be established to promote healthy relationships at the state level

1.4 By January 2011, new primary prevention programming and initiatives will be established to promote healthy relationships at the local level

Statewide Training & Support

1.7 By January 2012, training infrastructure is in place to support primary prevention initiatives and programming

1.8 By January 2012, evaluation infrastructure is in place to support primary prevention initiatives and programming

Statewide Policies

1.9 Policies that support the primary prevention of intimate partner violence are identified (2012) and adopted (2014), as reflected in public documents such as state legislation, local and tribal policy, memorandums of understanding, and agency documents.

Strategies:

- Educate potential funders about IPV primary prevention and needs for state-level funding
- Identify short and long-term funding for IPV prevention plan implementation, technical assistance, and local efforts.
- Identify and document key staff or "human capital" to implement plan
- Maintain and establish working groups for various goals and for overarching IPV prevention capacity building
- Develop media campaign messages that have Alaska-specific messages to prevent IPV
- Establish recommendations for initiating comprehensive prevention efforts in diverse communities across Alaska.

Goal 2) Youth are leaders in primary prevention efforts (ages 11-21)

Rationale: Effective IPV prevention efforts must build skills and create opportunities for young people to promote healthy relationships. The most effective programs focused on protective factors for youth in the areas of teen pregnancy, substance abuse, and bullying identify youth development and youth leadership as important components. A growing number of youth in Alaska have become more interested in promoting non-violence in relationships and equality in communities. We intend to build on this enthusiasm and movement to shape prevention efforts in this state.

Outcomes:

2.1 By 2010, there are local resources and opportunities for youth to build skills and participate in small projects that promote peace and equality
2.2 From Sept 2010-2015, there will be a 10% increase in the number of youth recognized as statewide leaders in promoting healthy relationships
2.3 By 2012, there is a 40% increase in local and statewide youth leadership training opportunities to promote healthy relationships in and out of school (e.g., conferences, policy-making situations
2.4 By 2012, a 10% increase in youth will providing healthy relationship messages and that are youth-accessible and interesting, both in and out of the school
2.5 By Dec 2014, 60% of state and local decision- making boards, commissions, task forces, and advisory groups have designated seats and identified adult mentors for youth.

Strategies

- Identify and coordinate human resources working on youth leadership to promote healthy relationships and prevent intimate partner violence.
- Compile youth group objectives from across the state to coordinate youth efforts across the state.
- Engage youth coalitions throughout the state that already exist to get more involved in youth-led programming
- Support and expand youth leadership events (e.g., LeadOn!, youth Rotary, AFN Elders and Youth)
- Identify best practices in youth development both nationally and statewide
- Encourage youth groups to have youth leadership as a goal for their own agency's objectives
- Provide healthy relationship train-the-trainer opportunities (e.g. Lead On!) at the youth events
- Research and identify 5 evidence-based promising practices for youth development and leadership training
- Draft legislation that will create designated seats utilized on youth-focused prevention and promotion decision-making boards
- Provide trainings (topical, leadership, legal)
- Support and launch a youth led social marketing/ media campaign (ties in with Goal 3)
- Use of innovative strength building programs (Girls on the Go, Men of Strength etc, Leadership Asset Youth)
- Recognize and honor youth leaders in various locations across the state

Prospective Partners: United Way, AASB, MCH, Behavioral Health, Boys and Girls Clubs, Big Brothers Big Sisters, Boy / Girl Scouts, Youth Development Academy, Alaska Network for Youth, AFN, Member Programs, Spirit of Youth, Rural Cap, Alaska Lung Association, Alaska Youth for Environmental Action, Anchorage Youth Development Coalition, Schools, Church Group Leaders, others? Alaska State Community Service Commission- Mita Mattson, Covenant House, Jake's place, Member programs, public health, tribes, youth centers , residential and afternoon centers, RYLA, MediaAK

Goal 3) Media sources are promoting healthy relationships and equality

Rationale: Media is a primary source of information and entertainment for youth ages 11-21. Exposure to violence and repeated gender stereotypes may cause many youth to feel confused about relationships and violence. Prolonged exposure to violent or aggressive media portrayals results in increased acceptance of violence as an appropriate means of solving problems and achieving one's goals. A growing body of evidence (in tobacco cessation and other areas)[1], [2] confirms that public health driven campaigns speaking to teens in their own voice are effective approaches to influencing behavior.

Outcomes:

3.1 By 2010, there are youth-led, media-supported campaigns promoting healthy relationships
3.2 By 2010, journalists and public relations specialists employed with Alaska radio, television, and newspaper outlets understand the role of media in promoting healthy relationships and preventing intimate partner violence
3.3 By 2011, 50% of regional and state media sources are promoting healthy relationships in their advertising and programming
3.4 By 2012, campaigns developed to promote healthy relationships and positive imaging in the media includes regional artists and "celebrities

Strategies:

- This goal has 2 foci (1) Awareness of the role of media and (2) media campaign/ social marketing for all of DELTA
- Use promising existing media campaigns and adapt to Alaska and tailor to specific Alaska audiences.
- Recruit Alaska spokespeople to promote healthy relationships in Alaska
- Develop advocacy plan to recruit media outlets
- Establish awards for positive advertising and media messaging
- Tie into existing youth groups to develop/ create/ influence media campaign
- Statewide campaign to counteract negative imaging, gender stereotyping and violence
- Link in to local and national campaigns (e.g., my strength is not for hurting- that's not cool)
- Launch campaigns promoting positive identities and relationships
- Launch campaigns exploring cultural implications for IPV and promoting strong cultural identities
- Develop a cache or templates for media campaigns to be adapted and printed upon request of communities (built on research of national and international campaigns)
- Establish tools to develop media literacy and media education in AK
- Seek legislative resolution to protest negative imaging and gender stereotyping

Prospective Partners: Private Radio, TV, and Newspapers across Alaska, Public Radio / TV across Alaska, Alaska Teen Media Institute, MediAK, campus radio stations, military media, musicians, marketing firms, UAA Journalism, UAF Journalism, Alaska Broadcasting Association, Anchorage Daily News

Goal 4) Comprehensive data systems exist that include and reflect standardized

[1] McKenna J, Gutierrez K, McCall K. Strategies for an effective youth counter-marketing program: recommendations from commercial marketing experts. Journal of Public Health Management and Practice,2000; 6(3):7-13. See also Columbia Marketing Panel. (1996). Tobacco Counter-Marketing Strategy Recommendations, Draft Report.

data on intimate partner violence prevalence and the risk and protective factors for healthy relationships
Rationale: Accurate and relevant data for IPV prevention remains scarce in Alaska, particularly for prevalence and protective factors amongst youth. Our success in addressing IPV will be determined in part by our understanding of IPV/SV in Alaska across regions, cultural, economic groups. Our success will also be determined by our ability to effectively evaluate healthy relationship strategies to develop Alaska-appropriate solutions.
Outcomes
4.1 By June 2010, a broad group of researchers and practitioners in the state will identify the risk and protective factor data available relevant for "healthy relationship" promotion. 4.2 By January 2012, Alaska will be funded to participate in the National Incident Based Reporting System (NIBRS). 4.3 By January 2012, mechanisms for gathering data exist that are culturally sensitive and ensure safety when reporting abuse (with particular attention to confidentiality in small villages and the need for aggregating data across villages) 4.4 By 2012, researchers collecting data on interpersonal violence will coordinate to create a central clearinghouse (including website) to share and access information about the risk and protective factor data available for "healthy relationships" and encourage unduplicated data collection 4.5 By 2012, a dynamic body of knowledge will be initiated by the SSC that clarifies the root causes of intimate partner violence in Alaska 4.6 2016, there are 3 promising IPV prevention strategies and national evidence-based strategies that have been evaluated within Alaska
Strategies
• Adopt and participate in the National Incident Based Reporting System (NIBRS) • Develop a workgroup to identify IPV data needs, coordinate IPV data research efforts, and collection mechanisms • Coordinate with Federal, State, Tribal agencies to enhance data • Determine data sharing technology to assist statewide data coordination • Develop an electronic communication strategy that will increase advocacy of IPV prevention research efforts. • Establish more asset (protective factors) based survey mechanisms, build on resiliency work in-state. • Review the SPF-SIG report on population-based indicators • Develop an infrastructure for practitioners to communicate promising practices • Develop protocols or guidelines for culturally responsive data collection, and reporting • Identify local policymaker and other organized groups who will advocate for ongoing funding sources for IPV prevention research • Research prevalence of youth dating violence

Prospective Partners: Alaska Network on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault, Council on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault, Alaska Family Violence Prevention, Alaska Native Justice Center, Alaska Dept of Health And Social Services (Public Health, Behavioral Health), UAA, UAF, legislators, local councils, tribal health, Alaska Federation of Native. Governor. Senators. Alaska Mental Health Trust

Goal 5) Statewide partners work together to promote inclusion, justice, and economic empowerment of all races, cultures, genders, and classes
(thereby addressing the root causes of violence)

Rationale: A disproportionate number of health disparities and risk factors are present within marginalized communities in Alaska. Specific communities and cultural groups have unique prevention needs that should be addressed by tailoring strategies and nuances to enhance prevention effectiveness.

Outcomes

5.1 By 2012, there will be a 50% increase in the number of organizing efforts among Alaskan males to collectively work to promote and respect social equality
5.2 By 2012, key health service, nonprofits, funders, and administrative leaders will recognize the root causes of intimate partner violence
5.3 By 2012, state policy makers will understand the relationship between economic disparity and health indicators as evidenced by new policies and proposals
5.4 By 2013, key health service, nonprofits, funders, and administrative leaders will commit resources to address the root causes of violence
5.6 By 2013, local and state policy makers will commit to programmatic and policy decisions which promote economic parity
5.7 By 2014, intimate partner violence prevention program planning and implementation will reflect the diversity of cultures and communities in Alaska

Strategies

- On all of our committees, organizations, boards, "root causes" are discussed
- Outreach, education, training on root causes of IPV (include youth as messengers) is carried out strategically
- Establish documentation of causal factors of IPV/SV and other social/health disparities
- Work with AFN in the development of resolutions – articulating root cause and relevant strategies
- Work with coaches' certification program to make coaching boys to men a part of their curricula
- Engage boys and men in healthy relationship promotion that includes land-based and outdoor activities
- Support programming that integrates traditional Alaska Native healthy living with healthy relationships.
- Host a conference focused on men's role in ending interpersonal violence
- Promote the Flags on Mountain campaign
- Record and share male elders' stories about equality and respect among men and women
- Implement the "Inspiring Moments" campaign
- Promote media campaigns where men take a lead in intimate violence prevention
- Engage men to serve as positive role models to adult youth
- Engage civic organizations and others to speak about IPV prevention and root causes
- Complete an analysis of economic, educational, and health disparities with a gender and culture-based lens to segment issues and identify population appropriate solutions.

Prospective Partners: Groups who are funded to address poverty, housing, racism; rural voices; marginalized populations, rotary clubs, service organizations with majority male membership, college and high school coaching organizations, LeadOn! youth and planning team, Native youth organizations or groups, AFN, local DELTA-funded communities who have worked to organize men (e.g., Dillingham), ANTHC; Alaska White Ribbon Campaign; UAA fraternities

Goal 6) State Health Education standards that promote healthy relationships And social and emotional youth development are in place for K-12 public education

Rationale: Healthy relationship education and social and emotional development is one piece of a broader strategy to help children and adolescents to make good choices and navigate life-changing developmental minefields such as substance use, bullying, sexual relationships, and violence

Outcomes:

6.1 By Jan 2010, representatives of the State Steering Committee and the Department of Education along with health educators from the schools and universities will develop state education health standards that promote healthy relationships and social and emotional youth development in accordance with evidence-based guidelines
6.2 By Sept 2012, the State Board of Education will adopt the state education health standards drafted in 7.1
6.3 By Sept 2013, all professional and paraprofessional education staff will be required to complete evidence-based professional development that fulfills the Alaska health education statute adopted in 7.2
6.4 By 2014, professional and paraprofessional education staff will integrate k-12 health education promoting healthy relationships and social and emotional youth development into the classroom

Strategies:

- Bring together identified representatives of the SSC, schools, universities, community based health educators and the Dept of Education to develop guidelines as described in 7.1
- Adapt or identify culturally responsive IPV prevention curriculum that has an emphasis on diversity or represents Alaska populations
- Evaluate promising curricula for use in Alaskan communities, such as the Fourth R
- Introduce bill that comprehensively addresses healthy relationship and social and emotional curriculum
- Engage the Statewide School Board to advocate for an incorporated curriculum that is comprehensive and works to address multiple risk factors
- Work with the coordinated school health efforts and special interest groups to review overlapping interests.
- Bring together identified representatives, school, university and community based health educators, Dept of Ed representatives to develop guidelines as described in goal
- Develop educational materials to publicly explain this work, including definitions of healthy relationships
- Ask LeadOn! youth to present in their communities on healthy relationships in their community
- Advocate for an incorporated curriculum that is comprehensive and work to address multiple risk factors

Prospective Partners: Coordinated School Health Program workgroup; groups that are doing healthy lifestyle trainings; Head Start program; special interest groups with similar interests in health curricula; South Central Foundation; Health Education Committee; AFN; ANTHC; Boys & Girls Club; First Alaskans Institute; Covenant House; Rural Cap; Joel's Place; Coaches' certification program – work with these programs and make this part of that training - tap into coaching boys to men; Local Schools; Commissioner and State Board of Education

Goal 7) The majority of Alaskan Communities are engaged in promoting healthy relationships free of intimate partner violence

Rationale: Many individuals are unaware that IPV is preventable. Other Alaskans are concerned about the levels of intimate partner violence, but are uncertain what to do about it. While most communities are best-positioned to develop appropriate messages and create change, many communities state that they lack the resources or support to effectively carry out comprehensive intimate partner violence programming.

Outcomes:

7.1 By 2011, at least 50% of youth-serving professionals (or at least 50% of community members in # of communities) can identify their role in promoting healthy relationships

7.2 Starting in 2011, there is a 10% annual increase in the number of community leaders and/or youth serving organizations that promote healthy relationships (compared to baseline)

7.3 By 2011, at least 25% of the target audience for a statewide social marketing campaign to promote healthy relationships will recall messages about the characteristics of a healthy relationship

7.4 By 2012, at least 50% of the organizations doing primary prevention of IPV will know how to access a cache of evidence-based strategies for promoting healthy relationships and preventing IPV

7.7 By 2012, at least 80% of state-level stakeholder groups (see work plan for examples) will be aware that IPV is preventable

7.8 By Jan 2011, at least 60% of key prevention stakeholders will have a clearly identified role in primary prevention on the statewide prevention team

7.5 By 2013, at least 25% of Alaska's communities are using primary prevention technical support and training available through the public health department or ANDVSA.

7.6 Starting in 2014 there is a 10% annual increase in communities that have active, committed groups working collaboratively on individual and relationship wellness (as measured by # of task forces, program, activities, and work plans

Strategies:

- Identify and recruit community natural helpers to initiate healthy relationship discussions on a community level
- Develop accessible training and support technical assistance (coaching, etc) for IPV prevention coalition building on a community level for IPV prevention capacity building.
- Collaborate with statewide youth organizations providing training to youth-serving organization staff to assist with healthy relationship promotion within usual activities.
- Develop mechanisms to share promising practices in Alaska
- Implement statewide media campaign
- Implement population focused media efforts
- Incorporate prevention efforts in the theater, art, music, film, poetry

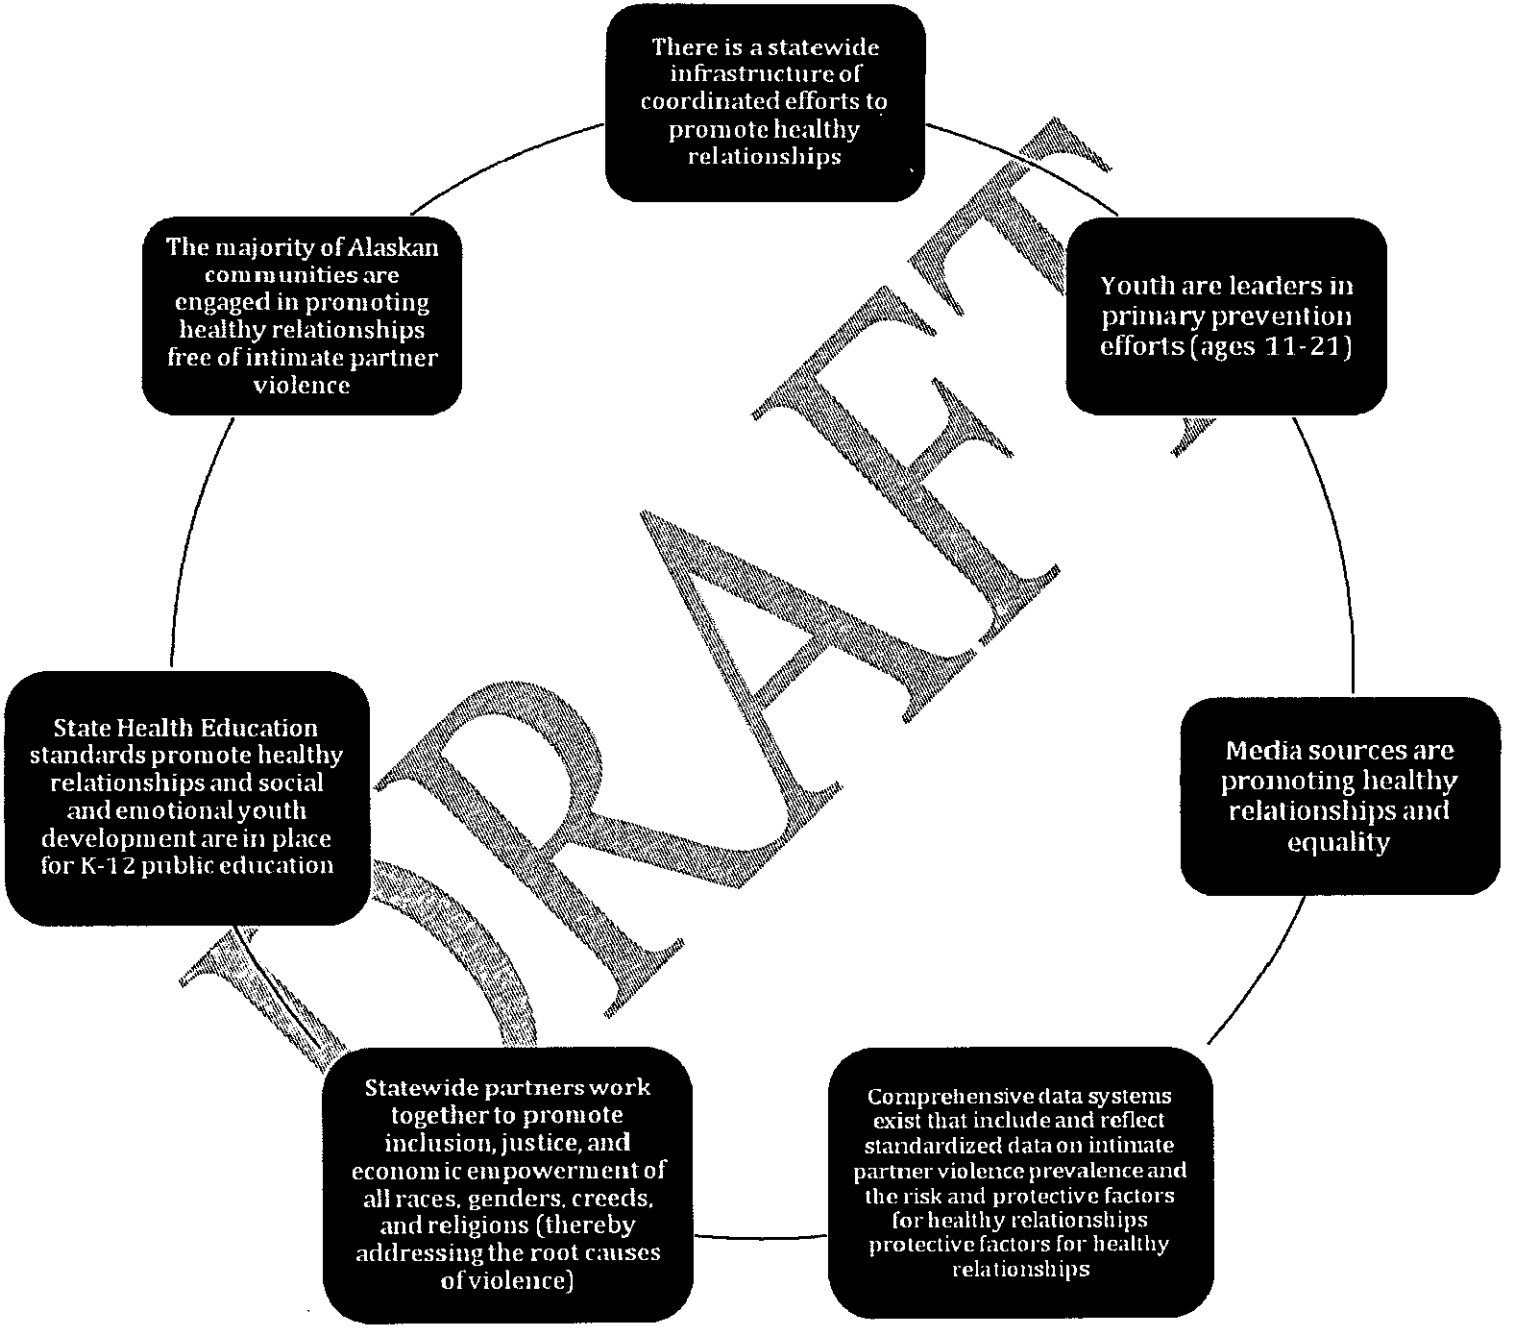
Logic Models



There is a statewide infrastructure of coordinated efforts to promote healthy relationships
Youth are leaders in primary prevention efforts (ages 11-21)
Media sources are promoting healthy relationships and equality
Comprehensive data systems exist that include and reflect standardized data on intimate partner violence prevalence and the risk and protective factors for healthy relationships protective factors for healthy relationships
Statewide partners work together to promote inclusion, justice, and economic empowerment of all races, genders, creeds, and religions (thereby addressing the root causes of violence)
State Health Education standards promote healthy relationships and social and emotional youth development are in place for K-12 public education
The majority of Alaskan communities are engaged in promoting healthy relationships free of intimate partner violence

Goal 1: There is a statewide infrastructure of coordinated efforts to promote healthy relationships

Resources/Inputs	Strategies and Activities	Outputs	Short Term Outcomes	Intermediate Outcomes	Long Term Outcomes
• Clarify and prioritize available resources in DELTA III	• Educate potential funders about IPV primary prevention and needs for state-level funding • Identify short and long-term funding for: Statewide Steering Committee group, implementation, technical assistance, • Identify staffing or "human capital" to implement plan • Maintain and establish working groups for various goals and for overarching IPV prevention capacity building • Develop media campaign messages that have Alaska-specific messages • Establish recommendations for initiating comprehensive prevention efforts in AK	• Materials (for segmented audiences) • # of presentations to funders • strategic funding plan with checklist or action plan for prospective funders • # of funding streams • agreements from agencies designating staff for implementation • coalition • protocols for diverse membership recruitment • Alaska specific messages defining healthy relationships • List of "small wins" for working groups and statewide capacity building group • Historical document explaining the DELTA SSC and process (spirit of intent document) • Marketing materials on IPV prevention (tv ads, radio ads, posters, web-based materials, event templates etc.) • Umbrella website that includes prevention activities and strategies • Social networking sites that discuss prevention • # of messages aired, material distributed • guidelines for initiating ipv prevention in communities • baseline and evaluation tools	• 1.1 By January 2010, funding for existing primary prevention programming and initiatives is maintained • 1.5 By Jan 2010, ANDVSA, CDVSA, DHSS, and SSC partners have developed funding strategies for "intimate partner violence prevention plan" implementation. • 1.6 From 2010 to 2015, there will be a minimum 10% annual increase in human resources dedicated to the ongoing support of IPV primary prevention at state organizations, as compared to baseline	• 1.2 Starting in January 2011, there will be a minimum of 10% annual increase in new funding sources (local, state, federal, tribal) for IPV prevention throughout Alaskan communities. • 1.3 By January 2011, new primary prevention programming and initiatives to promote healthy relationships are established at the state level • 1.4 By January 2011, new primary prevention programming and initiatives to promote healthy relationships are established at the local level • 1.7 By January 2012, training infrastructure is in place to support primary prevention initiatives and programming • 1.8 By January 2012, evaluation infrastructure is in place to support primary prevention initiatives and programming • 1.9 By Dec 2012, policies that support the primary prevention of intimate partner violence are identified and adopted, as reflected in public documents such as state legislation, local and tribal policy, memorandums of understanding, and agency documents.

Goal 2: Youth are leaders in primary prevention efforts (ages 11-21)

Resources/Inputs	Strategies and Activities	Outputs	Short Term Outcomes	Intermediate Outcomes	Long Term Outcomes
• Clarify and prioritize available resources in DELTA III	• Identify and coordinate human resources working on youth leadership to promote healthy relationships and prevent intimate partner violence. • Identify key contact person at each youth organization to coordinate youth efforts across the state. • Compile youth group objectives from across the state. • Engage youth coalitions throughout the state that already exist to get more involved in youth-led programming • Engage youth leadership events (e.g., LeadOn!, youth Rotary, AFN Elders and Youth) • Identify best practices in youth development national and statewide • Encourage youth groups to have youth leadership as a goal for their own agency's objectives • Do a train-the-trainer at LeadOn! at the youth events • Research and identify 5 evidence-based promising practices for youth development and leadership training • Draft legislation that will create designated seats on youth-focused prevention and promotion decision-making boards • Provide trainings (topical, leadership, egal) • Youth led social marketing/media campaign (ties in with Goal 3) • Use of innovative strength building programs (Girls on the Go, Men of Strength etc, Leadership Asset Youth Coalition)	• Job descriptions that include youth-leadership development as a part of their job • A database of youth-serving organizations • Training and networking opportunities for youth-serving organizations • Toolkit for promoting youth leadership • Compiled list of youth leadership examples in Alaska and nationally • Guidebook for decision making bodies to involve youth members and youth mentors • A resolution on youth designated seats • #of trainings • #of youth organizations that participate • #of youth participating in healthy relationship promotion • #of programs carried out that promote protective factors and youth leaderhsip	• 2.1 By 2010, there are local resources and opportunities for youth to build skills and small project developments that promote peace and equality • 2.3 From Sept 2010-2015, there will be a 10% increase in the number of youth recognized as statewide leaders in promoting healthy relationships	• 2.2 By 2012, there is a 40% increase in local and statewide youth leadership training opportunities to promote healthy relationships in and out of school (e.g., conferences, policy-making situations) • 2.4 By 2012, youth will provide healthy relationship messages and that are youth-accessible and interesting, both in and out of the school	• 2.5 By Dec 2014, 60% of state and local decision-making boards, commissions, task forces, and advisory groups have designated seats and identified adult mentors for youth.

Goal 3: Media sources are promoting healthy relationships and equality

Resources/Inputs	Strategies and Activities	Outputs	Short Term Outcomes	Intermediate Outcomes	Long Term Outcomes
• Clarify and prioritize available resources in DELTA III	• This goal has 2 foci (1) Awareness of the role of media and (2) media campaign/ social marketing for all of DELTA • Use promising existing media campaigns and adapt to Alaska • Recruit Alaska spokespeople to promote healthy relationships in Alaska • Advocacy to media outlets • Awards for positive advertising • Tie into existing youth groups to develop/ create/influence media campaign • Statewide campaign to protest negative imaging • Link in to local and national campaigns (e.g., my strength is not for hurting- RWJF-DELTA broaden reach, that's not cool) • Campaigns exploring positive identities and relationships • Campaigns exploring cultural implications for IPV • Have a cache or templates for media campaigns in communities (built on research of national and international campaigns) • Statewide campaign to protest gender stereotypes and degradation in the media • Establish tools to develop media literacy and media education in AK	• AK Broadcasting Association annual meeting—be on agenda and present on role/power of media and need for positive messaging • Tips and 'Please Don't Use' sheet for advertisers annual recipients of media award • # of radio personality endorsements, # of AK spokespeople agreements. AK famous/recognized spokespeople: Scotty Gomez (hockey), Klkkan Randal (skiing), Steve Helmel • Toolkit or guidelines for youth-led media campaign • Toolkits or statewide support for campaigns to Alaska Native men • # of groups involved in media campaign development • Templates for marketing campaigns • Facebook and MySpace advocacy sites • Engaging media literacy toolkits	• 3.1 By 2010, there are youth-led, media-supported campaigns promoting healthy relationships • 3.2 By 2010, journalists and public relations specialists employed with Alaska radio, television, and newspaper outlets understand the role of media in promoting healthy relationships and preventing intimate partner violence	• 3.3 By 2011, 50% of regional and state media sources are promoting healthy relationships in their advertising and programming • 3.4 By 2012, campaigns developed to promote healthy relationships and positive imaging in the media includes regional artists and "celebrities"

Goal 4: Comprehensive data systems exist that include and reflect standardized data on intimate partner violence prevalence and the risk and protective factors for healthy relationships protective factors for healthy relationships

Resources/Inputs	Strategies and Activities	Outputs	Short Term Outcomes	Intermediate Outcomes	Long Term Outcomes
• Clarify and prioritize available resources in DELTA III	• Adopt and participate in the National Incident Based Reporting System (NIBRS) • Develop a workgroup to determine what data exists and what data is needed and how to coordinate data collection • Coordinate with Federal, State, Tribal agencies to enhance data • Find out what technologies exist that allow you to access data across individual data systems (to assist statewide data coordination) • Develop an electronic communication strategy that will increase advocacy of IPV prevention research efforts. • Establish more asset (protective factors)-based survey mechanisms, build on work in-state. • Review the SFF-SIG report on population-based indicators • Develop an infrastructure for practitioners to communicate promising practices • Recommended process • Develop protocols or guidelines for acquiring culturally responsive, data collection, and reporting • Identify local policymakers and other organized groups who will advocate for ongoing funding sources for data collection and analysis	• NIBRS data • Data priorities • Technology options for data streaming in AK • Research champion • Risk factor data advocacy group • Electronic strategy for communication • List of statewide • Advocacy team • Tools to collect protective factor data • Resolution on more IPV data collection • Overview and guidelines for responsible, culturally responsive data collection and reporting	• 4.2 By June 2010, a broad group of researchers and practitioners in the state will identify the risk and protective factor data available for "healthy relationships."	• 4.3 By January 2012, Alaska will be funded to participate in the National Incident Based Reporting System (NIBRS). • 4.4 By January 2012, mechanisms for gathering data exist that are culturally sensitive and ensure safety when reporting abuse (with particular attention to confidentiality in small villages and the need for aggregating data across villages) • 4.5 By 2012, everyone who is collecting data on interpersonal violence will coordinate to create a central clearinghouse (including website) to share and access information about the risk and protective factor data available for "healthy relationships" and encourage unduplicated data collection • 4.6 By 2012, a dynamic body of knowledge will be initiated by the SSC that identifies the root causes of intimate partner violence in Alaska	• 4.7 2016, there are 3 promising IPV prevention strategies and national evidence-based strategies that have been evaluated within Alaska

Goal 5: Statewide partners work together to promote inclusion, justice, and economic empowerment of all races, genders, creeds, and religions (thereby addressing the root causes of violence)

Resources/Inputs	Strategies and Activities	Outputs	Short Term Outcomes	Intermediate Outcomes	Long Term Outcomes
• Clarify and prioritize available resources in DELTA III	• On all of our committees, organizations, boards, etc talk the "root causes" talk • Outreach, education, training • Ask LeadOn! Youth do these presentations in their communities • Write a document that shows how IPV/SV is caused by similar factors as other social/health problems • Work with AFN in the development of resolutions – articulating root cause • Work with Coaches' certification program to make coaching boys to men a part of their curricula • Consider social norms approach to teach Native youth about traditional ways of living a healthy life • Host a conference focused on men's role in ending interpersonal violence • Promote the Flags on Mountain campaign • Capture male elders' stories about equality and respect among men and women • Implement the "Inspiring Moments' campaign • Promote media campaigns where men take a lead in intimate violence prevention • Men serve as positive role models to adult youth • Engage civic organizations such as Rotary, Elks and others will have speakers talk on issues of IPV	• #of meetings, events, etc where root cause is discussed • Training materials to explore root cause • Research document - overlaying root cause and various health indicators (powerpoint, etc) • #of youth involved in educating on root cause • Alaska federation of native resolution • Certification program and coaches toolkit • #of programs focused on culture-based prevention strategies, integrating healthy relationship wisdom • Conference on Men Ending Violence • Flags on Mountain 'Inspiring moments campaigns • Elders stories on relationship values • Distribution of stories (radio, print, etc) • Male led media campaign materials • #of civic organizations engaged in project		• 5.2 By 2012, there will be a 50% increase in the number of organizing efforts among Alaskan males to collectively work to promote and respect social equality • 5.3 By 2012, key health service, nonprofits, funders, and administrative leaders will recognize the root causes of intimate partner violence • 5.5 By 2012, state policy makers will understand the relationship between economic disparity and health indicators as evidenced by new policies and proposals	• 5.4 By 2013, key health service, nonprofits, funders, and administrative leaders will commit resources to address the root causes of violence • 5.6 By 2013, local and state policy makers will commit to programmatic and policy decisions which promote economic parity • 5.7 By 2014, intimate partner violence prevention program planning and implementation will reflect the diversity of cultures and communities in Alaska

Goal 6: State Health Education standards promote healthy relationships and social and emotional youth development are in place for K-12 public education

Resources/Inputs	Strategies and Activities	Outputs	Short Term Outcomes	Intermediate Outcomes	Long Term Outcomes
• Clarify and prioritize available resources in DELTA III	• Bring together identified representatives of the SSC, schools, universities, community based heath educators and the Dept of Education to develop guidelines as described in 7.1 • Adapt or identify culturally responsive curriculum—diversity as a guiding principle • Evaluate promising curricula for use in Alaskan communities, such as the Fourth R • Introduce bill that comprehensively addresses healthy relationship and social and emotional curriculum • Engage the Statewide School Board • Advocate for an incorporated curriculum that is comprehensive and works for ALL special interest groups • Work with the coordinated school health efforts and special interest groups to review overlapping interests. • Bring together identified representatives, school, university and community based health educators, Dept of Ed representatives to develop guidelines as described in goal • Develop educational materials to publicly explain this work, including definitions of healthy relationships • Ask LeadOn! youth to do these presentations in their communities • Advocate for an incorporated curriculum that is comprehensive and works for ALL special interest groups	• Culturally responsive curriculum for Alaska • Evaluation of Alaska Perspectives Fourth R curricula • Legislation • School board presentations and meetings • List of suggested comprehensive approaches to health education • List of overlapping core education areas that address risk and protective factors • # of coordinated education meetings participate • Training materials in healthy relationships and social and emotional learning • Meeting with key stakeholders	• 6.1 By Jan 2010, representatives of the State Steering Committee and the Department of Education along with health educators from the schools and universities will develop state education health standards that promote healthy relationships and social and emotional youth development in accordance with evidence-based guidelines	• 6.2 By Sept 2012, the State Board of Education will adopt the state education health standards drafted in 7.1	• 6.3 By Sept 2013, all professional and paraprofessional education staff will be required to complete evidence-based professional development that fulfills the Alaska health education statute adopted in 7.2 • 6.4 By 2014, professional and paraprofessional education staff will integrate k-12 health education promoting healthy relationships and social and emotional youth development into the classroom

Goal 7: The majority of Alaskan communities are engaged in promoting healthy relationships free of intimate partner violence

Intimate Partner Violence

2010 - 2016

DRAFT

STATE PROFILE - Demographic Information

Alaska has a statewide population of 686,293. (U.S. Census Bureau). There has been a gradual growth trend, with a total 50,000 person increase since 2000. This trajectory is likely to continue unless economic changes within the state eliminate or create employment in oil and mining industries.

Alaska's geographical constraints are unparalleled by any other state. Alaska's territory is equal to approximately one-third the entire landmass of the United States. Within Alaska's territory, there are over two hundred villages ranging in size from less than one hundred to six thousand people. Most of these villages are accessible only by boat or small bush plane with most services provided from hub communities.

Roughly half of the state's population resides in Anchorage 279,243 in 2008. The Anchorage School District, which enrolls approximately 20,000 youth between the ages of 10 and 14, reports 122 languages spoken. Anchorage is the commerce center of the state and many individuals work and travel to Anchorage for employment. In recent years, Anchorage School District has been determining how to best support the increased number of village youth that move in and out of the Anchorage school systems.

The state of Alaska is rich in the traditions of the Alaska Native people. Alaska's population is 15.4% Alaska Native or American Indian, compared to only 1.0% of the US population. (U.S. Census Bureau) Some parts of the state are predominantly Alaska Native, such as the Bethel Census Area with 78.1% of the population identifying as Alaska Native or American Indian and 65.6% of the population speaking a language other than English at home. Twenty native languages are spoken throughout the state.

Education

Graduation rates in Alaska are below the national average at 67.2% in 2004. In 2005, Alaska's drop-out rate was higher than the national rate and ranked Alaska 36th among the states. 2005-2006 Department of Employment and Economic Development data indicates drop-out rates in Alaska vary by region. Rates were lowest in the Gulf

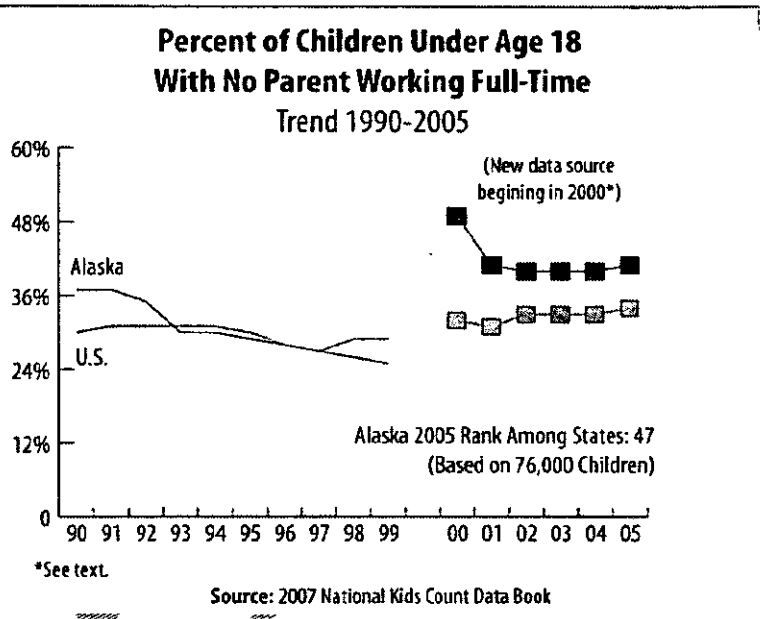
Economy and Governance

In addition to the Alaska state governing bodies, the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act of 1971 established twelve Regional Native Corporations for the state. The corporations range from over 35,000 members to under 1,000 members. The federal government recognizes over 220 Indian Entities in the state (Department of Interior, Bureau of Indian Affairs). While there are similarities among Alaska Natives, geography, language, cultural markers make each tribe and Native village distinct.



Much of the state government funding is derived from oil revenues. With fluctuating prices of oil, revenue in years to come is difficult to predict. The potential shrinking economic climate makes it difficult to advocate for new resources for programming. Sustainability of subsistence economy has also come into question in the past years with fewer salmon, changing environmental conditions interrupting historical ranges of various plants and animals impacting this livelihood strategy.

According to the 2000 Census, 6.7% of Alaskans live below the poverty level. Over 6% live in homes without complete plumbing facilities. Over 5% live in homes without complete kitchen facilities. Three percent of Alaskans do not have telephone service. In 2005, 11 percent of people were in poverty. Fifteen percent of related children under 18 were below the poverty level, compared with 7 percent of people 65 years old and over. Eight percent of all families and 25 percent of families with a female householder and no husband present had incomes below the poverty level. The chart below highlights unemployment and underemployment in Alaska. Many individuals in remote communities have few cash employment opportunities and offset minimal paid employment with subsistence living (hunting, fishing, gathering) which is a traditional, although increasingly less viable, way of life in Alaska (AK Kids Count 2006-2007).

In the past year, fuel prices reached a record high during the summer months (when fuel must be barged into communities). In an already overpriced market, fuel became inaccessible or required a much greater percentage of incomes in rural and remote communities. With shrinking fish returns and fewer subsistence options, cash resources and reliable food was unavailable to entire communities. In 2009, these communities made a statewide plea for assistance for basic necessities of food and heat.

Communities across Alaska are varied, from tourism hubs to pipeline communities, from urban areas to villages, from farming communities to fishing communities. There are populations and influences of Alaska Native, Filipino, Old-believer Russian Orthodox, and emerging cultural enclaves across the state. There are communities that are dry (prohibits alcohol) and communities that are "wet". There are traditional communities and modern. It is difficult to make generalizations about the communities of Alaska or the conditions of living in Alaska. Prevention efforts will have to be tailored or defined for and by the communities of Alaska.

Regardless of location, Alaskans continue to be overrepresented in health, economic, and educational disparities. Ranking distinctively high in high-school drop out rates, child abuse, alcoholism, and intimate partner violence.

MAGNITUDE OF INTIMATE PARTNER VIOLENCE IN ALASKA

Research indicates that intimate partner violence is a particularly challenging public health issue to address: it is simultaneously common and largely unseen (and unacknowledged). According to findings from the most recent National Violence Against Women Survey, 22.1% of women and 7.4% of men reported experiencing some form of intimate partner violence in their lifetime. In Alaska, existing research indicates a significantly greater prevalence of intimate partner violence: the 2006 Alaska Network on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault Public Opinion Research Survey found that almost 75% had experienced or known someone close to them that has experienced some form of intimate partner violence. Findings from a 2006 study by the Violence Policy Center indicate that with a 2004 homicide rate of 2.83 / 100,000 residents. In recent years Alaska has often received the highest ranking for women murdered by men in the nation. Among the homicides in which a victim / offender relationship could be established, 100% of female victims were murdered by someone they knew: not a single female victim was killed by a stranger.

Criminal justice data is not always seen as reliable in Alaskan communities, as geographical isolation and the frontier nature of communities often precludes either reporting or response to incidents of abuse. In Anchorage, a mostly urban/suburban community with one of the more reliable systems for tracking incidents of IPV, the average annual number of IPV reports in 2002 was 3,014, and children were documented as present in 42% of the reported incidents[i]. Of incidents where children were identified as present, 48% witnessed a minor injury and 13% witnessed a moderate or major injury. Sexual abuse is also high in Alaska Native populations. Alaska Natives are 7.6 times more likely than non-Natives to be a victim of sexual assault and rape, with the highest rate of forcible rape among 15 to 19 year olds (28.9%).[ii] More than 3 out of every 4 American Indian and Alaska Native (AI/AN) women will be physically assaulted in her lifetime.

Intimate partner violence doesn't only affect Alaskan adults; the prevalence of intimate partner violence among Alaska youth is also a concern. 2003 YRBS indicates that 10.8% of Alaska high school students (both genders) self-report as having been slapped or physically hurt by a boyfriend or girlfriend, compared to 9.5% of respondents nationally. When weighted by gender, twelfth grade female high-school students self report at an even higher rate (and difference in prevalence): 12.3% of twelfth grade Alaska women report being slapped or hit by a boyfriend or girlfriend in the past month, according to 9.8% of twelfth grade female respondents nationally. Because the definition of intimate partner violence that informs this report includes sexual violence, included here is data that indicates, according to the 2003 YRBS, that ninth and tenth grade Alaska women are more likely to report being forced to have unwanted sex than the equivalent national population; though rates for eleventh and twelfth grade women are slightly less in Alaska (9.7 and 12.0% respectively) than nationally (9.9 and 12.2% nationally). It is important to note here that the definitions of violence and relationships that inform the 2003 YRBS do not include threats of sexual and / or physical violence, psychological and / or emotional violence, and / or stalking. As such, the true prevalence of intimate partner violence prevalence amongst Alaska high school students is currently unknown, though it may be assumed that prevalence is much higher than reported.

2003 data reported to the state Council on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault from local shelter programs and crisis centers reflected a slight increase (from 4,638 to 5,916 clients) in Alaska residents seeking services for intimate partner violence victimization. Of the clients seeking services from ANDVSA member agencies, a clear majority (41 percent) identified a spouse or partner as their abuser. Bruises and abrasions were the most commonly reported type of physical injury, while humiliation, isolation, and threats to property, pets, and personal items were the most common types of non-physical assaults (reported by 22.45, 7.25, and 6.73 percent of respective clients seeking services). Related to risk, 26 percent of clients requesting services reported having had parents who were in abusive relationships, and over 50 percent of clients reported that alcohol use was a factor in their assault.

In Alaska, teens living in geographically isolated communities who are Alaska Native face additional risks for victimization. A higher number of Alaska Natives experience physical abuse in their lifetime than non-Native Alaskans (33% of Alaska Natives compared to 22.2% of non-Natives), and disclosure of IPV in the past 5 years among Alaska Natives (11.8%) is more than twice the rate disclosed by non-Natives (5.4%). More than 1 out of 4 (28.6%) Alaska Natives were exposed to domestic violence during their childhood, and adults with lower incomes were significantly more likely to disclose recent physical abuse by an intimate partner. Twenty-six percent of clients requesting services at local shelter programs and crisis centers in Alaska report having had parents who were in abusive relationships, and over fifty percent of clients reported that alcohol use was a factor in their assault.

Criminal justice data is not always seen as reliable in Alaskan communities, as geographical isolation and the frontier nature of communities often precludes either reporting or response to incidents of abuse. In Anchorage, a mostly urban/suburban community with one of the more reliable systems for tracking incidents of IPV, the average annual number of IPV reports in 2002 was 3,014, and children were documented as present in 42% of the reported incidents. Of incidents where children were identified as present, 48% witnessed a minor injury and 13% witnessed a moderate or major injury. Sexual abuse is also high in Alaska Native populations. Alaska Natives are 7.6 times more likely than non-Natives to be a victim of sexual assault and rape, with the highest rate of forcible rape among 15 to 19 year olds (28.9%).

These statistics point to the clear need for prevention efforts that target risk factors common to Native and rural populations, such as intergenerational trauma, geographic isolation, suicide, and the effects of colonialism on families/historical trauma.

Within Alaska there is tremendous scope for expanding the accuracy and variety of IPV / SV prevalence data, but what has been obviously absent from the available data is information linking specific risk factors or root cause elements with IPV and SV in Alaska, with particular attention to teen dating violence prevalence. Similarly there is very little data on protective factors for healthy relationships, healthy individuals, and healthy communities in Alaska.

The needs and resource assessment findings indicate that: 1) Intimate Partner Domestic Violence is an unfortunate reality for many Alaskans; 2) there is significant statewide awareness of the magnitude of Intimate Partner Domestic Violence and related need for prevention; and 3) many individuals, agencies, and communities would implement activities designed to prevent Intimate Partner Domestic Violence but lack the expertise and community resources to do so.

RISK AND PROTECTIVE FACTORS FOR PERPETRATION

Data that explicitly links risk and protective factors to IPV in Alaska is unavailable. The SSC carried out a SWOT analysis that highlighted much of the information we have on individual and community risk and protective factors: Weakness, Strengths and Opportunities have been included below:

Risk Factors for Male Perpetration of IPV

• Lowest graduation in 18-24 range (AN males lowest) • Psychosocial indicators are below average for boys and even lower for AN males • Difficult to access money • Seasonal affect / isolation • Alcohol consumption is some of the highest in the nation • Incarceration rate is very high • Male participation on IPV prevention is low • multigenerational- makes unhealthy community • Low population / isolation / disconnection • Cross-cultural non-understanding / racism • Violence or submission of women is a part of some Alaskan faith-based community norms • We don't train our own • High rates of child abuse and sexual abuse • Poor data quality standardization / data availability • Health and social services are minimized in the state • Health and social services and public Safety are not coordinated • Many of us are working in silos • Professional recruitment strategies are mismatched with community healing needs • No health education standards, social and emotional learning, or comprehensive sexuality education. • No guarantee that there is a school curriculum on relationships. • State leadership and visionaries have not embraced primary prevention • Historical- internalized oppression • Frontier mentality- gender norms • Unintended consequences of legislation • Expensive to travel • Difficult to replicate or compare diverse communities	• Low resident # means it is possible to reach most of the population • Connection to land and subsistence activities • We are a very word of mouth state • Youth peer-to-peer initiatives • White Ribbon and other community engagement activities • Warrior program (family violence prevention initiative) • Faith-based community engagement (engaged with the violent crimes compensation board). • Healthy and safe schools committee • Community engagement activities have had some success: ICE, community schools, elders to youth. • Willingness to try new things in Alaska • We have been involving youth • Many of our programs empower youth • strengths-based approach • Alaska Native Land Rights or Community Living (not reservations like many other states). • Strength of native community leadership, economy, healthcare • Most wired state in the country • Tribal Courts- tribal adoption, can set norms within tribes • We have a statewide steering committee that understands relationships • We are willing to ask difficult questions based on data • There is a shift happening in the state- ex. OCS has been shifting to discussion on oppression and healing. • There are other forums concerned about the safety of youth: • The physical environment • Strong networks and network spanners working for us 500 Nonprofit organizations improving Alaska

Opportunities

- Elder and Youth Forum with AFN- Linking Elder and Youth
- DELTA funding and opportunity to develop a plan
- Build on successful relationships and networks
- National Congress of American Indians (our Senator will participate)
- Youth to youth trainings- expanding some of these efforts to a statewide component
- Getting leveraging funding because of past and existing collaboration.
- We have and are invited to many workshops, conferences for sharing information on prevention work
- Many communities have trialed curriculum. There is an opportunity to share curriculum (OWL, Anchorage School District (ASD), SEICUS, Roots of Empathy, the 4th R).
- Department of Education has a health curricula educator position pending
- Rural Cap (utilize volunteers in rural communities).
- Tap into university resources(graduate and undergraduate)
- Take advantage of conference / presentations, rural providers, school board, statewide PHN for presentation, statewide DATA collection efforts.
- There are other leaders, individuals, and agencies that would advocate for DELTA if they were informed.
- Statewide Steering Committee members are engaged and can engage others.
- There is an opportunity to engage faith-based communities
- Collaboration with work being undertaken by ICWA
- Work with new leadership (receptive)
- Community education systems and web/internet-based learning opportunities.
- Work more closely with faith-based communities

Universal and Selected Populations Addressed in This Plan

While in Alaska there is not specific data on risk-factors for perpetration or victimization, the World Health Organization has identified some general risk and protective factors for intimate partner violence. Gender is the greatest determinant of perpetration or victimization. Men are the most likely to perpetrate intimate partner violence and women are most likely to be victims.

Many of the WHO risk factors associated with perpetration match the risk factors present in Alaska, including high rates of alcoholism, economic inequalities, and prevalence of child abuse or witnessing family violence, few economic opportunities, and other risks.

Based on available data and state level information the following selected populations have been chosen:

1) Youth Ages 11-21

After reviewing the data and discussing health, justice, education experiences across the state, there was consensus that systems in Alaska are failing many of our youth, especially Alaska Native youth and Alaska Native boys. Because most first time victimization and perpetration occurs between the ages of 16-21 (local data not available), the Statewide Steering Committee chose age groups 11-21 to be the target of two of our goals and have considered youth in many of the outcomes throughout this document.

2) Men and boys

In Alaska, as in other states the majority of perpetration is carried out by men. Alaska data also indicates that Alaskan many boys are already involved in risk behaviors that increase the likelihood of perpetration. The environmental scan indicated that there are few Alaska-tried strategies that have successfully engaged men in IPV prevention within Alaska. Surveys and community-based discussions indicate that men are underrepresented or largely not present in the discussion and solution around intimate partner violence prevention. This was established as a priority population to work with although we have fewer resources to build on in this area.

Universal Goals:

Many of the goals include outcomes that are more universal in nature. However, even goals and outcomes that were developed with universal populations in mind have placed some emphasis on geographical, cultural, and generational relevance.

For example, several strategies are focused on bringing Elders into the IPV prevention discussion and solution. This is building on the cultural practices of Alaska and will assist with overcoming historical trauma and reconnecting culturally significant adults with youth in the community.

System Goals:

We realized that many of the outcomes and goals for selected population will be chosen on a community to community basis, addressing health disparities and risk factors that fit within the community context. Much of the AK plan to prevent intimate partner violence and promote health relationships addresses system level goals and infrastructure that can support local level programming.

Several of our system goals involved education of specific individuals that are influential in the health and policy landscape. Policy makers and other IPV prevention educators were identified as essential population to focus on to successfully achieve systems goals.

ALASKA'S IPV PREVENTION SYSTEM CAPACITY

Prevention system capacity is composed of the following eight dimensions:

1. System profile
2. Leadership
3. Strategic planning
4. Information sharing
5. Community and constituency focus
6. Human resources
7. System operations
8. Results/outcomes

DRAFT

The SSC did not use a formal measure of prevention system capacity, but rather engaged in discussions about state capacity to support primary prevention activities and strategies. Below is a summary of the two main areas of relevance to Alaska's prevention system: previous prevention efforts and policy.

Prevention Efforts:
Historically within Alaska, the vast majority of intimate partner violence prevention programming has fallen within secondary or tertiary prevention. Meaning most of the efforts are directed towards those who have had some experience as a victim or perpetrator.

Within the past ten years, several communities have begun to direct resources and energies towards primary prevention, stopping violence before it occurs. These efforts are primarily spearheaded by local domestic violence shelters. Most of these efforts are directed towards youth and often in school settings. Those communities with funding support and statewide technical assistance have been able to most effectively expand primary prevention organizing efforts within their community. There are many other primary prevention efforts for "selected populations" of this plan, which focus on reducing risk and enhancing protective. Many of these are shared with IPV risk and protective factors. Many of these programs have the ultimate goals of deflecting substance use, tobacco cessation, teen pregnancy and others. There are synergies with many of these programs which seek to address similar root causes and expand protective factors with individuals, influencers, and communities. Recent suicide prevention efforts have been trialed in remote villages and primarily Alaska Native communities. These are being researched and evaluated for effectiveness and feasibility for replication.

Policy:
Alaska statutes address the IPV and SV statewide, while individual communities have enacted (or not) specific community ordinances that are used to intervene in intimate partner violence and / or promote healthy relationships, ultimately leading to a reduction in incidence of intimate partner violence. Nationally, the primary law impacting intimate partner violence in Alaska and throughout the United States is the federal Violence Against Women Act (Title IV, sec. 40001-40703 of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 HR 3355), which addresses intimate partner and sexual violence, stalking, children exposed to intimate partner violence, health care to support victims of intimate partner violence, crisis support for victims of sexual violence, and efforts to engage men and communities in intimate partner and sexual violence prevention.

The central state statutes addressing intimate partner violence in Alaska are in Title 18 (Health, Safety, and Housing) of the 2006 Alaska State (A.S.) legal statutes. Chapter 66 includes statute A.S. 18.66.010, which establishes the Council on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault (CDVSA) within the Alaska State Department of Public Safety. The purpose of the CDVSA is to plan and coordinate services for victims of intimate partner and / or sexual violence and their families; plan and coordinate services for perpetrators of intimate partner and / or sexual violence, and to provided for crisis intervention and prevention programs related to intimate partner and / or sexual violence.

Other sections of A.S. 18.66 address issues related to intimate partner violence including: protective orders (A.S. 18.66.100 – A.S. 18.66.170), definitions related to intimate partner and / or sexual violence intervention efforts in Alaska (A.S. 18.66.250), standards and procedures for health care in intimate partner violence cases, continuing education for all public employees, court system employees, and prosecuting authorities (A.S. 18.66.310), and the establishment of intimate partner violence fatality review teams (A.S. 18.66.400). Other Alaska legal statutes addressing intimate partner violence directly or indirectly include: A.S. 11.41 (assault, stalking, kidnapping, etc), A.S. 11.46.300 – 310 (burglary), A.S. 11.46.320 – 330 (criminal trespass), A.S. 11.46.400 – 430 (arson) A.S. 11.46.475 – 486 (criminal mischief) A.S. 11.56.807 or A.S. 11.56.810 (terrorist threats), A.S. 11.56.740 (a)(1) (violating a protective order), and A.S. 11.61.120 (a)(2)-(4) (harassment).

There are currently no provisions in any state statute directly related to the provision or administration of programs or activities related to the primary prevention of intimate partner violence, including addressing populations at elevated risk for victimization or perpetration of intimate partner violence.

There is a high commitment amongst statewide steering committee and community level allies to initiate primary prevention efforts. Through advocacy of shelters, sexual assault services, health workers, steering committee members, and other community level advocates, greater attention has been placed on moving upstream. Noticeably, in recent years administrative and policy leaders are asking questions about prevention and reversing trends of the many of the chronic issues that exist within Alaska, including IPV.

1/20/10 OVERVIEW: COST OF CRIME ISER RECOM. & UPDATE

Alaska Department of Corrections
Program Overview
Senate Judiciary Committee
20 January 2010

As of July 21, 2009, the Alaska Department of Correction's (DOC) population stood at 5,500 inmates; as of today, there are 5,628 inmates. There are approximately 6,000 individuals on Probation/Parole. The current incarceration rate in the United States is 1 in 100 adults.[1] When you include parole and probation numbers 1 in every 31 U.S. adults is behind bars, on parole or probation. The rate in Alaska is 1 in 36. [2]

An estimated 95% of Alaska's sentenced offenders return to our communities, of those 66% re-offends; this administration concluded it was time to consider a different approach.

These statistics translate into real numbers when it comes to our Alaskan communities:

- In 2008, DOC processed in excess of 38,000 bookings including 4,000 Title 47 12-hour holds
- From 2006 -2008, DOC incarcerated on average 3,714 sentenced felons
- In 2008, DOC released 15,382 sentenced offenders (felons and misdemeanants)
- The average DOC stay for a felon is 285 days
- The average DOC stay for a misdemeanant is 27 days
- In 2008, DOC released on average, 287 felons per month

DOC programs in place or in the planning stage for implementation:

Substance Abuse: FY2010 Authorization $3,517.7 (fund sources listed below). All programs adhere to the American Society of Addiction Medicine criteria. 79% of offenders arrested had an active substance abuse problem during the 12 months preceding their arrest.[3]

- $941.1 (GF/MH, GF, I/A) funds the Hiland Mountain Correctional Center (HMCC) & Wildwood Correctional Center (WWCC) programs: 6 month inpatient programs at HMCC 32 beds, WWCC 42 beds, and 80 beds at the out-of-state (OOS) facility. This will provide treatment for 240 inmates per year.

- $1,301.0 (GF): 3 to 4 month institutional intensive out-patient programs at Yukon-Kuskokwim Correctional Center (YKCC), Anvil Mountain Correctional Center (AMCC), Fairbanks Correctional Center (FCC), Lemon Creek Correctional Center (LCCC), and Spring Creek Correctional Center (SCCC). Treatment capacity of 25 inmates per group per facility for each program with a maximum capacity of 100 inmates per year.

  FY2009 facilities: YKCC, LCCC, FCC, SCCC, Anchorage Community Residential Center (CRC); FY2010 funding increase incorporated the Palmer Correctional Center (PCC), Anchorage Correctional Complex (ACC), AMCC, and the Fairbanks Northstar CRC.

All of these programs have aftercare components as part of the treatment protocols.

- The PCC/Matanuska-Susitna Pre-Trial (MSPT) and ACC programs consist of assessment and referral to appropriate treatment providers. In addition, the PCC program will provide a 30-day educational component which will serve a maximum capacity of 250 inmates per year.

Anger Management: This 12 week program covers the areas of hostility, aggressiveness, temperament, violence and cognitions favorable to violent behavior. This program is part of our substance abuse curriculum as a very high percentage of people with substance abuse issues also have anger issues. It is also offered as a stand alone program that meets court ordered requirements (individualized treatment plans and discharge summaries) in all DOC facilities. Up to 15 inmates per program, 4 program sessions per year, for a statewide total of 765 inmates.

48-week Offender Treatment Program: This program covers the areas of criminal thinking, socialization, poor problem solving, interpersonal relationship issues, risk-taking behavior and Anger Management. It is currently available in 8 facilities, ACC, SCCC, WWCC, FCC, LCCC, PCC, HMCC, and the OOS. 15 inmates per program, for a total of 120 inmates per year. The 4 phases of this program are:

1. Anger Management
2. Criminal Thinking Errors
3. Moral Reasoning and
4. Rational Problem Solving and Relapse Prevention

Criminal Attitudes Program or CAP: A comprehensive cognitive-behavioral program that focuses specifically on the attitudes, values, beliefs, and rationalizations conducive to criminality. It is a 22-session program that is available in all 13 institutions through the Education Unit. 20 inmates per group, 4 groups per year, for a potential total of 1,040 inmates per year.

Parenting, Inside/Out Dads: This is a program for incarcerated fathers. This is a 12-session program that provides practical and innovative ways to help overcome the physical and psychological challenges that incarcerated fathers face both inside and outside of prison. This program is offered in 13 of our facilities through the Education Unit. HMCC currently offers the Active Parenting Today program for female offenders. Both programs are designed to diminish intergenerational criminality. 20 inmates per group, 4 groups per year, for a potential total of 1,040 inmates per year.

Sex Offender Treatment: FY2010 authorization $2,636.0 (GF) - Institutional treatment to began operation in January of 2010. This is a 25 bed, 18-month intensive inpatient treatment program located at LCCC. The LCCC program is long-term and treats multi-custody offenders with focus on higher risk offenders.

The Bethel Tundra Center program is a CRC-based short-term residential sex offender treatment program for released offenders. The treatment staff also provides a companion community treatment program for program graduates and those who do not require residential treatment.

There are several out-patient sex offender management programs for released offenders that include assessment, treatment, supervision and polygraph testing. They are located in Fairbanks, Kenai, Juneau, Anchorage, Ketchikan, Sitka and Palmer.

Both treatment and supervision include polygraph testing. This testing occurs in Fairbanks, Kenai, Juneau, Anchorage, Ketchikan and Palmer.

Domestic Violence Programming: FY2010 authorization $174.7 (GF) -- Domestic Violence Perpetrator Programs are currently offered at FCC, LCCC, PCC, and Point MacKenzie Correctional Farm (PMCF), using psycho-educational groups loosely based on the Duluth Model, a model frequently used with this population. The department is working with the Council on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault (CDVSA) to determine the efficacy of these programs and identify evidence-based programs for use with this population (as recommended by the CDVSA Legislative Task Force in 2008).

General Education Development/Adult Basic Education (GED/ABE): FY2010 authorization $582.3 (GF, FED, I/A) - GED/ABE, Vocational Certification/Training and Re-Entry Programming in all 13 facilities. We have increased the number of inmates receiving GEDs from 182 in 2008 to 247 in 2009. We project 384 GEDs in 2010.

Vocational Rehabilitation: Workplace & Community Transitioning Grant FY10-$51.0 (FED) -- DOC currently provides vocational training programs for inmates to receive certifications upon completion. In addition to the state program for building maintenance, cook/baker, barber, plumber and carpentry, we also utilize the federal workplace & community transition grant which provides limited funding for the pursuit of post-secondary and vocational education. The department intends to expand the number and availability of these programs. In the FY2011 Governor's Budget, the DOC requests $150.0 to expand our current construction apprenticeship program (electrical, plumbing, carpentry).

Re-Entry Program: The re-entry begins at sentencing (felons) with a comprehensive risk/needs assessment, the development of the Offender Management Plan referral into indicated programs and a preliminary re-entry plan that focuses on employment, housing, sober support, and family reunification. Specific program components will consist of the Federal Bureau of Prisons Re-Entry Survival Program, the Department of Labor Job Preparedness Program, Criminal Attitudes Program, Parenting, and Substance Abuse.

In Summary:

Substance Abuse Treatment Program: FY2010 total authorization $3,517.7 (various fund sources) –

$ 110.0	Program Oversight
$ 941.1	RSAT
$1,301.0	LSAT
$ 165.6	After Care
$1,000.0	Secure Detox RSA w/H&SS

Sex Offender Treatment Program: FY2010 total authorization $2,636.0 (GF) –

$ 182.1	Program oversight
$ 950.0	Community Treatment and Polygraph direct authorization
$1,303.9	SB218 Sex offender Treatment legislation
$ 200.0	Institutional Treatment Program (LCCC)

Domestic Violence Program: FY2010 total authorization $174.7 (GF)

The Cost of Crime: Could The State Reduce Future Crime and Save Money by Expanding Education and Treatment Programs?

By Stephanie Martin and Steve Colt

Alaska's prison population is among the fastest-growing in the U.S., with five times more inmates in 2007 than in 1981. Spending for the state justice system has nearly doubled since 1981—but the crime rate has dropped only about 30%.

Here's the dilemma for the state, given the pattern shown in Figure 1: what can it do to hold down the number of inmates and stem the rising costs—while at the same time keeping the public safe and using tax dollars effectively?

Senator Hollis French asked ISER to project growth in the number of Alaska inmates and the associated costs—and then evaluate whether the state could reduce that growth by expanding intervention and prevention programs for people already in prison or at risk of ending up there. Alaska currently spends about $17 million a year for such programs, but they aren't available to many of those who might benefit from them.

There are a wide range of such programs. But it is programs for adults who are already in prison or jail that have the most potential to save money and reduce crime in the next 20 years. That's because they can reach the most people.

We know that without any intervention, about two-thirds of those who serve their sentences and are released commit new crimes. Stopping at least some of them from committing more crimes would not only help improve public safety but also reduce growth in both the number of inmates and in spending.

Also, most of those released committed misdemeanors (Figure 2). Those who commit the most serious crimes serve long sentences and make up a small share of those released in any given year.

To analyze which programs have the most potential to reduce crime and save the state money, we worked with the Alaska Criminal Justice Working Group and the Washington State Institute of Public Policy. That institute did a similar analysis for Washington state and provided us with data it collected from program evaluations nationwide (see back page). What did our study show?

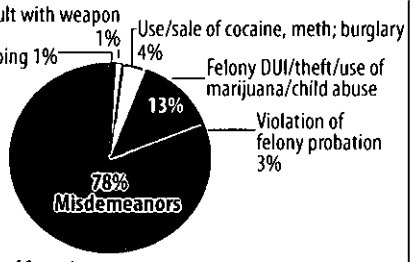
(Total Releases, 2002-2007: 82,339)



Source: Alaska Department of Corrections

- With no change in policies, the number of Alaska inmates is likely to double by 2030, from 5,300 to 10,500.
- If the state spent an additional $4 million a year to expand programs it already has, the prison population in 2030 might be 10% smaller than projected—about 1,050 fewer inmates.
- The state would spend about $124 million for expanded programs through 2030 but would avoid $445 million in costs—a savings of $321 million. It would save money by incarcerating fewer people and by delaying prison construction costs. (Figures 3 and 8).
- Education and substance-abuse treatment programs—in prison, after prison, and instead of prison—save the state two to five times what they cost and reach the most people. Programs for teenagers are also very effective at reducing crime and saving money, but they reach fewer people.

Why Consider Expanding Programs?

In 1980, 2 in 1,000 Alaskans were behind bars; today that share is approaching 10 in 1,000. The sharp increase started in the 1980s, when the state government began collecting large oil revenues. The state used some of that money to expand police agencies, courts, and other parts of the criminal justice system statewide. Also in the 1980s, it made sentencing for the most serious felonies more uniform and stiffened sentences.

The crime rate in Alaska has declined since the 1980s. But the number of Alaskans in prisons, jails, and halfway houses has increased much faster, as have costs for the state justice system. Alaska's prisons are full, and the 1,500-bed prison scheduled to open in 2012 is projected to be full soon after it opens.

Locking people up is expensive, whether their crimes are major or less serious. Alaska spends on average $44,000 a year per inmate in prisons, jails, and halfway houses. Adjusted for inflation, that's actually less than in the 1980s—but it's still a lot (Figure 4).

Studies in other states have shown that some intervention and prevention programs can help cut both costs and crime, either by keeping people who have served their sentences from committing new crimes after they're released, or preventing some people from going to prison in the first place.

What Programs Did We Analyze?

The Alaska Criminal Justice Working Group gave us a list of programs to analyze. We looked for programs with the biggest potential payoff for the state—those that could reduce growth in both numbers of inmates and in spending for corrections, at a reasonable cost for the state.

Alaska already has a number of programs in place, and we found that expanding some of those would be most cost-effective. Table 1 lists the programs in our final analysis. As a guideline for what was a "reasonable" expansion, we used 10% to 20% of the eligible people not already served—except for very small programs that can't easily be expanded that much.

These programs would serve inmates, at-risk juveniles, and young children. They are all intended to reduce future crime in some way. Programs that treat substance-abuse or mental heath disorders have been shown to reduce recidivism—and as Figure 5 shows, almost all current inmates have those disorders.

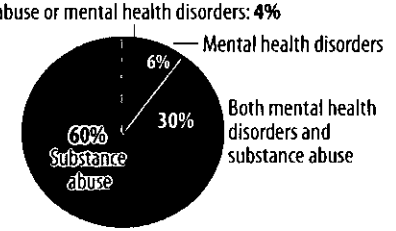
Figure 5. How Many Alaska Inmates Have Substance Abuse or Mental Health Disorders?



Sources: Alaska Department of Corrections; Alaska Mental Health Trust

Table 1. Current Size and Potential Expansion of Intervention and Prevention Programs[a]

Programs	Currently serve	Reasonable expansion	Potentially eligible (2008)
Prison-based programs
Education (adult basic; vocational)	More than 1,000	500	Almost all inmates (4,500)
Substance-Abuse (residential; intensive outpatient)	Close to 500	500	90% of inmates (approximately 4,000)
Sex-offender treatment[b]	0	50	10% of 500 eligible inmates
Transition from prison
Transition for inmates with mental health disorders (Institutional Discharge Project)	70	100	36% of inmates (1,600)
Alternatives to Incarceration	500	500	Approximately 5,000[c]
Mental health, drug, alcohol courts; electronic monitoring; residential substance-abuse treatment
Juvenile offenders	Approximately 500	1,000	Approximately 3,000
Aggression replacement training; family therapy; residential treatment; institutional transition
Prevention	3,025	450	Approximately 8,000[e]
Head Start for 3- and 4-year olds from low-income families[d]

[a]Programs included in our final analysis are those for which we found evidence that expansion would have significant pay-offs for the state at a reasonable cost. We evaluated additional programs not included here, either because there wasn't sufficient evidence to assess their effectiveness or because they weren't feasible to implement in Alaska at this time.
[b]To effectively reduce crime, sex offender treatment programs need to be offered in both prison and the community. Treatment is currently available only in the community, so the number served in prison is currently zero—but there are proposals to add treatment in prison.
[c]People facing low-level charges and with substance-abuse problems.
[d]Head Start is a federal program, but the state supplements federal money and Governor Sarah Palin has proposed additional state funding.
[e]We assume all children from families with up to double the poverty-level income would be eligible.

We looked at but excluded other programs from our final analysis. The criminal justice working group decided that a few programs, while effective elsewhere, wouldn't be feasible to implement in Alaska at this time. For other programs, there wasn't enough available evidence to judge how effective they were in saving money or reducing crime, or the available evidence showed them to be largely ineffective.

How Do the Programs Compare?

As Figure 3 (front page) shows, expanding programs to serve more of the eligible people would save the state about $321 million and reduce the projected number of inmates 10% by 2030. Figures 6 and 7 show how the various programs contribute to costs, savings, and reductions in the number of Alaskans behind bars.

- Education and substance-abuse treatment programs for inmates save two to four times what they cost, reduce recidivism by about four percentage points, and can reach the most people.

- Intervention programs for juveniles who have committed crimes are very effective at saving money and reducing recidivism, but they serve a much smaller number of people.

- Programs that set up transition services for inmates with mental-health disorders coming out of prison are among the most effective—but they can't readily be expanded to serve the many people who could benefit from them.

- Alternatives to prison for some people charged with lesser offenses save the state money right away, and almost all reduce recidivism. The exception is electronic monitoring, which is inexpensive but hasn't been shown to reduce future crime.

- Treatment programs for sex offenders do reduce crime, but they are very expensive and so don't save the state money.

- Programs that prevent future crime by helping very young at-risk children are the most effective. But the effects of spending for those programs aren't apparent until many years later.

Pre-school programs for at-risk children cost about $1,000 per child but save many times that much, by reducing future crime. The effects of the spending aren't apparent for years, until the children grow up.

Programs for juveniles offenders cost an average of about $2,500 per person, but save almost 10 times that much by keeping kids out of prison. They serve only a subset of the population of 12- to-17-year-olds.

Transition programs for people with mental health disorders are extremely effective, add about $2,000 per person to inmate costs, and save about four times that much. But the programs currently serve very few people and can't readily be expanded to serve large numbers.

Programs that treat inmates for substance abuse add about $2,000 a person to inmate costs, but over time save about twice as much. They are effective, but can't readily be expanded to reach all the people who need them.

Education and job training programs in prison add about $1,000 to inmate costs, but they reach the most people and save about four times more than they cost. Because they are offered in every facility, they can easily be expanded and can reach more people. (Reductions in the number of inmates as a result of the sex-offender treatment program are also included here, but are only one or two people a year.)

Programs that keep people out of prison save the state money right away, because they cost much less than the $44,000 per person the state spends to lock people up. They include therapeutic courts for substance abuse and mental health disorders, electronic monitoring, and residential substance-abuse treatment.

Conclusion

In conclusion, Figure 8 shows how Alaska's corrections system got where it is and where it's likely to go—if intervention and prevention program are kept at their current levels, and if the most effective programs are expanded to serve more of the eligible people.

We found that the state could both reduce the number of Alaskans in prison or jail and save considerable money over the next 20 years, by adding about $4 million a year to the $17 million it currently spends to keep people from returning to prison— or prevent them from ever going there at all.

Spending more for these programs even as oil prices and state revenues are falling may not seem like a good idea. But Alaska also needs to look to the future—and over time the benefits of strategically expanding those programs that reduce crime and keep more Alaskans out of prison far outweigh the costs.

Method of Analysis

Our job was to assess whether specific programs could reduce long-term state spending for corrections by reducing growth in the number of inmates. As a starting point, we needed evaluations of how effective various programs are at reducing future crime.

But except for some of the therapeutic court programs, most programs in Alaska have not been rigorously evaluated. Therefore, we used results of a Washington state assessment that systematically reviewed 571 program evaluations from around the country.

To be included, evaluations had to have carefully designed control groups, replicable results in multiple settings, and long-lasting effects. This method is evidence-based public policy, which merges research and practice. It is similar to clinical trials in medicine. Keep in mind that this is a new field, and only about 10% of programs in place nationwide have been evaluated at this standard.

With data from rigorous evaluations, the Washington State Institute of Public Policy created a model that estimated the effects of programs on recidivism—and then combined those results with a cost-benefit analysis to estimate the long-term effects on state spending and inmate populations.

We combined the institute's estimates of recidivism with Alaska data on program costs, eligible groups, and state population to estimate long-term effects on crime and state spending.

The Honorable Hollis French
Chair, Senate Judiciary Committee
Alaska State Legislature
Alaska State Capitol, Room 417
Juneau, AK 99811

Dear Senator French:

Listed below are responses to questions that were posed to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) on Wednesday, January 28, 2010, during the Senate Judiciary Committee hearing.

Senator Coghill: It is his understanding that law enforcement is not referring all the youth that it could to the DJJ for minor consuming violations. If it did, DJJ would see its referral trends dramatically increase. Is this DJJ's understanding as well? DJJ only has jurisdiction for minor consuming offenses when they rise to the habitual level—that is, a youth has to be cited for minor consuming three times before he is referred by law enforcement or the District Court to DJJ. First and second-time referrals for minor consuming are managed through District Courts. We are unable to locate statistics from District Court on the frequency of first- and second minor consuming citations statewide, but for DJJ to manage these violations would undoubtedly and dramatically increase the number of referrals we would need to manage, and require significantly more resources for the division. In addition, changes to the statutes surrounding minor consuming and juvenile delinquency would be needed, as these would be the only violations under the jurisdiction of the division. (The division currently manages offenses only when they rise to the misdemeanor or felony level, unless they occur as probation violations for youth already under our supervision.)

Out of the 7,692 offenses referred to DJJ in FY09, there were 117 (1.5%) alcohol related offenses (primarily "habitual minor consuming" but also a variety of others such as furnishing alcohol to a minor). Additionally, there were 469 (6.1%) probation or conduct violations related to alcohol and drug use.

Senator McGuire: What neurological anomalies are we seeing with the 10 and under age group? DJJ has no data readily available on neurological anomalies among its population. A mental health screening for youth at admission would assist us in getting an understanding of the frequency of these anomalies among our youth, so we will continue to explore the possibility of adding such a screen to our practice.

Currently, a mental health assessment required within seven days of institutionalization for youth. At that time we ask each institutionalized youth for a history of head injuries. If there is significant TBI this in noted as a DSM IV diagnosis (axis three, as it is a medical issue) and in our recommendations, we let the treatment team know what to look for with TBI and more effective ways of dealing with the resulting outcomes of TBI. This mental health assessment is presented and reviewed with the treatment team by the mental health clinician as part of our practice.The mental health clinicians who work at the Division have received training on TBI, and at McLaughlin Youth Center they work closely with Dr. Randy Moss, a psychiatrist who is able to assess TBI issues that our mental health clinicians think may be present. Over the years, youth have been sent to a neuropsychologist for specialized assessments and treatment suggestions. They have identified youth with TBI as a result of three- and four-wheeler accidents, abuse, and other issues. In addition, Dr. Moss has worked with the lead McLaughlin mental health clinician to provide training in TBI in March for all interested staff. This will be the second time staff have been offered TBI training, and the expectation is that this training will be offered at McLaughlin once each year.

Do you know the number of youth who also experience abuse/neglect? The division has actually been devoting considerable attention to this question recently. Last week, we pulled the current open supervision cases in the six pilot communities for the department's Families First project. The six locations are: Anchorage, Mat-Su, Fairbanks, Nome, Juneau and Sitka. Specifically, of the 1120 youth with open referrals or open supervision within the juvenile justice system, 24% also had an ORCA ID number. This means that the youth has had some current or past involvement with a child abuse or neglect case. The youth could be a sibling or a victim, or in a rare instance, possibly the natural child of a foster parent. This information is consistent with a recent informal survey of juvenile justice supervisors statewide, who estimated that that 10%–20% of the approximately 1,300 juveniles under division custody or supervision on any given day have current or recent involvement with the state's child protective services agency.

The division expects that the development of the Department of Health and Social Services's Master Client Index (MCI) will assist us in our desire to understand how many youth are involved with the juvenile justice and child protection systems, as well as other agencies in the department such as Public Assistance and Behavioral Health. We expect to refine our data-extraction methods as development of the MCI progresses.

In addition, both DJJ and the Office of Children's Services have made recent changes to their divisional databases to increase the ease with which staff may mutually access and share information through these IT systems.

Senator French: It would be good to see the DJJ Recidivism further broken down by region. Please see below:

What would be the cost for three positions to provide oversight and quality assurance for our evidence-based practices?: The division has determined that the position ranges would likely be one Range 21 position and two Range 20 positions. These positions would work to ensure the sustainability and effectiveness of evidence-based programs such as Aggression Replacement Training, a curriculum proven to change behavior of youth demonstrating chronic violent behavior and aggressiveness; and the Youth Level of Service Inventory, an assessment tool highly effective in identifying those youth at high risk of reoffending. The cost for the three positions would be approximately $350.0.

The Cost of Crime: Could The State Reduce Future Crime and Save Money by Expanding Education and Treatment Programs?

By Stephanie Martin and Steve Colt

Alaska's prison population is among the fastest-growing in the U.S., with five times more inmates in 2007 than in 1981. Spending for the state justice system has nearly doubled since 1981—but the crime rate has dropped only about 30%.

Here's the dilemma for the state, given the pattern shown in Figure 1: what can it do to hold down the number of inmates and stem the rising costs—while at the same time keeping the public safe and using tax dollars effectively?

Senator Hollis French asked ISER to project growth in the number of Alaska inmates and the associated costs—and then evaluate whether the state could reduce that growth by expanding intervention and prevention programs for people already in prison or at risk of ending up there. Alaska currently spends about $17 million a year for such programs, but they aren't available to many of those who might benefit from them.

[c]Rates per 100,000 for murder, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary, larceny, and motor vehicle theft.
Sources: U.S. Department of Justice; state budget documents; Alaska Department of Corrections

There are a wide range of such programs. But it is programs for adults who are already in prison or jail that have the most potential to save money and reduce crime in the next 20 years. That's because they can reach the most people.

We know that without any intervention, about two-thirds of those who serve their sentences and are released commit new crimes. Stopping at least some of them from committing more crimes would not only help improve public safety but also reduce growth in both the number of inmates and in spending.

Also, most of those released committed misdemeanors (Figure 2). Those who commit the most serious crimes serve long sentences and make up a small share of those released in any given year.

To analyze which programs have the most potential to reduce crime and save the state money, we worked with the Alaska Criminal Justice Working Group and the Washington State Institute of Public Policy. That institute did a similar analysis for Washington state and provided us with data it collected from program evaluations nationwide (see back page). What did our study show?

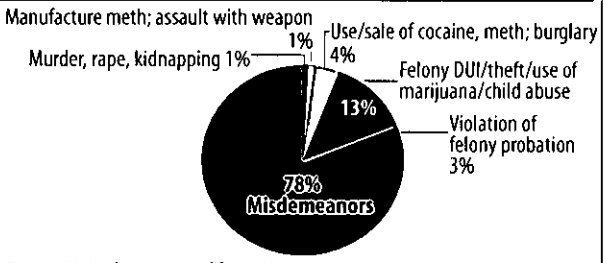
(Total Releases, 2002-2007: 82,339)



Source: Alaska Department of Corrections

- With no change in policies, the number of Alaska inmates is likely to double by 2030, from 5,300 to 10,500.
- If the state spent an additional $4 million a year to expand programs it already has, the prison population in 2030 might be 10% smaller than projected—about 1,050 fewer inmates.
- The state would spend about $124 million for expanded programs through 2030 but would avoid $445 million in costs—a savings of $321 million. It would save money by incarcerating fewer people and by delaying prison construction costs. (Figures 3 and 8).
- Education and substance-abuse treatment programs—in prison, after prison, and instead of prison—save the state two to five times what they cost and reach the most people. Programs for teenagers are also very effective at reducing crime and saving money, but they reach fewer people.

Why Consider Expanding Programs?

In 1980, 2 in 1,000 Alaskans were behind bars; today that share is approaching 10 in 1,000. The sharp increase started in the 1980s, when the state government began collecting large oil revenues. The state used some of that money to expand police agencies, courts, and other parts of the criminal justice system statewide. Also in the 1980s, it made sentencing for the most serious felonies more uniform and stiffened sentences.

The crime rate in Alaska has declined since the 1980s. But the number of Alaskans in prisons, jails, and halfway houses has increased much faster, as have costs for the state justice system. Alaska's prisons are full, and the 1,500-bed prison scheduled to open in 2012 is projected to be full soon after it opens.

Locking people up is expensive, whether their crimes are major or less serious. Alaska spends on average $44,000 a year per inmate in prisons, jails, and halfway houses. Adjusted for inflation, that's actually less than in the 1980s—but it's still a lot (Figure 4).

Studies in other states have shown that some intervention and prevention programs can help cut both costs and crime, either by keeping people who have served their sentences from committing new crimes after they're released, or preventing some people from going to prison in the first place.

What Programs Did We Analyze?

The Alaska Criminal Justice Working Group gave us a list of programs to analyze. We looked for programs with the biggest potential payoff for the state—those that could reduce growth in both numbers of inmates and in spending for corrections, at a reasonable cost for the state.

Alaska already has a number of programs in place, and we found that expanding some of those would be most cost-effective. Table 1 lists the programs in our final analysis. As a guideline for what was a "reasonable" expansion, we used 10% to 20% of the eligible people not already served—except for very small programs that can't easily be expanded that much.

These programs would serve inmates, at-risk juveniles, and young children. They are all intended to reduce future crime in some way. Programs that treat substance-abuse or mental heath disorders have been shown to reduce recidivism—and as Figure 5 shows, almost all current inmates have those disorders.

Table 1. Current Size and Potential Expansion of Intervention and Prevention Programs[a]

Programs	Currently serve	Reasonable expansion	Potentially eligible (2008)
Prison-based programs
Education (adult basic; vocational)	More than 1,000	500	Almost all inmates (4,500)
Substance-Abuse (residential; intensive outpatient)	Close to 500	500	90% of inmates (approximately 4,000)
Sex-offender treatment[b]	0	50	10% of 500 eligible inmates
Transition from prison
Transition for inmates with mental health disorders (Institutional Discharge Project)	70	100	36% of inmates (1,600)
Alternatives to incarceration	500	500	Approximately 5,000[c]
Mental health, drug, alcohol courts; electronic monitoring; residential substance-abuse treatment
Juvenile offenders	Approximately 500	1,000	Approximately 3,000
Aggression replacement training; family therapy; residential treatment; institutional transition
Prevention	3,025	450	Approximately 8,000[e]
Head Start for 3- and 4-year olds from low-income families[d]

[a]Programs included in our final analysis are those for which we found evidence that expansion would have significant pay-offs for the state at a reasonable cost. We evaluated additional programs not included here, either because there wasn't sufficient evidence to assess their effectiveness or because they weren't feasible to implement in Alaska at this time.
[b]To effectively reduce crime, sex offender treatment programs need to be offered in both prison and the community. Treatment is currently available only in the community, so the number served in prison is currently zero—but there are proposals to add treatment in prison.
[c]People facing low-level charges and with substance-abuse problems.
[d]Head Start is a federal program, but the state supplements federal money and Governor Sarah Palin has proposed additional state funding.
[e]We assume all children from families with up to double the poverty-level income would be eligible.

We looked at but excluded other programs from our final analysis. The criminal justice working group decided that a few programs, while effective elsewhere, wouldn't be feasible to implement in Alaska at this time. For other programs, there wasn't enough available evidence to judge how effective they were in saving money or reducing crime, or the available evidence showed them to be largely ineffective.

How Do the Programs Compare?

As Figure 3 (front page) shows, expanding programs to serve more of the eligible people would save the state about $321 million and reduce the projected number of inmates 10% by 2030. Figures 6 and 7 show how the various programs contribute to costs, savings, and reductions in the number of Alaskans behind bars.

- Education and substance-abuse treatment programs for inmates save two to four times what they cost, reduce recidivism by about four percentage points, and can reach the most people.
- Intervention programs for juveniles who have committed crimes are very effective at saving money and reducing recidivism, but they serve a much smaller number of people.
- Programs that set up transition services for inmates with mental-health disorders coming out of prison are among the most effective—but they can't readily be expanded to serve the many people who could benefit from them.
- Alternatives to prison for some people charged with lesser offenses save the state money right away, and almost all reduce recidivism. The exception is electronic monitoring, which is inexpensive but hasn't been shown to reduce future crime.
- Treatment programs for sex offenders do reduce crime, but they are very expensive and so don't save the state money.
- Programs that prevent future crime by helping very young at-risk children are the most effective. But the effects of spending for those programs aren't apparent until many years later.

Pre-school programs for at-risk children cost about $1,000 per child but save many times that much, by reducing future crime. The effects of the spending aren't apparent for years, until the children grow up.

Programs for juveniles offenders cost an average of about $2,500 per person, but save almost 10 times that much by keeping kids out of prison. They serve only a subset of the population of 12- to-17-year-olds.

Transition programs for people with mental health disorders are extremely effective, add about $2,000 per person to inmate costs, and save about four times that much. But the programs currently serve very few people and can't readily be expanded to serve large numbers.

Programs that treat inmates for substance abuse add about $2,000 a person to inmate costs, but over time save about twice as much. They are effective, but can't readily be expanded to reach all the people who need them.

Education and job training programs in prison add about $1,000 to inmate costs, but they reach the most people and save about four times more than they cost. Because they are offered in every facility, they can easily be expanded and can reach more people. (Reductions in the number of inmates as a result of the sex-offender treatment program are also included here, but are only one or two people a year.)

Programs that keep people out of prison save the state money right away, because they cost much less than the $44,000 per person the state spends to lock people up. They include therapeutic courts for substance abuse and mental health disorders, electronic monitoring, and residential substance-abuse treatment.

Conclusion

In conclusion, Figure 8 shows how Alaska's corrections system got where it is and where it's likely to go—if intervention and prevention program are kept at their current levels, and if the most effective programs are expanded to serve more of the eligible people.

We found that the state could both reduce the number of Alaskans in prison or jail and save considerable money over the next 20 years, by adding about $4 million a year to the $17 million it currently spends to keep people from returning to prison— or prevent them from ever going there at all.

Spending more for these programs even as oil prices and state revenues are falling may not seem like a good idea. But Alaska also needs to look to the future—and over time the benefits of strategically expanding those programs that reduce crime and keep more Alaskans out of prison far outweigh the costs.

Method of Analysis

Our job was to assess whether specific programs could reduce long-term state spending for corrections by reducing growth in the number of inmates. As a starting point, we needed evaluations of how effective various programs are at reducing future crime.

But except for some of the therapeutic court programs, most programs in Alaska have not been rigorously evaluated. Therefore, we used results of a Washington state assessment that systematically reviewed 571 program evaluations from around the country.

To be included, evaluations had to have carefully designed control groups, replicable results in multiple settings, and long-lasting effects. This method is evidence-based public policy, which merges research and practice. It is similar to clinical trials in medicine. Keep in mind that this is a new field, and only about 10% of programs in place nationwide have been evaluated at this standard.

With data from rigorous evaluations, the Washington State Institute of Public Policy created a model that estimated the effects of programs on recidivism—and then combined those results with a cost-benefit analysis to estimate the long-term effects on state spending and inmate populations.

We combined the institute's estimates of recidivism with Alaska data on program costs, eligible groups, and state population to estimate long-term effects on crime and state spending.

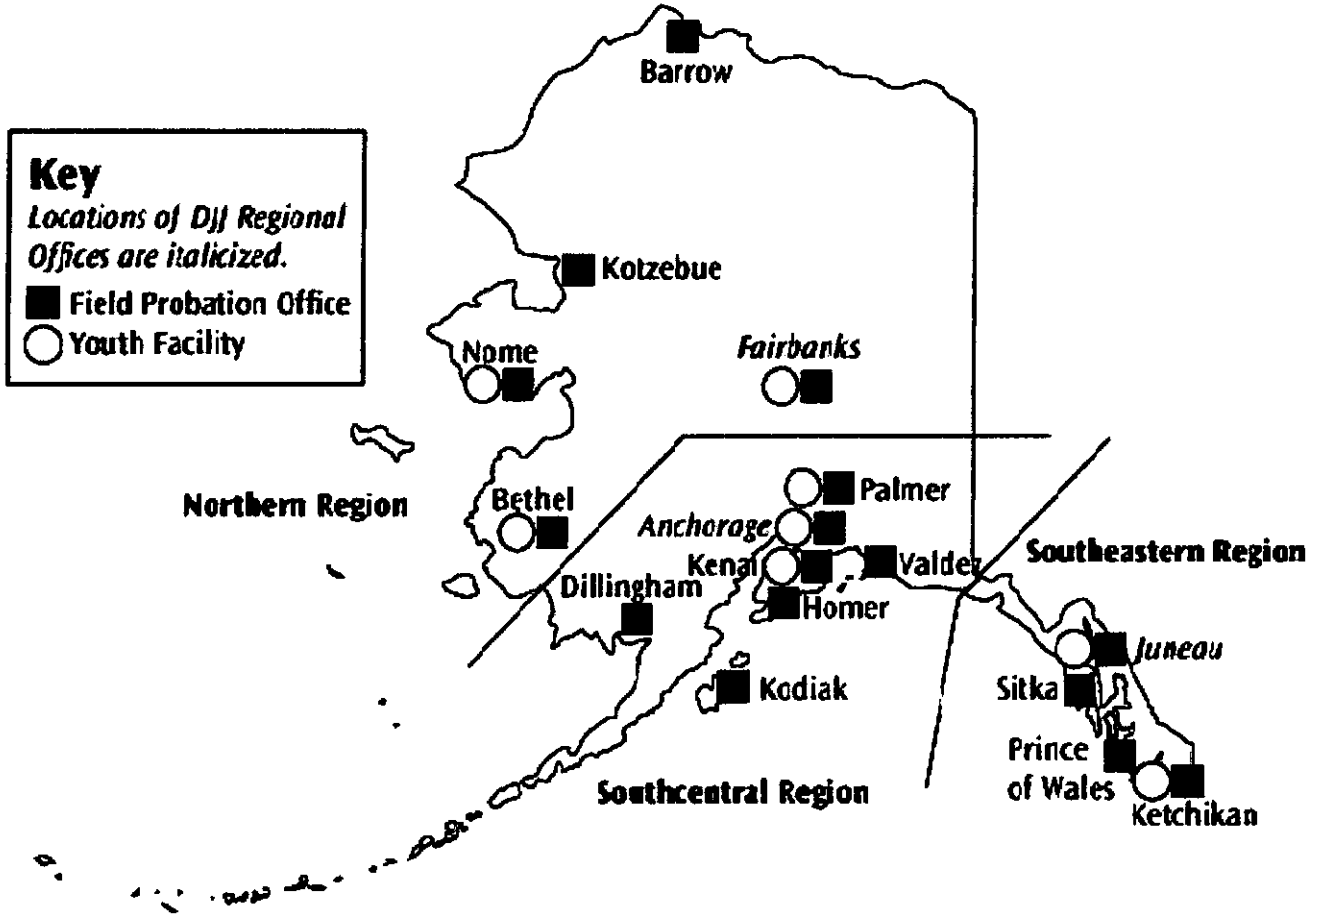
Map of DJJ Locations



Division of Juvenile Justice

- DJJ is an agency within the Department of Health & Social Services
- Our Mission is based on a Restorative Justice Philosophy:
  - Hold juvenile offenders accountable for their behavior.
  - Promote the safety and restoration of victims and communities.
  - Assist offenders and their families in developing skills to prevent crime.

Overview of what we'll cover today

- Juvenile Delinquency Trends, Recidivism, Areas needing Focus
- Key Programs
  - YLS: Youth Level of Service / Case Management Inventory (This is the youth version of the LSI)
  - PbS: Performance-based Standards
  - ART: Aggression Replacement Training

How does a youth enter our system?

- By committing an offense that would be a crime if committed by an adult.
- Less serious offense & low risk/needs, Informal sanctions
- More serious offense & higher risk/needs, Go to Court with possible outcomes of:
  - Formal Probation
  - Custody with possible Residential Placement
  - Institutionalized DJJ Treatment (with appropriate Transitional Services)

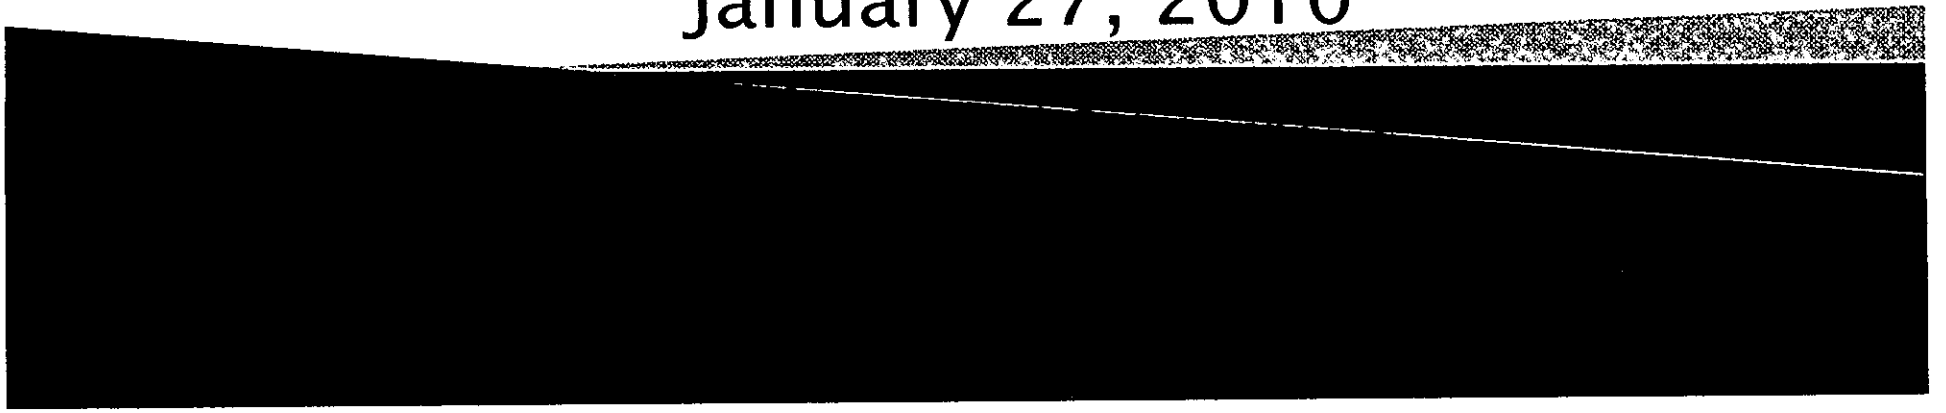
The Youth Level of Service/ Case Management Inventory

"The YLS"

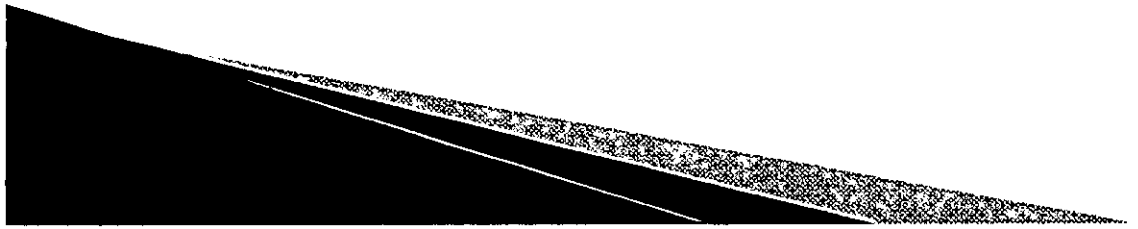
Juvenile Justice Overview
Senate Judiciary Committee
January 27, 2010



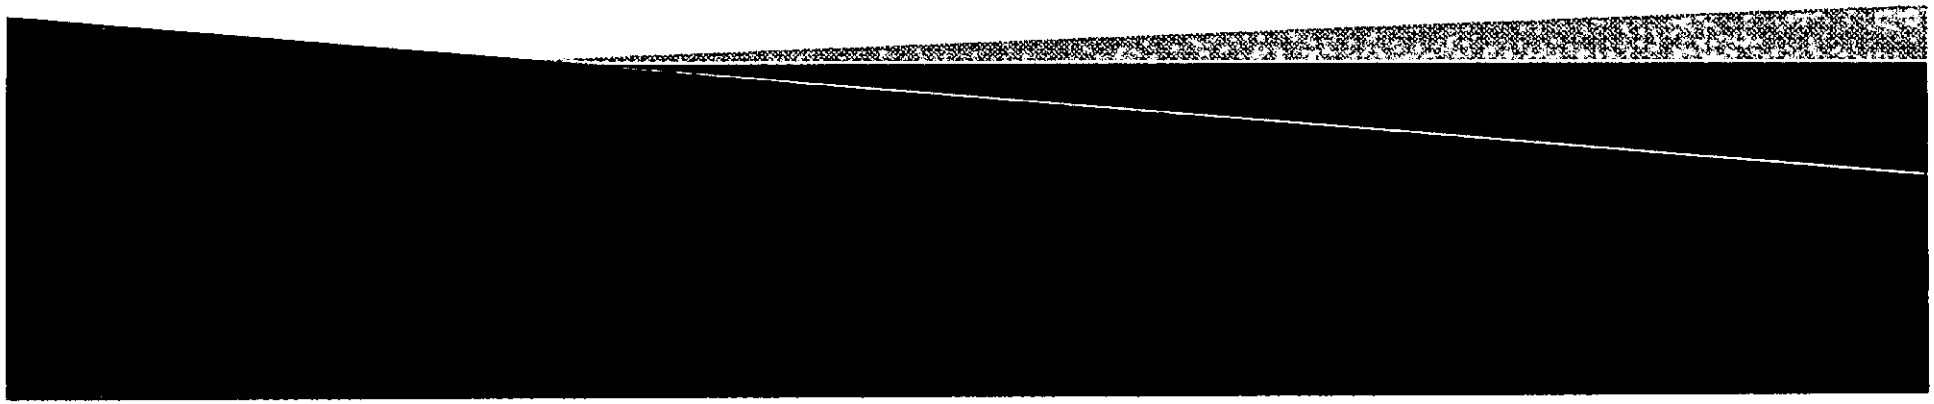
Objective:

To emphasize:

- The importance and value of effective assessment of juveniles
- The potential that the YLS holds for Alaska



What puts a youth at increased risk for delinquent behavior?



These are strong risk factors for delinquent behavior:

- A history of offending
- Challenging family circumstances
- Difficulties in education, employment
- Poor peer relations
- Substance abuse
- Few leisure activities, interests
- Pro-criminal behavior or personality
- Pro-criminal attitudes

These are NOT strong risk factors for delinquent behavior:

Socio-economic status

Personal distress

Mental illness

Family structure

- Learning disabilities
- Abusive parents
- Low self-esteem

Risk factors for delinquency are both STATIC and DYNAMIC

A youth CAN'T change his offense history, and previous educational failures

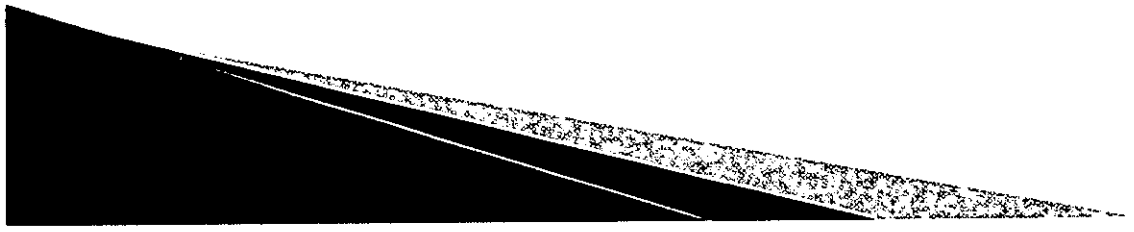
But MAY be able to change some family circumstances, his educational goals, friendships, substance abuse habits, etc.

Appropriate Assessment of Juveniles:

- Reduces bias in determining risk
- Helps better utilize resources
  - Guides decision making
  - Improves placement of offenders
- Can lead to enhanced public safety

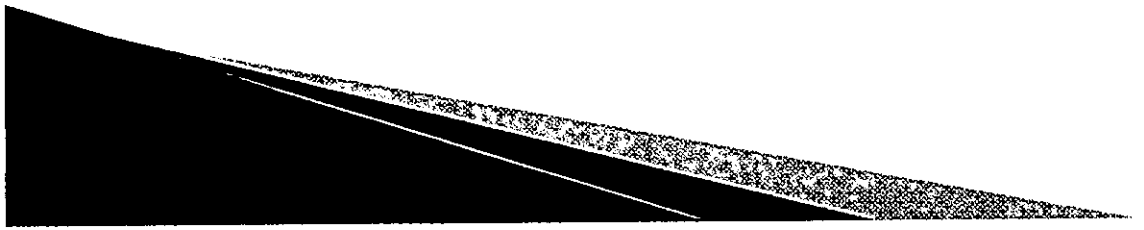
Why the Youth Level of Service/Case Management Inventory (YLS)?

- Measures the major risk and need factors for delinquency
- Extensive validation studies
- Case management flows from results



Features of the YLS

- Completed after In-Depth Interviews with Youth, Parents, and others familiar with youth
- 42 Questions on the Major Risk Factors
- Strict scoring criteria to limit subjectivity
- Allows professional discretion to adjust final risk/need level



The YLS in Alaska

- Introduced in 2005 Statewide
- Youth are assessed with the YLS if they've been adjudicated delinquent in Court and are at least 12 years old.
- Youth are RE-assessed every 6 months that they remain on probation supervision or following release from a secure or non-secure residential program.

YLS: Next Steps

- Quality Assurance Needs
  - Is it being performed correctly?
  - Is it being performed according to policy?
  - Would two assessors score the same youth the same way?

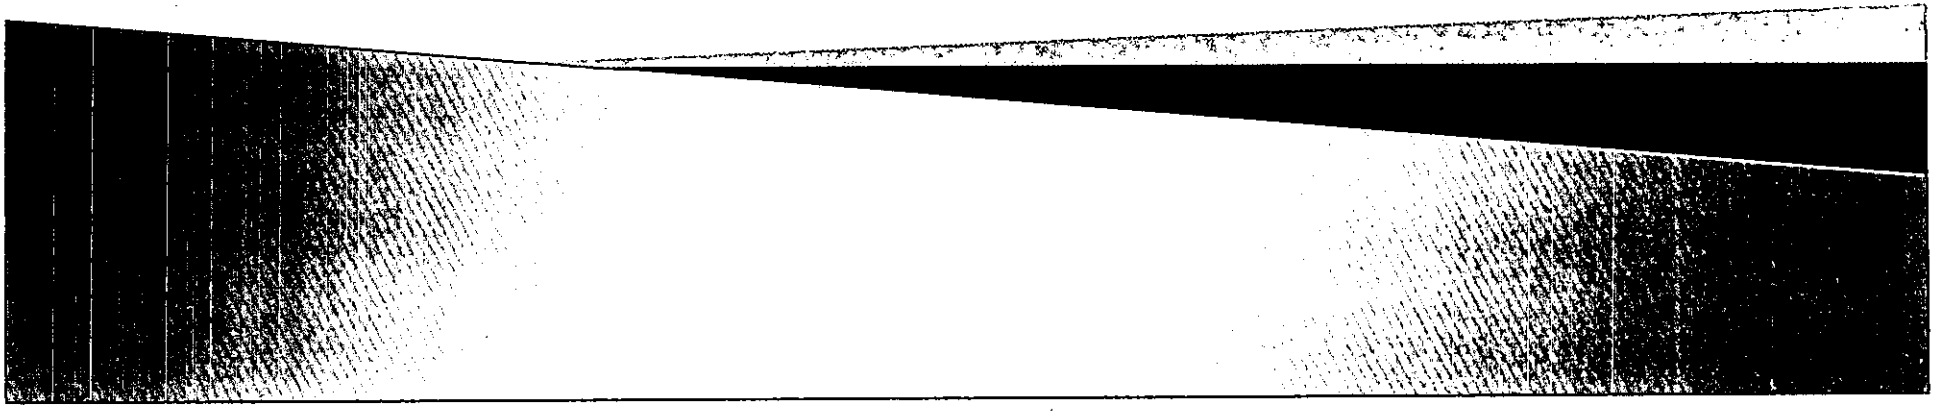
Introduction to AGGRESSION REPLACEMENT TRAINING®



What is Aggression Replacement Training ®

- ART ® is a cognitive behavioral, multi-modal curriculum comprised of three interdependent components:
  - Structured Learning Training (SLT)
  - Anger Control Training (ACT)
  - Moral Reasoning (MR)

Research on effectiveness

- ART® is a model program as rated by The Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP).
  http://ojjdp.ncjrs.org/programs/mpg.html

- Washington State Institute for Public Policy
  www.wsipp.wa.gov

Washington State outcomes

When competently delivered, Aggression Replacement Training (ART) has positive outcomes with estimated reductions in 18-month felony recidivism of 24 percent and a benefit to cost ratio of $11.66.

Alaska Juvenile Justice

Began training ART ® facilitators in 2004

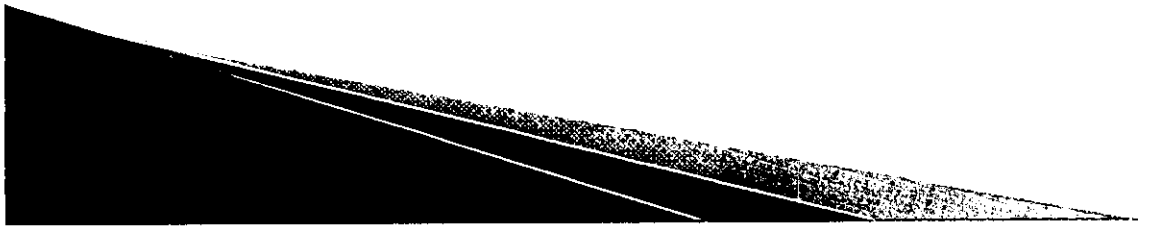
Have since trained more that 80 facilitators

Classes have been attended by more than 400 youth

Classes are offered to youth in DJJ care in Nome, Fairbanks, Bethel, Anchorage, Ketchikan and Juneau.

Aggression Replacement Training® (ART®)

- STRUCTURED LEARNING TRAINING (SLT) (Behavioral Component)
- ANGER CONTROL TRAINING (ACT)
- (Affective Component)
- MORAL REASONING (MR) (Values Component)

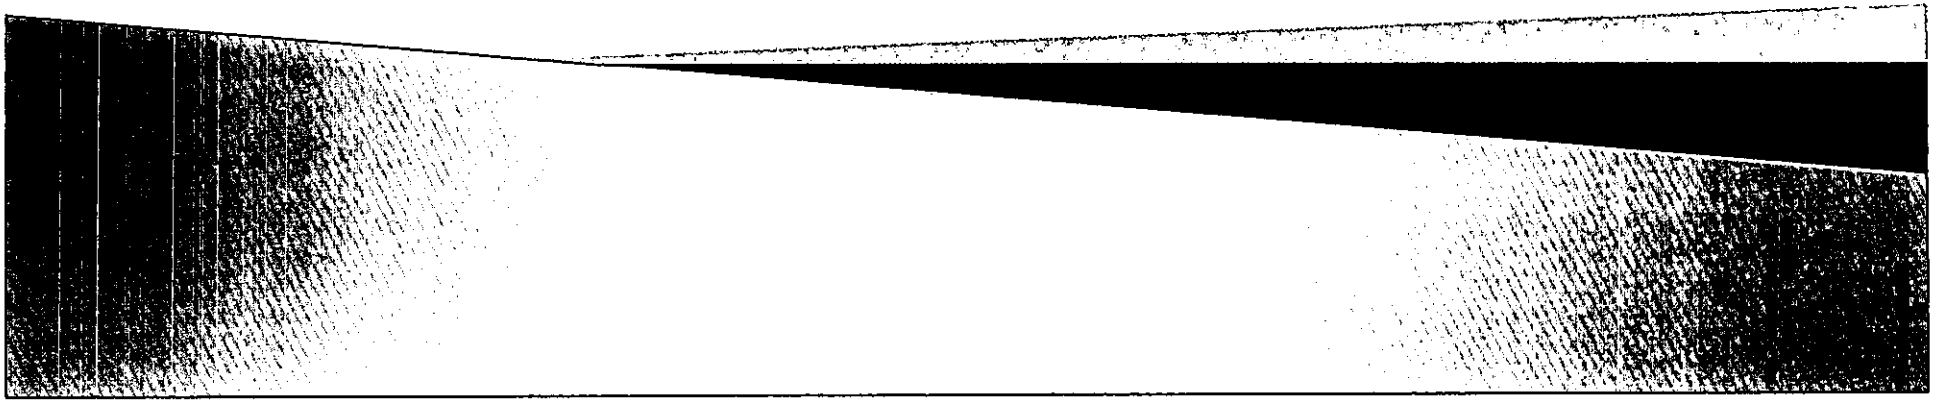


Aggression Replacement Training® Classes

- 10 weeks
- 3 classes per week
- 8 to 12 participants
- Closed classes
- Interactive
- Prescriptive Program for aggressive and violent youth

Structured Learning Training

The Behavioral Component of ART®

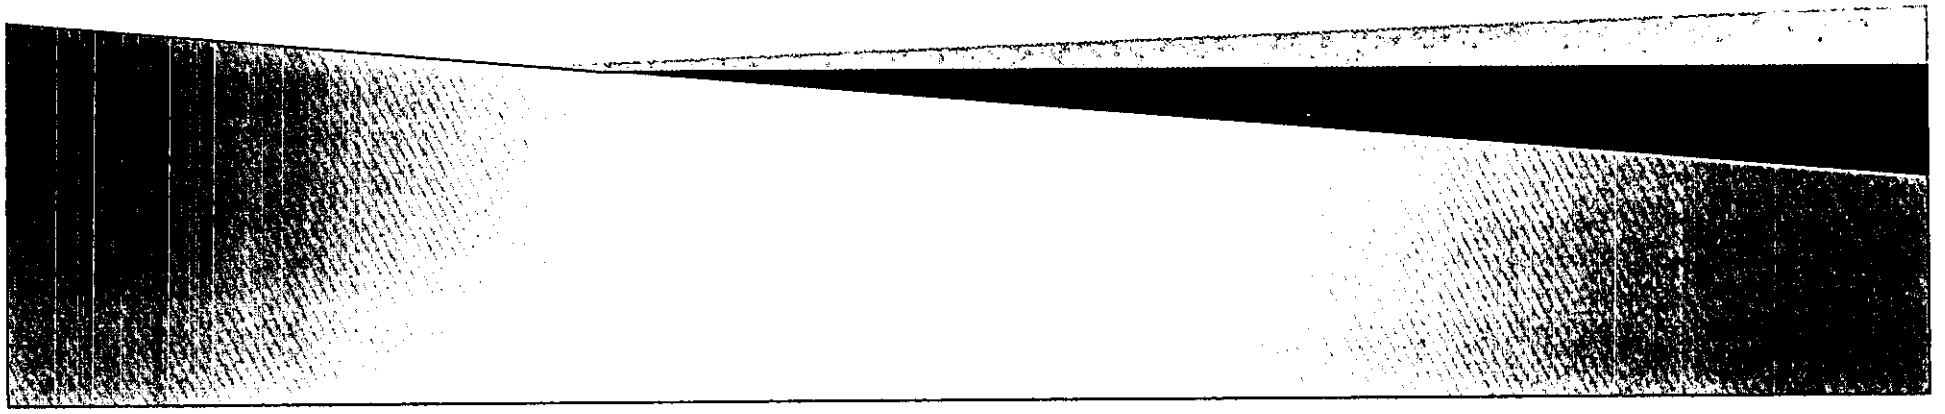


STRUCTURED LEARNING CURRICULUM

- Making a complaint
- Understanding the feelings of others
- Getting ready for a difficult conversation
- Dealing with someone else's anger
- Keeping out of fights
- Helping others
- Dealing with an accusation
- Dealing with group pressure
- Expressing affection
- Responding to failure

Anger Control Training

The Affective (Emotional) Component of ART®

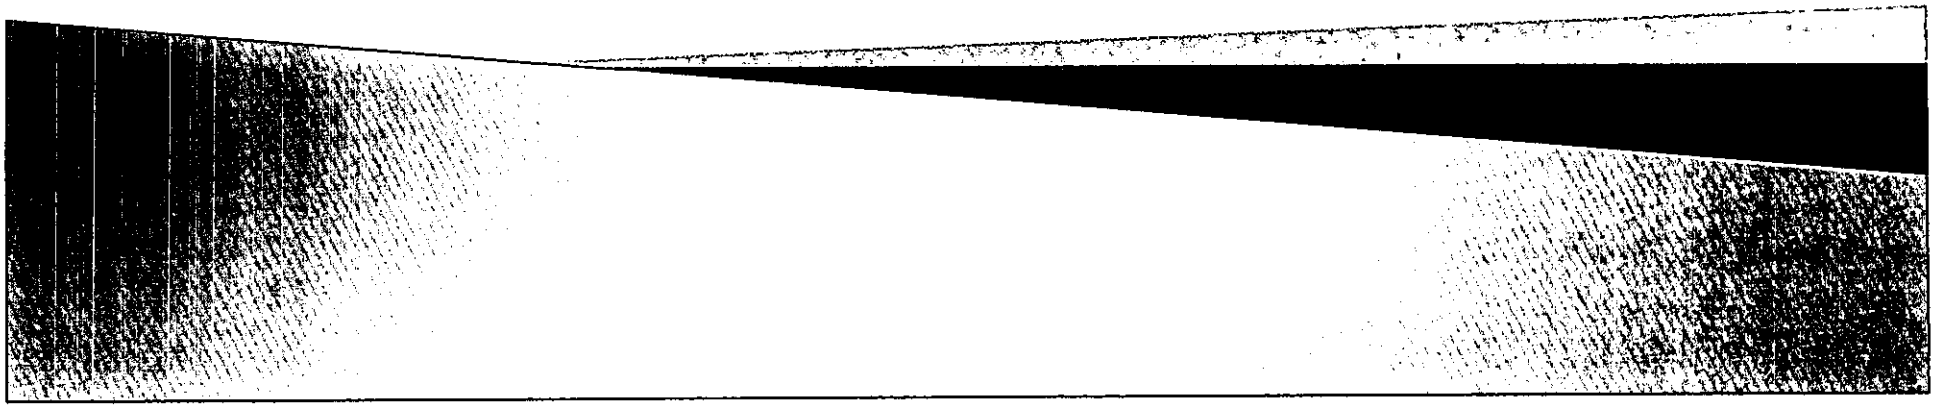


Goals and Objectives of ACT

- To help make the arousal of anger in chronically aggressive clients a less frequent occurrence.
- To provide clients with the means to learn self-control when their anger is aroused. (Whereas SLT teaches clients what to do in angry producing situations...ACT teaches them what not to do.)

Moral Reasoning

The Cognitive Component of ART®



Moral Reasoning

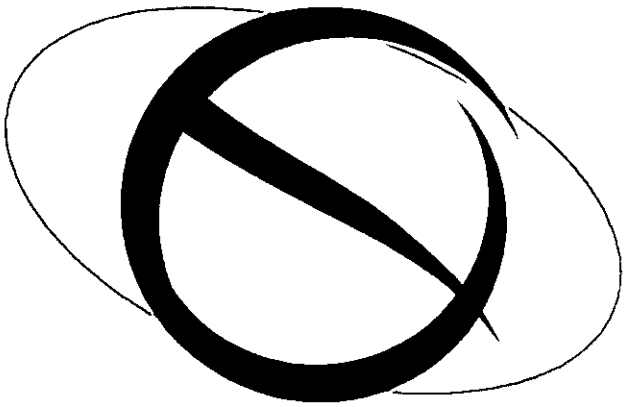
The Social Decision-Making Meeting

- The goal of the meeting is to facilitate the natural adolescent growth of moral-cognitive development so youth will make more mature decisions in social situations.

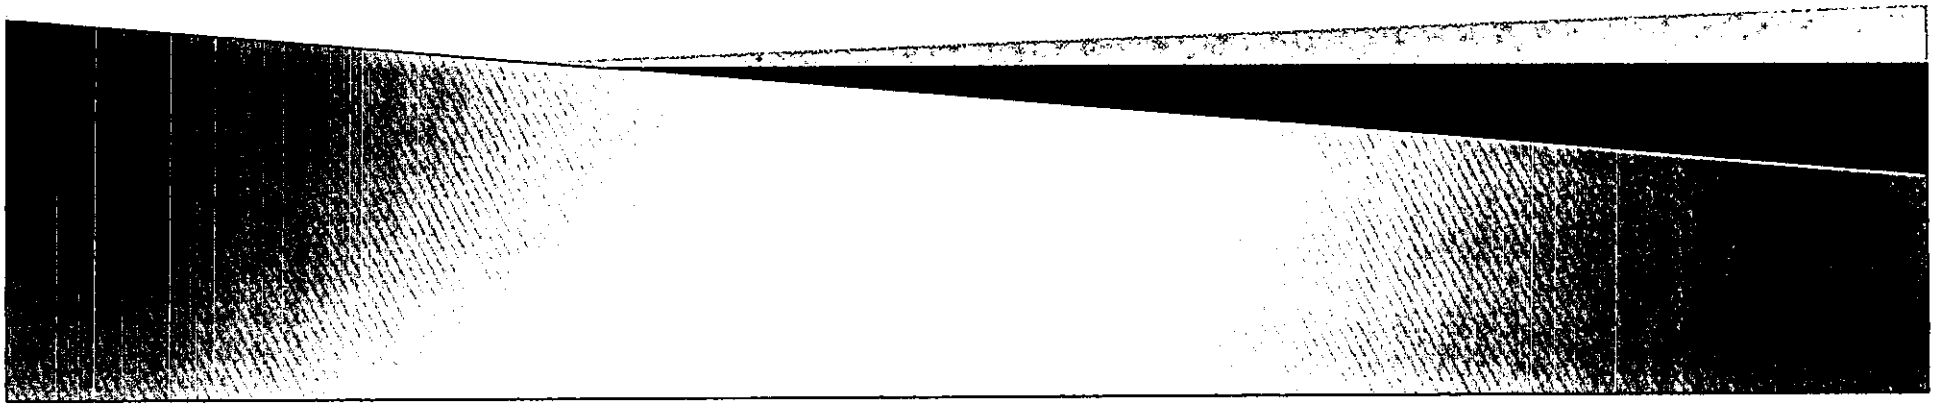
- The purpose is not to teach morality or values.

What ART® is NOT

- Traditional Psychotherapy
- Group Guidance or Advice Giving
- Values Training or Clarification
- Content Specific Education



Implementation

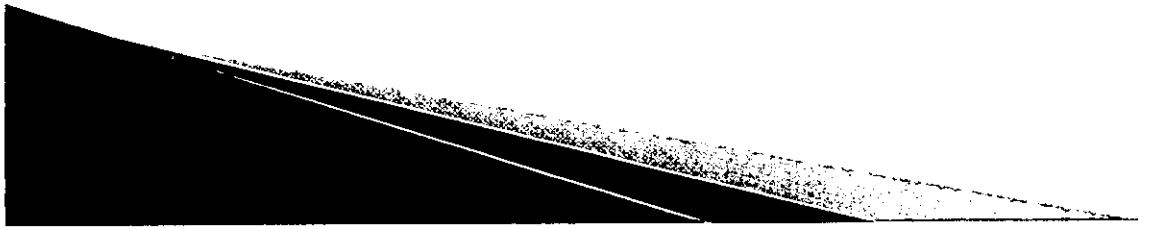


Facilitator Training

- ART® Institute is a 5 day training.
- Participants are certified to teach ART® and any of the three components.
- Annual Refresher Training for Facilitators
- Quality Assurance

Quality Assurance for ART®

- Provide all three ART® Components
- Complete Program
- Trained ART® Facilitators
- Observe Groups
- Provide Feedback



QUALITY ASSURANCE EFFORTS

- The key to reducing recidivism is to deliver the research-based program competently
  - Pick the best people to facilitate the program
  - Ensure proper training
  - Referring appropriate youth
  - Ensure the program is delivered with fidelity to the model
    - Assessment of facilitators skills
    - Providing statewide guidelines for the Program

RE: Hearing on February 3 regarding Citizens Untied v. Federal Election Commission

I wanted to provide some of the questions that committee members may be thinking about for your information as we get ready for Wednesday's hearing. I look forward to seeing you then!

Does this decision apply to state laws? Which state laws does it apply to?
Do the changes take effect immediately?
Are the statutes invalidated? Taken off the books?
Which corporations and unions are now authorized to spend money directly advocating for the election of candidates?
Must a corporation spending money in what used to be a prohibited period be authorized to do business in Alaska?
Are corporations creatures of state or federal law?
Did the decision draw any distinction between foreign and domestic corporations?
Where does the 'corporate personhood' idea come from?
Must a company do business in Alaska in order to spend money influencing elections?
What disclosure requirements currently exist for corporations - or PACs – that wish to advocate for the direct election of candidates?
Do those disclosure laws cover the time period immediately preceding an election?
Must we write laws to cover that period?
How far can the state go in requiring disclosure regarding corporate (or union) money spend advocating for or against candidates (by disclosure I mean the source and amount of contributions)
Daily disclosure to APOC allowable? On-line disclosure?
Disclosure in each advertisement?

MEMORANDUM January 25, 2010

SUBJECT: Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission
(Work Order No. 26-LS1367)

TO: Representative Jay Ramras
Attn: Jane Pierson

FROM: Alpheus Bullard
Legislative Counsel

You requested a legal analysis of the United States Supreme Court's ruling in Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission, No. 08-205, 558 U.S. ___ (January 21, 2010), and its effect on Alaska law.

WHAT IS MOST SIGNIFICANT

The Court held that the government cannot suppress political speech on the basis of the speaker's corporate identity.

WHAT THE DECISION DOES NOT DO

This is a case about independent election campaign expenditures made by corporations. Because one of the statutes involved in this case and considered by the Court concerned labor unions, it also, arguably, is a case about independent election campaign expenditures made by labor unions, though that is not made explicit in the opinion. Laws regulating corporate and union contributions to candidates, party committees, and political action committees, whether direct or in-kind, are not directly affected by the ruling. Disclosure and disclaimer requirements for communications relating to elections for public office and laws requiring corporations and unions to identify the sources of money for their political activities are also unaffected.

FACTS AND PROCEDURAL POSTURE

The case involved a documentary critical of the then potential presidential candidacy of Hillary Clinton. The documentary, "Hillary: The Movie," was produced by Citizens United, a nonprofit corporation. Anticipating that it would make the documentary available within a time period prohibited under the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA),[1] Citizens United sought declaratory and injunctive relief in the United

[1] 2 U.S.C. § 431 et seq. (also known as the McCain-Feingold Act (Pub. L. No. 107-155, 116 Stat. 81)).

States District Court for the District of Columbia seeking to prevent the Federal Election Commission (FEC) from enforcing provisions of the BCRA.[2] Citizens United argued that § 203 of the BCRA[3] violated the First Amendment on its face and as applied to the documentary and its related advertisements, and that §§ 201[4] and 311[5] of the Act, relating to disclosure, disclaimer, and reporting requirements were, as applied to the documentary, also unconstitutional.

The United States District Court denied the injunction, holding that under § 203 of the BCRA the documentary could not be shown on television in the 30 day period preceding the 2008 Democratic primaries. The court held that the BCRA prohibitions against corporate independent expenditures were constitutional, reasoning that the question had been answered by the Supreme Court in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, 540 U.S. 93 (2003).[6] The United States District Court held that the documentary had no other purpose than to discredit Hillary Clinton and inform viewers that she was unfit for public office, and thus the provision of the BCRA relating to electioneering communications

[2] Citizens United v. Fed. Election Commission, 530 F. Supp. 2d 274 (D.D.C. 2008).

[3] Section 203 of the BCRA regulates "electioneering communications." Generally, these are broadcast, cable, or satellite communications made within 60 days of a general election or 30 days of a primary election. 2 U.S.C. § 434(f)(3)(A)(i). Section 203 restricts corporations (other than media corporations) and labor organizations from funding electioneering communications from their general funds except under certain specific circumstances, e.g., get-out-the-vote campaigns. 2 U.S.C. § 441b(b)(2).

[4] Under § 201 of the BCRA, persons who disburse an aggregate of $10,000 or more a year for the production and airing of electioneering communications are required to file a statement with the Federal Election Commission (FEC) that includes the names and addresses of persons who have contributed in excess of $1,000 to accounts funding the communication. See 2 U.S.C. § 434(f)(1) and (2).

[5] Under the BCRA's § 311, the entity paying for a communication that is not authorized by a candidate or the candidate's political committee, must include in the communication a statement that the organization "is responsible for the content of this advertising." See 2 U.S.C. § 441d.

[6] In McConnell, the United States Supreme Court upheld § 203 as facially constitutional, reasoning that the justifications for regulating independent corporate expenditures constituting express advocacy "apply equally" to ads that are "the functional equivalent of express advocacy." Id. at 206. The Court held that the regulation of such independent expenditures was acceptable because the government has a compelling interest in countering the kind of "corrosive and distorting effect" identified in Austin. Id. at 205.

was not unconstitutionally applied. Lastly, the court ruled that the Act's disclosure, disclaimer, and reporting requirements were not unconstitutional as applied to the documentary or its advertisements.

Citizens United appealed the decision and the Supreme Court docketed the case on August 18, 2008,[7] hearing oral arguments on March 24, 2009. However, on June 29, 2009, the Supreme Court ordered the parties to reargue the case on September 9 after submitting briefs on the larger questions of whether the Court should overrule Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652 (1990)[8], that portion of McConnell 540 U.S. 93 (2003) that found § 203 of the BCRA to be facially valid, or both.

ANALYSIS

In Citizens United, 558 U.S. ___ (January 21, 2010), the Supreme Court considered (1) the validity of § 203 of the BCRA, which prohibits corporations and unions from using their general treasury funds to make independent expenditures for speech that is an "electioneering communication"; (2) the Court's prior holding in Austin that political speech may be banned based on the speaker's corporate identity; and (3) whether §§ 201 and 311 of the BCRA, which mandate disclaimer and disclosure requirements for Citizens United's ads, were constitutionally invalid.

Prohibitions on Independent Expenditures

The Court held that § 203 of the BCRA, which prohibits certain corporations and unions from using funds from their general treasuries[9] for certain independent expenditures made to influence the outcomes of elections for federal public office, was unconstitutional.[10] It

[7] Under § 403(a)(3) of the BCRA, the final decision of the district court in this case is "reviewable only by appeal directly to the Supreme Court of the United States."

[8] In Austin, the Court upheld a Michigan law that barred corporations from using their general treasury funds to support or oppose any state candidate, even though the spending occurred independently of that candidate's campaign operation.

[9] Prior to the ruling, to spend money on "electioneering communications" under federal law, corporations and unions were required to establish political action committees (PACS) that had a separate legal identity from the corporation or union. PACS could receive limited donations from employees, shareholders, or organization members. Now, after the Citizens United decision, corporations and unions may spend money directly from their treasuries on independent expenditures to influence elections for public office.

[10] While § 203 of the BCRA applied equally to corporations and unions, independent expenditures made by unions were not an issue before the Court, and it is not explicit in the ruling that the BCRA's independent expenditure prohibition is lifted for unions.

determined that prohibitions on corporate independent expenditures are an impermissible "ban on speech," id. at 22, and that political speech does not lose First Amendment protection "simply because its source is a corporation," id. at 26.[11]

The Court held that the case could not be decided in an examination of the relevant provisions of the BCRA alone, because the fundamental legal rationale underlying the challenged provisions of the Act was itself unjustified by a sufficient governmental interest.[12] The Court held that this rationale, identified in Austin, the prevention of "the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth that are accumulated with the help of the corporate form that have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas," id. at 660, is inconsistent with the protections offered speech and speakers by the First Amendment.[13]

Precedent Overturned

The Court overruled Austin, and those portions of McConnell that upheld the BCRA's restrictions on independent expenditures made by corporations and labor organizations. It did so holding that "no sufficient governmental interest justifies limits on the political speech of nonprofit or for-profit corporations[,]" and "[g]overnment may not suppress political speech on the basis of the speaker's corporate identity." Citizens United, 558 U.S. at 50.[14]

---

[11] Of less immediate consequence, in the absence of acknowledgement by the Court of any permissible First Amendment distinctions between corporate and natural persons, the case raises questions relating to whether corporations' newly realized equality under the First Amendment will affect (1) the constitutionality of existing prohibitions against corporate contributions to candidates in elections for public office and (2) other corporate related constitutional jurisprudence. These remain for future litigation.

[12] "When constitutional questions are 'indispensably necessary' to resolving the case at hand, 'the court must meet and decide them.'" Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission, 558 U.S. at 4 of Roberts, C.J. (concurring opinion), quoting Ex parte Randolph, 20 F. Cas. 242, 254 (No. 11, 558) (CC Va. 1833) (Marshall, C.J.).

[13] The First Amendment to the United States Constitution provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech . . . ."

Given the Court's interpretation of the requirements of the First Amendment, existing distinctions between "express advocacy" versus "issue advocacy" and "independent expenditures" versus contributions to candidates are less clear. Citizens United does not address these distinctions, but the logic underlying the decision suggests that they may soon be revisited.

[14] In addition to overturning Austin, the Court dismissed arguments that independent corporate expenditures in elections for federal office give rise to corruption or its appearance (Citizens United at 41 - 45) and that the government has a compelling interest

Disclosure and Disclaimer Requirements
The Court upheld the BCRA's disclosure and disclaimer requirements which were applied to the documentary (§§ 201 and 311 of the Act), holding that such requirements "may burden the ability to speak, but they 'impose no ceiling on campaign-related activities,' [Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 64 (1976)] and 'do not prevent anyone from speaking,' McConnell, [540 U.S.] at 201." Citizens United, 558 U.S. at 51. Citing Buckley and McConnell, the Court held that these requirements bear a substantial relation to the government's interest in ensuring that the electorate is able to evaluate the arguments to which it is being subjected, and that Citizens United did not demonstrate that the requirements imposed a chill on the organization's (or the organization's members') speech or expression. Id. at 51 - 56.

EFFECT ON ALASKA LAW
1. Under existing AS 15.13.067 (who may make expenditures in an election for candidates for elective office) and AS 15.13.135 (independent expenditures for or against candidates), only individuals, groups, and nongroup entities, as these terms are defined under AS 15.13.400, are permitted to make independent expenditures supporting or opposing candidates in elections under AS 15.13.[15] The terms "individual," "group," and "nongroup entity" are defined at AS 15.13.400. Together, these provisions effectively prohibit independent expenditures by for-profit corporations, and are likely to be interpreted by a court as unconstitutional in light of this decision.[16]

2. For-profit corporations are currently prohibited from making independent expenditures for or against candidates in elections under AS 15.13. Because of that, existing state statutes relating to (1) disclosure of expenditures, (2) limitations on expenditures, (3) identification of communications, and (4) filing of reports[17] under AS 15.13 do not currently account for independent expenditures and communications by for-profit corporations. Given the silence of our state statutes, and the likelihood that our existing in regulating corporations' independent expenditures to protect dissenting shareholders from being compelled to fund corporate political speech. (Citizens United at 46 - 47).

[15] Under AS 15.13.010(a), AS 15.13 applies to elections for governor, lieutenant governor, a member of the state legislature, a delegate to a constitutional convention, and a judge seeking judicial retention, and to elections for municipal office in municipalities with a population of more than 1,000 inhabitants unless the municipality has exempted itself from the provisions of the chapter.

[16] These statutes remain the law for the State of Alaska. If left unchanged, will they be enforced? The state could attempt to enforce them; however, enforcement would likely be quickly curtailed once the aggrieved party petitioned the state's courts.

[17] See AS 15.13.040, AS 15.13.082, AS 15.13.090, and AS 15.13.110.

statutes will not be enforced following the Court's holding in Citizens United, there are now no limits on independent expenditures made by for-profit corporations and no statutory disclosure, identification, or reporting requirements for these expenditures.

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

Sec. 15.13.010. Applicability. (a) This chapter applies

(1) in every election for governor, lieutenant governor, a member of the state legislature, a delegate to a constitutional convention, or judge seeking judicial retention;

(2) to every candidate for election to a municipal office in a municipality with a population of more than 1,000 inhabitants according to the latest United States census figures or estimates of population certified as correct for administrative purposes by the Department of Commerce, Community, and Economic Development unless the municipality has exempted itself from the provisions of this chapter; a municipality may exempt its elected municipal officers from the requirements of this chapter if a majority of the voters voting on the question at a regular election, as defined by AS 29.71.800 (20), or a special municipality-wide election called for that purpose, votes to exempt its elected municipal officers from the requirements of this chapter; the question of exemption from the requirements of this chapter may be submitted by the governing body by ordinance or by initiative election.

(b) Except as otherwise provided, this chapter applies to contributions, expenditures and communications made by a candidate, group, nongroup entity, municipality or individual for the purpose of influencing the outcome of a ballot proposition or question as well as those made to influence the nomination or election of a candidate.

(c) This chapter does not prohibit a municipality from regulating by ordinance election campaign contributions and expenditures in municipal elections, or from regulating those campaign contributions and expenditures more strictly than provided in this chapter.

(d) This chapter does not limit the authority of a person to make contributions to influence the outcome of a voter proposition submitted to the public for a vote at a municipal election. In this subsection, in addition to its meaning under AS 15.13.065 (c), "proposition" means a municipal reclassification, proposal to adopt or amend a home rule charter, a unification proposal, a boundary change proposal, or the approval of an ordinance when approval by public vote is a requirement for the ordinance. (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am §§ 1, 2 ch 189 SLA 1975; am § 32 ch 74 SLA 1985; am §§ 3, 4 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 2 ch 1 SLA 2002)

Revisor's notes. – In 1999, in paragraph (a)(2) of this section, "Department of Community and Economic Development" was substituted for "Department of Community and Regional Affairs" in accordance with § 91(a)(3), ch. 58, SLA 1999.

Effect of amendments. – The 1996 amendment, effective January 1, 1997, in subsection (a), added paragraph designations, rewrote paragraph (2) and made related stylistic changes and added subsections (c) and (d).

The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002 inserted "nongroup entity" in subsection (b).

The 2008 amendment, effective May 23, 2008, substituted "judicial retention" for "electoral confirmation" in paragraph (a)(1).

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Constitutionality. – In the case of First Nat'l Bank v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 98 S. Ct. 1407, 55 L. Ed. 2d 707, rehearing denied, 438 U.S. 907, 98 S. Ct. 3126, 57 L. Ed. 2d 1150 (1978), the supreme court of the United States has indicated in unmistakable terms that state disclosure laws pertaining to ballot issues are constitutional. Messerli v. State, 626 P.2d 81 (Alaska 1980).

When there is no showing that an individual must remain anonymous with respect to advertising as to ballot propositions because of the possibility of being subject to reprisals, economic or otherwise, the state campaign disclosure laws are not unconstitutional as applied to a contributor hoping to influence the outcome of a ballot issue, because the objective of an informed electorate is sufficiently compelling to overcome an interest in anonymous political expression. Messerli v. State, 626 P.2d 81 (Alaska 1980).

Initiative substantially similar to ch. 76, SLA 1974, correctly withheld from ballot. Substantial similarity existed between ch. 76, SLA 1974, which enacted this chapter, relating to election campaigns, and an initiative relating to campaign contributions and expenditures, which was filed with the lieutenant governor prior to the regular 1974 session of the legislature. The act effectively displaced the initiative, and the lieutenant governor was correct in withholding the initiative from the ballot. Warren v. Boucher, 543 P.2d 731 (Alaska 1975).

For comparison of ch. 76, SLA 1974, and the initiative, see Warren v. Boucher, 543 P.2d 731 (Alaska 1975).

Sec. 15.13.011. Inapplicability to presidential primary. [Repealed, Sec. 1 ch 2 SLA 1984].

Sec. 15.13.020. Alaska Public Offices Commission. (a) There is created in the Department of Administration the Alaska Public Offices Commission consisting of five members. The governor shall appoint all members of the commission in the manner prescribed in (b) and (c) of this section, subject to confirmation by a majority of the legislature meeting in joint session.

(b) The governor shall appoint two members of each of the two political parties whose candidate for governor received the highest number of votes in the most recent preceding general election at which a governor was elected. The two appointees from each of these two parties shall be chosen from a list of four names to be submitted by the central committee of each party.

(c) The four members selected under (b) of this section shall, by a majority vote, nominate to the governor an individual to serve as the fifth member of the commission. The governor shall either appoint the nominee to the commission, or shall reject the nominee and request those four members to nominate another individual to serve as the fifth member of the commission.

(d) Members of the commission serve staggered terms of five years, or until a successor is appointed and qualifies. The terms of no two members who are members of the same political party may expire in consecutive years. A member may not serve more than one term. However, a person appointed to fill the unexpired term of a predecessor may be appointed to a successive full five-year term.

(e) A member of the commission, during tenure, may not

(1) hold or campaign for elective office;

(2) be an officer of a political party, political committee, or group;

(3) permit the member's name to be used, or make any contributions whatsoever, in support of or in opposition to a candidate or proposition or question that appears on any ballot in the state including but not limited to that of a municipality; however, contributions may be made to a candidate for the office of President of the United States;

(4) participate in any way in an election campaign or participate in or contribute to any political party; or

(5) lobby, employ or assist a lobbyist.

(f) Members of the commission shall receive compensation of $50 a day while attending commission meetings and shall be entitled to travel expenses and per diem authorized by law for members of other boards and commissions.

(g) The members shall elect a chairperson. Three members of the commission constitute a quorum. A vacancy does not impair the powers of the remaining members to exercise all of the powers of the commission.

(h) A vacancy on the commission shall be filled through the appropriate appointing method for the position within 30 days after the occurrence of the vacancy. Except as provided in AS 39.05.080 (4), the appointee shall serve for the remaining term of the appointee's predecessor.

(i) The commission may employ an executive director and other employees it considers necessary. Neither the executive director nor an employee may have a vote.

(j) The commission shall establish an office, which may be called a regional office, in each senate district in the state to keep on file for public inspection copies of all reports filed with the commission by candidates for statewide office and by candidates for legislative office in that district; however, where one municipality contains more than one house district, only one commission office shall be established in that municipality. The regional office shall make all forms and pertinent material available to candidates. All reports shall be filed by candidates, groups, and individuals directly with the commission's central district office. The commission shall ensure that copies of all reports by statewide and legislative candidates in each senate district are forwarded promptly to that district or regional office.

(k) The commission shall ensure that copies of reports filed by candidates for municipal office are made available for public inspection in the appropriate municipality. (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am § 23 ch 25 SLA 1975; am §§ 3-10 ch 189 SLA 1975; am E.O. No. 41 § 2 (1980); am § 24 ch 85 SLA 1988; am §§ 1-3 ch 14 SLA 1989; am § 7 ch 80 SLA 1996; am § 38 ch 21 SLA 2000)

Revisor's notes. – In 2000, in (g) of this section, "chairperson" was substituted for "chairman" in accordance with sec. 95(3), ch 82, SLA 2000.

Effect of amendments. – The 1996 amendment, effective January 1, 1997, in subsection (h), in the second sentence, added "Except as provided in AS 39.05.080(4)," at the beginning and made a related stylistic change.

The 2000 amendment, effective April 28, 2000, substituted "house district" for "election district" in the first sentence in subsection (j).

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Subsection (j) requires forms to be made available in a regional office in each senate district. Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

Furnishing forms to Nome regional office constituted compliance with law. – Nome is designated center for forms pursuant to both subsection (j) and AS 15.10.110, and since Nome is the central office for Senate District P, which encompasses House District 21 and therefore Kotzebue, the lieutenant governor complied with the law by virtue of furnishing forms to the Nome regional office, even though such forms were not available in Kotzebue. Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

Sec. 15.13.030. Duties of the commission. The commission shall

(1) develop and provide all forms for the reports and statements required to be made under this chapter, AS 24.45, and AS 39.50;

(2) prepare and publish a manual setting out uniform methods of bookkeeping and reporting for use by persons required to make reports and statements under this chapter and otherwise assist candidates, groups, and individuals in complying with the requirements of this chapter;

(3) receive and hold open for public inspection reports and statements required to be made under this chapter and, upon request, furnish copies at cost to interested persons;

(4) compile and maintain a current list of all filed reports and statements;

(5) prepare a summary of each report filed under AS 15.13.110 and make copies of this summary available to interested persons at their actual cost;

(6) notify, by registered or certified mail, all persons who are delinquent in filing reports and statements required to be made under this chapter;

(7) examine, investigate, and compare all reports, statements, and actions required by this chapter, AS 24.45, and AS 39.50;

(8) prepare and publish a biennial report concerning the activities of the commission, the effectiveness of this chapter, its enforcement by the attorney general's office, and recommendations and proposals for change; the commission shall notify the legislature that the report is available;

(9) adopt regulations necessary to implement and clarify the provisions of AS 24.45, AS 39.50, and this chapter, subject to the provisions of AS 44.62 (Administrative Procedure Act); and

(10) consider a written request for an advisory opinion concerning the application of this chapter, AS 24.45, AS 24.60.200 - 24.60.260, or AS 39.50. (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am § 24 ch 25 SLA 1975; am §§ 11, 12 ch 189 SLA 1975; am §§ 3-5 ch 167 SLA 1976; am § 2 ch 134 SLA 1990; am § 16 ch 21 SLA 1995; am § 5 ch 6 SLA 1998; am §1 ch 108 SLA 2003)

Cross references. – For transitional provision applicable to development of regulations under paragraph (9) of this section to implement the amendments made by ch. 108 SLA 2003, see § 42, ch. 108, SLA 2003, in the 2003 Temporary and Special Acts. For provision adding an obligation for the commission to analyze the effect of ch. 108, SLA 2003, on the 2004 elections and provide a written report to legislative leaders by January 15, 2005, see § 43, ch. 108, SLA 2003 Temporary and Special Acts.

Effect of amendments. – The 1998 amendment, effective June 28, 1998, rewrote paragraphs (7)-(9).

The 2003 amendment, effective September 14, 2003, added paragraph (10) and made a related stylistic change.

NOTES TO DECISIONS

I. General Consideration.
II. Regulations

I. GENERAL CONSIDERATION.

Duty-to-notify requirement only applies to groups which have registered with commission pursuant to AS 15.13.050. VECO Int'l Inc. v. Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n, 753 p.2d 703 (Alaska 1988), appeal dismissed, 488 U.S. 919, 109 S. Ct. 298, 102, L. Ed. 2d 317 (1988).

Applied in Messerli v. State, 626 P.2d 81 (Alaska 1980).

II. REGULATIONS.

No regulations were necessary to implement the mandatory provisions for filing an appointment of campaign treasurer established by AS 15.13.060(c). Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

Sec. 15.13.040. Contributions, expenditures, and supplying of services to be reported. (a) [See delayed amendment note]. Except as provided in (g) and (l) of this section, each candidate shall make a full report, upon a form prescribed by the commission,

(1) listing

(A) the date and amount of all expenditures made by the candidate;

(B) the total amount of all contributions, including all funds contributed by the candidate;

(C) the name, address, date, and amount contributed by each contributor; and

(D) for contributions in excess of $50 in the aggregate during a calendar year, the principal occupation and employer of the contributor; and

(2) filed in accordance with AS 15.13.110 and certified correct by the candidate or campaign treasurer.

(b) Each group shall make a full report upon a form prescribed by the commission, listing

(1) the name and address of each officer and director;

(2) the aggregate amount of all contributions made to it; and, for all contributions in excess of $100 in the aggregate a year, the name, address, principal occupation, and employer of the contributor, and the date and amount contributed by each contributor; for purposes of this paragraph, "contributor" means the true source of the funds, property, or services being contributed; and

(3) the date and amount of all contributions made by it and all expenditures made, incurred, or authorized by it.

(c) The report required under (b) of this section shall be filed in accordance with AS 15.13.110 and shall be certified as correct by the group's treasurer.

(d) Every individual, person, nongroup entity, or group making an expenditure shall make a full report of expenditures, upon a form prescribed by the commission, unless exempt from reporting.

(e) The report required under (d) of this section must contain the name, address, principal occupation, and employer of the individual filing the report, and an itemized list of expenditures. The report shall be filed with the commission no later than 10 days after the expenditure is made.

(f) During each year in which an election occurs, all businesses, persons, or groups that furnish any of the following services, facilities, or supplies to a candidate or group shall maintain a record of each transaction: newspapers, radio, television, advertising, advertising agency services, accounting, billboards, printing, secretarial, public opinion polls, or research and professional campaign consultation or management, media production or preparation, or computer services. Records of provision of services, facilities, or supplies shall be available for inspection by the commission.

(g) The provisions of (a) and (l) of this section do not apply to a delegate to a constitutional convention, a judge seeking judicial retention, or a candidate for election to a municipal office under AS 15.13.010 , if that delegate, judge, or candidate

(1) indicates, on a form prescribed by the commission, an intent not to raise and not to expend more than $5,000 in seeking election to office, including both the primary and general elections;

(2) accepts contributions totaling not more than $5,000 in seeking election to office, including both the primary and general elections; and

(3) makes expenditures totaling not more than $5,000 in seeking election to office, including both the primary and general elections.

(h) The provisions of (d) of this section do not apply to one or more expenditures made by an individual acting independently of any group or nongroup entity and independently of any other individual if the expenditures

(1) cumulatively do not exceed $500 during a calendar year; and

(2) are made only for billboards, signs, or printed material concerning a ballot proposition as that term is defined by AS 15.13.065(c).

(i) The permission of the owner of real or personal property to post political signs, including bumper stickers, or to use space for an event or to store campaign-related materials is not considered to be a contribution to a candidate under this chapter unless the owner customarily charges a fee or receives payment for that activity. The fact that the owner customarily charges a fee or receives payment for posting signs that are not political signs is not determinative of whether the owner customarily does so for political signs.

(j) Except as provided in (l) of this section, each nongroup entity shall make a full report in accordance with AS 15.13.110 upon a form prescribed by the commission and certified by the nongroup entity's treasurer, listing

(1) the name and address of each officer and director of the nongroup entity;

(2) the aggregate amount of all contributions made to the nongroup entity for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election;

(3) for all contributions described in (2) of this subsection, the name, address, date, and amount contributed by each contributor and, for all contributions described in (2) of this subsection in excess of $250 in the aggregate during a calendar year, the principal occupation and employer of the contributor; and

(4) the date and amount of all contributions made by the nongroup entity, and, except as provided for certain independent expenditures in AS 15.13.135 (a), all expenditures made, incurred, or authorized by the nongroup entity, for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election; a nongroup entity shall report contributions made to a different nongroup entity for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election and expenditures made on behalf of a different nongroup entity for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election as soon as the total contributions and expenditures to that nongroup entity for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election reach $500 in a year and for all subsequent contributions and expenditures to that nongroup entity in a year whenever the total contributions and expenditures to that nongroup entity for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election that have not been reported under this paragraph reach $500.

(k) Every individual, person, nongroup entity, or group contributing a total of $500 or more to a group organized for the principal purpose of influencing the outcome of a proposition shall report the contribution or contributions on a form prescribed by the commission not later than 30 days after the contribution that requires the contributor to report under this subsection is made. The report must include the name, address, principal occupation, and employer of the individual filing the report and the amount of the contribution, as well as the total amount of contributions made to that group by that individual, person, nongroup entity, or group during the calendar year.

(l) Notwithstanding (a), (b), and (j) of this section, for any fund-raising activity in which contributions are in amounts or values that do not exceed $50 a person, the candidate, group, or nongroup entity shall report contributions and expenditures and supplying of services under this subsection as follows:

(1) a report under this subsection must

(A) describe the fund-raising activity;

(B) include the number of persons making contributions and the total proceeds from the activity;

(C) report all contributions made for the fund-raising activity that do not exceed $50 a person in amount or value; if a contribution for the fund-raising activity exceeds $50, the contribution shall be reported under (a), (b), and (j) of this section;

(2) for purposes of this subsection,

(A) "contribution" means a cash donation, a purchase such as the purchase of a ticket, the purchase of goods or services offered for sale at a fund-raising activity, or a donation of goods or services for the fund-raising activity;

(B) "fund-raising activity" means an activity, event, or sale of goods undertaken by a candidate, group, or nongroup entity in which contributions are $50 a person or less in amount or value.

(m) [See delayed amendment note]. Information required under this chapter shall be submitted to the commission electronically, except that the following information may be submitted in clear and legible black typeface or hand-printed in dark ink on paper in a format approved by the commission or on forms provided by the commission:

(1) information submitted by

(A) a candidate for election to a borough or city office of mayor, membership on a borough assembly, city council, or school board, or any state office, who meets the requirements of (g)(1) - (3) of this section; or

(B) a candidate for municipal office for a municipality with a population of less than 15,000; in this subparagraph, "municipal office" means the office of an elected borough or city

(i) mayor; or

(ii) assembly, council, or school board member;

(2) any information if the commission determines that circumstances warrant an exception to the electronic submission requirement.

(n) The commission shall print the forms to be provided under this chapter so that the front and back of each page have the same orientation when the page is rotated on the vertical axis of the page.

(o) Information required by this chapter that is submitted to the commission on paper and not electronically shall be electronically scanned and published on the Internet by the commission, in a format accessible to the general public, within two working days after the commission receives the information.

(p) For purposes of (b) and (j) of this section, "contributor" means the true source of the funds, property, or services being contributed (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am § 13 ch 189 SLA 1975; am § 33 ch 50 SLA 1989; am § 4 ch 126 SLA 1994; am §§ 5-7 ch 48 SLA 1996; am §§ 6, 7 ch 6 SLA 1998; am § 1 ch 74 SLA 1998; am §§ 3-6 ch 1 SLA 2002; am §§ 1-4 ch 1 TSSLA 2002; am §§ 2-7 ch 108 SLA 2003; am § 9 ch 99 SLA 2004; am §§ 1, 2 ch 155 SLA 2004; am § 3,2006 Primary Election Ballot Measure No. 1; am §§ 6 – 9 ch 47 SLA 2007; am § 1 ch 95 SLA 2008)

Delayed amendment of subsection (a). – Until January 1, 2009, subsection (a) of this section reads as follows: "(a) Except as provided in (g) and (l) of this section, each candidate shall make a full report, upon a form prescribed by the commission,

"(1) listing

"(A) the date and amount of all expenditures made by the candidate;

"(B) the total amount of all contributions, including all funds contributed by the candidate;

"(C) the name, address, date and amount contributed by each contributor; and

"(D) for contributions in excess of $250 in the aggregate during a calendar year, the principal occupation and employer of the contributor; and

"(2) filed in accordance with AS 15.13.110 and certified correct by the candidate or campaign treasurer."

Delayed amendment of subsection (m). – Until January 1, 2009, (m) of this section reads as follows:

"(m) Information required under this chapter shall be submitted to the commission electronically, except that the following information may be submitted in clear and legible black typeface or hand-printed in dark ink on paper in a format approved by the commission or on forms provided by the commission:

"(1) information submitted by a candidate for municipal office; in this paragraph, "municipal office" means the office of an elected borough or city

"(A) mayor; or

"(B) assembly, council, or school board member;

"(2) any information if the commission determines that circumstances warrant an exception to the electronic submission requirement;

"(3) information submitted by a candidate for election to state office other than the legislature who meets the requirements of (g)(1) – (3) of this section;

"(4) information submitted before January 1, 2009, by a candidate for the legislature."

Revisor's notes. – Subsection (n) was enacted as subsection (o). Relettered in 2004, at which time former subsection (n) was relettered as subsection (o). Subsection (o) was enacted as (p) and relettered in 2007, at which time former subsection (o) was relettered as (p).

Effect of amendments. – The 1996 amendment, effective January 1, 1997, in subsection (a), added the exception at the beginning of the first sentence and made a related stylistic change; in subsection (d), in paragraph (2), added "unless exempted from reporting by (h) of this section," and inserted " or other periodicals" and made minor stylistic changes and added subsections (g) and (h).

The first 1998 amendment, effective June 28, 1998, rewrote paragraph (d)(1) and the second and third sentences in subsection (f).

The second 1998 amendment, effective June 4, 1998, added subsection (i).

The first 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subsection (b) added the language beginning "for purposes of this paragraph" to the end of paragraph (2); in the introductory language of subsections (d) and (h) inserted references to nongroup entities; added subsection (j); and made a minor stylistic change.

The second 2002 amendment, effective June 26, 2002, rewrote subsection (d); in subsection (e) deleted "by the contributor" following "commission" and "contribution or" preceding "expenditure" in the second sentence and deleted the former third sentence, which read "A copy of the report shall be furnished to the candidate, campaign treasurer, or deputy campaign treasurer at the time the contribution is made"; updated an internal reference in subsection (h); and added subsection (k).

The 2003 amendment, effective September 14, 2003, rewrote subsections (a) and (b); in subsection (g) inserted "and (l)" in the introductory language and substituted "$5,000" for "2,500" in three places; in paragraph (h)(1) substituted "$500" for "250"; in subsection (j) added "Except as provided in (l) of this section," at the beginning, added the paragraph (3) and (4) designations, and rewrote paragraph (3); and added subsections (l), (m), and (o) [formerly (n), now (p)].

The first 2004 amendment, effective June 26, 2004, deleted "and principal occupation of the contributor and the" following address in paragraph (j)(3), and inserted "principal occupation and" in that paragraph.

The second 2004 amendment, effective October 1, 2004, rewrote subsection (m), and added subsection (o) [now (n)].

The 2006 amendment, effective December 17, 2006, rewrote subsection (b).

The 2007 amendment, effective July 10, 2007, substituted "to a delegate to a constitutional convention, a judge seeking judicial retention, or a candidate for election to a municipal office under As 15.13.010, if that delegate, judge, or" for "if a" in the introductory language of subsection (g), repealed and reenacted subsection (m), and added subsection (p) [now(o)].

The 2008 amendment, effective January 1, 2009, substituted "$50" for $250" in subparagraph (a)(1)(D).

Editor's notes. – From April 16, 2002, through June 25, 2002, the reference in subsection (h) to "(d) of this section" reads "to (d)(2) of this section" and subsection (d) reads as follows: "(d) Every individual, person, nongroup entity, or group making a contribution or expenditure shall make a full report, upon a form prescribed by the commission, of

"(1) contributions made to a candidate or group and expenditures made on behalf of a candidate or group

"(A) as soon as the total contributions and expenditures to that candidate or group reaches $500 in a year; and

"(B) for all subsequent contributions and expenditures to that candidate or group that have not been reported under this paragraph reaches $500;

"(2) unless exempted from reporting by (h) of this section, any expenditure whatsoever for advertising in newspapers or other periodicals, on radio, or on television; or for publication, distribution, or circulation of brochures, flyers, or other campaign material for any candidate or ballot proposition or question."

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Constitutionality. – In the case of First Nat'l Bank v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 98 S. Ct. 1407, 55 L. Ed. 2d 707, rehearing denied, 438 U.S. 907, 98 S. Ct. 3126, 57 L. Ed. 2d 1150 (1978), the supreme court of the United States has indicated in unmistakable terms that state disclosure laws pertaining to ballot issues are constitutional. Messerli v. State, 626 P.2d 81 (Alaska 1980).

When there is no showing that an individual must remain anonymous with respect to advertising as to ballot propositions because of the possibility of being subject to reprisals, economic or otherwise, the state campaign disclosure laws are not unconstitutional as applied to a contributor hoping to influence the outcome of a ballot issue, because the objective of an informed electorate is sufficiently compelling to overcome an interest in anonymous political expression. Messerli v. State, 626 P.2d 81 (Alaska 1980).

The disclosure requirements of this chapter are not unconstitutionally vague or overbroad, nor do they violate the constitutional right of the people to privacy. VECO Int'l, Inc. v. Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n, 753 P.2d 703 (Alaska 1988), appeal dismissed, 488 U.S. 919, 109 S. Ct. 298, 102 L. Ed. 2d 317 (1988).

Reporting provisions of this section and AS 15.13.074(i), 15.13.082(b), 15.13.110, and 15.13.135(a) survive strict scrutiny because the state's interest in regulating campaign contributions and expenditures is significant and the requirements are not particularly onerous. Alaska Right to Life Comm. v. Miles, 441 F.3rd 773 (9th Cir. 2006).

Cited in Libertarian Party of Alaska, Inc. v. State, 101 P.3rd 616 (Alaska 2004).

Sec. 15.13.045. Investigations, hearings. (a) The commission may issue subpoenas, administer oaths, hold hearings, and conduct investigations.

(b) In conjunction with (a) of this section, the commission may compel the attendance of witnesses and production of papers, books, records, accounts, documents, and testimony, and may have the deposition of witnesses taken in a manner prescribed by court rule or law for the taking of depositions in civil actions when consistent with the powers and duties assigned to the commission by this chapter.

(c) The commission may examine the papers, books, records, accounts, and documents of any person subject to this chapter to ascertain the correctness of a report filed with the commission, or in conjunction with an investigation or inspection conducted under (a) of this section.

(d) Subpoenas may be issued and shall be served in the manner prescribed by AS 44.62.430 and court rule. The failure, refusal, or neglect to obey a subpoena is punishable as contempt in the manner prescribed by law or court rule. The superior court may compel obedience to the commission's subpoena in the same manner as prescribed for obedience to a subpoena issued by the court. (§ 14 ch 189 SLA 1975).

Sec. 15.13.050. Registration before expenditure. (a) Before making an expenditure in support of or in opposition to a candidate or before making an expenditure in support of or in opposition to a ballot proposition or question, each person other than an individual shall register, on forms provided by the commission, with the commission.

(b) If a group intends to support only one candidate or to contribute to or expend on behalf of one candidate 33 1/3 percent or more of its funds, the name of the candidate shall be a part of the name of the group. If the group intends to oppose only one candidate or to contribute its funds in opposition to or make expenditures in opposition to a candidate, the group's name must clearly state that it opposes that candidate by using a word such as "opposes," "opposing," "in opposition to," or "against" in the group's name. Promptly upon receiving the registration, the commission shall notify the candidate of the group's organization and intent. A candidate may register more than one group to support the candidate; however, multiple groups controlled by a single candidate shall be treated as a single group for purposes of the contribution limit in AS 15.13.070 (b)(1). (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am § 15 ch 189 SLA 1975; am § 8 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 1 ch 3 SLA 2002)

Effect of amendments. – The 1996 amendment, effective January 1, 1997, rewrote this section.

The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subsection (b) added the last sentence and made minor stylistic changes.

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Disclosure requirements constitutional. – The disclosure requirements of this chapter are not unconstitutionally vague or overbroad, nor do they violate the constitutional right of the people to privacy. VECO Int'l, Inc. v. Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n, 753 P.2d 703 (Alaska 1988), appeal dismissed, 488 U.S. 919, 109 S. Ct. 298, 102 L. Ed. 2d 317 (1988).

Sec. 15.13.060. Campaign treasurers. (a) Each candidate and group shall appoint a campaign treasurer who is responsible for receiving, holding, and disbursing all contributions and expenditures, and for filing all reports and statements required by law. A candidate may be a campaign treasurer.

(b) Each group shall file the name and address of its campaign treasurer with the commission at the time it registers with the commission under AS 15.13.050 .

(c) Each candidate for state office shall file the name and address of the campaign treasurer with the commission, or submit, in writing, the name and address of the campaign treasurer to the director for filing with the commission, no later than 15 days after the date of filing the declaration of candidacy or the nominating petition. Each candidate for municipal office shall file the name and address of the campaign treasurer with the commission no later than seven days after the date of filing the declaration of candidacy or the nominating petition. If the candidate does not designate a campaign treasurer, the candidate is the campaign treasurer.

(d) In the case of the death, resignation, or removal of a campaign treasurer, the candidate shall appoint a successor as soon as practicable and file the successor's name and address with the commission within 48 hours of the appointment. The candidate is disqualified if found to have been in wilful violation of this subsection.

(e) A campaign treasurer may appoint as many deputy campaign treasurers as necessary. The candidate shall file the names and addresses of the deputy campaign treasurers with the commission.

(f) The candidate is responsible for the performance of the campaign treasurer, and any default or violation by the treasurer also shall be considered a default or violation by the candidate if the candidate knew or had reason to know of the default or violation. (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am §§ 16 –19 ch 189 SLA 1975; am § 1 ch 133 SLA 1977; am § 35 ch 59 SLA 1982)

NOTES TO DECISIONS

I. General Consideration.
II. Subsection (C).

I. GENERAL CONSIDERATION.

II. SUBSECTION (C).

Annotator's notes. –Silides v. Thomas, Sup. Ct. Op. No. 1362 (File Nos. 3019, 3020, 3021), 559 P.2d 80 (1977), cited in the notes below, was decided under subsection (c) as it existed before the 1977 amendment. Prior to that amendment, subsection (c) read: "Each candidate shall file the name and address of the campaign treasurer with the commission no later than seven days after the date of filing his declaration of candidacy or his nominating petition. The name of the candidate may be placed on the ballot by the lieutenant governor or municipal clerk only if the candidate has complied with this subsection."

This section is not unconstitutional in that it sets up "invalid class legislation." Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

The two groups classified by virtue of this section are those candidates who have complied with the law and those who have not; the failure to adhere to this section is the dividing line. Therefore, under any possible equal protection test this section passes constitutional muster. Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

Statutory requirement that a candidate's designation of treasurer be filed by a specified due date is not constitutionally unreasonable. Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

Subsection (c) should be strictly enforced. – Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

Effect of unequal enforcement of AS 39.50.020 on enforcement of subsection (c). –Unequal enforcement of AS 39.50.020, which requires candidates to file a financial disclosure statement, did not require the conclusion that a candidate had in fact substantially complied with the filing requirements of subsection (c) where the record did not show any intentional or purposeful discrimination against the candidate. Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

Subsection (c) requires candidates to "file" campaign treasurer statements within a specified time limit. Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

The definition of "file" is well established in the law. It has been consistently held that a document is filed only when the proper officer has received it, and that it is not considered filed when it is deposited in the mails. Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

Telephone conversation not appropriate filing. – Given the text of subsection (c), the legal meaning of the term "file" and the supreme court's adoption of the doctrine that statutory election deadlines are to be strictly enforced, a telephone conversation between the candidate's treasurer and the Alaska Public Offices Commission seven days after the declaration of candidacy was filed cannot be deemed an appropriate filing within the intendment of subsection (c). Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

No regulations were necessary to implement the mandatory provisions for filing an appointment of campaign treasurer established by subsection (c) of this section. Silides v. Thomas, 559 P.2d 80 (Alaska 1977).

Sec. 15.13.065. Contributions. (a) Individuals, groups, nongroup entities, and political parties may make contributions to a candidate. An individual, group, or nongroup entity may make a contribution to a group, to a nongroup entity, or to a political party.

(b) A political party may contribute to a subordinate unit of the political party, and a subordinate unit of a political party may contribute to the political party of which it is a subordinate unit.

(c) Except for reports required by AS 15.13.040 and 15.13.110 and except for the requirements of AS 15.13.050, 15.13.060, and 15.13.112 - 15.13.114, the provisions of AS 15.13.010 - 15.13.116 do not apply to limit the authority of a person to make contributions to influence the outcome of a ballot proposition. In this subsection, in addition to its meaning in AS 15.60.010, "proposition" includes an issue placed on a ballot to determine whether

(1) a constitutional convention shall be called;

(2) a debt shall be contracted;

(3) an advisory question shall be approved or rejected; or

(4) a municipality shall be incorporated. (§ 9 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 7 ch 1 SLA 2002)

Effect of amendments. – The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, inserted references to nongroup entities in three places in subsection (a) and made minor stylistic changes.

Sec. 15.13.067. Who may make expenditures. Only the following may make an expenditure in an election for candidates for elective office:

(1) the candidate;

(2) an individual;

(3) a group that has registered under AS 15.13.050 ; and

(4) a nongroup entity that has registered under AS 15.13.050 . (§ 9 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 8 ch 1 SLA 2002)

Effect of amendments. – The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, added paragraph (4) and made related stylistic changes.

Sec. 15.13.070. Limitations on amount of political contributions. (a) An individual or group may make contributions, subject only to the limitations of this chapter and AS 24.45, including the limitations on the maximum amounts set out in this section.

(b) An individual may contribute not more than

(1) $500 per year to a nongroup entity for the purpose of influencing the nomination or election of a candidate, to a candidate, to an individual who conducts a write-in campaign as a candidate, or to a group that is not a political party;

(2) $5,000 per year to a political party.

(c) A group that is not a political party may contribute not more than $1,000 per year

(1) to a candidate, or to an individual who conducts a write-in campaign as a candidate;

(2) to another group, to a nongroup entity, or to a political party.

(d) A political party may contribute to a candidate, or to an individual who conducts a write-in campaign, for the following offices an amount not to exceed

(1) $100,000 per year, if the election is for governor or lieutenant governor;

(2) $15,000 per year, if the election is for the state senate;

(3) $10,000 per year, if the election is for the state house of representatives; and

(4) $5,000 per year, if the election is for

(A) delegate to a constitutional convention;

(B) judge seeking retention; or

(C) municipal office.

(e) This section does not prohibit a candidate from using up to a total of $1,000 from campaign contributions in a year to pay the cost of

(1) attendance by a candidate or guests of the candidate at an event or other function sponsored by a political party or by a subordinate unit of a political party;

(2) membership in a political party, subordinate unit of a political party, or other entity within a political party, or subscription to a publication from a political party; or

(3) co-sponsorship of an event or other function sponsored by a political party or by a subordinate unit of a political party.

(f) A nongroup entity may contribute not more than $1,000 a year to another nongroup entity for the purpose of influencing the nomination or election of a candidate, to a candidate, to an individual who conducts a write-in campaign as a candidate, to a group, or to a political party. (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am §§ 20, 21 ch 189 SLA 1975; am § 45 ch 85 SLA 1986; am § 10 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 2 ch 74 SLA 1998; am §§ 9-11 ch 1 SLA 2002; am § 2 ch 3 SLA 2002; am §§ 8-10 ch 108 SLA 2003; am §§ 1, 2, 2006 Primary Election Ballot Measure No. 1)

Cross references. – For prohibition against certain campaign fund-raising by legislators, see AS 24.60.030.

Effect of amendments. – The 1996 amendment, effective January 1, 1997, rewrote this section.

The 1998 amendment, effective June 4, 1998, added subsection (e).

The first 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subsection (b) inserted the language beginning "to a nongroup" and ending "of a candidate" in paragraph (1); in subsection (c) inserted ", a nongroup entity," in paragraph (2); and added subsection (f).

The second 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subsection (b) added "for the purpose of influencing the nomination or election of a candidate or candidates" at the end of paragraph (2).

The 2003 amendment, effective September 14, 2003, increased the allowed contributions in subsections (b), (c), and (f) and made stylistic changes.

The 2006 amendment effective December 17, 2006 rewrote subsections (b) and (c).

Opinions of attorney general. – There seems to be no difference between § 608(c) of the Federal Elections Campaign Act of 1971, former 18 U.S.C. § 608(c), and subsection (f) of this section; accordingly, based on the reasons stated in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 96 S. Ct. 612, 46 L. Ed. 2d 659 (1976), for finding unconstitutional § 608(c) of the federal act, subsection (f) of this section is invalid as a violation of the rights and privileges protected by the 1st amendment. May 13, 1976 Op. Att'y Gen (decided prior to the 1986 repeal of subsection (f)).

The Public Offices Commission should not undertake investigations of violations of subsection (f) of this section, and candidates or others may be advised that no implementation or enforcement of subsection (f) of this section is planned by the office of the attorney general. May 13, 1976 Op. Att'y Gen. (decided prior to the 1986 repeal of subsection (f)).

The $1000 statutory limit under this section is applicable to "control groups" under former AS 15.13.130(4). Exempting such groups from the contribution limit would seriously undermine the statute's primary purpose of deterring the buying of elections and the undue influence of large contributors. June 15, 1987, Op. Att'y Gen.

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Constitutionality. – The $500 limitation on individual contributions for electoral campaigns in Alaska set forth in subsection (b) is justified by evidence that contribution limits do not place a substantial burden on the ability of candidates to run competitive local or state election campaigns. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1153, 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

Limits on individuals' contributions to groups and political parties are reasonable; preventing individuals from channeling their contributions through a group or a party, and thus avoiding the limit on individuals' contributions to candidates, is a valid purpose. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1153, 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

The limitation in subsection (c), that a "group" that is not a political party may not contribute more than $1000 per year to a candidate, another group, or a political party, is reasonable. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, U.S. 1153, 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

The graduated limits for political parties' contributions to candidates set forth in subsection (d) serve the State's legitimate governmental interest, and are upheld. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1153, 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

The limitations in former AS 15.13.070(b)(2) on individuals' soft money contributions to political parties were constitutional under the First Amendment. Jacobus v. Alaska, 338 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2003)

Implementation by regulations. – Alaska Admin. Code tit. 2 § 50.327, which was legally promulgated and requires that political parties report soft money contributions and expenditures, implements the Campaign Disclosure Act. Libertarian Party of Alaska, Inc. v. State, 101 P.3d 616 (Alaska 2004).

Sec. 15.13.072. Restrictions on solicitation and acceptance of contributions. (a) A candidate or an individual who has filed with the commission the document necessary to permit that individual to incur election-related expenses under AS 15.13.100 may not solicit or accept a contribution from

(1) a person not authorized by law to make a contribution;

(2) an individual who is not a resident of the state at the time the contribution is made, except as provided in (e) of this section;

(3) a group organized under the laws of another state, resident in another state, or whose participants are not residents of this state at the time the contribution is made; or

(4) a person registered as a lobbyist if the contribution violates AS 15.13.074(g) or AS 24.45.121 (a)(8).

(b) A candidate or an individual who has filed with the commission the document necessary to permit the individual to incur election-related expenses under AS 15.13.100 , or a group, may not solicit or accept a cash contribution that exceeds $100.

(c) An individual, or one acting directly or indirectly on behalf of that individual, may not solicit or accept a contribution

(1) before the date for which contributions may be made as determined under AS 15.13.074 (c); or

(2) later than the day after which contributions may not be made as determined under AS 15.13.074 (c).

(d) While the legislature is convened in a regular or special legislative session, a legislator or legislative employee may not solicit or accept a contribution to be used for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election under this chapter unless

(1) it is an election in which the legislator or legislative employee is a candidate and the contribution is for that legislator's or legislative employee's campaign;

(2) the solicitation or acceptance occurs during the 90 days immediately preceding that election; and

(3) the solicitation or acceptance occurs in a place other than the capital city or a municipality in which the legislature is convened in special session if the legislature is convened in a municipality other than the capital city.

(e) A candidate or an individual who has filed with the commission the document necessary to permit that individual to incur election-related expenses under AS 15.13.100 may solicit or accept contributions from an individual who is not a resident of the state at the time the contribution is made if the amounts contributed by individuals who are not residents do not exceed

(1) $20,000 a calendar year, if the candidate or individual is seeking the office of governor or lieutenant governor;

(2) $5,000 a calendar year, if the candidate or individual is seeking the office of state senator;

(3) $3,000 a calendar year, if the candidate or individual is seeking the office of state representative or municipal or other office.

(f) A group or political party may solicit or accept contributions from an individual who is not a resident of the state at the time the contribution is made, but the amounts accepted from individuals who are not residents may not exceed 10 percent of total contributions made to the group or political party during the calendar or group year in which the contributions are received.

(g) A candidate or an individual who has filed with the commission the document necessary to permit that individual to incur election-related expenses under AS 15.13.100 for election or reelection to the office of governor or lieutenant governor may not solicit or accept a contribution in the capital city while the legislature is convened in a regular or special legislative session.

(h) A nongroup entity may solicit or accept contributions for the purpose of influencing the nomination or election of a candidate from an individual who is not a resident of the state at the time the contribution is made or from an entity organized under the laws of another state, resident in another state, or whose participants are not residents of this state at the time the contribution is made. The amounts accepted by the nongroup entity from these individuals and entities for the purpose of influencing the nomination or election of a candidate may not exceed 10 percent of total contributions made to the nongroup entity for the purpose of influencing the nomination or election of a candidate during the calendar year in which the contributions are received. (§ 11 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 1 ch 14 SLA 1998; am §§ 3, 4 ch 74 SLA 1998; am § 12 ch 1 SLA 2002; am § 11 ch 108 SLA 2003; am § 1 ch 106 SLA 2008))

Effect of amendments. – The first 1998 amendment, effective April 21, 1998, rewrote subsection (d).

The second 1998 amendment, effective June 4, 1998, in subsection (d) added the paragraph (a) designation, added paragraph (2), and made minor stylistic changes; and added subsection (g).

The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, added subsection (h).

The 2003 amendment, effective September 14, 2003, in subsection (e) inserted "a calendar year" in three places.

The 2008 amendment, effective June 21, 2008, rewrote subsection (d).

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Constitutionality. – Attempting to limit outside influences in Alaska politics is a sufficiently compelling state interest to justify the restrictions on contributions by nonresidents set forth in subsections (a), (e), and (f). State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999) cert. denied, U.S. 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

Sec. 15.13.074. Prohibited contributions. (a) A person, group, or nongroup entity may not make a contribution if the making of the contribution would violate this chapter.

(b) A person or group may not make a contribution anonymously, using a fictitious name, or using the name of another.

(c) A person or group may not make a contribution

(1) to a candidate or an individual who files with the commission the document necessary to permit that individual to incur certain election-related expenses as authorized by AS 15.13.100 when the office is to be filled at a general election before the date that is 18 months before the general election;

(2) to a candidate or an individual who files with the commission the document necessary to permit that individual to incur certain election-related expenses as authorized by AS 15.13.100 for an office that is to be filled at a special election or municipal election before the date that is 18 months before the date of the regular municipal election or that is before the date of the proclamation of the special election at which the candidate or individual seeks election to public office; or

(3) to any candidate later than the 45th day

(A) after the date of the primary election if the candidate was not nominated at the primary election; or

(B) after the date of the general election, or after the date of a municipal or municipal runoff election.

(d) A person or group may not make a contribution to a candidate or a person or group who is prohibited by AS 15.13.072 (c) from accepting it.

(e) A person or group may not make a cash contribution that exceeds $100.

(f) A corporation, company, partnership, firm, association, entity recognized as tax-exempt under 26 U.S.C. 501(c)(3) (Internal Revenue Code), organization, business trust or surety, labor union, or publicly funded entity that does not satisfy the definition of group or nongroup entity in AS 15.13.400 may not make a contribution to a candidate, group, or nongroup entity.

(g) An individual required to register as a lobbyist under AS 24.45 may not make a contribution to a candidate for the legislature at any time the individual is subject to the registration requirement under AS 24.45 and for one year after the date of the individual's initial registration or its renewal. However, the individual may make a contribution under this section to a candidate for the legislature in a district in which the individual is eligible to vote or will be eligible to vote on the date of the election. An individual who is subject to the restrictions of this subsection shall report to the commission, on a form provided by the commission, each contribution made while required to register as a lobbyist under AS 24.45. Upon request of the commission, the information required under this subsection shall be submitted electronically. This subsection does not apply to a representational lobbyist as defined in regulations of the commission.

(h) Notwithstanding AS 15.13.070, a candidate for governor or lieutenant governor and a group that is not a political party and that, under the definition of the term "group," is presumed to be controlled by a candidate for governor or lieutenant governor, may not make a contribution to a candidate for another office, to a person who conducts a write-in campaign as a candidate for other office, or to another group of amounts received by that candidate or controlled group as contributions between January 1 and the date of the general election of the year of a general election for an election for governor and lieutenant governor. This subsection does not prohibit

(1) the group described in this subsection from making contributions to the candidates for governor and lieutenant governor whom the group supports; or

(2) the governor or lieutenant governor, or the group described in this subsection, from making contributions under AS 15.13.116 (a)(2)(A).

(i) A nongroup entity may not solicit or accept a contribution to be used for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election unless the potential contributor is notified that the contribution may be used for that purpose. (§ 11 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 12 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 2 ch 14 SLA 1998; am §5 ch 74 SLA 1998; am § 8 ch 33 SLA 1999; am §§ 13-15 ch 1 SLA 2002; am §§12, 13 ch 108 SLA 2003)

Revisor's notes. – The amendment to (c) of this section made by § 12, ch. 48, SLA 1996 took effect July 16, 1999 under §§ 33(b) and 34, ch. 48, SLA 1996. The contingency described in § 33(b), ch. 48, SLA 1996 occurred 90 days after the date of the decision in State of Alaska v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska Opin. No. 5108, April 16, 1999). The 90 day period represents the time during which a petition for certiorari could have been filed with the U.S. Supreme Court. The State did not file a petition for certiorari, and therefore that part of the decision declaring AS 15.13.074(c) (as enacted in § 11, ch. 48, SLA 1996) unconstitutional became final at the close of business July 15, 1999. Under § 34, ch. 48, SLA 1996, the amendment to (c) of this section made by § 12, ch. 48, SLA 1996, became effective the next day, July 16, 1999. Because it appeared to the revisor that the intervening amendments made to subsection (c) by § 2, ch. 14, SLA 1998 and § 5, ch. 74, SLA 1998 were inconsistent with the repeal and reenactment of subsection (c) under § 12, ch. 48, SLA 1996, those 1998 amendments were not retained.

The first 1998 amendment, effective April 21, 1998, in subsection (c), deleted "when the office is to be filled at a general election," preceding "before the later" in the introductory language of paragraph (1), deleted "general" preceding "election" in subparagraphs (1)(B) and (2)(B), rewrote paragraph (2), deleted "special election or" preceding "municipal election" in the introductory language of paragraph (3), and rewrote subparagraph (3)(B).

The second 1998 amendment, effective June 4, 1998, in subsection (c) added "when the office is to be filled at a general election; or" at the end of subparagraph (1)(B) and added subparagraph (1)(C), inserted "in a place other than the capital city" in the introductory language in paragraph (2), added "the date that" at the beginning of subparagraph (4), added paragraph (5), and made minor stylistic changes.

The 1999 amendment, effective May 28, 1999, made a section reference substitution at the end of paragraph (h)(2).

The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subsections (a) and (f) inserted references to nongroup entities; in subsection (f) inserted "entity recognized as tax-exempt under 26 U.S.C. 501(c)(3) (Internal Revenue Code)"; added subsection (I); and made related stylistic changes.

The 2003 amendment, effective September 14, 2003, rewrote paragraph (c)(3) and added the next-to-last sentence in subsection (g).

NOTES TO DECISION

Constitutionality. – Alaska has a substantial governmental interest in campaign finance reform that justifies some restriction on First Amendment freedoms, including the ban on contributions by a corporation, company, partnership, firm, association, organization, business trust, surety, or labor union in subsection (f). State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, U.S., 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

The restrictions on contributions and expenditures by corporations and labor unions, considered together, are not so extreme as to constitute bans on issue advocacy. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, U.S., 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed 2d 1069 (2000).

The ban on out-of-district lobbyist contributions in subsection (g) is narrowly tailored to further the State's compelling interest, and the restraint does not foreclose lobbyists from engaging in political speech. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, U.S., 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

The post-election contribution limits of paragraph (c)(4) comprise a narrowly-tailored impact on associational rights to further compelling state interests, and are upheld. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, U.S., 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000)

AS 15.13.074(f) is constitutional to the extend that it prohibits a corporation, company, partnership, firm association, organization, business trust or surety, labor union, or publicly funded entity from making a contribution to a political party for the purpose of nominating or electing a candidate. The provision does not prohibit, and is unconstitutional to the extent that it prohibits, contributions by these entities to a political party for a purpose other than influencing the nomination or election of a candidate. Jacobus v. Alaska, 182 F. Supp. 2d 893 (D. Alaska 2001).

Soft money ban on corporate contributions to political parties under AS 15.13.074(f) is constitutional under the First Amendment. Jacobus v. Alaska, 338 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2003).

Reporting provisions of this section and AS 15.13.040(d), (e) and (j), 15.13. 082(b), 15.13.110, and 15.13.135(a) survive strict scrutiny because the state's interest in regulating campaign contributions

Pre-election contribution limits invalid. - The pre-election contribution limits or paragraphs (c)(1), (2), and (3) are invalid, and the eighteen-month contingent pre-election time limits in ch. 48 § 12, SLA 1996 are effective. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, U.S., 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

Prohibition on contributions during legislative session invalid. - The prohibition against making contributions to legislative candidates, including both challengers and incumbents, during a regular legislative session, set forth in paragraph (c)(2), is not narrowly tailored to the State's compelling interest of preventing corruption or its appearance, and is therefore, invalid. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, U.S., 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

Severability. – Chapter 48, SLA 1996, which revised Alaska's election campaign finance laws, provides both a severability clause and contingent provisions to become effective if parts of the act are held invalid; thus, invalidation of some parts of the act does not undermine the structure of the whole, and legal effect can be given to the remaining provisions. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, U.S., 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

Sec. 15.13.076. Authorized recipients of contributions. A contribution to a

(1) candidate may be received only by

(A) the candidate; or

(B) the candidate's campaign treasurer or a deputy campaign treasurer;

(2) group may be received only by the group's campaign treasurer or a deputy treasurer. (§ 11 ch 48 SLA 1996)

Sec. 15.13.078. Contributions and loans from the candidate. (a) The provisions of this chapter do not prohibit the individual who is a candidate from giving any amount of the candidate's own money or other thing of value to the campaign of the candidate. Donations made by the candidate to the candidate's own campaign shall be reported as contributions in accordance with AS 15.13.040 and 15.13.110.

(b) The provisions of this chapter do not prohibit the individual who is a candidate from lending any amount to the campaign of the candidate. Loans made by the candidate shall be reported as contributions in accordance with AS 15.13.040 and 15.13.110. However, the candidate may not

(1) recover, under this section and AS 15.13.116 (a)(4), the amount of a loan made by the candidate to the candidate's own campaign that exceeds

(A) $25,000, if the candidate ran for governor or lieutenant governor;

(B) $10,000, if the candidate ran for

(i) the legislature; or

(ii) delegate to a constitutional convention;

(C) $10,000, if the candidate was a judge seeking retention;

(D) $5,000, if the candidate ran in a municipal election; or

(2) repay a loan that the candidate has made to the candidate's own campaign unless, within five days of making the loan, the candidate notifies the commission, on a form provided by the commission, of the candidate's intention to repay the loan under AS 15.13.116 (a)(4).

(c) On and after the date determined under AS 15.13.110 as the last day of the period ending three days before the due date of the report required to be filed under AS 15.13.110 (a)(1) and until the date of the election for which the report is filed, a candidate may not give or loan to the candidate's campaign the candidate's money or other thing of value of the candidate in an amount that exceeds $5,000.

(d) The provisions of this section apply only to the individual who is a candidate, as that term is defined by AS 15.13.400 (1)(A), and do not apply to authorize a contribution or loan under this section by an individual described in the definition of the term "candidate" under AS 15.13.400 (1)(B). (§ 11 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 9 ch 33 SLA 1999)

Effect of amendments. – The 1999 amendment, effective May 28, 1999, made section reference substitutions in paragraphs (b)(1) and (b)(2).

Sec. 15.13.080. Statement by or on behalf of contributor. [Repealed, Sec. 11 ch 1 TSSLA 2002].

Revisor's notes. – From April 16, 2002, until the repeal of this section on June 26, 2002, AS 15.13.080(a) read as follows:"(a) An individual who contributes $500, or goods or services with a value of $500, to a candidate shall file a contributor's statement as required by this section. A candidate who receives $500, or goods or services of a value of $500, may file a contributor's statement as required under this section on behalf of the contributor."

Sec. 15.13.082. Limitations on expenditures. (a) A candidate or group may not make an expenditure in cash that exceeds $100 unless the candidate, or the campaign treasurer or deputy campaign treasurer, obtains a written receipt from the person to whom the expenditure is made.

(b) A candidate, group, or nongroup entity may not make an expenditure unless the source of the expenditure has been disclosed as required by this chapter.

(c) If a candidate receives a contribution in the form of cash, check, money order, or other negotiable instrument and is subject to being reported to the commission under this chapter, the candidate may neither expend the contribution nor, in the case of a negotiable instrument, convert it to cash unless the candidate, campaign treasurer, or deputy campaign treasurer first records the following information for disclosure to the commission:

(1) the name, address, principal occupation, and employer of the contributor; and

(2) the date and amount of the contribution. (§ 14 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 16 ch 1 SLA 2002)

Effect of amendments. – The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subsection (b) inserted "or nongroup entity" and made a related stylistic change.

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Constitutionality. – Reporting provisions of this section and AS 15.13.040(d), (e) and (j), 15.13.074(i), 15.13.110, and 15.13.135(a) survive strict scrutiny because the state's interest in regulating campaign contributions and expenditures is significant and the requirements are not particularly onerous. Alaska Right to Life Comm. v. Miles, 441 F. 3d 773 (9th Cir 2006).

Sec. 15.13.084. Prohibited expenditures. A person may not make an expenditure

(1) anonymously, unless the expenditure is

(A) paid for by an individual acting independently of any group or nongroup entity and independently of any other individual;

(B) made to influence the outcome of a ballot proposition as that term is defined by AS 15.13.065 (c); and

(C) made for

(i) a billboard or sign; or

(ii) printed material, other than an advertisement made in a newspaper or other periodical;

(2) using a fictitious name or using the name of another. (§ 14 ch 48 SLA 1996; am §17 ch 1 SLA 2002)

Effect of amendments. – The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in paragraph (1) inserted "or nongroup entity" in subparagraph (A).

Sec. 15.13.086. Authorized makers of expenditures. An expenditure

(1) authorized by or in behalf of a candidate may be made only by

(A) the candidate; or

(B) the candidate's campaign treasurer or a deputy campaign treasurer;

(2) authorized by AS 15.13.067 (3) by or in behalf of a group may be made only by the group's campaign treasurer. (§ 14 ch 48 SLA 1996)

Sec. 15.13.090. Identification of communication. (a) All communications shall be clearly identified by the words "paid for by" followed by the name and address of the candidate, group, nongroup entity, or individual paying for the communication. In addition, candidates and groups may identify the name of their campaign chairperson.

(b) The provisions of (a) of this section do not apply when the communication

(1) is paid for by an individual acting independently of any group or nongroup entity and independently of any other individual;

(2) is made to influence the outcome of a ballot proposition as that term is defined by AS 15.13.065 (c); and

(3) is made for

(A) a billboard or sign; or

(B) printed material other than an advertisement made in a newspaper or other periodical. (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am § 22 ch 189 SLA 1975; am § 36 ch 100 SLA 1980; am § 15 ch 48 SLA 1996; am §§ 18, 19 ch 1 SLA 2002; am §5 ch 1 TSSLA 2002)

Revisor's notes. – In 2000, "chairperson" was substituted for "chairman" in (a) of this section in accordance with sec. 95(3), ch. 82, SLA 2000.

Effect of amendments. – The 1996 amendment, effective January 1, 1997, added subsection (b).

The first 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subsection (a) and paragraph (b)(1) inserted references to nongroup entities.

The second 2002 amendment, effective June 26, 2002, rewrote subsection (a) and substituted "communication" for "advertisement" in the introductory language of subsection (b).

Editor's notes. – From April 16, 2002 through June 25, 2002, this section read as follows: "Identification of communication. (a) All advertisements, billboards, handbills, paid-for television and radio announcements, and other communications intended to influence the election of a candidate or outcome of a ballot proposition or question shall be clearly identified by the words "paid for by" followed by the name and address of the candidate, group, nongroup entity, or individual paying for the advertising. In addition, candidates and groups must identify the name of their campaign chairperson.

"(b) The provisions of (a) of this section do not apply when the advertisement

"(1) is paid for by an individual acting independently of any group or nongroup entity and independently of any other individual;

"(2) is made to influence the outcome of a ballot proposition as that term is defined by AS 15.13.065(c); and

"(3) is made for

"(A) a billboard or sign; or

"(B) printed material other than an advertisement made in a newspaper or other periodical."

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Applicability to non-group entities – Compelling state interests of providing the electorate with information, deterring actual corruption and avoiding any appearance thereof, and gathering the data necessary to enforce more substantive electioneering restrictions, justifies the application of this section and AS 15.13.135 to non-group entities. Alaska Right to Life Comm. v. Miles, 44 F.3d 773 (9th Cir. 2006)

Sec. 15.13.095. False statements in telephone polling and calls to convince. (a) A candidate who is damaged as the result of a false statement about the candidate made with knowledge that it was false, or with reckless disregard for whether it was false or not, made as part of a telephone poll or an organized series of calls, and made with the intent to convince potential voters concerning the outcome of an election in which the candidate is running may recover damages in an action in superior court under this section against the individual who made the telephone call, the individual's employer, and the person who contracted for or authorized the poll or calls to convince. However, the employer of the individual or the person who contracted for or authorized the poll or calls to convince is liable to the defamed candidate only if the employer or person authorized the statement to be made, knowing that it was false or with reckless disregard for whether it was false or not, as part of the poll or calls to convince.

(b) The court may award damages, including punitive damages. If the court finds that the result of the statement places the integrity of the election process in substantial doubt, the eligibility of the successful candidate to hold the office to which elected shall be determined as provided in AS 15.56.110 (b) or, in the case of a candidate for governor or lieutenant governor, by impeachment under art. II, sec. 20, Constitution of the State of Alaska. (§ 1 ch 142 SLA 1996)

Sec. 15.13.100. Expenditures before filing. A political campaign expenditure may not be made or incurred by a person in an election or by a person or group with the person's knowledge and on the person's behalf before the date upon which the person files for nomination for the office which the person seeks, except for personal travel expenses or for opinion surveys or polls. These expenditures must be included in the first report required under this chapter after filing for office. (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am § 23 ch 189 SLA 1975; am § 25 ch 14 SLA 1987)

Sec. 15.13.110. Filing of reports. (a) Each candidate, group, and nongroup entity shall make a full report in accordance with AS 15.13.040 for the period ending three days before the due date of the report and beginning on the last day covered by the most recent previous report. If the report is a first report, it must cover the period from the beginning of the campaign to the date three days before the due date of the report. If the report is a report due February 15, it must cover the period beginning on the last day covered by the most recent previous report or on the day that the campaign started, whichever is later, and ending on February 1 of that year. The report shall be filed

(1) 30 days before the election; however, this report is not required if the deadline for filing a nominating petition or declaration of candidacy is within 30 days of the election;

(2) one week before the election;

(3) 105 days after a special election; and

(4) February 15 for expenditures made and contributions received that were not reported previously, including, if applicable, all amounts expended from a public office expense term account established under AS 15.13.116(a)(8) and all amounts expended from a municipal office account under AS 15.13.116 (a)(9), or when expenditures were not made or contributions were not received during the previous year.

(b) Each contribution that exceeds $250 and that is made within nine days of the election shall be reported to the commission by date, amount, and contributor within 24 hours of receipt by the candidate, group, campaign treasurer, or deputy campaign treasurer. Each contribution to a nongroup entity for the purpose of influencing the outcome of an election that exceeds $250 and that is made within nine days of the election shall be reported to the commission by date, amount, and contributor within 24 hours of receipt by the nongroup entity.

(c) All reports required by this chapter shall be filed with the commission's central office and shall be kept open to public inspection. Within 30 days after each election, the commission shall prepare a summary of each report which shall be made available to the public at cost upon request. Each summary shall use uniform categories of reporting.

(d) [Repealed, Sec. 35 ch 126 SLA 1994].

(e) A group formed to sponsor an initiative, a referendum or a recall shall report 30 days after its first filing with the lieutenant governor. Thereafter each group shall report within 10 days after the end of each calendar quarter on the contributions received and expenditures made during the preceding calendar quarter until reports are due under (a) of this section.

(f) During the year in which the election is scheduled, each of the following shall file the campaign disclosure reports in the manner and at the times required by this section:

(1) a person who, under the regulations adopted by the commission to implement AS 15.13.100, indicates an intention to become a candidate for elective state executive or legislative office;

(2) a person who has filed a nominating petition under AS 15.25.140 - 15.25.200 to become a candidate at the general election for elective state executive or legislative office;

(3) a person who campaigns as a write-in candidate for elective state executive or legislative office at the general election; and

(4) a group or nongroup entity that receives contributions or makes expenditures on behalf of or in opposition to a person described in (1) - (3) of this subsection, except as provided for certain independent expenditures by nongroup entities in AS 15.13.135 (a). (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am § 24 ch 189 SLA 1975; am § 2 ch 133 SLA 1977; am §§ 1, 2 ch 49 SLA 1993; am §35 ch 126 SLA 1994; am § 2 ch 59 SLA 1995; am § 13 ch 30 SLA 1996; am §§ 16-18 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 6 ch 74 SLA 1998; am § 2 ch 103 SLA 2001; am §§ 20-22 ch 1 SLA 2002; am § 14 ch 108 SLA 2003; am § 10 ch 99 SLA 2004)

Cross references. – For legislative purpose in enacting subsection (f), see § 1, ch. 59, SLA 1995 in the Temporary and Special Acts.

Effect of amendments. – The 1995 amendment, effective August 29, 1995, added subsection (f).

The second 1996 amendment, effective January 1, 1997, in subsection (a), inserted ", including, if applicable, all amounts expended from a legislative office account established under AS 15.13.116(a)(9) and all amounts expended from a municipal office account under AS 15.13.116(a)(10)," rewrote subsection (b), and, in subsection (c), deleted the former first sentence which read "the reports of candidates shall be filed with the commission's central office" and inserted "shall be filed with the commission's central office and."

The 1998 amendment, effective June 4, 1998, substituted "a public office expense term account" for "a legislative office account" and made two section reference substitutions in paragraph (a)(4).

The 2001 amendment, effective July 14, 2001, substituted "general election" for "primary election" in paragraph (f)(2).

The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subsection (a) and paragraph (f)(4) inserted references to nongroup entities; in subsection (b) added the second sentence; in paragraph (f)(4) added the exception at the end; and made a stylistic change.

The 2003 amendment, effective September 14, 2003, in subsection (a) substituted "must" for "shall" in two places and "on February 1 of that year" for "on December 31 of the prior year" at the end of the next-to-last sentence in the introductory language, rewrote paragraph (3), which read "10 days after the election; and," and in paragraph (4) substituted "reported previously" for "reported during the previous year."

The 2004 amendment, effective June 26, 2004 substituted "general" for "primary" in paragraph (f)(2).

Editor's notes. – Under § 4, ch. 59, SLA 1995, the provisions of (f)(1) of this section "are intended to apply to a person who indicates an intention to become a candidate for elective state executive or legislative office under a letter of intent authorized by 2 AAC 50.380 and who makes or incurs campaign expenditures by initiating early campaigning for the office."

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Disclosure requirements constitutional. – The disclosure requirements of this chapter are not unconstitutionally vague or overbroad, nor do they violate the constitutional right of the people to privacy. VECO Int'l, Inc. v. Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n, 753, P.2d 703 (Alaska 1988), appeal dismissed, 488 U.S. 919, 109 S. Ct. 298, 102 L. Ed. 2d 317 (1988).

Stated in State, Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n v. Marshall, 633, P.2d 227 (Alaska 1981).

Sec. 15.13.111. Preservation of records. [Effective January 1, 2009]. (a) Each candidate, group, nongroup entity, or person required to report under this chapter shall preserve all records necessary to substantiate information required to be reported under this chapter for a period of six years from the date of the election for which the information was required to be reported, unless the records have been submitted to the commission under (c) of this section.

(b) Information preserved under (a) of this section must be made available for inspection by the commission.

(c) A candidate for state elected office who was not elected or a person who has left state elected office may submit the records required to be preserved under (a) of this section to the commission electronically. Records submitted under this subsection shall be preserved by the commission for a period of six years from the date of the election for which the information was required to be reported. (§ 2 ch 95 SLA 2008)

Effective dates. – Section 16, ch. 95 SLA 2008, makes this section effective January 1, 2009.

Editor's notes. – Section 13(a), ch. 95, SLA 2008 provides that this section applies to records for elections on or after January 1, 2009.

Sec. 15.13.112. Uses of campaign contributions held by candidate or group. (a) Except as otherwise provided, campaign contributions held by a candidate or group may be used only to pay the expenses of the candidate or group, and the campaign expenses incurred by the candidate or group, that reasonably relate to election campaign activities, and in those cases only as authorized by this chapter.

(b) Campaign contributions held by a candidate or group may not be

(1) used to give a personal benefit to the candidate or to another person;

(2) converted to personal income of the candidate;

(3) loaned to a person;

(4) knowingly used to pay more than the fair market value for goods or services purchased for the campaign;

(5) used to pay a criminal fine;

(6) used to pay civil penalties; however, campaign contributions held by a candidate or group may be used to pay a civil penalty assessed under this chapter if authorized by the commission or a court after it first determines that

(A) the candidate, campaign treasurer, and deputy campaign treasurer did not cause or participate in the violation for which the civil penalty is imposed and exercised a reasonable level of oversight over the campaign; and

(B) the candidate, campaign treasurer, and deputy campaign treasurer cooperated in the revelation of the violation and in its immediate correction; or

(7) used to make contributions to another candidate or to a group; however, it is not a violation of this paragraph if, in circumstances in which a candidate or group participates in a shared campaign activity, the candidate or group participating in the activity

(A) uses campaign contributions of the candidate or group for payment of

(i) all of the shared campaign activity expense; or

(ii) more than the candidate's or group's pro rata share of the activity expense; and

(B) receives, within seven days after payment of the expense, complete reimbursement of the amount of campaign contributions used for payments made on behalf of another candidate or group participating in the activity.

(c) A candidate may use up to a total of $1,000 in campaign contributions in a year to pay the cost of

(1) attending, or paying the cost for guests of the candidate to attend, an event or other function sponsored by a political party or subordinate unit of a political party;

(2) membership in a political party, subordinate unit of a political party, or other entity within a political party, or subscription to a publication from a political party; and

(3) co-sponsorship of an event or other function sponsored by a political party or by a subordinate unit of a political party. (§ 19 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 7 ch 74 SLA 1998; am § 1 ch 90 SLA 2006)

Effect of amendments. – The 1998 amendment, effective June 4, 1998, added subsection (c).

The 2006 amendment, effective October 11, 2006, added language to paragraph (b)(7) beginning "however, it is not a violation" through the end of the paragraph.

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Constitutionality. – Because the State has a compelling interest in enforcing contribution limits, and because candidates still retain the right to make contributions from personal funds, the ban on inter-candidate contributions in paragraph (b)(7) is constitutional. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1153, 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

Sec. 15.13.114. Disposition of prohibited contributions. (a) A candidate, group, or nongroup entity that receives and accepts a contribution given in violation of AS 15.13.072 or 15.13.074 shall immediately, upon discovery that the contribution is prohibited, return it to the contributor. A candidate, group, or nongroup entity that receives and accepts a contribution in excess of the limitation on contributions set out in AS 15.13.070 shall immediately, upon discovery of the prohibited excess contribution, return the excess to the contributor. If the contribution or excess amount cannot be returned in the same form, the equivalent value of the contribution or excess amount shall be returned.

(b) An anonymous contribution is forfeited to the state unless the contributor is identified within five days of its receipt. Money that forfeits to the state under this subsection shall be delivered immediately to the Department of Revenue for deposit in the general fund. (§ 19 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 23 ch 1 SLA 2002)

Effect of amendments. – The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in two places. In subsection (a) inserted ", or nongroup entity": and made related stylistic changes

Sec. 15.13.116. Disbursement of campaign assets after election. (a) A candidate who, after the date of the general, special, municipal, or municipal runoff election or after the date the candidate withdraws as a candidate, whichever comes first, holds unused campaign contributions shall distribute the amount held on February 1 for a general election or within 90 days after a special election. The distribution may only be made to

(1) pay bills incurred for expenditures reasonably related to the campaign and the winding up of the affairs of the campaign, including a victory or thank you party, thank you advertisements, and thank you gifts to campaign employees and volunteers, and to pay expenditures associated with post-election fund raising that may be needed to raise funds to pay off campaign debts;

(2) make donations, without condition, to

(A) a political party;

(B) the state's general fund;

(C) a municipality of the state; or

(D) the federal government;

(3) make donations, without condition, to organizations qualified as charitable organizations under 26 U.S.C. 501(c)(3) if the organization is not controlled by the candidate or a member of the candidate's immediate family;

(4) repay loans from the candidate to the candidate's own campaign under AS 15.13.078 (b);

(5) repay contributions to contributors, but only if repayment of the contribution is made pro rata in approximate proportion to the contributions made using one of the following, as the candidate determines:

(A) to all contributors;

(B) to contributors who have contributed most recently; or

(C) to contributors who have made larger contributions;

(6) establish a fund for, and from that fund to pay, attorney fees or costs incurred in the prosecution or defense of an administrative or civil judicial action that directly concerns a challenge to the victory or defeat of the candidate in the election;

(7) transfer all or a portion of the unused campaign contributions to an account for a future election campaign; a transfer under this paragraph is limited to

(A) $50,000, if the transfer is made by a candidate for governor or lieutenant governor;

(B) $10,000, if the transfer is made by a candidate for the state senate;

(C) $5,000, if the transfer is made by a candidate for the state house of representatives; and

(D) $5,000, if the transfer is made by a candidate for an office not described in (A) - (C) of this paragraph;

(8) transfer all or a portion of the unused campaign contributions to a public office expense term account or to a public office expense term account reserve in accordance with (d) of this section; a transfer under this paragraph is subject to the following:

(A) the authority to transfer is limited to candidates who are elected to the state legislature;

(B) the public office expense term account established under this paragraph may be used only for expenses associated with the candidate's serving as a member of the legislature;

(C) all amounts expended from the public office expense term account shall be annually accounted for under AS 15.13.110 (a)(4); and

(D) a transfer under this paragraph is limited to $5,000 multiplied by the number of years in the term to which the candidate is elected plus any accumulated interest; and

(9) transfer all or a portion of the unused campaign contributions to a municipal office account; a transfer under this paragraph is subject to the following:

(A) the authority to transfer is limited to candidates who are elected to municipal office, including a municipal school board;

(B) the municipal office account established under this paragraph may be used only for expenses associated with the candidate's serving as mayor or as a member of the assembly, city council, or school board;

(C) all amounts expended from the municipal office account shall be annually accounted for under AS 15.13.110 (a)(4); and

(D) a transfer under this paragraph is limited to $5,000.

(b) After a general, special, municipal, or municipal runoff election, a candidate may retain the ownership of one computer and one printer and of personal property, except money, that was acquired by and for use in the campaign. The current fair market value of the property retained, exclusive of the computer and printer, may not exceed $5,000. All other property shall be disposed of, or sold and the sale proceeds disposed of, in accordance with (a) or (c) of this section. Notwithstanding any other provision of this chapter,

(1) a candidate may (A) retain a bulk mailing permit that was paid for with campaign funds, and (B) use personal funds, campaign funds, or unused campaign contributions transferred to a public office expense term account under (a)(8) of this section to pay the continuing charges for the permit after the election; money used to continue the life of the permit is not considered to be a contribution under this chapter; in addition to any other use permitted under this chapter, during the candidate's term of office, the candidate may use the bulk mailing permit for mailings associated with service in the office to which the candidate was elected; during the candidate's term of office, if the candidate files a declaration of candidacy or the document necessary to permit the candidate to incur election-related expenses under AS 15.13.100 for the same or a different elective office, the candidate may also use the bulk mailing permit in that election campaign;

(2) a candidate may retain campaign photographs and use the photographs for any purpose associated with service in the office to which the candidate was elected;

(3) a candidate may retain seasonal greeting cards purchased with campaign funds; and

(4) campaign signs prepared for an election that has already taken place have no monetary value and may be retained or disposed of at the candidate's discretion.

(c) Property remaining after disbursements are made under (a) - (b) of this section is forfeited to the state. Within 30 days, the candidate shall deliver the property to the Department of Revenue. The Department of Revenue shall deposit any money received into the general fund and dispose of any other property in accordance with law.

(d) After a general or special election, a candidate for the state legislature who has been elected to the state legislature in that election may, from the amount retained in the public office expense term account reserve under this subsection, transfer to a public office expense term account not more than $5,000 each calendar year for use only for expenses associated with the candidate's serving as a member of the legislature, except that a senator serving a two-year term may transfer not more than $10,000 each calendar year. A candidate for the senate may transfer up to $20,000 from unused campaign contributions to a public office expense term account reserve. A candidate for the house of representatives may transfer up to $10,000 from unused campaign contributions to a public office expense term account reserve. The public office expense term account reserve may only be used to make transfers to the public office expense term account. At the end of the candidate's term of office, a balance in the public office expense term account reserve must be disposed of as provided in (a) of this section but may not be disposed of as provided in (a)(1), (4), or (6) - (9) of this section. All amounts expended under this subsection shall be annually accounted for under AS 15.13.110 (a)(4). (§ 19 ch 48 SLA 1996; am §§ 8, 9, 10 ch 74 SLA 1998; am §§ 4-6 ch 3 SLA 2002; am § 15 ch 108 SLA 2003)

Cross references. – For provisions relating to certain persons holding unused campaign contributions on January 1, 1997, see § 32, ch. 48, SLA 1996 in the Temporary and Special Acts.

For provisions relating to the applicability of subsection (d) to certain contributions held by certain legislators, see § 104, ch. 74, SLA 1998 in the 1998 Temporary and Special Acts.

Effect of amendments. – The 1998 amendment, effective June 4, 1998, rewrote subsection (a); added the last four sentences in subsection (b); and added subsection (d).

The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subsection (a) inserted ", thank you advertisements," in paragraph (1), in paragraph (8) inserted "plus any accumulated interest" in subparagraph (D); in subsection (b) substituted "$5,000" for "$2,500" in the introductory language, added the subparagraph (1) designation, in subparagraph (1) substituted "the document necessary to permit the candidate to incur election-related expenses under AS 15.13.100" for "A letter of intent to become a candidate" near the end and added subparagraphs (2)-(4); in subsection (d) added the exception at the end of the first sentence; and made stylistic changes.

The 2003 amendment, effective September 14, 2003, in subsection (a) inserted "on February 1 for a general election or" and "after a special election" in the introductory language and made a stylistic change.

Editor's notes. – Section 106, ch. 105, SLA 1998 makes the 1998 amendments to subsections (a) and (b), the 1998 enactment of subsection (d), and the related provisions in § 104, ch. 74, SLA 1998 in the 1998 Temporary and Special Acts all retroactive to December 31, 1996.

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Constitutionality. – The State's interest in preventing avoidance of valid contribution limits by use of carry-forwards in both compelling and served by the restriction set forth in this section, which is narrowly tailored to accomplish this interest, and justifies its burden on speech. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1153, 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

Sec. 15.13.135. Independent expenditures for or against candidates. (a) Only an individual, group, or nongroup entity may make an independent expenditure supporting or opposing a candidate for election to public office. An independent expenditure supporting or opposing a candidate for election to public office, except an independent expenditure made by a nongroup entity with an annual operating budget of $250 or less, shall be reported in accordance with AS 15.13.040 and 15.13.100 - 15.13.110 and other requirements of this chapter.

(b) An individual, group, or nongroup entity who makes independent expenditures for a mass mailing, for distribution of campaign literature of any sort, for a television, radio, newspaper, or magazine advertisement, or any other communication that supports or opposes a candidate for election to public office

(1) shall comply with AS 15.13.090 ; and

(2) shall place the following statement in the mailing, literature, advertisement, or other communication so that it is readily and easily discernible:

This NOTICE TO VOTERS is required by Alaska law. (I/we) certify that this (mailing/literature/advertisement) is not authorized, paid for, or approved by the candidate. (§ 24 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 24 ch 1 SLA 2002)

Effect of Amendments. – The 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subsection (a) and (b) inserted ", or nongroup entity: and made related stylistic changes; in subsection (a) inserted ", except an independent expenditure made by a nongroup entity with an annual operating budget of $250 or less,"; and made stylistic changes.

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Constitutionality. – The State has a compelling interest that justifies applying the section to business corporations and labor unions. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1153, 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

The restrictions on contributions and expenditures by corporations and labor unions, considered together, are not so extreme as to constitute bans on issue advocacy. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1153, 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

This section as written embraces "nongroup" entities whose speech may not be permissibly restricted by an expenditure prohibition, and the section must be read narrowly to prevent it from applying to such "nongroup" entities; thus, entities must be exempted from this section's ban if: (1) They cannot participate in business activities, (2) they have no shareholders who have a claim on corporate earnings, and (3) they are independent from the influence of business corporations. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1153, 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

Reporting provisions of as 15.13.040(d), (e) and (j), 15.13.074(i), 15.13.082(b), 15.13.110, and this section survive strict scrutiny because the state's interest in regulating campaign contributions and expenditures is significant and the requirements are not particularly onerous. Alaska Right to Life Comm. v. Miles, 441 F.3d 773 (9th Cir. 2006).

Applicability to non-group entities. – Compelling state interests of providing the electorate with information, deterring actual corruption and avoiding any appearance thereof, and gathering the data necessary to enforce more substantive electioneering restrictions justified the application of AS 15.13.090 and this section to non-group entities. Alaska Right to Life Comm. v. Miles, 441 F.3d 773 (9th Cir. 2006).

Permissible acts by nongroup entities. – Nothing prevents individual organizers of nongroup entities from either forming a "group" to collect contributions and make expenditures, or soliciting individual contributions from other members without relying on treasury funds; further, nongroup entities may communicate their endorsements to their employees or members. State v. Alaska Civil Liberties Union, 978 P.2d 597 (Alaska 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1153, 120 S. Ct. 1156, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1069 (2000).

Sec. 15.13.140. Independent expenditures for or against ballot proposition or question. (a) This chapter does not prohibit a person from making independent expenditures in support of or in opposition to a ballot proposition or question.

(b) An independent expenditure for or against a ballot proposition or question

(1) shall be reported in accordance with AS 15.13.040 and 15.13.100 - 15.13.110 and other requirements of this chapter; and

(2) may not be made if the expenditure is prohibited by AS 15.13.145 . (§ 24 ch 48 SLA 1996)

Sec. 15.13.145. Money of the state and its political subdivisions. (a) Except as provided in (b) and (c) of this section, each of the following may not use money held by the entity to influence the outcome of the election of a candidate to a state or municipal office:

(1) the state, its agencies, and its corporations;

(2) the University of Alaska and its Board of Regents;

(3) municipalities, school districts, and regional educational attendance areas, or another political subdivision of the state; and

(4) an officer or employee of an entity identified in (1) - (3) of this subsection.

(b) Money held by an entity identified in (a)(1) - (3) of this section may be used to influence the outcome of an election concerning a ballot proposition or question, but only if the funds have been specifically appropriated for that purpose by a state law or a municipal ordinance.

(c) Money held by an entity identified in (a)(1) - (3) of this section may be used

(1) to disseminate information about the time and place of an election and to hold an election;

(2) to provide the public with nonpartisan information about a ballot proposition or question or about all the candidates seeking election to a particular public office.

(d) When expenditure of money is authorized by (b) or (c) of this section and is used to influence the outcome of an election, the expenditures shall be reported to the commission in the same manner as an individual is required to report under AS 15.13.040 .(§ 24 ch 48 SLA 1996)

Sec. 15.13.150. Election educational activities not prohibited. This chapter does not prohibit a person from engaging in educational election-related communications and activities, including

(1) the publication of the date and location of an election;

(2) the education of students about voting and elections;

(3) the sponsorship of open candidate debate forums;

(4) participation in get-out-the-vote or voter registration drives that do not favor a particular candidate, political party, or political position;

(5) the dissemination of the views of all candidates running for a particular office. (§ 24 ch 48 SLA 1996)

Sec. 15.13.155. Restrictions on earned income and honoraria. (a) A candidate for the state legislature, for governor, or for lieutenant governor, including an individual campaigning as a write-in candidate for the office, may not

(1) seek or accept compensation for personal services that involves payments that are not commensurate with the services rendered taking into account the higher rates generally charged by specialists in a profession; or

(2) accept a payment of anything of value, except for actual and necessarily incurred travel expenses, for an appearance or speech; this paragraph does not apply to the salary paid to the candidate for making an appearance or speech as part of the candidate's normal course of employment.

(b) Notwithstanding (a) of this section, a candidate for the state legislature, for governor, or for lieutenant governor, including an individual campaigning as a write-in candidate for the office, may accept a payment for an appearance or speech if the appearance or speech is not connected with the individual's status as a state official or as a candidate. (§ 24 ch 48 SLA 1996)

Sec. 15.13.374. Advisory opinion. (a) Any person may request an advisory opinion from the commission concerning this chapter, AS 24.45, AS 24.60.200 - 24.60.260, or AS 39.50.

(b) A request for an advisory opinion

(1) must be in writing or contained in a message submitted by electronic mail;

(2) must describe a specific transaction or activity that the requesting person is presently engaged in or intends to undertake in the future;

(3) must include a description of all relevant facts, including the identity of the person requesting the advisory opinion; and

(4) may not concern a hypothetical situation or the activity of a third party.

(c) Within seven days after receiving a request satisfying the requirements of (b) of this section, the executive director of the commission shall recommend a draft advisory opinion for the commission to consider at its next meeting.

(d) The approval of a draft advisory opinion requires the affirmative vote of four members of the commission. A draft advisory opinion failing to receive four affirmative votes of the members of the commission is disapproved.

(e) A complaint under AS 15.13.380 may not be considered about a person involved in a transaction or activity that

(1) was described in an advisory opinion approved under (d) of this section;

(2) is indistinguishable from the description of an activity that was approved in an advisory opinion approved under (d) of this section; or

(3) was undertaken after the executive director of the commission recommended a draft advisory opinion under (c) of this section and before the commission acted on the draft advisory opinion under (d) of this section, if

(A) the draft advisory opinion would have approved the transaction or activity described; and

(B) the commission disapproved the draft advisory opinion.

(f) Advisory opinion requests and advisory opinions are public records subject to inspection and copying under AS 40.25. (§16 ch 108 SLA 2003)

Effective dates. – Section 16, ch. 108, SLA 2003, which enacted this section took effect on September 14, 2003.

Sec. 15.13.380. Violations; limitations on actions. (a) Promptly after the final date for filing statements and reports under this chapter, the commission shall notify all persons who have become delinquent in filing them, including contributors who failed to file a statement in accordance with AS 15.13.040 , and shall make available a list of those delinquent filers for public inspection. The commission shall also report to the attorney general the names of all candidates in an election whose campaign treasurers have failed to file the reports required by this chapter.

(b) [See delayed amendment note]. A person who believes a violation of this chapter or a regulation adopted under this chapter has occurred or is occurring may file an administrative complaint with the commission within five years after the date of the alleged violation. If a member of the commission has filed the complaint, that member may not participate as a commissioner in any proceeding of the commission with respect to the complaint. The commission may consider a complaint on an expedited basis or a regular basis.

(c) The complainant or the respondent to the complaint may request in writing that the commission expedite consideration of the complaint. A request for expedited consideration must be accompanied by evidence to support expedited consideration and be served on the opposing party. The commission shall grant or deny the request within two days after receiving it. In deciding whether to expedite consideration, the commission shall consider such factors as whether the alleged violation, if not immediately restrained, could materially affect the outcome of an election or other impending event; whether the alleged violation could cause irreparable harm that penalties could not adequately remedy; and whether there is reasonable cause to believe that a violation has occurred or will occur. Notwithstanding the absence of a request to expedite consideration, the commission may independently expedite consideration of the complaint if the commission finds that the standards for expedited consideration set out in this subsection have been met.

(d) If the commission expedites consideration, the commission shall hold a hearing on the complaint within two days after granting expedited consideration. Not later than one day after affording the respondent notice and an opportunity to be heard, the commission shall

(1) enter an emergency order requiring the violation to be ceased or to be remedied and assess civil penalties under AS 15.13.390 if the commission finds that the respondent has engaged in or is about to engage in an act or practice that constitutes or will constitute a violation of this chapter or a regulation adopted under this chapter;

(2) enter an emergency order dismissing the complaint if the commission finds that the respondent has not or is not about to engage in an act or practice that constitutes or will constitute a violation of this chapter or a regulation adopted under this chapter; or

(3) remand the complaint to the executive director of the commission for consideration by the commission on a regular rather than an expedited basis.

(e) If the commission accepts the complaint for consideration on a regular rather than an expedited basis, the commission shall notify the respondent within seven days after receiving the complaint and shall investigate the complaint. The respondent may answer the complaint by filing a written response with the commission within 15 days after the commission notifies the respondent of the complaint. The commission may grant the respondent additional time to respond to the complaint only for good cause. The commission shall hold a hearing on the complaint not later than 45 days after the respondent's written response is due. Not later than 10 days after the hearing, the commission shall issue its order. If the commission finds that the respondent has engaged in or is about to engage in an act or practice that constitutes or will constitute a violation of this chapter or a regulation adopted under this chapter, the commission shall enter an order requiring the violation to be ceased or to be remedied and shall assess civil penalties under AS 15.13.390 .

(f) If the complaint involves a challenge to the constitutionality of a statute or regulation, necessary witnesses that are not subject to the commission's subpoena authority, or other issues outside the commission's authority, the commission may request the attorney general to file a complaint in superior court alleging a violation of this chapter. The commission may request the attorney general to file a complaint in superior court to remedy the violation of a commission order.

(g) A commission order under (d) or (e) of this section may be appealed to the superior court by either the complainant or respondent within 30 days in accordance with the Alaska Rules of Appellate Procedure.

(h) If the commission does not complete action on an administrative complaint within 90 days after the complaint was filed, the complainant may file a complaint in superior court alleging a violation of this chapter by a respondent as described in the administrative complaint filed with the commission. The complainant shall provide copies of the complaint filed in the superior court to the commission and the attorney general. This subsection does not create a private cause of action against the commission; against the commission's members, officers, or employees; or against the state.

(i) If a person who was a successful candidate or the campaign treasurer or deputy campaign treasurer of a person who was a successful candidate is convicted of a violation of this chapter, after the candidate is sworn into office, proceedings shall be held and appropriate action taken in accordance with

(1) art. II, sec. 12, of the state constitution, if the successful candidate is a member of the state legislature;

(2) art. II, sec. 20, of the state constitution, if the successful candidate is governor or lieutenant governor;

(3) the provisions of the call for the constitutional convention, if the successful candidate is a constitutional convention delegate;

(4) art. IV, sec. 10, of the state constitution, if the successful candidate is a judge.

(j) Information developed by the commission under (b) - (e) of this section shall be considered during a proceeding under (i) of this section.

(k) If, after a successful candidate is sworn into office, the successful candidate or the campaign treasurer or deputy campaign treasurer of the person who was a successful candidate is charged with a violation of this chapter, the case shall be promptly tried and accorded a preferred position for purposes of argument and decision so as to ensure a speedy disposition of the matter. (§ 1 ch 76 SLA 1974; am § 25 ch 189 SLA 1975; am §§ 1, 6 ch 134 SLA 1982; am §§ 33 - 36 ch 74 SLA 1985; am § 26 ch 14 SLA 1987; am §§ 20, 21, 28 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 6 ch 1 SLA 2002 TSSLA; am § 17 ch 108 SLA 2003; am § 3 ch 95 SLA 2008)

Delayed amendment of subsection (b). – Until January 1, 2009, subsection (b) reads as follows: "(b) A member of the commission, the commission's executive director, or a person who believes a violation of this chapter or a regulation adopted under this chapter has occurred or is occurring may file an administrative complaint with the commission within one year after the date of the alleged violation. If a member of the commission has filed the complaint, that member may not participate as a commissioner in any proceeding of the commission with respect to the complaint. The commission may consider a complaint on an expedited basis or a regular basis."

Revisor's notes. – Formerly AS 15.13.120 Renumbered in 2000 at which time, "AS 15.13.390" was substituted for "AS 15.13.125" in subsection (d) in order to reflect the 2000 renumbering of AS 15.13.125.

Effect of amendments. – The 1996 amendment, effective January 1, 1997, repealed subsection (a), and rewrote subsections (d) and (e).

The 2002 amendment, effective June 26, 2002, deleted ", including contributors who failed to file a statement in accordance with AS 15.13.040," following "delinquent in filing them" in the first sentence in subsection (c).

The 2003 amendment, effective September 14, 2003, rewrote this section.

The 2008 amendment, effective January 1, 2009, deleted "A member of the commission, the commission's executive director, or" at the beginning of subsection (b), and substituted "five years" for "one year" in the first sentence of that subsection.

Editor's notes. – Section 13(b), ch. 95, SLA 2008, provides that the 2008 amendment of (b) of this section "applies to administration complaints alleging violations of AS 15.13 or the regulations adopted under that chapter that occurred

"(1) within one year before January 1, 2009; or

"(2) on or after January 1, 2009."

NOTES TO DECISIONS

I. General Consideration.
II. Forfeiture Sanction.

I. GENERAL CONSIDERATION.

This section contains no scienter requirement and the court would not impose one. State, Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n v. Marshall, 633 P.2d 227 (Alaska 1981).

Quoted in Messerli v. State, 626 P.2d 81 (Alaska 1980).

II. FORFEITURE SANCTION.

Annotator's notes. – Subsection (b), which contained a forfeiture sanction for violation AS 15.13 was repealed in 1982.

Constitutionality of forfeiture sanction. – The forfeiture sanction of subsection (b) (now repealed) does not conflict with any constitutional provision delimiting the qualifications of assembly or council members or with any provision reserving exclusive authority to determine a member's election to those local entities. State, Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n v. Marshall 633 P.2d 227 (Alaska 1981).

Even if the forfeiture sanction of subsection (b) (now repealed) may conflict with Alaska Const., art. II, § 12, insofar as state legislative elections are concerned, it can nonetheless constitutionally apply to local elections. State, Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n v. Marshall 633 P.2d 227 (Alaska 1981).

The forfeiture sanction is valid. State, Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n v. Marshall, 633 P.2d 227 (Alaska 1981).

The deadlines for filing are mandatory, and the plain meaning of this section makes the forfeiture sanction applicable. State, Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n v. Marshall, 633 P.2d 227 (Alaska 1981).

The statutory forfeiture of office provision applied to the election of a city councilman and borough assemblyman whose 1980 seven-day election pre-election report was not filed until well after the election. State, Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n v. Marshall, 633 P.2d 227 (Alaska 1981).

The absence of regulations is not fatal to enforcement of the forfeiture sanction because they are not necessary to implement the sanction or to protect a constitutional right. State, Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n v. Marshall, 633 P.2d 227 (Alaska 1981).

Sec. 15.13.385. Legal counsel. (a) The attorney general is legal counsel for the commission. The attorney general shall advise the commission in legal matters arising in the discharge of its duties and represent the commission in actions to which it is a party. If, in the opinion of the commission, the public interest warrants, the commission may request the chief justice of the supreme court to appoint a special prosecutor to represent the commission in a proceeding involving an alleged violation of this chapter and to prosecute that violation.

(b) When the public interest warrants, the commission may employ temporary legal counsel from time to time in matters in which the commission is involved. (§ 26 ch 189 SLA 1975)

Revisor's notes. – Formerly AS 15.13.122. Renumbered in 2000

Sec. 15.13.390. Civil penalty; late filing of required reports. (a) A person who fails to register when required by AS 15.13.050(a) or who fails to file a properly completed and certified report within the time required by AS 15.13.040 , 15.13.060(b) - (d), 15.13.110(a)(1), (3), or (4), (e), or (f) is subject to a civil penalty of not more than $50 a day for each day the delinquency continues as determined by the commission subject to right of appeal to the superior court. A person who fails to file a properly completed and certified report within the time required by AS 15.13.110 (a)(2) or 15.13.110(b) is subject to a civil penalty of not more than $500 a day for each day the delinquency continues as determined by the commission subject to right of appeal to the superior court. A person who violates a provision of this chapter, except a provision requiring registration or filing of a report within a time required as otherwise specified in this section, is subject to a civil penalty of not more than $50 a day for each day the violation continues as determined by the commission, subject to right of appeal to the superior court. An affidavit stating facts in mitigation may be submitted to the commission by a person against whom a civil penalty is assessed. However, the imposition of the penalties prescribed in this section or in AS 15.13.380 does not excuse that person from registering or filing reports required by this chapter.

(b) When an administrative complaint has been filed under AS 15.13.380, the commission shall give the respondent due notice and an opportunity to be heard. If, at the conclusion of the hearing, the commission determines that the respondent engaged in the alleged violation, the commission shall assess

(1) civil penalties under (a) of this section;

(2) the commission's costs of investigation and adjudication; and

(3) reasonable attorney fees.

(c) The commission's determination under (b) of this section may be appealed to the superior court under AS 44.62 (Administrative Procedure Act).

(d) When an action has been filed in the superior court under AS 15.13.380, upon proof of the violation, the court shall enter a judgment in the amount of the civil penalty authorized to be collected by (a) of this section.

(e) If the commission or superior court finds that the violation was not a repeat violation or was not part of a series or pattern of violations, was inadvertent, was quickly corrected, and had no adverse effect on the campaign of another, the commission or the court may

(1) suspend imposition of the penalties; and

(2) order the penalties set aside if the person does not engage in a similar violation for a period of one year.

(f) A party who has filed a civil action under AS 15.13.380

(1) is not entitled to trial by jury on the civil action;

(2) is not entitled to be represented by legal counsel at public expense. (§ 6 ch 167 SLA 1976; am §5 ch 126 SLA 1994; am § 3 ch 59 SLA 1995; am §§22, 23 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 7 ch 1 SLA 2002 TSSLA)

Revisor's notes. – Formerly AS 15.13.125. Renumbered in 2000, at which time "AS 15.13.380" was substituted for "AS 15.13.120" in subsections (a), (b), (d), and (f) in order to reflect the 2000 renumbering of AS 15.13.120.

Effect of amendments. – The 1996 amendment, effective January 1, 1997, rewrote subsection (a) and added subsections (b)-(f).

The 2002 amendment, effective June 26, 2002, updated a section reference in the first sentence in subsection (a).

NOTES TO DECISION

Penalty cannot be obviously unreasonable. – The penalty cannot be so severe and oppressive as to be wholly disproportioned to the offense and obviously unreasonable. The standard is one of obvious unreasonableness. VECO Int'l, Inc. v. Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n, 753 P.2d 703 (Alaska 1988), appeal dismissed 488 U.S. 919, 109 S. Ct. 298 L. Ed. 2d 317 (1988).

Statement of reasons for maximum penalties. – A statement of reasons should be given by the commission when it imposes the maximum civil penalties under this section. VECO Int'l, Inc. v. Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n, 753 P.2d 703 (Alaska 1988), appeal dismissed, 488 U.S. 919, 109 S. Ct. 298 L. Ed. 2d 317 (1988).

Stated in State, Alaska Pub. Offices Comm'n v. Marshall, 633 P.2d 227 (Alaska 1981).

Sec. 15.13.400. Definitions. In this chapter,

(1) "candidate"

(A) means an individual who files for election to the state legislature, for governor, for lieutenant governor, for municipal office, for retention in judicial office, or for constitutional convention delegate, or who campaigns as a write-in candidate for any of these offices; and

(B) when used in a provision of this chapter that limits or prohibits the donation, solicitation, or acceptance of campaign contributions, or limits or prohibits an expenditure, includes

(i) a candidate's campaign treasurer and a deputy campaign treasurer;

(ii) a member of the candidate's immediate family;

(iii) a person acting as agent for the candidate;

(iv) the candidate's campaign committee; and

(v) a group that makes expenditures or receives contributions with the authorization or consent, express or implied, or under the control, direct or indirect, of the candidate;

(2) "commission" means the Alaska Public Offices Commission;

(3) "communication" means an announcement or advertisement disseminated through print or broadcast media, including radio, television, cable, and satellite, the Internet, or through a mass mailing, excluding those placed by an individual or nongroup entity and costing $500 or less and those that do not directly or indirectly identify a candidate or proposition, as that term is defined in AS 15.13.065(c);

(4) "contribution"

(A) means a purchase, payment, promise or obligation to pay, loan or loan guarantee, deposit or gift of money, goods, or services for which charge is ordinarily made and that is made for the purpose of influencing the nomination or election of a candidate, and in AS 15.13.010(b) for the purpose of influencing a ballot proposition or question, including the payment by a person other than a candidate or political party, or compensation for the personal services of another person, that are rendered to the candidate or political party;

(B) does not include

(i) services provided without compensation by individuals volunteering a portion or all of their time on behalf of a political party, candidate, or ballot proposition or question;

(ii) ordinary hospitality in a home;

(iii) two or fewer mass mailings before each election by each political party describing the party's slate of candidates for election, which may include photographs, biographies, and information about the party's candidates;

(iv) the results of a poll limited to issues and not mentioning any candidate, unless the poll was requested by or designed primarily to benefit the candidate;

(v) any communication in the form of a newsletter from a legislator to the legislator's constituents, except a communication expressly advocating the election or defeat of a candidate or a newsletter or material in a newsletter that is clearly only for the private benefit of a legislator or a legislative employee; or

(vi) a fundraising list provided without compensation by one candidate or political party to a candidate or political party;

(5) "electioneering communication" means a communication that

(A) directly or indirectly identifies a candidate;

(B) addresses an issue of national, state, or local political importance and attributes a position on that issue to the candidate identified; and

(C) occurs within the 30 days preceding a general or municipal election;

(6) "expenditure"

(A) means a purchase or a transfer of money or anything of value, or promise or agreement to purchase or transfer money or anything of value, incurred or made for the purpose of

(i) influencing the nomination or election of a candidate or of any individual who files for nomination at a later date and becomes a candidate;

(ii) use by a political party;

(iii) the payment by a person other than a candidate or political party of compensation for the personal services of another person that are rendered to a candidate or political party; or

(iv) influencing the outcome of a ballot proposition or question;

(B) does not include a candidate's filing fee or the cost of preparing reports and statements required by this chapter;

(C) includes an express communication and an electioneering communication, but does not include an issues communication;

(7) "express communication" means a communication that, when read as a whole and with limited reference to outside events, is susceptible of no other reasonable interpretation but as an exhortation to vote for or against a specific candidate;

(8) "group" means

(A) every state and regional executive committee of a political party; and

(B) any combination of two or more individuals acting jointly who organize for the principal purpose of influencing the outcome of one or more elections and who take action the major purpose of which is to influence the outcome of an election; a group that makes expenditures or receives contributions with the authorization or consent, express or implied, or under the control, direct or indirect, of a candidate shall be considered to be controlled by that candidate; a group whose major purpose is to further the nomination, election, or candidacy of only one individual, or intends to expend more than 50 percent of its money on a single candidate, shall be considered to be controlled by that candidate and its actions done with the candidate's knowledge and consent unless, within 10 days from the date the candidate learns of the existence of the group the candidate files with the commission, on a form provided by the commission, an affidavit that the group is operating without the candidate's control; a group organized for more than one year preceding an election and endorsing candidates for more than one office or more than one political party is presumed not to be controlled by a candidate; however, a group that contributes more than 50 percent of its money to or on behalf of one candidate shall be considered to support only one candidate for purposes of AS 15.13.070 , whether or not control of the group has been disclaimed by the candidate;

(9) "immediate family" means the spouse, parents, children, including a stepchild and an adoptive child, and siblings of an individual;

(10) "independent expenditure" means an expenditure that is made without the direct or indirect consultation or cooperation with, or at the suggestion or the request of, or with the prior consent of, a candidate, a candidate's campaign treasurer or deputy campaign treasurer, or another person acting as a principal or agent of the candidate;

(11) "individual" means a natural person;

(12) "issues communication" means a communication that

(A) directly or indirectly identifies a candidate; and

(B) addresses an issue of national, state, or local political importance and does not support or oppose a candidate for election to public office.

(13) "nongroup entity" means a person, other than an individual, that takes action the major purpose of which is to influence the outcome of an election, and that

(A) cannot participate in business activities;

(B) does not have shareholders who have a claim on corporate earnings; and

(C) is independent from the influence of business corporations.

(14) "person" has the meaning given in AS 01.10.060 , and includes a labor union, nongroup entity, and a group;

(15) "political party" means any group that is a political party under AS 15.60.010 and any subordinate unit of that group if, consistent with the rules or bylaws of the political party, the unit conducts or supports campaign operations in a municipality, neighborhood, house district, or precinct;

(16) "publicly funded entity" means a person, other than an individual, that receives half or more of the money on which it operates during a calendar year from government, including a public corporation (§ 24 ch 48 SLA 1996; am § 39 ch 21 SLA 2000; am §§25, 26 ch 1 SLA 2002; am § 7 ch 3 SLA 2002; am §§ 8, 9 ch 1 TSSLA 2002; am §§ 18, 19 ch 108 SLA 2003; am § 2 ch 90 SLA 2006)

Revisor's notes – Paragraph (13) was enacted as (12) and paragraphs (3), (5), (7), and (12) were enacted as (13) – (16). Renumbered in 2002 to retain alphabetical order.

Effect of amendments. – The 2000 amendment, effective April 28, 2000, substituted "house district" for "election district" in subparagraph (10)(B).

The first 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, added paragraph (13) and in paragraph (14) inserted ", nongroup entity."

The second 2002 amendment, effective April 16, 2002, in subparagraph (4)(b), in (I) inserted "political party, " and deleted ", but it does include professional services volunteered by individuals for which they ordinarily would be paid a fee or wage;" from the end; deleted former item (ii), which read "services provided by an accountant or other person to prepare reports and statements required by this chapter; redesignated former item (iii) as item (ii); added present items (iii) to (v); and made a stylistic change.

The third 2002 amendment, effective June 26, 2002, added subparagraph (6)(C) and paragraphs (3), (5), (7) and (12).

The 2003 amendment, effective September 14, 2003, rewrote paragraphs (7) and (15).

The 2006 amendment, effective October 11, 2006, added subparagraph (4)(B)(iv) and made related stylistic changes.

Opinions of attorney general. – The statutory limit under AS 15.13.070(a) is applicable to "control groups" under former AS 15.13.130. Exempting such groups from the contribution limit would seriously undermine the statute's primary purpose of deterring the buying of elections and undue influence of large contributors. June 15, 1987, Op. Att'y Gen.

NOTES TO DECISION

Constitutionality. – Under the First Amendment, former AS 15.13.400(3)(B)(i) was unconstitutional to the extend that it limited the volunteering of professional services by individuals, but the statute was constitutional as to the ban on the provision of volunteer services by corporations. Jacobus v. Alaska, 338 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2003).

Alaska's campaign finance law, AS 15.13.030 et seq., does not violate pro-life association's First Amendment rights because this section's definition of "electioneering communication" is not unconstitutionally vague or over broad either facially or as applied, and the reporting and disclosure provisions are reasonable and serve a significant state interest. Alaska Right to Life Comm.v. Miles, 441 F3d 773 (9th Cir. 2006).

Applied in Jacobus v. Alaska, 182 F. Supp. 2d 893 (D. Alaska 2001).

CITIZENS UNITED v. FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

No. 08–205. Argued March 24, 2009—Reargued September 9, 2009—Decided January 21, 2010

As amended by §203 of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), federal law prohibits corporations and unions from using their general treasury funds to make independent expenditures for speech that is an "electioneering communication" or for speech that expressly advocates the election or defeat of a candidate. 2 U. S. C. §441b. An electioneering communication is "any broadcast, cable, or satellite communication" that "refers to a clearly identified candidate for Federal office" and is made within 30 days of a primary election, §434(f)(3)(A), and that is "publicly distributed," 11 CFR §100.29(a)(2), which in "the case of a candidate for nomination for President . . . means" that the communication "[c]an be received by 50,000 or more persons in a State where a primary election . . . is being held within 30 days," §100.29(b)(3)(ii). Corporations and unions may establish a political action committee (PAC) for express advocacy or electioneering communications purposes. 2 U. S. C. §441b(b)(2). In McConnell v. Federal Election Comm'n, 540 U. S. 93, 203–209, this Court upheld limits on electioneering communications in a facial challenge, relying on the holding in Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U. S. 652, that political speech may be banned based on the speaker's corporate identity.

In January 2008, appellant Citizens United, a nonprofit corporation, released a documentary (hereinafter Hillary) critical of then-Senator Hillary Clinton, a candidate for her party's Presidential nomination. Anticipating that it would make Hillary available on cable television through video-on-demand within 30 days of primary elections, Citizens United produced television ads to run on broadcast and cable television. Concerned about possible civil and criminal penalties for violating §441b, it sought declaratory and injunctive relief, arguing that (1) §441b is unconstitutional as applied to Hillary; and (2) BCRA's disclaimer, disclosure, and reporting requirements, BCRA §§201 and 311, were unconstitutional as applied to Hillary and the ads. The District Court denied Citizens United a preliminary injunction and granted appellee Federal Election Commission (FEC) summary judgment.

Held:

1. Because the question whether §441b applies to Hillary cannot be resolved on other, narrower grounds without chilling political speech, this Court must consider the continuing effect of the speech suppression upheld in Austin. Pp. 5–20.

(a) Citizen United's narrower arguments—that Hillary is not an "electioneering communication" covered by §441b because it is not "publicly distributed" under 11 CFR §100.29(a)(2); that §441b may not be applied to Hillary under Federal Election Comm'n v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., 551 U. S. 449 (WRTL), which found §441b unconstitutional as applied to speech that was not "express advocacy or its functional equivalent," id., at 481 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.), determining that a communication "is the functional equivalent of express advocacy only if [it] is susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than as an appeal to vote for or against a specific candidate," id., at 469–470; that §441b should be invalidated as applied to movies shown through video-on-demand because this delivery system has a lower risk of distorting the political process than do television ads; and that there should be an exception to §441b's ban for nonprofit corporate political speech funded overwhelming by individuals—are not sustainable under a fair reading of the statute. Pp. 5–12.

(b) Thus, this case cannot be resolved on a narrower ground without chilling political speech, speech that is central to the First Amendment's meaning and purpose.. Citizens United did not waive this challenge to Austin when it stipulated to dismissing the facial challenge below, since (1) even if such a challenge could be waived, this Court may reconsider Austin and §441b's facial validity here because the District Court "passed upon" the issue, Lebron v. National Railroad Passenger Corporation, 513 U. S. 374, 379; (2) throughout the litigation, Citizens United has asserted a claim that the FEC has violated its right to free speech; and (3) the parties cannot enter into a stipulation that prevents the Court from considering remedies necessary to resolve a claim that has been preserved. Because Citizen United's narrower arguments are not sustainable, this Court must, in an exercise of its judicial responsibility, consider §441b's facial validity. Any other course would prolong the substantial, nationwide chilling effect caused by §441b's corporate expenditure ban. This conclusion is further supported by the following: (1) the uncertainty caused by the Government's litigating position; (2) substantial time would be required to clarify §441b's application on the points raised by the Government's position in order to avoid any chilling effect caused by an improper interpretation; and (3) because speech itself is of primary importance to the integrity of the election process, any speech arguably within the reach of rules created for regulating political speech is chilled. The regulatory scheme at issue may not be a prior restraint in the strict sense. However, given its complexity and the deference courts show to administrative determinations, a speaker wishing to avoid criminal liability threats and the heavy costs of defending against FEC enforcement must ask a governmental agency for prior permission to speak. The restrictions thus function as the equivalent of a prior restraint, giving the FEC power analogous to the type of government practices that the First Amendment was drawn to prohibit. The ongoing chill on speech makes it necessary to invoke the earlier precedents that a statute that chills speech can and must be invalidated where its facial invalidity has been demonstrated. Pp. 12–20.

2. Austin is overruled, and thus provides no basis for allowing the Government to limit corporate independent expenditures. Hence, §441b's restrictions on such expenditures are invalid and cannot be applied to Hillary. Given this conclusion, the part of McConnell that upheld BCRA §203's extension of §441b's restrictions on independent corporate expenditures is also overruled. Pp. 20–51.

(a) Although the First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech," §441b's prohibition on corporate independent expenditures is an outright ban on speech, backed by criminal sanctions. It is a ban notwithstanding the fact that a PAC created by a corporation can still speak, for a PAC is a separate association from the corporation. Because speech is an essential mechanism of democracy—it is the means to hold officials accountable to the people—political speech must prevail against laws that would suppress it by design or inadvertence. Laws burdening such speech are subject to strict scrutiny, which requires the Government to prove that the restriction "furthers a compelling interest and is narrowly tailored to achieve that interest." WRTL, 551 U. S., at 464. This language provides a sufficient framework for protecting the interests in this case. Premised on mistrust of governmental power, the First Amendment stands against attempts to disfavor certain subjects or viewpoints or to distinguish among different speakers, which may be a means to control content. The Government may also commit a constitutional wrong when by law it identifies certain preferred speakers. There is no basis for the proposition that, in the political speech context, the Government may impose restrictions on certain disfavored speakers. Both history and logic lead to this conclusion. Pp. 20–25.

(b) The Court has recognized that the First Amendment applies to corporations, e.g., First Nat. Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765, 778, n. 14, and extended this protection to the context of political speech, see, e.g., NAACP v. Button, 371 U. S. 415, 428–429. Addressing challenges to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, the Buckley Court upheld limits on direct contributions to candidates, 18 U. S. C. §608(b), recognizing a governmental interest in preventing quid pro quo corruption. 424 U. S., at 25–26. However, the Court invalidated §608(e)'s expenditure ban, which applied to individuals, corporations, and unions, because it "fail[ed] to serve any substantial governmental interest in stemming the reality or appearance of corruption in the electoral process," id., at 47–48. While Buckley did not consider a separate ban on corporate and union independent expenditures found in §610, had that provision been challenged in Buckley's wake, it could not have been squared with the precedent's reasoning and analysis. The Buckley Court did not invoke the overbreadth doctrine to suggest that §608(e)'s expenditure ban would have been constitutional had it applied to corporations and unions but not individuals. Notwithstanding this precedent, Congress soon recodified §610's corporate and union expenditure ban at 2 U. S. C. §441b, the provision at issue. Less than two years after Buckley, Bellotti reaffirmed the First Amendment principle that the Government lacks the power to restrict political speech based on the speaker's corporate identity. 435 U.S., at 784–785. Thus the law stood until Austin upheld a corporate independent expenditure restriction, bypassing Buckley and Bellotti by recognizing a new governmental interest in preventing "the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of [corporate] wealth . . . that have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas." 494 U. S., at 660. Pp. 25–32.

(c) This Court is confronted with conflicting lines of precedent: a pre-Austin line forbidding speech restrictions based on the speaker's corporate identity and a post-Austin line permitting them. Neither Austin's antidistortion rationale nor the Government's other justifications support §441b's restrictions. Pp. 32–47.

(1) The First Amendment prohibits Congress from fining or jailing citizens, or associations of citizens, for engaging in political speech, but Austin's antidistortion rationale would permit the Government to ban political speech because the speaker is an association with a corporate form. Political speech is "indispensable to decision-making in a democracy, and this is no less true because the speech comes from a corporation." Bellotti, supra, at 777 (footnote omitted). This protection is inconsistent with Austin's rationale, which is meant to prevent corporations from obtaining " 'an unfair advantage in the political marketplace' " by using " 'resources amassed in the economic marketplace.' " 494 U. S., at 659. First Amendment protections do not depend on the speaker's "financial ability to engage in public discussion." Buckley, supra, at 49. These conclusions were reaffirmed when the Court invalidated a BCRA provision that increased the cap on contributions to one candidate if the opponent made certain expenditures from personal funds. Davis v. Federal Election Comm'n, 554 U. S. ___, ___. Distinguishing wealthy individuals from corporations based on the latter's special advantages of, e.g., limited liability, does not suffice to allow laws prohibiting speech. It is irrelevant for First Amendment purposes that corporate funds may "have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas." Austin, supra, at 660. All speakers, including individuals and the media, use money amassed from the economic marketplace to fund their speech, and the First Amendment protects the resulting speech. Under the antidistortion rationale, Congress could also ban political speech of media corporations. Although currently exempt from §441b, they accumulate wealth with the help of their corporate form, may have aggregations of wealth, and may express views "hav[ing] little or no correlation to the public's support" for those views. Differential treatment of media corporations and other corporations cannot be squared with the First Amendment, and there is no support for the view that the Amendment's original meaning would permit suppressing media corporations' political speech. Austin interferes with the "open marketplace" of ideas protected by the First Amendment. New York State Bd. of Elections v. Lopez Torres, 552 U. S. 196, 208. Its censorship is vast in its reach, suppressing the speech of both for-profit and nonprofit, both small and large, corporations. Pp. 32–40.

(2) This reasoning also shows the invalidity of the Government's other arguments. It reasons that corporate political speech can be banned to prevent corruption or its appearance. The Buckley Court found this rationale "sufficiently important" to allow contribution limits but refused to extend that reasoning to expenditure limits, 424 U.S., at 25, and the Court does not do so here. While a single Bellotti footnote purported to leave the question open, 435 U. S., at 788, n. 26, this Court now concludes that independent expenditures, including those made by corporations, do not give rise to corruption or the appearance of corruption. That speakers may have influence over or access to elected officials does not mean that those officials are corrupt. And the appearance of influence or access will not cause the electorate to lose faith in this democracy. Caperton v. A. T. Massey Coal Co., 556 U. S. ___, distinguished. Pp. 40–45.

(3) The Government's asserted interest in protecting shareholders from being compelled to fund corporate speech, like the antidistortion rationale, would allow the Government to ban political speech even of media corporations. The statute is underinclusive; it only protects a dissenting shareholder's interests in certain media for 30 or 60 days before an election when such interests would be implicated in any media at any time. It is also overinclusive because it covers all corporations, including those with one shareholder. P. 46.

(4) Because §441b is not limited to corporations or associations created in foreign countries or funded predominantly by foreign shareholders, it would be overbroad even if the Court were to recognize a compelling governmental interest in limiting foreign influence over the Nation's political process. Pp. 46–47.

(d) The relevant factors in deciding whether to adhere to stare decisis, beyond workability—the precedent's antiquity, the reliance interests at stake, and whether the decision was well reasoned—counsel in favor of abandoning Austin, which itself contravened the precedents of Buckley and Bellotti. As already explained, Austin was not well reasoned. It is also undermined by experience since its announcement. Political speech is so ingrained in this country's culture that speakers find ways around campaign finance laws. Rapid changes in technology—and the creative dynamic inherent in the concept of free expression—counsel against upholding a law that restricts political speech in certain media or by certain speakers. In addition, no serious reliance issues are at stake. Thus, due consideration leads to the conclusion that Austin should be overruled. The Court returns to the principle established in Buckley and Bellotti that the Government may not suppress political speech based on the speaker's corporate identity. No sufficient governmental interest justifies limits on the political speech of nonprofit or for-profit corporations. Pp. 47–50.

3. BCRA §§201 and 311 are valid as applied to the ads for Hillary and to the movie itself. Pp. 50–57.

(a) Disclaimer and disclosure requirements may burden the ability to speak, but they "impose no ceiling on campaign-related activities," Buckley, 424 U. S., at 64, or "'"prevent anyone from speaking,"'" McConnell, supra, at 201. The Buckley Court explained that disclosure can be justified by a governmental interest in providing "the electorate with information" about election-related spending sources. The McConnell Court applied this interest in rejecting facial challenges to §§201 and 311. 540 U. S., at 196. However, the Court acknowledged that as-applied challenges would be available if a group could show a "'reasonable probability'" that disclosing its contributors' names would "'subject them to threats, harassment, or reprisals from either Government officials or private parties.'" Id., at 198. Pp. 50–52.

(b) The disclaimer and disclosure requirements are valid as applied to Citizens United's ads. They fall within BCRA's "electioneering communication" definition: They referred to then-Senator Clinton by name shortly before a primary and contained pejorative references to her candidacy. Section 311 disclaimers provide information to the electorate, McConnell, supra, at 196, and "insure that the voters are fully informed" about who is speaking, Buckley, supra, at 76. At the very least, they avoid confusion by making clear that the ads are not funded by a candidate or political party. Citizens United's arguments that §311 is underinclusive because it requires disclaimers for broadcast advertisements but not for print or Internet advertising and that §311 decreases the quantity and effectiveness of the group's speech were rejected in McConnell. This Court also rejects their contention that §201's disclosure requirements must be confined to speech that is the functional equivalent of express advocacy under WRTL's test for restrictions on independent expenditures, 551 U. S., at 469–476 (opinion of ROBERTS, C.J.). Disclosure is the less-restrictive alternative to more comprehensive speech regulations. Such requirements have been upheld in Buckley and McConnell. Citizens United's argument that no informational interest justifies applying §201 to its ads is similar to the argument this Court rejected with regard to disclaimers. Citizens United finally claims that disclosure requirements can chill donations by exposing donors to retaliation, but offers no evidence that its members face the type of threats, harassment, or reprisals that might make §201 unconstitutional as applied. Pp. 52–55.

(c) For these same reasons, this Court affirms the application of the §§201 and 311 disclaimer and disclosure requirements to Hillary. Pp. 55–56.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 08–205

CITIZENS UNITED, APPELLANT v. FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

[January 21, 2010]

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

Federal law prohibits corporations and unions from using their general treasury funds to make independent expenditures for speech defined as an "electioneering communication" or for speech expressly advocating the election or defeat of a candidate. 2 U. S. C. §441b. Limits on electioneering communications were upheld in McConnell v. Federal Election Comm'n, 540 U. S. 93, 203–209 (2003). The holding of McConnell rested to a large extent on an earlier case, Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U. S. 652 (1990). Austin had held that political speech may be banned based on the speaker's corporate identity.

In this case we are asked to reconsider Austin and, in effect, McConnell. It has been noted that "Austin was a significant departure from ancient First Amendment principles," Federal Election Comm'n v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., 551 U. S. 449, 490 (2007) (WRTL) (SCALIA, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). We agree with that conclusion and hold that stare decisis does not compel the continued acceptance of Austin. The Government may regulate corporate political speech through disclaimer and disclosure requirements, but it may not suppress that speech altogether. We turn to the case now before us.

I

Citizens United is a nonprofit corporation. It brought this action in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. A three-judge court later convened to hear the cause. The resulting judgment gives rise to this appeal.

Citizens United has an annual budget of about $12 million. Most of its funds are from donations by individuals; but, in addition, it accepts a small portion of its funds from for-profit corporations.

In January 2008, Citizens United released a film entitled Hillary: The Movie. We refer to the film as Hillary. It is a 90-minute documentary about then-Senator Hillary Clinton, who was a candidate in the Democratic Party's 2008 Presidential primary elections. Hillary mentions Senator Clinton by name and depicts interviews with political commentators and other persons, most of them quite critical of Senator Clinton. Hillary was released in theaters and on DVD, but Citizens United wanted to increase distribution by making it available through video-on-demand.

Video-on-demand allows digital cable subscribers to select programming from various menus, including movies, television shows, sports, news, and music. The viewer can watch the program at any time and can elect to rewind or pause the program. In December 2007, a cable company offered, for a payment of $1.2 million, to make Hillary available on a video-on-demand channel called "Elections '08." App. 255a–257a. Some video-on-demand services require viewers to pay a small fee to view a selected program, but here the proposal was to make Hillary available to viewers free of charge.

To implement the proposal, Citizens United was prepared to pay for the video-on-demand; and to promote the film, it produced two 10-second ads and one 30-second ad for Hillary. Each ad includes a short (and, in our view, pejorative) statement about Senator Clinton, followed by the name of the movie and the movie's Website address. Id., at 26a–27a. Citizens United desired to promote the video-on-demand offering by running advertisements on broadcast and cable television.

B

Before the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), federal law prohibited—and still does prohibit—corporations and unions from using general treasury funds to make direct contributions to candidates or independent expenditures that expressly advocate the election or defeat of a candidate, through any form of media, in connection with certain qualified federal elections. 2 U. S. C. §441b (2000 ed.); see McConnell, supra, at 204, and n. 87; Federal Election Comm'n v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc., 479 U. S. 238, 249 (1986) (MCFL). BCRA §203 amended §441b to prohibit any "electioneering communication" as well. 2 U. S. C. §441b(b)(2) (2006 ed.). An electioneering communication is defined as "any broadcast, cable, or satellite communication" that "refers to a clearly identified candidate for Federal office" and is made within 30 days of a primary or 60 days of a general election. §434(f)(3)(A). The Federal Election Commission's (FEC) regulations further define an electioneering communication as a communication that is "publicly distributed." 11 CFR §100.29(a)(2) (2009). "In the case of a candidate for nomination for President . . . publicly distributed means" that the communication "[c]an be received by 50,000 or more persons in a State where a primary election . . . is being held within 30 days." §100.29(b)(3)(ii). Corporations and unions are barred from using their general treasury funds for express advocacy or electioneering communications. They may establish, however, a "separate segregated fund" (known as a political action committee, or PAC) for these purposes. 2 U. S. C. §441b(b)(2). The moneys received by the segregated fund are limited to donations from stockholders and employees of the corporation or, in the case of unions, members of the union. Ibid.

C

Citizens United wanted to make Hillary available through video-on-demand within 30 days of the 2008 primary elections. It feared, however, that both the film and the ads would be covered by §441b's ban on corporate-funded independent expenditures, thus subjecting the corporation to civil and criminal penalties under §437g. In December 2007, Citizens United sought declaratory and injunctive relief against the FEC. It argued that (1) §441b is unconstitutional as applied to Hillary; and (2) BCRA's disclaimer and disclosure requirements, BCRA §§201 and 311, are unconstitutional as applied to Hillary and to the three ads for the movie.

The District Court denied Citizens United's motion for a preliminary injunction, 530 F. Supp. 2d 274 (DC 2008) (per curiam), and then granted the FEC's motion for summary judgment, App. 261a–262a. See id., at 261a ("Based on the reasoning of our prior opinion, we find that the [FEC] is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. See Citizen[s] United v. FEC, 530 F. Supp. 2d 274 (D.D.C. 2008) (denying Citizens United's request for a preliminary injunction)"). The court held that §441b was facially constitutional under McConnell, and that §441b was constitutional as applied to Hillary because it was "susceptible of no other interpretation than to inform the electorate that Senator Clinton is unfit for office, that the United States would be a dangerous place in a President Hillary Clinton world, and that viewers should vote against her." 530 F. Supp. 2d, at 279. The court also rejected Citizens United's challenge to BCRA's disclaimer and disclosure requirements. It noted that "the Supreme Court has written approvingly of disclosure provisions triggered by political speech even though the speech itself was constitutionally protected under the First Amendment." Id., at 281.

We noted probable jurisdiction. 555 U. S. ___ (2008). The case was reargued in this Court after the Court asked the parties to file supplemental briefs addressing whether we should overrule either or both Austin and the part of McConnell which addresses the facial validity of 2 U. S. C. §441b. See 557 U. S. ___ (2009).

II

Before considering whether Austin should be overruled, we first address whether Citizens United's claim that §441b cannot be applied to Hillary may be resolved on other, narrower grounds.

A

Citizens United contends that §441b does not cover Hillary, as a matter of statutory interpretation, because the film does not qualify as an "electioneering communication." §441b(b)(2). Citizens United raises this issue for the first time before us, but we consider the issue because "it was addressed by the court below." Lebron v. National Railroad Passenger Corporation, 513 U. S. 374, 379 (1995); see 530 F. Supp. 2d, at 277, n. 6. Under the definition of electioneering communication, the video-on-demand showing of Hillary on cable television would have been a "cable . . . communication" that "refer[red] to a clearly identified candidate for Federal office" and that was made within 30 days of a primary election. 2 U. S. C. §434(f)(3)(A)(i). Citizens United, however, argues that Hillary was not "publicly distributed," because a single video-on-demand transmission is sent only to a requesting cable converter box and each separate transmission, in most instances, will be seen by just one household—not 50,000 or more persons. 11 CFR §100.29(a)(2); see §100.29(b)(3)(ii).

This argument ignores the regulation's instruction on how to determine whether a cable transmission "[c]an be received by 50,000 or more persons." §100.29(b)(3)(ii). The regulation provides that the number of people who can receive a cable transmission is determined by the number of cable subscribers in the relevant area. §§100.29(b)(7)(i)(G), (ii). Here, Citizens United wanted to use a cable video-on-demand system that had 34.5 million subscribers nationwide. App. 256a. Thus, Hillary could have been received by 50,000 persons or more.

One amici brief asks us, alternatively, to construe the condition that the communication "[c]an be received by 50,000 or more persons," §100.29(b)(3)(ii)(A), to require "a plausible likelihood that the communication will be viewed by 50,000 or more potential voters"—as opposed to requiring only that the communication is "technologically capable" of being seen by that many people, Brief for Former Officials of the American Civil Liberties Union as Amici Curiae 5. Whether the population and demographic statistics in a proposed viewing area consisted of 50,000 registered voters—but not "infants, pre-teens, or otherwise electorally ineligible recipients"—would be a required determination, subject to judicial challenge and review, in any case where the issue was in doubt. Id., at 6.

In our view the statute cannot be saved by limiting the reach of 2 U. S. C. §441b through this suggested interpretation. In addition to the costs and burdens of litigation, this result would require a calculation as to the number of people a particular communication is likely to reach, with an inaccurate estimate potentially subjecting the speaker to criminal sanctions. The First Amendment does not permit laws that force speakers to retain a campaign finance attorney, conduct demographic marketing research, or seek declaratory rulings before discussing the most salient political issues of our day. Prolix laws chill speech for the same reason that vague laws chill speech: People "of common intelligence must necessarily guess at [the law's] meaning and differ as to its application." Connally v. General Constr. Co., 269 U. S. 385, 391 (1926). The Government may not render a ban on political speech constitutional by carving out a limited exemption through an amorphous regulatory interpretation. We must reject the approach suggested by the amici. Section 441b covers Hillary.

B

Citizens United next argues that §441b may not be applied to Hillary under the approach taken in WRTL. McConnell decided that §441b(b)(2)'s definition of an "electioneering communication" was facially constitutional insofar as it restricted speech that was "the functional equivalent of express advocacy" for or against a specific candidate. 540 U. S., at 206. WRTL then found an unconstitutional application of §441b where the speech was not "express advocacy or its functional equivalent." 551 U. S., at 481 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.). As explained by THE CHIEF JUSTICE's controlling opinion in WRTL, the functional-equivalent test is objective: "a court should find that [a communication] is the functional equivalent of express advocacy only if [it] is susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than as an appeal to vote for or against a specific candidate." Id., at 469–470.

Under this test, Hillary is equivalent to express advocacy. The movie, in essence, is a feature-length negative advertisement that urges viewers to vote against Senator

Clinton for President. In light of historical footage, interviews with persons critical of her, and voiceover narration, the film would be understood by most viewers as an extended criticism of Senator Clinton's character and her fitness for the office of the Presidency. The narrative may contain more suggestions and arguments than facts, but there is little doubt that the thesis of the film is that she is unfit for the Presidency. The movie concentrates on alleged wrongdoing during the Clinton administration, Senator Clinton's qualifications and fitness for office, and policies the commentators predict she would pursue if elected President. It calls Senator Clinton "Machiavellian," App. 64a, and asks whether she is "the most qualified to hit the ground running if elected President," id., at 88a. The narrator reminds viewers that "Americans have never been keen on dynasties" and that "a vote for Hillary is a vote to continue 20 years of a Bush or a Clinton in the White House," id., at 143a–144a.

Citizens United argues that Hillary is just "a documentary film that examines certain historical events." Brief for Appellant 35. We disagree. The movie's consistent emphasis is on the relevance of these events to Senator Clinton's candidacy for President. The narrator begins by asking "could [Senator Clinton] become the first female President in the history of the United States?" App. 35a. And the narrator reiterates the movie's message in his closing line: "Finally, before America decides on our next president, voters should need no reminders of . . . what's at stake—the well being and prosperity of our nation." Id., at 144a–145a.

As the District Court found, there is no reasonable interpretation of Hillary other than as an appeal to vote against Senator Clinton. Under the standard stated in McConnell and further elaborated in WRTL, the film qualifies as the functional equivalent of express advocacy.

Citizens United further contends that §441b should be invalidated as applied to movies shown through video-on-demand, arguing that this delivery system has a lower risk of distorting the political process than do television ads. Cf. McConnell, supra, at 207. On what we might call conventional television, advertising spots reach viewers who have chosen a channel or a program for reasons unrelated to the advertising. With video-on-demand, by contrast, the viewer selects a program after taking "a series of affirmative steps": subscribing to cable; navigating through various menus; and selecting the program. See Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U. S. 844, 867 (1997).

While some means of communication may be less effective than others at influencing the public in different contexts, any effort by the Judiciary to decide which means of communications are to be preferred for the particular type of message and speaker would raise questions as to the courts' own lawful authority. Substantial questions would arise if courts were to begin saying what means of speech should be preferred or disfavored. And in all events, those differentiations might soon prove to be irrelevant or outdated by technologies that are in rapid flux. See Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC, 512 U. S. 622, 639 (1994).

Courts, too, are bound by the First Amendment. We must decline to draw, and then redraw, constitutional lines based on the particular media or technology used to disseminate political speech from a particular speaker. It must be noted, moreover, that this undertaking would require substantial litigation over an extended time, all to interpret a law that beyond doubt discloses serious First Amendment flaws. The interpretive process itself would create an inevitable, pervasive, and serious risk of chilling protected speech pending the drawing of fine distinctions that, in the end, would themselves be questionable. First Amendment standards, however, "must give the benefit of any doubt to protecting rather than stifling speech." WRTL, 551 U. S., at 469 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.) (citing New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 269–270 (1964)).

D

Citizens United also asks us to carve out an exception to §441b's expenditure ban for nonprofit corporate political speech funded overwhelmingly by individuals. As an alternative to reconsidering Austin, the Government also seems to prefer this approach. This line of analysis, however, would be unavailing.

In MCFL, the Court found unconstitutional §441b's restrictions on corporate expenditures as applied to nonprofit corporations that were formed for the sole purpose of promoting political ideas, did not engage in business activities, and did not accept contributions from for-profit corporations or labor unions. 479 U. S., at 263–264; see also 11 CFR §114.10. BCRA's so-called Wellstone Amendment applied §441b's expenditure ban to all nonprofit corporations. See 2 U. S. C. §441b(c)(6); McConnell, 540 U. S., at 209. McConnell then interpreted the Wellstone Amendment to retain the MCFL exemption to §441b's expenditure prohibition. 540 U. S., at 211. Citizens United does not qualify for the MCFL exemption, however, since some funds used to make the movie were donations from for-profit corporations.

The Government suggests we could find BCRA's Wellstone Amendment unconstitutional, sever it from the statute, and hold that Citizens United's speech is exempt from §441b's ban under BCRA's Snowe-Jeffords Amendment, §441b(c)(2). See Tr. of Oral Arg. 37–38 (Sept. 9, 2009). The Snowe-Jeffords Amendment operates as a backup provision that only takes effect if the Wellstone Amendment is invalidated. See McConnell, supra, at 339 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). The Snowe-Jeffords Amendment would exempt from §441b's expenditure ban the political speech of certain nonprofit corporations if the speech were funded "exclusively" by individual donors and the funds were maintained in a segregated account. §441b(c)(2). Citizens United would not qualify for the Snowe-Jeffords exemption, under its terms as written, because Hillary was funded in part with donations from for-profit corporations.

Consequently, to hold for Citizens United on this argument, the Court would be required to revise the text of MCFL, sever BCRA's Wellstone Amendment, §441b(c)(6), and ignore the plain text of BCRA's Snowe-Jeffords Amendment, §441b(c)(2). If the Court decided to create a de minimis exception to MCFL or the Snowe-Jeffords Amendment, the result would be to allow for-profit corporate general treasury funds to be spent for independent expenditures that support candidates. There is no principled basis for doing this without rewriting Austin's holding that the Government can restrict corporate independent expenditures for political speech.

Though it is true that the Court should construe statutes as necessary to avoid constitutional questions, the series of steps suggested would be difficult to take in view of the language of the statute. In addition to those difficulties the Government's suggestion is troubling for still another reason. The Government does not say that it agrees with the interpretation it wants us to consider. See Supp. Brief for Appellee 3, n. 1 ("Some courts" have implied a de minimis exception, and "appellant would appear to be covered by these decisions"). Presumably it would find textual difficulties in this approach too. The Government, like any party, can make arguments in the alternative; but it ought to say if there is merit to an alternative proposal instead of merely suggesting it. This is especially true in the context of the First Amendment. As the Government stated, this case "would require a remand" to apply a de minimis standard. Tr. of Oral Arg. 39 (Sept. 9, 2009). Applying this standard would thus require case-by-case determinations. But archetypical political speech would be chilled in the meantime. "'First Amendment freedoms need breathing space to survive.'" WRTL, supra, at 468–469 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.) (quoting NAACP v. Button, 371 U. S. 415, 433 (1963)). We decline to adopt an interpretation that requires intricate case-by-case determinations to verify whether political speech is banned, especially if we are convinced that, in the end, this corporation has a constitutional right to speak on this subject.

E

As the foregoing analysis confirms, the Court cannot resolve this case on a narrower ground without chilling political speech, speech that is central to the meaning and purpose of the First Amendment. See Morse v. Frederick, 551 U. S. 393, 403 (2007). It is not judicial restraint to accept an unsound, narrow argument just so the Court can avoid another argument with broader implications. Indeed, a court would be remiss in performing its duties were it to accept an unsound principle merely to avoid the necessity of making a broader ruling. Here, the lack of a valid basis for an alternative ruling requires full consideration of the continuing effect of the speech suppression upheld in Austin.

Citizens United stipulated to dismissing count 5 of its complaint, which raised a facial challenge to §441b, even though count 3 raised an as-applied challenge. See App. 23a (count 3: "As applied to Hillary, [§441b] is unconstitutional under the First Amendment guarantees of free expression and association"). The Government argues that Citizens United waived its challenge to Austin by dismissing count 5. We disagree.

First, even if a party could somehow waive a facial challenge while preserving an as-applied challenge, that would not prevent the Court from reconsidering Austin or addressing the facial validity of §441b in this case. "Our practice 'permit[s] review of an issue not pressed [below] so long as it has been passed upon . . . .'" Lebron, 513 U. S., at 379 (quoting United States v. Williams, 504 U. S. 36, 41 (1992); first alteration in original). And here, the District Court addressed Citizens United's facial challenge. See 530 F. Supp. 2d, at 278 ("Citizens wants us to enjoin the operation of BCRA §203 as a facially unconstitutional burden on the First Amendment right to freedom of speech"). In rejecting the claim, it noted that it "would have to overrule McConnell" for Citizens United to prevail on its facial challenge and that "[o]nly the Supreme Court may overrule its decisions." Ibid. (citing Rodriguez de Quijas v. Shearson/American Express, Inc., 490 U. S. 477, 484 (1989)). The District Court did not provide much analysis regarding the facial challenge because it could not ignore the controlling Supreme Court decisions in Austin or McConnell. Even so, the District Court did "'pas[s] upon'" the issue. Lebron, supra, at 379. Furthermore, the District Court's later opinion, which granted the FEC summary judgment, was "[b]ased on the reasoning of [its] prior opinion," which included the discussion of the facial challenge. App. 261a (citing 530 F. Supp. 2d 274). After the District Court addressed the facial validity of the statute, Citizens United raised its challenge to Austin in this Court. See Brief for Appellant 30 ("Austin was wrongly decided and should be overruled"); id., at 30–32. In these circumstances, it is necessary to consider Citizens United's challenge to Austin and the facial validity of §441b's expenditure ban.

Second, throughout the litigation, Citizens United has asserted a claim that the FEC has violated its First Amendment right to free speech. All concede that this claim is properly before us. And "'[o]nce a federal claim is properly presented, a party can make any argument in support of that claim; parties are not limited to the precise arguments they made below.'" Lebron, supra, at 379 (quoting Yee v. Escondido, 503 U. S. 519, 534 (1992); alteration in original). Citizens United's argument that Austin should be overruled is "not a new claim." Lebron, 513 U. S., at 379. Rather, it is—at most—"a new argument to support what has been [a] consistent claim: that [the FEC] did not accord [Citizens United] the rights it was obliged to provide by the First Amendment." Ibid.

Third, the distinction between facial and as-applied challenges is not so well defined that it has some automatic effect or that it must always control the pleadings and disposition in every case involving a constitutional challenge. The distinction is both instructive and necessary, for it goes to the breadth of the remedy employed by the Court, not what must be pleaded in a complaint. See United States v. Treasury Employees, 513 U. S. 454, 477–478 (1995) (contrasting "a facial challenge" with "a narrower remedy"). The parties cannot enter into a stipulation that prevents the Court from considering certain remedies if those remedies are necessary to resolve a claim that has been preserved. Citizens United has preserved its First Amendment challenge to §441b as applied to the facts of its case; and given all the circumstances, we cannot easily address that issue without assuming a premise—the permissibility of restricting corporate political speech—that is itself in doubt. See Fallon, As-Applied and Facial Challenges and Third-Party Standing, 113 Harv. L. Rev. 1321, 1339 (2000) ("[O]nce a case is brought, no general categorical line bars a court from making broader pronouncements of invalidity in properly 'as-applied' cases"); id., at 1327–1328. As our request for supplemental briefing implied, Citizens United's claim implicates the validity of Austin, which in turn implicates the facial validity of §441b.

When the statute now at issue came before the Court in McConnell, both the majority and the dissenting opinions considered the question of its facial validity. The holding and validity of Austin were essential to the reasoning of the McConnell majority opinion, which upheld BCRA's extension of §441b. See 540 U. S., at 205 (quoting Austin, 494 U. S., at 660). McConnell permitted federal felony punishment for speech by all corporations, including nonprofit ones, that speak on prohibited subjects shortly before federal elections. See 540 U. S., at 203–209. Four Members of the McConnell Court would have overruled Austin, including Chief Justice Rehnquist, who had joined the Court's opinion in Austin but reconsidered that conclusion. See 540 U. S., at 256–262 (SCALIA, J., concurring in part, concurring in judgment in part, and dissenting in part); id., at 273–275 (THOMAS, J., concurring in part, concurring in result in part, concurring in judgment in part, and dissenting in part); id., at 322–338 (opinion of KENNEDY, J., joined by Rehnquist, C. J., and SCALIA, J.). That inquiry into the facial validity of the statute was facilitated by the extensive record, which was "over 100,000 pages" long, made in the three-judge District Court. McConnell v. Federal Election Comm'n, 251 F. Supp. 2d 176, 209 (DC 2003) (per curiam) (McConnell I). It is not the case, then, that the Court today is premature in interpreting §441b "'on the basis of [a] factually barebones recor[d].'" Washington State Grange v. Washington State Republican Party, 552 U. S. 442, 450 (2008) (quoting Sabri v. United States, 541 U. S. 600, 609 (2004)).

The McConnell majority considered whether the statute was facially invalid. An as-applied challenge was brought in Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. v. Federal Election Comm'n, 546 U. S. 410, 411–412 (2006) (per curiam), and the Court confirmed that the challenge could be maintained. Then, in WRTL, the controlling opinion of the Court not only entertained an as-applied challenge but also sustained it. Three Justices noted that they would continue to maintain the position that the record in McConnell demonstrated the invalidity of the Act on its face. 551 U. S., at 485–504 (opinion of SCALIA, J.). The controlling opinion in WRTL, which refrained from holding the statute invalid except as applied to the facts then before the Court, was a careful attempt to accept the essential elements of the Court's opinion in McConnell, while vindicating the First Amendment arguments made by the WRTL parties. 551 U. S., at 482 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.).

As noted above, Citizens United's narrower arguments are not sustainable under a fair reading of the statute. In the exercise of its judicial responsibility, it is necessary then for the Court to consider the facial validity of §441b. Any other course of decision would prolong the substantial, nation-wide chilling effect caused by §441b's prohibitions on corporate expenditures. Consideration of the facial validity of §441b is further supported by the following reasons.

First is the uncertainty caused by the litigating position of the Government. As discussed above, see Part II–D, supra, the Government suggests, as an alternative argument, that an as-applied challenge might have merit. This argument proceeds on the premise that the nonprofit corporation involved here may have received only de minimis donations from for-profit corporations and that some nonprofit corporations may be exempted from the operation of the statute. The Government also suggests that an as-applied challenge to §441b's ban on books may be successful, although it would defend §441b's ban as applied to almost every other form of media including pamphlets. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 65–66 (Sept. 9, 2009). The Government thus, by its own position, contributes to the uncertainty that §441b causes. When the Government holds out the possibility of ruling for Citizens United on a narrow ground yet refrains from adopting that position, the added uncertainty demonstrates the necessity to address the question of statutory validity.

Second, substantial time would be required to bring clarity to the application of the statutory provision on these points in order to avoid any chilling effect caused by some improper interpretation. See Part II–C, supra. It is well known that the public begins to concentrate on elections only in the weeks immediately before they are held. There are short timeframes in which speech can have influence. The need or relevance of the speech will often first be apparent at this stage in the campaign. The decision to speak is made in the heat of political campaigns, when speakers react to messages conveyed by others. A speaker's ability to engage in political speech that could have a chance of persuading voters is stifled if the speaker must first commence a protracted lawsuit. By the time the lawsuit concludes, the election will be over and the litigants in most cases will have neither the incentive nor, perhaps, the resources to carry on, even if they could establish that the case is not moot because the issue is "capable of repetition, yet evading review." WRTL, supra, at 462 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.) (citing Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U. S. 95, 109 (1983); Southern Pacific Terminal Co. v. ICC, 219 U. S. 498, 515 (1911)). Here, Citizens United decided to litigate its case to the end. Today, Citizens United finally learns, two years after the fact, whether it could have spoken during the 2008 Presidential primary—long after the opportunity to persuade primary voters has passed.

Third is the primary importance of speech itself to the integrity of the election process. As additional rules are created for regulating political speech, any speech arguably within their reach is chilled. See Part II–A, supra. Campaign finance regulations now impose "unique and complex rules" on "71 distinct entities." Brief for Seven Former Chairmen of FEC et al. as Amici Curiae 11–12. These entities are subject to separate rules for 33 different types of political speech. Id., at 14–15, n. 10. The FEC has adopted 568 pages of regulations, 1,278 pages of explanations and justifications for those regulations, and 1,771 advisory opinions since 1975. See id., at 6, n. 7. In fact, after this Court in WRTL adopted an objective "appeal to vote" test for determining whether a communication was the functional equivalent of express advocacy, 551 U. S., at 470 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.), the FEC adopted a two-part, 11-factor balancing test to implement WRTL's ruling. See 11 CFR §114.15; Brief for Wyoming Liberty Group et al. as Amici Curiae 17–27 (filed Jan. 15, 2009).

This regulatory scheme may not be a prior restraint on speech in the strict sense of that term, for prospective speakers are not compelled by law to seek an advisory opinion from the FEC before the speech takes place. Cf. Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U. S. 697, 712–713 (1931). As a practical matter, however, given the complexity of the regulations and the deference courts show to administrative determinations, a speaker who wants to avoid threats of criminal liability and the heavy costs of defending against FEC enforcement must ask a governmental agency for prior permission to speak. See 2 U. S. C. §437f; 11 CFR §112.1. These onerous restrictions thus function as the equivalent of prior restraint by giving the FEC power analogous to licensing laws implemented in 16th- and 17th-century England, laws and governmental practices of the sort that the First Amendment was drawn to prohibit. See Thomas v. Chicago Park Dist., 534 U. S. 316, 320 (2002); Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U. S. 444, 451–452 (1938); Near, supra, at 713–714. Because the FEC's "business is to censor, there inheres the danger that [it] may well be less responsive than a court—part of an independent branch of government—to the constitutionally protected interests in free expression." Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U. S. 51, 57–58 (1965). When the FEC issues advisory opinions that prohibit speech, "[m]any persons, rather than undertake the considerable burden (and sometimes risk) of vindicating their rights through case-by-case litigation, will choose simply to abstain from protected speech—harming not only themselves but society as a whole, which is deprived of an uninhibited marketplace of ideas." Virginia v. Hicks, 539 U. S. 113, 119 (2003) (citation omitted). Consequently, "the censor's determination may in practice be final." Freedman, supra, at 58.

This is precisely what WRTL sought to avoid. WRTL said that First Amendment standards "must eschew 'the open-ended rough-and-tumble of factors,' which 'invit[es] complex argument in a trial court and a virtually inevitable appeal.'" 551 U. S., at 469 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.) (quoting Jerome B. Grubart, Inc. v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 513 U. S. 527, 547 (1995); alteration in original). Yet, the FEC has created a regime that allows it to select what political speech is safe for public consumption by applying ambiguous tests. If parties want to avoid litigation and the possibility of civil and criminal penalties, they must either refrain from speaking or ask the FEC to issue an advisory opinion approving of the political speech in question. Government officials pore over each word of a text to see if, in their judgment, it accords with the 11-factor test they have promulgated. This is an unprecedented governmental intervention into the realm of speech.

The ongoing chill upon speech that is beyond all doubt protected makes it necessary in this case to invoke the earlier precedents that a statute which chills speech can and must be invalidated where its facial invalidity has been demonstrated. See WRTL, supra, at 482–483 (ALITO, J., concurring); Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88, 97–98 (1940). For these reasons we find it necessary to reconsider Austin.

III

The First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech." Laws enacted to control or suppress speech may operate at different points in the speech process. The following are just a few examples of restrictions that have been attempted at different stages of the speech process—all laws found to be invalid: restrictions requiring a permit at the outset, Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc. of N. Y., Inc. v. Village of Stratton, 536 U. S. 150, 153 (2002); imposing a burden by impounding proceeds on receipts or royalties, Simon & Schuster, Inc. v. Members of N. Y. State Crime Victims Bd., 502 U. S. 105, 108, 123 (1991); seeking to exact a cost after the speech occurs, New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S., at 267; and subjecting the speaker to criminal penalties, Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U. S. 444, 445 (1969) (per curiam).

The law before us is an outright ban, backed by criminal sanctions. Section 441b makes it a felony for all corporations—including nonprofit advocacy corporations—either to expressly advocate the election or defeat of candidates or to broadcast electioneering communications within 30 days of a primary election and 60 days of a general election. Thus, the following acts would all be felonies under §441b: The Sierra Club runs an ad, within the crucial phase of 60 days before the general election, that exhorts the public to disapprove of a Congressman who favors logging in national forests; the National Rifle Association publishes a book urging the public to vote for the challenger because the incumbent U. S. Senator supports a handgun ban; and the American Civil Liberties Union creates a Web site telling the public to vote for a Presidential candidate in light of that candidate's defense of free speech. These prohibitions are classic examples of censorship.

Section 441b is a ban on corporate speech notwithstanding the fact that a PAC created by a corporation can still speak. See McConnell, 540 U. S., at 330–333 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.). A PAC is a separate association from the corporation. So the PAC exemption from §441b's expenditure ban, §441b(b)(2), does not allow corporations to speak. Even if a PAC could somehow allow a corporation to speak—and it does not—the option to form PACs does not alleviate the First Amendment problems with §441b. PACs are burdensome alternatives; they are expensive to administer and subject to extensive regulations. For example, every PAC must appoint a treasurer, forward donations to the treasurer promptly, keep detailed records of the identities of the persons making donations, preserve receipts for three years, and file an organization statement and report changes to this information within 10 days. See id., at 330–332 (quoting MCFL, 479 U. S., at 253–254).

And that is just the beginning. PACs must file detailed monthly reports with the FEC, which are due at different times depending on the type of election that is about to occur:

> "'These reports must contain information regarding the amount of cash on hand; the total amount of receipts, detailed by 10 different categories; the identification of each political committee and candidate's authorized or affiliated committee making contributions, and any persons making loans, providing rebates, refunds, dividends, or interest or any other offset to operating expenditures in an aggregate amount over $200; the total amount of all disbursements, detailed by 12 different categories; the names of all authorized > or affiliated committees to whom expenditures aggregating over $200 have been made; persons to whom loan repayments or refunds have been made; the total sum of all contributions, operating expenses, outstanding debts and obligations, and the settlement terms of the retirement of any debt or obligation.'" 540 U. S., at 331–332 (quoting MCFL, supra, at 253–254).

PACs have to comply with these regulations just to speak. This might explain why fewer than 2,000 of the millions of corporations in this country have PACs. See Brief for Seven Former Chairmen of FEC et al. as Amici Curiae 11 (citing FEC, Summary of PAC Activity 1990–2006, online at http://www.fec.gov/press/press2007/20071009pac/sumhistory.pdf); IRS, Statistics of Income: 2006, Corporation Income Tax Returns 2 (2009) (hereinafter Statistics of Income) (5.8 million for-profit corporations filed 2006 tax returns). PACs, furthermore, must exist before they can speak. Given the onerous restrictions, a corporation may not be able to establish a PAC in time to make its views known regarding candidates and issues in a current campaign.

Section 441b's prohibition on corporate independent expenditures is thus a ban on speech. As a "restriction on the amount of money a person or group can spend on political communication during a campaign," that statute "necessarily reduces the quantity of expression by restricting the number of issues discussed, the depth of their exploration, and the size of the audience reached." Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U. S. 1, 19 (1976) (per curiam). Were the Court to uphold these restrictions, the Government could repress speech by silencing certain voices at any of the various points in the speech process. See McConnell, supra, at 251 (opinion of SCALIA, J.) (Government could repress speech by "attacking all levels of the production and dissemination of ideas," for "effective public communication requires the speaker to make use of the services of others"). If §441b applied to individuals, no one would believe that it is merely a time, place, or manner restriction on speech. Its purpose and effect are to silence entities whose voices the Government deems to be suspect.

Speech is an essential mechanism of democracy, for it is the means to hold officials accountable to the people. See Buckley, supra, at 14–15 ("In a republic where the people are sovereign, the ability of the citizenry to make informed choices among candidates for office is essential"). The right of citizens to inquire, to hear, to speak, and to use information to reach consensus is a precondition to enlightened self-government and a necessary means to protect it. The First Amendment "'has its fullest and most urgent application' to speech uttered during a campaign for political office." Eu v. San Francisco County Democratic Central Comm., 489 U. S. 214, 223 (1989) (quoting Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U. S. 265, 272 (1971)); see Buckley, supra, at 14 ("Discussion of public issues and debate on the qualifications of candidates are integral to the operation of the system of government established by our Constitution").

For these reasons, political speech must prevail against laws that would suppress it, whether by design or inadvertence. Laws that burden political speech are "subject to strict scrutiny," which requires the Government to prove that the restriction "furthers a compelling interest and is narrowly tailored to achieve that interest." WRTL, 551 U. S., at 464 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.). While it might be maintained that political speech simply cannot be banned or restricted as a categorical matter, see Simon & Schuster, 502 U. S., at 124 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in judgment), the quoted language from WRTL provides a sufficient framework for protecting the relevant First Amendment interests in this case. We shall employ it here.

Premised on mistrust of governmental power, the First Amendment stands against attempts to disfavor certain subjects or viewpoints. See, e.g., United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, Inc., 529 U. S. 803, 813 (2000) (striking down content-based restriction). Prohibited, too, are restrictions distinguishing among different speakers, allowing speech by some but not others. See First Nat. Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765, 784 (1978). As instruments to censor, these categories are interrelated: Speech restrictions based on the identity of the speaker are all too often simply a means to control content.

Quite apart from the purpose or effect of regulating content, moreover, the Government may commit a constitutional wrong when by law it identifies certain preferred speakers. By taking the right to speak from some and giving it to others, the Government deprives the disadvantaged person or class of the right to use speech to strive to establish worth, standing, and respect for the speaker's voice. The Government may not by these means deprive the public of the right and privilege to determine for itself what speech and speakers are worthy of consideration. The First Amendment protects speech and speaker, and the ideas that flow from each.

The Court has upheld a narrow class of speech restrictions that operate to the disadvantage of certain persons, but these rulings were based on an interest in allowing governmental entities to perform their functions. See, e.g., Bethel School Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U. S. 675, 683 (1986) (protecting the "function of public school education"); Jones v. North Carolina Prisoners' Labor Union, Inc., 433 U. S. 119, 129 (1977) (furthering "the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system" (internal quotation marks omitted)); Parker v. Levy, 417 U. S. 733, 759 (1974) (ensuring "the capacity of the Government to discharge its [military] responsibilities" (internal quotation marks omitted)); Civil Service Comm'n v. Letter Carriers, 413 U. S. 548, 557 (1973) ("[F]ederal service should depend upon meritorious performance rather than political service"). The corporate independent expenditures at issue in this case, however, would not interfere with governmental functions, so these cases are inapposite. These precedents stand only for the proposition that there are certain governmental functions that cannot operate without some restrictions on particular kinds of speech. By contrast, it is inherent in the nature of the political process that voters must be free to obtain information from diverse sources in order to determine how to cast their votes. At least before Austin, the Court had not allowed the exclusion of a class of speakers from the general public dialogue.

We find no basis for the proposition that, in the context of political speech, the Government may impose restrictions on certain disfavored speakers. Both history and logic lead us to this conclusion.

The Court has recognized that First Amendment protection extends to corporations. Bellotti, supra, at 778, n. 14 (citing Linmark Associates, Inc. v. Willingboro, 431 U. S. 85 (1977); Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 424 U. S. 448 (1976); Doran v. Salem Inn, Inc., 422 U. S. 922 (1975); Southeastern Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U. S. 546 (1975); Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U. S. 469 (1975); Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U. S. 241 (1974); New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U. S. 713 (1971) (per curiam); Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U. S. 374 (1967); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254; Kingsley Int'l Pictures Corp. v. Regents of Univ. of N. Y., 360 U. S. 684 (1959); Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495 (1952)); see, e.g., Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC, 520 U. S. 180 (1997); Denver Area Ed. Telecommunications Consortium, Inc. v. FCC, 518 U. S. 727 (1996); Turner, 512 U. S. 622; Simon & Schuster, 502 U. S. 105; Sable Communications of Cal., Inc. v. FCC, 492 U. S. 115 (1989); Florida Star v. B. J. F., 491 U. S. 524 (1989); Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U. S. 767 (1986); Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia, 435 U. S. 829 (1978); Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc., 427 U. S. 50 (1976); Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U. S. 323 (1974); Greenbelt Cooperative Publishing Assn., Inc. v. Bresler, 398 U. S. 6 (1970).

This protection has been extended by explicit holdings to the context of political speech. See, e.g., Button, 371 U. S., at 428–429; Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U. S. 233, 244 (1936). Under the rationale of these precedents, political speech does not lose First Amendment protection "simply because its source is a corporation." Bellotti, supra, at 784; see Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. Public Util. Comm'n of Cal., 475 U. S. 1, 8 (1986) (plurality opinion) ("The identity of the speaker is not decisive in determining whether speech is protected. Corporations and other associations, like individuals, contribute to the 'discussion, debate, and the dissemination of information and ideas' that the First Amendment seeks to foster" (quoting Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 783)). The Court has thus rejected the argument that political speech of corporations or other associations should be treated differently under the First Amendment simply because such associations are not "natural persons." Id., at 776; see id., at 780, n. 16. Cf. id., at 828 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

At least since the latter part of the 19th century, the laws of some States and of the United States imposed a ban on corporate direct contributions to candidates. See B. Smith, Unfree Speech: The Folly of Campaign Finance Reform 23 (2001). Yet not until 1947 did Congress first prohibit independent expenditures by corporations and labor unions in §304 of the Labor Management Relations Act 1947, 61 Stat. 159 (codified at 2 U. S. C. §251 (1946 ed., Supp. I)). In passing this Act Congress overrode the veto of President Truman, who warned that the expenditure ban was a "dangerous intrusion on free speech." Message from the President of the United States, H. R. Doc. No. 334, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., 9 (1947).

For almost three decades thereafter, the Court did not reach the question whether restrictions on corporate and union expenditures are constitutional. See WRTL, 551 U. S., at 502 (opinion of SCALIA, J.). The question was in the background of United States v. CIO, 335 U. S. 106 (1948). There, a labor union endorsed a congressional candidate in its weekly periodical. The Court stated that "the gravest doubt would arise in our minds as to [the federal expenditure prohibition's] constitutionality" if it were construed to suppress that writing. Id., at 121. The Court engaged in statutory interpretation and found the statute did not cover the publication. Id., at 121–122, and n. 20. Four Justices, however, said they would reach the constitutional question and invalidate the Labor Management Relations Act's expenditure ban. Id., at 155 (Rutledge, J., joined by Black, Douglas, and Murphy, JJ., concurring in result). The concurrence explained that any "'undue influence'" generated by a speaker's "large expenditures" was outweighed "by the loss for democratic processes resulting from the restrictions upon free and full public discussion." Id., at 143.

In United States v. Automobile Workers, 352 U. S. 567 (1957), the Court again encountered the independent expenditure ban, which had been recodified at 18 U. S. C. §610 (1952 ed.). See 62 Stat. 723–724. After holding only that a union television broadcast that endorsed candidates was covered by the statute, the Court "[r]efus[ed] to anticipate constitutional questions" and remanded for the trial to proceed. 352 U. S., at 591. Three Justices dissented, arguing that the Court should have reached the constitutional question and that the ban on independent expenditures was unconstitutional:

> "Under our Constitution it is We The People who are sovereign. The people have the final say. The legislators are their spokesmen. The people determine through their votes the destiny of the nation. It is therefore important—vitally important—that all channels of communications be open to them during every election, that no point of view be restrained or barred, and that the people have access to the views of every group in the community." Id., at 593 (opinion of Douglas, J., joined by Warren, C. J., and Black, J.).

The dissent concluded that deeming a particular group "too powerful" was not a "justificatio[n] for withholding First Amendment rights from any group—labor or corporate." Id., at 597. The Court did not get another opportunity to consider the constitutional question in that case; for after a remand, a jury found the defendants not guilty. See Hayward, Revisiting the Fable of Reform, 45 Harv. J. Legis. 421, 463 (2008).

Later, in Pipefitters v. United States, 407 U. S. 385, 400–401 (1972), the Court reversed a conviction for expenditure of union funds for political speech—again without reaching the constitutional question. The Court would not resolve that question for another four years.

In Buckley, 424 U. S. 1, the Court addressed various challenges to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (FECA) as amended in 1974. These amendments created 18 U. S. C. §608(e) (1970 ed., Supp. V), see 88 Stat. 1265, an independent expenditure ban separate from §610 that applied to individuals as well as corporations and labor unions, Buckley, 424 U. S., at 23, 39, and n. 45.

Before addressing the constitutionality of §608(e)'s independent expenditure ban, Buckley first upheld §608(b), FECA's limits on direct contributions to candidates. The Buckley Court recognized a "sufficiently important" governmental interest in "the prevention of corruption and the appearance of corruption." Id., at 25; see id., at 26. This followed from the Court's concern that large contributions could be given "to secure a political quid pro quo." Ibid.

The Buckley Court explained that the potential for quid pro quo corruption distinguished direct contributions to candidates from independent expenditures. The Court emphasized that "the independent expenditure ceiling . . . fails to serve any substantial governmental interest in stemming the reality or appearance of corruption in the electoral process," id., at 47–48, because "[t]he absence of prearrangement and coordination . . . alleviates the danger that expenditures will be given as a quid pro quo for improper commitments from the candidate," id., at 47. Buckley invalidated §608(e)'s restrictions on independent expenditures, with only one Justice dissenting. See Federal Election Comm'n v. National Conservative Political Action Comm., 470 U. S. 480, 491, n. 3 (1985) (NCPAC).

Buckley did not consider §610's separate ban on corporate and union independent expenditures, the prohibition that had also been in the background in CIO, Automobile Workers, and Pipefitters. Had §610 been challenged in the wake of Buckley, however, it could not have been squared with the reasoning and analysis of that precedent. See WRTL, supra, at 487 (opinion of SCALIA, J.) ("Buckley might well have been the last word on limitations on independent expenditures"); Austin, 494 U. S., at 683 (SCALIA, J., dissenting). The expenditure ban invalidated in Buckley, §608(e), applied to corporations and unions, 424 U. S., at 23, 39, n. 45; and some of the prevailing plaintiffs in Buckley were corporations, id., at 8. The Buckley Court did not invoke the First Amendment's overbreadth doctrine, see Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U. S. 601, 615 (1973), to suggest that §608(e)'s expenditure ban would have been constitutional if it had applied only to corporations and not to individuals, 424 U. S., at 50. Buckley cited with approval the Automobile Workers dissent, which argued that §610 was unconstitutional. 424 U. S., at 43 (citing 352 U. S., at 595–596 (opinion of Douglas, J.)).

Notwithstanding this precedent, Congress recodified §610's corporate and union expenditure ban at 2 U. S. C. §441b four months after Buckley was decided. See 90 Stat. 490. Section 441b is the independent expenditure restriction challenged here.

Less than two years after Buckley, Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765, reaffirmed the First Amendment principle that the Government cannot restrict political speech based on the speaker's corporate identity. Bellotti could not have been clearer when it struck down a state-law prohibition on corporate independent expenditures related to referenda issues:

> "We thus find no support in the First . . . Amendment, or in the decisions of this Court, for the proposition that speech that otherwise would be within the protection of the First Amendment loses that protection simply because its source is a corporation that cannot prove, to the satisfaction of a court, a material effect on its business or property. . . . [That proposition] amounts to an impermissible legislative prohibition of speech based on the identity of the interests that spokesmen may represent in public debate over controversial issues and a requirement that the speaker have a sufficiently great interest in the subject to justify communication.

> "In the realm of protected speech, the legislature is constitutionally disqualified from dictating the subjects about which persons may speak and the speakers who may address a public issue." Id., at 784–785.

It is important to note that the reasoning and holding of Bellotti did not rest on the existence of a viewpoint-discriminatory statute. It rested on the principle that the Government lacks the power to ban corporations from speaking.

Bellotti did not address the constitutionality of the State's ban on corporate independent expenditures to support candidates. In our view, however, that restriction would have been unconstitutional under Bellotti's central principle: that the First Amendment does not allow political speech restrictions based on a speaker's corporate identity. See ibid.

Thus the law stood until Austin. Austin "uph[eld] a direct restriction on the independent expenditure of funds for political speech for the first time in [this Court's] history." 494 U. S., at 695 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting). There, the Michigan Chamber of Commerce sought to use general treasury funds to run a newspaper ad supporting a specific candidate. Michigan law, however, prohibited corporate independent expenditures that supported or opposed any candidate for state office. A violation of the law was punishable as a felony. The Court sustained the speech prohibition.

To bypass Buckley and Bellotti, the Austin Court identified a new governmental interest in limiting political speech: an antidistortion interest. Austin found a compelling governmental interest in preventing "the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth that are accumulated with the help of the corporate form and that have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas." 494 U. S., at 660; see id., at 659 (citing MCFL, 479 U. S., at 257; NCPAC, 470 U. S., at 500–501).

B

The Court is thus confronted with conflicting lines of precedent: a pre-Austin line that forbids restrictions on political speech based on the speaker's corporate identity and a post-Austin line that permits them. No case before Austin had held that Congress could prohibit independent expenditures for political speech based on the speaker's corporate identity. Before Austin Congress had enacted legislation for this purpose, and the Government urged the same proposition before this Court. See MCFL, supra, at 257 (FEC posited that Congress intended to "curb the political influence of 'those who exercise control over large aggregations of capital'" (quoting Automobile Workers, supra, at 585)); California Medical Assn. v. Federal Election Comm'n, 453 U. S. 182, 201 (1981) (Congress believed that "differing structures and purposes" of corporations and unions "may require different forms of regulation in order to protect the integrity of the electoral process"). In neither of these cases did the Court adopt the proposition.

In its defense of the corporate-speech restrictions in §441b, the Government notes the antidistortion rationale on which Austin and its progeny rest in part, yet it all but abandons reliance upon it. It argues instead that two other compelling interests support Austin's holding that corporate expenditure restrictions are constitutional: an anticorruption interest, see 494 U. S., at 678 (STEVENS, J., concurring), and a shareholder-protection interest, see id., at 674–675 (Brennan, J., concurring). We consider the three points in turn.

As for Austin's antidistortion rationale, the Government does little to defend it. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 45–48 (Sept. 9, 2009). And with good reason, for the rationale cannot support §441b.

If the First Amendment has any force, it prohibits Congress from fining or jailing citizens, or associations of citizens, for simply engaging in political speech. If the antidistortion rationale were to be accepted, however, it would permit Government to ban political speech simply because the speaker is an association that has taken on the corporate form. The Government contends that Austin permits it to ban corporate expenditures for almost all forms of communication stemming from a corporation. See Part II–E, supra; Tr. of Oral Arg. 66 (Sept. 9, 2009); see also id., at 26–31 (Mar. 24, 2009). If Austin were correct, the Government could prohibit a corporation from expressing political views in media beyond those presented here, such as by printing books. The Government responds "that the FEC has never applied this statute to a book," and if it did, "there would be quite [a] good as-applied challenge." Tr. of Oral Arg. 65 (Sept. 9, 2009). This troubling assertion of brooding governmental power cannot be reconciled with the confidence and stability in civic discourse that the First Amendment must secure.

Political speech is "indispensable to decisionmaking in a democracy, and this is no less true because the speech comes from a corporation rather than an individual." Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 777 (footnote omitted); see ibid. (the worth of speech "does not depend upon the identity of its source, whether corporation, association, union, or individual"); Buckley, 424 U. S., at 48–49 ("[T]he concept that government may restrict the speech of some elements of our society in order to enhance the relative voice of others is wholly foreign to the First Amendment"); Automobile Workers, 352 U. S., at 597 (Douglas, J., dissenting); CIO, 335 U. S., at 154–155 (Rutledge, J., concurring in result). This protection for speech is inconsistent with Austin's antidistortion rationale. Austin sought to defend the antidistortion rationale as a means to prevent corporations from obtaining "'an unfair advantage in the political marketplace'" by using "'resources amassed in the economic marketplace.'" 494 U. S., at 659 (quoting MCFL, supra, at 257). But Buckley rejected the premise that the Government has an interest "in equalizing the relative ability of individuals and groups to influence the outcome of elections." 424 U. S., at 48; see Bellotti, supra, at 791, n. 30. Buckley was specific in stating that "the skyrocketing cost of political campaigns" could not sustain the governmental prohibition. 424 U. S., at 26. The First Amendment's protections do not depend on the speaker's "financial ability to engage in public discussion." Id., at 49.

The Court reaffirmed these conclusions when it invalidated the BCRA provision that increased the cap on contributions to one candidate if the opponent made certain expenditures from personal funds. See Davis v. Federal Election Comm'n, 554 U. S. ___, ___ (2008) (slip op., at 16) ("Leveling electoral opportunities means making and implementing judgments about which strengths should be permitted to contribute to the outcome of an election. The Constitution, however, confers upon voters, not Congress, the power to choose the Members of the House of Representatives, Art. I, §2, and it is a dangerous business for Congress to use the election laws to influence the voters' choices"). The rule that political speech cannot be limited based on a speaker's wealth is a necessary consequence of the premise that the First Amendment generally prohibits the suppression of political speech based on the speaker's identity.

Either as support for its antidistortion rationale or as a further argument, the Austin majority undertook to distinguish wealthy individuals from corporations on the ground that "[s]tate law grants corporations special advantages—such as limited liability, perpetual life, and favorable treatment of the accumulation and distribution of assets." 494 U. S., at 658–659. This does not suffice, however, to allow laws prohibiting speech. "It is rudimentary that the State cannot exact as the price of those special advantages the forfeiture of First Amendment rights." Id., at 680 (SCALIA, J., dissenting).

It is irrelevant for purposes of the First Amendment that corporate funds may "have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas." Id., at 660 (majority opinion). All speakers, including individuals and the media, use money amassed from the economic marketplace to fund their speech. The First Amendment protects the resulting speech, even if it was enabled by economic transactions with persons or entities who disagree with the speaker's ideas. See id., at 707 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting) ("Many persons can trace their funds to corporations, if not in the form of donations, then in the form of dividends, interest, or salary").

Austin's antidistortion rationale would produce the dangerous, and unacceptable, consequence that Congress could ban political speech of media corporations. See McConnell, 540 U. S., at 283 (opinion of THOMAS, J.) ("The chilling endpoint of the Court's reasoning is not difficult to foresee: outright regulation of the press"). Cf. Tornillo, 418 U. S., at 250 (alleging the existence of "vast accumulations of unreviewable power in the modern media empires"). Media corporations are now exempt from §441b's ban on corporate expenditures. See 2 U. S. C. §§431(9)(B)(i), 434(f)(3)(B)(i). Yet media corporations accumulate wealth with the help of the corporate form, the largest media corporations have "immense aggregations of wealth," and the views expressed by media corporations often "have little or no correlation to the public's support" for those views. Austin, 494 U. S., at 660. Thus, under the Government's reasoning, wealthy media corporations could have their voices diminished to put them on par with other media entities. There is no precedent for permitting this under the First Amendment.

The media exemption discloses further difficulties with the law now under consideration. There is no precedent supporting laws that attempt to distinguish between corporations which are deemed to be exempt as media corporations and those which are not. "We have consistently rejected the proposition that the institutional press has any constitutional privilege beyond that of other speakers." Id., at 691 (SCALIA, J., dissenting) (citing Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 782); see Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc., 472 U. S. 749, 784 (1985) (Brennan, J., joined by Marshall, Blackmun, and STEVENS, JJ., dissenting); id., at 773 (White, J., concurring in judgment). With the advent of the Internet and the decline of print and broadcast media, moreover, the line between the media and others who wish to comment on political and social issues becomes far more blurred.

The law's exception for media corporations is, on its own terms, all but an admission of the invalidity of the antidistortion rationale. And the exemption results in a further, separate reason for finding this law invalid: Again by its own terms, the law exempts some corporations but covers others, even though both have the need or the motive to communicate their views. The exemption applies to media corporations owned or controlled by corporations that have diverse and substantial investments and participate in endeavors other than news. So even assuming the most doubtful proposition that a news organization has a right to speak when others do not, the exemption would allow a conglomerate that owns both a media business and an unrelated business to influence or control the media in order to advance its overall business interest. At the same time, some other corporation, with an identical business interest but no media outlet in its ownership structure, would be forbidden to speak or inform the public about the same issue. This differential treatment cannot be squared with the First Amendment.

There is simply no support for the view that the First Amendment, as originally understood, would permit the suppression of political speech by media corporations. The Framers may not have anticipated modern business and media corporations. See McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U. S. 334, 360–361 (1995) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment). Yet television networks and major newspapers owned by media corporations have become the most important means of mass communication in modern times. The First Amendment was certainly not understood to condone the suppression of political speech in society's most salient media. It was understood as a response to the repression of speech and the press that had existed in England and the heavy taxes on the press that were imposed in the colonies. See McConnell, 540 U. S., at 252–253 (opinion of SCALIA, J.); Grosjean, 297 U. S., at 245–248; Near, 283 U. S., at 713–714. The great debates between the Federalists and the Anti-Federalists over our founding document were published and expressed in the most important means of mass communication of that era—newspapers owned by individuals. See McIntyre, 514 U. S., at 341–343; id., at 367 (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment). At the founding, speech was open, comprehensive, and vital to society's definition of itself; there were no limits on the sources of speech and knowledge. See B. Bailyn, Ideological Origins of the American Revolution 5 (1967) ("Any number of people could join in such proliferating polemics, and rebuttals could come from all sides"); G. Wood, Creation of the American Republic 1776–1787, p. 6 (1969) ("[I]t is not surprising that the intellectual sources of [the Americans'] Revolutionary thought were profuse and various"). The Framers may have been unaware of certain types of speakers or forms of communication, but that does not mean that those speakers and media are entitled to less First Amendment protection than those types of speakers and media that provided the means of communicating political ideas when the Bill of Rights was adopted.

Austin interferes with the "open marketplace" of ideas protected by the First Amendment. New York State Bd. of Elections v. Lopez Torres, 552 U. S. 196, 208 (2008); see ibid. (ideas "may compete" in this marketplace "without government interference"); McConnell, supra, at 274 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). It permits the Government to ban the political speech of millions of associations of citizens. See Statistics of Income 2 (5.8 million for-profit corporations filed 2006 tax returns). Most of these are small corporations without large amounts of wealth. See Supp. Brief for Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America as Amicus Curiae 1, 3 (96% of the 3 million businesses that belong to the U. S. Chamber of Commerce have fewer than 100 employees); M. Keightley, Congressional Research Service Report for Congress, Business Organizational Choices: Taxation and Responses to Legislative Changes 10 (2009) (more than 75% of corporations whose income is taxed under federal law, see 26 U. S. C. §301, have less than $1 million in receipts per year). This fact belies the Government's argument that the statute is justified on the ground that it prevents the "distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth." Austin, 494 U. S., at 660. It is not even aimed at amassed wealth.

The censorship we now confront is vast in its reach. The Government has "muffle[d] the voices that best represent the most significant segments of the economy." McConnell, supra, at 257–258 (opinion of SCALIA, J.). And "the electorate [has been] deprived of information, knowledge and opinion vital to its function." CIO, 335 U. S., at 144 (Rutledge, J., concurring in result). By suppressing the speech of manifold corporations, both for-profit and non-profit, the Government prevents their voices and viewpoints from reaching the public and advising voters on which persons or entities are hostile to their interests. Factions will necessarily form in our Republic, but the remedy of "destroying the liberty" of some factions is "worse than the disease." The Federalist No. 10, p. 130 (B. Wright ed. 1961) (J. Madison). Factions should be checked by permitting them all to speak, see ibid., and by entrusting the people to judge what is true and what is false.

The purpose and effect of this law is to prevent corporations, including small and nonprofit corporations, from presenting both facts and opinions to the public. This makes Austin's antidistortion rationale all the more an aberration. "[T]he First Amendment protects the right of corporations to petition legislative and administrative bodies." Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 792, n. 31 (citing California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U. S. 508, 510–511 (1972); Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U. S. 127, 137–138 (1961)). Corporate executives and employees counsel Members of Congress and Presidential administrations on many issues, as a matter of routine and often in private. An amici brief filed on behalf of Montana and 25 other States notes that lobbying and corporate communications with elected officials occur on a regular basis. Brief for State of Montana et al. as Amici Curiae 19. When that phenomenon is coupled with §441b, the result is that smaller or nonprofit corporations cannot raise a voice to object when other corporations, including those with vast wealth, are cooperating with the Government. That cooperation may sometimes be voluntary, or it may be at the demand of a Government official who uses his or her authority, influence, and power to threaten corporations to support the Government's policies. Those kinds of interactions are often unknown and unseen. The speech that §441b forbids, though, is public, and all can judge its content and purpose. References to massive corporate treasuries should not mask the real operation of this law. Rhetoric ought not obscure reality.

Even if §441b's expenditure ban were constitutional, wealthy corporations could still lobby elected officials, although smaller corporations may not have the resources to do so. And wealthy individuals and unincorporated associations can spend unlimited amounts on independent expenditures. See, e.g., WRTL, 551 U. S., at 503–504 (opinion of SCALIA, J.) ("In the 2004 election cycle, a mere 24 individuals contributed an astounding total of $142 million to [26 U. S. C. §527 organizations]"). Yet certain disfavored associations of citizens—those that have taken on the corporate form—are penalized for engaging in the same political speech.

When Government seeks to use its full power, including the criminal law, to command where a person may get his or her information or what distrusted source he or she may not hear, it uses censorship to control thought. This is unlawful. The First Amendment confirms the freedom to think for ourselves.

What we have said also shows the invalidity of other arguments made by the Government. For the most part relinquishing the antidistortion rationale, the Government falls back on the argument that corporate political speech can be banned in order to prevent corruption or its appearance. In Buckley, the Court found this interest "sufficiently important" to allow limits on contributions but did not extend that reasoning to expenditure limits. 424 U. S., at 25. When Buckley examined an expenditure ban, it found "that the governmental interest in preventing corruption and the appearance of corruption [was] inadequate to justify [the ban] on independent expenditures." Id., at 45.

With regard to large direct contributions, Buckley reasoned that they could be given "to secure a political quid pro quo," id., at 26, and that "the scope of such pernicious practices can never be reliably ascertained," id., at 27. The practices Buckley noted would be covered by bribery laws, see, e.g., 18 U. S. C. §201, if a quid pro quo arrangement were proved. See Buckley, supra, at 27, and n. 28 (citing Buckley v. Valeo, 519 F. 2d 821, 839–840, and nn. 36–38 (CADC 1975) (en banc) (per curiam)). The Court, in consequence, has noted that restrictions on direct contributions are preventative, because few if any contributions to candidates will involve quid pro quo arrangements. MCFL, 479 U. S., at 260; NCPAC, 470 U. S., at 500; Federal Election Comm'n v. National Right to Work Comm., 459 U. S. 197, 210 (1982) (NRWC). The Buckley Court, nevertheless, sustained limits on direct contributions in order to ensure against the reality or appearance of corruption. That case did not extend this rationale to independent expenditures, and the Court does not do so here.

"The absence of prearrangement and coordination of an expenditure with the candidate or his agent not only undermines the value of the expenditure to the candidate, but also alleviates the danger that expenditures will be given as a quid pro quo for improper commitments from the candidate." Buckley, 424 U. S., at 47; see ibid. (independent expenditures have a "substantially diminished potential for abuse"). Limits on independent expenditures, such as §441b, have a chilling effect extending well beyond the Government's interest in preventing quid pro quo corruption. The anticorruption interest is not sufficient to displace the speech here in question. Indeed, 26 States do not restrict independent expenditures by for-profit corporations. The Government does not claim that these expenditures have corrupted the political process in those States. See Supp. Brief for Appellee 18, n. 3; Supp. Brief for Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America as Amicus Curiae 8–9, n. 5.

A single footnote in Bellotti purported to leave open the possibility that corporate independent expenditures could be shown to cause corruption. 435 U. S., at 788, n. 26. For the reasons explained above, we now conclude that independent expenditures, including those made by corporations, do not give rise to corruption or the appearance of corruption. Dicta in Bellotti's footnote suggested that "a corporation's right to speak on issues of general public interest implies no comparable right in the quite different context of participation in a political campaign for election to public office." Ibid. Citing the portion of Buckley that invalidated the federal independent expenditure ban, 424 U. S., at 46, and a law review student comment, Bellotti surmised that "Congress might well be able to demonstrate the existence of a danger of real or apparent corruption in independent expenditures by corporations to influence candidate elections." 435 U. S., at 788, n. 26. Buckley, however, struck down a ban on independent expenditures to support candidates that covered corporations, 424 U. S., at 23, 39, n. 45, and explained that "the distinction between discussion of issues and candidates and advocacy of election or defeat of candidates may often dissolve in practical application," id., at 42. Bellotti's dictum is thus supported only by a law review student comment, which misinterpreted Buckley. See Comment, The Regulation of Union Political Activity: Majority and Minority Rights and Remedies, 126 U. Pa. L. Rev. 386, 408 (1977) (suggesting that "corporations and labor unions should be held to different and more stringent standards than an individual or other associations under a regulatory scheme for campaign financing").

Seizing on this aside in Bellotti's footnote, the Court in NRWC did say there is a "sufficient" governmental interest in "ensur[ing] that substantial aggregations of wealth amassed" by corporations would not "be used to incur political debts from legislators who are aided by the contributions." 459 U. S., at 207–208 (citing Automobile Workers, 352 U. S., at 579); see 459 U. S., at 210, and n. 7; NCPAC, supra, at 500–501 (NRWC suggested a governmental interest in restricting "the influence of political war chests funneled through the corporate form"). NRWC, however, has little relevance here. NRWC decided no more than that a restriction on a corporation's ability to solicit funds for its segregated PAC, which made direct contributions to candidates, did not violate the First Amendment. 459 U. S., at 206. NRWC thus involved contribution limits, see NCPAC, supra, at 495–496, which, unlike limits on independent expenditures, have been an accepted means to prevent quid pro quo corruption, see McConnell, 540 U. S., at 136–138, and n. 40; MCFL, supra, at 259–260. Citizens United has not made direct contributions to candidates, and it has not suggested that the Court should reconsider whether contribution limits should be subjected to rigorous First Amendment scrutiny.

When Buckley identified a sufficiently important governmental interest in preventing corruption or the appearance of corruption, that interest was limited to quid pro quo corruption. See McConnell, supra, at 296–298 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.) (citing Buckley, supra, at 26–28, 30, 46–48); NCPAC, 470 U. S., at 497 ("The hallmark of corruption is the financial quid pro quo: dollars for political favors"); id., at 498. The fact that speakers may have influence over or access to elected officials does not mean that these officials are corrupt:

> "Favoritism and influence are not . . . avoidable in representative politics. It is in the nature of an elected representative to favor certain policies, and, by necessary corollary, to favor the voters and contributors who support those policies. It is well understood that a substantial and legitimate reason, if not the > only reason, to cast a vote for, or to make a contribution to, one candidate over another is that the candidate will respond by producing those political outcomes the supporter favors. Democracy is premised on responsiveness." McConnell, 540 U. S., at 297 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.).

Reliance on a "generic favoritism or influence theory . . . is at odds with standard First Amendment analyses because it is unbounded and susceptible to no limiting principle." Id., at 296.

The appearance of influence or access, furthermore, will not cause the electorate to lose faith in our democracy. By definition, an independent expenditure is political speech presented to the electorate that is not coordinated with a candidate. See Buckley, supra, at 46. The fact that a corporation, or any other speaker, is willing to spend money to try to persuade voters presupposes that the people have the ultimate influence over elected officials. This is inconsistent with any suggestion that the electorate will refuse "'to take part in democratic governance'" because of additional political speech made by a corporation or any other speaker. McConnell, supra, at 144 (quoting Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC, 528 U. S. 377, 390 (2000)).

Caperton v. A. T. Massey Coal Co., 556 U. S. ___ (2009), is not to the contrary. Caperton held that a judge was required to recuse himself "when a person with a personal stake in a particular case had a significant and disproportionate influence in placing the judge on the case by raising funds or directing the judge's election campaign when the case was pending or imminent." Id., at ___ (slip op., at 14). The remedy of recusal was based on a litigant's due process right to a fair trial before an unbiased judge. See Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U. S. 35, 46 (1975). Caperton's holding was limited to the rule that the judge must be recused, not that the litigant's political speech could be banned.

The McConnell record was "over 100,000 pages" long, McConnell I, 251 F. Supp. 2d, at 209, yet it "does not have any direct examples of votes being exchanged for . . . expenditures," id., at 560 (opinion of Kollar-Kotelly, J.). This confirms Buckley's reasoning that independent expenditures do not lead to, or create the appearance of, quid pro quo corruption. In fact, there is only scant evidence that independent expenditures even ingratiate. See 251 F. Supp. 2d, at 555–557 (opinion of Kollar-Kotelly, J.). Ingratiation and access, in any event, are not corruption. The BCRA record establishes that certain donations to political parties, called "soft money," were made to gain access to elected officials. McConnell, supra, at 125, 130–131, 146–152; see McConnell I, 251 F. Supp. 2d, at 471–481, 491–506 (opinion of Kollar-Kotelly, J.); id., at 842–843, 858–859 (opinion of Leon, J.). This case, however, is about independent expenditures, not soft money. When Congress finds that a problem exists, we must give that finding due deference; but Congress may not choose an unconstitutional remedy. If elected officials succumb to improper influences from independent expenditures; if they surrender their best judgment; and if they put expediency before principle, then surely there is cause for concern. We must give weight to attempts by Congress to seek to dispel either the appearance or the reality of these influences. The remedies enacted by law, however, must comply with the First Amendment; and, it is our law and our tradition that more speech, not less, is the governing rule. An outright ban on corporate political speech during the critical preelection period is not a permissible remedy. Here Congress has created categorical bans on speech that are asymmetrical to preventing quid pro quo corruption.

The Government contends further that corporate independent expenditures can be limited because of its interest in protecting dissenting shareholders from being compelled to fund corporate political speech. This asserted interest, like Austin's antidistortion rationale, would allow the Government to ban the political speech even of media corporations. See supra, at 35–37. Assume, for example, that a shareholder of a corporation that owns a newspaper disagrees with the political views the newspaper expresses. See Austin, 494 U. S., at 687 (SCALIA, J., dissenting). Under the Government's view, that potential disagreement could give the Government the authority to restrict the media corporation's political speech. The First Amendment does not allow that power. There is, furthermore, little evidence of abuse that cannot be corrected by shareholders "through the procedures of corporate democracy." Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 794; see id., at 794, n. 34.

Those reasons are sufficient to reject this shareholder-protection interest; and, moreover, the statute is both underinclusive and overinclusive. As to the first, if Congress had been seeking to protect dissenting shareholders, it would not have banned corporate speech in only certain media within 30 or 60 days before an election. A dissenting shareholder's interests would be implicated by speech in any media at any time. As to the second, the statute is overinclusive because it covers all corporations, including nonprofit corporations and for-profit corporations with only single shareholders. As to other corporations, the remedy is not to restrict speech but to consider and explore other regulatory mechanisms. The regulatory mechanism here, based on speech, contravenes the First Amendment.

We need not reach the question whether the Government has a compelling interest in preventing foreign individuals or associations from influencing our Nation's political process. Cf. 2 U. S. C. §441e (contribution and expenditure ban applied to "foreign national[s]"). Section 441b is not limited to corporations or associations that were created in foreign countries or funded predominantly by foreign shareholders. Section 441b therefore would be overbroad even if we assumed, arguendo, that the Government has a compelling interest in limiting foreign influence over our political process. See Broadrick, 413 U. S., at 615.

C

Our precedent is to be respected unless the most convincing of reasons demonstrates that adherence to it puts us on a course that is sure error. "Beyond workability, the relevant factors in deciding whether to adhere to the principle of stare decisis include the antiquity of the precedent, the reliance interests at stake, and of course whether the decision was well reasoned." Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U. S. ___, ___ (2009) (slip op., at 13) (overruling Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U. S. 625 (1986)). We have also examined whether "experience has pointed up the precedent's shortcomings." Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U. S. ___, ___ (2009) (slip op., at 8) (overruling Saucier v. Katz, 533 U. S. 194 (2001)).

These considerations counsel in favor of rejecting Austin, which itself contravened this Court's earlier precedents in Buckley and Bellotti. "This Court has not hesitated to overrule decisions offensive to the First Amendment." WRTL, 551 U. S., at 500 (opinion of SCALIA, J.). "[S]tare decisis is a principle of policy and not a mechanical formula of adherence to the latest decision." Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U. S. 106, 119 (1940).

For the reasons above, it must be concluded that Austin was not well reasoned. The Government defends Austin, relying almost entirely on "the quid pro quo interest, the corruption interest or the shareholder interest," and not Austin's expressed antidistortion rationale. Tr. of Oral Arg. 48 (Sept. 9, 2009); see id., at 45–46. When neither party defends the reasoning of a precedent, the principle of adhering to that precedent through stare decisis is diminished. Austin abandoned First Amendment principles, furthermore, by relying on language in some of our precedents that traces back to the Automobile Workers Court's flawed historical account of campaign finance laws, see Brief for Campaign Finance Scholars as Amici Curiae; Hayward, 45 Harv. J. Legis. 421; R. Mutch, Campaigns, Congress, and Courts 33–35, 153–157 (1988). See Austin, supra, at 659 (quoting MCFL, 479 U. S., at 257–258; NCPAC, 470 U. S., at 500–501); MCFL, supra, at 257 (quoting Automobile Workers, 352 U. S., at 585); NCPAC, supra, at 500 (quoting NRWC, 459 U. S., at 210); id., at 208 ("The history of the movement to regulate the political contributions and expenditures of corporations and labor unions is set forth in great detail in [Automobile Workers], supra, at 570–584, and we need only summarize the development here").

Austin is undermined by experience since its announcement. Political speech is so ingrained in our culture that speakers find ways to circumvent campaign finance laws. See, e.g., McConnell, 540 U. S., at 176–177 ("Given BCRA's tighter restrictions on the raising and spending of soft money, the incentives . . . to exploit [26 U. S. C. §527] organizations will only increase"). Our Nation's speech dynamic is changing, and informative voices should not have to circumvent onerous restrictions to exercise their First Amendment rights. Speakers have become adept at presenting citizens with sound bites, talking points, and scripted messages that dominate the 24-hour news cycle. Corporations, like individuals, do not have monolithic views. On certain topics corporations may possess valuable expertise, leaving them the best equipped to point out errors or fallacies in speech of all sorts, including the speech of candidates and elected officials.

Rapid changes in technology—and the creative dynamic inherent in the concept of free expression—counsel against upholding a law that restricts political speech in certain media or by certain speakers. See Part II–C, supra. Today, 30-second television ads may be the most effective way to convey a political message. See McConnell, supra, at 261 (opinion of SCALIA, J.). Soon, however, it may be that Internet sources, such as blogs and social networking Web sites, will provide citizens with significant information about political candidates and issues. Yet, §441b would seem to ban a blog post expressly advocating the election or defeat of a candidate if that blog were created with corporate funds. See 2 U. S. C. §441b(a); MCFL, supra, at 249. The First Amendment does not permit Congress to make these categorical distinctions based on the corporate identity of the speaker and the content of the political speech.

No serious reliance interests are at stake. As the Court stated in Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U. S. 808, 828 (1991), reliance interests are important considerations in property and contract cases, where parties may have acted in conformance with existing legal rules in order to conduct transactions. Here, though, parties have been prevented from acting—corporations have been banned from making independent expenditures. Legislatures may have enacted bans on corporate expenditures believing that those bans were constitutional. This is not a compelling interest for stare decisis. If it were, legislative acts could prevent us from overruling our own precedents, thereby interfering with our duty "to say what the law is." Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 177 (1803).

Due consideration leads to this conclusion: Austin, 494

U. S. 652, should be and now is overruled. We return to the principle established in Buckley and Bellotti that the Government may not suppress political speech on the basis of the speaker's corporate identity. No sufficient governmental interest justifies limits on the political speech of nonprofit or for-profit corporations.

D

Austin is overruled, so it provides no basis for allowing the Government to limit corporate independent expenditures. As the Government appears to concede, overruling Austin "effectively invalidate[s] not only BCRA Section 203, but also 2 U. S. C. 441b's prohibition on the use of corporate treasury funds for express advocacy." Brief for Appellee 33, n. 12. Section 441b's restrictions on corporate independent expenditures are therefore invalid and cannot be applied to Hillary.

Given our conclusion we are further required to overrule the part of McConnell that upheld BCRA §203's extension of §441b's restrictions on corporate independent expenditures. See 540 U. S., at 203–209. The McConnell Court relied on the antidistortion interest recognized in Austin to uphold a greater restriction on speech than the restriction upheld in Austin, see 540 U. S., at 205, and we have found this interest unconvincing and insufficient. This part of McConnell is now overruled.

IV

Citizens United next challenges BCRA's disclaimer and disclosure provisions as applied to Hillary and the three advertisements for the movie. Under BCRA §311, televised electioneering communications funded by anyone other than a candidate must include a disclaimer that "'_____ is responsible for the content of this advertising.'" 2 U. S. C. §441d(d)(2). The required statement must be made in a "clearly spoken manner," and displayed on the screen in a "clearly readable manner" for at least four seconds. Ibid. It must state that the communication "is not authorized by any candidate or candidate's committee"; it must also display the name and address (or Web site address) of the person or group that funded the advertisement. §441d(a)(3). Under BCRA §201, any person who spends more than $10,000 on electioneering communications within a calendar year must file a disclosure statement with the FEC. 2 U. S. C. §434(f)(1). That statement must identify the person making the expenditure, the amount of the expenditure, the election to which the communication was directed, and the names of certain contributors. §434(f)(2).

Disclaimer and disclosure requirements may burden the ability to speak, but they "impose no ceiling on campaign-related activities," Buckley, 424 U. S., at 64, and "do not prevent anyone from speaking," McConnell, supra, at 201 (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted). The Court has subjected these requirements to "exacting scrutiny," which requires a "substantial relation" between the disclosure requirement and a "sufficiently important" governmental interest. Buckley, supra, at 64, 66 (internal quotation marks omitted); see McConnell, supra, at 231–232.

In Buckley, the Court explained that disclosure could be justified based on a governmental interest in "provid[ing] the electorate with information" about the sources of election-related spending. 424 U. S., at 66. The McConnell Court applied this interest in rejecting facial challenges to BCRA §§201 and 311. 540 U. S., at 196. There was evidence in the record that independent groups were running election-related advertisements "'while hiding behind dubious and misleading names.'" Id., at 197 (quoting McConnell I, 251 F. Supp. 2d, at 237). The Court therefore upheld BCRA §§201 and 311 on the ground that they would help citizens "'make informed choices in the political marketplace.'" 540 U. S., at 197 (quoting McConnell I, supra, at 237); see 540 U. S., at 231.

Although both provisions were facially upheld, the Court acknowledged that as-applied challenges would be available if a group could show a "'reasonable probability'" that disclosure of its contributors' names "'will subject them to threats, harassment, or reprisals from either Government officials or private parties.'" Id., at 198 (quoting Buckley, supra, at 74).

For the reasons stated below, we find the statute valid as applied to the ads for the movie and to the movie itself.

B

Citizens United sought to broadcast one 30-second and two 10-second ads to promote Hillary. Under FEC regulations, a communication that "[p]roposes a commercial transaction" was not subject to 2 U. S. C. §441b's restrictions on corporate or union funding of electioneering communications. 11 CFR §114.15(b)(3)(ii). The regulations, however, do not exempt those communications from the disclaimer and disclosure requirements in BCRA §§201 and 311. See 72 Fed. Reg. 72901 (2007).

Citizens United argues that the disclaimer requirements in §311 are unconstitutional as applied to its ads. It contends that the governmental interest in providing information to the electorate does not justify requiring disclaimers for any commercial advertisements, including the ones at issue here. We disagree. The ads fall within BCRA's definition of an "electioneering communication": They referred to then-Senator Clinton by name shortly before a primary and contained pejorative references to her candidacy. See 530 F. Supp. 2d, at 276, nn. 2–4. The disclaimers required by §311 "provid[e] the electorate with information," McConnell, supra, at 196, and "insure that the voters are fully informed" about the person or group who is speaking, Buckley, supra, at 76; see also Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 792, n. 32 ("Identification of the source of advertising may be required as a means of disclosure, so that the people will be able to evaluate the arguments to which they are being subjected"). At the very least, the disclaimers avoid confusion by making clear that the ads are not funded by a candidate or political party.

Citizens United argues that §311 is underinclusive because it requires disclaimers for broadcast advertisements but not for print or Internet advertising. It asserts that §311 decreases both the quantity and effectiveness of the group's speech by forcing it to devote four seconds of each advertisement to the spoken disclaimer. We rejected these arguments in McConnell, supra, at 230–231. And we now adhere to that decision as it pertains to the disclosure provisions.

As a final point, Citizens United claims that, in any event, the disclosure requirements in §201 must be confined to speech that is the functional equivalent of express advocacy. The principal opinion in WRTL limited 2 U. S. C. §441b's restrictions on independent expenditures to express advocacy and its functional equivalent. 551 U. S., at 469–476 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.). Citizens United seeks to import a similar distinction into BCRA's disclosure requirements. We reject this contention.

The Court has explained that disclosure is a less restrictive alternative to more comprehensive regulations of speech. See, e.g., MCFL, 479 U. S., at 262. In Buckley, the Court upheld a disclosure requirement for independent expenditures even though it invalidated a provision that imposed a ceiling on those expenditures. 424 U. S., at 75–76. In McConnell, three Justices who would have found §441b to be unconstitutional nonetheless voted to uphold BCRA's disclosure and disclaimer requirements. 540 U. S., at 321 (opinion of KENNEDY, J., joined by Rehnquist, C. J., and SCALIA, J.). And the Court has upheld registration and disclosure requirements on lobbyists, even though Congress has no power to ban lobbying itself. United States v. Harriss, 347 U. S. 612, 625 (1954) (Congress "has merely provided for a modicum of information from those who for hire attempt to influence legislation or who collect or spend funds for that purpose"). For these reasons, we reject Citizens United's contention that the disclosure requirements must be limited to speech that is the functional equivalent of express advocacy.

Citizens United also disputes that an informational interest justifies the application of §201 to its ads, which only attempt to persuade viewers to see the film. Even if it disclosed the funding sources for the ads, Citizens United says, the information would not help viewers make informed choices in the political marketplace. This is similar to the argument rejected above with respect to disclaimers. Even if the ads only pertain to a commercial transaction, the public has an interest in knowing who is speaking about a candidate shortly before an election. Because the informational interest alone is sufficient to justify application of §201 to these ads, it is not necessary to consider the Government's other asserted interests.

Last, Citizens United argues that disclosure requirements can chill donations to an organization by exposing donors to retaliation. Some amici point to recent events in which donors to certain causes were blacklisted, threatened, or otherwise targeted for retaliation. See Brief for Institute for Justice as Amicus Curiae 13–16; Brief for Alliance Defense Fund as Amicus Curiae 16–22. In McConnell, the Court recognized that §201 would be unconstitutional as applied to an organization if there were a reasonable probability that the group's members would face threats, harassment, or reprisals if their names were disclosed. 540 U. S., at 198. The examples cited by amici are cause for concern. Citizens United, however, has offered no evidence that its members may face similar threats or reprisals. To the contrary, Citizens United has been disclosing its donors for years and has identified no instance of harassment or retaliation.

Shareholder objections raised through the procedures of corporate democracy, see Bellotti, supra, at 794, and n. 34, can be more effective today because modern technology makes disclosures rapid and informative. A campaign finance system that pairs corporate independent expenditures with effective disclosure has not existed before today. It must be noted, furthermore, that many of Congress' findings in passing BCRA were premised on a system without adequate disclosure. See McConnell, 540 U. S., at 128 ("[T]he public may not have been fully informed about the sponsorship of so-called issue ads"); id., at 196–197 (quoting McConnell I, 251 F. Supp. 2d, at 237). With the advent of the Internet, prompt disclosure of expenditures can provide shareholders and citizens with the information needed to hold corporations and elected officials accountable for their positions and supporters. Shareholders can determine whether their corporation's political speech advances the corporation's interest in making profits, and citizens can see whether elected officials are "'in the pocket' of so-called moneyed interests." 540 U. S., at 259 (opinion of SCALIA, J.); see MCFL, supra, at 261. The First Amendment protects political speech; and disclosure permits citizens and shareholders to react to the speech of corporate entities in a proper way. This transparency enables the electorate to make informed decisions and give proper weight to different speakers and messages.

C

For the same reasons we uphold the application of BCRA §§201 and 311 to the ads, we affirm their application to Hillary. We find no constitutional impediment to the application of BCRA's disclaimer and disclosure requirements to a movie broadcast via video-on-demand. And there has been no showing that, as applied in this case, these requirements would impose a chill on speech or expression.

V

When word concerning the plot of the movie Mr. Smith Goes to Washington reached the circles of Government, some officials sought, by persuasion, to discourage its distribution. See Smoodin, "Compulsory" Viewing for Every Citizen: Mr. Smith and the Rhetoric of Reception, 35 Cinema Journal 3, 19, and n. 52 (Winter 1996) (citing Mr. Smith Riles Washington, Time, Oct. 30, 1939, p. 49); Nugent, Capra's Capitol Offense, N. Y. Times, Oct. 29, 1939, p. X5. Under Austin, though, officials could have done more than discourage its distribution—they could have banned the film. After all, it, like Hillary, was speech funded by a corporation that was critical of Members of Congress. Mr. Smith Goes to Washington may be fiction and caricature; but fiction and caricature can be a powerful force.

Modern day movies, television comedies, or skits on Youtube.com might portray public officials or public policies in unflattering ways. Yet if a covered transmission during the blackout period creates the background for candidate endorsement or opposition, a felony occurs solely because a corporation, other than an exempt media corporation, has made the "purchase, payment, distribution, loan, advance, deposit, or gift of money or anything of value" in order to engage in political speech. 2 U. S. C. §431(9)(A)(i). Speech would be suppressed in the realm where its necessity is most evident: in the public dialogue preceding a real election. Governments are often hostile to speech, but under our law and our tradition it seems stranger than fiction for our Government to make this political speech a crime. Yet this is the statute's purpose and design.

Some members of the public might consider Hillary to be insightful and instructive; some might find it to be neither high art nor a fair discussion on how to set the Nation's course; still others simply might suspend judgment on these points but decide to think more about issues and candidates. Those choices and assessments, however, are not for the Government to make. "The First Amendment underwrites the freedom to experiment and to create in the realm of thought and speech. Citizens must be free to use new forms, and new forums, for the expression of ideas. The civic discourse belongs to the people, and the Government may not prescribe the means used to conduct it." McConnell, supra, at 341 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.).

The judgment of the District Court is reversed with respect to the constitutionality of 2 U. S. C. §441b's restrictions on corporate independent expenditures. The judgment is affirmed with respect to BCRA's disclaimer and disclosure requirements. The case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 08–205

CITIZENS UNITED, APPELLANT v. FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

[January 21, 2010]

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS, with whom JUSTICE ALITO joins, concurring.

The Government urges us in this case to uphold a direct prohibition on political speech. It asks us to embrace a theory of the First Amendment that would allow censorship not only of television and radio broadcasts, but of pamphlets, posters, the Internet, and virtually any other medium that corporations and unions might find useful in expressing their views on matters of public concern. Its theory, if accepted, would empower the Government to prohibit newspapers from running editorials or opinion pieces supporting or opposing candidates for office, so long as the newspapers were owned by corporations—as the major ones are. First Amendment rights could be confined to individuals, subverting the vibrant public discourse that is at the foundation of our democracy.

The Court properly rejects that theory, and I join its opinion in full. The First Amendment protects more than just the individual on a soapbox and the lonely pamphleteer. I write separately to address the important principles of judicial restraint and stare decisis implicated in this case.

I

Judging the constitutionality of an Act of Congress is

"the gravest and most delicate duty that this Court is called upon to perform." Blodgett v. Holden, 275 U. S. 142, 147–148 (1927) (Holmes, J., concurring). Because the stakes are so high, our standard practice is to refrain from addressing constitutional questions except when necessary to rule on particular claims before us. See Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U. S. 288, 346–348 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). This policy underlies both our willingness to construe ambiguous statutes to avoid constitutional problems and our practice "'never to formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied.'" United States v. Raines, 362 U. S. 17, 21 (1960) (quoting Liverpool, New York & Philadelphia S. S. Co. v. Commissioners of Emigration, 113 U. S. 33, 39 (1885)).

The majority and dissent are united in expressing allegiance to these principles. Ante, at 12; post, at 14 (STEVENS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). But I cannot agree with my dissenting colleagues on how these principles apply in this case.

The majority's step-by-step analysis accords with our standard practice of avoiding broad constitutional questions except when necessary to decide the case before us. The majority begins by addressing—and quite properly rejecting—Citizens United's statutory claim that 2 U. S. C. §441b does not actually cover its production and distribution of Hillary: The Movie (hereinafter Hillary). If there were a valid basis for deciding this statutory claim in Citizens United's favor (and thereby avoiding constitutional adjudication), it would be proper to do so. Indeed, that is precisely the approach the Court took just last Term in Northwest Austin Municipal Util. Dist. No. One v. Holder, 557 U. S. ___ (2009), when eight Members of the Court agreed to decide the case on statutory grounds instead of reaching the appellant's broader argument that the Voting Rights Act is unconstitutional.

It is only because the majority rejects Citizens United's statutory claim that it proceeds to consider the group's various constitutional arguments, beginning with its narrowest claim (that Hillary is not the functional equivalent of express advocacy) and proceeding to its broadest claim (that Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U. S. 652 (1990) should be overruled). This is the same order of operations followed by the controlling opinion in Federal Election Comm'n v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., 551 U. S. 449 (2007) (WRTL). There the appellant was able to prevail on its narrowest constitutional argument because its broadcast ads did not qualify as the functional equivalent of express advocacy; there was thus no need to go on to address the broader claim that McConnell v. Federal Election Comm'n, 540 U. S. 93 (2003), should be overruled. WRTL, 551 U. S., at 482; id., at 482–483 (ALITO, J., concurring). This case is different—not, as the dissent suggests, because the approach taken in WRTL has been deemed a "failure," post, at 11, but because, in the absence of any valid narrower ground of decision, there is no way to avoid Citizens United's broader constitutional argument.

The dissent advocates an approach to addressing Citizens United's claims that I find quite perplexing. It presumably agrees with the majority that Citizens United's narrower statutory and constitutional arguments lack merit—otherwise its conclusion that the group should lose this case would make no sense. Despite agreeing that these narrower arguments fail, however, the dissent argues that the majority should nonetheless latch on to one of them in order to avoid reaching the broader constitutional question of whether Austin remains good law. It even suggests that the Court's failure to adopt one of these concededly meritless arguments is a sign that the majority is not "serious about judicial restraint." Post, at 16.

This approach is based on a false premise: that our practice of avoiding unnecessary (and unnecessarily broad) constitutional holdings somehow trumps our obligation faithfully to interpret the law. It should go without saying, however, that we cannot embrace a narrow ground of decision simply because it is narrow; it must also be right. Thus while it is true that "[i]f it is not necessary to decide more, it is necessary not to decide more," post, at 14 (internal quotation marks omitted), sometimes it is necessary to decide more. There is a difference between judicial restraint and judicial abdication. When constitutional questions are "indispensably necessary" to resolving the case at hand, "the court must meet and decide them." Ex parte Randolph, 20 F. Cas. 242, 254 (No. 11, 558) (CC Va. 1833) (Marshall, C. J.).

Because it is necessary to reach Citizens United's broader argument that Austin should be overruled, the debate over whether to consider this claim on an as-applied or facial basis strikes me as largely beside the point. Citizens United has standing—it is being injured by the Government's enforcement of the Act. Citizens United has a constitutional claim—the Act violates the First Amendment, because it prohibits political speech. The Government has a defense—the Act may be enforced, consistent with the First Amendment, against corporations. Whether the claim or the defense prevails is the question before us.

Given the nature of that claim and defense, it makes no difference of any substance whether this case is resolved by invalidating the statute on its face or only as applied to Citizens United. Even if considered in as-applied terms, a holding in this case that the Act may not be applied to Citizens United—because corporations as well as individuals enjoy the pertinent First Amendment rights—would mean that any other corporation raising the same challenge would also win. Likewise, a conclusion that the Act may be applied to Citizens United—because it is constitutional to prohibit corporate political speech—would similarly govern future cases. Regardless whether we label Citizens United's claim a "facial" or "as-applied" challenge, the consequences of the Court's decision are the same.[1]

II

The text and purpose of the First Amendment point in the same direction: Congress may not prohibit political speech, even if the speaker is a corporation or union. What makes this case difficult is the need to confront our prior decision in Austin.

This is the first case in which we have been asked to overrule Austin, and thus it is also the first in which we have had reason to consider how much weight to give stare decisis in assessing its continued validity. The dissent erroneously declares that the Court "reaffirmed" Austin's holding in subsequent cases—namely, Federal Election Comm'n v. Beaumont, 539 U. S. 146 (2003); McConnell; and WRTL. Post, at 48–50. Not so. Not a single party in any of those cases asked us to overrule Austin, and as the dissent points out, post, at 4–6, the Court generally does not consider constitutional arguments that have not properly been raised. Austin's validity was therefore not directly at issue in the cases the dissent cites. The Court's unwillingness to overturn Austin in those cases cannot be understood as a reaffirmation of that decision.

Fidelity to precedent—the policy of stare decisis—is vital

---

[1]The dissent suggests that I am "much too quick" to reach this conclusion because I "ignore" Citizens United's narrower arguments. Post, at 13, n. 12. But in fact I do not ignore those arguments; on the contrary, I (and my colleagues in the majority) appropriately consider and reject them on their merits, before addressing Citizens United's broader claims. Supra, at 2–3; ante, at 5–12.

to the proper exercise of the judicial function. "Stare decisis is the preferred course because it promotes the evenhanded, predictable, and consistent development of legal principles, fosters reliance on judicial decisions, and contributes to the actual and perceived integrity of the judicial process." Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U. S. 808, 827 (1991). For these reasons, we have long recognized that departures from precedent are inappropriate in the absence of a "special justification." Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U. S. 203, 212 (1984).

At the same time, stare decisis is neither an "inexorable command," Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U. S. 558, 577 (2003), nor "a mechanical formula of adherence to the latest decision," Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U. S. 106, 119 (1940), especially in constitutional cases, see United States v. Scott, 437 U. S. 82, 101 (1978). If it were, segregation would be legal, minimum wage laws would be unconstitutional, and the Government could wiretap ordinary criminal suspects without first obtaining warrants. See Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 (1896), overruled by Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U. S. 483 (1954); Adkins v. Children's Hospital of D. C., 261 U. S. 525 (1923), overruled by West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U. S. 379 (1937); Olmstead v. United States, 277 U. S. 438 (1928), overruled by Katz v. United States, 389 U. S. 347 (1967). As the dissent properly notes, none of us has viewed stare decisis in such absolute terms. Post, at 17; see also, e.g., Randall v. Sorrell, 548 U. S. 230, 274–281 (2006) (STEVENS, J., dissenting) (urging the Court to overrule its invalidation of limits on independent expenditures on political speech in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U. S. 1 (1976) (per curiam)).

Stare decisis is instead a "principle of policy." Helvering, supra, at 119. When considering whether to reexamine a prior erroneous holding, we must balance the importance of having constitutional questions decided against the importance of having them decided right. As Justice

Jackson explained, this requires a "sober appraisal of the disadvantages of the innovation as well as those of the questioned case, a weighing of practical effects of one against the other." Jackson, Decisional Law and Stare Decisis, 30 A. B. A. J. 334 (1944).

In conducting this balancing, we must keep in mind that stare decisis is not an end in itself. It is instead "the means by which we ensure that the law will not merely change erratically, but will develop in a principled and intelligible fashion." Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U. S. 254, 265 (1986). Its greatest purpose is to serve a constitutional ideal—the rule of law. It follows that in the unusual circumstance when fidelity to any particular precedent does more to damage this constitutional ideal than to advance it, we must be more willing to depart from that precedent.

Thus, for example, if the precedent under consideration itself departed from the Court's jurisprudence, returning to the " 'intrinsically sounder' doctrine established in prior cases" may "better serv[e] the values of stare decisis than would following [the] more recently decided case inconsistent with the decisions that came before it." Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U. S. 200, 231 (1995); see also Helvering, supra, at 119; Randall, supra, at 274 (STEVENS, J., dissenting). Abrogating the errant precedent, rather than reaffirming or extending it, might better preserve the law's coherence and curtail the precedent's disruptive effects.

Likewise, if adherence to a precedent actually impedes the stable and orderly adjudication of future cases, its stare decisis effect is also diminished. This can happen in a number of circumstances, such as when the precedent's validity is so hotly contested that it cannot reliably function as a basis for decision in future cases, when its rationale threatens to upend our settled jurisprudence in related areas of law, and when the precedent's underlying reasoning has become so discredited that the Court cannot keep the precedent alive without jury-rigging new and different justifications to shore up the original mistake. See, e.g., Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U. S. ___, ___ (2009) (slip op., at 10); Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U. S. ___, ___ (2009) (slip op., at 13) (stare decisis does not control when adherence to the prior decision requires "fundamentally revising its theoretical basis").

B

These considerations weigh against retaining our decision in Austin. First, as the majority explains, that decision was an "aberration" insofar as it departed from the robust protections we had granted political speech in our earlier cases. Ante, at 39; see also Buckley, supra; First Nat. Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765 (1978). Austin undermined the careful line that Buckley drew to distinguish limits on contributions to candidates from limits on independent expenditures on speech. Buckley rejected the asserted government interest in regulating independent expenditures, concluding that "restrict[ing] the speech of some elements of our society in order to enhance the relative voice of others is wholly foreign to the First Amendment." 424 U. S., at 48–49; see also Bellotti, supra, at 790–791; Citizens Against Rent Control/Coalition for Fair Housing v. Berkeley, 454 U. S. 290, 295 (1981). Austin, however, allowed the Government to prohibit these same expenditures out of concern for "the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth" in the marketplace of ideas. 494 U. S., at 660. Austin's reasoning was—and remains—inconsistent with Buckley's explicit repudiation of any government interest in "equalizing the relative ability of individuals and groups to influence the outcome of elections." 424 U. S., at 48–49.

Austin was also inconsistent with Bellotti's clear rejection of the idea that "speech that otherwise would be within the protection of the First Amendment loses that protection simply because its source is a corporation." 435 U. S., at 784. The dissent correctly points out that Bellotti involved a referendum rather than a candidate election, and that Bellotti itself noted this factual distinction, id., at 788, n. 26; post, at 52. But this distinction does not explain why corporations may be subject to prohibitions on speech in candidate elections when individuals may not.

Second, the validity of Austin's rationale—itself adopted over two "spirited dissents," Payne, 501 U. S., at 829—has proved to be the consistent subject of dispute among Members of this Court ever since. See, e.g., WRTL, 551 U. S., at 483 (SCALIA, J., joined by KENNEDY and THOMAS, JJ., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); McConnell, 540 U. S., at 247, 264, 286 (opinions of SCALIA, THOMAS, and KENNEDY, JJ.); Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 163, 164 (opinions of KENNEDY and THOMAS, JJ.). The simple fact that one of our decisions remains controversial is, of course, insufficient to justify overruling it. But it does undermine the precedent's ability to contribute to the stable and orderly development of the law. In such circumstances, it is entirely appropriate for the Court—which in this case is squarely asked to reconsider Austin's validity for the first time—to address the matter with a greater willingness to consider new approaches capable of restoring our doctrine to sounder footing.

Third, the Austin decision is uniquely destabilizing because it threatens to subvert our Court's decisions even outside the particular context of corporate express advocacy. The First Amendment theory underlying Austin's holding is extraordinarily broad. Austin's logic would authorize government prohibition of political speech by a category of speakers in the name of equality—a point that most scholars acknowledge (and many celebrate), but that the dissent denies. Compare, e.g., Garrett, New Voices in Politics: Justice Marshall's Jurisprudence on Law and Politics, 52 Howard L. J. 655, 669 (2009) (Austin "has been understood by most commentators to be an opinion driven by equality considerations, albeit disguised in the language of 'political corruption' ") with post, at 74 (Austin's rationale "is manifestly not just an 'equalizing' ideal in disguise").[2]

It should not be surprising, then, that Members of the Court have relied on Austin's expansive logic to justify greater incursions on the First Amendment, even outside the original context of corporate advocacy on behalf of candidates running for office. See, e.g., Davis v. Federal Election Comm'n, 554 U. S. ___, ___ (2008) (slip op., at 7–8) (STEVENS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (relying on Austin and other cases to justify restrictions on campaign spending by individual candidates, explaining that "there is no reason that their logic—specifically, their concerns about the corrosive and distorting effects of wealth on our political process—is not equally applicable in the context of individual wealth"); McConnell, supra, at 203–209 (extending Austin beyond its original context to cover not only the "functional equivalent" of express advocacy by corporations, but also electioneering speech conducted by labor unions). The dissent in this case succumbs to the same temptation, suggesting that Austin justifies prohibiting corporate speech because such speech

Hasen, The Supreme Court and Election Law: Judging Equality from Baker v. Carr to Bush v. Gore 114 (2003) ("Austin represents the first and only case [before McConnell] in which a majority of the Court accepted, in deed if not in word, the equality rationale as a permissible state interest"); Strauss, Corruption, Equality, and Campaign Finance Reform, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 1369, 1369, and n. 1 (1994) (noting that Austin's rationale was based on equalizing political speech); Ashdown, Controlling Campaign Spending and the "New Corruption": Waiting for the Court, 44 Vand. L. Rev. 767, 781 (1991); Eule, Promoting Speaker Diversity: Austin and Metro Broadcasting, 1990 S. Ct. Rev. 105, 108–111.

might unduly influence "the market for legislation." Post, at 82. The dissent reads Austin to permit restrictions on corporate speech based on nothing more than the fact that the corporate form may help individuals coordinate and present their views more effectively. Post, at 82. A speaker's ability to persuade, however, provides no basis for government regulation of free and open public debate on what the laws should be.

If taken seriously, Austin's logic would apply most directly to newspapers and other media corporations. They have a more profound impact on public discourse than most other speakers. These corporate entities are, for the time being, not subject to §441b's otherwise generally applicable prohibitions on corporate political speech. But this is simply a matter of legislative grace. The fact that the law currently grants a favored position to media corporations is no reason to overlook the danger inherent in accepting a theory that would allow government restrictions on their political speech. See generally McConnell, supra, at 283–286 (THOMAS, J., concurring in part, concurring in judgment in part, and dissenting in part).

These readings of Austin do no more than carry that decision's reasoning to its logical endpoint. In doing so, they highlight the threat Austin poses to First Amendment rights generally, even outside its specific factual context of corporate express advocacy. Because Austin is so difficult to confine to its facts—and because its logic threatens to undermine our First Amendment jurisprudence and the nature of public discourse more broadly—the costs of giving it stare decisis effect are unusually high.

Finally and most importantly, the Government's own effort to defend Austin—or, more accurately, to defend something that is not quite Austin—underscores its weakness as a precedent of the Court. The Government concedes that Austin "is not the most lucid opinion," yet asks us to reaffirm its holding. Tr. of Oral Arg. 62 (Sept. 9, 2009). But while invoking stare decisis to support this position, the Government never once even mentions the compelling interest that Austin relied upon in the first place: the need to diminish "the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth that are accumulated with the help of the corporate form and that have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas." 494 U. S., at 660.

Instead of endorsing Austin on its own terms, the Government urges us to reaffirm Austin's specific holding on the basis of two new and potentially expansive interests—the need to prevent actual or apparent quid pro quo corruption, and the need to protect corporate shareholders. See Supp. Brief for Appellee 8–10, 12–13. Those interests may or may not support the result in Austin, but they were plainly not part of the reasoning on which Austin relied.

To its credit, the Government forthrightly concedes that Austin did not embrace either of the new rationales it now urges upon us. See, e.g., Supp. Brief for Appellee 11 ("The Court did not decide in Austin . . . whether the compelling interest in preventing actual or apparent corruption provides a constitutionally sufficient justification for prohibiting the use of corporate treasury funds for independent electioneering"); Tr. of Oral Arg. 45 (Sept. 9, 2009) ("Austin did not articulate what we believe to be the strongest compelling interest"); id., at 61 ("[The Court:] I take it we have never accepted your shareholder protection interest. This is a new argument. [The Government:] I think that that's fair"); id., at 64 ("[The Court:] In other words, you are asking us to uphold Austin on the basis of two arguments, two principles, two compelling interests we have never accepted in [the context of limits on political expenditures]. [The Government:] [I]n this particular context, fair enough").

To be clear: The Court in Austin nowhere relied upon the only arguments the Government now raises to support that decision. In fact, the only opinion in Austin endorsing the Government's argument based on the threat of quid pro quo corruption was JUSTICE STEVENS's concurrence. 494 U. S., at 678. The Court itself did not do so, despite the fact that the concurrence highlighted the argument. Moreover, the Court's only discussion of shareholder protection in Austin appeared in a section of the opinion that sought merely to distinguish Austin's facts from those of Federal Election Comm'n v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc., 479 U. S. 238 (1986). Austin, supra, at 663. Nowhere did Austin suggest that the goal of protecting shareholders is itself a compelling interest authorizing restrictions on First Amendment rights.

To the extent that the Government's case for reaffirming Austin depends on radically reconceptualizing its reasoning, that argument is at odds with itself. Stare decisis is a doctrine of preservation, not transformation. It counsels deference to past mistakes, but provides no justification for making new ones. There is therefore no basis for the Court to give precedential sway to reasoning that it has never accepted, simply because that reasoning happens to support a conclusion reached on different grounds that have since been abandoned or discredited.

Doing so would undermine the rule-of-law values that justify stare decisis in the first place. It would effectively license the Court to invent and adopt new principles of constitutional law solely for the purpose of rationalizing its past errors, without a proper analysis of whether those principles have merit on their own. This approach would allow the Court's past missteps to spawn future mistakes, undercutting the very rule-of-law values that stare decisis is designed to protect.

None of this is to say that the Government is barred from making new arguments to support the outcome in Austin. On the contrary, it is free to do so. And of course the Court is free to accept them. But the Government's new arguments must stand or fall on their own; they are not entitled to receive the special deference we accord to precedent. They are, as grounds to support Austin, literally *un*precedented. Moreover, to the extent the Government relies on new arguments—and declines to defend Austin on its own terms—we may reasonably infer that it lacks confidence in that decision's original justification.

Because continued adherence to Austin threatens to subvert the "principled and intelligible" development of our First Amendment jurisprudence, Vasquez, 474 U. S., at 265, I support the Court's determination to overrule that decision.

We have had two rounds of briefing in this case, two oral arguments, and 54 amicus briefs to help us carry out our obligation to decide the necessary constitutional questions according to law. We have also had the benefit of a comprehensive dissent that has helped ensure that the Court has considered all the relevant issues. This careful consideration convinces me that Congress violates the First Amendment when it decrees that some speakers may not engage in political speech at election time, when it matters most.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 08–205

CITIZENS UNITED, APPELLANT v. FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

[January 21, 2010]

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom JUSTICE ALITO joins, and with whom JUSTICE THOMAS joins in part, concurring.

I join the opinion of the Court.[1]

I write separately to address JUSTICE STEVENS' discussion of "Original Understandings," post, at 34 (opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part) (hereinafter referred to as the dissent). This section of the dissent purports to show that today's decision is not supported by the original understanding of the First Amendment. The dissent attempts this demonstration, however, in splendid isolation from the text of the First Amendment. It never shows why "the freedom of speech" that was the right of Englishmen did not include the freedom to speak in association with other individuals, including association in the corporate form. To be sure, in 1791 (as now) corporations could pursue only the objectives set forth in their charters; but the dissent provides no evidence that their speech in the pursuit of those objectives could be censored.

Instead of taking this straightforward approach to determining the Amendment's meaning, the dissent embarks on a detailed exploration of the Framers' views about the "role of corporations in society." Post, at 35. The Framers didn't like corporations, the dissent concludes, and therefore it follows (as night the day) that corporations had no rights of free speech. Of course the Framers' personal affection or disaffection for corporations is relevant only insofar as it can be thought to be reflected in the understood meaning of the text they enacted—not, as the dissent suggests, as a freestanding substitute for that text. But the dissent's distortion of proper analysis is even worse than that. Though faced with a constitutional text that makes no distinction between types of speakers, the dissent feels no necessity to provide even an isolated statement from the founding era to the effect that corporations are not covered, but places the burden on petitioners to bring forward statements showing that they are ("there is not a scintilla of evidence to support the notion that anyone believed [the First Amendment] would preclude regulatory distinctions based on the corporate form," post, at 34–35).

Despite the corporation-hating quotations the dissent has dredged up, it is far from clear that by the end of the 18th century corporations were despised. If so, how came there to be so many of them? The dissent's statement that there were few business corporations during the eighteenth century—"only a few hundred during all of the 18th century"—is misleading. Post, at 35, n. 53. There were approximately 335 charters issued to business corporations in the United States by the end of the 18th century.[2] See 2 J. Davis, Essays in the Earlier History of American Corporations 24 (1917) (reprint 2006) (hereinafter Davis). This was a "considerable extension of corporate enterprise in the field of business," Davis 8, and represented "unprecedented growth," id., at 309. Moreover, what seems like a small number by today's standards surely does not indicate the relative importance of corporations when the Nation was considerably smaller. As I have previously noted, "[b]y the end of the eighteenth century the corporation was a familiar figure in American economic life." McConnell v. Federal Election Comm'n, 540 U. S. 93, 256 (2003) (SCALIA, J., concurring in part, concurring in judgment in part, and dissenting in part) (quoting C. Cooke, Corporation Trust and Company 92 (1951) (hereinafter Cooke)).

[2]The dissent protests that 1791 rather than 1800 should be the relevant date, and that "[m]ore than half of the century's total business charters were issued between 1796 and 1800." Post, at 35, n. 53. I used 1800 only because the dissent did. But in any case, it is surely fanciful to think that a consensus of hostility towards corporations was transformed into general favor at some magical moment between 1791 and 1796.

Even if we thought it proper to apply the dissent's approach of excluding from First Amendment coverage what the Founders disliked, and even if we agreed that the Founders disliked founding-era corporations; modern corporations might not qualify for exclusion. Most of the Founders' resentment towards corporations was directed at the state-granted monopoly privileges that individually chartered corporations enjoyed.[3] Modern corporations do not have such privileges, and would probably have been favored by most of our enterprising Founders—excluding, perhaps, Thomas Jefferson and others favoring perpetuation of an agrarian society. Moreover, if the Founders' specific intent with respect to corporations is what matters, why does the dissent ignore the Founders' views about other legal entities that have more in common with modern business corporations than the founding-era corporations? At the time of the founding, religious, educational, and literary corporations were incorporated under general incorporation statutes, much as business corporations are today.[4] See Davis 16–17; R. Seavoy, Origins of the American Business Corporation, 1784–1855, p. 5 (1982); Cooke 94. There were also small unincorporated business associations, which some have argued were the "'true progenitors'" of today's business corporations. Friedman 200 (quoting S. Livermore, Early American Land Companies: Their Influence on Corporate Development 216 (1939)); see also Davis 33. Were all of these silently excluded from the protections of the First Amendment?

[3] "[P]eople in 1800 identified corporations with franchised monopolies." L. Friedman, A History of American Law 194 (2d ed. 1985) (hereinafter Friedman). "The chief cause for the changed popular attitude towards business corporations that marked the opening of the nineteenth century was the elimination of their inherent monopolistic character. This was accomplished primarily by an extension of the principle of free incorporation under general laws." 1 W. Fletcher, Cyclopedia of the Law of Corporations §2, p. 8 (rev. ed. 2006).

The lack of a textual exception for speech by corporations cannot be explained on the ground that such organizations did not exist or did not speak. To the contrary, colleges, towns and cities, religious institutions, and guilds had long been organized as corporations at common law and under the King's charter, see 1 W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 455–473 (1765); 1 S. Kyd, A Treatise on the Law of Corporations 1–32, 63 (1793) (reprinted 2006), and as I have discussed, the practice of incorporation only expanded in the United States. Both corporations and voluntary associations actively petitioned the Government and expressed their views in newspapers and pamphlets. For example: An antislavery Quaker corporation petitioned the First Congress, distributed pamphlets, and communicated through the press in 1790. W. diGiacomantonio, "For the Gratification of a Volunteering Society": Antislavery and Pressure Group

[4] At times (though not always) the dissent seems to exclude such non-"business corporations" from its denial of free speech rights. See post, at 37. Finding in a seemingly categorical text a distinction between the rights of business corporations and the rights of non-business corporations is even more imaginative than finding a distinction between the rights of all corporations and the rights of other associations.

Politics in the First Federal Congress, 15 J. Early Republic 169 (1995). The New York Sons of Liberty sent a circular to colonies farther south in 1766. P. Maier, From Resistance to Revolution 79–80 (1972). And the Society for the Relief and Instruction of Poor Germans circulated a biweekly paper from 1755 to 1757. Adams, The Colonial German-language Press and the American Revolution, in The Press & the American Revolution 151, 161–162 (B. Bailyn & J. Hench eds. 1980). The dissent offers no evidence—none whatever—that the First Amendment's unqualified text was originally understood to exclude such associational speech from its protection.[5] [5]The best the dissent can come up with is that "[p]ostratification practice" supports its reading of the First Amendment. Post, at 40, n. 56. For this proposition, the dissent cites Justice White's statement (in dissent) that "[t]he common law was generally interpreted as prohibiting corporate political participation," First Nat. Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765, 819 (1978). The sole authority Justice White cited for this proposition, id., at 819, n. 14, was a law-review note that made no such claim. To the contrary, it stated that the cases dealing with the propriety of corporate political expenditures were "few." Note, Corporate Political Affairs Programs, 70 Yale L. J. 821, 852 (1961). More specifically, the note cites only two holdings to that effect, one by a Federal District Court, and one by the Supreme Court of Montana. Id., at 852, n. 197. Of course even if the common law was "generally interpreted" to prohibit corporate political expenditures as ultra vires, that would have nothing to do with whether political expenditures that were authorized by a corporation's charter could constitutionally be suppressed.

As additional "[p]ostratification practice," the dissent notes that the Court "did not recognize any First Amendment protections for corporations until the middle part of the 20th century." Post, at 40, n. 56. But it did that in Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U. S. 233 (1936), a case involving freedom of the press—which the dissent acknowledges did cover corporations from the outset. The relative recency of that first case is unsurprising. All of our First Amendment jurisprudence was slow to develop. We did not consider application of the First Amendment to speech restrictions other than prior restraints until 1919, see Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47 (1919); we did not invalidate a state law on First Amendment grounds until 1931, see

Historical evidence relating to the textually similar clause "the freedom of . . . the press" also provides no support for the proposition that the First Amendment excludes conduct of artificial legal entities from the scope of its protection. The freedom of "the press" was widely understood to protect the publishing activities of individual editors and printers. See McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U. S. 334, 360 (1995) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment); see also McConnell, 540 U. S., at 252–253 (opinion of SCALIA, J.). But these individuals often acted through newspapers, which (much like corporations) had their own names, outlived the individuals who had founded them, could be bought and sold, were sometimes owned by more than one person, and were operated for profit. See generally F. Mott, American Journalism: A History of Newspapers in the United States Through 250 Years 3–164 (1941); J. Smith, Freedom's Fetters (1956). Their activities were not stripped of First Amendment protection simply because they were carried out under the banner of an artificial legal entity. And the notion which follows from the dissent's view, that modern newspapers, since they are incorporated, have free-speech rights only at the sufferance of Congress, boggles the mind.[6]

Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359 (1931), and a federal law until 1965, see Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U. S. 301 (1965).

[6]The dissent seeks to avoid this conclusion (and to turn a liability into an asset) by interpreting the Freedom of the Press Clause to refer to the institutional press (thus demonstrating, according to the dissent, that the Founders "did draw distinctions—explicit distinctions—between types of 'speakers,' or speech outlets or forms"). Post, at 40 and n. 57. It is passing strange to interpret the phrase "the freedom of speech, or of the press" to mean, not everyone's right to speak or publish, but rather everyone's right to speak or the institutional press's right to publish. No one thought that is what it meant. Patriot Noah Webster's 1828 dictionary contains, under the word "press," the following entry:

"Liberty of the press, in civil policy, is the free right of publishing

In passing, the dissent also claims that the Court's conception of corruption is unhistorical. The Framers "would have been appalled," it says, by the evidence of corruption in the congressional findings supporting the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002. Post, at 61. For this proposition, the dissent cites a law review article arguing that "corruption" was originally understood to include "moral decay" and even actions taken by citizens in pursuit of private rather than public ends. Teachout, The Anti-Corruption Principle, 94 Cornell L. Rev. 341, 373, 378 (2009). It is hard to see how this has anything to do with what sort of corruption can be combated by restrictions on political speech. Moreover, if speech can be prohibited because, in the view of the Government, it leads to "moral decay" or does not serve "public ends," then there is no limit to the Government's censorship power.

The dissent says that when the Framers "constitutionalized the right to free speech in the First Amendment, it was the free speech of individual Americans that they had in mind." Post, at 37. That is no doubt true. All the provisions of the Bill of Rights set forth the rights of individual men and women—not, for example, of trees or polar bears. But the individual person's right to speak includes the right to speak in association with other individual persons. Surely the dissent does not believe that speech books, pamphlets, or papers without previous restraint; or the unrestrained right which every citizen enjoys of publishing his thoughts and opinions, subject only to punishment for publishing what is pernicious to morals or to the peace of the state." 2 American Dictionary of the English Language (1828) (reprinted 1970).

As the Court's opinion describes, ante, at 36, our jurisprudence agrees with Noah Webster and contradicts the dissent.

"The liberty of the press is not confined to newspapers and periodicals. It necessarily embraces pamphlets and leaflets. . . . The press in its historical connotation comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion." Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U. S. 444, 452 (1938).

by the Republican Party or the Democratic Party can be censored because it is not the speech of "an individual American." It is the speech of many individual Americans, who have associated in a common cause, giving the leadership of the party the right to speak on their behalf. The association of individuals in a business corporation is no different—or at least it cannot be denied the right to speak on the simplistic ground that it is not "an individual American."[7]

But to return to, and summarize, my principal point, which is the conformity of today's opinion with the original meaning of the First Amendment. The Amendment is written in terms of "speech," not speakers. Its text offers no foothold for excluding any category of speaker, from [7] The dissent says that "'speech'" refers to oral communications of human beings, and since corporations are not human beings they cannot speak. Post, at 37, n. 55. This is sophistry. The authorized spokesman of a corporation is a human being, who speaks on behalf of the human beings who have formed that association—just as the spokesman of an unincorporated association speaks on behalf of its members. The power to publish thoughts, no less than the power to speak thoughts, belongs only to human beings, but the dissent sees no problem with a corporation's enjoying the freedom of the press.

The same footnote asserts that "it has been 'claimed that the notion of institutional speech . . . did not exist in post-revolutionary America.'" This is quoted from a law-review article by a Bigelow Fellow at the University of Chicago (Fagundes, State Actors as First Amendment Speakers, 100 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1637, 1654 (2006)), which offers as the sole support for its statement a treatise dealing with government speech, M. Yudof, When Government Speaks 42–50 (1983). The cited pages of that treatise provide no support whatever for the statement—unless, as seems overwhelmingly likely, the "institutional speech" referred to was speech by the subject of the law-review article, governmental institutions.

The other authority cited in the footnote, a law-review article by a professor at Washington and Lee Law School, Bezanson, Institutional Speech, 80 Iowa L. Rev. 735, 775 (1995), in fact contradicts the dissent, in that it would accord free-speech protection to associations.

single individuals to partnerships of individuals, to unincorporated associations of individuals, to incorporated associations of individuals—and the dissent offers no evidence about the original meaning of the text to support any such exclusion. We are therefore simply left with the question whether the speech at issue in this case is "speech" covered by the First Amendment. No one says otherwise. A documentary film critical of a potential Presidential candidate is core political speech, and its nature as such does not change simply because it was funded by a corporation. Nor does the character of that funding produce any reduction whatever in the "inherent worth of the speech" and "its capacity for informing the public," First Nat. Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765, 777 (1978). Indeed, to exclude or impede corporate speech is to muzzle the principal agents of the modern free economy. We should celebrate rather than condemn the addition of this speech to the public debate.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 08–205

CITIZENS UNITED, APPELLANT v. FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

[January 21, 2010]

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE GINSBURG, JUSTICE BREYER, and JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR join, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

The real issue in this case concerns how, not if, the appellant may finance its electioneering. Citizens United is a wealthy nonprofit corporation that runs a political action committee (PAC) with millions of dollars in assets. Under the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), it could have used those assets to televise and promote Hillary: The Movie wherever and whenever it wanted to. It also could have spent unrestricted sums to broadcast Hillary at any time other than the 30 days before the last primary election. Neither Citizens United's nor any other corporation's speech has been "banned," ante, at 1. All that the parties dispute is whether Citizens United had a right to use the funds in its general treasury to pay for broadcasts during the 30-day period. The notion that the First Amendment dictates an affirmative answer to that question is, in my judgment, profoundly misguided. Even more misguided is the notion that the Court must rewrite the law relating to campaign expenditures by for-profit corporations and unions to decide this case.

The basic premise underlying the Court's ruling is its iteration, and constant reiteration, of the proposition that the First Amendment bars regulatory distinctions based on a speaker's identity, including its "identity" as a corporation. While that glittering generality has rhetorical appeal, it is not a correct statement of the law. Nor does it tell us when a corporation may engage in electioneering that some of its shareholders oppose. It does not even resolve the specific question whether Citizens United may be required to finance some of its messages with the money in its PAC. The conceit that corporations must be treated identically to natural persons in the political sphere is not only inaccurate but also inadequate to justify the Court's disposition of this case.

In the context of election to public office, the distinction between corporate and human speakers is significant. Although they make enormous contributions to our society, corporations are not actually members of it. They cannot vote or run for office. Because they may be managed and controlled by nonresidents, their interests may conflict in fundamental respects with the interests of eligible voters. The financial resources, legal structure, and instrumental orientation of corporations raise legitimate concerns about their role in the electoral process. Our lawmakers have a compelling constitutional basis, if not also a democratic duty, to take measures designed to guard against the potentially deleterious effects of corporate spending in local and national races.

The majority's approach to corporate electioneering marks a dramatic break from our past. Congress has placed special limitations on campaign spending by corporations ever since the passage of the Tillman Act in 1907, ch. 420, 34 Stat. 864. We have unanimously concluded that this "reflects a permissible assessment of the dangers posed by those entities to the electoral process," FEC v. National Right to Work Comm., 459 U. S. 197, 209 (1982) (NRWC), and have accepted the "legislative judgment that the special characteristics of the corporate structure require particularly careful regulation," id., at 209–210. The Court today rejects a century of history when it treats the distinction between corporate and individual campaign spending as an invidious novelty born of Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U. S. 652 (1990). Relying largely on individual dissenting opinions, the majority blazes through our precedents, overruling or disavowing a body of case law including FEC v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., 551 U. S. 449 (2007) (WRTL), McConnell v. FEC, 540 U. S. 93 (2003), FEC v. Beaumont, 539 U. S. 146 (2003), FEC v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc., 479 U. S. 238 (1986) (MCFL), NRWC, 459 U. S. 197, and California Medical Assn. v. FEC, 453 U. S. 182 (1981).

In his landmark concurrence in Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U. S. 288, 346 (1936), Justice Brandeis stressed the importance of adhering to rules the Court has "developed . . . for its own governance" when deciding constitutional questions. Because departures from those rules always enhance the risk of error, I shall review the background of this case in some detail before explaining why the Court's analysis rests on a faulty understanding of Austin and McConnell and of our campaign finance jurisprudence more generally.[1] I regret the length of what follows, but the importance and novelty of the Court's opinion require a full response. Although I concur in the Court's decision to sustain BCRA's disclosure provisions and join Part IV of its opinion, I emphatically dissent from its principal holding.

[1] Specifically, Part I, infra, at 4–17, addresses the procedural history of the case and the narrower grounds of decision the majority has bypassed. Part II, infra, at 17–23, addresses stare decisis. Part III, infra, at 23–56, addresses the Court's assumptions that BCRA "bans" corporate speech, that identity-based distinctions may not be drawn in the political realm, and that Austin and McConnell were outliers in our First Amendment tradition. Part IV, infra, at 56–89, addresses the Court's treatment of the anticorruption, antidistortion, and shareholder protection rationales for regulating corporate electioneering.

I

The Court's ruling threatens to undermine the integrity of elected institutions across the Nation. The path it has taken to reach its outcome will, I fear, do damage to this institution. Before turning to the question whether to overrule Austin and part of McConnell, it is important to explain why the Court should not be deciding that question.

Scope of the Case

The first reason is that the question was not properly brought before us. In declaring §203 of BCRA facially unconstitutional on the ground that corporations' electoral expenditures may not be regulated any more stringently than those of individuals, the majority decides this case on a basis relinquished below, not included in the questions presented to us by the litigants, and argued here only in response to the Court's invitation. This procedure is unusual and inadvisable for a court.[2] Our colleagues' suggestion that "we are asked to reconsider Austin and, in effect, McConnell," ante, at 1, would be more accurate if rephrased to state that "we have asked ourselves" to reconsider those cases.

In the District Court, Citizens United initially raised a facial challenge to the constitutionality of §203. App. 23a–24a. In its motion for summary judgment, however, Citizens United expressly abandoned its facial challenge, 1:07–cv–2240–RCL–RWR, Docket Entry No. 52, pp. 1–2 (May 16, 2008), and the parties stipulated to the dismissal of that claim, id., Nos. 53 (May 22, 2008), 54 (May 23, 2008), App. 6a. The District Court therefore resolved the case on alternative grounds,[3] and in its jurisdictional statement to this Court, Citizens United properly advised us that it was raising only "an as-applied challenge to the constitutionality of . . . BCRA §203." Juris. Statement 5. The jurisdictional statement never so much as cited Austin, the key case the majority today overrules. And not one of the questions presented suggested that Citizens United was surreptitiously raising the facial challenge to §203 that it previously agreed to dismiss. In fact, not one of those questions raised an issue based on Citizens United's corporate status. Juris. Statement (i). Moreover, even in its merits briefing, when Citizens United injected its request to overrule Austin, it never sought a declaration that §203 was facially unconstitutional as to all corporations and unions; instead it argued only that the statute could not be applied to it because it was "funded overwhelmingly by individuals." Brief for Appellant 29; see also id., at 10, 12, 16, 28 (affirming "as applied" character of challenge to §203); Tr. of Oral Arg. 4–9 (Mar. 24, 2009) (counsel for Citizens United conceding that §203 could be applied to General Motors); id., at 55 (counsel for Citizens United stating that "we accept the Court's decision in Wisconsin Right to Life").

[2]See Yee v. Escondido, 503 U. S. 519, 535 (1992) ("[U]nder this Court's Rule 14.1(a), only questions set forth in the petition, or fairly included therein, will be considered by the Court" (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted)); Wood v. Allen, ante, at __ (slip op., at 13) ("[T]he fact that petitioner discussed [an] issue in the text of his petition for certiorari does not bring it before us. Rule 14.1(a) requires that a subsidiary question be fairly included in the question presented for our review" (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted)); Cooper Industries, Inc. v. Aviall Services, Inc., 543 U. S. 157, 168–169 (2004) ("We ordinarily do not decide in the first instance issues not decided below" (internal quotation marks omitted)).

[3] The majority states that, in denying Citizens United's motion for a preliminary injunction, the District Court "addressed" the facial validity of BCRA §203. Ante, at 13. That is true, in the narrow sense that the court observed the issue was foreclosed by McConnell v. FEC, 540 U. S. 93 (2003). See 530 F. Supp. 2d 274, 278 (DC 2008) (per curiam). Yet as explained above, Citizens United subsequently dismissed its facial challenge, so that by the time the District Court granted the Federal Election Commission's (FEC) motion for summary judgment, App. 261a–262a, any question about statutory validity had dropped out of the case. That latter ruling by the District Court was the "final decision" from which Citizens United appealed to this Court under BCRA §403(a)(3). As regards the lower court decision that has come before us, the claim that §203 is facially unconstitutional was neither pressed nor passed upon in any form.

"'It is only in exceptional cases coming here from the federal courts that questions not pressed or passed upon below are reviewed,'" Youakim v. Miller, 425 U. S. 231, 234 (1976) (per curiam) (quoting Duignan v. United States, 274 U. S. 195, 200 (1927)), and it is "only in the most exceptional cases" that we will consider issues outside the questions presented, Stone v. Powell, 428 U. S. 465, 481, n. 15 (1976). The appellant in this case did not so much as assert an exceptional circumstance, and one searches the majority opinion in vain for the mention of any. That is unsurprising, for none exists.

Setting the case for reargument was a constructive step, but it did not cure this fundamental problem. Essentially, five Justices were unhappy with the limited nature of the case before us, so they changed the case to give themselves an opportunity to change the law.

As-Applied and Facial Challenges

This Court has repeatedly emphasized in recent years that "[f]acial challenges are disfavored." Washington State Grange v. Washington State Republican Party, 552 U. S. 442, 450 (2008); see also Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood of Northern New Eng., 546 U. S. 320, 329 (2006) ("[T]he 'normal rule' is that 'partial, rather than facial, invalidation is the required course,' such that a 'statute may . . . be declared invalid to the extent that it reaches too far, but otherwise left intact'" (quoting Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 472 U. S. 491, 504 (1985); alteration in original)). By declaring §203 facially unconstitutional, our colleagues have turned an as-applied challenge into a facial challenge, in defiance of this principle.

This is not merely a technical defect in the Court's decision. The unnecessary resort to a facial inquiry "run[s] contrary to the fundamental principle of judicial restraint that courts should neither anticipate a question of constitutional law in advance of the necessity of deciding it nor formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied." Washington State Grange, 552 U. S., at 450 (internal quotation marks omitted). Scanting that principle "threaten[s] to short circuit the democratic process by preventing laws embodying the will of the people from being implemented in a manner consistent with the Constitution." Id., at 451. These concerns are heightened when judges overrule settled doctrine upon which the legislature has relied. The Court operates with a sledge hammer rather than a scalpel when it strikes down one of Congress' most significant efforts to regulate the role that corporations and unions play in electoral politics. It compounds the offense by implicitly striking down a great many state laws as well.

The problem goes still deeper, for the Court does all of this on the basis of pure speculation. Had Citizens United maintained a facial challenge, and thus argued that there are virtually no circumstances in which BCRA §203 can be applied constitutionally, the parties could have developed, through the normal process of litigation, a record about the actual effects of §203, its actual burdens and its actual benefits, on all manner of corporations and unions.[4] [4] Shortly before Citizens United mooted the issue by abandoning its facial challenge, the Government advised the District Court that it "require[d] time to develop a factual record regarding [the] facial challenge." 1:07–cv–2240–RCL–RWR, Docket Entry No. 47, p. 4 (Mar. 26, 2008). By reinstating a claim that Citizens United abandoned, the Court gives it a perverse litigating advantage over its adversary, which was deprived of the opportunity to gather and present information necessary to its rebuttal.

"Claims of facial invalidity often rest on speculation," and consequently "raise the risk of premature interpretation of statutes on the basis of factually barebones records." Id., at 450 (internal quotation marks omitted). In this case, the record is not simply incomplete or unsatisfactory; it is nonexistent. Congress crafted BCRA in response to a virtual mountain of research on the corruption that previous legislation had failed to avert. The Court now negates Congress' efforts without a shred of evidence on how §203 or its state-law counterparts have been affecting any entity other than Citizens United.[5]

Faced with this gaping empirical hole, the majority throws up its hands. Were we to confine our inquiry to Citizens United's as-applied challenge, it protests, we would commence an "extended" process of "draw[ing], and then redraw[ing], constitutional lines based on the particular media or technology used to disseminate political speech from a particular speaker." Ante, at 9. While tacitly acknowledging that some applications of §203 might be found constitutional, the majority thus posits a future in which novel First Amendment standards must

[5] In fact, we do not even have a good evidentiary record of how §203 has been affecting Citizens United, which never submitted to the District Court the details of Hillary's funding or its own finances. We likewise have no evidence of how §203 and comparable state laws were expected to affect corporations and unions in the future.

It is true, as the majority points out, that the McConnell Court evaluated the facial validity of §203 in light of an extensive record. See ante, at 15. But that record is not before us in this case. And in any event, the majority's argument for striking down §203 depends on its contention that the statute has proved too "chilling" in practice—and in particular on the contention that the controlling opinion in WRTL, 551 U. S. 449 (2007), failed to bring sufficient clarity and "breathing space" to this area of law. See ante, at 12, 16–20. We have no record with which to assess that claim. The Court complains at length about the burdens of complying with §203, but we have no meaningful evidence to show how regulated corporations and unions have experienced its restrictions.

be devised on an ad hoc basis, and then leaps from this unfounded prediction to the unfounded conclusion that such complexity counsels the abandonment of all normal restraint. Yet it is a pervasive feature of regulatory systems that unanticipated events, such as new technologies, may raise some unanticipated difficulties at the margins. The fluid nature of electioneering communications does not make this case special. The fact that a Court can hypothesize situations in which a statute might, at some point down the line, pose some unforeseen as-applied problems, does not come close to meeting the standard for a facial challenge.[6]

The majority proposes several other justifications for the sweep of its ruling. It suggests that a facial ruling is necessary because, if the Court were to continue on its normal course of resolving as-applied challenges as they present themselves, that process would itself run afoul of the First Amendment. See, e.g., ante, at 9 (as-applied review process "would raise questions as to the courts' own lawful authority"); ibid. ("Courts, too, are bound by the First Amendment"). This suggestion is perplexing. Our colleagues elsewhere trumpet "our duty 'to say what the law is,'" even when our predecessors on the bench and our counterparts in Congress have interpreted the law differ-ently. Ante, at 49 (quoting Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 177 (1803)). We do not typically say what the law is not as a hedge against future judicial error. The possibility that later courts will misapply a constitutional provision does not give us a basis for pretermitting litigation relating to that provision.[7]

[6]Our cases recognize a "type of facial challenge in the First Amendment context under which a law may be overturned as impermissibly overbroad because a substantial number of its applications are unconstitutional." Washington State Grange v. Washington State Republican Party, 552 U. S. 442, 449, n. 6 (2008) (internal quotation marks omitted). Citizens United has not made an overbreadth argument, and "[w]e generally do not apply the strong medicine of overbreadth analysis where the parties fail to describe the instances of arguable overbreadth of the contested law," ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted). If our colleagues nonetheless concluded that §203's fatal flaw is that it affects too much protected speech, they should have invalidated it for overbreadth and given guidance as to which applications are permissible, so that Congress could go about repairing the error.

The majority suggests that a facial ruling is necessary because anything less would chill too much protected speech. See ante, at 9–10, 12, 16–20. In addition to begging the question what types of corporate spending are constitutionally protected and to what extent, this claim rests on the assertion that some significant number of corporations have been cowed into quiescence by FEC "'censor[ship].'" Ante, at 18–19. That assertion is unsubstantiated, and it is hard to square with practical experience. It is particularly hard to square with the legal landscape following WRTL, which held that a corporate communication could be regulated under §203 only if it was "susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than as an appeal to vote for or against a specific candidate." 551 U. S., at 470 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.) (emphasis added). The whole point of this test was to make §203 as simple and speech-protective as possible. The Court does not explain how, in the span of a single election cycle, it has determined THE CHIEF JUSTICE's project to be [7]Also perplexing is the majority's attempt to pass blame to the Government for its litigating position. By "hold[ing] out the possibility of ruling for Citizens United on a narrow ground yet refrain[ing] from adopting that position," the majority says, the Government has caused "added uncertainty [that] demonstrates the necessity to address the question of statutory validity." Ante, at 17. Our colleagues have apparently never heard of an alternative argument. Like every litigant, the Government would prefer to win its case outright; failing that, it would prefer to lose on a narrow ground. The fact that there are numerous different ways this case could be decided, and that the Government acknowledges as much, does not demonstrate anything about the propriety of a facial ruling.

---

a failure. In this respect, too, the majority's critique of line-drawing collapses into a critique of the as-applied review method generally.[8]

The majority suggests that, even though it expressly dismissed its facial challenge, Citizens United nevertheless preserved it—not as a freestanding "claim," but as a potential argument in support of "a claim that the FEC has violated its First Amendment right to free speech." Ante, at 13; see also ante, at 4 (ROBERTS, C. J., concurring) (describing Citizens United's claim as: "[T]he Act violates the First Amendment"). By this novel logic, virtually any submission could be reconceptualized as "a claim that the Government has violated my rights," and it would then be available to the Court to entertain any conceivable issue that might be relevant to that claim's disposition. Not only the as-applied/facial distinction, but the basic relationship between litigants and courts, would be upended if the latter had free rein to construe the former's claims at such high levels of generality. There would be no need for plaintiffs to argue their case; they could just cite the constitutional provisions they think relevant, and leave the rest to us.[9] [8] The majority's "chilling" argument is particularly inapposite with respect to 2 U. S. C. §441b's longstanding restriction on the use of corporate general treasury funds for express advocacy. If there was ever any significant uncertainty about what counts as the functional equivalent of express advocacy, there has been little doubt about what counts as express advocacy since the "magic words" test of Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U. S. 1, 44, n. 52 (1976) (per curiam). Yet even though Citizens United's briefs never once mention §441b's restriction on express advocacy; even though this restriction does not generate chilling concerns; and even though no one has suggested that Hillary counts as express advocacy; the majority nonetheless reaches out to opine that this statutory provision is "invalid" as well. Ante, at 50.

---

[9] The majority adds that the distinction between facial and as-applied challenges does not have "some automatic effect" that mechanically controls the judicial task. Ante, at 14. I agree, but it does not follow that in any given case we should ignore the distinction, much less

Finally, the majority suggests that though the scope of Citizens United's claim may be narrow, a facial ruling is necessary as a matter of remedy. Relying on a law review article, it asserts that Citizens United's dismissal of the facial challenge does not prevent us "'from making broader pronouncements of invalidity in properly "as-applied" cases.'" Ante, at 14 (quoting Fallon, As-Applied and Facial Challenges and Third-Party Standing, 113 Harv. L. Rev. 1321, 1339 (2000) (hereinafter Fallon)); accord, ante, at 5 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.) ("Regardless whether we label Citizens United's claim a 'facial' or 'as-applied' challenge, the consequences of the Court's decision are the same"). The majority is on firmer conceptual ground here. Yet even if one accepts this part of Professor Fallon's thesis, one must proceed to ask which as-applied challenges, if successful, will "properly" invite or entail invalidation of the underlying statute.[10] The paradigmatic case is a judicial determination that the legislature acted with an impermissible purpose in enacting a provision, as this carries the necessary implication that all future as-applied challenges to the provision must prevail. See Fallon 1339–1340.

Citizens United's as-applied challenge was not of this sort. Until this Court ordered reargument, its contention was that BCRA §203 could not lawfully be applied to a invert it.

[10] Professor Fallon proposes an intricate answer to this question that the majority ignores. Fallon 1327–1359. It bears mention that our colleagues have previously cited Professor Fallon's article for the exact opposite point from the one they wish to make today. In Gonzales v. Carhart, 550 U. S. 124 (2007), the Court explained that "[i]t is neither our obligation nor within our traditional institutional role to resolve questions of constitutionality with respect to each potential situation that might develop," and "[f]or this reason, '[a]s-applied challenges are the basic building blocks of constitutional adjudication.'" Id., at 168 (opinion for the Court by KENNEDY, J.) (quoting Fallon 1328 (second alteration in original)).

feature-length video-on-demand film (such as Hillary) or to a nonprofit corporation exempt from taxation under 26 U. S. C. §501(c)(4)[11] and funded overwhelmingly by individuals (such as itself). See Brief for Appellant 16–41. Success on either of these claims would not necessarily carry any implications for the validity of §203 as applied to other types of broadcasts, other types of corporations, or unions. It certainly would not invalidate the statute as applied to a large for-profit corporation. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 8, 4 (Mar. 24, 2009) (counsel for Citizens United emphasizing that appellant is "a small, nonprofit organization, which is very much like [an MCFL corporation]," and affirming that its argument "definitely would not be the same" if Hillary were distributed by General Motors).[12] There is no legitimate basis for resurrecting a facial chal-

[11] Internal Revenue Code section 501(c)(4) applies, inter alia, to nonprofit organizations "operated exclusively for the promotion of social welfare, . . . the net earnings of which are devoted exclusively to charitable, educational, or recreational purposes."

[12] THE CHIEF JUSTICE is therefore much too quick when he suggests that, "[e]ven if considered in as-applied terms, a holding in this case that the Act may not be applied to Citizens United—because corporations as well as individuals enjoy the pertinent First Amendment rights—would mean that any other corporation raising the same challenge would also win." Ante, at 4 (concurring opinion). That conclusion would only follow if the Court were to ignore Citizens United's plausible as-applied arguments and instead take the implausible position that all corporations and all types of expenditures enjoy the same First Amendment protections, which always trump the interests in regulation. At times, the majority appears to endorse this extreme view. At other times, however, it appears to suggest that nonprofit corporations have a better claim to First Amendment protection than for-profit corporations, see ante, at 20, 39, "advocacy" organizations have a better claim than other nonprofits, ante, at 20, domestic corporations have a better claim than foreign corporations, ante, at 46–47, small corporations have a better claim than large corporations, ante, at 38–40, and printed matter has a better claim than broadcast communications, ante, at 33. The majority never uses a multinational business corporation in its hypotheticals.

lenge that dropped out of this case 20 months ago.

Narrower Grounds

It is all the more distressing that our colleagues have manufactured a facial challenge, because the parties have advanced numerous ways to resolve the case that would facilitate electioneering by nonprofit advocacy corporations such as Citizens United, without toppling statutes and precedents. Which is to say, the majority has transgressed yet another "cardinal" principle of the judicial process: "[I]f it is not necessary to decide more, it is necessary not to decide more," PDK Labs., Inc. v. Drug Enforcement Admin., 362 F. 3d 786, 799 (CADC 2004) (Roberts, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment).

Consider just three of the narrower grounds of decision that the majority has bypassed. First, the Court could have ruled, on statutory grounds, that a feature-length film distributed through video-on-demand does not qualify as an "electioneering communication" under §203 of BCRA, 2 U. S. C. §441b. BCRA defines that term to encompass certain communications transmitted by "broadcast, cable, or satellite." §434(f)(3)(A). When Congress was developing BCRA, the video-on-demand medium was still in its infancy, and legislators were focused on a very different sort of programming: short advertisements run on television or radio. See McConnell, 540 U. S., at 207. The sponsors of BCRA acknowledge that the FEC's implementing regulations do not clearly apply to video-on-demand transmissions. See Brief for Senator John McCain et al. as Amici Curiae 17–19. In light of this ambiguity, the distinctive characteristics of video-on-demand, and "[t]he elementary rule . . . that every reasonable construction must be resorted to, in order to save a statute from unconstitutionality," Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 648, 657 (1895), the Court could have reasonably ruled that §203 does not apply to Hillary.[13]

Second, the Court could have expanded the MCFL exemption to cover §501(c)(4) nonprofits that accept only a de minimis amount of money from for-profit corporations. Citizens United professes to be such a group: Its brief says it "is funded predominantly by donations from individuals who support [its] ideological message." Brief for Appellant 5. Numerous Courts of Appeal have held that de minimis business support does not, in itself, remove an otherwise qualifying organization from the ambit of MCFL.[14] This Court could have simply followed their lead.[15]

Finally, let us not forget Citizens United's as-applied constitutional challenge. Precisely because Citizens

[13] The Court entirely ignores this statutory argument. It concludes that §203 applies to Hillary on the basis of the film's content, ante, at 7–8, without considering the possibility that §203 does not apply to video-on-demand transmissions generally.

[14] See Colorado Right to Life Comm., Inc. v. Coffman, 498 F. 3d 1137, 1148 (CA10 2007) (adopting this rule and noting that "every other circuit to have addressed this issue" has done likewise); Brief for Independent Sector as Amicus Curiae 10–11 (collecting cases). The Court rejects this solution in part because the Government "merely suggest[s] it" and "does not say that it agrees with the interpretation." Ante, at 11. Our colleagues would thus punish a defendant for showing insufficient excitement about a ground it has advanced, at the same time that they decide the case on a ground the plaintiff expressly abandoned. The Court also protests that a de minimis standard would "requir[e] intricate case-by-case determinations." Ante, at 12. But de minimis tests need not be intricate at all. A test that granted MCFL status to §501(c)(4) organizations if they received less than a fixed dollar amount of business donations in the previous year, or if such donations represent less than a fixed percentage of their total assets, would be perfectly easy to understand and administer.

[15] Another bypassed ground, not briefed by the parties, would have been to revive the Snowe-Jeffords Amendment in BCRA §203(c), allowing certain nonprofit corporations to pay for electioneering communications with general treasury funds, to the extent they can trace the payments to individual contributions. See Brief for National Rifle Association as Amicus Curiae 5–15 (arguing forcefully that Congress intended this result).

United looks so much like the MCFL organizations we have exempted from regulation, while a feature-length video-on-demand film looks so unlike the types of electoral advocacy Congress has found deserving of regulation, this challenge is a substantial one. As the appellant's own arguments show, the Court could have easily limited the breadth of its constitutional holding had it declined to adopt the novel notion that speakers and speech acts must always be treated identically—and always spared expenditures restrictions—in the political realm. Yet the Court nonetheless turns its back on the as-applied review process that has been a staple of campaign finance litigation since Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U. S. 1 (1976) (per curiam), and that was affirmed and expanded just two Terms ago in WRTL, 551 U. S. 449.

This brief tour of alternative grounds on which the case could have been decided is not meant to show that any of these grounds is ideal, though each is perfectly "valid," ante, at 12 (majority opinion).[16] It is meant to show that there were principled, narrower paths that a Court that was serious about judicial restraint could have taken. There was also the straightforward path: applying Austin and McConnell, just as the District Court did in holding

[16] THE CHIEF JUSTICE finds our discussion of these narrower solutions "quite perplexing" because we suggest that the Court should "latch on to one of them in order to avoid reaching the broader constitutional question," without doing the same ourselves. Ante, at 3. There is nothing perplexing about the matter, because we are not similarly situated to our colleagues in the majority. We do not share their view of the First Amendment. Our reading of the Constitution would not lead us to strike down any statutes or overturn any precedents in this case, and we therefore have no occasion to practice constitutional avoidance or to vindicate Citizens United's as-applied challenge. Each of the arguments made above is surely at least as strong as the statutory argument the Court accepted in last year's Voting Rights Act case, Northwest Austin Municipal Util. Dist. No. One v. Holder, 557 U. S. __ (2009).

that the funding of Citizens United's film can be regulated under them. The only thing preventing the majority from affirming the District Court, or adopting a narrower ground that would retain Austin, is its disdain for Austin.

II

The final principle of judicial process that the majority violates is the most transparent: stare decisis. I am not an absolutist when it comes to stare decisis, in the campaign finance area or in any other. No one is. But if this principle is to do any meaningful work in supporting the rule of law, it must at least demand a significant justification, beyond the preferences of five Justices, for overturning settled doctrine. "[A] decision to overrule should rest on some special reason over and above the belief that a prior case was wrongly decided." Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey, 505 U. S. 833, 864 (1992). No such justification exists in this case, and to the contrary there are powerful prudential reasons to keep faith with our precedents.[17]

The Court's central argument for why stare decisis ought to be trumped is that it does not like Austin. The opinion "was not well reasoned," our colleagues assert, and it conflicts with First Amendment principles. Ante, at 47–48. This, of course, is the Court's merits argument, the many defects in which we will soon consider. I am perfectly willing to concede that if one of our precedents were dead wrong in its reasoning or irreconcilable with the rest of our doctrine, there would be a compelling basis for revisiting it. But neither is true of Austin, as I explain at length in Parts III and IV, infra, at 23–89, and restating a merits argument with additional vigor does not give it

---

[17] I will have more to say shortly about the merits—about why Austin and McConnell are not doctrinal outliers, as the Court contends, and why their logic is not only defensible but also compelling. For present purposes, I limit the discussion to stare-decisis-specific considerations.

extra weight in the stare decisis calculus.

Perhaps in recognition of this point, the Court supplements its merits case with a smattering of assertions. The Court proclaims that "Austin is undermined by experience since its announcement." Ante, at 48. This is a curious claim to make in a case that lacks a developed record. The majority has no empirical evidence with which to substantiate the claim; we just have its ipse dixit that the real world has not been kind to Austin. Nor does the majority bother to specify in what sense Austin has been "undermined." Instead it treats the reader to a string of non sequiturs: "Our Nation's speech dynamic is changing," ante, at 48; "[s]peakers have become adept at presenting citizens with sound bites, talking points, and scripted messages," ibid.; "[c]orporations . . . do not have monolithic views," ibid. How any of these ruminations weakens the force of stare decisis, escapes my comprehension.[18]

The majority also contends that the Government's hesitation to rely on Austin's antidistortion rationale "diminishe[s]" "the principle of adhering to that precedent." Ante, at 48; see also ante, at 11 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.) (Government's litigating position is "most importan[t]"

[18] THE CHIEF JUSTICE suggests that Austin has been undermined by subsequent dissenting opinions. Ante, at 9. Under this view, it appears that the more times the Court stands by a precedent in the face of requests to overrule it, the weaker that precedent becomes. THE CHIEF JUSTICE further suggests that Austin "is uniquely destabilizing because it threatens to subvert our Court's decisions even outside" its particular facts, as when we applied its reasoning in McConnell. Ante, at 9. Once again, the theory seems to be that the more we utilize a precedent, the more we call it into question. For those who believe Austin was correctly decided—as the Federal Government and the States have long believed, as the majority of Justices to have served on the Court since Austin have believed, and as we continue to believe—there is nothing "destabilizing" about the prospect of its continued application. It is gutting campaign finance laws across the country, as the Court does today, that will be destabilizing.

factor undermining Austin). Why it diminishes the value of stare decisis is left unexplained. We have never thought fit to overrule a precedent because a litigant has taken any particular tack. Nor should we. Our decisions can often be defended on multiple grounds, and a litigant may have strategic or case-specific reasons for emphasizing only a subset of them. Members of the public, moreover, often rely on our bottom-line holdings far more than our precise legal arguments; surely this is true for the legislatures that have been regulating corporate electioneering since Austin. The task of evaluating the continued viability of precedents falls to this Court, not to the parties.[19]

Although the majority opinion spends several pages making these surprising arguments, it says almost nothing about the standard considerations we have used to determine stare decisis value, such as the antiquity of the precedent, the workability of its legal rule, and the reliance interests at stake. It is also conspicuously silent about McConnell, even though the McConnell Court's decision to uphold BCRA §203 relied not only on the anti-distortion logic of Austin but also on the statute's historical pedigree, see, e.g., 540 U. S., at 115–132, 223–224, and the need to preserve the integrity of federal campaigns, see id., at 126–129, 205–208, and n. 88.

We have recognized that "[s]tare decisis has special force when legislators or citizens 'have acted in reliance on a previous decision, for in this instance overruling the decision would dislodge settled rights and expectations or require an extensive legislative response.'" Hubbard v. United States, 514 U. S. 695, 714 (1995) (quoting Hilton v. South Carolina Public Railways Comm'n, 502 U. S. 197, 202 (1991)). Stare decisis protects not only personal rights involving property or contract but also the ability of the elected branches to shape their laws in an effective and coherent fashion. Today's decision takes away a power that we have long permitted these branches to exercise. State legislatures have relied on their authority to regulate corporate electioneering, confirmed in Austin, for more than a century.[20] The Federal Congress has relied on this authority for a comparable stretch of time, and it specifically relied on Austin throughout the years it spent developing and debating BCRA. The total record it compiled was 100,000 pages long.[21] Pulling out the rug beneath Congress after affirming the constitutionality of §203 six years ago shows great disrespect for a coequal branch.

[19] Additionally, the majority cites some recent scholarship challenging the historical account of campaign finance law given in United States v. Automobile Workers, 352 U. S. 567 (1957). Ante, at 48. Austin did not so much as allude to this historical account, much less rely on it. Even if the scholarship cited by the majority is correct that certain campaign finance reforms were less deliberate or less benignly motivated than Automobile Workers suggested, the point remains that this body of law has played a significant and broadly accepted role in American political life for decades upon decades.

By removing one of its central components, today's ruling makes a hash out of BCRA's "delicate and interconnected regulatory scheme." McConnell, 540 U. S., at 172. Consider just one example of the distortions that will follow: Political parties are barred under BCRA from soliciting or spending "soft money," funds that are not subject to the statute's disclosure requirements or its source and amount limitations. 2 U. S. C. §441i; McConnell, 540 U. S., at 122–126. Going forward, corporations and unions will be free to spend as much general treasury money as they wish on ads that support or attack specific candidates, whereas national parties will not be able to spend a dime of soft money on ads of any kind. The Court's ruling thus dramatically enhances the role of corporations and unions—and the narrow interests they represent—vis-à-vis the role of political parties—and the broad coalitions they represent—in determining who will hold public office.[22]

Beyond the reliance interests at stake, the other stare decisis factors also cut against the Court. Considerations of antiquity are significant for similar reasons. McConnell is only six years old, but Austin has been on the books for two decades, and many of the statutes called into question by today's opinion have been on the books for a half-century or more. The Court points to no intervening change in circumstances that warrants revisiting Austin. Certainly nothing relevant has changed since we decided WRTL two Terms ago. And the Court gives no reason to think that Austin and McConnell are unworkable.

In fact, no one has argued to us that Austin's rule has proved impracticable, and not a single for-profit corporation, union, or State has asked us to overrule it. Quite to the contrary, leading groups representing the business community,[23] organized labor,[24] and the nonprofit sector,[25] together with more than half of the States,[26] urge that we [22] To be sure, the majority may respond that Congress can correct the imbalance by removing BCRA's soft-money limits. Cf. Tr. of Oral Arg. 24 (Sept. 9, 2009) (query of KENNEDY, J.). But this is no response to any legislature that takes campaign finance regulation seriously. It merely illustrates the breadth of the majority's deregulatory vision.

preserve Austin. As for McConnell, the portions of BCRA it upheld may be prolix, but all three branches of Government have worked to make §203 as user-friendly as possible. For instance, Congress established a special mechanism for expedited review of constitutional challenges, see note following 2 U. S. C. §437h; the FEC has established a standardized process, with clearly defined safe harbors, for corporations to claim that a particular electioneering communication is permissible under WRTL, see 11 CFR §114.15 (2009);[27] and, as noted above, THE CHIEF JUSTICE crafted his controlling opinion in WRTL with the express goal of maximizing clarity and administrability, 551 U. S., at 469–470, 473–474. The case for stare decisis may be bolstered, we have said, when subsequent rulings "have reduced the impact" of a precedent "while reaffirming the decision's core ruling." Dickerson v. United States, 530 U. S. 428, 443 (2000).[28]

In the end, the Court's rejection of Austin and McCon-

[27] The FEC established this process following the Court's June 2007 decision in that case, 551 U. S. 449. In the brief interval between the establishment of this process and the 2008 election, corporations and unions used it to make $108.5 million in electioneering communications. Supp. Brief for Appellee 22–23; FEC, Electioneering Communication Summary, online at http://fec.gov/finance/disclosure/ECSummary.shtml (all Internet materials as visited Jan. 18, 2010, and available in Clerk of Court's case file).

[28] Concedely, Austin and McConnell were constitutional decisions, and we have often said that "claims of stare decisis are at the weakest in that field, where our mistakes cannot be corrected by Congress." Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U. S. 267, 305 (2004) (plurality opinion). As a general matter, this principle is a sound one. But the principle only takes on real force when an earlier ruling has obstructed the normal democratic process; it is the fear of making "mistakes [that] cannot be corrected by Congress," ibid., that motivates us to review constitutional precedents with a more critical eye. Austin and McConnell did not obstruct state or congressional legislative power in any way. Although it is unclear how high a bar today's decision will pose to future attempts to regulate corporate electioneering, it will clearly restrain much legislative action.

nell comes down to nothing more than its disagreement with their results. Virtually every one of its arguments was made and rejected in those cases, and the majority opinion is essentially an amalgamation of resuscitated dissents. The only relevant thing that has changed since Austin and McConnell is the composition of this Court. Today's ruling thus strikes at the vitals of stare decisis, "the means by which we ensure that the law will not merely change erratically, but will develop in a principled and intelligible fashion" that "permits society to presume that bedrock principles are founded in the law rather than in the proclivities of individuals." Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U. S. 254, 265 (1986).

III

The novelty of the Court's procedural dereliction and its approach to stare decisis is matched by the novelty of its ruling on the merits. The ruling rests on several premises. First, the Court claims that Austin and McConnell have "banned" corporate speech. Second, it claims that the First Amendment precludes regulatory distinctions based on speaker identity, including the speaker's identity as a corporation. Third, it claims that Austin and McConnell were radical outliers in our First Amendment tradition and our campaign finance jurisprudence. Each of these claims is wrong.

The So-Called "Ban"

Pervading the Court's analysis is the ominous image of a "categorical ba[n]" on corporate speech. Ante, at 45. Indeed, the majority invokes the specter of a "ban" on nearly every page of its opinion. Ante, at 1, 4, 7, 10, 11, 12, 13, 16, 20, 21, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 33, 35, 38, 40, 42, 45, 46, 47, 49, 54, 56. This characterization is highly misleading, and needs to be corrected.

In fact it already has been. Our cases have repeatedly pointed out that, "[c]ontrary to the [majority's] critical assumptions," the statutes upheld in Austin and McConnell do "not impose an absolute ban on all forms of corporate political spending." Austin, 494 U. S., at 660; see also McConnell, 540 U. S., at 203–204; Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 162–163. For starters, both statutes provide exemptions for PACs, separate segregated funds established by a corporation for political purposes. See 2 U. S. C. §441b(b)(2)(C); Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. §169.255 (West 2005). "The ability to form and administer separate segregated funds," we observed in McConnell, "has provided corporations and unions with a constitutionally sufficient opportunity to engage in express advocacy. That has been this Court's unanimous view." 540 U. S., at 203.

Under BCRA, any corporation's "stockholders and their families and its executive or administrative personnel and their families" can pool their resources to finance electioneering communications. 2 U. S. C. §441b(b)(4)(A)(i). A significant and growing number of corporations avail themselves of this option;[29] during the most recent election cycle, corporate and union PACs raised nearly a billion dollars.[30] Administering a PAC entails some administrative burden, but so does complying with the disclaimer, disclosure, and reporting requirements that the Court today upholds, see ante, at 51, and no one has suggested that the burden is severe for a sophisticated for-profit corporation. To the extent the majority is worried about [29] See FEC, Number of Federal PAC's Increases, http://fec.gov/press/press2008/20080812paccount.shtml.

[30] See Supp. Brief for Appellee 16 (citing FEC statistics placing this figure at $840 million). The majority finds the PAC option inadequate in part because "[a] PAC is a separate association from the corporation." Ante, at 21. The formal "separateness" of PACs from their host corporations—which administer and control the PACs but which cannot funnel general treasury funds into them or force members to support them—is, of course, the whole point of the PAC mechanism.

this issue, it is important to keep in mind that we have no record to show how substantial the burden really is, just the majority's own unsupported factfinding, see ante, at 21–22. Like all other natural persons, every shareholder of every corporation remains entirely free under Austin and McConnell to do however much electioneering she pleases outside of the corporate form. The owners of a "mom & pop" store can simply place ads in their own names, rather than the store's. If ideologically aligned individuals wish to make unlimited expenditures through the corporate form, they may utilize an MCFL organization that has policies in place to avoid becoming a conduit for business or union interests. See MCFL, 479 U. S., at 263–264.

The laws upheld in Austin and McConnell leave open many additional avenues for corporations' political speech. Consider the statutory provision we are ostensibly evaluating in this case, BCRA §203. It has no application to genuine issue advertising—a category of corporate speech Congress found to be far more substantial than election-related advertising, see McConnell, 540 U. S., at 207—or to Internet, telephone, and print advocacy.[31] Like numer-

[31] Roaming far afield from the case at hand, the majority worries that the Government will use §203 to ban books, pamphlets, and blogs. Ante, at 20, 33, 49. Yet by its plain terms, §203 does not apply to printed material. See 2 U. S. C. §434(f)(3)(A)(i); see also 11 CFR §100.29(c)(1) ("[E]lectioneering communication does not include communications appearing in print media"). And in light of the ordinary understanding of the terms "broadcast, cable, [and] satellite," §434(f)(3)(A)(i), coupled with Congress' clear aim of targeting "a virtual torrent of televised election-related ads," McConnell, 540 U. S., at 207, we highly doubt that §203 could be interpreted to apply to a Web site or book that happens to be transmitted at some stage over airwaves or cable lines, or that the FEC would ever try to do so. See 11 CFR §100.26 (exempting most Internet communications from regulation as advertising); §100.155 (exempting uncompensated Internet activity from regulation as an expenditure); Supp. Brief for Center for Independent Media et al. as Amici Curiae 14 (explaining that "the FEC has ous statutes, it exempts media companies' news stories, commentaries, and editorials from its electioneering restrictions, in recognition of the unique role played by the institutional press in sustaining public debate.[32] See 2 U. S. C. §434(f)(3)(B)(i); McConnell, 540 U. S., at 208–209; see also Austin, 494 U. S., at 666–668. It also allows corporations to spend unlimited sums on political communications with their executives and shareholders, §441b(b)(2)(A); 11 CFR §114.3(a)(1), to fund additional PAC activity through trade associations, 2 U. S. C. §441b(b)(4)(D), to distribute voting guides and voting records, 11 CFR §§114.4(c)(4)–(5), to underwrite voter registration and voter turnout activities, §114.3(c)(4); §114.4(c)(2), to host fundraising events for candidates within certain limits, §114.4(c); §114.2(f)(2), and to publicly endorse candidates through a press release and press conference, §114.4(c)(6).

At the time Citizens United brought this lawsuit, the only types of speech that could be regulated under §203 were: (1) broadcast, cable, or satellite communications;[33] (2) capable of reaching at least 50,000 persons in the relevant electorate;[34] (3) made within 30 days of a primary or 60 days of a general federal election;[35] (4) by a labor union or a non-MCFL, nonmedia corporation;[36] (5) paid for consistently construed [BCRA's] media exemption to apply to a variety of non-traditional media"). If it should, the Government acknowledges "there would be quite [a] good as-applied challenge." Tr. of Oral Arg. 65 (Sept. 9, 2009).

[32] As the Government points out, with a media corporation there is also a lesser risk that investors will not understand, learn about, or support the advocacy messages that the corporation disseminates. Supp. Reply Brief for Appellee 10. Everyone knows and expects that media outlets may seek to influence elections in this way.

with general treasury funds;[37] and (6) "susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than as an appeal to vote for or against a specific candidate."[38] The category of communications meeting all of these criteria is not trivial, but the notion that corporate political speech has been "suppress[ed] . . . altogether," ante, at 2, that corporations have been "exclu[ded] . . . from the general public dialogue," ante, at 25, or that a work of fiction such as Mr. Smith Goes to Washington might be covered, ante, at 56–57, is nonsense.[39] Even the plaintiffs in McConnell, who had every incentive to depict BCRA as negatively as possible, declined to argue that §203's prohibition on certain uses of general treasury funds amounts to a complete ban. See 540 U. S., at 204.

In many ways, then, §203 functions as a source restriction or a time, place, and manner restriction. It applies in a viewpoint-neutral fashion to a narrow subset of advocacy messages about clearly identified candidates for federal office, made during discrete time periods through discrete channels. In the case at hand, all Citizens United needed to do to broadcast Hillary right before the primary was to abjure business contributions or use the funds in its PAC, which by its own account is "one of the most active conservative PACs in America," Citizens United Political Victory [39] It is likewise nonsense to suggest that the FEC's "'business is to censor.'" Ante, at 18 (quoting Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U. S. 51, 57 (1965)). The FEC's business is to administer and enforce the campaign finance laws. The regulatory body at issue in Freedman was a state Board of Censors that had virtually unfettered discretion to bar distribution of motion picture films it deemed not to be "moral and proper." See id., at 52–53, and n. 2. No movie could be shown in the State of Maryland that was not first approved and licensed by the Board of Censors. Id., at 52, n. 1. It is an understatement to say that Freedman is not on point, and the majority's characterization of the FEC is deeply disconcerting.

Fund, http://www.cupvf.org/.[40]

So let us be clear: Neither Austin nor McConnell held or implied that corporations may be silenced; the FEC is not a "censor"; and in the years since these cases were decided, corporations have continued to play a major role in the national dialogue. Laws such as §203 target a class of communications that is especially likely to corrupt the political process, that is at least one degree removed from the views of individual citizens, and that may not even reflect the views of those who pay for it. Such laws burden political speech, and that is always a serious matter, demanding careful scrutiny. But the majority's incessant talk of a "ban" aims at a straw man.

Identity-Based Distinctions

The second pillar of the Court's opinion is its assertion that "the Government cannot restrict political speech based on the speaker's . . . identity." Ante, at 30; accord, ante, at 1, 24, 26, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 49, 50. The case on which it relies for this proposition is First Nat. Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765 (1978). As I shall explain, infra, at 52–55, the holding in that case was far narrower than the Court implies. Like its paeans to unfettered discourse, the Court's denunciation of identity-based distinctions may have rhetorical appeal but it obscures reality.

"Our jurisprudence over the past 216 years has rejected an absolutist interpretation" of the First Amendment. WRTL, 551 U. S., at 482 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.). The [40] Citizens United has administered this PAC for over a decade. See Defendant FEC's Memorandum in Opposition to Plaintiff's Second Motion for Preliminary Injunction in No. 07–2240 (ARR, RCL, RWR) (DC), p. 20. Citizens United also operates multiple "527" organizations that engage in partisan political activity. See Defendant FEC's Statement of Material Facts as to Which There Is No Genuine Dispute in No. 07–2240 (DC), ¶¶ 22–24.

First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." Apart perhaps from measures designed to protect the press, that text might seem to permit no distinctions of any kind. Yet in a variety of contexts, we have held that speech can be regulated differentially on account of the speaker's identity, when identity is understood in categorical or institutional terms. The Government routinely places special restrictions on the speech rights of students,[41] prisoners,[42] members of the Armed Forces,[43] foreigners,[44] and its own employees.[45] When such restrictions are justified by a legitimate governmental interest, they do not necessarily raise constitutional problems.[46] In [42] See, e.g., Jones v. North Carolina Prisoners' Labor Union, Inc., 433 U. S. 119, 129 (1977) ("In a prison context, an inmate does not retain those First Amendment rights that are inconsistent with his status as a prisoner or with the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system" (internal quotation marks omitted)).

[43] See, e.g., Parker v. Levy, 417 U. S. 733, 758 (1974) ("While the members of the military are not excluded from the protection granted by the First Amendment, the different character of the military community and of the military mission requires a different application of those protections").

[44] See, e.g., 2 U. S. C. §441e(a)(1) (foreign nationals may not directly or indirectly make contributions or independent expenditures in connection with a U. S. election).

[45] See, e.g., Civil Service Comm'n v. Letter Carriers, 413 U. S. 548 (1973) (upholding statute prohibiting Executive Branch employees from taking "any active part in political management or in political campaigns" (internal quotation marks omitted)); Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75 (1947) (same); United States v. Wurzbach, 280 U. S. 396 (1930) (upholding statute prohibiting federal employees from making contributions to Members of Congress for "any political purpose whatever" (internal quotation marks omitted)); Ex parte Curtis, 106 U. S. 371 (1882) (upholding statute prohibiting certain federal employees from giving money to other employees for political purposes).

[46] The majority states that the cases just cited are "inapposite" be-contrast to the blanket rule that the majority espouses, our cases recognize that the Government's interests may be more or less compelling with respect to different classes of speakers,[47] cf. Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U. S. 575, 585 (1983) ("[D]ifferential treatment" is constitutionally suspect "unless justified by some special characteristic" of the regulated class of speakers (emphasis added)), and that the constitutional rights of certain categories of speakers, in certain contexts, "'are not automatically coextensive with the rights'" that are normally accorded to members of our society, Morse v. Frederick, 551 U. S. 393, 396–397, 404 (2007) (quoting Bethel School Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U. S. 675, 682 (1986)).

The free speech guarantee thus does not render every other public interest an illegitimate basis for qualifying a speaker's autonomy; society could scarcely function if it did. It is fair to say that our First Amendment doctrine has "frowned on" certain identity-based distinctions, Los Angeles Police Dept. v. United Reporting Publishing Corp., cause they "stand only for the proposition that there are certain governmental functions that cannot operate without some restrictions on particular kinds of speech." Ante, at 25. The majority's creative suggestion that these cases stand only for that one proposition is quite implausible. In any event, the proposition lies at the heart of this case, as Congress and half the state legislatures have concluded, over many decades, that their core functions of administering elections and passing legislation cannot operate effectively without some narrow restrictions on corporate electioneering paid for by general treasury funds.

[47] Outside of the law, of course, it is a commonplace that the identity and incentives of the speaker might be relevant to an assessment of his speech. See Aristotle, Poetics 43–44 (M. Heath transl. 1996) ("In evaluating any utterance or action, one must take into account not just the moral qualities of what is actually done or said, but also the identity of the agent or speaker, the addressee, the occasion, the means, and the motive"). The insight that the identity of speakers is a proper subject of regulatory concern, it bears noting, motivates the disclaimer and disclosure provisions that the Court today upholds.

528 U. S. 32, 47, n. 4 (1999) (STEVENS, J., dissenting), particularly those that may reflect invidious discrimination or preferential treatment of a politically powerful group. But it is simply incorrect to suggest that we have prohibited all legislative distinctions based on identity or content. Not even close.

The election context is distinctive in many ways, and the Court, of course, is right that the First Amendment closely guards political speech. But in this context, too, the authority of legislatures to enact viewpoint-neutral regulations based on content and identity is well settled. We have, for example, allowed state-run broadcasters to exclude independent candidates from televised debates. Arkansas Ed. Television Comm'n v. Forbes, 523 U. S. 666 (1998).[48] We have upheld statutes that prohibit the distribution or display of campaign materials near a polling place. Burson v. Freeman, 504 U. S. 191 (1992).[49] Although we have not reviewed them directly, we have never cast doubt on laws that place special restrictions on campaign spending by foreign nationals. See, e.g., 2 U. S. C. §441e(a)(1). And we have consistently approved laws that bar Government employees, but not others, from contributing to or participating in political activities. See n. 45, supra. These statutes burden the political expression of one class of speakers, namely, civil servants. Yet we have sustained them on the basis of longstanding practice and Congress' reasoned judgment that certain regulations which leave "untouched full participation . . . in political decisions at the ballot box," Civil Service Comm'n v. Letter Carriers, 413 U. S. 548, 556 (1973) (internal quotation marks omitted), help ensure that public officials are "sufficiently free from improper influences," id., at 564, and that "confidence in the system of representative Government is not . . . eroded to a disastrous extent," id., at 565.

[48] I dissented in Forbes because the broadcaster's decision to exclude the respondent from its debate was done "on the basis of entirely subjective, ad hoc judgments," 523 U. S., at 690, that suggested anticompetitive viewpoint discrimination, id., at 693–694, and lacked a compelling justification. Needless to say, my concerns do not apply to the instant case.

[49] The law at issue in Burson was far from unusual. "[A]ll 50 States," the Court observed, "limit access to the areas in or around polling places." 504 U. S., at 206; see also Note, 91 Ky. L. J. 715, 729, n. 89, 747–769 (2003) (collecting statutes). I dissented in Burson because the evidence adduced to justify Tennessee's law was "exceptionally thin," 504 U. S., at 219, and "the reason for [the] restriction [had] disappear[ed]" over time, id., at 223. "In short," I concluded, "Tennessee ha[d] failed to point to any legitimate interest that would justify its selective regulation of campaign-related expression." Id., at 225. These criticisms are inapplicable to the case before us.

The same logic applies to this case with additional force because it is the identity of corporations, rather than individuals, that the Legislature has taken into account. As we have unanimously observed, legislatures are entitled to decide "that the special characteristics of the corporate structure require particularly careful regulation" in an electoral context. NRWC, 459 U. S., at 209–210.[50] Not only has the distinctive potential of corporations to corrupt the electoral process long been recognized, but within the area of campaign finance, corporate spending is also "furthest from the core of political expression, since corporations' First Amendment speech and association interests are derived largely from those of their members and of the public in receiving information," Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 161, n. 8 (citation omitted). Campaign finance distinctions based on corporate identity tend to be less worrisome, in other words, because the "speakers" are not natural persons, much less members of our political community, and

[50] They are likewise entitled to regulate media corporations differently from other corporations "to ensure that the law 'does not hinder or prevent the institutional press from reporting on, and publishing editorials about, newsworthy events.'" McConnell, 540 U. S., at 208 (quoting Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U. S. 652, 668 (1990)).

the governmental interests are of the highest order. Furthermore, when corporations, as a class, are distinguished from noncorporations, as a class, there is a lesser risk that regulatory distinctions will reflect invidious discrimination or political favoritism.

If taken seriously, our colleagues' assumption that the identity of a speaker has no relevance to the Government's ability to regulate political speech would lead to some remarkable conclusions. Such an assumption would have accorded the propaganda broadcasts to our troops by "Tokyo Rose" during World War II the same protection as speech by Allied commanders. More pertinently, it would appear to afford the same protection to multinational corporations controlled by foreigners as to individual Americans: To do otherwise, after all, could "'enhance the relative voice'" of some (i.e., humans) over others (i.e., nonhumans). Ante, at 33 (quoting Buckley, 424 U. S., at 49).[51] Under the majority's view, I suppose it may be a First Amendment problem that corporations are not permitted to vote, given that voting is, among other things, a [51]The Court all but confesses that a categorical approach to speaker identity is untenable when it acknowledges that Congress might be allowed to take measures aimed at "preventing foreign individuals or associations from influencing our Nation's political process." Ante, at 46–47. Such measures have been a part of U. S. campaign finance law for many years. The notion that Congress might lack the authority to distinguish foreigners from citizens in the regulation of electioneering would certainly have surprised the Framers, whose "obsession with foreign influence derived from a fear that foreign powers and individuals had no basic investment in the well-being of the country." Teachout, The Anti-Corruption Principle, 94 Cornell L. Rev. 341, 393, n. 245 (2009) (hereinafter Teachout); see also U. S. Const., Art. I, §9, cl. 8 ("[N]o Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust . . . shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State"). Professor Teachout observes that a corporation might be analogized to a foreign power in this respect, "inasmuch as its legal loyalties necessarily exclude patriotism." Teachout 393, n. 245.

form of speech.[52]

In short, the Court dramatically overstates its critique of identity-based distinctions, without ever explaining why corporate identity demands the same treatment as individual identity. Only the most wooden approach to the First Amendment could justify the unprecedented line it seeks to draw.

Our First Amendment Tradition

A third fulcrum of the Court's opinion is the idea that Austin and McConnell are radical outliers, "aberration[s]," in our First Amendment tradition. Ante, at 39; see also ante, at 45, 56 (professing fidelity to "our law and our tradition"). The Court has it exactly backwards. It is today's holding that is the radical departure from what had been settled First Amendment law. To see why, it is useful to take a long view.

1. Original Understandings

Let us start from the beginning. The Court invokes "ancient First Amendment principles," ante, at 1 (internal quotation marks omitted), and original understandings, ante, at 37–38, to defend today's ruling, yet it makes only a perfunctory attempt to ground its analysis in the principles or understandings of those who drafted and ratified the Amendment. Perhaps this is because there is not a scintilla of evidence to support the notion that anyone Meiklejohn, Political Freedom: The Constitutional Powers of the People 39–40 (1965); Tokaji, First Amendment Equal Protection: On Discretion, Inequality, and Participation, 101 Mich. L. Rev. 2409, 2508–2509 (2003). Of course, voting is not speech in a pure or formal sense, but then again neither is a campaign expenditure; both are nevertheless communicative acts aimed at influencing electoral outcomes. Cf. Strauss, Corruption, Equality, and Campaign Finance Reform, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 1369, 1383–1384 (1994) (hereinafter Strauss).

believed it would preclude regulatory distinctions based on the corporate form. To the extent that the Framers' views are discernible and relevant to the disposition of this case, they would appear to cut strongly against the majority's position.

This is not only because the Framers and their contemporaries conceived of speech more narrowly than we now think of it, see Bork, Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, 47 Ind. L. J. 1, 22 (1971), but also because they held very different views about the nature of the First Amendment right and the role of corporations in society. Those few corporations that existed at the founding were authorized by grant of a special legislative charter.[53] Corporate sponsors would petition the legislature, and the legislature, if amenable, would issue a charter that specified the corporation's powers and purposes and "authoritatively fixed the scope and content of corporate organization," including "the internal structure of the [53] Scholars have found that only a handful of business corporations were issued charters during the colonial period, and only a few hundred during all of the 18th century. See E. Dodd, American Business Corporations Until 1860, p. 197 (1954); L. Friedman, A History of American Law 188–189 (2d ed. 1985); Baldwin, American Business Corporations Before 1789, 8 Am. Hist. Rev. 449, 450–459 (1903). JUSTICE SCALIA quibbles with these figures; whereas we say that "a few hundred" charters were issued to business corporations during the 18th century, he says that the number is "approximately 335." Ante, at 2 (concurring opinion). JUSTICE SCALIA also raises the more serious point that it is improper to assess these figures by today's standards, ante, at 3, though I believe he fails to substantiate his claim that "the corporation was a familiar figure in American economic life" by the century's end, ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted). His formulation of that claim is also misleading, because the relevant reference point is not 1800 but the date of the First Amendment's ratification, in 1791. And at that time, the number of business charters must have been significantly smaller than 335, because the pace of chartering only began to pick up steam in the last decade of the 18th century. More than half of the century's total business charters were issued between 1796 and 1800. Friedman, History of American Law, at 189.

corporation." J. Hurst, The Legitimacy of the Business Corporation in the Law of the United States 1780–1970, pp. 15–16 (1970) (reprint 2004). Corporations were created, supervised, and conceptualized as quasi-public entities, "designed to serve a social function for the state." Handlin & Handlin, Origin of the American Business Corporation, 5 J. Econ. Hist. 1, 22 (1945). It was "assumed that [they] were legally privileged organizations that had to be closely scrutinized by the legislature because their purposes had to be made consistent with public welfare." R. Seavoy, Origins of the American Business Corporation, 1784–1855, p. 5 (1982).

The individualized charter mode of incorporation reflected the "cloud of disfavor under which corporations labored" in the early years of this Nation. 1 W. Fletcher, Cyclopedia of the Law of Corporations §2, p. 8 (rev. ed. 2006); see also Louis K. Liggett Co. v. Lee, 288 U. S. 517, 548–549 (1933) (Brandeis, J., dissenting) (discussing fears of the "evils" of business corporations); L. Friedman, A History of American Law 194 (2d ed. 1985) ("The word 'soulless' constantly recurs in debates over corporations. . . . Corporations, it was feared, could concentrate the worst urges of whole groups of men"). Thomas Jefferson famously fretted that corporations would subvert the Republic.[54] General incorporation statutes, and widespread acceptance of business corporations as socially useful actors, did not emerge until the 1800's. See Hansmann & Kraakman, The End of History for Corporate Law, 89 Geo. L. J. 439, 440 (2001) (hereinafter Hansmann & Kraakman) ("[A]ll general business corporation statutes appear to date from well after 1800").

[54] See Letter from Thomas Jefferson to Tom Logan (Nov. 12, 1816), in 12 The Works of Thomas Jefferson 42, 44 (P. Ford ed. 1905) ("I hope we shall . . . crush in [its] birth the aristocracy of our monied corporations which dare already to challenge our government to a trial of strength and bid defiance to the laws of our country").

The Framers thus took it as a given that corporations could be comprehensively regulated in the service of the public welfare. Unlike our colleagues, they had little trouble distinguishing corporations from human beings, and when they constitutionalized the right to free speech in the First Amendment, it was the free speech of individual Americans that they had in mind.[55] While individuals might join together to exercise their speech rights, business corporations, at least, were plainly not seen as facilitating such associational or expressive ends. Even "the notion that business corporations could invoke the First Amendment would probably have been quite a novelty," given that "at the time, the legitimacy of every corporate activity was thought to rest entirely in a concession of the sovereign." Shelledy, Autonomy, Debate, and Corporate Speech, 18 Hastings Const. L. Q. 541, 578 (1991); cf. Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 636

[55] In normal usage then, as now, the term "speech" referred to oral communications by individuals. See, e.g., 2 S. Johnson, Dictionary of the English Language 1853–1854 (4th ed. 1773) (reprinted 1978) (listing as primary definition of "speech": "The power of articulate utterance; the power of expressing thoughts by vocal words"); 2 N. Webster, American Dictionary of the English Language (1828) (reprinted 1970) (listing as primary definition of "speech": "The faculty of uttering articulate sounds or words, as in human beings; the faculty of expressing thoughts by words or articulate sounds. Speech was given to man by his Creator for the noblest purposes"). Indeed, it has been "claimed that the notion of institutional speech . . . did not exist in post-revolutionary America." Fagundes, State Actors as First Amendment Speakers, 100 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1637, 1654 (2006); see also Bezanson, Institutional Speech, 80 Iowa L. Rev. 735, 775 (1995) ("In the intellectual heritage of the eighteenth century, the idea that free speech was individual and personal was deeply rooted and clearly manifest in the writings of Locke, Milton, and others on whom the framers of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights drew"). Given that corporations were conceived of as artificial entities and do not have the technical capacity to "speak," the burden of establishing that the Framers and ratifiers understood "the freedom of speech" to encompass corporate speech is, I believe, far heavier than the majority acknowledges.

(1819) (Marshall, C. J.) ("A corporation is an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law. Being the mere creature of law, it possesses only those properties which the charter of its creation confers upon it"); Eule, Promoting Speaker Diversity: Austin and Metro Broadcasting, 1990 S. Ct. Rev. 105, 129 ("The framers of the First Amendment could scarcely have anticipated its application to the corporation form. That, of course, ought not to be dispositive. What is compelling, however, is an understanding of who was supposed to be the beneficiary of the free speech guaranty—the individual"). In light of these background practices and understandings, it seems to me implausible that the Framers believed "the freedom of speech" would extend equally to all corporate speakers, much less that it would preclude legislatures from taking limited measures to guard against corporate capture of elections.

The Court observes that the Framers drew on diverse intellectual sources, communicated through newspapers, and aimed to provide greater freedom of speech than had existed in England. Ante, at 37. From these (accurate) observations, the Court concludes that "[t]he First Amendment was certainly not understood to condone the suppression of political speech in society's most salient media." Ibid. This conclusion is far from certain, given that many historians believe the Framers were focused on prior restraints on publication and did not understand the First Amendment to "prevent the subsequent punishment of such [publications] as may be deemed contrary to the public welfare." Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U. S. 697, 714 (1931). Yet, even if the majority's conclusion were correct, it would tell us only that the First Amendment was understood to protect political speech in certain media. It would tell us little about whether the Amendment was understood to protect general treasury electioneering expenditures by corporations, and to what extent.

As a matter of original expectations, then, it seems absurd to think that the First Amendment prohibits legislatures from taking into account the corporate identity of a sponsor of electoral advocacy. As a matter of original meaning, it likewise seems baseless—unless one evaluates the First Amendment's "principles," ante, at 1, 48, or its "purpose," ante, at 5 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.), at such a high level of generality that the historical understandings of the Amendment cease to be a meaningful constraint on the judicial task. This case sheds a revelatory light on the assumption of some that an impartial judge's application of an originalist methodology is likely to yield more determinate answers, or to play a more decisive role in the decisional process, than his or her views about sound policy.

JUSTICE SCALIA criticizes the foregoing discussion for failing to adduce statements from the founding era showing that corporations were understood to be excluded from the First Amendment's free speech guarantee. Ante, at 1–2, 9. Of course, JUSTICE SCALIA adduces no statements to suggest the contrary proposition, or even to suggest that the contrary proposition better reflects the kind of right that the drafters and ratifiers of the Free Speech Clause thought they were enshrining. Although JUSTICE SCALIA makes a perfectly sensible argument that an individual's right to speak entails a right to speak with others for a common cause, cf. MCFL, 479 U. S. 238, he does not explain why those two rights must be precisely identical, or why that principle applies to electioneering by corporations that serve no "common cause." Ante, at 8. Nothing in his account dislodges my basic point that members of the founding generation held a cautious view of corporate power and a narrow view of corporate rights (not that they "despised" corporations, ante, at 2), and that they conceptualized speech in individualistic terms. If no prominent Framer bothered to articulate that corporate speech would have lesser status than individual speech, that may well be because the contrary proposition—if not also the very notion of "corporate speech"—was inconceivable.[56]

JUSTICE SCALIA also emphasizes the unqualified nature of the First Amendment text. Ante, at 2, 8. Yet he would seemingly read out the Free Press Clause: How else could he claim that my purported views on newspapers must track my views on corporations generally? Ante, at 6.[57] Like virtually all modern lawyers, JUSTICE SCALIA presumably believes that the First Amendment restricts the Executive, even though its language refers to Congress alone. In any event, the text only leads us back to the questions who or what is guaranteed "the freedom of speech," and, just as critically, what that freedom consists of and under what circumstances it may be limited. JUSTICE SCALIA appears to believe that because corporations are created and utilized by individuals, it follows (as [56] Postratification practice bolsters the conclusion that the First Amendment, "as originally understood," ante, at 37, did not give corporations political speech rights on a par with the rights of individuals. Well into the modern era of general incorporation statutes, "[t]he common law was generally interpreted as prohibiting corporate political participation," First Nat. Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765, 819 (1978) (White, J., dissenting), and this Court did not recognize any First Amendment protections for corporations until the middle part of the 20th century, see ante, at 25–26 (listing cases).

[57] In fact, the Free Press Clause might be turned against JUSTICE SCALIA, for two reasons. First, we learn from it that the drafters of the First Amendment did draw distinctions—explicit distinctions—between types of "speakers," or speech outlets or forms. Second, the Court's strongest historical evidence all relates to the Framers' views on the press, see ante, at 37–38; ante, at 4–6 (SCALIA, J., concurring), yet while the Court tries to sweep this evidence into the Free Speech Clause, the Free Press Clause provides a more natural textual home. The text and history highlighted by our colleagues suggests why one type of corporation, those that are part of the press, might be able to claim special First Amendment status, and therefore why some kinds of "identity"-based distinctions might be permissible after all. Once one accepts that much, the intellectual edifice of the majority opinion crumbles.

night the day) that their electioneering must be equally protected by the First Amendment and equally immunized from expenditure limits. See ante, at 7–8. That conclusion certainly does not follow as a logical matter, and JUSTICE SCALIA fails to explain why the original public meaning leads it to follow as a matter of interpretation.

The truth is we cannot be certain how a law such as BCRA §203 meshes with the original meaning of the First Amendment.[58] I have given several reasons why I believe the Constitution would have been understood then, and ought to be understood now, to permit reasonable restrictions on corporate electioneering, and I will give many more reasons in the pages to come. The Court enlists the Framers in its defense without seriously grappling with their understandings of corporations or the free speech right, or with the republican principles that underlay those understandings.

In fairness, our campaign finance jurisprudence has never attended very closely to the views of the Framers, see Randall v. Sorrell, 548 U. S. 230, 280 (2006) (STEVENS, J., dissenting), whose political universe differed profoundly from that of today. We have long since held that corporations are covered by the First Amendment, and many legal scholars have long since rejected the concession theory of the corporation. But "historical context is usually relevant," ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted), and in light of the Court's effort to cast itself as guardian of ancient values, it pays to remember that nothing in our constitutional history dictates today's outcome. To the contrary, this history helps illuminate just how extraordinarily dissonant the decision is.

[58] Cf. L. Levy, Legacy of Suppression: Freedom of Speech and Press in Early American History 4 (1960) ("The meaning of no other clause of the Bill of Rights at the time of its framing and ratification has been so obscure to us" as the Free Speech and Press Clause).

2. Legislative and Judicial Interpretation

A century of more recent history puts to rest any notion that today's ruling is faithful to our First Amendment tradition. At the federal level, the express distinction between corporate and individual political spending on elections stretches back to 1907, when Congress passed the Tillman Act, ch. 420, 34 Stat. 864, banning all corporate contributions to candidates. The Senate Report on the legislation observed that "[t]he evils of the use of [corporate] money in connection with political elections are so generally recognized that the committee deems it unnecessary to make any argument in favor of the general purpose of this measure. It is in the interest of good government and calculated to promote purity in the selection of public officials." S. Rep. No. 3056, 59th Cong., 1st Sess., 2 (1906). President Roosevelt, in his 1905 annual message to Congress, declared:

> "'All contributions by corporations to any political committee or for any political purpose should be forbidden by law; directors should not be permitted to use stockholders' money for such purposes; and, moreover, a prohibition of this kind would be, as far as it went, an effective method of stopping the evils aimed at in corrupt practices acts.'" United States v. Automobile Workers, 352 U. S. 567, 572 (1957) (quoting 40 Cong. Rec. 96).

The Court has surveyed the history leading up to the Tillman Act several times, see WRTL, 551 U. S., at 508–510 (Souter, J., dissenting); McConnell, 540 U. S., at 115; Automobile Workers, 352 U. S., at 570–575, and I will refrain from doing so again. It is enough to say that the Act was primarily driven by two pressing concerns: first, the enormous power corporations had come to wield in federal elections, with the accompanying threat of both actual corruption and a public perception of corruption; and second, a respect for the interest of shareholders and members in preventing the use of their money to support candidates they opposed. See ibid.; United States v. CIO, 335 U. S. 106, 113 (1948); Winkler, "Other People's Money": Corporations, Agency Costs, and Campaign Finance Law, 92 Geo. L. J. 871 (2004).

Over the years, the limitations on corporate political spending have been modified in a number of ways, as Congress responded to changes in the American economy and political practices that threatened to displace the commonweal. Justice Souter recently traced these developments at length.[59] WRTL, 551 U. S., at 507–519 (dissenting opinion); see also McConnell, 540 U. S., at 115–133; McConnell, 251 F. Supp. 2d, at 188–205. The Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 is of special significance for this case. In that Act passed more than 60 years ago, Congress extended the prohibition on corporate support of candidates to cover not only direct contributions, but independent expenditures as well. Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, §304, 61 Stat. 159. The bar on contributions "was being so narrowly construed" that corporations were easily able to defeat the purposes of the Act by supporting candidates through other means. WRTL, 551 U. S., at 511 (Souter, J., dissenting) (citing S. Rep. No. 1, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 38–39 (1947)).

Our colleagues emphasize that in two cases from the middle of the 20th century, several Justices wrote sepa-

[59] As the majority notes, there is some academic debate about the precise origins of these developments. Ante, at 48; see also n. 19, supra. There is always some academic debate about such developments; the motives of legislatures are never entirely clear or unitary. Yet the basic shape and trajectory of 20th-century campaign finance reform are clear, and one need not take a naïve or triumphalist view of this history to find it highly relevant. The Court's skepticism does nothing to mitigate the absurdity of its claim that Austin and McConnell were outliers. Nor does it alter the fact that five Justices today destroy a longstanding American practice.

rately to criticize the expenditure restriction as applied to unions, even though the Court declined to pass on its constitutionality. Ante, at 27–28. Two features of these cases are of far greater relevance. First, those Justices were writing separately; which is to say, their position failed to command a majority. Prior to today, this was a fact we found significant in evaluating precedents. Second, each case in this line expressed support for the principle that corporate and union political speech financed with PAC funds, collected voluntarily from the organization's stockholders or members, receives greater protection than speech financed with general treasury funds.[60]

[60] See Pipefitters v. United States, 407 U. S. 385, 409, 414–415 (1972) (reading the statutory bar on corporate and union campaign spending not to apply to "the voluntary donations of employees," when maintained in a separate account, because "[t]he dominant [legislative] concern in requiring that contributions be voluntary was, after all, to protect the dissenting stockholder or union member"); Automobile Workers, 352 U. S., at 592 (advising the District Court to consider on remand whether the broadcast in question was "paid for out of the general dues of the union membership or [whether] the funds [could] be fairly said to have obtained on a voluntary basis"); United States v. CIO, 335 U. S. 106, 123 (1948) (observing that "funds voluntarily contributed [by union members or corporate stockholders] for election purposes" might not be covered by the expenditure bar). Both the Pipefitters and the Automobile Workers Court approvingly referenced Congress' goal of reducing "the effect of aggregated wealth on federal elections," understood as wealth drawn from a corporate or union general treasury without the stockholders' or members' "free and knowing choice." Pipefitters, 407 U. S., at 416; see Automobile Workers, 352 U. S., at 582.

The two dissenters in Pipefitters would not have read the statutory provision in question, a successor to §304 of the Taft-Hartley Act, to allow such robust use of corporate and union funds to finance otherwise prohibited electioneering. "This opening of the door to extensive corporate and union influence on the elective and legislative processes," Justice Powell wrote, "must be viewed with genuine concern. This seems to me to be a regressive step as contrasted with the numerous legislative and judicial actions in recent years designed to assure that elections are indeed free and representative." 407 U. S., at 450 (opinion

This principle was carried forward when Congress enacted comprehensive campaign finance reform in the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (FECA), 86 Stat. 3, which retained the restriction on using general treasury funds for contributions and expenditures, 2 U. S. C. §441b(a). FECA codified the option for corporations and unions to create PACs to finance contributions and expenditures forbidden to the corporation or union itself. §441b(b).

By the time Congress passed FECA in 1971, the bar on corporate contributions and expenditures had become such an accepted part of federal campaign finance regulation that when a large number of plaintiffs, including several nonprofit corporations, challenged virtually every aspect of the Act in Buckley, 424 U. S. 1, no one even bothered to argue that the bar as such was unconstitutional. Buckley famously (or infamously) distinguished direct contributions from independent expenditures, id., at 58–59, but its silence on corporations only reinforced the understanding that corporate expenditures could be treated differently from individual expenditures. "Since our decision in Buckley, Congress' power to prohibit corporations and unions from using funds in their treasuries to finance advertisements expressly advocating the election or defeat of candidates in federal elections has been firmly embedded in our law." McConnell, 540 U. S., at 203.

Thus, it was unremarkable, in a 1982 case holding that Congress could bar nonprofit corporations from soliciting nonmembers for PAC funds, that then-Justice Rehnquist wrote for a unanimous Court that Congress' "careful legislative adjustment of the federal electoral laws, in a cautious advance, step by step, to account for the particular legal and economic attributes of corporations . . . warrants considerable deference," and "reflects a permissible assessment of the dangers posed by those entities to the electoral process." NRWC, 459 U. S., at 209 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). "The governmental interest in preventing both actual corruption and the appearance of corruption of elected representatives has long been recognized," the unanimous Court observed, "and there is no reason why it may not . . . be accomplished by treating . . . corporations . . . differently from individuals." Id., at 210–211.

The corporate/individual distinction was not questioned by the Court's disposition, in 1986, of a challenge to the expenditure restriction as applied to a distinctive type of nonprofit corporation. In MCFL, 479 U. S. 238, we stated again "that 'the special characteristics of the corporate structure require particularly careful regulation,'" id., at 256 (quoting NRWC, 459 U. S., at 209–210), and again we acknowledged that the Government has a legitimate interest in "regulat[ing] the substantial aggregations of wealth amassed by the special advantages which go with the corporate form," 479 U. S., at 257 (internal quotation marks omitted). Those aggregations can distort the "free trade in ideas" crucial to candidate elections, ibid., at the expense of members or shareholders who may disagree with the object of the expenditures, id., at 260 (internal quotation marks omitted). What the Court held by a 5-to-4 vote was that a limited class of corporations must be allowed to use their general treasury funds for independent expenditures, because Congress' interests in protecting shareholders and "restrict[ing] 'the influence of political war chests funneled through the corporate form,'" id., at 257 (quoting FEC v. National Conservative Political Action Comm., 470 U. S. 480, 501 (1985) (NCPAC)), did not apply to corporations that were structurally insulated from those concerns.[61]

[61] Specifically, these corporations had to meet three conditions. First,

It is worth remembering for present purposes that the four MCFL dissenters, led by Chief Justice Rehnquist, thought the Court was carrying the First Amendment too far. They would have recognized congressional authority to bar general treasury electioneering expenditures even by this class of nonprofits; they acknowledged that "the threat from corporate political activity will vary depending on the particular characteristics of a given corporation," but believed these "distinctions among corporations" were "distinctions in degree," not "in kind," and thus "more properly drawn by the Legislature than by the Judiciary." 479 U. S., at 268 (opinion of Rehnquist, C. J.) (internal quotation marks omitted). Not a single Justice suggested that regulation of corporate political speech could be no more stringent than of speech by an individual.

Four years later, in Austin, 494 U. S. 652, we considered whether corporations falling outside the MCFL exception could be barred from using general treasury funds to make independent expenditures in support of, or in opposition to, candidates. We held they could be. Once again recognizing the importance of "the integrity of the marketplace of political ideas" in candidate elections, MCFL, 479 U. S., at 257, we noted that corporations have "special advantages—such as limited liability, perpetual life, and favorable treatment of the accumulation and distribution of assets," 494 U. S., at 658–659—that allow them to spend prodigious general treasury sums on campaign messages they had to be formed "for the express purpose of promoting political ideas," so that their resources reflected political support rather than commercial success. MCFL, 479 U. S., at 264. Next, they had to have no shareholders, so that "persons connected with the organization will have no economic disincentive for disassociating with it if they disagree with its political activity." Ibid. Finally, they could not be "established by a business corporation or a labor union," nor "accept contributions from such entities," lest they "serv[e] as conduits for the type of direct spending that creates a threat to the political marketplace." Ibid.

that have "little or no correlation" with the beliefs held by actual persons, id., at 660. In light of the corrupting effects such spending might have on the political process, ibid., we permitted the State of Michigan to limit corporate expenditures on candidate elections to corporations' PACs, which rely on voluntary contributions and thus "reflect actual public support for the political ideals espoused by corporations," ibid. Notwithstanding our colleagues' insinuations that Austin deprived the public of general "ideas," "facts," and "knowledge," ante, at 38–39, the decision addressed only candidate-focused expenditures and gave the State no license to regulate corporate spending on other matters.

In the 20 years since Austin, we have reaffirmed its holding and rationale a number of times, see, e.g., Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 153–156, most importantly in McConnell, 540 U. S. 93, where we upheld the provision challenged here, §203 of BCRA.[62] Congress crafted §203 in response to a problem created by Buckley. The Buckley

[62] According to THE CHIEF JUSTICE, we are "erroneou[s]" in claiming that McConnell and Beaumont "'reaffirmed'" Austin. Ante, at 5. In both cases, the Court explicitly relied on Austin and quoted from it at length. See 540 U. S., at 204–205; 539 U. S., at 153–155, 158, 160, 163; see also ante, at 15 ("The holding and validity of Austin were essential to the reasoning of the McConnell majority opinion"); Brief for Appellants National Rifle Association et al., O. T. 2003, No. 02–1675, p. 21 ("Beaumont reaffirmed . . . the Austin rationale for restricting expenditures"). The McConnell Court did so in the teeth of vigorous protests by Justices in today's majority that Austin should be overruled. See ante, at 15 (citing relevant passages); see also Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 163–164 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in judgment). Both Courts also heard criticisms of Austin from parties or amici. See Brief for Appellants Chamber of Commerce of the United States et al., O. T. 2003, No. 02–1756, p. 35, n. 22; Reply Brief for Appellants/Cross-Appellees Senator Mitch McConnell et al., O. T. 2003, No. 02–1674, pp. 13–14; Brief for Pacific Legal Foundation as Amicus Curiae in FEC v. Beaumont, O. T. 2002, No. 02–403, passim. If this does not qualify as reaffirmation of a precedent, then I do not know what would.

Court had construed FECA's definition of prohibited "expenditures" narrowly to avoid any problems of constitutional vagueness, holding it applicable only to "communications that expressly advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate," 424 U. S., at 80, i.e., statements containing so-called "magic words" like "'vote for,' 'elect,' 'support,' 'cast your ballot for,' 'Smith for Congress,' 'vote against,' 'defeat,' [or] 'reject,'" id., at 43–44, and n. 52. After Buckley, corporations and unions figured out how to circumvent the limits on express advocacy by using sham "issue ads" that "eschewed the use of magic words" but nonetheless "advocate[d] the election or defeat of clearly identified federal candidates." McConnell, 540 U. S., at 126. "Corporations and unions spent hundreds of millions of dollars of their general funds to pay for these ads." Id., at 127. Congress passed §203 to address this circumvention, prohibiting corporations and unions from using general treasury funds for electioneering communications that "refe[r] to a clearly identified candidate," whether or not those communications use the magic words. 2 U. S. C. §434(f)(3)(A)(i)(I).

When we asked in McConnell "whether a compelling governmental interest justifie[d]" §203, we found the question "easily answered": "We have repeatedly sustained legislation aimed at 'the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth that are accumulated with the help of the corporate form and that have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas.'" 540 U. S., at 205 (quoting Austin, 494 U. S., at 660). These precedents "represent respect for the legislative judgment that the special characteristics of the corporate structure require particularly careful regulation." 540 U. S., at 205 (internal quotation marks omitted). "Moreover, recent cases have recognized that certain restrictions on corporate electoral involvement permissibly hedge against '"circumvention of [valid] contribution limits."'" Ibid. (quoting Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 155, in turn quoting FEC v. Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Comm., 533 U. S. 431, 456, and n. 18 (2001) (Colorado II); alteration in original). BCRA, we found, is faithful to the compelling governmental interests in "'preserving the integrity of the electoral process, preventing corruption, . . . sustaining the active, alert responsibility of the individual citizen in a democracy for the wise conduct of the government,'" and maintaining "'the individual citizen's confidence in government.'" 540 U. S., at 206–207, n. 88 (quoting Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 788–789; some internal quotation marks and brackets omitted). What made the answer even easier than it might have been otherwise was the option to form PACs, which give corporations, at the least, "a constitutionally sufficient opportunity to engage in" independent expenditures. 540 U. S., at 203.

3. Buckley and Bellotti

Against this extensive background of congressional regulation of corporate campaign spending, and our repeated affirmation of this regulation as constitutionally sound, the majority dismisses Austin as "a significant departure from ancient First Amendment principles," ante, at 1 (internal quotation marks omitted). How does the majority attempt to justify this claim? Selected passages from two cases, Buckley, 424 U. S. 1, and Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765, do all of the work. In the Court's view, Buckley and Bellotti decisively rejected the possibility of distinguishing corporations from natural persons in the 1970's; it just so happens that in every single case in which the Court has reviewed campaign finance legislation in the decades since, the majority failed to grasp this truth. The Federal Congress and dozens of state legislatures, we now know, have been similarly deluded.

The majority emphasizes Buckley's statement that

"'[t]he concept that government may restrict the speech of some elements of our society in order to enhance the relative voice of others is wholly foreign to the First Amendment.'" Ante, at 33 (quoting 424 U. S., at 48–49); ante, at 8 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.). But this elegant phrase cannot bear the weight that our colleagues have placed on it. For one thing, the Constitution does, in fact, permit numerous "restrictions on the speech of some in order to prevent a few from drowning out the many": for example, restrictions on ballot access and on legislators' floor time. Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC, 528 U. S. 377, 402 (2000) (BREYER, J., concurring). For another, the Buckley Court used this line in evaluating "the ancillary governmental interest in equalizing the relative ability of individuals and groups to influence the outcome of elections." 424 U. S., at 48. It is not apparent why this is relevant to the case before us. The majority suggests that Austin rests on the foreign concept of speech equalization, ante, at 34; ante, at 8–10 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.), but we made it clear in Austin (as in several cases before and since) that a restriction on the way corporations spend their money is no mere exercise in disfavoring the voice of some elements of our society in preference to others. Indeed, we expressly ruled that the compelling interest supporting Michigan's statute was not one of "'equaliz[ing] the relative influence of speakers on elections,'" Austin, 494 U. S., at 660 (quoting id., at 705 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting)), but rather the need to confront the distinctive corrupting potential of corporate electoral advocacy financed by general treasury dollars, id., at 659–660.

For that matter, it should go without saying that when we made this statement in Buckley, we could not have been casting doubt on the restriction on corporate expenditures in candidate elections, which had not been challenged as "foreign to the First Amendment," ante, at 33 (quoting Buckley, 424 U. S., at 49), or for any other reason.

Buckley's independent expenditure analysis was focused on a very different statutory provision, 18 U. S. C. §608(e)(1) (1970 ed., Supp. V). It is implausible to think, as the majority suggests, ante, at 29–30, that Buckley covertly invalidated FECA's separate corporate and union campaign expenditure restriction, §610 (now codified at 2 U. S. C. §441b), even though that restriction had been on the books for decades before Buckley and would remain on the books, undisturbed, for decades after.

The case on which the majority places even greater weight than Buckley, however, is Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765, claiming it "could not have been clearer" that Bellotti's holding forbade distinctions between corporate and individual expenditures like the one at issue here, ante, at 30. The Court's reliance is odd. The only thing about Bellotti that could not be clearer is that it declined to adopt the majority's position. Bellotti ruled, in an explicit limitation on the scope of its holding, that "our consideration of a corporation's right to speak on issues of general public interest implies no comparable right in the quite different context of participation in a political campaign for election to public office." 435 U. S., at 788, n. 26; see also id., at 787–788 (acknowledging that the interests in preserving public confidence in Government and protecting dissenting shareholders may be "weighty . . . in the context of partisan candidate elections"). Bellotti, in other words, did not touch the question presented in Austin and McConnell, and the opinion squarely disavowed the proposition for which the majority cites it.

The majority attempts to explain away the distinction Bellotti drew—between general corporate speech and campaign speech intended to promote or prevent the election of specific candidates for office—as inconsistent with the rest of the opinion and with Buckley. Ante, at 31, 42–44. Yet the basis for this distinction is perfectly coherent: The anticorruption interests that animate regulations of corporate participation in candidate elections, the "importance" of which "has never been doubted," 435 U. S., at 788, n. 26, do not apply equally to regulations of corporate participation in referenda. A referendum cannot owe a political debt to a corporation, seek to curry favor with a corporation, or fear the corporation's retaliation. Cf. Austin, 494 U. S., at 678 (STEVENS, J., concurring); Citizens Against Rent Control/Coalition for Fair Housing v. Berkeley, 454 U. S. 290, 299 (1981). The majority likewise overlooks the fact that, over the past 30 years, our cases have repeatedly recognized the candidate/issue distinction. See, e.g., Austin, 494 U. S., at 659; NCPAC, 470 U. S., at 495–496; FCC v. League of Women Voters of Cal., 468 U. S. 364, 371, n. 9 (1984); NRWC, 459 U. S., at 210, n. 7. The Court's critique of Bellotti's footnote 26 puts it in the strange position of trying to elevate Bellotti to canonical status, while simultaneously disparaging a critical piece of its analysis as unsupported and irreconcilable with Buckley. Bellotti, apparently, is both the font of all wisdom and internally incoherent.

The Bellotti Court confronted a dramatically different factual situation from the one that confronts us in this case: a state statute that barred business corporations' expenditures on some referenda but not others. Specifically, the statute barred a business corporation "from making contributions or expenditures 'for the purpose of . . . influencing or affecting the vote on any question submitted to the voters, other than one materially affecting any of the property, business or assets of the corporation,'" 435 U. S., at 768 (quoting Mass. Gen. Laws Ann., ch. 55, §8 (West Supp. 1977); alteration in original), and it went so far as to provide that referenda related to income taxation would not "'be deemed materially to affect the property, business or assets of the corporation,'" 435 U. S., at 768. As might be guessed, the legislature had enacted this statute in order to limit corporate speech on a proposed state constitutional amendment to authorize a graduated income tax. The statute was a transparent attempt to prevent corporations from spending money to defeat this amendment, which was favored by a majority of legislators but had been repeatedly rejected by the voters. See id., at 769–770, and n. 3. We said that "where, as here, the legislature's suppression of speech suggests an attempt to give one side of a debatable public question an advantage in expressing its views to the people, the First Amendment is plainly offended." Id., at 785–786 (footnote omitted).

Bellotti thus involved a viewpoint-discriminatory statute, created to effect a particular policy outcome. Even Justice Rehnquist, in dissent, had to acknowledge that "a very persuasive argument could be made that the [Massachusetts Legislature], desiring to impose a personal income tax but more than once defeated in that desire by the combination of the Commonwealth's referendum provision and corporate expenditures in opposition to such a tax, simply decided to muzzle corporations on this sort of issue so that it could succeed in its desire." Id., at 827, n. 6. To make matters worse, the law at issue did not make any allowance for corporations to spend money through PACs. Id., at 768, n. 2 (opinion of the Court). This really was a complete ban on a specific, preidentified subject. See MCFL, 479 U. S., at 259, n. 12 (stating that 2 U. S. C. §441b's expenditure restriction "is of course distinguishable from the complete foreclosure of any opportunity for political speech that we invalidated in the state referendum context in . . . Bellotti" (emphasis added)).

The majority grasps a quotational straw from Bellotti, that speech does not fall entirely outside the protection of the First Amendment merely because it comes from a corporation. Ante, at 30–31. Of course not, but no one suggests the contrary and neither Austin nor McConnell held otherwise. They held that even though the expenditures at issue were subject to First Amendment scrutiny, the restrictions on those expenditures were justified by a compelling state interest. See McConnell, 540 U. S., at 205; Austin, 494 U. S., at 658, 660. We acknowledged in Bellotti that numerous "interests of the highest importance" can justify campaign finance regulation. 435 U. S., at 788–789. But we found no evidence that these interests were served by the Massachusetts law. Id., at 789. We left open the possibility that our decision might have been different if there had been "record or legislative findings that corporate advocacy threatened imminently to undermine democratic processes, thereby denigrating rather than serving First Amendment interests." Ibid.

Austin and McConnell, then, sit perfectly well with Bellotti. Indeed, all six Members of the Austin majority had been on the Court at the time of Bellotti, and none so much as hinted in Austin that they saw any tension between the decisions. The difference between the cases is not that Austin and McConnell rejected First Amendment protection for corporations whereas Bellotti accepted it. The difference is that the statute at issue in Bellotti smacked of viewpoint discrimination, targeted one class of corporations, and provided no PAC option; and the State has a greater interest in regulating independent corporate expenditures on candidate elections than on referenda, because in a functioning democracy the public must have faith that its representatives owe their positions to the people, not to the corporations with the deepest pockets.

In sum, over the course of the past century Congress has demonstrated a recurrent need to regulate corporate participation in candidate elections to "'[p]reserv[e] the integrity of the electoral process, preven[t] corruption, . . . sustai[n] the active, alert responsibility of the individual citizen,'" protect the expressive interests of shareholders, and "'[p]reserv[e] . . . the individual citizen's confidence in government.'" McConnell, 540 U. S., at 206–207, n. 88 (quoting Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 788–789; first alteration in original). These understandings provided the combined impetus behind the Tillman Act in 1907, see Automobile Workers, 352 U. S., at 570–575, the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947, see WRTL, 551 U. S., at 511 (Souter, J., dissenting), FECA in 1971, see NRWC, 459 U. S., at 209–210, and BCRA in 2002, see McConnell, 540 U. S., at 126–132. Continuously for over 100 years, this line of "[c]ampaign finance reform has been a series of reactions to documented threats to electoral integrity obvious to any voter, posed by large sums of money from corporate or union treasuries." WRTL, 551 U. S., at 522 (Souter, J., dissenting). Time and again, we have recognized these realities in approving measures that Congress and the States have taken. None of the cases the majority cites is to the contrary. The only thing new about Austin was the dissent, with its stunning failure to appreciate the legitimacy of interests recognized in the name of democratic integrity since the days of the Progressives.

IV

Having explained why this is not an appropriate case in which to revisit Austin and McConnell and why these decisions sit perfectly well with "First Amendment principles," ante, at 1, 48, I come at last to the interests that are at stake. The majority recognizes that Austin and McConnell may be defended on anticorruption, antidistortion, and shareholder protection rationales. Ante, at 32–46. It badly errs both in explaining the nature of these rationales, which overlap and complement each other, and in applying them to the case at hand.

The Anticorruption Interest

Undergirding the majority's approach to the merits is the claim that the only "sufficiently important governmental interest in preventing corruption or the appearance of corruption" is one that is "limited to quid pro quo corruption." Ante, at 43. This is the same "crabbed view of corruption" that was espoused by JUSTICE KENNEDY in McConnell and squarely rejected by the Court in that case. 540 U. S., at 152. While it is true that we have not always spoken about corruption in a clear or consistent voice, the approach taken by the majority cannot be right, in my judgment. It disregards our constitutional history and the fundamental demands of a democratic society.

On numerous occasions we have recognized Congress' legitimate interest in preventing the money that is spent on elections from exerting an "'undue influence on an officeholder's judgment'" and from creating "'the appearance of such influence,'" beyond the sphere of quid pro quo relationships. Id., at 150; see also, e.g., id., at 143–144, 152–154; Colorado II, 533 U. S., at 441; Shrink Missouri, 528 U. S., at 389. Corruption can take many forms. Bribery may be the paradigm case. But the difference between selling a vote and selling access is a matter of degree, not kind. And selling access is not qualitatively different from giving special preference to those who spent money on one's behalf. Corruption operates along a spectrum, and the majority's apparent belief that quid pro quo arrangements can be neatly demarcated from other improper influences does not accord with the theory or reality of politics. It certainly does not accord with the record Congress developed in passing BCRA, a record that stands as a remarkable testament to the energy and ingenuity with which corporations, unions, lobbyists, and politicians may go about scratching each other's backs—and which amply supported Congress' determination to target a limited set of especially destructive practices.

The District Court that adjudicated the initial challenge to BCRA pored over this record. In a careful analysis, Judge Kollar-Kotelly made numerous findings about the corrupting consequences of corporate and union independent expenditures in the years preceding BCRA's passage. See McConnell, 251 F. Supp. 2d, at 555–560, 622–625; see also id., at 804–805, 813, n. 143 (Leon, J.) (indicating agreement). As summarized in her own words:

> "The factual findings of the Court illustrate that corporations and labor unions routinely notify Members of Congress as soon as they air electioneering communications relevant to the Members' elections. The record also indicates that Members express appreciation to organizations for the airing of these election-related advertisements. Indeed, Members of Congress are particularly grateful when negative issue advertisements are run by these organizations, leaving the candidates free to run positive advertisements and be seen as 'above the fray.' Political consultants testify that campaigns are quite aware of who is running advertisements on the candidate's behalf, when they are being run, and where they are being run. Likewise, a prominent lobbyist testifies that these organizations use issue advocacy as a means to influence various Members of Congress.
> "The Findings also demonstrate that Members of Congress seek to have corporations and unions run these advertisements on their behalf. The Findings show that Members suggest that corporations or individuals make donations to interest groups with the understanding that the money contributed to these groups will assist the Member in a campaign. After the election, these organizations often seek credit for their support. . . . Finally, a large majority of Americans (80%) are of the view that corporations and other organizations that engage in electioneering communications, which benefit specific elected officials, receive special consideration from those officials when matters arise that affect these corporations and organizations." Id., at 623–624 (citations and footnote omitted).

Many of the relationships of dependency found by Judge Kollar-Kotelly seemed to have a quid pro quo basis, but other arrangements were more subtle. Her analysis shows the great difficulty in delimiting the precise scope of the quid pro quo category, as well as the adverse consequences that all such arrangements may have. There are threats of corruption that are far more destructive to a democratic society than the odd bribe. Yet the majority's understanding of corruption would leave lawmakers impotent to address all but the most discrete abuses.

Our "undue influence" cases have allowed the American people to cast a wider net through legislative experiments designed to ensure, to some minimal extent, "that officeholders will decide issues . . . on the merits or the desires of their constituencies," and not "according to the wishes of those who have made large financial contributions"—or expenditures—"valued by the officeholder." McConnell, 540 U. S., at 153.[63] When private interests are seen to exert outsized control over officeholders solely on account of the money spent on (or withheld from) their campaigns, the result can depart so thoroughly "from what is pure or correct" in the conduct of Government, Webster's Third New International Dictionary 512 (1966) (defining "corruption"), that it amounts to a "subversion . . . of the electoral process," Automobile Workers, 352 U. S., at 575. At stake in the legislative efforts to address this threat is therefore not only the legitimacy and quality of Government but also the public's faith therein, not only "the capacity of this democracy to represent its constituents [but also] the confidence of its citizens in their capacity to govern themselves," WRTL, 551 U. S., at 507 (Souter, J., dissenting). "Take away Congress' authority to regulate the appearance of undue influence and 'the cynical assumption that large donors call the tune could jeopardize the willingness of voters to take part in democratic governance.'" McConnell, 540 U. S., at 144 (quoting Shrink Missouri, 528 U. S., at 390).[64]

[63] Cf. Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC, 528 U. S. 377, 389 (2000) (recognizing "the broader threat from politicians too compliant with the wishes of large contributors"). Though discrete in scope, these experiments must impose some meaningful limits if they are to have a chance at functioning effectively and preserving the public's trust. "Even if it occurs only occasionally, the potential for such undue influence is manifest. And unlike straight cash-for-votes transactions, such corruption is neither easily detected nor practical to criminalize." McConnell, 540 U. S., at 153. There should be nothing controversial about the proposition that the influence being targeted is "undue." In a democracy, officeholders should not make public decisions with the aim of placating a financial benefactor, except to the extent that the benefactor is seen as representative of a larger constituency or its arguments are seen as especially persuasive.

The cluster of interrelated interests threatened by such undue influence and its appearance has been well captured under the rubric of "democratic integrity." WRTL, 551 U. S., at 522 (Souter, J., dissenting). This value has underlined a century of state and federal efforts to regulate the role of corporations in the electoral process.[65]

[64] The majority declares by fiat that the appearance of undue influence by high-spending corporations "will not cause the electorate to lose faith in our democracy." Ante, at 44. The electorate itself has consistently indicated otherwise, both in opinion polls, see McConnell v. FEC, 251 F. Supp. 2d 176, 557–558, 623–624 (DC 2003) (opinion of Kollar-Kotelly, J.), and in the laws its representatives have passed, and our colleagues have no basis for elevating their own optimism into a tenet of constitutional law.

[65] Quite distinct from the interest in preventing improper influences on the electoral process, I have long believed that "a number of [other] purposes, both legitimate and substantial, may justify the imposition of reasonable limitations on the expenditures permitted during the course of any single campaign." Davis v. FEC, 554 U. S. ___, ___ (2008) (slip op., at 3) (opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part). In my judgment, such limitations may be justified to the extent they are tailored to "improving the quality of the exposition of ideas" that voters

Unlike the majority's myopic focus on quid pro quo scenarios and the free-floating "First Amendment principles" on which it rests so much weight, ante, at 1, 48, this broader understanding of corruption has deep roots in the Nation's history. "During debates on the earliest [campaign finance] reform acts, the terms 'corruption' and 'undue influence' were used nearly interchangeably." Pasquale, Reclaiming Egalitarianism in the Political Theory of Campaign Finance Reform, 2008 U. Ill. L. Rev. 599, 601. Long before Buckley, we appreciated that "[t]o say that Congress is without power to pass appropriate legislation to safeguard . . . an election from the improper use of money to influence the result is to deny to the nation in a vital particular the power of self protection." Burroughs v. United States, 290 U. S. 534, 545 (1934). And whereas we have no evidence to support the notion that the Framers would have wanted corporations to have the same rights as natural persons in the electoral context, we have ample evidence to suggest that they would have been appalled by the evidence of corruption that Congress unearthed in developing BCRA and that the Court today discounts to irrelevance. It is fair to say that "[t]he Framers were obsessed with corruption," Teachout 348, which they understood to encompass the dependency of public officeholders on private interests, see id., at 373–374; see also Randall, 548 U. S., at 280 (STEVENS, J., dissenting). They discussed corruption "more often in the Constitutional Convention than factions, violence, or instability." Teachout 352. When they brought our constitutional order into being, the Framers had their minds trained on a threat to republican self-government that this Court has lost sight of.

S. 230, 278 (2006) (STEVENS, J., dissenting) (internal quotation marks omitted). I continue to adhere to these beliefs, but they have not been briefed by the parties or amici in this case, and their soundness is immaterial to its proper disposition.

Quid Pro Quo Corruption

There is no need to take my side in the debate over the scope of the anticorruption interest to see that the Court's merits holding is wrong. Even under the majority's "crabbed view of corruption," McConnell, 540 U. S., at 152, the Government should not lose this case.

"The importance of the governmental interest in preventing [corruption through the creation of political debts] has never been doubted." Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 788, n. 26. Even in the cases that have construed the anticorruption interest most narrowly, we have never suggested that such quid pro quo debts must take the form of outright vote buying or bribes, which have long been distinct crimes. Rather, they encompass the myriad ways in which outside parties may induce an officeholder to confer a legislative benefit in direct response to, or anticipation of, some outlay of money the parties have made or will make on behalf of the officeholder. See McConnell, 540 U. S., at 143 ("We have not limited [the anticorruption] interest to the elimination of cash-for-votes exchanges. In Buckley, we expressly rejected the argument that antibribery laws provided a less restrictive alternative to FECA's contribution limits, noting that such laws 'deal[t] with only the most blatant and specific attempts of those with money to influence governmental action'" (quoting 424 U. S., at 28; alteration in original)). It has likewise never been doubted that "[o]f almost equal concern as the danger of actual quid pro quo arrangements is the impact of the appearance of corruption." Id., at 27. Congress may "legitimately conclude that the avoidance of the appearance of improper influence is also critical . . . if confidence in the system of representative Government is not to be eroded to a disastrous extent." Ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted; alteration in original). A democracy cannot function effectively when its constituent members believe laws are being bought and sold.

In theory, our colleagues accept this much. As applied to BCRA §203, however, they conclude "[t]he anticorruption interest is not sufficient to displace the speech here in question." Ante, at 41.

Although the Court suggests that Buckley compels its conclusion, ante, at 40–44, Buckley cannot sustain this reading. It is true that, in evaluating FECA's ceiling on independent expenditures by all persons, the Buckley Court found the governmental interest in preventing corruption "inadequate." 424 U. S., at 45. But Buckley did not evaluate corporate expenditures specifically, nor did it rule out the possibility that a future Court might find otherwise. The opinion reasoned that an expenditure limitation covering only express advocacy (i.e., magic words) would likely be ineffectual, ibid., a problem that Congress tackled in BCRA, and it concluded that "the independent advocacy restricted by [FECA §608(e)(1)] does not presently appear to pose dangers of real or apparent corruption comparable to those identified with large campaign contributions," id., at 46 (emphasis added). Buckley expressly contemplated that an anticorruption rationale might justify restrictions on independent expenditures at a later date, "because it may be that, in some circumstances, 'large independent expenditures pose the same dangers of actual or apparent quid pro quo arrangements as do large contributions.'" WRTL, 551 U. S., at 478 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.) (quoting Buckley, 424 U. S., at 45). Certainly Buckley did not foreclose this possibility with respect to electioneering communications made with corporate general treasury funds, an issue the Court had no occasion to consider.

The Austin Court did not rest its holding on quid pro quo corruption, as it found the broader corruption implicated by the antidistortion and shareholder protection rationales a sufficient basis for Michigan's restriction on corporate electioneering. 494 U. S., at 658–660. Concurring in that opinion, I took the position that "the danger of either the fact, or the appearance, of quid pro quo relationships [also] provides an adequate justification for state regulation" of these independent expenditures. Id., at 678. I did not see this position as inconsistent with Buckley's analysis of individual expenditures. Corporations, as a class, tend to be more attuned to the complexities of the legislative process and more directly affected by tax and appropriations measures that receive little public scrutiny; they also have vastly more money with which to try to buy access and votes. See Supp. Brief for Appellee 17 (stating that the Fortune 100 companies earned revenues of $13.1 trillion during the last election cycle). Business corporations must engage the political process in instrumental terms if they are to maximize shareholder value. The unparalleled resources, professional lobbyists, and single-minded focus they bring to this effort, I believed, make quid pro quo corruption and its appearance inherently more likely when they (or their conduits or trade groups) spend unrestricted sums on elections.

It is with regret rather than satisfaction that I can now say that time has borne out my concerns. The legislative and judicial proceedings relating to BCRA generated a substantial body of evidence suggesting that, as corporations grew more and more adept at crafting "issue ads" to help or harm a particular candidate, these nominally independent expenditures began to corrupt the political process in a very direct sense. The sponsors of these ads were routinely granted special access after the campaign was over; "candidates and officials knew who their friends were," McConnell, 540 U. S., at 129. Many corporate independent expenditures, it seemed, had become essentially interchangeable with direct contributions in their capacity to generate quid pro quo arrangements. In an age in which money and television ads are the coin of the campaign realm, it is hardly surprising that corporations deployed these ads to curry favor with, and to gain influence over, public officials.

The majority appears to think it decisive that the BCRA record does not contain "direct examples of votes being exchanged for . . . expenditures." Ante, at 45 (internal quotation marks omitted). It would have been quite remarkable if Congress had created a record detailing such behavior by its own Members. Proving that a specific vote was exchanged for a specific expenditure has always been next to impossible: Elected officials have diverse motivations, and no one will acknowledge that he sold a vote. Yet, even if "[i]ngratiation and access . . . are not corruption" themselves, ibid., they are necessary prerequisites to it; they can create both the opportunity for, and the appearance of, quid pro quo arrangements. The influx of unlimited corporate money into the electoral realm also creates new opportunities for the mirror image of quid pro quo deals: threats, both explicit and implicit. Starting today, corporations with large war chests to deploy on electioneering may find democratically elected bodies becoming much more attuned to their interests. The majority both misreads the facts and draws the wrong conclusions when it suggests that the BCRA record provides "only scant evidence that independent expenditures . . . ingratiate," and that, "in any event," none of it matters. Ibid.

In her analysis of the record, Judge Kollar-Kotelly documented the pervasiveness of this ingratiation and explained its significance under the majority's own touchstone for defining the scope of the anticorruption rationale, Buckley. See McConnell, 251 F. Supp. 2d, at 555–560, 622–625. Witnesses explained how political parties and candidates used corporate independent expenditures to circumvent FECA's "hard-money" limitations. See, e.g., id., at 478–479. One former Senator candidly admitted to the District Court that "'[c]andidates whose campaigns benefit from [phony "issue ads"] greatly appreciate the help of these groups. In fact, Members will also be favorably disposed to those who finance these groups when they later seek access to discuss pending legislation.'" Id., at 556 (quoting declaration of Sen. Dale Bumpers). One prominent lobbyist went so far as to state, in uncontroverted testimony, that "'unregulated expenditures—whether soft money donations to the parties or issue ad campaigns—can sometimes generate far more influence than direct campaign contributions.'" Ibid. (quoting declaration of Wright Andrews; emphasis added). In sum, Judge Kollar-Kotelly found, "[t]he record powerfully demonstrates that electioneering communications paid for with the general treasury funds of labor unions and corporations endears those entities to elected officials in a way that could be perceived by the public as corrupting." Id., at 622–623. She concluded that the Government's interest in preventing the appearance of corruption, as that concept was defined in Buckley, was itself sufficient to uphold BCRA §203. 251 F. Supp. 2d, at 622–625. Judge Leon agreed. See id., at 804–805 (dissenting only with respect to the Wellstone Amendment's coverage of MCFL corporations).

When the McConnell Court affirmed the judgment of the District Court regarding §203, we did not rest our holding on a narrow notion of quid pro quo corruption. Instead we relied on the governmental interest in combating the unique forms of corruption threatened by corporations, as recognized in Austin's antidistortion and shareholder protection rationales, 540 U. S., at 205 (citing Austin, 494 U. S., at 660), as well as the interest in preventing circumvention of contribution limits, 540 U. S., at 128–129, 205, 206, n. 88. Had we felt constrained by the view of today's Court that quid pro quo corruption and its appearance are the only interests that count in this field, ante, at 32–46, we of course would have looked closely at that issue. And as the analysis by Judge Kollar-Kotelly reflects, it is a very real possibility that we would have found one or both of those interests satisfied and §203 appropriately tailored to them.

The majority's rejection of the Buckley anticorruption rationale on the ground that independent corporate expenditures "do not give rise to [quid pro quo] corruption or the appearance of corruption," ante, at 42, is thus unfair as well as unreasonable. Congress and outside experts have generated significant evidence corroborating this rationale, and the only reason we do not have any of the relevant materials before us is that the Government had no reason to develop a record at trial for a facial challenge the plaintiff had abandoned. The Court cannot both sua sponte choose to relitigate McConnell on appeal and then complain that the Government has failed to substantiate its case. If our colleagues were really serious about the interest in preventing quid pro quo corruption, they would remand to the District Court with instructions to commence evidentiary proceedings.[66]

The insight that even technically independent expendi-

[66] In fact, the notion that the "electioneering communications" covered by §203 can breed quid pro quo corruption or the appearance of such corruption has only become more plausible since we decided McConnell. Recall that THE CHIEF JUSTICE's controlling opinion in WRTL subsequently limited BCRA's definition of "electioneering communications" to those that are "susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than as an appeal to vote for or against a specific candidate." 551 U. S., at 470. The upshot was that after WRTL, a corporate or union expenditure could be regulated under §203 only if everyone would understand it as an endorsement of or attack on a particular candidate for office. It does not take much imagination to perceive why this type of advocacy might be especially apt to look like or amount to a deal or a threat.

tures can be corrupting in much the same way as direct contributions is bolstered by our decision last year in Caperton v. A. T. Massey Coal Co., 556 U. S. ___ (2009). In that case, Don Blankenship, the chief executive officer of a corporation with a lawsuit pending before the West Virginia high court, spent large sums on behalf of a particular candidate, Brent Benjamin, running for a seat on that court. "In addition to contributing the $1,000 statutory maximum to Benjamin's campaign committee, Blankenship donated almost $2.5 million to 'And For The Sake Of The Kids,'" a §527 corporation that ran ads targeting Benjamin's opponent. Id., at ___ (slip op., at 2). "This was not all. Blankenship spent, in addition, just over $500,000 on independent expenditures . . . '"to support . . . Brent Benjamin."'" Id., at ___ (slip op., at 2–3) (second alteration in original). Applying its common sense, this Court accepted petitioners' argument that Blankenship's "pivotal role in getting Justice Benjamin elected created a constitutionally intolerable probability of actual bias" when Benjamin later declined to recuse himself from the appeal by Blankenship's corporation. Id., at ___ (slip op., at 11). "Though n[o] . . . bribe or criminal influence" was involved, we recognized that "Justice Benjamin would nevertheless feel a debt of gratitude to Blankenship for his extraordinary efforts to get him elected." Ibid. "The difficulties of inquiring into actual bias," we further noted, "simply underscore the need for objective rules," id., at ___ (slip op., at 13)—rules which will perforce turn on the appearance of bias rather than its actual existence.

In Caperton, then, we accepted the premise that, at least in some circumstances, independent expenditures on candidate elections will raise an intolerable specter of quid pro quo corruption. Indeed, this premise struck the Court as so intuitive that it repeatedly referred to Blankenship's spending on behalf of Benjamin—spending that consisted of 99.97% independent expenditures ($3 million) and 0.03% direct contributions ($1,000)—as a "contribution." See, e.g., id., at ___ (slip op., at 1) ("The basis for the [recusal] motion was that the justice had received campaign contributions in an extraordinary amount from" Blankenship); id., at ___ (slip op., at 3) (referencing "Blankenship's $3 million in contributions"); id., at ___ (slip op., at 14) ("Blankenship contributed some $3 million to unseat the incumbent and replace him with Benjamin"); id., at ___ (slip op., at 15) ("Blankenship's campaign contributions . . . had a significant and disproportionate influence on the electoral outcome"). The reason the Court so thoroughly conflated expenditures and contributions, one assumes, is that it realized that some expenditures may be functionally equivalent to contributions in the way they influence the outcome of a race, the way they are interpreted by the candidates and the public, and the way they taint the decisions that the officeholder thereafter takes.

Caperton is illuminating in several additional respects. It underscores the old insight that, on account of the extreme difficulty of proving corruption, "prophylactic measures, reaching some [campaign spending] not corrupt in purpose or effect, [may be] nonetheless required to guard against corruption." Buckley, 424 U. S., at 30; see also Shrink Missouri, 528 U. S., at 392, n. 5. It underscores that "certain restrictions on corporate electoral involvement" may likewise be needed to "hedge against circumvention of valid contribution limits." McConnell, 540 U. S., at 205 (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted); see also Colorado II, 533 U. S., at 456 ("[A]ll Members of the Court agree that circumvention is a valid theory of corruption"). It underscores that for-profit corporations associated with electioneering communications will often prefer to use nonprofit conduits with "misleading names," such as And For The Sake Of The Kids, "to conceal their identity" as the sponsor of those communications, thereby frustrating the utility of disclosure laws. McConnell, 540 U. S., at 128; see also id., at 196–197.

And it underscores that the consequences of today's holding will not be limited to the legislative or executive context. The majority of the States select their judges through popular elections. At a time when concerns about the conduct of judicial elections have reached a fever pitch, see, e.g., O'Connor, Justice for Sale, Wall St. Journal, Nov. 15, 2007, p. A25; Brief for Justice at Stake et al. as Amici Curiae 2, the Court today unleashes the floodgates of corporate and union general treasury spending in these races. Perhaps "Caperton motions" will catch some of the worst abuses. This will be small comfort to those States that, after today, may no longer have the ability to place modest limits on corporate electioneering even if they believe such limits to be critical to maintaining the integrity of their judicial systems.

Deference and Incumbent Self-Protection

Rather than show any deference to a coordinate branch of Government, the majority thus rejects the anticorruption rationale without serious analysis.[67] Today's opinion provides no clear rationale for being so dismissive of Congress, but the prior individual opinions on which it relies have offered one: the incentives of the legislators who passed BCRA. Section 203, our colleagues have suggested, may be little more than "an incumbency protection plan," McConnell, 540 U. S., at 306 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part); see also id., at 249–250, 260–263 (SCALIA, J., concurring in part, concurring in judgment in part, and dissenting in part), a dis-

[67] "We must give weight" and "due deference" to Congress' efforts to dispel corruption, the Court states at one point. Ante, at 45. It is unclear to me what these maxims mean, but as applied by the Court they clearly do not entail "deference" in any normal sense of that term.

reputable attempt at legislative self-dealing rather than an earnest effort to facilitate First Amendment values and safeguard the legitimacy of our political system. This possibility, the Court apparently believes, licenses it to run roughshod over Congress' handiwork.

In my view, we should instead start by acknowledging that "Congress surely has both wisdom and experience in these matters that is far superior to ours." Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Comm. v. FEC, 518 U. S. 604, 650 (1996) (STEVENS, J., dissenting). Many of our campaign finance precedents explicitly and forcefully affirm the propriety of such presumptive deference. See, e.g., McConnell, 540 U. S., at 158; Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 155–156; NRWC, 459 U. S., at 209–210. Moreover, "[j]udicial deference is particularly warranted where, as here, we deal with a congressional judgment that has remained essentially unchanged throughout a century of careful legislative adjustment." Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 162, n. 9 (internal quotation marks omitted); cf. Shrink Missouri, 528 U. S., at 391 ("The quantum of empirical evidence needed to satisfy heightened judicial scrutiny of legislative judgments will vary up or down with the novelty and plausibility of the justification raised"). In America, incumbent legislators pass the laws that govern campaign finance, just like all other laws. To apply a level of scrutiny that effectively bars them from regulating electioneering whenever there is the faintest whiff of self-interest, is to deprive them of the ability to regulate electioneering.

This is not to say that deference would be appropriate if there were a solid basis for believing that a legislative action was motivated by the desire to protect incumbents or that it will degrade the competitiveness of the electoral process.[68] See League of United Latin American Citizens

[68] JUSTICE BREYER has suggested that we strike the balance as fol-

v. Perry, 548 U. S. 399, 447 (2006) (STEVENS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U. S. 267, 317 (2004) (STEVENS, J., dissenting). Along with our duty to balance competing constitutional concerns, we have a vital role to play in ensuring that elections remain at least minimally open, fair, and competitive. But it is the height of recklessness to dismiss Congress' years of bipartisan deliberation and its reasoned judgment on this basis, without first confirming that the statute in question was intended to be, or will function as, a restraint on electoral competition. "Absent record evidence of invidious discrimination against challengers as a class, a court should generally be hesitant to invalidate legislation which on its face imposes evenhanded restrictions." Buckley, 424 U. S., at 31.

We have no record evidence from which to conclude that BCRA §203, or any of the dozens of state laws that the Court today calls into question, reflects or fosters such invidious discrimination. Our colleagues have opined that "'any restriction upon a type of campaign speech that is equally available to challengers and incumbents tends to favor incumbents.'" McConnell, 540 U. S., at 249 (opinion of SCALIA, J.). This kind of airy speculation could easily be turned on its head. The electioneering prohibited by §203 might well tend to favor incumbents, because incumbents have pre-existing relationships with corporations and unions, and groups that wish to procure legislative benefits may tend to support the candidate who, as a sitting officeholder, is already in a position to dispense benefits and is statistically likely to retain office. If a corporation's goal is to induce officeholders to do its bidding, the corpo-lows: "We should defer to [the legislature's] political judgment that unlimited spending threatens the integrity of the electoral process. But we should not defer in respect to whether its solution . . . insulates legislators from effective electoral challenge." Shrink Missouri, 528 U. S., at 403–404 (concurring opinion).

ration would do well to cultivate stable, long-term relationships of dependency.

So we do not have a solid theoretical basis for condemning §203 as a front for incumbent self-protection, and it seems equally if not more plausible that restrictions on corporate electioneering will be self-denying. Nor do we have a good empirical case for skepticism, as the Court's failure to cite any empirical research attests. Nor does the legislative history give reason for concern. Congress devoted years of careful study to the issues underlying BCRA; "[f]ew legislative proposals in recent years have received as much sustained public commentary or news coverage"; "[p]olitical scientists and academic experts . . . with no self-interest in incumbent protectio[n] were central figures in pressing the case for BCRA"; and the legislation commanded bipartisan support from the outset. Pildes, The Supreme Court 2003 Term Foreword: The Constitutionalization of Democratic Politics, 118 Harv. L. Rev. 28, 137 (2004). Finally, it is important to remember just how incumbent-friendly congressional races were prior to BCRA's passage. As the Solicitor General aptly remarked at the time, "the evidence supports overwhelmingly that incumbents were able to get re-elected under the old system just fine." Tr. of Oral Arg. in McConnell v. FEC, O. T. 2003, No. 02–1674, p. 61. "It would be hard to develop a scheme that could be better for incumbents." Id., at 63.

In this case, then, "there is no convincing evidence that th[e] important interests favoring expenditure limits are fronts for incumbency protection." Randall, 548 U. S., at 279 (STEVENS, J., dissenting). "In the meantime, a legislative judgment that 'enough is enough' should command the greatest possible deference from judges interpreting a constitutional provision that, at best, has an indirect relationship to activity that affects the quantity . . . of repetitive speech in the marketplace of ideas." Id., at 279–

280. The majority cavalierly ignores Congress' factual findings and its constitutional judgment: It acknowledges the validity of the interest in preventing corruption, but it effectively discounts the value of that interest to zero. This is quite different from conscientious policing for impermissibly anticompetitive motive or effect in a sensitive First Amendment context. It is the denial of Congress' authority to regulate corporate spending on elections.

Austin and Corporate Expenditures

Just as the majority gives short shrift to the general societal interests at stake in campaign finance regulation, it also overlooks the distinctive considerations raised by the regulation of corporate expenditures. The majority fails to appreciate that Austin's antidistortion rationale is itself an anticorruption rationale, see 494 U. S., at 660 (describing "a different type of corruption"), tied to the special concerns raised by corporations. Understood properly, "antidistortion" is simply a variant on the classic governmental interest in protecting against improper influences on officeholders that debilitate the democratic process. It is manifestly not just an "'equalizing'" ideal in disguise. Ante, at 34 (quoting Buckley, 424 U. S., at 48).[69]

---

[69] THE CHIEF JUSTICE denies this, ante, at 9–10, citing scholarship that has interpreted Austin to endorse an equality rationale, along with an article by Justice Thurgood Marshall's former law clerk that states that Marshall, the author of Austin, accepted "equality of opportunity" and "equalizing access to the political process" as bases for campaign finance regulation, Garrett, New Voices in Politics: Justice Marshall's Jurisprudence on Law and Politics, 52 Howard L. J. 655, 667–668 (2009) (internal quotation marks omitted). It is fair to say that Austin can bear an egalitarian reading, and I have no reason to doubt this characterization of Justice Marshall's beliefs. But the fact that Austin can be read a certain way hardly proves THE CHIEF JUSTICE's charge that there is nothing more to it. Many of our precedents can bear multiple readings, and many of our doctrines have some "equalizing" implications but do not rest on an equalizing theory: for example, our

1. Antidistortion

The fact that corporations are different from human beings might seem to need no elaboration, except that the majority opinion almost completely elides it. Austin set forth some of the basic differences. Unlike natural persons, corporations have "limited liability" for their owners and managers, "perpetual life," separation of ownership and control, "and favorable treatment of the accumulation and distribution of assets . . . that enhance their ability to attract capital and to deploy their resources in ways that maximize the return on their shareholders' investments." 494 U. S., at 658–659. Unlike voters in U. S. elections, corporations may be foreign controlled.[70] Unlike other interest groups, business corporations have been "effectively delegated responsibility for ensuring society's economic welfare";[71] they inescapably structure the life of every citizen. "'[T]he resources in the treasury of a business corporation,'" furthermore, "'are not an indication of popular support for the corporation's political ideas.'" Id., at 659 (quoting MCFL, 479 U. S., at 258). "'They reflect instead the economically motivated decisions of investors and customers. The availability of these resources may takings jurisprudence and numerous rules of criminal procedure. More important, the Austin Court expressly declined to rely on a speech-equalization rationale, see 494 U. S., at 660, and we have never understood Austin to stand for such a rationale. Whatever his personal views, Justice Marshall simply did not write the opinion that THE CHIEF JUSTICE suggests he did; indeed, he "would have viewed it as irresponsible to write an opinion that boldly staked out a rationale based on equality that no one other than perhaps Justice White would have even considered joining," Garrett, 52 Howard L. J., at 674.

[70] In state elections, even domestic corporations may be "foreign"-controlled in the sense that they are incorporated in another jurisdiction and primarily owned and operated by out-of-state residents.

[71] Regan, Corporate Speech and Civic Virtue, in Debating Democracy's Discontent 289, 302 (A. Allen & M. Regan eds. 1998) (hereinafter Regan).

make a corporation a formidable political presence, even though the power of the corporation may be no reflection of the power of its ideas.'" 494 U. S., at 659 (quoting MCFL, 479 U. S., at 258).[72]

It might also be added that corporations have no consciences, no beliefs, no feelings, no thoughts, no desires. Corporations help structure and facilitate the activities of human beings, to be sure, and their "personhood" often serves as a useful legal fiction. But they are not themselves members of "We the People" by whom and for whom our Constitution was established.

These basic points help explain why corporate electioneering is not only more likely to impair compelling governmental interests, but also why restrictions on that electioneering are less likely to encroach upon First Amendment freedoms. One fundamental concern of the First Amendment is to "protec[t] the individual's interest in self-expression." Consolidated Edison Co. of N. Y. v. Public Serv. Comm'n of N. Y., 447 U. S. 530, 534, n. 2 (1980); see also Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 777, n. 12. Freedom of speech helps "make men free to develop their faculties," Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357, 375 (1927) (Brandeis,

[72] Nothing in this analysis turns on whether the corporation is conceptualized as a grantee of a state concession, see, e.g., Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 636 (1819) (Marshall, C. J.), a nexus of explicit and implicit contracts, see, e.g., F. Easterbrook & D. Fischel, The Economic Structure of Corporate Law 12 (1991), a mediated hierarchy of stakeholders, see, e.g., Blair & Stout, A Team Production Theory of Corporate Law, 85 Va. L. Rev. 247 (1999) (hereinafter Blair & Stout), or any other recognized model. Austin referred to the structure and the advantages of corporations as "state-conferred" in several places, 494 U. S., at 660, 665, 667, but its antidistortion argument relied only on the basic descriptive features of corporations, as sketched above. It is not necessary to agree on a precise theory of the corporation to agree that corporations differ from natural persons in fundamental ways, and that a legislature might therefore need to regulate them differently if it is human welfare that is the object of its concern. Cf. Hansmann & Kraakman 441, n. 5.

J., concurring), it respects their "dignity and choice," Cohen v. California, 403 U. S. 15, 24 (1971), and it facilitates the value of "individual self-realization," Redish, The Value of Free Speech, 130 U. Pa. L. Rev. 591, 594 (1982). Corporate speech, however, is derivative speech, speech by proxy. A regulation such as BCRA §203 may affect the way in which individuals disseminate certain messages through the corporate form, but it does not prevent anyone from speaking in his or her own voice. "Within the realm of [campaign spending] generally," corporate spending is "furthest from the core of political expression." Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 161, n. 8.

It is an interesting question "who" is even speaking when a business corporation places an advertisement that endorses or attacks a particular candidate. Presumably it is not the customers or employees, who typically have no say in such matters. It cannot realistically be said to be the shareholders, who tend to be far removed from the day-to-day decisions of the firm and whose political preferences may be opaque to management. Perhaps the officers or directors of the corporation have the best claim to be the ones speaking, except their fiduciary duties generally prohibit them from using corporate funds for personal ends. Some individuals associated with the corporation must make the decision to place the ad, but the idea that these individuals are thereby fostering their self-expression or cultivating their critical faculties is fanciful. It is entirely possible that the corporation's electoral message will conflict with their personal convictions. Take away the ability to use general treasury funds for some of those ads, and no one's autonomy, dignity, or political equality has been impinged upon in the least.

Corporate expenditures are distinguishable from individual expenditures in this respect. I have taken the view that a legislature may place reasonable restrictions on individuals' electioneering expenditures in the service of the governmental interests explained above, and in recognition of the fact that such restrictions are not direct restraints on speech but rather on its financing. See, e.g., Randall, 548 U. S., at 273 (dissenting opinion). But those restrictions concededly present a tougher case, because the primary conduct of actual, flesh-and-blood persons is involved. Some of those individuals might feel that they need to spend large sums of money on behalf of a particular candidate to vindicate the intensity of their electoral preferences. This is obviously not the situation with business corporations, as their routine practice of giving "substantial sums to both major national parties" makes pellucidly clear. McConnell, 540 U. S., at 148. "[C]orporate participation" in elections, any business executive will tell you, "is more transactional than ideological." Supp. Brief for Committee for Economic Development as Amicus Curiae 10.

In this transactional spirit, some corporations have affirmatively urged Congress to place limits on their electioneering communications. These corporations fear that officeholders will shake them down for supportive ads, that they will have to spend increasing sums on elections in an ever-escalating arms race with their competitors, and that public trust in business will be eroded. See id., at 10–19. A system that effectively forces corporations to use their shareholders' money both to maintain access to, and to avoid retribution from, elected officials may ultimately prove more harmful than beneficial to many corporations. It can impose a kind of implicit tax.[73]

[73] Not all corporations support BCRA §203, of course, and not all corporations are large business entities or their tax-exempt adjuncts. Some nonprofit corporations are created for an ideological purpose. Some closely held corporations are strongly identified with a particular owner or founder. The fact that §203, like the statute at issue in Austin, regulates some of these corporations' expenditures does not disturb the analysis above. See 494 U. S., at 661–665. Small-business

In short, regulations such as §203 and the statute upheld in Austin impose only a limited burden on First Amendment freedoms not only because they target a narrow subset of expenditures and leave untouched the broader "public dialogue," ante, at 25, but also because they leave untouched the speech of natural persons. Recognizing the weakness of a speaker-based critique of Austin, the Court places primary emphasis not on the corporation's right to electioneer, but rather on the listener's interest in hearing what every possible speaker may have to say. The Court's central argument is that laws such as §203 have "'deprived [the electorate] of information, knowledge and opinion vital to its function,'" ante, at 38 (quoting CIO, 335 U. S., at 144 (Rutledge, J., concurring in judgment)), and this, in turn, "interferes with the 'open marketplace' of ideas protected by the First Amendment," ante, at 38 (quoting New York State Bd. of Elections v. Lopez Torres, 552 U. S. 196, 208 (2008)).

There are many flaws in this argument. If the overriding concern depends on the interests of the audience, surely the public's perception of the value of corporate speech should be given important weight. That perception today is the same as it was a century ago when Theodore Roosevelt delivered the speeches to Congress that, in time, led to the limited prohibition on corporate campaign expenditures that is overruled today. See WRTL, 551 U. S., at 509–510 (Souter, J., dissenting) (summarizing President owners may speak in their own names, rather than the business', if they wish to evade §203 altogether. Nonprofit corporations that want to make unrestricted electioneering expenditures may do so if they refuse donations from businesses and unions and permit members to disassociate without economic penalty. See MCFL, 479 U. S. 238, 264 (1986). Making it plain that their decision is not motivated by a concern about BCRA's coverage of nonprofits that have ideological missions but lack MCFL status, our colleagues refuse to apply the Snowe-Jeffords Amendment or the lower courts' de minimis exception to MCFL. See ante, at 10–12.

Roosevelt's remarks). The distinctive threat to democratic integrity posed by corporate domination of politics was recognized at "the inception of the republic" and "has been a persistent theme in American political life" ever since. Regan 302. It is only certain Members of this Court, not the listeners themselves, who have agitated for more corporate electioneering.

Austin recognized that there are substantial reasons why a legislature might conclude that unregulated general treasury expenditures will give corporations "unfai[r] influence" in the electoral process, 494 U. S., at 660, and distort public debate in ways that undermine rather than advance the interests of listeners. The legal structure of corporations allows them to amass and deploy financial resources on a scale few natural persons can match. The structure of a business corporation, furthermore, draws a line between the corporation's economic interests and the political preferences of the individuals associated with the corporation; the corporation must engage the electoral process with the aim "to enhance the profitability of the company, no matter how persuasive the arguments for a broader or conflicting set of priorities," Brief for American Independent Business Alliance as Amicus Curiae 11; see also ALI, Principles of Corporate Governance: Analysis and Recommendations §2.01(a), p. 55 (1992) ("[A] corporation . . . should have as its objective the conduct of business activities with a view to enhancing corporate profit and shareholder gain"). In a state election such as the one at issue in Austin, the interests of nonresident corporations may be fundamentally adverse to the interests of local voters. Consequently, when corporations grab up the prime broadcasting slots on the eve of an election, they can flood the market with advocacy that bears "little or no correlation" to the ideas of natural persons or to any broader notion of the public good, 494 U. S., at 660. The opinions of real people may be marginalized. "The expenditure restrictions of [2 U. S. C.] §441b are thus meant to ensure that competition among actors in the political arena is truly competition among ideas." MCFL, 479 U. S., at 259.

In addition to this immediate drowning out of noncorporate voices, there may be deleterious effects that follow soon thereafter. Corporate "domination" of electioneering, Austin, 494 U. S., at 659, can generate the impression that corporations dominate our democracy. When citizens turn on their televisions and radios before an election and hear only corporate electioneering, they may lose faith in their capacity, as citizens, to influence public policy. A Government captured by corporate interests, they may come to believe, will be neither responsive to their needs nor willing to give their views a fair hearing. The predictable result is cynicism and disenchantment: an increased perception that large spenders "'call the tune'" and a reduced "'willingness of voters to take part in democratic governance.'" McConnell, 540 U. S., at 144 (quoting Shrink Missouri, 528 U. S., at 390). To the extent that corporations are allowed to exert undue influence in electoral races, the speech of the eventual winners of those races may also be chilled. Politicians who fear that a certain corporation can make or break their reelection chances may be cowed into silence about that corporation. On a variety of levels, unregulated corporate electioneering might diminish the ability of citizens to "hold officials accountable to the people," ante, at 23, and disserve the goal of a public debate that is "uninhibited, robust, and wide-open," New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 270 (1964). At the least, I stress again, a legislature is entitled to credit these concerns and to take tailored measures in response.

The majority's unwillingness to distinguish between corporations and humans similarly blinds it to the possibility that corporations' "war chests" and their special "advantages" in the legal realm, Austin, 494 U. S., at 659, may translate into special advantages in the market for legislation. When large numbers of citizens have a common stake in a measure that is under consideration, it may be very difficult for them to coordinate resources on behalf of their position. The corporate form, by contrast, "provides a simple way to channel rents to only those who have paid their dues, as it were. If you do not own stock, you do not benefit from the larger dividends or appreciation in the stock price caused by the passage of private interest legislation." Sitkoff, Corporate Political Speech, Political Extortion, and the Competition for Corporate Charters, 69 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1103, 1113 (2002). Corporations, that is, are uniquely equipped to seek laws that favor their owners, not simply because they have a lot of money but because of their legal and organizational structure. Remove all restrictions on their electioneering, and the door may be opened to a type of rent seeking that is "far more destructive" than what noncorporations are capable of. Ibid. It is for reasons such as these that our campaign finance jurisprudence has long appreciated that "the 'differing structures and purposes' of different entities 'may require different forms of regulation in order to protect the integrity of the electoral process.'" NRWC, 459 U. S., at 210 (quoting California Medical Assn., 453 U. S., at 201).

The Court's facile depiction of corporate electioneering assumes away all of these complexities. Our colleagues ridicule the idea of regulating expenditures based on "nothing more" than a fear that corporations have a special "ability to persuade," ante, at 11 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.), as if corporations were our society's ablest debaters and viewpoint-neutral laws such as §203 were created to suppress their best arguments. In their haste to knock down yet another straw man, our colleagues simply ignore the fundamental concerns of the Austin Court and the legislatures that have passed laws like §203: to safeguard the integrity, competitiveness, and democratic responsiveness of the electoral process. All of the majority's theoretical arguments turn on a proposition with undeniable surface appeal but little grounding in evidence or experience, "that there is no such thing as too much speech," Austin, 494 U. S., at 695 (SCALIA, J., dissenting)).[74] If individuals in our society had infinite free time to listen to and contemplate every last bit of speech uttered by anyone, anywhere; and if broadcast advertisements had no special ability to influence elections apart from the merits of their arguments (to the extent they make any); and if legislators always operated with nothing less than perfect virtue; then I suppose the majority's premise would be sound. In the real world, we have seen, corporate domination of the airwaves prior to an election may decrease the average listener's exposure to relevant viewpoints, and it may diminish citizens' willingness and capacity to participate in the democratic process.

None of this is to suggest that corporations can or should be denied an opportunity to participate in election campaigns or in any other public forum (much less that a work of art such as Mr. Smith Goes to Washington may be banned), or to deny that some corporate speech may contribute significantly to public debate. What it shows, however, is that Austin's "concern about corporate domination of the political process," 494 U. S., at 659, reflects more than a concern to protect governmental interests outside of the First Amendment. It also reflects a concern to facilitate First Amendment values by preserving some breathing room around the electoral "marketplace" of ideas, ante, at 19, 34, 38, 52, 54, the marketplace in which the actual people of this Nation determine how they will govern themselves. The majority seems oblivious to the simple truth that laws such as §203 do not merely pit the anticorruption interest against the First Amendment, but also pit competing First Amendment values against each other. There are, to be sure, serious concerns with any effort to balance the First Amendment rights of speakers against the First Amendment rights of listeners. But when the speakers in question are not real people and when the appeal to "First Amendment principles" depends almost entirely on the listeners' perspective, ante, at 1, 48, it becomes necessary to consider how listeners will actually be affected.

[74] Of course, no presiding person in a courtroom, legislature, classroom, polling place, or family dinner would take this hyperbole literally.

In critiquing Austin's antidistortion rationale and campaign finance regulation more generally, our colleagues place tremendous weight on the example of media corporations. See ante, at 35–38, 46; ante, at 1, 11 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.); ante, at 6 (opinion of SCALIA, J.). Yet it is not at all clear that Austin would permit §203 to be applied to them. The press plays a unique role not only in the text, history, and structure of the First Amendment but also in facilitating public discourse; as the Austin Court explained, "media corporations differ significantly from other corporations in that their resources are devoted to the collection of information and its dissemination to the public," 494 U. S., at 667. Our colleagues have raised some interesting and difficult questions about Congress' authority to regulate electioneering by the press, and about how to define what constitutes the press. But that is not the case before us. Section 203 does not apply to media corporations, and even if it did, Citizens United is not a media corporation. There would be absolutely no reason to consider the issue of media corporations if the majority did not, first, transform Citizens United's as-applied challenge into a facial challenge and, second, invent the theory that legislatures must eschew all "identity"-based distinctions and treat a local nonprofit news outlet exactly the same as General Motors.[75] This calls to mind George Berkeley's description of philosophers: "[W]e have first raised a dust and then complain we cannot see." Principles of Human Knowledge/Three Dialogues 38, ¶3 (R. Woolhouse ed. 1988).

It would be perfectly understandable if our colleagues feared that a campaign finance regulation such as §203 may be counterproductive or self-interested, and therefore attended carefully to the choices the Legislature has made. But the majority does not bother to consider such practical matters, or even to consult a record; it simply stipulates that "enlightened self-government" can arise only in the absence of regulation. Ante, at 23. In light of the distinctive features of corporations identified in Austin, there is no valid basis for this assumption. The marketplace of ideas is not actually a place where items—or laws—are meant to be bought and sold, and when we move from the realm of economics to the realm of corporate electioneering, there may be no "reason to think the market ordering is intrinsically good at all," Strauss 1386.

The Court's blinkered and aphoristic approach to the First Amendment may well promote corporate power at the cost of the individual and collective self-expression the Amendment was meant to serve. It will undoubtedly cripple the ability of ordinary citizens, Congress, and the States to adopt even limited measures to protect against corporate domination of the electoral process. Americans may be forgiven if they do not feel the Court has advanced

---

[75] Under the majority's view, the legislature is thus damned if it does and damned if it doesn't. If the legislature gives media corporations an exemption from electioneering regulations that apply to other corporations, it violates the newly minted First Amendment rule against identity-based distinctions. If the legislature does not give media corporations an exemption, it violates the First Amendment rights of the press. The only way out of this invented bind: no regulations whatsoever.

the cause of self-government today.

2. Shareholder Protection

There is yet another way in which laws such as §203 can serve First Amendment values. Interwoven with Austin's concern to protect the integrity of the electoral process is a concern to protect the rights of shareholders from a kind of coerced speech: electioneering expenditures that do not "reflec[t] [their] support." 494 U. S., at 660–661. When corporations use general treasury funds to praise or attack a particular candidate for office, it is the shareholders, as the residual claimants, who are effectively footing the bill. Those shareholders who disagree with the corporation's electoral message may find their financial investments being used to undermine their political convictions.

The PAC mechanism, by contrast, helps assure that those who pay for an electioneering communication actually support its content and that managers do not use general treasuries to advance personal agendas. Ibid. It "'allows corporate political participation without the temptation to use corporate funds for political influence, quite possibly at odds with the sentiments of some shareholders or members.'" McConnell, 540 U. S., at 204 (quoting Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 163). A rule that privileges the use of PACs thus does more than facilitate the political speech of like-minded shareholders; it also curbs the rent seeking behavior of executives and respects the views of dissenters. Austin's acceptance of restrictions on general treasury spending "simply allows people who have invested in the business corporation for purely economic reasons"—the vast majority of investors, one assumes—"to avoid being taken advantage of, without sacrificing their economic objectives." Winkler, Beyond Bellotti, 32 Loyola (LA) L. Rev. 133, 201 (1998).

The concern to protect dissenting shareholders and union members has a long history in campaign finance reform. It provided a central motivation for the Tillman Act in 1907 and subsequent legislation, see Pipefitters v. United States, 407 U. S. 385, 414–415 (1972); Winkler, 92 Geo. L. J., at 887–900, and it has been endorsed in a long line of our cases, see, e.g., McConnell, 540 U. S., at 204–205; Beaumont, 539 U. S., at 152–154; MCFL, 479 U. S., at 258; NRWC, 459 U. S., at 207–208; Pipefitters, 407 U. S., at 414–416; see also n. 60, supra. Indeed, we have unanimously recognized the governmental interest in "protect[ing] the individuals who have paid money into a corporation or union for purposes other than the support of candidates from having that money used to support political candidates to whom they may be opposed." NRWC, 459 U. S., at 207–208.

The Court dismisses this interest on the ground that abuses of shareholder money can be corrected "through the procedures of corporate democracy," ante, at 46 (internal quotation marks omitted), and, it seems, through Internet-based disclosures, ante, at 55.[76] I fail to understand how this addresses the concerns of dissenting union members, who will also be affected by today's ruling, and I fail to understand why the Court is so confident in these mechanisms. By "corporate democracy," presumably the Court means the rights of shareholders to vote and to bring derivative suits for breach of fiduciary duty. In practice, however, many corporate lawyers will tell you that "these rights are so limited as to be almost nonexistent," given the internal authority wielded by boards and managers and the expansive protections afforded by the business judgment rule. Blair & Stout 320; see also id., at 298–315; Winkler, 32 Loyola (LA) L. Rev., at 165–166, 199–200. Modern technology may help make it easier to track corporate activity, including electoral advocacy, but it is utopian to believe that it solves the problem. Most American households that own stock do so through intermediaries such as mutual funds and pension plans, see Evans, A Requiem for the Retail Investor? 95 Va. L. Rev. 1105 (2009), which makes it more difficult both to monitor and to alter particular holdings. Studies show that a majority of individual investors make no trades at all during a given year. Id., at 1117. Moreover, if the corporation in question operates a PAC, an investor who sees the company's ads may not know whether they are being funded through the PAC or through the general treasury.

[76] I note that, among the many other regulatory possibilities it has left open, ranging from new versions of §203 supported by additional evidence of quid pro quo corruption or its appearance to any number of tax incentive or public financing schemes, today's decision does not require that a legislature rely solely on these mechanisms to protect shareholders. Legislatures remain free in their incorporation and tax laws to condition the types of activity in which corporations may engage, including electioneering activity, on specific disclosure requirements or on prior express approval by shareholders or members.

If and when shareholders learn that a corporation has been spending general treasury money on objectionable electioneering, they can divest. Even assuming that they reliably learn as much, however, this solution is only partial. The injury to the shareholders' expressive rights has already occurred; they might have preferred to keep that corporation's stock in their portfolio for any number of economic reasons; and they may incur a capital gains tax or other penalty from selling their shares, changing their pension plan, or the like. The shareholder protection rationale has been criticized as underinclusive, in that corporations also spend money on lobbying and charitable contributions in ways that any particular shareholder might disapprove. But those expenditures do not implicate the selection of public officials, an area in which "the interests of unwilling . . . corporate shareholders [in not being] forced to subsidize that speech" "are at their zenith." Austin, 494 U. S., at 677 (Brennan, J., concurring). And in any event, the question is whether shareholder protection provides a basis for regulating expenditures in the weeks before an election, not whether additional types of corporate communications might similarly be conditioned on voluntariness.

Recognizing the limits of the shareholder protection rationale, the Austin Court did not hold it out as an adequate and independent ground for sustaining the statute in question. Rather, the Court applied it to reinforce the antidistortion rationale, in two main ways. First, the problem of dissenting shareholders shows that even if electioneering expenditures can advance the political views of some members of a corporation, they will often compromise the views of others. See, e.g., id., at 663 (discussing risk that corporation's "members may be . . . reluctant to withdraw as members even if they disagree with [its] political expression"). Second, it provides an additional reason, beyond the distinctive legal attributes of the corporate form, for doubting that these "expenditures reflect actual public support for the political ideas espoused," id., at 660. The shareholder protection rationale, in other words, bolsters the conclusion that restrictions on corporate electioneering can serve both speakers' and listeners' interests, as well as the anticorruption interest. And it supplies yet another reason why corporate expenditures merit less protection than individual expenditures.

Today's decision is backwards in many senses. It elevates the majority's agenda over the litigants' submissions, facial attacks over as-applied claims, broad constitutional theories over narrow statutory grounds, individual dissenting opinions over precedential holdings, assertion over tradition, absolutism over empiricism, rhetoric over reality. Our colleagues have arrived at the conclusion that Austin must be overruled and that §203 is facially unconstitutional only after mischaracterizing both the reach and rationale of those authorities, and after bypassing or ignoring rules of judicial restraint used to cabin the Court's lawmaking power. Their conclusion that the societal interest in avoiding corruption and the appearance of corruption does not provide an adequate justification for regulating corporate expenditures on candidate elections relies on an incorrect description of that interest, along with a failure to acknowledge the relevance of established facts and the considered judgments of state and federal legislatures over many decades.

In a democratic society, the longstanding consensus on the need to limit corporate campaign spending should outweigh the wooden application of judge-made rules. The majority's rejection of this principle "elevate[s] corporations to a level of deference which has not been seen at least since the days when substantive due process was regularly used to invalidate regulatory legislation thought to unfairly impinge upon established economic interests." Bellotti, 435 U. S., at 817, n. 13 (White, J., dissenting). At bottom, the Court's opinion is thus a rejection of the common sense of the American people, who have recognized a need to prevent corporations from undermining self-government since the founding, and who have fought against the distinctive corrupting potential of corporate electioneering since the days of Theodore Roosevelt. It is a strange time to repudiate that common sense. While American democracy is imperfect, few outside the majority of this Court would have thought its flaws included a dearth of corporate money in politics.

I would affirm the judgment of the District Court.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 08–205

CITIZENS UNITED, APPELLANT v. FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

[January 21, 2010]

JUSTICE THOMAS, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I join all but Part IV of the Court's opinion.

Political speech is entitled to robust protection under the First Amendment. Section 203 of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA) has never been reconcilable with that protection. By striking down §203, the Court takes an important first step toward restoring full constitutional protection to speech that is "indispensable to the effective and intelligent use of the processes of popular government." McConnell v. Federal Election Comm'n, 540 U. S. 93, 265 (2003) (THOMAS, J., concurring in part, concurring in judgment in part, and dissenting in part) (internal quotation marks omitted). I dissent from Part IV of the Court's opinion, however, because the Court's constitutional analysis does not go far enough. The disclosure, disclaimer, and reporting requirements in BCRA §§201 and 311 are also unconstitutional. See id., at 275–277, and n. 10.

Congress may not abridge the "right to anonymous speech" based on the "'simple interest in providing voters with additional relevant information,'" id., at 276 (quoting McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U. S. 334, 348 (1995)). In continuing to hold otherwise, the Court misapprehends the import of "recent events" that some amici describe "in which donors to certain causes were blacklisted, threatened, or otherwise targeted for retaliation." Ante, at 54. The Court properly recognizes these events as "cause for concern," ibid., but fails to acknowledge their constitutional significance. In my view, amici's submissions show why the Court's insistence on upholding §§201 and 311 will ultimately prove as misguided (and ill fated) as was its prior approval of §203.

Amici's examples relate principally to Proposition 8, a state ballot proposition that California voters narrowly passed in the 2008 general election. Proposition 8 amended California's constitution to provide that "[o]nly marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California." Cal. Const., Art. I, §7.5. Any donor who gave more than $100 to any committee supporting or opposing Proposition 8 was required to disclose his full name, street address, occupation, employer's name (or business name, if self-employed), and the total amount of his contributions.[1] See Cal. Govt. Code Ann. §84211(f) (West 2005). The California Secretary of State was then required to post this information on the Internet. See §§84600–84601; §§84602–84602.1 (West Supp. 2010); §§84602.5–84604 (West 2005); §85605 (West Supp. 2010); §§84606–84609 (West 2005).

Some opponents of Proposition 8 compiled this information and created Web sites with maps showing the locations of homes or businesses of Proposition 8 supporters. Many supporters (or their customers) suffered property damage, or threats of physical violence or death, as a result. They cited these incidents in a complaint they filed after the 2008 election, seeking to invalidate California's mandatory disclosure laws. Supporters recounted being told: "Consider yourself lucky. If I had a gun I would have gunned you down along with each and every other supporter," or, "we have plans for you and your friends." Complaint in ProtectMarriage.com—Yes on 8 v. Bowen, Case No. 2:09–cv–00058–MCE–DAD (ED Cal.), ¶31. Proposition 8 opponents also allegedly harassed the measure's supporters by defacing or damaging their property. Id., ¶32. Two religious organizations supporting Proposition 8 reportedly received through the mail envelopes containing a white powdery substance. Id., ¶33.

[1] BCRA imposes similar disclosure requirements. See, e.g., 2 U. S. C. §434(f)(2)(F) ("Every person who makes a disbursement for the direct costs of producing and airing electioneering communications in an aggregate amount in excess of $10,000 during any calendar year" must disclose "the names and addresses of all contributors who contributed an aggregate amount of $1,000 or more to the person making the disbursement").

Those accounts are consistent with media reports describing Proposition 8-related retaliation. The director of the nonprofit California Musical Theater gave $1,000 to support the initiative; he was forced to resign after artists complained to his employer. Lott & Smith, Donor Disclosure Has Its Downsides, Wall Street Journal, Dec. 26, 2008, p. A13. The director of the Los Angeles Film Festival was forced to resign after giving $1,500 because opponents threatened to boycott and picket the next festival. Ibid. And a woman who had managed her popular, family-owned restaurant for 26 years was forced to resign after she gave $100, because "throngs of [angry] protesters" repeatedly arrived at the restaurant and "shout[ed] 'shame on you' at customers." Lopez, Prop. 8 Stance Upends Her Life, Los Angeles Times, Dec. 14, 2008, p. B1. The police even had to "arriv[e] in riot gear one night to quell the angry mob" at the restaurant. Ibid. Some supporters of Proposition 8 engaged in similar tactics; one real estate businessman in San Diego who had donated to a group opposing Proposition 8 "received a letter from the Prop. 8 Executive Committee threatening to publish his company's name if he didn't also donate to the 'Yes on 8' campaign." Donor Disclosure, supra, at A13.

The success of such intimidation tactics has apparently spawned a cottage industry that uses forcibly disclosed donor information to pre-empt citizens' exercise of their First Amendment rights. Before the 2008 Presidential election, a "newly formed nonprofit group . . . plann[ed] to confront donors to conservative groups, hoping to create a chilling effect that will dry up contributions." Luo, Group Plans Campaign Against G.O.P. Donors, N. Y. Times, Aug. 8, 2008, p. A15. Its leader, "who described his effort as 'going for the jugular,'" detailed the group's plan to send a "warning letter . . . alerting donors who might be considering giving to right-wing groups to a variety of potential dangers, including legal trouble, public exposure and watchdog groups digging through their lives." Ibid.

These instances of retaliation sufficiently demonstrate why this Court should invalidate mandatory disclosure and reporting requirements. But amici present evidence of yet another reason to do so—the threat of retaliation from elected officials. As amici's submissions make clear, this threat extends far beyond a single ballot proposition in California. For example, a candidate challenging an incumbent state attorney general reported that some members of the State's business community feared donating to his campaign because they did not want to cross the incumbent; in his words, "'I go to so many people and hear the same thing: "I sure hope you beat [the incumbent], but I can't afford to have my name on your records. He might come after me next."'" Strassel, Challenging Spitzerism at the Polls, Wall Street Journal, Aug. 1, 2008, p. A11. The incumbent won reelection in 2008.

My point is not to express any view on the merits of the political controversies I describe. Rather, it is to demonstrate—using real-world, recent examples—the fallacy in the Court's conclusion that "[d]isclaimer and disclosure requirements . . . impose no ceiling on campaign-related activities, and do not prevent anyone from speaking."

Ante, at 51 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). Of course they do. Disclaimer and disclosure requirements enable private citizens and elected officials to implement political strategies specifically calculated to curtail campaign-related activity and prevent the lawful, peaceful exercise of First Amendment rights.

The Court nevertheless insists that as-applied challenges to disclosure requirements will suffice to vindicate those speech rights, as long as potential plaintiffs can "show a reasonable probability that disclosure . . . will subject them to threats, harassment, or reprisals from either Government officials or private parties." Ante, at 52 (internal quotation marks omitted). But the Court's opinion itself proves the irony in this compromise. In correctly explaining why it must address the facial constitutionality of §203, see ante, at 5–20, the Court recognizes that "[t]he First Amendment does not permit laws that force speakers to . . . seek declaratory rulings before discussing the most salient political issues of our day," ante, at 7; that as-applied challenges to §203 "would require substantial litigation over an extended time" and result in an "interpretive process [that] itself would create an inevitable, pervasive, and serious risk of chilling protected speech pending the drawing of fine distinctions that, in the end, would themselves be questionable," ante, at 9–10; that "a court would be remiss in performing its duties were it to accept an unsound principle merely to avoid the necessity of making a broader ruling," ante, at 12; and that avoiding a facial challenge to §203 "would prolong the substantial, nation-wide chilling effect" that §203 causes, ante, at 16. This logic, of course, applies equally to as-applied challenges to §§201 and 311.

Irony aside, the Court's promise that as-applied challenges will adequately protect speech is a hollow assurance. Now more than ever, §§201 and 311 will chill protected speech because—as California voters can attest—

"the advent of the Internet" enables "prompt disclosure of expenditures," which "provide[s]" political opponents "with the information needed" to intimidate and retaliate against their foes. Ante, at 55. Thus, "disclosure permits citizens . . . to react to the speech of [their political opponents] in a proper"—or undeniably improper—"way" long before a plaintiff could prevail on an as-applied challenge.[2] Ibid.

I cannot endorse a view of the First Amendment that subjects citizens of this Nation to death threats, ruined careers, damaged or defaced property, or pre-emptive and threatening warning letters as the price for engaging in "core political speech, the 'primary object of First Amendment protection.'" McConnell, 540 U. S., at 264 (THOMAS, J., concurring in part, concurring in judgment in part, and dissenting in part) (quoting Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC, 528 U. S. 377, 410–411 (2000) (THOMAS, J., dissenting)). Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from the Court's judgment upholding BCRA §§201 and 311.

[2] But cf. Hill v. Colorado, 530 U. S. 703, 707–710 (2000) (approving a statute restricting speech "within 100 feet" of abortion clinics because it protected women seeking an abortion from "'sidewalk counseling,'" which "consists of efforts 'to educate, counsel, persuade, or inform passersby about abortion and abortion alternatives by means of verbal or written speech,'" and which "sometimes" involved "strong and abusive language in face-to-face encounters").

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations ("AFL-CIO"), a federation of 56 national and international labor organizations with a total membership of 11 million working men and women, files this brief amicus curiae in support of Appellant with the consent of the parties as provided for in the Rules of this Court.[1]

INTEREST OF AMICUS

As plaintiffs in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, 540 U.S. 93 (2003), the AFL-CIO and its federal political committee ("the AFL-CIO Plaintiffs") brought a facial First Amendment challenge to § 203 of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act ("BCRA") of 2002, 2 U.S.C. § 441b(b)(2) and (c) (amending the Federal Election Campaign Act ("FECA"), 2 U.S.C. § 431 et seq.), which proscribes union and corporate funding of "electioneering communications." The AFL-CIO Plaintiffs did so because this provision criminalized the AFL-CIO's use of the broadcast medium as a legislative and policy advocacy tool, falsely characterized substantial labor organization speech on matters of public concern as wholly or substantially electoral, and impaired union political participation as a matter of law.

The AFL-CIO Plaintiffs placed in the McConnell record approximately 85 different television and radio advertisements that the AFL-CIO had sponsored throughout every year from 1995 through 2001, many of which would have been prohibited by § 203 because they referred to incumbent Members of Congress. See Joint Appendix ("J.A."), Vol. I, pp. 440-62 (Declaration of Denise Mitchell); J.A. Vol. II, pgs. 464-587 (Index of AFL-CIO Issue Advertising, 1995-2001); Brief of AFL-CIO Appellants/Cross-Appellees at 1-7, McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, No. 02-1775. Without specifically addressing that evidence or the other plaintiffs' evidence of overbreadth, however, this Court held that the various McConnell plaintiffs had not "carried their heavy burden of proving that [§ 203] is overbroad" and that § 203 constitutionally proscribed advertising "to the extent that [it was] the functional equivalent of express advocacy." See 540 U.S. at 203-11.

The AFL-CIO subsequently filed briefs amicus curiae in support of a tax-exempt, non-profit corporation in Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. v. Federal Election Commission, 546 U.S. 410 (2006), and Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., 127 S. Ct. 2652 (2007) ("WRTL II"), in order to preserve its own right to make as-applied challenges to § 203 and to undertake advertising that was structurally similar to that which the Government sought to ban in those cases.

Because the controlling opinion in WRTL II still leaves the AFL-CIO uncertain as to which of its public speech is potentially criminal, it has a direct interest in whether McConnell's facial upholding of § 203 stands. And, because the AFL-CIO and other labor organizations have fundamental interests in communicating with the general public about candidates and elections, it has a commensurate interest in the fate and interpretation of Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652 (1990).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

McConnell should be overruled as to §203's facial constitutionality. McConnell endorsed record evidence and theories that treated virtually all advertising literally described by §203 as bearing an "electioneering purpose" or a likely electoral "effect" that justifies its prohibition as the "functional equivalent" of express advocacy. But WRTL II rightly rejects these as permissible bases for censorship, eliminating the analytical underpinning of McConnell's overbreadth holding. And, as construed in WRTL II, §203 covers an insufficiently defined realm of speech that the FEC's regulatory implementation cannot satisfactorily define. Only express advocacy itself avoids undue vagueness.

The Court need not reconsider Austin to decide this case. The Government does not even defend Austin's anti-corruption rationale, instead contending that union and corporate independent speech may be prohibited if candidates and officeholders react favorably to it. But that proposition threatens the established constitutional line between contributions and independent expenditures, and its reliance on the McConnell record would justify censorship of speech well beyond even that captured by §203 as written.

The Government cannot demonstrate any other compelling governmental interest in prohibiting union independent expenditures. Austin aptly distinguished unions from corporations, and the Government's suggestion that such a prohibition is warranted to protect dissident employees is incorrect because federal constitutional and statutory law fully enable non-members to avoid paying for union political activities they oppose and empower union members to form and operate unions democratically with full voting and other participatory rights.

ARGUMENT

I. THE COURT SHOULD OVERRULE McCONNELL AND HOLD THAT § 203 IS FACIALLY UNCONSTITUTIONAL

A. McConnell upheld §203 on the ground that it was not overbroad, and WRTL II declined to revisit that holding in deciding an as-applied challenge. See 127 S. Ct. at 2670 n. 8. But the two decisions coexist in hopeless tension, as WRTL II's diligent effort to make constitutional sense of § 203 rebuts McConnell's ill-founded departures from sound and established First Amendment principles. The result is that labor organizations, including the AFL-CIO, and corporations, including Citizens United, remain subject to an unworkable censorship regime that can be redressed only by overruling McConnell's facial upholding of § 203.

McConnell concluded that "the vast majority of ads" that "clearly identified a [federal] candidate" and aired during the 30- and 60- day periods preceding recent general elections had "an electioneering purpose," 540 U.S. at 206, and "BCRA's application to pure issue ads is [in]substantial." Id. at 207. WRTL II states that McConnell's "vast majority" statement was "beside the point" because the Court "did not find that a 'vast majority' of the issue ads considered were the functional equivalent of express advocacy." 127 S. Ct. at 2670 n.8. But WRTL II rejects the analytical linchpins of McConnell's cursory overbreadth analysis, stating both that "electioneering purpose" was not "the appropriate test for distinguishing between genuine issue ads and the functional equivalent of express campaign advocacy," id. (emphasis added), and that "this Court in Buckley [v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 43-44 (1976),] had already rejected an intent-and-effect test for distinguishing between discussions of issues and candidates," a holding that McConnell "did not...address." 127 S. Ct. at 2665.

If "electioneering purpose" and "intent-and-effect" are not proxies for "functional equivalen[ce]," then no empirical underpinning remains for McConnell's overbreadth holding, which relied on "studies [that] classified the ads in terms of intent and effect." 127 S. Ct. at 2665. McConnell plainly endorsed the explicit position of the Government and the BCRA sponsor-intervenors that, with rare exception, § 203's primary definition of "electioneering communication" – a mere "refer[ence] to a clearly identified candidate for federal office" broadcast during the pre-election period and receivable by the requisite electorate, see 2 U.S.C. § 434(f)(3)(A)(i)(I) – literally identified "the functional equivalent of express advocacy," with "[in]substantial" exceptions. The McConnell majority pointed to four specific portions of the record to support its holding, see 540 U.S. at 206, and all treated § 203's "bright line" capaciously:

- The referenced pages of Annenberg Public Policy Center, "Issue Advertising in the 1999-2000 Election Cycle," termed all ads that referred to a candidate as "candidate-centered," and stated that they "usually present a candidate in a favorable or unfavorable light and then urge the audience to contact the candidate and tell him or her to support the sponsoring organization's policy position. Though the intent of these ads is to encourage voters to favor or oppose a candidate, because they do so implicitly instead of explicitly these ads fall outside the current regulatory jurisdiction of federal election law." Id. at 13 (emphasis added).

- The referenced pages of J. Krasno and F. Sorauf, "Evaluating the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA)," endorsed the work of student coders who reviewed ads and then answered this question: "In your opinion, is the purpose of the ad to provide information about or urge action on a bill or issue, or is it to generate support or opposition for a particular candidate?" J.A., Vol. III, p. 1336, McConnell v. Federal Election Commission (emphasis added). The few ads that these coders decided were "pure issue ads" "rarely mention[ed] federal candidates." Id. at 1339.
- The referenced pages of Judge Kollar-Kotelly's opinion rejected the plaintiffs' overbreadth claim by reasoning that it was "very likely that these eight advertisements did influence federal elections because they refer to a federal candidate in a broadcast advertisement aired in close proximity to a federal election, and targeted to the candidate's electorate" -- enough, she concluded, to warrant prohibition. See 251 F. Supp. 2d 176, 575 (D.D.C. 2003). For example, an ad that "[c]riticized a candidate on past votes in the period immediately before a federal election with no indication of future legislation on the issue likely serves no purpose other than to affect the outcome of the election" and so constitutes prohibitable "electioneering." Id.

- The referenced portion of Judge Leon's opinion, which discussed only political party advertisements, deemed as "electioneering" those that either "focused on the positions, past actions, or general character traits of federal candidates" or "compared the positions or past actions, of two competing federal candidates," rather than "focusing" on pending legislation or executive action. Id. at 826-87.

During the McConnell litigation, neither the Government, the BCRA sponsor-intervenors nor their amici subjected the advertisements in the record to anything resembling the WRTL II test, namely, that irrespective of an ad's actual or likely intent or effect, and irrespective of its context (other than timing and audience), whether the message was "susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than as an appeal to vote for or against a specific candidate." 127 S. Ct. at 2666 (emphasis added). To the contrary, they emphasized § 203's "bright line" and explicitly urged the Court to embrace the view that all candidate-referencing ads broadcast to the electorate close to elections were "functional[ly] equivalent to express advocacy" and so could be prohibited, subject only to rare as-applied challenges regarding ads that, in an inversion of WRTL II's holding, were susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than as an entirely non-electoral legislative or other issue appeal – a so-called "pure" issue ad. Like the student coders' question, they and McConnell presumed away the constitutionally critical fact that "'the distinction between discussion of issues and candidates and advocacy of election or defeat may often dissolve in practical application.'" WRTL II, 127 S. Ct. at 2669, quoting Buckley, 424 U.S. at 42. The Government relies upon the McConnell record, see Gov. Br. at 21, but, as we and other McConnell plaintiffs demonstrated through our submissions of actual advertisements in that case, McConnell erred in concluding that § 203 was not unconstitutionally overbroad, and the Court should overrule that determination.

B. As a category of speech whose utterance may be either prosecuted as "a federal crime," WRTL II, 127 S. Ct. at 2658; see 2 U.S.C. § 437g(a)(5)(C) and (D), or subjected to a wide-ranging FEC investigation and then to "burdensome [civil] litigation," WRTL II, 127 S. Ct. at 2666; see 2 U.S.C. § 437g(a)(4)-(6), WRTL II's "appeal to vote" standard is unduly vague and therefore unworkable. Relying as it does upon illustrative features that are, respectively, "consistent with that of a genuine issue ad" and "indicia of express advocacy," 127 S. Ct. at 2667, the standard introduces the kind of subjective analysis that the Court eschewed in Buckley and Federal Election Commission v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc. ("MCFL"), 479 U.S. 238, 248-49 (1986). The resulting uncertainty is well captured by the FEC's ensuing regulation, which offers a grudgingly narrow "safe harbor" and then "rules of interpretation" to determine whether, "on balance," the "appeal to vote" standard is satisfied. See 11 C.F.R. § 114.15. The agency has already failed to achieve a majority when it sought to apply this regulation during the very advisory opinion process that McConnell confidently predicted would suffice to "clarif[y]" other BCRA language "and thereby remove any doubt there may be as to the meaning of the law." 540 U.S. at 170 n.64 (citation and interior quotation marks omitted). See FEC Advisory Opinion 2008-15 (2009). Although this Court does not now sit in judgment of the FEC's regulatory implementation of WRTL II, it is an inevitable administrative consequence of an inherently uncertain standard for permissible speech.

Only express advocacy itself marks an electoral speech category that is precise enough to avoid "[t]he constitutional deficiencies" of vagueness: it unacceptably "'puts the speaker wholly at the mercy of the varied understanding of his hearers,'" "'blankets with uncertainly whatever may be said,'" and "'compels the speaker to hedge and trim.'" Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. at 43, quoting Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 535 (1945). See also Buckley, 424 U.S. at 79-80; MCFL, 479 U.S. at 249; WRTL II, 127 S. Ct. at 2682 (Scalia, J. concurring) ("If a permissible test short of the magic-words test existed, Buckley would surely have adopted it."). If salvaging § 203 requires the delineation of a category of speech that defies comparably clear application, the Court should invalidate the restriction outright.

II. THE ANTI-CORRUPTION INTEREST THAT SUPPORTS RESTRICTIONS ON CONTRIBUTIONS DOES NOT JUSTIFY RESTRICTIONS ON INDEPENDENT SPEECH

Because the Government does not contend that Hillary: The Movie contains express advocacy, and because the Court can and should overrule McConnell irrespective of McConnell's reliance on Austin, it is unnecessary in this case for the Court to reconsider Austin. Moreover, the Government neither directly acknowledges nor defends Austin's holding concerning Michigan's prohibition of corporate independent expenditures, and instead contends that a prohibition of both corporate and union expenditures is warranted by concerns about quid-pro-quo corruption that, since Buckley, the Court has consistently held warrant restrictions only on contributions. See generally Federal Election Commission v. Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee, 533 U.S. 431, 441-42 (2001).

The Government supports that proposition with a fraction of the McConnell record and asserts that it "indicated that... federal office-holders and candidates were aware of and felt indebted to corporations and unions that financed electioneering advertisements on their behalf or against their opponents." Gov. Br. at 8; see also id. at 11 (independent speech "has come to be used as a means of currying favor with and attempting to influence federal office-holders"). The Court should reject this invitation.

First, the Government fails to explain why that anecdotal record suffices to eliminate "the fundamental constitutional difference between money spent to advertise one's views independently of the candidate's campaign and money contributed to a candidate to be spent on his campaign." Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Political Action Committee ("NCPAC"), 470 U.S. 480, 497 (1985). Buckley so distinguished expenditures from contributions in invalidating FECA § 608(e)(l), which limited to $1,000/yr. "any expenditure... advocating the election or defeat of [a] candidate" by any "person," including unions and corporations. 424 U.S. at 44-45 and n.45. After construing this provision to mean only express advocacy in order to "preserve the provision against invalidation on vagueness grounds," id. at 46-47, the Court held that the prohibition "inadequate[ly]" served "the governmental interest in preventing corruption and [its] appearance" in part because the independence of the speech did not pose the danger that contributions did, namely, the risk of a "quid pro quo for improper commitments from the candidate," and, in fact, uncoordinated speech "may well provide little assistance to the candidate's campaign and indeed may prove counterproductive." Id. at 48.

Moreover, "[t]he fact that candidates and elected officials may alter or reaffirm their own positions on issues in response to political messages paid for [independently] by [others] can hardly be called corruption, for one of the essential features of democracy is the presentation to the electorate of varying points of view." NCPAC, 470 U.S. at 498. And, independent speech is as likely to curry disfavor as any "favor"; § 203 was fueled by caustic congressional denunciations of advertisements, from "negative" to "nightmare." McConnell, 540 U.S. at 260 (Scalia, J.) (collecting examples). All speech risks reaction, and the decision to undertake that risk is the speaker's constitutional prerogative.

Second, the McConnell union and corporate advertising record, including the portions referenced by the Government, was comprised entirely of independent speech that did not contain express advocacy at all, because 2 U.S.C. § 441b then, as now, prohibited it – indeed, the point of the Government and the BCRA sponsor-intervenors in compiling that record was to justify banning vast swaths of speech in addition to express advocacy, because, it was claimed, they were "functionally equivalent" to each other. The Government's contention now proves far too much and, if accepted, would lay the foundation for Congress and state legislatures to engulf in prohibition both the very independent speech that WRTL II held was immune from § 203 and much more.

The spillover in the Government's arguments from express advocacy to other speech on matters of public concern is also reflected in its dismissive contention that advertisements are often "unrelated to the mission of the financing corporation," or, for example, "focus[] on [judicial] candidates' records on crime rather than on issues of special concern to the corporate or union speaker," so their "electoral advocacy is a means to an end rather than an expression of political conviction." Gov. Br. at 10-11 n. 2. But "[i]n the realm of protected speech, the legislature is constitutionally disqualified from dictating the subjects about which persons may speak and the speakers who may address a public issue." First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 784-85 (1978). The Government does not even acknowledge Bellotti, which invalidated a state statute that prohibited corporations from spending on any ballot measure "other than one materially affecting any of [their] property, business or assets[.]" Id. at 768 n. 2 (interior quotation marks omitted). See also Buckley, 424 U.S. at 57.

The Government's casual dismissal of union political and social concerns brings to mind Justice Frankfurter's observation that "[to] write the history of the [railroad] Brotherhoods, the United Mine Workers, the Steel Workers, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, the International Ladies Garment Workers, the United Auto Workers, and leave out their so-called political activities and expenditures for them, would be sheer mutilation." Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. 740, 814-15 (1961) (dissenting opinion). "[U]nions have traditionally aligned themselves with a wide range of social, political and ideological viewpoints," Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Ass'n, 500 U.S. 507, 516 (1991), "expended funds in the support of political candidates and issues," Ellis v. Bhd. of Railway and Airline Clerks, 466 U.S. 435, 447 (1984), and played a vital role in the public arena as advocates for both their members and all workers. See generally Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB. 437 U.S. 556, 565-66 (1978); Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209, 227-32 (1977); Pipefitters v. United States, 407 U.S. 385, 402-32 (1972); Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. at 767. "[T]his Court accepts briefs from the AFL-CIO on issues that cannot be called industrial, in any circumscribed sense," id. at 814 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting), an observation that still holds true. See, e.g., Brief of AFL-CIO as Amicus Curiae, Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003). The Government simply lacks constitutional authority to designate and enforce its view of what are a union's "mission" or "special concern[s]."

III. NO OTHER COMPELLING GOVERNMENTAL INTEREST WARRANTS PROHIBITION OF UNION INDEPENDENT EXPENDITURES

Nor can the Government point to any other compelling governmental interest that could justify restricting union-financed express advocacy to the general public, and, except inferentially in McConnell, the Court has never held that there is one. See, e.g., Federal Election Commission v. National Right to Work Committee ("NRWC"), 459 U.S. 197, 208 (1982) (discussing unions with respect to contributions, not expenditures). Indeed, even before Buckley, indictments of labor organizations for allegedly violating the 1947 Taft-Hartley Act's proscription of union and corporate "expenditures" led every Justice who addressed its constitutionality to conclude that it violated the First Amendment.

In United States v. Congress of Industrial Organizations ("CIO"), 335 U.S. 106 (1948), the Court reviewed an indictment of the CIO and its president for making "expenditures" by endorsing a congressional candidate in the CIO's weekly newspaper. Reviewing the 1947 enactment, the Court concluded that the term "expenditure" "has no definitely defined meaning," id. at 112, and the "congressional explanation of [its] intended scope...[was] scanty and indecisive." Id. at 116. See also id. at 134 (Rutledge, J., concurring) (describing legislative history as "a veritable fog of contradictions relating to specific possible applications"). The majority dismissed the indictment by finding that it was not intended to apply to electoral publications by unions and corporations to their "members, stockholders or customers," because otherwise "the gravest doubt would arise in our minds as to its constitutionality." Id. at 121. And, four concurring Justices – as urged by the CIO and amici AFL and the Machinists Union – concluded that the "expenditure" prohibition should be invalidated because it was unduly vague, the justification that it was necessary to counter unions' "undue influence" was inadequate, and the asserted "minority protection" interest was trumped by its unwarranted "majority prohibition" since unions operated on "the principle of majority rule" in matters of "public advocacy." See id. at 147-48.

The Court returned to this prohibition nine years later when it considered another indictment of another labor organization for allegedly violating the expenditure provision in a television broadcast. United States v. United Auto Workers ("UAW"), 352

U.S. 567 (1957). Uncertain of the facts, the Court allowed the indictment to proceed and declined to address the union's constitutional claims. Id. at 590-93. The three dissenters echoed Justice Rutledge's CIO concurrence, id. at 593 (Douglas, J., dissenting), and Buckley 424 U.S. at 43, approvingly cited that dissent where it rejected the notion that union speech could be prohibited because it might "incite to action," including with the "purpose" "to sway voters." UAW, 352 U.S. at 595-96.

In upholding § 203, McConnell recited concern about "the special characteristics of the corporate structure [that] require particularly careful regulation" but recited none about unions. See id. at 205 (emphasis added) (quotation marks and citations omitted). Between UAW and McConnell, Austin was the Court's only decision holding any interest sufficient to warrant such a restriction on any group, there the non-profit Michigan Chamber of Commerce, which was primarily composed and funded by for-profit corporate members. See 494 U.S. at 656.[2] Austin identified "a different form of corruption" than had Buckley, namely, "the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth that are accumulated with the help of the corporate form and that have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas." Id. at 660.

Whatever the correctness of this holding as to the Chamber, the Court squarely rejected its applicability to unions in denying the Chamber's equal-protection claim that the state law under-inclusively failed also to apply to unincorporated labor organizations. The Court reasoned that unions have "crucial differences" from corporations: first, although unions too "may be able to amass large treasuries, they do so without the significant state-conferred advantage of the corporate structure"; and, second, "the funds available for a union's political activities more accurately reflect members' support for the organization's political views than does a corporation's general treasury" because a union may not compel represented non-members to support, with dues or other fees, the union's political, legislative and other ideological spending that is not directly germane to "'collective bargaining, contract administration and germane adjustment.'" Id. at 665-66, quoting Communications Workers of America v. Beck, 487 U.S. 735, 746 (1988).

[2] McConnell erred in saying that, since Buckley, Congress's power to prohibit union and corporate express advocacy "has been firmly embedded in our law." 540 U.S. at 203. See Austin, 494 U.S. at 682-83 (Scalia, J., dissenting); MCFL, 479 U.S. at 263; NCPAC, 470 U.S. at 496.

The legal framework governing unions, members, and other workers confirms that conclusion. "[T]he union is obliged 'fairly and equitably to represent all employees..., union and nonunion,' within the relevant unit." Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. at 221, quoting Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. at 761. "Wherever necessary to that end, the union is required to consider requests of nonunion members of the craft and expressions of their views with respect to collective bargaining with the employer and to give to them notice of and opportunity for hearing upon its proposed action." Steele v. Louisville & N.R. Co., 323 U.S. 192, 203 (1944). In 28 states and the District of Columbia, private sector unions and employers may lawfully reach "union-security" agreements under which non-members pay "agency fees" reflecting their fair share for that representation. See W. Osborne, ed., Labor Union Law and Regula- tion 518 (2003). But these non-members cannot be compelled to contribute toward a union's partisan political activities or its legislative, ideological and other activities unrelated to collective bargaining and contract administration. Communications Workers of America v. Beck. And, their dissent "is not to be presumed – it must affirmatively be made known by the dissenting employee." Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. at 774. Meanwhile, in the other 22 states, so-called "right-to-work" laws preclude any requirement in the private sector that non-members pay any fees to their exclusive union representative for any purpose, yet the union's duty of fair representation nonetheless applies. See Osborne, supra.

Moreover, from their inception unions are democratic, member-controlled organizations. A union forms by its "designat[ion] or select[ion] for the purpose of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purpose." 29 U.S.C. § 159(a). Following this voluntary formation, members elect their officers and national convention delegates by secret ballot, see 29 U.S.C. §§ 481-483; members determine their dues rates by these same methods, see 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(3); all members enjoy equal rights to nominate candidates for union office, vote in union elections and otherwise participate in union affairs, and they have rights of speech and association. See 29 U.S.C. §§ 411, 481(e). Membership itself is completely voluntary, and resignation cannot be restricted. Pattern Makers League v. NLRB, 473 U.S. 95 (1985).

These laws and practices, which set unions apart from other entities subject to FECA's speech prohibitions, completely undermine the Government's only other proffered rationale for restricting union independent expenditures, namely, to protect individuals "'who have paid money into a ...union for purposes other than the support of candidates from having that money used to support political candidates to whom they are opposed.'" See Gov. Br. at 12, quoting NRWC, supra. See also Gov. Br. at 13 ("protections against the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes"). Even so, the Government tepidly terms that interest as merely "legitimate," id. at 12, 13, but only a compelling governmental interest can justify such a restriction on any speaker, WRTL II, 127 S. Ct. at 2671, and the Court has never held this interest to justify prohibiting union-financed speech outright. However the Court addresses Austin, it should recognize no compelling governmental interest in criminalizing independent union electoral speech.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the district court should be reversed.

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE[1]

Amici curiae, Senators John McCain and Russell Feingold and former Representatives Christopher Shays and Martin Meehan, were the principal sponsors of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA). Working together over the course of their public careers, they have devoted enormous time and energy to ensuring that our federal campaign finance laws are meaningful and not subject to wholesale evasion. Amici worked for seven years to enact BCRA to close loopholes in the then-existing system. They participated as intervening defendants in McConnell v. FEC, 540 U.S. 93 (2003), to defend the constitutionality of those loophole-closing measures. Senator McCain and former representatives Shays and Meehan also participated as amici curiae and, later, intervenors in the litigation commenced as Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. v. FEC, which led to two decisions of this Court.[2] Messrs. Shays and Meehan have also been plaintiffs in a series of lawsuits in the federal courts of the District of Columbia seeking to compel the FEC to carry out its duty to promulgate regulations properly implementing BCRA.

Amici McCain, Feingold, Shays, and Meehan submit this brief because the arguments advanced by Citizens United threaten to undo much of what they accomplished in achieving the enactment of BCRA, to roll back long-standing provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) that predate BCRA, and even to jeopardize statutes requiring disclosure of corporate and union political and lobbying expenditures outside the field of candidate elections. Amici urge the Court to reject Citizens United's far-reaching positions and instead apply settled principles establishing that restrictions on the use of corporate and union funds for express candidate advocacy and its functional equivalents are constitutionally permitted, and that the interest in informing voters of the moneyed interests behind candidate-related election-season advertising is sufficient to sustain application of BCRA's disclosure provisions to the entire range of electioneering communications defined in BCRA, as eight members of this Court held in McConnell.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Beyond the dispute over whether the contents of Hillary: The Movie are the functional equivalent of express advocacy—a factbound question that was thoroughly considered by the district court, with whose decision we agree for the reasons stated by the FEC and the court itself, and that we do not address further—this case presents several issues of great importance for the ongoing enforcement and administration of federal campaign finance laws. Acceptance of Citizens United's positions would open the door to essentially unlimited corporate- and union-funded election advocacy and would eviscerate disclosure provisions designed to alert the electorate to the interests that finance election-related messages.

Citizens United contends that even assuming that Hillary: The Movie contains the functional equivalent of express advocacy, it should have been permitted to finance cable transmissions of the movie outside the constraints of BCRA. To support this position, it advocates that the Court either overrule its decision in Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652 (1990), significantly expand the scope of its holding in FEC v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc., 479 U.S. 238 (1986) (MCFL), or hold that regulation of the financing of "on-demand" cable transmissions of video programming containing candidate advocacy falls outside the justifications this Court has previously accepted for restrictions on funding of electioneering communications by business corporations and labor unions.

None of these submissions has merit. Merely overruling Austin would not avail Citizens United because the application of BCRA to corporate- and union-financed communications that are the functional equivalent of express advocacy is supported not only by Austin, but also, much more directly, by this Court's more recent decisions in McConnell and FEC v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., 127 S. Ct. 2652 (2007) (WRTL II), neither of which the Court has been asked to overrule. Nor, in any event, does Citizens United offer the special justification necessary to support the overruling of this Court's precedents. As for MCFL, Citizens United's arguments would tear it from its moorings as a narrow ruling allowing advocacy by nonprofit corporations that do not accept donations from business corporations and unions, turning it into a loophole that would allow substantial use of corporate and union funds to support express advocacy and its equivalent. And Citizens United's argument that candidate advocacy via on-demand video is so different from traditional advertising that it should be open to no-holds-barred corporate and union financing of electioneering messages overlooks that such advocacy poses the same threats to the electoral system as does corporate funding of more traditional forms of election advocacy.

With respect to the advertisements for Hillary: The Movie, Citizens United's arguments are just as unfounded and would be equally destructive of settled principles of campaign finance jurisprudence. With near unanimity, this Court has approved requirements for disclosure of the sources of funding of election-related messages because disclosure serves the electorate's significant informational interests. Citizens United's assertion that those interests are only present when the messages in question involve express advocacy or its equivalent are unsupported by any of this Court's precedents. Rather, those interests are implicated by the full range of electioneering communications under BCRA, specifically including Citizens United's ads bearing derogatory messages about a presidential candidate, targeted at voters in states in which she was competing in primary elections. And Citizens United's hollow claims that it would be burdened by the disclosure and disclaimer requirements applicable to its ads under BCRA are flatly contradicted by this Court's precedents.

ARGUMENT

I. The First Amendment Does Not Protect Citizens United's Use of Corporate Funds to Finance the Functional Equivalent of Express Advocacy.

A. This Court Should Reject Citizens United's Suggestion That It Overrule Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce.

In its merits brief, Citizens United suggests for the first time that this Court resolve this case by overruling Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, in which the Court upheld a Michigan statute requiring for-profit corporations and unions to use segregated funds rather than treasury funds to finance express advocacy. Citizens United makes this request despite the failure of its Jurisdictional Statement in this case to present any such issue. Indeed, the Jurisdictional Statement did not even cite Austin, and it limited the questions Citizens United wished to present to as-applied challenges to BRCA's restriction on Citizens United's use of its funds to transmit Hillary: The Movie by cable or satellite, and as-applied challenges to BCRA's reporting and disclosure requirements (the same as-applied challenges Citizens United advanced in the district court).

Even overlooking this omission, Citizens United's current suggestion that repudiating Austin—the only decision its brief asks this Court to overrule—would be sufficient to decide this case in its favor is incorrect. Citizens United contends that even as to communications that are the functional equivalent of express advocacy—indeed, even as to express advocacy itself—BCRA's restriction on the use of corporate or union treasury funds to finance electioneering communications is unconstitutional. That is not, as Citizens United would have it, a conclusion the Court could reach by overruling Austin alone. Rather, to arrive at that holding, the Court would have to overrule its more recent decision in McConnell v. FEC, because it was McConnell (not Austin) that held that the funding restrictions imposed by BCRA are facially constitutional, and the thrust of Citizens United's argument is that those restrictions have no constitutional application to the use of corporate or union treasury funds to finance electioneering communications. Notably, overruling McConnell is a step that Citizens United does not ask the Court to take, despite extensively discussing various aspects of McConnell's holdings. And it is a well-settled principle that this Court generally declines to overrule one of its decisions when no party has asked it to do so. See, e.g., IBP, Inc. v. Alvarez, 546 U.S. 21, 32 (2005).

Moreover, the McConnell majority's holding that BCRA's restrictions on the use of corporate and union treasury funds to finance electioneering communications are facially constitutional did not rest only, or even principally, on Austin. Rather, the majority invoked the Court's campaign finance jurisprudence from Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), onward, with special emphasis on FEC v. National Right to Work Committee, 459 U.S. 197 (1982), and FEC v. Beaumont, 539 U.S. 146 (2003). See McConnell, 540 U.S. at 203-06. The Court based its holding that there is a compelling interest supporting application of funding restrictions to express advocacy, and hence to its functional equivalent, on "our precedents," id. at 205, not just on Austin. In light of McConnell's reasoning as well as its holding, it is untenable to suggest that a surgical overruling of Austin, as opposed to a wholesale overruling of McConnell and the line of precedents on which it relied, would suffice to resolve this case.

Citizens United's suggested disposition of the case would also make a mockery of the controlling opinion in WRTL II. That opinion went to great pains to explicate a test for distinguishing electioneering communications that are not the functional equivalent of express advocacy (and hence, it held, may not be subjected to the funding restrictions of BCRA Title II), from those that are the functional equivalent of express advocacy, and hence fall within McConnell's undisturbed holding that the funding restrictions are constitutional "to the extent that ... ads broadcast during the 30- and 60-day periods preceding federal primary and general elections are the functional equivalent of express advocacy." McConnell, 540 U.S. at 206; see WRTL II, 127 S. Ct. at 2670 (opinion of Roberts, C.J.).

The controlling opinion in WRTL II explicitly described its holding as "draw[ing] ... a line" between impermissible applications of the funding restrictions and permissible ones, id. at 2659, and establishing a "test to distinguish constitutionally protected political speech from speech that BCRA may proscribe." Id. at 2665 (emphasis added). Moreover, the opinion defended the line it drew not only against arguments that it was insufficient to serve BCRA's goals of preventing actual and apparent corruption, but also against the contention of the concurring Justices that it was too restrictive of speech. Id. at 2669 n.7. The controlling opinion roundly rejected the latter view, insisting that a test that "affords protection unless an ad is susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than as an appeal to vote for or against a specific candidate" is adequate to protect First Amendment interests. Id. (emphasis in original). To erase that line only two years later with a holding that unlimited corporate and union funds may be used even for communications that are express advocacy or its functional equivalent would be, in the words of WRTL II, "a constitutional 'bait and switch.'" Id. at 2673.

In any event, Citizens United's argument for overruling Austin fails to identify the "special justification" required for this Court to overrule one of its precedents. Harris v. United States, 536 U.S. 545, 557 (2002). Citizens United's brief argument for overruling Austin rests principally on its alleged inconsistency with the principles of Buckley v. Valeo and First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765 (1978). Such claimed doctrinal inconsistency is hardly a "special justification," see Harris, 536 U.S. at 557, especially when the supposedly inconsistent decisions preceded and were thoroughly considered in the decision at issue. See Austin, 494 U.S. at 657-58 (extensively discussing Buckley and Bellotti).

That the Court in McConnell (in an opinion coauthored by one of the Austin dissenters) reaffirmed the principle that the use of corporate funds for express candidate advocacy may be restricted and again specifically addressed both Buckley and Bellotti underscores that those decisions offer no special justification for overruling precedents of this Court. See McConnell, 540 U.S. at 206 n. 88.

In light of the 60-year history of the prohibition on use of corporate or union treasury funds for express advocacy and the string of this Court's precedents that were either premised on or explicitly affirmed the constitutionality of this restriction—including Buckley, National Right to Work Committee, MCFL, Austin, Beaumont, McConnell, and WRTL II—it can hardly be suggested that the "evolution of legal principle" has "implicitly or explicitly left [Austin or McConnell] behind as a mere survivor of obsolete constitutional thinking." Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 857 (1992).

Indeed, when this Court first considered BCRA in McConnell, Citizens United's current counsel, who was then defending BCRA, repeatedly endorsed Austin's holding and argued that it was "clear that the Constitution permits source-of-funding limits on corporate expenditures in connection with candidate elections." Brief for the FEC, at 78, McConnell (No. 02-1674). Indeed, counsel told the Court that the record developed in McConnell, far from indicating some change in circumstances that undermined Austin, provided support for restrictions on corporate and union election expenditures that "dwarfed" the showing accepted in Austin, id. at 85-86, and rejected the suggestion that Austin should be overturned even in part. Id. at 116.

Little more than five years later, the holding of McConnell and the reasoning of such cases as Austin and Beaumont that supported it remain fully valid. There is no basis for suggesting that concerns about the potentially overwhelming, distorting, and corrupting influence of unleashing massive corporate and union war chests for use in unfettered express candidate advocacy are no longer compelling. That our electoral process would soon be dominated by corporate and union spending if the Court were to use this case as the occasion to roll back the longstanding prohibition on express advocacy by business corporations and unions is beyond serious question.

B. Citizens United's Communications Are Not Protected by the Principles of MCFL.

Beyond its frontal assault on the proposition that the use of corporate funds for express advocacy or its equivalent may be restricted, Citizens United asks the Court to rewrite its precedents to permit Citizens United to engage in such advocacy as long as the corporate funds used for that purpose are outweighed by funds contributed by individuals. According to Citizens United, this Court's holding in MCFL that ideological nonprofit organizations that accept no money from for-profit corporations may use their treasury funds for express advocacy should also protect Citizens United's use of funds contributed by business corporations, as long as its communications are "funded predominantly by individuals." Citizens United Br. 31.

Citizens United made no such argument in this case before its merits brief in this Court. Nowhere in its papers in the district court or in its Jurisdictional Statement did it contend that the sources of funding on which it relied brought its speech within the protection of MCFL. Indeed, Citizens United expressly informed the district court that it is "not a 'qualified nonprofit corporation' because it receives corporate donations and engages in business activities." Plaintiff's Statement of Undisputed Material Facts at 1, Citizens United v. FEC, No. 07-2240, D.E. 52 (D.D.C. filed May 16, 2008).[3] It made no effort to establish that, despite its acknowledged failure to meet the regulatory criteria for the exception embodying the MCFL principle, it nonetheless should receive the benefit of MCFL's holding. Having failed to make the argument in the district court or in its Jurisdictional Statement, Citizens United has waived it. See Bay Area Laundry & Dry Cleaning Pension Trust Fund v. Ferbar Corp. of Cal., 522 U.S. 192, 207-08 (1997); see also TRW Inc. v. Andrews, 534 U.S. 19, 33-34 (2001).[4]

Even if entertained, Citizens United's belated reliance on MCFL should be rejected because it would transform a narrowly limited doctrine designed to protect groups that are truly independent of the interests of for-profit corporations and unions into an avenue for

[3] "Qualified nonprofit corporation" is the FEC's regulatory nomenclature for an MCFL corporation. See 11 C.F.R. § 114.10.

[4] Citizens United's failure to advance this argument in the district court inhibited the creation of a complete record that would have unearthed the full extent to which it has relied on corporate funds. Citizens United's brief cites the organization's interrogatory responses, which purport to establish that only two business corporations made contributions of $1000 toward Hillary: The Movie (see Citizens United Br. 7), but those responses not only are apparently limited to earmarked contributions, but also reveal that significant contributions came from some "other noncorporate persons" who were not individuals. Id. Presumably those "noncorporate persons" were other organizations, which may in turn have been passing through funds donated by business corporations.

wholesale circumvention of restrictions on corporate electioneering expenditures and contributions.

This Court's decision in MCFL did not, as Citizens United suggests, establish the principle that funding of candidate advocacy by for-profit corporations is constitutionally protected as long as it is combined with a larger quantity of dollars contributed by individuals. Rather, the Court in MCFL identified "three features essential to our holding that [MCFL] may not constitutionally be bound by [2 U.S.C.] § 441b's restriction on independent spending." MCFL, 479 U.S. at 263-64 (emphasis added). The third of those essential features was:

> MCFL was not established by a business corporation or a labor union, and it is its policy not to accept contributions from such entities. This prevents such corporations from serving as conduits for the type of direct spending that creates a threat to the political marketplace.

Id. at 264 (emphasis added). In other words, what the Court considered essential in MCFL was not that the organization received only a little corporate money or that its funding was mostly from individuals, but that it accepted no contributions from business corporations or labor unions, as a matter of policy.

Similarly, in Austin, the Court rejected the argument that funding restrictions on candidate advocacy could not be applied to a non-profit corporation that received money from business corporations. The Court reiterated that each of the three characteristics identified in MCFL was "crucial," 494 U.S. at 662, and it found the organization at issue (the Michigan Chamber of Commerce) ineligible for MCFL's constitutional exemption from restrictions on candidate advocacy expenditures in part "[b]ecause the Chamber accepts money from for-profit corporations," and therefore "it could ... serve as a conduit for corporate political spending" if permitted to use its treasury funds for advocacy. Id. at 664. The Court thus found it permissible to relegate the Chamber to advocacy through a segregated fund, which "cannot receive contributions from corporations." Id. at 664 n.3 (emphasis added).

McConnell, too, emphasized that MCFL exempts only a "carefully defined category of entities," 540 U.S. at 210, from the requirement that candidate advocacy by corporations be paid for from segregated funds contributed by individuals. And it repeated that one of the "central" requirements of MCFL is that an organization have a policy of not accepting contributions from business corporations or labor unions. Id. at 210-11. Similarly, in WRTL II, the controlling opinion declined to consider the argument that MCFL supported the as-applied challenge in that case "because WRTL's funds for its ads were not derived solely from individual contributions." 127 S. Ct. at 2673 n.10 (emphasis added).

Accepting Citizens United's argument that a little corporate funding of candidate advocacy must be permitted—or even a substantial amount, as long as it is not "predominant"—would have serious deleterious effects on federal campaign finance law and allow widespread circumvention of critical provisions previously upheld by this Court. Citizens United's argument would apply equally to express advocacy as well as to electioneering communications that are the functional equivalent of express advocacy. Cf. McConnell, 540 U.S. at 210 (noting that MCFL necessarily applies both to electioneering communications under BCRA and to traditional express-advocacy expenditures under FECA). Thus, the implication of Citizens United's argument is not only that non-profit organizations may freely finance candidate advocacy with a mix of funds contributed by business corporations and individuals as long as most of the money comes from the latter, but also that (1) business corporations and unions may pay for express advocacy through accounts to which they have contributed their own treasury funds, as long as contributions from individuals predominate; (2) independent political committees that engage in express advocacy (and possibly multicandidate committees that make contributions to candidate committees) must be free to accept corporate funds as long as individual contributions predominate; and (3) BCRA's prohibitions on the use of "soft money" by political parties for federal election activity (upheld in McConnell) must be modified to allow some corporate soft-money contributions toward such activity as long as they do not predominate over individual contributions.

In short, Citizens United's argument would upset both the requirements that election expenditures be funded through truly "segregated" funds and the prohibitions on use of corporate and union funds for expenditures by political committees—provisions that are supported by a long line of this Court's decisions. See McConnell, 124 S. Ct. at 204-11; Beaumont, 539 U.S. at 162-63; Austin, 494 U.S. at 658-65; Nat'l Right to Work Comm., 459 U.S. at 201-202; Cal. Med. Ass'n v. FEC, 453 U.S. 182 (1981). The effect of accepting Citizens United's view would be to permit the mobilization and unleashing of "political war chests funneled through the corporate form," FEC v. Nat'l Conservative Political Action Comm., 470 U.S. 480, 501 (1985), as corporations would be free to use essentially unlimited amounts of their treasury funds to back candidate advocacy, as long as those funds were parceled out among nonprofit organizations or political committees in such a way that any particular piece of advocacy was not paid for "predominantly" with corporate funds. In effect, MCFL would be transformed into little more than a "matching" requirement: Every dollar of corporate or union funds supporting express advocacy would have to be matched by something more than a dollar (how much more is unclear) contributed by an individual.

The compelling interest in preventing corruption and the appearance of corruption that is served by "barring corporate earnings from being converted into political 'war chests,'" Beaumont, 539 U.S. at 154, as well as the interest in preventing nonprofit organizations from becoming conduits for the evasion of campaign finance law, id. at 155, thus demand rejection of Citizens United's proposed expansion of MCFL. As in Beaumont and National Right to Work Committee, the Court should not "second-guess a legislative determination as to the need for prophylactic measures where corruption is the evil feared." Beaumont, 539 U.S. at 157 (quoting Nat'l Right to Work Comm., 459 U.S. at 210).

Respect for Congress's judgment in this respect is counseled not only by the interests served by the funding restriction, but also by the absence of any principled and workable basis on which a court that accepted Citizens United's invitation to allow some corporate or union funding could proceed to determine how much corporate or union money is too much. Moreover, because both the amount and percentage of corporate or union contributions to any particular organization would vary from year to year—and even from communication to communication—the quest to determine "predominance" would become, at least, an annual event. The Court should therefore adhere to the bright-line constitutional principle established by its precedents: Congress may disallow any use of funds from business corporations or labor unions to pay for express advocacy and its equivalent.

C. Citizens United's Position That Justifications for Limits on Corporate Electioneering Vanish When Voters Must Choose to Expose Themselves to It Is Incorrect.

Leaving aside its pleas for overruling Austin or dramatically extending MCFL, Citizens United's principal argument seems to be that the justifications for restrictions on corporate and union funding of express advocacy or communications that are its functional equivalent vanish when the advocacy takes the form not of broadcast ads that are imposed on television viewers, but "narrowcast" advocacy that members of the public must first choose to view (enticed, at least in this case, by ads that are themselves electioneering communications).[5] Although the principal focus of the congressional deliberations leading to passage of BCRA's electioneering communications provisions was traditional ads, the interests that provide constitutional justification for the funding restriction are fully applicable to communications that recipients must choose to receive.

[5] Citizens United also questions whether its particular advocacy would threaten to create actual or apparent corruption because Senator Clinton's principal opponent in the primaries, President Obama, likely would not perceive Citizens United's communications as supportive of his own candidacy. See Citizens United Br. 41. But this Court has never suggested that the justifications for limits on corporate express advocacy and its equivalent depend on whether one can identify a specific candidate who would likely be corrupted by a particular expenditure. In any event, Citizens United's argument assumes, wrongly, that only Senator Clinton's primary opponents, and not potential Republican opponents in the general election, would be favorably influenced by Citizens United's spending to defeat her.

Indeed, that ads are imposed on viewers unwillingly is not one of the reasons that this Court has relied on in holding that corporations and unions can be prohibited from using their treasury funds to finance candidate advocacy. The Court has identified two principal justifications for that restriction: that there is a significant potential for corruption or its appearance if candidates benefit from large-scale corporate or union expenditures supporting them or targeting their opponents, and that the electoral process should be protected from "the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth that are accumulated with the help of the corporate form and that have little or no correlation to the public's support for the corporation's political ideas." McConnell, 540 U.S. at 205 (quoting Austin, 494 U.S. at 660). Both are equally applicable to means of electoral persuasion that voters must take some initiative to access.

Acceptance of Citizens United's argument would have potentially far-reaching and undesirable consequences. The argument, like the MCFL argument, cannot be confined to electioneering communications, but would extend to independent expenditures for express advocacy as well. Thus, Citizens United's reasoning would appear equally applicable, for example, to full-scale express advocacy over the Internet (where access to content is typically user-initiated), and it would thereby open the door to unlimited corporate and union expenditures using the web to explicitly urge votes for and against candidates.[6] The same would be true of any cor-

[6] As the FEC notes (FEC Br. 26 n.8), the FEC has been cautious in extending FECA's and BCRA's provisions to the Internet, and the electioneering communications provisions do not apply to the web. The regulations cited by the FEC, however, do not exempt porate- or union-funded express advocacy in any form—written, audio, or video—where a voter exercised choice before receiving it. Indeed, Citizens United's reasoning would seem to protect corporate-funded telephone banks that called voters, asked if they were interested in hearing a message about Candidate X, and then, if the voter said yes, launched into express advocacy.

The majority in McConnell observed that when it comes to elections, "Money, like water, will always find an outlet." 540 U.S. at 224. Congress cannot, of course, always anticipate precisely what that outlet will be. But when, as here, it has enacted legislation principally motivated by one practice (corporate and union funding of broadcasts and cablecasts of ads containing candidate-related advocacy) that is equally applicable by its terms to another practice (corporate and union funding of on-demand cablecasting of programming containing candidate-related advocacy), and when that other practice poses exactly the same threats of potential corruption of the electoral process, there is no reason to limit Congress's enactment to the precise evil that prompted its passage. Cf. Brogan v. United States, 522 U.S. 398, 403 (1998) ("[T]he reach of a statute often exceeds the precise evil to be eliminated").

Although its constitutional arguments are unfounded, Citizens United has also raised a question about whether on-demand cable "narrowcasting" of Hillary: The Movie

Internet communications from the restriction on the use of treasury funds of business corporations and unions to finance "expenditures" (i.e., express advocacy). Citizens United's reasoning, by contrast, would place any Internet site accessed at the choice of a user constitutionally off-limits from any restrictions on the use of corporate or union funds.

would have met the FEC's regulatory definition of transmission of an electioneering communication. According to Citizens United, each individual on-demand transmission of the program would have been received only by the household that ordered it, but the regulatory definition of an electioneering communication requires that a transmission be capable of receipt by 50,000 persons in the state where the election is imminent. See Citizens United Br. 26-27 n.2 (citing 11 C.F.R. § 100.29(b)(3)(ii)). Because this Court's consideration of the constitutionality of a statutory or regulatory restriction may require, as an antecedent, determining what the challenged law actually provides, Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic & Institutional Rights, 547 U.S. 47, 56 (2006), Citizens United's failure to raise this point before does not necessarily bar this Court from reaching it.

As the FEC points out, however, if Hillary: The Movie had been distributed through an on-demand cable channel, it would have been available to all subscribers of a cable system with access to on-demand programming, and the regulatory definition of what it means for a transmission to be capable of being viewed by the requisite number of persons is based primarily on the number of subscribers of the system. See FEC Br. 23-24 n.7; 11 C.F.R. § 100.29(b)(7)(i)-(iii). The FEC's interpretation of its own regulation appears reasonable even though the Commission may not have specifically considered application of the regulations to on-demand programming when promulgating them.

To the extent that there may be some ambiguity in the applicability of the regulations, the Court could possibly conclude that it is sufficiently doubtful that on-demand viewing of Hillary: The Movie would have been within the scope of the FEC's current regulations that the Court should withhold judgment on the constitutional issue until such time as the FEC made a more specific regulatory determination to include such transmissions within the regulatory definition of electioneering communications. In no event, however, should the Court accept Citizens United's broad constitutional arguments that would place even express advocacy beyond the bounds of regulation if it is accessed at the choice of the viewer.

II. The Application of BCRA's Disclosure and Disclaimer Requirements to Electioneering Communications That Are Not Functionally Equivalent to Express Candidate Advocacy Is Constitutionally Permissible.

Citizens United's proposed broadcast advertisements for Hillary: The Movie, though not containing the functional equivalent of express advocacy within the meaning of WRTL II, prominently mentioned Senator Clinton and were intended to be aired shortly before primary elections in which she was a candidate for office and/or the national party convention that would determine the nomination for that office. The ads would thus, without question, have been electioneering communications under BCRA, see 2 U.S.C. § 434(f)(3)(A)(i), and the FEC's implementing regulations. Equally unquestionable is that the ads commented negatively on Senator Clinton's character and fitness for office, either explicitly or by insinuation. Nothing in this Court's decisions suggests that measures aimed at disclosing to the public the origin of these broadcast messages and the identity of those who financed them are unconstitutional.

A. The Justifications for Disclosure Requirements That This Court Has Accepted Are Not Limited to Express Advocacy and Its Functional Equivalent.

Citizens United's basic submission is that unless a communication falls within the class as to which Congress may permissibly impose restrictions on corporate funding—that is, express advocacy or its functional equivalent—there is no legitimate justification for disclosure provisions, either. Citizens United's position is flatly at odds with this Court's jurisprudence.

In McConnell, eight Justices voted to uphold the facial constitutionality of § 201 of BCRA, the basic provision requiring those who disseminate electioneering communications to disclose contributions made to support them. The five-Justice majority found disclosure to be justified by "the important state interests that prompted the Buckley Court to uphold FECA's disclosure requirements—providing the electorate with information, deterring actual corruption and avoiding any appearance thereof, and gathering the data necessary to enforce more substantive electioneering restrictions." 540 U.S. at 196. The three concurring Justices did not believe that either the enforcement or anti-corruption rationales applied to electioneering communications, but they agreed that the disclosure requirement "does substantially relate to" the interest in providing the electorate with information, and that this substantial relationship "assures its constitutionality." Id. at 321 (Kennedy, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part).[7]

[7] What Citizens United refers to as the "disclaimer" requirement of BCRA § 311—which requires electioneering communica-

Notably, the three Justices who concurred on this point did so even though they saw no interests sufficient to justify the application of corporate funding restrictions to electioneering communications—a position directly at odds with Citizens United's view that the justifications for disclosure extend only to communications as to which funding restrictions are also justified. Similarly, the majority opinion nowhere suggested that the justification for the disclosure requirements was limited to electioneering communications that are the functional equivalent of express advocacy. In short, eight Justices accepted the disclosure requirements in McConnell without intimating any support for Citizens United's position that Congress's power to impose disclosure requirements is coextensive with its power to restrict funding of communications.

Moreover, the majority's treatment of the disclosure requirements was quite different from its analysis of the corporate funding restriction, where it limited its holding that the restriction was facially constitutional by noting that the justifications for the restriction are applicable "to the extent that the issue ads broadcast during the 30- and 60-day periods preceding federal primary and general elections are the functional equivalent of express advocacy." 540 U.S. at 206. By contrast, the majority identified no such limits on the justifications for the disclosure provisions, and concluded that they were facially constitutional because, absent evidence that their appli-tions not authorized by candidate committees to identify who paid for them and state that they were not authorized by a candidate committee—was similarly upheld by eight Justices who found that it "bears a sufficient relationship to the important governmental interest of 'shed[ding] the light of publicity' on campaign financing." 540 U.S. at 231 (opinion for the Court of Rehnquist, C.J.).

cation in a particular case was reasonably likely to lead to threats, harassment, or reprisals against contributors (id. at 198-99), the interests served by disclosure "amply suppor[t] application of [the] disclosure requirements to the entire range of 'electioneering communications'"—not just those that are equivalent to express advocacy. Id. at 196.

McConnell did not, of course, decide as-applied challenges that were not before it. See Wisc. Right to Life, Inc. v. FEC, 546 U.S. 410 (2006). But the reasoning used by the Court in rejecting the facial challenge to BCRA's disclosure provisions is inconsistent with this particular as-applied challenge. In contrast, the controlling opinion in WRTL II held that McConnell's reasoning in rejecting the facial challenge to BCRA's funding restrictions for electioneering communications was not inconsistent with the as-applied challenge in WRTL II.

With respect to the funding restrictions, the Court held in McConnell that the statute was not facially overbroad because it could be validly applied to communications that were the functional equivalent of express advocacy, and the Court was not convinced that the possible unconstitutional applications outside that realm were substantial in relation to the statute's legitimate sweep. See 540 U.S. at 207. In WRTL II, the controlling opinion concluded that that holding necessarily left room for an as-applied challenge to application of the restrictions to communications that were asserted not to be functionally equivalent to express advocacy. See 127 S. Ct. at 2659-60.

By contrast, with respect to disclosure, the reason that McConnell rejected the facial challenge was not simply that there were a substantial number of permissible applications of the disclosure provision, but that the justifications for disclosure applied to the "entire range of 'electioneering communications,'" McConnell, 540 U.S. at 196, except where the result would be harassment, threats or reprisals. That reasoning is inconsistent with the as-applied challenge advanced here, and there is nothing novel in recognizing that the reasoning of a decision finding a statute facially constitutional may determine the outcome of subsequent as-applied challenges. See, e.g., WRTL II, 127 S. Ct. at 2664 (recognizing that resolution of an as-applied challenge is "informed by our precedents" and that McConnell's holding would doom an as-applied challenge to the application of BCRA's electioneering communication funding restrictions to "express advocacy or its functional equivalent").

Nor does the Court's holding in WRTL II call into doubt the constitutionality of applying the disclosure provisions to electioneering communications that fall short of being the functional equivalent of express advocacy. The controlling opinion in WRTL II acknowledged that advertisements that are not the functional equivalent of express advocacy may be intended to influence elections and may have actual effects on elections, and that it may be exceedingly difficult to distinguish ads with that intent and effect from electorally neutral ones. 127 S. Ct. at 2664-69. But because the Court was considering what the controlling opinion regarded as a prohibition on speech by corporate speakers, it adopted a narrow, objective test for determining when a communication constitutes the functional equivalent of express advocacy, premised on the notion that "[w]here the First Amendment is implicated, the tie goes to the speaker, not the censor," and that "[d]iscussion of issues cannot be suppressed because the issues may also be pertinent in an election." Id. at 2669 (emphasis added). In short, the controlling opinion in WRTL II was determining what justifications would support a "ban" on protected speech, and its conclusions reflected the view that in deciding such an issue "we give the benefit of the doubt to speech, not censorship." Id. at 2674.

The controlling opinion's conclusion that speech must be the functional equivalent of express advocacy before the interests identified as compelling in McConnell, Austin, and Buckley justify a prohibition on corporate funding by no means suggests that lesser measures can only be sustained for the same type of speech. Rather, the undoubted electoral effects of advertisements that discuss candidates in proximity to an election, which were described in detail in the majority opinion in McConnell, 540 U.S. at 126-30, 193-94, and nowhere denied in the controlling opinion in WRTL II, are more than sufficient to support disclosure requirements on informational grounds alone. An electorate bombarded with messages about candidates in the run-up to an election has an obvious interest in knowing what moneyed interests lie behind them so that it can evaluate in a more informed manner whether, and to what extent, the messages should influence voting. See Buckley, 424 U.S. at 66 (relying on the interest of the voting public in knowing "where political campaign money comes from"). Indeed, that is undoubtedly why eight Justices of this Court saw little difficulty in upholding the disclosure provision (and even less difficulty in sustaining the so-called "disclaimer" provision) in McConnell.

In this specific case, the interest in disclosure is evident. The advertisements in question were to be run during the primary season in states where Senator Clinton was on the presidential primary ballot. Each advertisement either contained direct negative statements about Senator Clinton's political views or insinuated that there was negative information that members of the public could learn more about if they viewed Hillary: The Movie, which, as the district court found, is itself a thoroughgoing critique with the theme that Senator Clinton was unfit for the office for which she was running. Moreover, the ads themselves discuss no "issues" other than the "issue" of Senator Clinton herself, a subject pertinent first and foremost to the imminent elections.

Under such circumstances, viewers of the ads would have an obvious and legitimate interest in knowing who was—and was not—behind them. It would be important, for example, to know that the ads were not the work of the campaigns of either her Democratic rivals in the primaries or her potential Republican opponents in the general election (hence the disclaimer). Beyond that, there would be an obvious interest in finding out both who paid for the ads (Citizens United) and who supplied the money behind that innocuous-sounding name, so that members of the public could help place Citizens United "in the political spectrum" (Buckley, 424 U.S. at 67) and identify the interests it represents—all with the goal of providing themselves more information to assist in evaluating the credibility of its critique of the Senator and determining whether to seek more information from this source. Nothing in this Court's jurisprudence suggests that such interests are insufficient to justify disclosure here.[8]

[8] The Court's recent decision in Davis v. FEC, 128 S. Ct. 2759 (2007), notwithstanding Citizens United's repeated citations, does not suggest that the interests that support disclosure here are insufficient. In Davis, the only interest served by the disclosure provisions the Court struck down was to make possible implementation of the substantive provisions of the "Millionaire's Amendment," which, the Court held, were themselves unconstitutional. See id. at 2775. That implementation of unconstitutional restrictions is not a suffi-

Indeed, the Court has long recognized the legitimacy of disclosure requirements much further removed from express candidate advocacy than the ones at issue here. For instance, in Bellotti,—the very decision that sustained the right of corporations to engage in issue advocacy and that lies at the core of WRTL II's holding that corporate funding of speech that is not the functional equivalent of express candidate advocacy cannot be prohibited—the Court recognized that where corporate issue advertising is concerned, "[i]dentification of the source of advertising may be required as a means of disclosure, so that the people will be able to evaluate the arguments to which they are being subjected," and that the government may rely on "the prophylactic effect of requiring that the source of communication be disclosed." Bellotti, 435 U.S. at 792 n.32 (citing Buckley, 424 U.S. at 66-67). Similarly, in Citizens Against Rent Control v. City of Berkeley, 454 U.S. 290 (1981) (CARC), while holding that limits on contributions to a committee formed for ballot measure issue advocacy were unconstitutional, the Court stressed that, even absent those limits, the government could protect the interest in informing voters of the committee's sources of funding by enforcing disclosure provisions. Id. at 298-99.

Citizens United characterizes these statements in Bellotti and CARC as "dicta," Citizens United Br. 55-56, but they were nonetheless important to the Court's explanations of its holdings. Moreover, in McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U.S. 334 (1995), where the Court cient justification for anything should go without saying, but that does not advance Citizens United's claim that the different interests served by the provisions at issue here are insufficient to meet constitutional demands.

upheld the right of an individual to distribute self-published, anonymous pamphlets on ballot measure issues, the Court was careful to reconcile its holding with the "dicta" from Bellotti and took pains not to call into doubt regulations requiring disclosure of corporate campaign expenditures and contributions, whether issue or candidate-related. See id. at 353-56. Moreover, "dicta" or not, these statements by the Court are far more persuasive than the authority Citizens United musters for the proposition that disclosure of expenditures and sources of funding for issue advocacy may not be required—that is to say, no authority at all.

Indeed, the notion that disclosure requirements applicable to political speech must be limited to express candidate advocacy or its equivalent is directly at odds with the holding in United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612 (1954). There, the Court upheld disclosure requirements as to nonelectoral issue advocacy—that is, lobbying—based on the informational interest in disclosing to the public and to members of Congress "who is being hired, who is putting up the money, and how much," information that it found essential to "maintain[ing] the integrity of a basic governmental process." Id. at 625.

In each of these cases, the Court asserted the validity of disclosure requirements as to the amount and source of expenditures notwithstanding that (1) the expenditures themselves could not be prohibited, and (2) the expenditures involved issue rather than candidate advocacy. The decisions thus demonstrate the fallacy of Citizens United's two related submissions that disclosure requirements cannot be imposed upon its communications unless they are the type of communications as to which corporate funding may be prohibited and/or they are express candidate advocacy or its equivalent.

Whatever the limits may be to the imposition of disclosure requirements when citizens pool their money to address matters of public interest, the provisions of BCRA at issue here do not approach them. When a corporation such as Citizens United collects and expends funds to broadcast messages about a candidate on the eve of an election, this Court's precedents indicate that the public interest in knowing whose money is behind those messages is more than sufficient to justify reporting and disclosure requirements.

B. Citizens United's "Burdensomeness" Arguments Are Unfounded.

Citizens United's assertion that the disclosure and disclaimer requirements are unduly burdensome is unpersuasive and unsupported by this Court's precedents. As to disclosure, Citizens United's argument is refuted by the very authority on which it relies—MCFL (see Citizens United Br. 54). MCFL, to begin with, expressly stated that even though an ideological nonprofit corporation that accepts no contributions from business corporations cannot be restrained from expending its own funds for express candidate advocacy or forced to bear the burden of establishing a "separate segregated fund" subject to the detailed reporting and disclosure requirements applicable to a "political committee," it must nonetheless report its political expenditures and contributors. Compare 479 U.S. at 253-54 (discussing burdens of political committee requirements) with id. at 262. Specifically, the Court in MCFL stated that, under FECA's provision for disclosure of independent expenditures (2 U.S.C. § 434(c)),

> MCFL will be required to identify all contributors who annually provide in the aggregate $200 in funds intended to influence elections, will have to > specify all recipients of independent spending amounting to more than $200, and will be bound to identify all persons making contributions over $200 who request that the money be used for independent expenditures. These reporting obligations provide precisely the information necessary to monitor MCFL's independent spending activity and its receipt of contributions. The state interest in disclosure therefore can be met in a manner less restrictive than imposing the full panoply of regulations that accompany status as a political committee under the Act.

479 U.S. at 262.

MCFL's discussion on this point has twofold significance. First, it provides yet another refutation of Citizens United's position that disclosure obligations cannot be imposed on it if its funding of the speech itself is constitutionally protected, for the MCFL Court acknowledged the existence of sufficient justifications for disclosure even in circumstances where it could not find constitutional justification for prohibiting the use of the corporation's funds for the expenditures at issue. Second, it is fatal to Citizens United's undue burden argument. While finding the requirements of political committee status generically too burdensome for MCFL corporations, the Court obviously thought that compliance with FECA's standards for disclosure of independent expenditures created no similarly excessive burden. Moreover, as the majority in McConnell observed, BCRA's disclosure requirements for electioneering communications are "actually somewhat less intrusive than the comparable requirements that have long applied to persons making independent expenditures [under 2 U.S.C. § 434(c)]." McConnell, 540 U.S. at 196 n.81 (emphasis added). If, as MCFL recognized, the requirements of § 434(c) are not too burdensome for a true MCFL corporation, it follows that the less onerous reporting requirements of BCRA are not excessive for a corporation that does not even qualify under MCFL.

As for Citizens United's contention that the four-second disclaimer requirements applicable to its ads under BCRA are excessively burdensome, it, too, is untenable. Four seconds is obviously a minimal requirement for conveying any information, and Citizens United cites no authority for the proposition that its own decision to use ads so abbreviated that the disclaimer cannot fit comfortably with everything else it wants to cram into the short timeframe it has selected renders the disclaimer requirement unduly burdensome. The significant public interest in knowing who is and is not behind such election-eve, candidate-related messages is more than sufficient to justify the minimal burden of a four-second disclaimer and to outweigh Citizens United's interest (if any) in making its messages so short that it has no time for a disclaimer.

CONCLUSION

This Court should affirm the decision of the three-judge district court.

The Honorable Hollis French
Alaska State Legislature
State Capitol, Room 417

Re: Responses to March 8, 2010 Memorandum

Dear Senator French:

Thank you for the opportunity to provide answers to the questions posed in your memorandum of March 8, 2010, in anticipation of my confirmation hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Are you satisfied with turnover rates in the criminal division? What actions do you plan to take in reaction to that challenge?

The biggest challenge the criminal division faces is in human resources. Prosecutors receive modest pay, and their work takes an emotional toll. As a result, most attorneys who join the criminal division do not become career prosecutors. This means that for the most complex cases, we have fewer experienced attorneys to call upon, and those experienced attorneys have less time to assist and mentor newer attorneys.

Reducing turnover is therefore a priority, and the Department of Law has made special efforts to reduce the number of prosecutors who leave public service for higher paying jobs. We have allowed each district attorney's office the discretion to develop a flex-time work schedule. We have created the Rural Prosecution Unit to take the strain off single-prosecutor offices by providing additional manpower and experience. We provide opportunities for professional training, with both an annual training for all attorneys and, for the past three years, a trial advocacy course for 20 attorneys. With these efforts, we hope to reduce turnover rates and retain our experienced, capable prosecutors.

What is the current salary disparity between a state attorney and a private one? Compare attorneys at 3, 5, and 10 years of practice.

We do not currently have an accurate comparison of Department of Law salaries with private-sector salaries. Comparing the two is difficult, because law firm salaries vary widely and because compensation comes in different forms in the private sector: salary, bonus, use of car, payment of professional dues and fees for trainings and conferences.

However, we can compare Department of Law attorney salaries to the attorney salaries of other public sector employers. The Department of Administration, in a recent salary survey, compared Department of Law salaries to the 65th percentile of legal salaries for public sector employers. The 65th percentile was chosen as a target to determine where the department stands vis-à-vis other top-tier public sector employers. The survey found that salaries for attorney IIs, who have 1-3 years of experience, are 5.4% above the target, while salaries for attorney IVs, who have more than 6 years of experience, are 11% below the target. This suggests that while our less experienced attorneys receive salaries comparable to their peers at other public interest employers, their salaries become less competitive as they grow more experienced. Additionally, when compared with the top level of public sector employers, Department of Law salaries are significantly less competitive. Attorney II salaries are 13% below the maximum range of public sector attorney salaries, while attorney IV salaries are 43% below that range.

Alaska suffers from some of the highest sex assault and sex abuse rates in the nation. Are prosecutions of this crime increasing? Are trials on these charges increasing? Please provide some statistics on this subject. What actions do you plan to take in this area?

As you know, fighting the problems of domestic violence and sexual assault is a priority of the Department of Law. We have participated extensively in developing the Governor's ten-year strategy to combat sexual assault and domestic violence, a comprehensive approach to addressing problems with deep roots and many facets.

Prosecuting offenders who commit these crimes is an important element of this approach. The number of prosecutions has roughly tracked the number of reported offenses. In general, there has been an annual 10% increase in crime in Alaska. Sexual assaults and sexual abuse followed this increase. In 2006 and 2007 there was a spike in these cases. We saw a decrease in 2008 and although in 2009 there was an increase, we are not quite up to 2007 levels.

Prosecutions have generally followed these fluctuations. In 2007, we were referred 620 felony sex crimes and accepted 296 (47%) for prosecution, obtaining 196 convictions. In 2008, we were referred 513 felony sex crimes, and accepted 231 (45%) for prosecution, obtaining 135 convictions. In 2009, we were referred 569 felony sex crimes and accepted 240 (42%) for prosecution, obtaining 40 convictions (many cases accepted for prosecution in 2009 have not yet reached their resolution).

In order to ensure that those who commit sex crimes receive the strong punishment they deserve and are forced to register as sex offenders, we have implemented a policy that prosecutors shall not accept a plea bargain with a person accused of a sex crime unless the accused pleads to a crime that requires him to register as a sex offender. Additionally, my top two criminal attorneys will be training prosecutors at every office in the state in tough negotiating tactics. With regard to increasing the percentage of sex crimes referred to us that are ultimately accepted for prosecution, I believe that the Governor's plan to dramatically increase VPSOs in rural communities and to hire more state troopers focused solely on sex crimes will result in stronger cases against offenders.

In short, I believe that the combination of continued training in the prosecution of sex crimes and increased law enforcement and evidence-collection capabilities promised by the Governor's initiative will enable the Department of Law to put more sex offenders behind bars.

I hope this letter adequately answers your questions. Please do not hesitate to contact me with any further questions.

Sincerely,

Daniel S. Sullivan
Attorney General

Kaltag questions:

The Kaltag case involves an adoption of a tribal child by her relatives who were not tribal members in Kaltag (they live in Huslia). Kid's mom with serious substance abuse issues and in jail for murder; was dad out of state and uninterested. No parties involved objected to the proceedings. The state refused to recognize the results because *it * did not refer the case to the tribal court. The AG in HJUD also made the argument that it was a problem because it involved "nontribal" members though the child went to relatives and is safe and happy.

1. Can you tell us what position the 9th Circuit Court has taken in regard to tribal court jurisdiction in the past? Hasn't the state litigated this point before and lost (in Venetie, 20 years ago)? Hasn't the state taken the opposite position in the past and in front of the state's supreme court as recently as 2004?

2. Why are we relitigating this issue with this particular case? Did any of the parties involved in this adoption object to the tribal court's actions or their jurisdiction in this case? Is there a workload change at Health and Social Services we are unaware of that they have time to prioritize adoption cases like this one (OCS often does not respond even to complaints involving violence against children, especially in rural Alaska)? Given the state's extreme workloads in children's cases, why is it NOT in the state's best interest to work cooperatively with tribal governments?

3. How much money have we spent so far on litigation of this case? Estimate of attorneys fees or hourly rates? How much does the state pay for active social work case managers for this region of Alaska? How much time and effort did the State spent trying to mediate a solution before jumping into litigation?

Dear Mr. Sullivan:

As an Alaskan I think I'm entitled to information about what, if anything, the so-called "rural subcabinet" has done since it was created.

I had contacted you earlier and encouraged you to look into reported problems from rural residents who couldn't afford to purchase fuel for their boats for subsistence fishing purposes. I encouraged you to add this issue to the rural subcabinet's agenda.

(Now I think my request may have been laughable-- I doubt the rural subcabinet regularly meets)

I never received a response from you about my concern.

I also contacted John Moller, the executive branch rural affairs advisor, and asked him to answer the following questions:

1. What (if any) business has the "rural subcabinet" conducted?

2. On what dates has it met?

3. Who are its members?

4. Are there comprehensive minutes from any and all meetings that would be available to Alaska's public?

5. Has the rural subcabinet executed any action items (with tangible results) since it was created?

Mr. Moller advised me to research through published Alaska regulations for answers to my questions. I did and learned which state officials reside on the subcabinet. However I could not find answers to 1, 2, 4, or 5 within the State's records. Personally I speculate Mr. Moller may know good and well the answers to my remaining questions.

I indicated to Mr. Moller that he hadn't answered most of my questions.

I had also contacted Mr. Moller and asked if rural Alaska had received sufficient fuel for next winter. He never responded to that question.

Could you please respond to my original inquiry? Also, could you please answer questions 1, 2, 4, and 5 above? As an added bonus, any information you may have about the fuel situation for the upcoming winter would be appreciated.

I'll copy this message to the Governor, to Mr. Moller, to Alaska's Ombudsman, and to Senator Hollis French, Chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Thanks,

Sincerely,

Jim Behlke

Kaltag v. State of Alaska

Attorney: Natalie Landreth

Case Update

This is an action to enforce the full faith and credit clause of the Indian Child Welfare Act. The Kaltag Tribe had completed an adoption in tribal court and had applied for a new birth certificate, but the State refused to issue one on the grounds that the Tribe had not petitioned for reassumption of jurisdiction under ICWA. This argument assumes that a Tribe does not have inherent jurisdiction to adjudicate adoptions of its own tribal members. The Tribe and the parents (two individual Kaltag tribal members) brought suit against the State of Alaska Department of Health and Social Services and the Alaska Bureau of Vital Statistics for denying full faith and credit to a tribal adoption decree in violation of section 1911(d) of the Indian Child Welfare Act. The parents also have raised a section 1983 claim.

Cross motions for summary judgment were filed in May 2007 and the court ruled in favor of the Tribe on all claims, holding that their decision was entitled to full faith and credit under the ICWA. The State moved to stay the judgment and has also appealed to the Ninth Circuit. The Ninth Circuit denied the stay and affirmed the decision on appeal. The State further moved for rehearing en banc, which was also recently denied.

What a waste of time and money...you know no one was even disputing tribal jurisdiction in this case - except the state.

Biography of Alaska Attorney General
Daniel S. Sullivan

Federal Government Service

Prior to becoming Attorney General, Sullivan served as the U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Economic, Energy, and Business Affairs. His nomination by the President for this position was unanimously confirmed by the United States Senate in May 2006 and he served until January 2009. In this role, he was a senior advisor to the Secretary of State and other top U.S. government officials on the formulation and execution of international economic, energy, trade, finance, transportation, telecommunications and Arctic policies. Sullivan also led and managed the 200-employee State Department Bureau of Economic, Energy, and Business Affairs.

As the Assistant Secretary of State, much of Sullivan's work focused on international energy issues. He served as the U.S. Governing Board member of the Paris-based International Energy Agency – the world's premier energy security organization. He and the State Department bureau he led worked closely with the Office of the Federal Coordinator for Alaska Natural Gas Transportation Projects on Alaska gas pipeline issues. Sullivan also was responsible for overseeing and leading several complex international negotiations of strategic importance to the United States, including serving as the primary negotiator for the President at the Group of Eight (G8) Summits.

Prior to serving as the Assistant Secretary of State, Sullivan was a Director in the International Economics Directorate of the National Security Council and National Economic Council staffs at the White House

Alaska Law Background

Sullivan is one of a select number of Alaska attorneys who has held judicial clerkships on both the highest state and highest federal courts in Alaska. He was a judicial law clerk for Judge Andrew Kleinfeld of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in Fairbanks from 1997-98, and was a judicial law clerk for Chief Justice Warren Matthews of the Alaska Supreme Court in Anchorage from 1998-99. Following his clerkships, Sullivan joined the Anchorage office of Perkins, Coie, LLP. His practice focused on corporate transactions and commercial litigation, and he represented a variety of clients, including Alaska small businesses and Native corporations.

U.S. Military Service

Sullivan has served in the United States Marine Corps since 1993 on active duty and in the reserves as an infantry and reconnaissance officer, including with Second Battalion, Fifth Marines at Camp Pendleton, California, and for several years with Anchorage-based Echo Company, Fourth Reconnaissance Battalion – the Marine Corps Reserve's premier cold weather reconnaissance unit. In recent years, Sullivan has been recalled to active duty twice: in January 2009 to help draft a regional strategy report for the Commander of U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) General David Petraeus, and from December 2004 until April 2006 to serve as a strategic advisor to CENTCOM Commander General John Abizaid. During this period, Sullivan spent substantial time deployed in the CENTCOM theater of operations.

Academic Background

Sullivan graduated magna cum laude from Harvard University, earning a bachelors degree in Economics, where he was a Harvard College scholar during each of his four years. Sullivan graduated cum laude from Georgetown University Law Center, earning a Juris Doctor and Masters of Science in Foreign Service joint degree. He was an articles editor on the Georgetown Law Journal and a contributing author to the Georgetown Criminal Procedure Project. During his final year at Georgetown, Sullivan worked as a law clerk for Judge James L. Buckley on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Awards, Honors, and Personal Information

Sullivan is the recipient of numerous professional, academic, and military awards, including the White House Fellowship, the National Security Council Outstanding Service Award, and the Defense Meritorious Service Medal. He is a member of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Sullivan was born in Fairview Park, Ohio. He has been married for 15 years to Julie Fate Sullivan of Fairbanks. They moved to Alaska in 1997, after Sullivan completed active duty service with the Marine Corps. They have three daughters, two of whom were born in Anchorage.

Background Information on Alaska Attorney General Daniel S. Sullivan

Academic Background

Sullivan graduated magna cum laude from Harvard University in 1987, earning a bachelor's degree in economics. He was a Harvard College scholar, a designation awarded to students with a 3.5 GPA or higher, during each of his four years at Harvard, and was awarded a Rotary Foundation Scholarship upon graduation.

Sullivan graduated cum laude from Georgetown University Law Center, earning a Juris Doctor and Masters of Science in Foreign Service (MSFS) joint degree in 1993. He was a member and articles editor on the Georgetown Law Journal, awarded to first-year students in the top 4 percent of their class, and a contributing author to the Georgetown Criminal Procedure Project – one of the country's most respected annual surveys of criminal procedure. He received the MSFS Award for Academic Excellence, awarded to students with a 3.8 GPA or higher. He was also awarded the Ford Foundation Fellowship for the Study of Public International Law.

During his final year at Georgetown, Sullivan worked as law clerk/intern for Judge James L. Buckley on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Colombia Circuit – generally recognized as the second most important court in the United States.

Alaska Law Background

Sullivan is one of a select number of Alaska attorneys who has held judicial clerkships on both the highest state and highest federal courts in Alaska. He was a judicial law clerk for Judge Andrew Kleinfeld of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in Fairbanks from 1997-98, and was a judicial law clerk for Chief Justice Warren Matthews of the Alaska Supreme Court in Anchorage from 1998-99. As a Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and Alaska Supreme court law clerk, Sullivan analyzed appellate cases, conducted extensive legal research, wrote bench memoranda for Chief Justice Matthews, Judge Kleinfeld and the other justices and judges on the bench, and helped draft published opinions on some of the most important state and federal legal issues facing Alaska. These judicial clerkships have provided Sullivan with insights into and a deep respect for the Alaska legal system, its judges and public officials. He also served briefly as an appellate court staff attorney on the Alaska Court of Appeals, which focuses on criminal cases.

In 2000, Sullivan joined the Anchorage office of Perkins, Coie, LLP, one of the largest law firms in the Pacific Northwest. His practice focused on corporate transactions and commercial litigation, and he represented a variety of clients, including Alaska small businesses and Native corporations. He has been a member of the Alaska Bar Association since 2000.

Alaska Community Service

As an attorney in Alaska, Sullivan was appointed by the mayor of Anchorage to serve as vice chairman of the Anchorage Public Facilities Commission, which was responsible for holding public hearings and advising city officials on the financial, operational and long-term planning of Anchorage's major public facilities, including convention centers and sports arenas. He also served on the Anchorage Veterans Affairs Commission, which was responsible for holding public hearings and advising city government officials on policies affecting Anchorage's substantial population of veterans.

Sullivan has been a member of the School Advisory Committee of Saint Elizabeth Ann Seaton School, where his children attended grade school. He also was active for several years with Alaska's Toys for Tots Foundation, a community program involving active duty and reserve Marines and dozens of other volunteers who collect and distribute thousands of toys throughout the state for low-income families during the holiday season. He served as a member of Advocates for Harvard ROTC and in 2001 published an article in the "My Turn" column of Newsweek criticizing elite universities for their discriminatory treatment of the U.S. military. His article helped reignite a national public debate on the issue.

Service at the White House

In response to the September 11th terrorist attacks on the United States, Sullivan applied for and was awarded a White House Fellowship – one of only three Alaskans to have been selected for this honor. In July 2002, he left private law practice in Anchorage and moved to Washington, D.C., to serve as a director in the International Economics Directorate of the National Security Council (NSC) and National Economic Council (NEC) staffs at the White House. In this capacity, he advised the president, the national security advisor and the NEC chairman on international economic and security issues, also assisting them with preparations for international economic meetings, such as the Group of Eight (G8) Summit, the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation Summit, the U.S.-EU Summit and the Summit of the Americas.

Sullivan also led coordination among U.S. government agencies on the formulation and execution of international economic policies, particularly those focused on trade. He worked and traveled extensively with U.S. Trade Representative Robert Zoellick, a Bush administration cabinet member, as part of his multilateral and bilateral negotiating team. Sullivan's work at the White House ended in December 2004, when he was recalled to active duty by the United States Marine Corps.

Service as U.S. Assistant Secretary of State

In April 2006, while still on active duty with the Marines, Sullivan was nominated by the president to serve as the assistant secretary of state for economic, energy and business affairs. He was unanimously confirmed by the United States Senate for this position in May 2006 and served until January 2009. In this role, he served as a senior advisor to the secretary and other top U.S. government officials on the formulation and execution of international economic, energy, trade, finance, transportation, telecommunications and Arctic policies.

He led and managed the 200-employee State Department Bureau of Economic, Energy, and Business Affairs. He was responsible for managing six different sub-bureaus covering the following policy areas: (1) energy security, sanctions and efforts against terrorist financing; (2) international trade, investment and intellectual property rights; (3) international finance, debt relief and development; (4) international telecommunications; (5) international transportation; and (6) advocacy for U.S. businesses and the private sector abroad.

Much of Sullivan's work focused on international energy issues. He served as the U.S. Governing Board member for the Paris-based International Energy Agency (IEA) – the world's premier energy security organization. He and the State Department bureau he led worked closely with the Office of the Federal Coordinator for Alaska Natural Gas Transportation Projects in advancing the Alaska gas pipeline. His bureau also had regulatory responsibility for cross-border permitting of petroleum pipelines in North America.

Sullivan developed, negotiated and helped to implement numerous international energy initiatives, including: a $10 billion annual G8 commitment to invest in clean energy R&D; a G8 commitment to reduce and eliminate global tariffs on clean energy technology goods and services; the U.S.-Brazil Western Hemisphere bio-fuels partnership; International Energy Agency (IEA) initiatives to deepen China and India's cooperation with the IEA; and a comprehensive U.S. Eurasian/Caspian energy security strategy that included the establishment of a special presidential envoy. He strengthened U.S.-Canadian energy ties as the co-chair of the U.S.-Canadian Energy Consultative Group.

Sullivan led, oversaw, and was responsible for several complex international negotiations of strategic importance to the United States. He served as the primary negotiator for the president at the G8 summits, as well for the Western Hemisphere "Pathways to Prosperity" economic integration initiative. Additionally, he was responsible for overseeing the following: aviation liberalization agreements, including those with the European Union, China, Japan and Australia; Bilateral Investment Treaty negotiations, including those with China and India; global telecommunications and internet governance agreements; "Paris Club" sovereign debt-relief negotiations and agreements, including those that resulted in significant debt reduction for Iraq, Afghanistan and Liberia; and economic and energy agreements at the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, and the International Energy Agency.

Leadership on Issues Affecting Alaska

In addition to focusing on global energy issues, Sullivan played an important role on a number of other issues directly affecting Alaska, including an updated National Security Policy Directive (NSPD) on U.S. Arctic strategy. He helped ensure that the new NSPD strategy focused on all of the core issues relating to the Arctic, including: developing the region's vast resources; protecting the environment; promoting safe, secure and reliable transportation; and respecting the culture and way of life of indigenous peoples. He worked closely with the White House, the chairman of the Arctic Research Commission, and Alaska's congressional delegation (particularly Senator Murkowski's office) to ensure enactment of this important strategy at the end of 2008.

Sullivan was also a strong advocate in government meetings, congressional testimony and public speeches on the importance of U.S. accession to the Law of the Sea Convention. His leadership on working to open markets overseas, including those for aviation services, stands to significantly benefit Alaska exporters and aviation service providers.

U.S. Military Service

Sullivan has served in the United States Marine Corps since 1993 on active duty and in the reserves as an infantry and reconnaissance officer, including with Second Battalion, Fifth Marines at Camp Pendleton, California, and for several years with Anchorage-based Echo Company, Fourth Reconnaissance Battalion – the Marine Corps Reserve's premier cold weather reconnaissance unit. He has held a wide variety of billets, including 81mm mortar platoon commander, weapons company executive officer, and commander of a search-and-rescue unit deployed as part of a three-ship special operations Marine Expeditionary Unit. He also served as an overseas faculty member with Central Texas College, teaching college courses on U.S. foreign policy and criminal justice to Marines on deployment and at Camp Pendleton.

In the past four years, Sullivan has been recalled to active duty twice: in January 2009 to help draft a regional strategy report for Commander of U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) General David Petraeus; and from December 2004 until April 2006 to serve as a strategic advisor to CENTCOM Commander General John Abizaid. During this period, Sullivan spent substantial time deployed in the CENTCOM theater of operations and was responsible for drafting the 2006 CENTCOM "Posture Statement" with General Abizaid, which provides strategic guidance for subordinate commanders as they conduct military operations in the CENTCOM area of operations.

Sullivan has completed training at the following U.S. military schools and courses: USMC Officer Candidate School; USMC Basic Officer School; USMC Infantry Officer Course; USMC Amphibious Reconnaissance School; USMC Mountain Reconnaissance Course; U.S. Army Airborne School; Navy-Marine Corps Survival, Evasion, Resistance and Escape (SERE) School; USMC Marine Air Ground Task Force Intelligence School; and USMC Expeditionary Warfare Staff Planning Course.

Awards and Honors

Sullivan is the recipient of numerous professional, academic, and military awards, including the White House Fellowship, the National Security Council Outstanding Service Award, the Defense Meritorious Service Medal, and the U.S. Junior Chamber of Commerce Ten Outstanding Young Americans Award.

Personal Information

Sullivan, 44, was born in Fairview Park, Ohio. He has been married for almost 15 years to Julie Fate Sullivan of Fairbanks, who is a Doyon shareholder. They have three daughters, two of whom were born in Anchorage. After Sullivan left active duty service with the Marine Corps in 1997, they moved to Alaska and have owned a home in Anchorage since 2000.

TERRY L. THURBON

PROFESSIONAL EXPERIENCE

Chief Administrative Law Judge, Alaska Office of Administrative Hearings (Nov. 2004-)

As chief administrative law judge, I am responsible for operating the State's central panel of administrative law judges who hear cases in more than 40 categories. This includes developing policies and procedures; supervising the office; employing judges and staff; establishing case management and performance standards; managing the budget; providing peer review and training for the judges; conducting alternative dispute resolution, hearing cases and writing decisions; considering complaints alleging violation of the Code of Hearing Officer Conduct; and reporting to the Governor and Legislature on the activities of the office. The chief's duties also include monitoring State agencies' administrative hearing processes and reviewing their hearing-related regulations; providing training to executive branch adjudicators; and recommending changes in the law to improve administrative adjudications. As the first chief judge, I have been responsible for developing procedural regulations for the office's cases and Code of Hearing Officer Conduct regulations applicable to all State hearing officers, and for many tasks required to start up a new state agency.

Assistant Attorney General, State of Alaska, Department of Law (Oct. 2003-Oct. 2004)

As an Assistant Attorney General in the Environmental Section, I worked on legislation and regulations for the Department of Environmental Conservation and advised the Commissioner on administrative appeals of permit decisions. This included drafting legislation and assisting with reports to the Legislature and responses to legislators' questions, testifying before committees of the Legislature; drafting regulations and assisting with the public comment process; and researching legal issues for and drafting proposed decisions on administrative appeals before the Commissioner. Other duties included representing the State in matters such as the clean up of contaminated sites and related cost recovery, cruise ship regulatory compliance, and Village Safe Water project contracting. I also represented the State in federal litigation regarding the State's interest in Tongass timber supply.

Legal & Regulatory Consultant, Thurbon Regulatory-Legal Services (Apr.-Oct. 2003)

Emphasizing work on environmental permitting and compliance, I provided legal support to environmental consulting firms, law firms, and government agencies on matters ranging from drafting legislation and regulations to advising natural resources industry clients (particularly mining sector clients) on permitting requirements and administrative procedures under Alaska and federal law.

Associate Attorney/Director, Robertson, Monagle & Eastaugh (May 1991-Apr. 2003)

I practiced natural resources and environmental law, working primarily on environmental permitting, land use and related litigation for resources industry clients, as well as on environmental compliance matters and associated business matters such as preparation and enforcement of contracts. This work included representing clients before administrative agencies and before state and federal courts; preparing briefs and memoranda; drafting and negotiating agreements, including permits, leases and other forms of land use authorizations; reviewing technical and legal documents; drafting, commenting upon and tracking proposed legislation and regulations; and overseeing the work efforts of associate attorneys, paralegals and law clerks.

Lecturer in Law/Legal Research & Writing Director, McGeorge School of Law (1987-91)

I taught classes in legal method, legal research and writing, appellate advocacy, and international law. I designed legal problems to test students' analytical and research skills, critiqued drafts of office memoranda, trial briefs and client letters, and conferred with students about their work products. As Legal Research & Writing Director, I assisted in hiring new instructors, trained and monitored all instructors, and generally administered the program in which each year more than four hundred first-year law students were introduced to such fundamental skills as legal analysis, research, drafting, and fact gathering. I also served as faculty advisor to the International Law Moot Court Board and coached the Jessup International Law Moot Court Competition Team.

Law Clerk/Graduate Legal Assistant, Institute for Administrative Justice (1986-87)

I assisted with training programs for state and federal administrative hearing officers, and researched and drafted analyses for projects under contract to the Institute, including comprehensive legal analyses of state administrative programs. I served as interim project coordinator for the Victims of Crime Resource Center, overseeing operation of the legislatively mandated state-wide telephone information and referral service for crime victims and supervising the students who counseled victims.

Instructions for Recipient

Form 1099-DIV (OMB No. 1545-0110)

Account number. May show an account or other unique number the payer assigned to distinguish your account.

Box 1a. Shows total ordinary (short term) dividends that are taxable. Include this amount on Line 9a of Form 1040 or 1040A. Also, report it on Schedule B (Form 1040) or Schedule 1 (Form 1040A) if required. The amount shown may be a distribution from an employee stock ownership plan (ESOP). Report it as a dividend on your Form 1040/1040A but treat it as a plan distribution, not as investment income, for any other purpose.

Box 1b. Shows the portion of the amount in box 1a that may be eligible for the 15% or 5% capital gains rates. See the Form 1040/1040A instructions for how to determine this amount. Report the eligible amount on line 9b, Form 1040 or 1040A.

Box 2a. Shows total capital gain distributions (long-term) from a regulated investment company or real estate investment trust. Report the amounts shown in box 2a on Schedule D (Form 1040), line 13. But, if no amount is shown in boxes 2c-2d and you only capital gains and losses are capital gain distributions, you may be able to report the amounts shown in box 2a on line 13 of Form 1040 (line 10 of Form 1040A) rather than Schedule D. See the Form 1040/1040A instructions.

Box 2b. Shows the portion of the amount in box 2a that is unrecaptured section 1250 gain from certain depreciable real property. Report this amount on the Unrecaptured Section 1250 Gain Worksheet-Line 19 in the Schedule D instructions (Form 1040).

Box 2c. Shows the portion of the amount in box 2a that is section 1202 gain from certain small business stock that may be subject to a 50% exclusion. See the Schedule D (Form 1040) instructions.

Box 2d. Shows 28% rate gain from sales or exchanges of collectibles. If ...ired, use this amount when completing the 28% Rate Gain ...sheet-Line 18 in the instructions for Schedule D (Form 1040).

...3. Shows the part of the distribution that is nontaxable because it is a return of your cost (or other basis). You must reduce your cost (or other basis) by this amount for figuring gain or loss when you sell your stock. But if you get back all your cost (or other basis), report future distributions as capital gains. See Pub. 550, Investment Income and Expenses.

Box 4. Shows backup withholding. For example, a payer must backup withhold on certain payments at a 28% rate if you did not give your taxpayer identification number to the payer. See Form W-9, Request for Taxpayer Identification Number and Certification, for information on backup withholding. Include this amount on your income tax return as tax withheld.

Box 5. Shows your share of expenses of a nonpublicly offered regulated investment company, generally a nonpublicly offered mutual fund. If you file Form 1040, you may deduct these expenses on the "Other expenses" line on Schedule A (Form 1040) subject to the 2% limit. This amount is included in box 1a.

Box 6. Shows the foreign tax you may be able to claim as a deduction or a credit on Form 1040. See the Form 1040 instructions.

Boxes 8 and 9. Shows cash and noncash liquidation distributions.

Nominees. If this form includes amounts belonging to another person, you are considered a nominee recipient. You must file Form 1099-DIV with the IRS for each of the other owners to show their share of the income, and you must furnish a Form 1099-DIV to each. A husband or wife is not required to file a nominee return to show amounts owned by the other. See the 2007 General Instructions for Forms 1099, 1098, 5498, and W-2G.

Form 1099-INT (OMB No. 1545-0112)

Account number. May show an account or other unique number the payer assigned to distinguish your account.

Box 1. Shows taxable interest paid to you during the calendar year by the payer. This does not include interest shown in box 3. May also show the ...t amount of the credits from clean renewable energy bonds and Gulf tax ...d bonds that must be included in your interest income. These amounts ...e treated as paid to you during 2007 on the credit allowance dates (March 15, June 15, September 15, and December 15). For more information, see Form 8912, Credit for Clean Renewable Energy and Gulf Tax Credit Bonds.

Box 2. Shows interest or principal forfeited because of early withdrawal of time savings. You may deduct this amount to figure your adjusted gross income on your income tax return. See the instructions for Form 1040 to see where to take the deduction.

Box 3. Shows interest on U.S. Savings Bonds, Treasury bills, Treasury bonds, and Treasury notes. This may or may not be all taxable. See Pub. 550, Investment Income and Expenses. This interest is exempt from state and local income taxes. This interest is not included in box 1.

Box 4. Shows backup withholding. Generally, a payer must backup withhold at a 28% rate if you did not furnish your taxpayer identification number (TIN) or you did not furnish the correct TIN to the payer. See Form W-9, Request for Taxpayer Identification Number and Certification, for information on backup withholding. Include this amount on your income tax return as tax withheld.

Box 5. Any amount shown is your share of investment expenses of a single-class REMIC. If you file Form 1040, you may deduct these expenses on the "Other expenses" line of Schedule A (Form 1040) subject to the 2% limit. This amount is included in box 1.

...deduction or a credit on your Form 1040. See your Form 1040 instructions.

Box 8. Shows tax-exempt interest, including exempt-interest dividends from a mutual fund or other regulated investment company, paid to you during the calendar year by the payer. Report this amount on line 8b of Form 1040 or Form 1040A. This amount may be subject to backup withholding. See box 4.

Box 9. Shows tax-exempt interest subject to the alternative minimum tax. This amount is included in box 8. See the instructions for Form 6251, Alternative Minimum Tax-Individuals.

Nominees. If this form includes amounts belonging to another person(s), you are considered a nominee recipient. Complete a Form 1099-INT for each of the other owners showing the income allocable to each. File Copy A of the form with the IRS. Furnish Copy B to each owner. List yourself as the "payer" and the other owner(s) as the "recipient." File Form(s) 1099-INT with Form 1096, Annual Summary and Transmittal of U.S. Information Returns, with the Internal Revenue Service Center for your area. On Form 1096 list yourself as the "filer." A husband or wife is not required to file a nominee return to show amounts owned by the other.

Form 1099-OID (OMB No. 1545-0117)

Original issue discount (OID) is the excess of an obligation's stated redemption price at maturity over its issue price (acquisition price for a stripped bond or coupon). OID is taxable as interest over the life of the obligation. If you are the holder of an OID obligation, generally you must include an amount of OID in your gross income each year you hold the obligation. Obligations that may have OID include a bond, debenture, note, certificate, or other evidence of indebtedness having a term of more than 1 year. For example, the OID rules may apply to certificates of deposit (CDs), time deposits, bonus savings plans, and other deposit arrangements, especially if the payment of interest is deferred until maturity. In addition, the OID rules apply to Treasury inflation-indexed securities. See Pub. 550, Investment Income and Expenses, for more information.

If, as the record holder, you receive Form 1099-OID showing amounts belonging to another person, you are considered a nominee recipient. Complete a Form 1099-OID for each of the other owners showing the amounts allocable to each. File Copy A of the form with the IRS. Furnish Copy B to each owner. List yourself as the "payer" and the other owner as the "recipient." File Form(s) 1099-OID with Form 1096, Annual Summary and Transmittal of U.S. Information Returns, with the Internal Revenue Service Center for your area. On Form 1096, list yourself as the "filer." A husband or wife is not required to file a nominee return to show amounts owned by the other. If you bought or sold an obligation during the year and you are not a nominee, you are not required to issue or file Form 1099-OID showing the OID or stated interest allocable to the seller/buyer of the obligation.

Account number. May show an account or other unique number the payer assigned to distinguish your account.

Box 1. Shows the OID on the obligation for the part of the year you owned it. Report the amount in box 1 as interest income on your income tax return. However, depending on the type of debt instrument, the issue or acquisition date, and other factors (for example, if you paid acquisition or bond premium), or the obligation is a stripped bond or coupon), you may have to figure the correct amount of OID to report on your return. See Pub. 1212, Guide to Original Issue Discount (OID) Instruments, for details on how to figure the correct OID.

Box 2. Shows other interest on this obligation for the year, which is an amount separate from the OID, if you held the obligation the entire year, report this amount as interest income on your tax return. If you disposed of the obligation or acquired it from another holder during the year, see Pub. 550 for reporting instructions. If there is an amount in both boxes 2 and 6, the amount in box 2 is interest on a U.S. Treasury obligation and is exempt from state and local income taxes.

Box 3. Shows interest or principal forfeited if you withdrew the money before the maturity date of the obligation, such as from a CD. You may deduct this amount to figure your adjusted gross income on your income tax return. See the instructions for Form 1040 to see where to take the deduction.

Box 4. Shows backup withholding. Generally, a payer must backup withhold at a 28% rate if you did not furnish your taxpayer identification number (TIN) or you did not furnish the correct TIN to the payer. See Form W-9, Request for Taxpayer Identification Number and Certification, for information on backup withholding. Include this amount on your income tax return as tax withheld.

Box 5. Shows the identification number (CUSIP number) or description of the obligation. The description may include the stock exchange, issuer, coupon rate, and year of maturity.

Box 6. Shows OID on a U.S. Treasury obligation for the part of the year you owned it. Report this amount as interest income on your federal income tax return, and see Pub. 1212 to figure any appropriate adjustments to this amount. This OID is exempt from state and local income taxes and is not included in box 1.

Box 7. Any amount shown is your share of investment expenses of a single-class REMIC. If you file Form 1040, you may deduct these expenses on the "Other expenses" line of Schedule A (Form 1040) subject to the 2% limit. This amount is included in box 2.

1099-MISC (OMB No. 1545-0115)

Account number. May show an account or other unique number the payer assigned to distinguish your account.

...income from self-employment is $400 or more, you ... file a return and compute your SE tax on Schedule SE (Form 1040). See Pub. 334, Tax Guide for Small Business, for more information. If no income or social security and Medicare taxes were withheld and you are still receiving these payments, see Form 1040-ES, Estimated Tax for Individuals. Individuals must report as explained for box 7 below. Corporations, fiduciaries, or partnerships report the amounts on the proper line of your tax return.

Boxes 1 and 2. Report rents from real estate on Schedule E (Form 1040). If you provided significant services to the tenant, sold real estate as a business, or rented personal property as a business, report on Schedule C or C-EZ (Form 1040). For royalties on timber, coal, and iron ore, see Pub. 544, Sales and Other Dispositions of Assets.

Box 3. Generally, report this amount on the "Other income" line of Form 1040 and identify the payment. The amount shown may be payments received as the beneficiary of a deceased employee, prizes awards, taxable damages, Indian gaming profits, payments made by employers to former employees who are serving in the Armed Forces or the National Guard, or other taxable income. See Pub. 525, Taxable and Nontaxable Income. If it is trade or business income, report this amount on Schedule C, C-EZ, or F (Form 1040).

Box 4. Shows backup withholding or withholding on Indian gaming profits. Generally, a payer must backup withhold at a 28% rate if you did not furnish your taxpayer identification number. See Form W-9, Request for Taxpayer Identification Number and Certification, for more information. Report this amount on your income tax return as tax withheld.

Box 5. An amount in this box means the fishing boat operator considers you self-employed. Report this amount on Schedule C or C-EZ (Form 1040). See Pub. 334.

Box 6. For individuals, report on Schedule C or C-EZ (Form 1040).

Box 7. Shows nonemployee compensation. If you are in the trade or business of catching fish, box 7 may show cash you received for the sale of fish. If payments in this box are SE income, report this amount on Schedule C, C-EZ, or F (Form 1040), and complete Schedule SE (Form 1040). You received this form instead of Form W-2 because the payer did not consider you an employee and did not withhold income tax or social security and Medicare taxes. Contact the payer if you believe this form is incorrect or has been issued in error. If you believe you are an employee, call the IRS for information on how to report any social security and Medicare taxes or see Form 8919, Uncollected Social Security and Medicare Taxes on Wages.

Box 8. Shows substitute payments in lieu of dividends or tax-exempt interest received by your broker on your behalf as a result of a loan of your securities. Report on the "Other income" line of Form 1040.

Box 9. If checked, $5,000 or more of sales of consumer products was paid to you on a buy-sell, deposit-commission, or other basis. A dollar amount does not have to be shown. Generally, report any income from your sale of these products on Schedule C or C-EZ (Form 1040).

Box 10. Report this amount on line 8 of Schedule F (Form 1040).

Box 13. Shows your total compensation of excess golden parachute payments subject to a 20% excise tax. See the Form 1040 instructions for where to report.

Box 14. Shows gross proceeds paid to an attorney in connection with legal services. Report only the taxable part as income on your return.

Box 15a. Shows current year deferrals as a nonemployee under a nonqualified deferred compensation (NQDC) plan that is subject to the requirements of section 409A. Any earnings on current and prior year deferrals are also reported.

Box 15b. Shows income as a nonemployee under a NQDC plan that does not meet the requirements of section 409A. This amount is also included in box 7 as nonemployee compensation. Any amount included in box 15a that is currently taxable is also included in this box. This income is also subject to a substantial additional tax to be reported on Form 1040. See "Total Tax" in the Form 1040 instructions.

Boxes 16-18. Shows state or local income tax withheld from the payments.

Form 1099-B (OMB No. 1545-0715)

Brokers and barter exchanges must report proceeds from transactions to you and the IRS on Form 1099-B. Reporting is also required when your broker knows or has reason to know that a corporation in which you own stock has had a change in control or a substantial change in capital structure. You may be required to recognize gain from the receipt of cash, stock, or other property that was exchanged for the corporation's stock. If your broker reported this type of transaction to you, the corporation is identified in the box below your name and address on Form 1099-B.

Account number. May show an account or other unique number the payer assigned to distinguish your account.

Box 1a. Shows the trade date of the transaction. For aggregate reporting, no entry will be present.

Box 1b. For broker transactions, may show the CUSIP (Committee on Uniform Security Identification Procedures) number of the item reported.

Box 2. Shows the aggregate proceeds from transactions involving stocks, bonds, other debt obligations, commodities, or forward contracts. May show the proceeds from the disposition of your interest(s) in a widely held fixed investment trust. Loss on forward contracts and changes in control or substantial change in capital structure are shown in parentheses.

...This box does not include proceeds from regulated futures contracts. The broker must indicate whether gross proceeds or gross proceeds less commissions and option premiums were reported to the IRS. Report this amount on Schedule D (Form 1040), Capital Gains and Losses. However, if box 12 is checked, you cannot take a loss on your tax return based on gross proceeds from an acquisition of control or substantial change in capital structure reported in box 2. Do not report this loss on Schedule D (Form 1040). The broker should advise you of any losses on a separate statement.

Box 3. Shows the cash you received, the fair market value of any property or services you received, and/or the fair market value of any trade credits or scrip credited to your account by a barter exchange. See Pub. 525, Taxable and Nontaxable Income, for information on how to report this income.

Box 4. Shows backup withholding. Generally, a payer must backup withhold at a 28% rate if you did not furnish your taxpayer identification number to the payer. See Form W-9, Request for Taxpayer Identification Number and Certification, for information on backup withholding. Include this amount on your income tax return as tax withheld.

Box 5. Shows the number of shares of the corporation's stock that you held which were exchanged in the change in control or substantial change in capital structure.

Box 6. Shows the class or classes of the corporation's stock that were exchanged in the change in control or substantial change in capital structure.

Box 7. Shows a brief description of the item or service for which the proceeds or bartering income is being reported. For regulated futures contracts and forward contracts, "RFC" or other appropriate description may be shown.

Regulated Futures Contracts:

Box 8. Shows the profit or (loss) realized on regulated futures or foreign currency contracts closed during 2007.

Box 9. Shows any year-end adjustment to the profit or (loss) shown in box 8 due to open contracts on December 31, 2006.

Box 10. Shows the unrealized profit or (loss) on open contracts held in your account on December 31, 2007. These are considered sold as of that date. This will become an adjustment reported in box 9 in 2008.

Box 11. Boxes 8, 9, and 10 are all used to figure the aggregate profit or (loss) on regulated futures or foreign currency contracts for the year. Include this amount on your 2007 Form 6781.

Form 1099-C (OMB No. 1545-1424)

If a federal government agency, certain agencies connected with the Federal Government, financial institution, credit union, or an organization having a significant trade or business of lending money (such as a finance or credit card company) cancels or forgives a debt you owe of $600 or more, this form must be provided to you. Generally, if you are an individual, you must include all canceled amounts, even if less than $600, on the "Other income" line of Form 1040. If you are a corporation, partnership, or other entity, report the canceled debt on your tax return. See the instructions for your tax return.

However, some canceled debts are not includible, or fully includible, in your income, such as certain student loans (see Pub. 525), certain debts reduced by the seller after purchase (see Pub. 334), qualified farm debt (see Pub. 225), qualified real property business debt (see Pub. 334), or debts canceled in bankruptcy (see Pub. 908). Do not report a canceled debt as income if you did not deduct it but would have been able to do so on your tax return if you had paid it. Also, do not include canceled debts in your income to the extent you were insolvent. If you exclude a canceled debt from your income because it was canceled in a bankruptcy case or during insolvency, or because the debt is qualified farm debt or qualified real property business debt, file Form 982, Reduction of Tax Attributes Due to Discharge of Indebtedness (and Section 1082 Basis Adjustment).

Account number. May show an account or other unique number the creditor assigned to distinguish your account.

Box 1. Shows the date the debt was canceled.

Box 2. Shows the amount of debt canceled.

Box 3. Shows interest if included in the canceled debt in box 2. See Pub. 525, Taxable and Nontaxable Income, to see if you must include the interest in gross income.

Box 5. Shows a description of the debt. If box 7 is completed, box 5 shows a description of the property.

Box 6. If the box is marked, the creditor has indicated the debt was canceled in a bankruptcy proceeding.

Box 7. If, in the same calendar year, a foreclosure or abandonment of property occurred in connection with the cancellation of the debt, the fair market value (FMV) of the property will be shown, or you will receive a separate Form 1099-A, Acquisition or Abandonment of Secured Property. Generally, the gross foreclosure bid price is considered to be the FMV. For an abandonment or voluntary conveyance in lieu of foreclosure, the FMV is generally the appraised value of the property. You may have income or loss because of the acquisition or abandonment. See Pub. 544, Sales and Other Dispositions of Assets, for information about foreclosures and abandonments.

Wells Fargo Investments, LLC (Member SIPC), a non-bank affiliate of Wells Fargo & Company. Wells Fargo Cash Sweep is held at Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., a bank affiliate of Wells Fargo & Company, and is FDIC-insured up to applicable limits and is Not SIPC covered. Precious metals are not SIPC covered or FDIC insured.

WELLS FARGO

1. This statement is provided to clients of Wells Fargo Investments, LLC ("WFI")(member SIPC). All orders and transactions shall be solely for your account and risk, shall be subject to the constitution, rules, regulations, customs, usages, rulings and interpretations of the exchange or market and the clearing facility, if any, where the transactions are executed and/ or settled and to all applicable laws and regulations.

2. It is your responsibility to review your statement and promptly report any inaccuracy or discrepancy to us. Any oral communication must be confirmed to us in writing at the address on the front of your statement to protect your rights, including rights under the Securities Investor Protection Act. We will consider this account statement correct unless we receive written notice from you of a suspected error within 30 days of receipt.

3. Securities and other assets (except brokered certificates of deposit and Wells Fargo Cash Sweep) are Not FDIC Insured, May lose value and are Not bank guaranteed, but are protected against broker-dealer insolvency up to a value of $500,000 (limited to $100,000 for cash claims) by SIPC. Explanatory brochure available by calling 202-371-8300 or at www.sipc.org. Please refer to your Brokerage Account Agreement under the section titled Not FDIC Insured or contact us for further information. Please be aware that SIPC account protection features do not protect against investment losses. The Wells Fargo Cash Sweep is held at Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. and (along with brokered CDs) is FDIC-insured up to applicable limits. Please see the Disclosure Statement for Sweep Features for further information. Precious metals are not SIPC covered or FDIC insured.

4. If you maintain a margin account, this is a combined statement of your general account and of a special memorandum account maintained for you under Regulation T of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. The permanent record of the separate account as required by Regulation T is available for your inspection upon written request.

Free credit balances may be used in the conduct of WFI's business subject to applicable rules and regulations. Any free credit balance in your account is payable immediately on demand.

5. If you trade options in your account, you are responsible to inform WFI of any change in your investment objectives or financial situation. Exercise notices for option contracts are allocated among client's short positions pursuant to a procedure that selects those contracts from among customer short option positions including positions established on the date of assignment. All short options positions are liable for assignment at any time. Commissions and other charges incurred in connection with the execution of option transactions have been included in confirmations of these transactions previously furnished to you. A summary of this information will be furnished upon written request.

6. Taxable dividends and interest reported on this statement for retirement plan accounts are generally exempt from year-end government reporting. If earnings are taxable in the tax year received, you will receive a Form 1099 at year-end. The information is provided as a convenience only, and may vary from the year-end tax report. There is no representation regarding the taxability of earnings at the state or local levels.

7. A copy of the financial statements for WFI is available for personal inspection at its main offices in Minneapolis, Minnesota or a copy will be furnished upon written request.

8. Under the NASD Regulation's Public Disclosure Program, the NASDR provides certain information regarding the disciplinary history of broker/dealers and their associated persons. Such information can be obtained from the NASDR Public Disclosure Program hotline number (1-800-289-9999) or the NASDR web site (www.nasdr.com). An investor brochure that includes information describing the NASDR Public Disclosure Program will be furnished upon written request.

9. Payment for Order Flow: WFI may receive payment for order flow from various market centers, but payment for order flow is not a consideration for any routing decisions. Unless otherwise instructed, WFI routes equity orders taking into consideration, among other factors, the quality and speed of execution, price improvement statistics, liquidity enhancements, NASDAQ report cards, and T+1 reports. WFI uses compensation received from market centers to help offset costs associated with executing orders. Payment information on specific market centers can be found by selecting the Wells Fargo Investments Equity Order Routing Information link on the bottom of the Wells Fargo Brokerage web site at www.wellsfargo.com/investing/styles/ and clicking on the Material Aspects of the Relationship link next to each market center. Information on payments and/ or credits received in connection with a specific transaction will be furnished upon written request.

Notice of Availability of Order Routing Information: WFI prepares quarterly reports describing its order routing practices for non-directed orders routed to a particular venue for execution. These reports are publicly available through a link at the bottom of the Wells Fargo Brokerage web site, www.wellsfargo.com/investing/styles/. WFI will furnish a printed copy of the quarterly report upon written request. In addition, WFI will provide on request more detailed information relating to the routing of any order in the six months prior to the request.

10. Dividend reinvestment transactions were affected by WFI acting as agent. Additional information regarding these transactions will be furnished upon written request.

11. Open orders will remain in effect until executed or canceled by you or until the expiration date on the open order confirmation previously sent to you. Failure to cancel an open order may result in the transaction being executed for your account. WFI has no responsibility to cancel an open order at its own initiative.

12. The prices of securities displayed on your statement are derived from various sources, and in some cases may be higher or lower than the price you would actually receive in the market. For securities listed on an exchange or trading continually in an active marketplace, the price reflects market quotations at the close of your statement period. For certificates of deposit ("CDs"), the value shown reflects the market value of the CDs. The actual value of the CDs may be different from their purchase price. CDs held until maturity are redeemed by the issuer at their face value. If CDs are sold prior to maturity, the result could be a significant loss of principal. The secondary market for CDs may be limited. The maturity value of CDs can be found under the "Quantity" section. If the CD market value listed appears as 'N/A', the market value was not available at the time this statement was prepared. Please note that any unpriced positions are not reflected in the total account value reported on this statement. For bonds trading less frequently, we generally rely on outside pricing services or a computerized pricing model which cannot always give us actual market values. Similarly, some annuity values provided by outside carriers may be estimates.

If we cannot obtain a price or estimate, "N/A" appears. Direct Participation Program (DPP) and Real Estate Investment Trust (REIT) securities are generally illiquid; the value of the security will be different than its purchase price.

13. In the event of a partial CALL of corporate or municipal bonds, or preferred stock held in bulk segregation, the securities to be called will automatically be selected on a random basis, as is customary in the securities industry. The probability that your securities will be selected is proportional to the amount of your holdings relative to the total holdings. A detailed description of the random selection procedure is available upon written request.

14. All information provided with respect to cost basis is derived from transactions in the account or information supplied by you or other sources. There is no guarantee as to the accuracy of cost basis information or the profit and loss information provided. Accordingly cost basis information is not intended for tax reporting purposes. Please inform us in the event that a cost basis is not accurate.

Reported gains and losses are based on a tax lot basis and are not based on an average cost. This information should not be used for tax purposes.

15. The information provided in this statement is for informational purposes only and should not be used for tax preparation. This information is not intended and should not be construed as tax, accounting or legal advice. Please consult your tax advisor regarding the tax consequences of your investment decisions.

When reporting your taxes please rely exclusively on Form 1099 and other tax reporting forms that WFI will provide to you at year-end.

16. Complaints should be directed to the Branch Office Manager. If you are unable to reach the Branch Office Manager, complaints may be directed to Wells Fargo Investments, Attn: Compliance Department, P.O. Box 7898, San Francisco, CA, 94120-9816 or by calling 866-415-6982.

17. For a change of address, please send your request to WFI at the address shown on the front of this statement.

[5] Unrealized gains and losses are not reported for securities for which cost basis or market value is not available.

The values, where indicated, of real estate investment trusts (REITs) and direct participation programs (DPPs), including limited partnerships, have been provided by the REITs or DPPs, generally through an intermediary. The values are not guaranteed and are intended to reflect an estimate of the interest in the REIT or DPP represented by the units or shares described above. REIT and DPP securities are generally illiquid, and the value may not be realized when you seek to liquidate the security. Where no value is indicated, please note that:

- REIT or DPP securities are generally illiquid
- The value of the security may be different from its purchase price
- Accurate valuation information is not available.

Please note the values for DPPs and REITs which are provided by the REITs and DPPs may not reflect recent activity and do not reflect an independent evaluation of the REIT or DPP.

Pricing - Securities prices may vary from actual liquidation value. Prices shown should only be used as a general guide to portfolio value. Prices are received from various pricing services. However, pricing services are sometimes unable to provide timely information. Where pricing sources are not readily available, particularly on certain debt securities, estimated prices may be generated by a matrix system taking various factors into consideration. The pricing of listed options takes into account the last closing price, as well as the current bid and offer prices. Where securities have not been priced, such securities have not been included in the Asset Allocation information at the beginning of this statement.

Investment - The dollar amount of Mutual Fund distributions, Money Market Fund dividend income, Bank Deposit interest income, or dividends for other securities shown on your Statement may have been reinvested. You will not receive confirmation of these reinvestments. However, information pertaining to these transactions which would otherwise appear on confirmations, including the time of execution and the name of the person from whom your security was purchased, will be furnished to you upon written request to your introducing firm. In dividend reinvestment transactions, Pershing acts as your agent and receives payment for order flow, the source and nature of which payment will be furnished to you upon written request to your introducing firm.

Option Disclosure - Information with respect to commissions and other charges incurred in connection with the execution of option transactions has been included in confirmations previously furnished to you. A summary of this information is available to you promptly upon your written request directed to your introducing firm. In order to assist your introducing firm in maintaining current background and financial information concerning your option accounts, please promptly advise them in writing of any material change in your investment objectives or financial situation. Expiring options which are valuable are exercised automatically pursuant to the exercise by exception procedure of the Options Clearing Corporation. Additional information regarding this procedure is available upon written request to your introducing firm.

Foreign Currency Transactions - Pershing may execute foreign currency transactions as principal for your account. Pershing may automatically convert foreign currency to or from U.S. dollars for dividends and similar corporate action transactions unless you instruct your financial organization otherwise. Pershing's currency conversion rate will not exceed the highest interbank conversion rate identified from customary banking sources on the conversion date or the prior business day, increased by up to 1%, unless a particular rate is required by applicable law. Your financial organization may also increase the currency conversion rate. This conversion rate may differ from rates in effect on the date you executed a transaction, incurred a charge, or received a credit. Transactions converted by agents (such as depositories) will be billed at the rates such agents use.

Proxy Vote - Securities held by you on margin (securities not fully paid for by you) may be lent by Pershing to itself or others in accordance with the terms outlined in the Margin Agreement. The right to vote your shares held on margin will be reduced by the amount of shares on loan. The Proxy Voting Instruction Form sent to you may reflect a smaller number of shares entitled to vote than the number of shares in your margin account.

Exchange-Traded Products - Exchange-traded products may include any combination of exchange-traded funds, exchange-traded notes, and other exchange-traded products.

[3] The cost basis of securities positions acquired prior to the availability of the PORTFOLIO EVALUATION SERVICE for this account, or delivered into this account, has been provided to PERSHING by your financial institution, and we make no representation as to the accuracy of such cost basis.

The values, where indicated, of real estate investment trusts (REITs) and direct participation programs (DPPs), including limited partnerships, have been provided by the REITs or DPPs, generally through an intermediary. The values are not guaranteed and are intended to reflect an estimate of the interest in the REIT or DPP represented by the units or shares described above. REIT and DPP securities are generally illiquid, and the value may not be realized when you seek to liquidate the security. Where no value is indicated, please note that:

- REIT or DPP securities are generally illiquid
- The value of the security may be different from its purchase price
- Accurate valuation information is not available.

Please note the values for DPPs and REITs which are provided by the REITs and DPPs may not reflect recent activity and do not reflect an independent evaluation of the REIT or DPP.

Disclosures and Other Information

Pricing - Securities prices may vary from actual liquidation value. Prices shown should only be used as a general guide to portfolio value. Prices are received from various pricing services. However, pricing services are sometimes unable to provide timely information. Where pricing sources are not readily available, particularly on certain debt securities, estimated prices may be generated by a matrix system taking various factors into consideration. The pricing of listed options takes into account the last closing price, as well as the current bid and offer prices. Where securities have not been priced, such securities have not been included in the Asset Allocation information at the beginning of this statement.

TERMS AND CONDITIONS

GENERAL INFORMATION

1. All orders and transactions shall be solely for your account and risk shall be subject to the constitution, rules, regulations, customs, usages, rulings and interpretations of the exchange or market and the clearing facility, if any, where the transactions are executed and/or settled, or if applicable, of the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority and to all applicable laws and regulations.
2. Whenever you are indebted to Pershing LLC ("Pershing") for any amount, all securities held by it for you in any account in which you have any interest shall secure all your liabilities to Pershing, and Pershing may in its discretion at any time, without tender, demand or notice to you, close or reduce any or all of your accounts by public or private sale or purchase or both of all or any securities carried in such accounts; any balance remaining due Pershing to be promptly paid by you.
3. Whenever you are indebted to Pershing for any amount, all securities carried for your account are or may be, without further notice to you, loaned or pledged by Pershing, either separately or under circumstances which will permit the commingling thereof, with other securities for any amount less than, equal to or greater than your liabilities to Pershing, but not under circumstances for an amount prohibited by law.
4. Title to securities sold to you, where Pershing has acted as principal, shall remain with Pershing until the entire purchase price is received or until the settlement date, whichever is later.
5. Any free credit balance carried for your account represents funds payable upon demand which, although properly accounted for on Pershing's books of record, are not segregated and may be used in the conduct of its business.
6. You may have received confirmations for transactions which do not appear on your statement. If so, the transactions will appear on your next periodic statement. Such transactions must be considered by you when computing the value of your account. This is especially true if you have written options which have been exercised.
7. If you maintain a margin account, this is a combined statement of your general account and a special memorandum account maintained for you under Regulation T of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. The permanent record of the separate account as required by Regulation T is available for your inspection upon request.
8. Interest charged on debit balances in your account appears on the statement. The rate of interest and period covered are indicated. The rate may change from time to time due to fluctuations in money rates or other reasons. Interest is computed as described in material previously furnished to you. Please contact your financial institution if you desire additional copies.
9. A financial statement of Pershing is available for your personal inspection at Pershing's offices. A copy of it will be mailed upon your written request or you can view it online at Pershing.com.
10. This statement should be retained for your records.
11. Dividends, interest and other distributions shown on this statement were classified as taxable or nontaxable based on certain information known as of the distribution date. This classification is subject to change and is solely intended for use as general information. After year end, Pershing is required to provide tax information to the Internal Revenue Service and other governmental authorities. At that time Pershing will provide that information on the annual tax information statement to you; use that statement to prepare your tax filings. The tax statement also includes other useful information to assist in accumulating the data to prepare your tax returns.
12. Pershing does not provide tax, investment or legal advisory services and no one associated with Pershing is authorized to render such advice. Do not rely upon any such advice, if given. Investors are encouraged to consult their tax advisors to determine the appropriate tax treatment of their business.
13. Pershing provides account protection for the net equity of securities positions and cash held in your account. Of this total, the Securities Investor Protection Corporation (SIPC) provides $500,000 of coverage, including $100,000 for claims for cash. Pershing provides additional protection on terms similar to SIPC for account net equity in excess of $500,000 through a commercial insurer. The account protection applies when a SIPC member firm fails financially and is unable to meet obligations to securities clients, but it does not protect against losses from the rise and fall in the market value of investments.
14. Pershing trades for its own account as a market maker, specialist, odd lot dealer, block positioner, arbitrageur and/or investor. Consequently, at the time of any transaction you may make, Pershing may have a position in such securities, which position may be partially or completely hedged.
15. If average price transaction is indicated on the front of this statement your financial institution or Pershing may have acted as principal, agent or both. Details available upon request.
16. This statement will be deemed conclusive and an account stated unless you advise Pershing in writing of any objection to it within ten days after receipt. Any such objection should be sent to Pershing at One Pershing Plaza, Jersey City, NJ 07399, Attn: Compliance.
17. You are advised to report promptly any inaccuracy or discrepancy in your account (including unauthorized trading) to your financial organization and Pershing, the custodian of your account. Please be advised that any oral communication should be re-confirmed in writing to further protect your rights, including your rights under the Securities Investor Protection Act. Your financial organization's contact information can be found on the first page of this statement. Pershing's contact information is as follows: Pershing LLC; Legal Department; One Pershing Plaza; Jersey City, New Jersey 07399; (201) 413-3330.

ERRORS AND OMISSIONS EXCEPTED.

PORTFOLIO HOLDINGS

This section includes the net market value of the securities in your account on a settlement date basis, including short positions, at the close of the statement period. The market prices have been obtained from quotation services, which we believe to be reliable; however, we cannot guarantee their accuracy. Securities for which a price is not available are marked "N/A" and are omitted from the Total.

The Annual Income, which is an estimated figure, is the current interest or most recently declared dividend for each security and is annualized. This figure particularly on equity mutual funds can vary substantially from one year to the next. As a result, actual amounts distributed may be more or less than those estimated on this statement. The Annual Income is then divided by the current Market Value to give the Estimated Yield which too could vary substantially because the income is estimated and it does not take account of your holding period. Annual Income has been obtained from sources believed to be reliable, but no assurance can be made as to accuracy.

Accrued interest represents interest earned but not yet received.

THE ROLE OF PERSHING

Pershing carries your account as clearing broker pursuant to a clearing agreement with your financial institution. Pershing may accept from your financial institution without inquiry or investigation (i) orders for the purchase and sale of securities and other property and (ii) any other instructions concerning your account. Pershing is not responsible or liable for any acts or omissions of your financial institution or its employees and it does not supervise them. Pershing provides no investment advice nor does it assess the suitability of any transaction or order. Pershing acts as the agent of your financial institution and you agree that you will not hold Pershing or any person controlling or under common control with it liable for any investment losses incurred by you.

Pershing performs several key functions at the direction of your financial institution. It acts as custodian for funds and securities you may deposit with it directly or through your financial institution or that it receives as the result of securities transactions it processes. Inquiries concerning the positions and balances in your account may only be directed to the Pershing Customer Service Department at (201) 413-3333. All other inquiries regarding your account or activity should be directed to your financial institution. For a description of other functions performed by Pershing please consult the Disclosure Statement provided to you upon the opening of your account.

Your financial institution is responsible for adherence to the securities laws, regulations and rules which apply to it regarding its own operations and the supervision of your account. Its sales representatives and other personnel. Your financial institution is also responsible for approving the opening of accounts and obtaining account documents; the acceptance and, in certain instances, execution of securities orders; the assessment of the suitability of those transactions, where applicable; the rendering of investment advice, if any, to you and in general, for the ongoing relationship that it has with you.

Pershing may capture and store data about you such as your financial information and investment objectives. However, Pershing is not reviewing this information and evaluating whether your investments comport with your financial status and objectives and you hereby release Pershing from any liability to do so. Similarly, Pershing may capture and store information about whether a broker or an introducing firm is registered in a given state. You hereby release Pershing from any liability to review this data or to evaluate whether a particular security is registered or exempt from registration in your State.

This notice is not meant as a definitive enumeration of every possible circumstance, but as a general disclosure. If you have any questions regarding this notice or if you would like additional copies of the Disclosure Statement, please contact your financial institution.

PAYMENT FOR ORDER FLOW PRACTICES

The following statement is provided to you as required by Rule 11Ac1-3 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934.

Pershing sends certain equity orders to exchanges, Electronic Communication Networks, or broker-dealers during normal business hours and during extended trading sessions. Certain of these venues provide payments to Pershing or charge access fees to Pershing depending upon the characteristics of the order and any subsequent execution. In addition, Pershing may execute certain equity orders as principal. The details of these payments and fees are available upon written request. Pershing receives payments for directing listed options order flow to certain option exchanges. Compensation is generally in the form of a per option contract cash payment. Compensation is generally in the form of a per option contract cash payment. For a listing of organizations that pay Pershing for order flow, please refer to www.pershing.com/orderflow.htm.

Best Execution

Notwithstanding the previous paragraph regarding payment for order flow, Pershing selects certain market centers to provide execution of over-the-counter and exchange-listed securities transactions which agree to accept orders, transmitted electronically up to a specified size, and to execute them at or better than the national best bid or offer (NBBO). On certain larger orders, or if the designated market centers do not make a market in the subject security, Pershing directly contacts market centers to obtain an execution. The designated market centers to which orders are automatically routed are selected based on the consistent high quality of their executions in one or more market segments and their ability to provide opportunities for executions at prices superior to the NBBO.

If an order for an exchange-listed security is not immediately executable on the exchange to which it is routed, such order may be represented in the national marketplace using the various means available for price discovery. Pershing also regularly reviews reports for quality of execution purposes.

ARBITRATION

ARBITRATION DISCLOSURES:

- ALL PARTIES TO THIS AGREEMENT ARE GIVING UP THE RIGHT TO SUE EACH OTHER IN COURT, INCLUDING THE RIGHT TO A TRIAL BY JURY, EXCEPT AS PROVIDED BY THE RULES OF THE ARBITRATION FORUM IN WHICH A CLAIM IS FILED.
- ARBITRATION AWARDS ARE GENERALLY FINAL AND BINDING; A PARTY'S ABILITY TO HAVE A COURT REVERSE OR MODIFY AN ARBITRATION AWARD IS VERY LIMITED.
- THE ABILITY OF THE PARTIES TO OBTAIN DOCUMENTS, WITNESS STATEMENTS AND OTHER DISCOVERY IS GENERALLY MORE LIMITED IN ARBITRATION THAN IN COURT PROCEEDINGS.
- THE ARBITRATORS DO NOT HAVE TO EXPLAIN THE REASON(S) FOR THEIR AWARD.
- THE PANEL OF ARBITRATORS WILL TYPICALLY INCLUDE A MINORITY OF ARBITRATORS WHO WERE OR ARE AFFILIATED WITH THE SECURITIES INDUSTRY.
- THE RULES OF SOME ARBITRATION FORUMS MAY IMPOSE TIME LIMITS FOR BRINGING A CLAIM IN ARBITRATION. IN SOME CASES, A CLAIM THAT IS INELIGIBLE FOR ARBITRATION MAY BE BROUGHT IN COURT.
- THE RULES OF THE ARBITRATION FORUM IN WHICH THE CLAIM IS FILED, AND ANY AMENDMENTS THERETO, SHALL BE INCORPORATED INTO THIS AGREEMENT.

If any of the above Terms and Conditions are unacceptable to you, please notify Pershing immediately in writing by certified mail to One Pershing Plaza, Jersey City, NJ 07399, Attn: Compliance.

JAN - 5 2009

TERMS AND CONDITIONS

ARBITRATION AGREEMENT

ANY CONTROVERSY BETWEEN YOU AND US SHALL BE SUBMITTED TO ARBITRATION BEFORE THE FINANCIAL INDUSTRY REGULATORY AUTHORITY OR ANY OTHER NATIONAL SECURITIES EXCHANGE ON WHICH A TRANSACTION GIVING RISE TO THE CLAIM TOOK PLACE (AND ONLY BEFORE SUCH EXCHANGE).

NO PERSON SHALL BRING A PUTATIVE OR CERTIFIED CLASS ACTION TO ARBITRATION, NOR SEEK TO ENFORCE ANY PREDISPUTE ARBITRATION AGREEMENT AGAINST ANY PERSON WHO HAS INITIATED IN COURT A PUTATIVE CLASS ACTION; WHO IS A MEMBER OF A PUTATIVE CLASS WHO HAS NOT OPTED OUT OF THE CLASS WITH RESPECT TO ANY CLAIMS ENCOMPASSED BY THE PUTATIVE CLASS ACTION UNTIL; (I) THE CLASS CERTIFICATION IS DENIED; (II) THE CLASS IS DECERTIFIED; OR (III) THE CUSTOMER IS EXCLUDED FROM THE CLASS BY THE COURT. SUCH FORBEARANCE TO ENFORCE AN AGREEMENT TO ARBITRATE SHALL NOT CONSTITUTE A WAIVER OF ANY RIGHTS UNDER THIS AGREEMENT EXCEPT TO THE EXTENT STATED HEREIN.

THE LAWS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK GOVERN.

WRAP ACCOUNT CUSTOMERS WHO ELECTED NOT TO RECEIVE IMMEDIATE CONFIRMATION OF TRANSACTIONS

The following Terms and Conditions are applicable only if your account is a wrap fee managed account, and the trade confirmations are not sent to you (sent only to your portfolio manager) pursuant to your instruction:

1. The following information will be furnished to you upon request to your financial institution (introducing firm) ("Introducing Firm"), with respect to any transaction for which a trade confirmation was not sent to you:
   - The market upon which any transaction was executed;
   - The time of day that any transaction was executed;
   - The name of the person from whom any security was purchased, or to whom such security was sold;
   - The source and amount of other commissions received in connection with any transaction; and
   - A copy of the trade confirmation.
2. Introducing Firm effected each transaction for which a trade confirmation was not sent to you, as your agent.
3. In connection with each equity security and certain other securities sold, Introducing Firm charges to you, and remits to a regulatory organization or national securities exchange, a "Trans. Fee". Pershing calculates this Fee based on amounts paid by Introducing Firm to the applicable regulatory organization or national securities exchange. This, in turn, is based on the value of the applicable securities sold. To determine the exact amount of this Fee with respect to any transaction, please contact the Introducing Firm.
4. Introducing Firm does not receive any payment for order flow for any transaction for which a trade confirmation was not sent to you.
5. Call features may exist for securities. Call features for fixed income securities may affect yield. Complete information will be provided upon request.
6. If any transaction involves an asset-backed security, including a municipal collateralized mortgage obligation, which represents an interest in or is secured by a pool of receivables or other financial assets that are subject continuously to prepayment, then the actual yield of such security may vary according to the rate at which the underlying receivables or other financial assets are prepaid. Information concerning the factors that affect yield (including at a minimum estimated yield, weighted average life, and the prepayment assumptions of underlying yield) will be furnished to you, upon request to Introducing Firm.
7. The ratings that appear in the description of some fixed income securities have been obtained from ratings services which Pershing believes to be reliable; however, Pershing cannot guarantee their accuracy. Securities for which a rating is not available are marked "UNRATED".

If any of the above Terms and Conditions are unacceptable to you, please notify Pershing immediately in writing by certified mail to One Pershing Plaza, Jersey City, NJ 07399, Attn: Compliance.

Anchorage, Ak 99501-2084

Dear Chief Justice Fabe,

I am interested in serving on the Legislative Ethics Committee. Please review my resume and this letter of interest.

Currently, I reside in Juneau and Yakutat, Alaska, where we have our second home. I have lived in southeast Alaska for almost forty years. My involvement in the local native community is through my membership in Alaska Native Sisterhood and Alaska Native Brotherhood. My family has been involved in cultural and traditional events for many years. My husband and I have supported strong family values of responsibility, hard work ethics, kindness, ties to our ancestral lands and people and being a good person.

I am a registered Democrat and my voter registration is in Yakutat. I retired from teaching in 2003.

If you have any questions, please call me at the following numbers; Juneau: 586-6937, cell- 321-2022 (does not work in Yakutat) and Yakutat: 784-3074.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

Antoinette Mallott

Antoinette Mallott

Residence:

102 Cordova Street
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Status:

Married: Byron I. Mallott Children: Anthony, Joseph and Benjamin

Date of Birth: October 27, 1947, Rampart, Alaska

Background:

I am an Alaskan Native and have spent my entire life in Alaska. I have been involved in education for the past thirty years, both as a teacher and parent. I strongly believe that it is imperative to develop and strengthen students' self-esteem and academic skills. It is equally important to establish a positive relationship with parents and support their involvement with their children's academic and social achievements.

My experience in the teaching profession included knowledge about the public laws of inclusion for students with learning, physical and emotional disabilities. I have worked with ESL (English Second Language) students and supported their rights to seek and obtain academic assistance in core subjects, such as reading, math and writing.

During my years of teaching at Gastineau Elementary School, I was on SCOT, a collaboration team composed of teachers, administrators and other support staff members. Our team met weekly to discuss learning and behavioral problems of students that classroom teachers were concerned about. Parents were requested to be present during these meetings. We were responsible for coming up with educational or behavioral plans to assist the students in their classrooms.

I was a Site Council member and facilitator for seven years at Gastineau. My duties included setting the monthly agendas, conducting the meetings, communication with parents, teachers and other members and carrying out the directions on decisions made for improving the school climate, safety of the students and staff and review and approval of curricula.

One of the many duties that a teacher has is writing academic and learning diagnostic reports for parents and administrators. I am confident that I possess the ability to organize, evaluate and present information effectively.

Education:

Bachelor of Elementary Education, University of Alaska, Fairbanks, 5/72
Master's in Elementary Education, University of Alaska, Juneau, 5/87

Professional Experiences:

2006 -2010	Care Coordinator for Catholic Community Services, Yakutat
1998-2003	Librarian and ESL teacher, Juneau
1990-1998	Classroom teacher, Juneau
1986-1990	Substitute teacher, Juneau
1982-1983	Chairperson for the Commissioner's Task Force on Native Achievement, Department of Education
1979-1980	3rd grade teacher, Yakutat
1978-1979	Headstart director and teacher, Yakutat
1977-1978	Resource coordinator, Indian Studies Program, Anchorage
1974-1976	2nd/3rd grade teacher, Yakutat
1972-1974	3rd grade teacher, Juneau
1970-1972	Home-School coordinator, State of Alaska Boarding Home Program, Fairbanks
1970	Summer flight attendant, TransWorld Airlines, Kansas City, Kansas
1968-1970	Travel agent, Roger's Travel Agency, Fairbanks

Objective:
Reappointment to serving on Alaska's Violent Crimes Compensation Board.

Strengths:
Diverse work experience throughout Alaska from laborer to administrative fields. Perpetually seeking to learn. Exceptional communicator both orally and written. Optimistic yet realistic. Creative while pragmatic. Highly motivated to help reduce the occurrence of violent crimes in Alaska and continue to aid victims through education, prevention and outreach.

Voluntary Civic Activity:
2003-Present – Appointed Chair of Alaska's Violent Crimes Compensation Board by last two Governors. Chairing a quasi-judicial board which adjudicates claims and distributes funds to innocent violent crime victims in Alaska while coordinating with full time staff in Juneau. Cultivating and nourishing fruitful relationships with local and state politicians as well as state commissioners in order to maintain board's statutory and fiscal homeostasis or augment it. Oversee preparation and submission of annual report to Alaska's legislators, select state commissioners and Governor.

2002-Present – Volunteer lobbyist for innocent victims of violent crimes. Annual trips to Juneau to meet with legislators, commissioners and the Governor's office on behalf of crime victims regarding public safety issues, legislation and fund allocation for crime victim services.

2007-Present – Created the Helping Hands Healing Hearts Program. A committee designed to consolidate the numerous victim advocacy groups in order to educate and assist the faith based community in dealing with violent crime victims by bridging the gap between faith based organizations and government/non-faith based organizations.

2002-2003 – Appointed by Mayor of Anchorage to Municipal Emergency 911 Oversight Task Force. Ad Hoc committee which explored and researched existing detriments, then potential remedies, to Anchorage's critically deficient emergency response system. Culminated with proposed upgrades and enhancements submitted to Mayor. Spoke on national television on topic.

Work Experience:
-2009-Present- Afognak Native Corporation, Legal Department, Anchorage, Alaska. Corporate Risk and Compliance. Your Personal Rate of Return

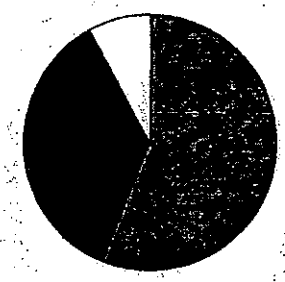
This Period	19.2%
Year to Date	7.5%

Your Personal Rate of Return is calculated with a time-weighted formula, widely used by financial analysts to calculate investment earnings. It reflects the results of your investment selections as well as any activity in the plan account(s) shown. There are other Personal Rate of Return formulas used that may yield different results. Remember that past performance is no guarantee of future results.

Your Asset Allocation



Your account is currently allocated among the asset classes specified above. Percentages and totals may not be exact due to rounding.

The Additional Fund Information section lists the allocation of your blended funds.

Market Value of Your Account

Displayed in this section is the value of your account for the statement period, in both shares and dollars.

Fid Freedom 2015			$7.72	$9.16
Account Total

Remember that a dividend payment to fund shareholders reduces the share price of the fund, so a decrease in the share price for the statement period does not necessarily reflect lower fund performance.

* Some of your investments are classified as a Blended Investment. Blended Investments may include a mixture of stocks, bonds, and/or short term assets. Please refer to the "Additional Investment Information" section to determine the allocation of your blended investments' underlying assets. The asset breakdown of your portfolio is reflected in the pie chart in the "Asset Allocation" section.

Market Value of Your Account (continued)

Please refer to NetBenefits and other Plan information, such as your SPD, for a description of your right to direct investments under the Plan. For information on any plan restrictions on those rights, please contact your benefits office.

To help achieve long-term retirement security, you should give careful consideration to the benefits of a well-balanced and diversified investment portfolio. Spreading your assets among different types of investments can help you achieve a favorable rate of return, while minimizing your overall risk of losing money. This is because market or other economic conditions that cause one category of assets, or one particular security, to perform very well often cause another asset category, or another particular security, to perform poorly. If you invest more than 20% of your retirement savings in any one company or industry, your savings may not be properly diversified. Although diversification is not a guarantee against loss, it is an effective strategy to help you manage investment risk.

In deciding how to invest your retirement savings, you should take into account all of your assets, including any retirement savings outside of the Plan. No single approach is right for everyone because, among other factors, individuals have different financial goals, different time horizons for meeting their goals, and different tolerances for risk. It is also important to periodically review your investment portfolio, your investment objectives, and the investment options under the Plan to help ensure that your retirement savings will meet your retirement goals. Visit the Department of Labor website http://www.dol.gov/ebsa/investing.html for information on individual investing and diversification.
