1988 granted permanent injunction prohibiting placer miner from operating off-road vehicles in national preserve without first obtaining access permit and from conducting placer miner operations without submitting and obtaining approval of mining operations plan. Miner appealed. The Court of Appeals, held that: (1) Federal Government had authority to regulate access and mining within Alaska's national parks; (2) regulations did not deprive placer miner of "adequate and feasible" access to his claims and were within power granted under property clause; (3) Federal Government had authority to regulate travel on trail, even assuming it was established right-of-way; and (4) claim alleging unconstitutional taking of property rights was not ripe for judicial resolution.

SHULTZ v DEPARTMENT OF ARMY

Shultz v. Army, 1993, concerning a right-of-way claim across Fort Wainwright, established that the public right-of-way between the origin and termini of the route need not be absolutely fixed, and upheld the broad definition of a highway found in state law. On rehearing, the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals reversed its original ruling in the Shultz case. However, the legal reasoning that produced that original decision has been used to support other cases. Paul G. Shultz appeals the district court's judgment in favor of the government in his quiet title action under 28 U.S.C. S 2409a. Shultz argued that he has a right-of-way across Fort Wainwright to get back and forth between Fairbanks and his property under either R.S. 2477, 43 U.S.C. S 932, or Alaska common law, or both. Because we ultimately agree with the district court that Shultz has not sustained his burden to factually establish a continuous R.S. 2477 route or a right-of-way under Alaska common law, we affirm the district court. We do not reach Shultz's argument that the district court erred by holding that his action was time-barred by 28 U.S.C. S 2409a(g).

It seems as if their goal is to eliminate public access to public land. To make a fair judgment on this issue, some background history is essential. As each new area of this country developed, the federal government owned all of the land. Gradually land was sold or homesteaded, with almost all land transferring to private ownership. However, in the Western states, this transfer from federal to private ownership in many cases was never completed.

Twenty six years after its repeal by FLPMA, the process of asserting claims under the statute is far from consistent and has been the subject of litigation between the Federal government, the states and the counties. 43 CFR Part 1860 [WO-350-1864-24 1A] RIN 1004-AD50 Conveyances, Disclaimers and Correction Documents

We are amending the regulation by: removing the 12-year regulatory filing deadline for states; removing the requirement that an applicant be a ``present owner of record'' to be qualified under the Act; allowing any entity claiming title, not just current owners of record, to apply for a disclaimer of interest; defining the term ``state'' as it is used in this rule; clarifying how we will approve disclaimer applications involving another Federal land managing agency.

ACCESS CLOSURE TO PATENTED PRIVATE LAND IN LOWER 48 STATES

9/11 - Catron Co, NM - Forest Service Probes Road Grading - There are 4 parcels of unimproved, uninhabited tracts of land located on the San Francisco River that are surrounded by national forest lands. The road servicing these tracts is an old historic road (RS 2477) connecting Glenwood with Reserve. This 17 mile stretch of road has not been maintained by the county for many years. However travelers and landowners have continually gone up the river anyway. The Gila Forest wishes to purchase this property and has had it appraised. Our county land plan calls for no net loss of private land. Private land is our tax base and provides a nucleus for any future economic benefits. One of the landowners would not consent to sell. This land owner received a letter from Gila Forest Supervisor Kelly M. Russell stating that the area had been designated as the Devils Park Road-less area. He was informed that his only access was by foot or horseback. He could be granted a vehicle permit if he consented to pay the forest service to do a full blown NEPA study. Nobody else, to our knowledge was informed of this road-less designation including Catron County. One of the strongest rights in the U.S. is to have full access to ones private land.

Question

What public uses are authorized within the R.S. 2477 right-of-way for the Klutina Lake Road?1

Ahtna, Inc., the landowner whose lands are traversed by the Klutina Lake road, claims that travelers may use the road only for continuous travel. According to Ahtna, the traveling public may not make rest stops, park for any purpose within the right-of-way except for emergencies, or camp overnight within the right-of-way.

Ahtna also claims that R.S. 2477 easements are of no effect until established by a court judgment. In addition, Ahtna asserts that the state's R.S. 2477 right-of-way for the Klutina Lake road is superceded by an overlapping ANCSA 17(b) easement reserved for the road in the interim conveyances conveying the lands traversed by the road from BLM to Ahtna and Kluti-Kaah Corporation, hereinafter collectively referred to as "Ahtna."

Summary of Advice

In our opinion, the public may make reasonable use of the right-of-way for the activities listed above. Department of Transportation and Public Facilities (DOT&PF) may make improvements to the road reasonably necessary to accommodate the uses made of the road from its establishment circa 1898 through October 21, 1976 (the date R.S. 2477 was repealed) and may take reasonable steps to render the road convenient for those public uses.

A judgment is not necessary to perfect R.S. 2477 easements. The state's R.S. 2477 right-of-way is not superceded by the overlapping ANCSA 17(b) easement contained in Ahtna's conveyances. Rather, the overlapping R.S. 2477 right-of-way is impressed on the land by operation of law and is enforceable even if it is of greater scope than the ANCSA 17(b) easement.

Legal Analysis

We first address the uses to which the right-of-way may be put and then address Ahtna's arguments that the state's R.S. 2477 right-of-way must be perfected by litigation and is supplanted by the ANCSA 17(b) easement for the Klutina Lake road included in Ahtna's conveyances.

1. The uses the public may make of a perfected R.S. 2477 right-of-way are those uses to which the public has traditionally put the road.

The issue of what public uses of a right-of-way are authorized by law is an issue concerning the "scope" of the right-of-way.

The "scope" of a right-of-way refers to the bundle of property rights possessed by the holder of the right-of-way. This bundle is defined by the physical boundaries of the right-of-way as well as the uses to which it has been put.

Sierra Club v. Hodel, 848 F.2d 1068, 1079 n. 9 (10th Cir. 1988), overruled in part on other grounds, Village of Los Ranchos de Albuquerque v. Marsh, 956 F.2d 970, 973 (10th Cir. 1992) (emphasis added).2

Because the Klutina Lake road was established under a federal statute, we must, as a threshold matter, examine whether state or federal law controls the scope issue.

a. The uses to which an R.S. 2477 may be put will probably be controlled by state law.

There is controversy over whether state or federal law controls the perfection of R.S. 2477 rights-of-way. The controversy centers on whether R.S. 2477 required actual road construction in order to perfect a right-of-way, as opposed to establishment by user or an act of a public authority. See North Dakota Op. Att'y Gen. No. 2000-05, 2000 WL 146636 (N.D.A.G.

Jan. 26, 2000)(containing a general summary of this controversy and of state and federal cases addressing this issue).

The "actual construction" controversy is irrelevant to your question. The perfection of an R.S. 2477 right-of-way for the Klutina Lake road through actual construction by a public authority is not an issue in this case. The road was constructed and state funds expended on improvements well before R.S. 2477 was repealed by the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 (FLPMA) on October 21, 1976, with a savings provision for existing rights-of-way. See 701(a), 706(a) Pub.L. 94-579, 90 Stat. 2743, 43 U.S.C. 1701 (note). Nevertheless, we have examined federal and state cases to ascertain whether state or federal law controls the scope of an R.S. 2477.

(i) Decisions of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals indicate that the Ninth Circuit would probably apply state law to the issue of the scope of an R.S. 2477 right-of-way unless federal law expressly dictates otherwise.

At least one circuit applies state law to determine the scope of an R.S. 2477 right-of-way. In Sierra Club v. Hodel, 848 F.2d at 1080-83, the Tenth Circuit unequivocally held that state law controls the scope of an R.S. 2477 right-of-way, including the uses to which the road may be put.

No Ninth Circuit decision directly holds that the scope of an R.S. 2477 is a matter to be determined under state law where federal law is otherwise silent on the issue of which law controls. However, several Ninth Circuit decisions imply that state law would be applied to determine the uses to which an R.S. 2477 may be put where, as here, the perfection of the R.S. 2477 right-of-way by actual construction is not in doubt. See Shultz v. Dep't of Army, 10 F.3d 649, 655 n. 8 (9th Cir. 1993) (holding that both the establishment and scope of an R.S. 2477 right-of-way is a question of state law, citing Standage Ventures, infra. and Hodel, supra.), withdrawn, 96 F.3d 1222 (1996) n3; Standage Ventures, Inc. v. Arizona, 499 F.2d 248, 250 (9th Cir. 1974); Adams v. U.S., 687 F.Supp. 1479, 1490 (D.Nev. 1988), affirmed in part, reversed in part on other grounds, 3 F.3d 1254 (9th Cir. 1993) ("[A] right of way could be established by public use under terms provided by state law."); U.S. v. Rogge, 10 Alaska 130 (D. Alaska Terr. 1941), affirmed, 128 F.2d 800 (9th Cir. 1942); see also, lower court decisions within the Ninth Circuit, e.g., U.S. v. 9,947.71 Acres of Land, 220 F.Supp. 328, 332, 335-36 (D.Nev. 1963); Berger v. Ohlson, 9 Alaska 389, 395 (D. Alaska Terr. 1938), vacated on other grounds, 9 Alaska 605 (D.Alaska Terr. 1939); Clark v. Taylor, 9 Alaska 298, 305 (D. Alaska Terr. 1938).

In Vieux v. East Bay Regional Park District, 906 F.2d 1330, 1341 (9th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 967 (1990), a case concerning a public highway established within a railroad right-of-way under 43 U.S.C. 912, the Ninth Circuit, held that:

State law determines what is a "public highway legally established" for the purposes of federal land grant statues....

(quoting 43 U.S.C. 912, citing Standage Ventures, supra.); accord, King County v. Burlington Northern Railroad Corp., 885 F.Supp. 1419, 1422 n. 5 (W.D. Wash. 1994).

While Vieux did not address R.S. 2477, its holding is broadly applicable to all "federal land grant statutes" of which R.S. 2477 was a part.4 Vieux, 906 F.2d at 1341. Therefore, there is a good argument that the holding in Vieux applies to the establishment of R.S. 2477 rights-of-way as well.

Furthermore, in a case that arose out of the Supreme Court of California, the U.S. Supreme Court recognized that R.S. 2477 authorized the creation of highways over the federal public domain in any manner consistent with state law. Central Pacific Railway Co. v. Alameda County, 52 S.Ct. 225, 226-27, 229 (1932). The right-of-way at issue in Central Pacific was a road first established by public use and subsequently laid out and improved by the county before R.S. 2477 was enacted.5 The Court held that R.S. 2477 applied retroactively to validate pre-existing roads crossing public domain lands. Id. at 227. The Court also held that R.S. 2477 rights-of-way are "controlled by the same general principles" applicable to cases concerning appropriation of water from the public domain under section 9 of the Act of July 26, 1866.6 Id. at 228. Section 9, in turn, provided that water appropriation issues would be determined under local customs and laws. The Court twice noted that the road was established under state law. Central Pacific, 52 S.Ct. at 226, 229. Central Pacific thus lends support to the argument that state law controls the scope of an R.S. 2477 right-of-way.

There is one Ninth Circuit decision that indicates the Ninth Circuit may apply federal law to determine the scope of an R.S. 2477 right-of-way. We believe that case is distinguishable. In U.S. v. Gates of the Mountains Lakeshore Homes, Inc., 732 F.2d 1411, 1413 (9th Cir. 1984), the court, construing R.S. 2477, held that the scope of a federal land grant is a question of federal law. The court recognized that federal law sometimes adopts and applies state law to federal land grants, but found that federal statutes passed after R.S. 2477 was enacted dictated a distinctly federal rule applicable to the placement of electric power transmission lines within R.S. 2477 roads. Id.

Hodel distinguished the holding of Gates of the Mountains, reasoning that it was limited to the issue of placing utilities within R.S. 2477s.7 Hodel, 848 F.2d at 1081. Unlike the situation in Gates of the Mountains, we can find nothing in federal law that controls other uses to which an R.S. 2477 may be put or that specifies a width for R.S. 2477 rights-of-way. Federal law is silent on both of these "scope" issues. Thus, because there is no federal law to apply with respect to the scope issues related to the Klutina Lake road, we believe it likely that the Ninth Circuit would apply state law to resolve these issues.

Although we believe a strong argument can be made that state law controls both the establishment and scope of R.S. 2477 rights-of-way, you should be aware of a recent Tenth Circuit decision that refused to apply state law to determine the validity of an R.S. 2477 crossing federal lands. In South Utah Wilderness Alliance v. BLM, 147 F.Supp.2d 1130, 1141-43 (D.Utah 2001), the court upheld the BLM interpretation of R.S. 2477 that requires actual road construction to perfect the easement. The court deferred to BLM's interpretation of R.S. 2477 because federal law requires federal courts to "give some deference to the agency interpretation of the statute" and because the court found BLM's "actual construction" interpretation to be reasonable. Id. at 1135, 1143.

The holding in South Utah would probably not apply to the Klutina Lake road situation. First, South Utah is not controlling precedent in the Ninth Circuit. Second, South Utah addresses the perfection of an R.S. 2477, not the allowable uses to be made of an R.S. 2477 after it is perfected. Thus, BLM's statutory interpretation of R.S. 2477 as to what actions are sufficient to perfect an R.S. 2477 easement would likely be irrelevant to the issue of the allowable uses of the Klutina Lake road.

On balance, we believe that the Ninth Circuit would apply state law to determine the allowable uses within an R.S. 2477 because there is no federal law to apply. In such circumstances, the federal courts will most likely look to state law. Hodel, 848 F.2d at 1083; Gates of the Mountains, 732 F.2d at 1413.

(ii) Cases from Alaska and other state courts.

The Alaska Supreme Court has long held that R.S. 2477 grants are to be interpreted in accordance with Alaska law. Fitzgerald v. Puddicombe, 918 P.2d 1017, 1019 (Alaska 1996); Girves v. Kenai Peninsula Borough, 536 P.2d 1221, 1226 (Alaska 1975); Hamerly v. Denton, 359 P.2d 121 (Alaska 1961). Other states also hold that state law controls the scope of an R.S. 2477 right-of-way. See, e.g., cases cited in Hodel, 848 F.2d at 1082 & n. 13 ("We are not aware of any state that even considered the possibility of a federal rule."); North Dakota Op. Att'y Gen. 2000-05, 2000 WL 146636 at *10 ("All state court decisions look to state law.")

b. The uses authorized within an R.S. 2477.

In Hodel, the court, applying Utah law, held that the uses authorized within an R.S. 2477 right-of-way are those that are "reasonable and necessary" as measured "in light of traditional uses to which the right-of-way was put." Hodel, 848 F.2d at 1083. Moreover, because the grantor, the federal government, was never required to ratify a use on an R.S. 2477 right-of-way, each new use of the [right-of-way] automatically vested as an incident of the easement. Thus, all uses before October 21, 1976, not terminated or surrendered, are part of an R.S. 2477 right-of-way.

Hodel, 848 F.2d at 1084. The court ruled that the county had authority to improve the road at issue in Hodel to the extent reasonably necessary to ensure safe use of the right-of-way consistent with its historical uses. 848 F.2d at 1083. We believe the same conclusion would be reached under Alaska law.

In Simon v. State, 996 P.2d 1211 (Alaska 2000), the court was asked to address the scope of an easement set out in a Department of Interior public land order. The court applied the common law of easements and held that, "where the terms of the easement are ambiguous, then the holder of the easement is only entitled to use the property within reason." 996 P.2d at 1214. The court found that a public land order granting an easement "over and across" a parcel of property was ambiguous as to its scope. 996 P.2d at 1215. The language of R.S. 2477 granting a "right of way for the construction of highways ... for public uses" is no less ambiguous than the easement language at issue in Simon.

Where the language of an easement is ambiguous, the "easement gives the holder the right to use the land to the extent necessary to serve the purpose of the easement." Simon, 996 P.2d at 1215. While Simon did not involve an R.S. 2477 right-of-way, it did involve a public right-of-way granted under federal law. Therefore, it is likely that Alaska courts will apply the Simon standard to determine the uses to which the Klutina Lake road may be put under R.S. 2477.

The historical uses of the Klutina Lake road include vehicular and pedestrian travel, rest stops, parking for recreational uses of the Klutina River, and overnight camping. The law authorizes the reasonable use of the right-of-way for these purposes.

However, in assisting the public in making these uses convenient, the department should bear the following in mind:

BLM Administrative Determinations on R.S. 2477 Rights-of-Way

Section 8 of the Mining Act of 1866 provided: "and be it further enacted, that the right-of-way for the construction of highways over public lands, not reserved for public uses, is hereby granted." The statute was self enacting; rights being established by "construction" of a "highway" on unreserved public lands, without any form of acknowledgement or action by the Federal government. This section of the statute was later re-codified as Revised Statute 2477. R.S. 2477 was repealed by FLPMA on October 21, 1976, with a savings provision for rights established prior.

The BLM does not have the authority to make binding determinations on the validity of R.S. 2477 right-of-way claims. The BLM may, however, make informal, non-binding, administrative determinations for its own land use planning and management purposes. Such determinations must be based in the particular laws of each state in which a claimed right-of-way is situated. In Utah, applicable State code provided for the acceptance of a right-of-way pursuant to R.S. 2477 across public lands not reserved for public purposes when a right-of-way had been used by the public for a continuous 10 year period.

As of February 2009, the BLM has been directed not to process or review any claims under R.S. 2477 pending further review and direction from the Secretary of the Interior.

Revised Statute 2477 (commonly known as "RS 2477") was enacted by the United States Congress in 1866 to encourage the settlement of the Western United States by the development of a system of highways. Its entire text is one sentence: "the right-of-way for the construction of highways across public lands not otherwise reserved for public purposes is hereby granted."

The original grant did not require being recorded, meaning it was self enacting, and in 1866 constructing a road often meant using a trail many times and perhaps filling low places, moving rocks and placing signs.

It granted to counties and states a right-of-way across federal land when a highway was built.

RS 2477 was repealed in 1976 under the Federal Land Policy and Management Act (FLPMA). The repeal was subject to "valid existing rights." The relevant text (Sec. 701. 43 U.S.C. 1701) reads (a) "Nothing in this Act, or in any amendment made by this Act, shall be construed as terminating any valid lease, permit, patent, right-of-way, or other land use right or authorization existing on the date of approval of this Act" [1].

Controversy

Shared-access advocates claim that neither the BLM, Forest Service nor other federal agencies, nor even private landowners have the authority to close RS 2477 roads. Their interpretation of the statute has brought them into conflict with wilderness advocates, the federal government and private landowners.

Conflicts on Federal Lands

RS 2477 has become an issue for wilderness advocacy groups because of language in the Wilderness Act of 1964. According to Section 2 (c) 3, any area to be considered for wilderness status must contain "a least five thousand acres of land or is of sufficient size as to make practicable its preservation and use in an unimpaired condition." Section 4 (c) further specifies, "Except as specifically provided for in this Act, and subject to existing private rights, there shall be no commercial enterprise and no permanent road within any wilderness area designated by this Act" [2]. Thus an RS 2477 "highway" which qualifies as a "road" could disqualify the land it traverses from being recognized by the federal government as a "wilderness" if it reduced the area under consideration beneath the 5,000 acre limit.

Access advocates have sometimes organized to reopen or maintain what they consider to be legitimate RS 2477 roads [3]. The Jarbidge Shovel Brigade is the best-known group that was formed for this purpose.

Landowners, environmental organizations, government organizations (federal, state and county) and recreational-use advocates have very different understandings of the law. Conflicts among these groups came to a head when President Bill Clinton declared the Grand Staircase-Escalante, in southern Utah, to be a National Monument. Several Utah counties have been fighting in court to assert RS 2477 claims to roads that cross federal and private property (see SUWA v BLM), including across the Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument.

Interior Secretary Ken Salazar recently authorized interior representatives to negotiate federal recognition of RS 2477 roads for which there is a clear historical record [4]. In August 2010, quiet title of the Skutumpah Road, within the Grand Staircase-Escalante National Monument, (see Kane County, Utah v United States) was granted to Kane County, Utah [5].

Conflicts on Private Lands

As western lands become developed into residential subdivisions, motorized recreationists and sportsmen are continuing to claim access rights on privately-constructed, -owned, and -maintained roads that cross private land and gated communities. Because some disputed roads were never recorded by counties, shared-access groups claim that private landowners hold property with an unrecorded public right-of-way. Property rights advocates say that failure to record a right-of-way means that there was no intention to create a public right.

Shared-access groups argue that lack of formal action by counties does not diminish the public's easement/usufruct rights through private lands. hey have engaged in threats, trespassing, and vandalism [6] to vigorously assert those rights.

Private property activists claim that nobody has access rights without a recorded easement. Shared-access activists claim that virtually all private land that used to be public can legally be traversed by the public. There is little common ground between these interpretation, so lawsuits are being fought in the western United States, and it has fallen to the courts to determine which routes are public and which are not.

Courts have applied state laws, federal laws, and federal land court rulings to resolve RS 2477 claims. Recent examples of failed attempts to assert RS 2477 rights on private property are Galli v. Idaho County (Case Number CV 36692, Second Judicial District of Idaho, 2006) and Ramey v. Boslough (Case Number 02-CV-582, Boulder County District Court, 20th Judicial District of Colorado, 2007).

Included with the formal request please find a packet of information and documents in a .pdf format.

CSHJR 40 is an in-house request from the legislature to restart our assertion that Alaska is entitled to seek access to our resources and to commerce opportunities by using transportation corridors. To date there are 670 identified RS 2477s that are being denied by federal government departments that don't want to commit.

Similar problems are being faced in other states and this resolution asks our administration to join with them to resolve the access problems facing many western states.

If you have any questions please feel free to contact my office.

I should pass along two things. The fiscal note has not been published but I am assured it is zero. Second there is a document in the list that says AG Opin (no print). It is 59 pages and will be just as easy for anyone to read electronically if they so choose.

SPONSOR STATEMENT FOR CSSB 15 (JUD)

"An Act relating to penalties for certain alcohol offenses involving persons under 21 years of age committed by a sex offender or a child kidnapper."

Senate Bill 15 makes providing alcohol for those who are under 21 years of age by a person who is required to register as a sex offender or child kidnapper.

If SB 15 is enacted, penalties will increase as follows:

- A Violation to a Class B Misdemeanor
- A Class A Misdemeanor to a Class C Felony
- A Class C Felony to a Class B Felony

According to the Anchorage Police Department, alcohol is involved in over 51.2% of sexual assaults reported in Anchorage between 2006 and 2007. Almost a fourth of those sexual assaults were perpetrated against victims between the ages of 15 and 19. Law enforcement and social service agencies all recognize a strong pattern in the use of drugs and alcohol as a "grooming" tool in an attempt to lure young people into sexual activity.

CHANGES TO SB 15:

CSSB 15 SHSS: 27-LS0119\D
Two substantive changes:
Lines 5 and 6 on page 1:
Aggravated penalties applies to:

- AS 04.16.51
  Furnishing or delivery of alcoholic beverages to persons under the age of 21.
- AS 04.16.055
  Room rental for purposes of consuming alcoholic beverages.
- AS 04.16.057
  Permitting a person under 21 years of age to possess liquor in dwelling.

The addition of AS 12.63.100 -- the definition of sex offender child kidnapper.

Changes make the bill more accurately reflect the situations where a young person may be lured into providing sexual favors for alcohol.

Fiscal Note from Department of Corrections:
From GF: $469.2 for FY 2012-2013, $821.1 for FY 2014, $1,173.0 for FY 2014-2015, $1,524.9 for FY 2016, $1,876.8 for FY 2017

CSSB 15 SJUD: 27-LS0119\E
One main change:
Line 10 on page 1:

- "who is required to register as a sex offender or child kidnapper under AS 12.63"

Change was recommended by the Department of Law.

FISCAL NOTE #1

STATE OF ALASKA
2011 LEGISLATIVE SESSION

BILL NO CSSB 15(HSS)

Analysis

This bill would elevate the offenses of furnishing alcohol to persons under the age of 21 (under AS 04.16.051 - AS 04.16.057) if the offense is committed by a sex offender or child kidnapper. For example, if the offense committed under AS 04.16.051 - AS 04.16.057 is a class C felony, the offense would be elevated to a class B felony.

Should this legislation pass, the Department of Corrections has data to support an average of 3.5 convictions per year under the following sections:

Section 1(2): if the underlying offense is a class A misemeanor, a sex offender or child kidnapper committing the offense is guilty of a class C felony and shall be punished as provided in AS 12.55;

3.5 convictions per year represents an increase of 860 mandays per year @ $136.44/da = $117.3/yr

Section 1(3) : if the underlying offense is a class C felony, a sex offender or child kidnapper committing the offense is guilty of a class B felony and shall be punished as provided in AS 12.55.

3.5 convictions per year represents an increase of 2,579 mandays per year @ $136.44/day = $351.9/yr

FISCAL NOTE #2

STATE OF ALASKA
2011 LEGISLATIVE SESSION

BILL NO. CSSB 15(HSS)

Analysis

SB 15 raises one level the severity of offenses for providing alcohol to persons under 21 years of age if the offender is a sex offender or child kidnapper. For example, a nonlicensee who furnishes alcohol to a person under 21 years of age commits a class A misdemeanor for a first offense. SB 15 would make this offense a class C felony if the offender was a sex offender or child kidnapper.

This would have an indeterminate fiscal impact on the Department of Law. Any time an offense is raised from a misdemeanor to a felony there is an impact. Felony prosecutions require more time – for example, a felony requires a grand jury indictment and a jury of 12 persons.

Re: SB 15 – Alcohol Offenses Committed by Sex Offenders, Child Kidnappers

Dear Senator Meyer,

On behalf of the Advisory Board on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse, I would like to express our support for your efforts to protect children and youth from falling victim to sexual exploitation, trafficking, and kidnapping. While there is no specific data reflecting how often a young person gains access to alcohol through a convicted sex offender or child kidnapper, there is data that shows that young people gain access to alcohol at least one third of the time from adults or friends.

The Center for Behavioral Health Statistics and Quality reported in February 2011 that, between 2006 and 2009, 93.4% of the 709,000 adolescents aged 12-14 who reported drinking alcohol gained access to the alcohol — for free — from other people. Of those, 13.5% were given the alcohol by an unrelated adult. In Alaska, 34.7% of traditional high schools students participating in the 2009 Youth Risk Behavior Survey reported that they had used alcohol in the past thirty days and that they got that alcohol from someone else. While we don't know who provided that alcohol, or whether they were a convicted sex offender or child kidnapper, we do know there is connection between providing alcohol to minors and victimization.

Recent new coverage of sexual exploitation of young Alaskan women by Channel 2, KTUU news highlighted the role of drugs and alcohol in this form of victimization. Young people are often ensnared in human trafficking and sexual exploitation through the provision of drugs and alcohol, among other "grooming" efforts. By creating an aggravating factor to target individuals who use alcohol to coerce, induce, or otherwise attempt to engage a young person in sexual activity will help to address this problem.

Given the traumatic and potentially lifelong harm that can result from situations in when predators use alcohol (and other drugs) to prey upon young people, SB 15 provides a balanced approach to increasing the penalty for individuals who engage in this sort of victimization and exploitation. We appreciate your efforts on behalf our most vulnerable youth.

Sincerely,

J. Kate Burkhart

system. These violations can be enforced by traditional criminal procedures, including the use of search warrants. State v. Euteneier, 31 P.3d 111 (Alaska Ct. App. 2001).

The trial court erred in granting a defendant's motion to suppress evidence discovered pursuant to a search warrant in a prosecution for consuming alcohol as a minor, because while consuming alcohol as a minor was classified as a violation rather than a misdemeanor, search warrants could validly be issued to investigate violations. Sec. 04.16.051. Furnishing or delivery of alcoholic beverages to persons under the age of 21. (a) A person may not furnish or deliver an alcoholic beverage to a person under the age of 21 years. This subsection does not apply to a licensee or an agent or employee of a licensee while working on licensed premises.

(b) This section does not prohibit the furnishing or delivery of an alcoholic beverage

(1) by a parent to the parent's child, by a guardian to the guardian's ward, or by a person to the legal spouse of that person if the furnishing or delivery occurs off licensed premises; or

(2) by a licensed physician or nurse to a patient in the course of administering medical treatment.

(c) Acts unlawful under AS 11.51.130 are not made legal by (b) of this section.

(d) A person acting with criminal negligence who violates this section is guilty of a class C felony if

(1) within the five years preceding the violation, the person has been previously convicted under

(A) this section; or

(B) a law or ordinance of this or another jurisdiction with elements substantially similar to this section;

(2) the person who receives the alcoholic beverage negligently causes serious physical injury to or the death of another person while under the influence of the alcoholic beverage received in violation of this section; in this paragraph,

(A) "negligently" means acting with civil negligence; and

(B) "serious physical injury" has the meaning given in AS 11.81.900; or

(3) the violation occurs within the boundaries of a municipality or the perimeter of an established village that has adopted a local option under AS 04.11.491 and has not opted out of applying a class C felony to violations of this section under AS 04.11.491(g). Effect of amendments. — The 2002 amendment, effective September 25, 2002, in subsection (d) added paragraph (2) and the paragraph (1) designation, and in paragraph (1) redesignated former paragraphs (1) and (2) as subparagraphs (A) and (B).

The 2004 amendment, effective July 1, 2004, added paragraph (d)(3) and made related stylistic changes.

The 2008 amendment, effective July 1, 2008, added the last sentence of subsection (a).

Editor's notes. — Section 32(a), ch. 124, SLA 2004, provides that the 2004 amendment of (d) of this section applies "to offenses committed on or after July 1, 2004."

Section 43(a), ch. 75, SLA 2008 provides that the 2008 amendment of (a) of this section "[applies] to an offense occurring on or after July 1, 2008."

Section 44, ch. 75, SLA 2008, explicitly declares that § 6, ch. 75, SLA 2008, amending (a) of this section, is subject to severability as authorized by AS 01.10.030.

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Contributory negligence. — Fact that injured party violated this section by providing liquor to minor causing accident does not mitigate liability of seller of liquor in violation of AS 04.16.052. Morris v. Farley Enters., Inc., 661 P.2d 167 (Alaska 1983).

Comparative negligence. — A licensee who violates this section is not entitled to assert the comparative fault of the minor/consumer, in an action for damages resulting from the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor. Loeb v. Rasmussen, 822 P.2d 914 (Alaska 1991).

Double jeopardy violation. — Trial court violated defendant's double jeopardy rights by sentencing him for both contributing to the delinquency of a minor and for furnishing alcohol to a minor for the single act of furnishing alcohol to the minor, where defendant engaged in only a single criminal act which violated two separate statutes and the two counts should have merged. Newsome v. State, 782 P.2d 689 (Alaska Ct. App. 1989).

Exceptions as affirmative defenses. — At a minimum, the exceptions specified under subsection (b) are "defenses" to criminal liability; that is, if a defendant wishes to invoke one of these exceptions, then at the very least the defendant must affirmatively raise the exception and point to some evidence from which a reasonable jury could decide that issue in his or her favor. Accordingly, where defendant presented no evidence that he had received his alcoholic beverages from a parent, guardian, or spouse, his conviction was affirmed. Trout v. State, 866 P.2d 1323 (Alaska Ct. App. 1994).

Sec. 04.16.052. Furnishing of alcoholic beverages to persons under the age of 21 by licensees. A licensee or an agent or employee of the licensee may not with criminal negligence

(1) allow another person to sell, barter, or give an alcoholic beverage to a person under the age of 21 years within licensed premises;

(2) allow a person under the age of 21 years to enter and remain within licensed premises except as provided in AS 04.16.049;

(3) allow a person under the age of 21 years to consume an alcoholic beverage within licensed premises;

(4) allow a person under the age of 21 years to sell or serve alcoholic beverages;

(5) while working on licensed premises, furnish or deliver alcoholic beverages to a person under the age of 21 years. (§ 3 ch 131 SLA 1980; am § 10 ch 109 SLA 1983; am § 7 ch 75 SLA 2008)

Effect of amendments. — The 2008 amendment, effective July 1, 2008, added paragraph (5).

Editor's notes. — Section 43(a), ch. 75, SLA 2008 provides that the 2008 amendment of this section "[applies] to an offense occurring on or after July 1, 2008."

Section 44, ch. 75, SLA 2008, explicitly declares that § 7, ch. 75, SLA 2008, amending this section, is subject to severability as authorized by AS 01.10.030.

NOTES TO DECISIONS

Negligence per se. — Violation of this section by sale of alcoholic beverages to a person under 19 by a licensee is negligence per se in a case involving resulting injuries to the customer or to others. Morris v. Farley Enters., Inc., 661 P.2d 167 (Alaska 1983) (decided under AS 04.15.020 repealed).

Proximate cause. — It was neither unforseeable nor extraordinary that the sale of liquor in violation of this section would result in the sharing of the liquor with companions and that an accident caused by companion's intoxication would result. Morris v. Farley Enters., Inc., 661 P.2d 167 (Alaska 1983) (decided under former AS 04.15.020).

Contributory negligence. — Fact that injured party violated law by providing liquor to minor causing accident does not mitigate liability of seller of liquor in violation of this section. Morris v. Farley Enters., Inc., 661 P.2d 167 (Alaska 1983) (decided under former AS 04.15.020).

Proof of patron's age. — It was reversible error for the trial court to allow the prosecution to prove a liquor establishment's patron's age, a material element of the crime for which defendant was charged (former AS 04.15.020), by admitting the patron's conviction for being a minor on a liquor premises in evidence. SB 30

An Act providing for the release of property in the custody of a law enforcement agency to the owner under certain conditions

SB 30 introduces within the Alaska Code of Criminal Procedure a process for victims of property crime to petition the court for relief in recovering their property held as evidence.

All too often victims of theft and robbery are victimized a second time by bureaucracy. This is particularly true in cases of property crimes where demonstrable loss occurs to the victim's person or business as a result of property being held for a protracted period of time by a law enforcement agency, usually at the direction of prosecution, defense counsel and/or other interested parties.

The law as currently written, provides discretionary authority to the prosecution for release of property, but does not clearly provide a right of hearing for a property owner to directly petition the court in those circumstances when property owners, prosecution and defense cannot come to agreement on return of property to the owner.

Victims of property theft often face the added burden of replacing stolen property. Small business owners who suffer property loss may face bankruptcy if the theft of property results in the inability to consummate a sale, continue their business operations, or the stolen property is uninsured or underinsured.

Property recovered by a law enforcement agency may be held as evidence for months or years. Property owners deserve protections in the law to ensure their property is held as evidence only as long as necessary for the prosecution and defense to physically retain the item, without jeopardizing the case.

SB 30 will provide property owners in the Alaska Code of Criminal Procedure, a clearly identifiable process to petition the court for the recovery of their property in those circumstances where they are otherwise not able to reach agreement with interested parties on the return of the property.

SECTION ANALYSIS – CS SB30 (2d JUD)

1. Provides that a crime victim who is the owner of property in the custody of a law enforcement agency may request the agency for the return of their property through the Office of Victims' Rights (OVR).

2. OVR will file the request with the agency after conducting an investigation into the request to make an initial determination if the crime victim is entitled to return of the property being claimed under the requirements of proposed 12.36.070(c): the crime victim provides satisfactory proof of ownership, and the party that objects to the return of the property fails to prove that the property must be retained by the agency for evidentiary purposes.

3. Once OVR makes such a determination, they will request on behalf of the crime victim that the agency return the property.

4. Within 10 days after receipt of request and following reasonable notice to prosecution, defense and other interested parties, the agency will request a hearing before the court to determine if the property shall be released to the crime victim.

5. The court of jurisdiction is identified in cases involving a pending criminal case and in situations where no criminal case is pending.

6. Establishes the burden of proof to be a preponderance of the evidence, for both the crime victim showing ownership and the objecting party proving the property must be retained by the agency.

7. Establishes that if the court orders the return of the property to the crime victim, the court may impose reasonable conditions on the return to maintain the evidentiary integrity of the property.

8. Identifies the term crime victim as having the meaning given to victim in AS 12.55.185, the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Section 2

1. Establishes within Title 24, Chapter 65 Office of Victims' Rights the authority of OVR to request a law enforcement agency for return of property on behalf of a crime victim claiming property after conducting an investigation as proscribed in AS 12.36.070(c).

2. Provides that the victims' advocate may use any of the powers granted to the advocate under Title 24, Chapter 65.

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act providing for the release of certain property in the custody of a law enforcement agency to a crime victim under certain conditions and relating to requests for that release by the office of victims' rights."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 12.36 is amended by adding a new section to read:

Sec. 12.36.070. Return of property by hearing. (a) A crime victim who is the owner of property not belonging to a law enforcement agency that is in the custody of the agency under this chapter may request that the office of victims' rights request that the agency return the property to the crime victim. The request under this subsection shall be filed by the office of victims' rights on behalf of the crime victim after the office has conducted an investigation and has concluded that the crime victim is entitled to the return of the property under the factors listed in (c) of this section.

(b) Within 10 days after receipt of a request under (a) of this section and following reasonable notice to the prosecution, defense, and other interested parties, the agency shall request a hearing before the court to determine if the property shall be released to the crime victim. If the property is being held in connection with a criminal case, the hearing shall be before the court with jurisdiction of the criminal case. If no criminal case is pending regarding the property, the hearing shall be before a district or superior court where the property is located.

(c) At the hearing, a party that objects to the return of the property shall state the reason on the record. After a hearing, the court may order the return of the property in the custody of a law enforcement agency to the crime victim if

(1) the crime victim by a preponderance of the evidence provides satisfactory proof of ownership; and

(2) the party that objects to the return of the property fails to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the property must be retained by the agency for evidentiary purposes under the provisions of this chapter or another law.

(d) If the court orders the return of the property to the crime victim, the court may impose reasonable conditions on the return. Those conditions may include an order that the crime victim retain and store the property so that the property is available for future court hearings, requiring photographs of the property to be taken, or any other condition the court considers necessary to maintain the evidentiary integrity of the property.

(e) In this section, "crime victim" has the meaning given to "victim" in AS 12.55.185.

 Sec. 2. AS 24.65 is amended by adding a new section to read:

Sec. 24.65.115. Authority to request return of property on behalf of certain persons. Notwithstanding another provision of this chapter, the victims' advocate may file a request under AS 12.36.070 with a law enforcement agency for the return of property to a crime victim after having conducted an investigation and determining that the crime victim is entitled to the return of the property under the factors listed in AS 12.36.070(c). In fulfilling the requirements of this section, the victims' advocate may use any of the powers granted to the advocate under this chapter.

CS SB30(2d JUD) - EXPLANATION OF CHANGES

The substantive changes to SB 30 since introduction on 01/19/11 are as follows:

1. The use of the term owner was changed to crime victim out of a concern that bill language would allow for defendants to misuse the return of property hearing process, and detract from the intention of the bill, to promote victims' rights by returning property to crime victims.
2. The introduction of the Office of Victims' Rights to the return of property process was done to alleviate a concern that bill language may inadvertently open the door to a significant number of requests for return of property hearings from crime victims, and that a required intermediary step be considered to vet the requests to make a pre-determination concerning eligibility of crime victims to have their property returned to them.
3. Original bill language permitted property owners to directly request from a law enforcement agency the return of their property. For reasons mentioned in #2, the current version provides that the Office of Victims' Rights files a request with the law enforcement agency on behalf of the crime victim for return of property.
4. Original bill language required the law enforcement agency to prove that the agency or another interested party is authorized to retain possession of the property. Judiciary committee members and the Office of Public Defender recommended that the party that objects to the return of the property should be the entity with the burden of proof that the property should be retained and not returned to the crime victim.
5. Department of Law requested the following changes in cooperation with the bill sponsor –
    a. Clarification of court jurisdiction when the property in question is part of a criminal case, and when it is not part of a criminal case.
    b. An evidentiary standard of proof be established to guide the Court with decisions of whether the burden of proof is met by the parties. The standard is a preponderance of the evidence.
    c. The party who objects to the return of property to a crime victim shall state the reason on the record.
    d. Clarifies the reasonable conditions the court may impose on the return of property to crime victims to maintain the evidentiary integrity of the property.
6. The term crime victim is defined as the meaning given to victim in AS 12.55.185, Alaska Code of Criminal Procedure.
7. Consistent with the changes identified in #2, the current version of SB 30 establishes within Title 24, Chapter 65 – Office of Victims' Rights, the authority of OVR to request a law enforcement agency for return of property on behalf of a crime victim.

RE Senate Bill 30

Dear Senator Dyson,

On behalf of the National Federation of Independent Business/Alaska, I wish to express our support for Senate Bill 30. The National Federation of Independent Business is the largest small-business advocacy group in Alaska.

SB 30 would provide a mechanism for businesses that have had property stolen to gain assistance in recovering the items that are often critical to the continuation of a person's business.

While often there is not a problem retrieving property from authorities that are prosecuting a case, there are times when small businesses find that they are not considered as important as other issues. SB 30 provides the person assistance from the office of victims' rights to help recover stolen property being held by a law enforcement agency.

While the problem of retrieving stolen property is not always a problem, small businesses have found themselves fighting the government who has bottomless resources. The legal cost and loss of business are a very heavy burden to small businesses.

We believe that CSSB 30 is a reasonable solution to a potentially devastating problem for small businesses.

Sincerely yours,

Dennis L. DeWitt

January 5, 2011 one of our employees was involved in a traffic accident on the Sterling Highway. Another driver lost control of her vehicle, crossed the road and ran into our vehicle. She was not wearing a seatbelt, was thrown from her vehicle, and consequently died on scene. The State Troopers confiscated our vehicle and trailer and have kept it in their impound yard in Soldotna since that time.

It has been 13 months since that accident with no police report or indication that we will be able to get our equipment back any time soon, nor are we able to make a settlement with the insurance company. If we were a smaller business than we are, we would be out of business by not having access to our equipment to continue to operate. Renting equipment to replace what is in impound until the case is settled would be a financial burden we would have to incur until the troopers complete their paperwork.

We would like to see this process improved with a timelier turnaround for the parties involved so that life and business can continue. It is just as hard on the deceased family to have to go through this again a year or more later with an insurance claim as it is for the injured parties.

If this is due to the legal system then it needs to change. If it is the political system this needs to change. We need decisions made right away when everything is fresh in people's minds, not six months or one to two years after and the file has sat on someone's desk.

BILL NO. CSSB 30 (2nd JUD)

Analysis

In the last four years, the OVR has received only a few requests from crime victims regarding the return of property held by a criminal justice agency during the course of a criminal prosecution. It is anticipated that current OVR staff and resources exist to process requests associated with SB 30. If more OVR resources are needed to fulfill the mandate of SB 30, it is believed additional funding and/or resources may be obtained in the future to satisfy the requirements of SB 30.

FISCAL NOTE #3

STATE OF ALASKA
2012 LEGISLATIVE SESSION

BILL NO. CSSB 30(2d JUD)

Analysis

This bill amends AS 12.36 by adding a new section regarding the return of property in the custody of a law enforcement agency. This legislation specifies that the owner of property in the custody of a law enforcement agency may request that the agency return the property. Further, that within 10 days of the request and following reasonable notice to all involved parties, a request for a court hearing shall be made.

Currently it is the standard practice of the department to return seized personal property as soon as possible. This legislation will not have a significant impact on the workload of the department.

Analysis

SB 30 would adopt a procedure for the owner of property to request the Office of Victims' Rights to investigate whether property in the custody of law enforcement should be returned to them. The Victims' Advocate may, after an investigation, request that a hearing about the property be held. This note is indeterminate because the department may be required to represent law enforcement agencies at the hearings proposed in the bill. At this time we are not sure how many of these proceedings will occur. The issues raised may be complex, particularly if defense counsel opposes the return.

ALASKA STATE LEGISLATURE

SENATOR JOE THOMAS

Senate Bill 31:
An Act relating to the counting of write-in votes.

Sponsor Statement

"We start with the bedrock principle that the right of the citizens to cast their ballot and thus participate in the selection of those who control their government is one of the fundamental prerogatives of citizenship."
- Alaska Supreme Court, (Miller v. Treadwell)

Last fall, Alaskans reelected Lisa Murkowski to the United States Senate as a write-in candidate with nearly 100,000 votes statewide, something not witnessed by our nation in over fifty years. Because of the unique nature of write-in votes and confusion in state statute there was substantial debate over the validity of nearly 12,000 ballots. In the suit that followed, (Miller v. Treadwell), Joe Miller argued that these ballots should not be counted because the name written was not identical to the way Senator Murkowski's name appeared on her declaration of candidacy. Superior Court Judge William Carey and the Alaska Supreme Court both ruled against this argument, finding that judging the validity of a ballot based on the intent of the voter is paramount.

Much of this case centered on the interpretation of state statute regarding the counting of ballots. Each court, in their findings, including Federal District Judge Ralph Bieistline, found that AS 15.15.360 was badly worded and left open for legitimate debate. Senate Bill 31 looks to address this language by inserting a section that would place the intention of the voter above minor variations, mismarks or abbreviations.

Senate Bill 31 follows on over fifty years of consistent precedent in support of a voter's intent and enfranchisement. In strengthening this statute by inserting federally recognized language from the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act, SB 31 will reduce potential future litigation while strengthening the public's perception of Alaska's democratic process.

I urge you to join me in supporting Senate Bill 31.

Memorandum

TO: Senator Joe Thomas
FROM: Susan Warner, Legislative Analyst
DATE: January 21, 2011
RE: Legal History of Counting Write-in Votes in Alaska
LRS Report 11.113

You asked about the history in Alaska of write-in vote counting. You were particularly interested in legal precedents, and you asked for copies of pertinent decisions.

Within certain parameters defined by the U.S. Constitution, states have the authority to make their own election laws, and most states allow voters to write in the name of a candidate who is not listed on the ballot. Legal challenges occur most often in close races; courts then attempt to balance the constitutional right of citizens to elect the person of their choice against state laws that are designed to ensure efficient and orderly elections, among other things. The Alaska Supreme Court has consistently held that the right of citizens to select their government representatives is a fundamental prerogative of citizenship and should not be impaired or destroyed by "strained" statutory constructions.[1] As such, the Court in the most recent case (Miller v. Treadwell, 2010) held as follows:

> Voter intent is paramount, and any misspelling, abbreviation, or other minor variation in the form of the candidate's name on a write-in ballot does not invalidate a ballot so long as the intention of the voter can be ascertained.[2]

Alaska Voting Law

As you know, Alaska law does not allow write-in voting during primary elections, but provisions must be made for write-in voting on general election ballots. Alaska's rules for counting write-in ballots specify that a vote for a write-in candidate "shall be counted" if the oval is filled in and if the candidate's last name, or the candidate's name as it appears on the declaration of candidacy, is written in the space provided.[3] The law further specifies that the rules on counting ballots are, without exception, mandatory.

Miller v. Treadwell

Voter intent prevailed in litigation over the counting of write-in ballots in Alaska's 2010 U.S. Senate race. Joe Miller, the Republican senate candidate on the general ballot, argued that write-in votes for his opponent should not have been counted unless the candidate's name was spelled flawlessly. The Alaska Supreme Court ruled against Mr. Miller in Miller v. Treadwell, and the Court opinion begins with powerful language in support of voter enfranchisement. The Court proclaims that a citizen's right to vote is of profound importance; key to participatory democracy; and a polar, cardinal, and bedrock principle. The Court also notes that such longstanding principles have been consistently applied to election issues in Alaska over the past 50 years.

[2] Miller v. Treadwell, Alaska Supreme Court No. S-14112, December 22, 2010. Please note the recitation of pertinent case history entitled "Longstanding Alaska Election Principles" on page 2 of that decision (Attachment B).

[3] AS 15.15.360(a)(11).

Mr. Miller had argued that Alaska statutory language excludes any vote that is not spelled perfectly. The Superior Court held that if the legislature intended a candidate's name to be spelled perfectly, legislators would have used words like exactly, precisely, or perfectly.[4] The Supreme Court agreed and held that Alaska's statutory language is meant to be inclusive rather than exclusive:

> It is designed to ensure that ballots are counted, not excluded. And this inclusiveness is consistent with the overarching purpose of an election: to ascertain the public will. . . . Voter intent is paramount, and any misspelling, abbreviation, or other minor variation in the form of the candidate's name on a write-in ballot does not invalidate a ballot so long as the intention of the voter can be ascertained.

Additionally, the Court noted that Alaskan voters arrive at their polling places with a variety of backgrounds and capabilities, including some being raised without English as their first language, and such issues should not take away a person's right to decide which candidate to elect:

> We must construe the statute's language in light of the purpose of preserving a voter's choice rather than ignoring it.

Legal Precedents

The decision reached in Miller v. Treadwell reflects the tendency for all U.S. courts to favor voter intent over ambiguous statutory language, but election scholar Richard Hasen asserts that the Alaska Supreme Court—even before Miller—appears to have gone the furthest in giving emphasis to voter intent.[5] Alaska's 1978 precedent-setting case, Carr v. Thomas, involved the question of counting certain ballots, and Alaska's highest court declared that the state would need "clear and unmistakable" statutory language to take away a citizen's right to have his or her voted counted.

Alaska courts have consistently emphasized the importance of voter intent. The decisions for the following Alaska cases are attached to this document:

- Willis v. Thomas, 600 P.2d 1079 (1979). The Alaska Supreme Court depended on a determination of voter intent in ruling on the results of a recount of ballots in Senate District F (Attachment D).
- Fischer v. Stout, 741 P.2d 217 (1987). The Alaska Supreme Court ruled on whether certain votes or classes of votes were properly counted or rejected in the 1986 race for Senate District H. The Court held that ballots marked with a pen rather than punched still showed clear voter intent and should be counted (Attachment E).
- Finkelstein v. Stout, 774 P.2d 786 (1989). The Alaska Supreme Court ruled on a ballot recount for Seat A in House District 13. The Court considered voter intent with regard to questioned signatures on absentee ballots (Attachment F).
- Edgmon v. Moses, 152 P.3d 1154 (2007). The Alaska Supreme Court ruled on the results of a recount in the District 37 Democratic primary. Considering ballot markings, the Court found that marks clearly intended as votes should be counted (Attachment G).

Addressing Irregular Write-in Votes in Other States

Although Alaska statute does not address the inevitable misspellings and illegibility of written-in names, many states attempt to clarify how such votes will be counted, and these rules always give primacy to voter intent. There are variations among states, but this directive, by its very nature, is subjective and gives vote-counters the authority to determine who a voter intended to elect. Here are examples from four states:

- California accepts a "reasonable facsimile" of a write-in candidate's name (Cal. Elec. Code § 15342).
- Nebraska will count a write-in vote without the first name of the candidate, and the write-in name must be "reasonably close to the proper spelling" (Neb. Rev. Stat. § 32-615).
- Delaware allows for a "misspelled or minor variation" of a write-in candidate (Del. Code Ann. Title 15, § 4972 (b)(8)).
- Washington election officials are required to "exercise all reasonable efforts to determine the voter's intent (WAC 434-262-160).

Some states provide further guidance on counting irregular write-in votes. Washington State has an extensive, pictorial booklet on how election officials are expected to count nearly every deviation from what might be considered a standard marking, including samples of acceptable and unacceptable write-in votes. Attachment H is the portion of the booklet that deals with write-in votes, and the entire document can be viewed at http://www.sos.wa.gov/_assets/elections/2009StatewideStandardsonWhatisaVote.pdf.

We hope this is helpful. If you have questions or need additional information, please let us know.

Our view: No doubt

State smart to review election, need for any changes in law

(01/03/11 19:17:26)

When federal Judge Ralph Beistline tossed Joe Miller's challenge to Alaska's U.S. Senate election, he granted that Alaska's law could be clearer about the primacy of voter intent.

He was right.

The requirement that a write-in candidate's name be written as it appears in its state-qualified form led to the arguments over spelling and how close voters had to be.

In addition, the state's decision to provide, at voters' request, lists of qualified write-in candidates prompted unsuccessful suits by both the Republican and Democratic parties.

While we disagreed with the Division of Elections on the latter point, state courts upheld their call. And the division ran a straight, fair election.

Lawmakers, however, should revisit the law to make clear that voter intent, not spelling, is the key test in deciding which write-in votes count, and to decide whether write-in lists either will or won't be provided at polling places in the future.

The division did well by Alaskans. But clarity in the law may help keep future elections out of court.

BOTTOM LINE: Election law should leave no room for doubt.

No 'spelling bee' election in Alaska

Ruth Walker | Christian Science Monitor | Dec 7, 2010

The 2010 elections, the gift that keeps on giving, have imparted new meaning to the phrase "all over but the shouting."

At this writing, Lisa Murkowski looks likely to be headed back to Washington as Alaska's senior senator and into the history books as the first candidate since Strom Thurmond in 1954 to win election to the Senate as a write-in. Her victory, if confirmed, as is now expected, will turn in part on a decision to honor ballots from voters who merely approximated the correct spelling of her name.

How should we feel about that? Are standards slipping irretrievably in the republic?

Her Democratic opponent has conceded defeat. But her Republican opponent, Joe Miller, whose own name was easier to spell and was, moreover, actually on the ballot, has had other ideas.

His campaign has challenged all ballots that fall short orthographically. State authorities, on the other hand, have been counting as valid all those who came close to spelling "Murkowski" right.

Alaskan law requires electoral officials to take into account "voter intent" when counting write-in votes. This standard is common across the country, it turns out. The Los Angeles Times quoted Richard Winger, editor of the election law journal Ballot Access News: "I am not aware of any state that says write-ins can't be counted unless the spelling is perfect."

As a copy editor, I'm with Mr. Miller. What kind of democracy can't spell its leaders' names right? As a student of language, though, I understand that spoken language came first, and that the written form of any word is an approximation of the spoken form; it's not the other way around. After all, there's a reason we call it "language" - from the Latin word for "tongue" - and not "scribblage," or something like that.

The case for a more generous interpretation of what counts as a valid vote for a write-in candidate starts with this primacy of spoken language.

Much of what we recognize as democracy began with spoken language, conversations, and debates in halls of assembly and the public square. Democracy was then furthered by written communication, especially after the development of the printing press.

More recently, speech has gained a boost from new forms of communication - from FDR's fireside chats to YouTube - that have let us hear, and hear repeatedly, what we otherwise might only have read.

Of course we need both modes: Writing - "print" - allows for rereading, for reflection and the consideration of nuance. Speech, especially live, in-person speech, provides immediacy and the expression of feelings.

Fix the law: Write-in ballot statute needs repair by Legislature

12.30.10 - 11:53 pm
Editorial

Federal Judge Ralph Beistline wrote in his Tuesday ruling dismissing Joe Miller's amended federal lawsuit in the U.S. Senate race that he can understand Mr. Miller's viewpoint regarding the wording of state election law.

Judge Beistline also said he can easily see the state's view when it comes to the law governing how a write-in candidate's name must appear on the ballot in order to be considered a valid vote.

The judge ultimately deferred to the Alaska Supreme Court, which ruled in Mr. Miller's state lawsuit that the name of Sen. Lisa Murkowski didn't have to be spelled correctly. Mr. Miller argued, in both state and federal court, that Alaska law required a precise spelling.

But Judge Beistline found the Alaska Supreme Court "did not make a finding clearly contrary to the face of the statute and its findings were entirely consistent with the state's past practice of making voter intent a priority."

But the judge, in his ruling, pointedly noted a problem:

"This is not to say that Miller's technical arguments are frivolous, for it is easy to understand his view ...

"What we have before us is a poorly drafted state statute. Wisdom would suggest the Alaska Legislature act to clarify it to avoid similar disputes in the future. For now we have to work with what we have and that is what the Alaska Supreme Court has done."

Judge Beistline's message is clear and sound: The Legislature should clarify the law. It should do so this coming session while the subject is fresh.

Supreme Court takes reasonable approach in election challenge

by Dermot Cole / cole@newsminer.com

Dec 22 2010 | 757 views | 0 | | 5 | | |

FAIRBANKS — The Alaska Supreme Court said it relied on principles applied consistently during the past 50 years to reject Joe Miller's court case and approve the state's approach to counting ballots.

The decision Wednesday helps clear the way for Sen. Lisa Murkowski's re-election to be certified before the next Congress. Miller may pursue a federal court fight, however.

This unanimous ruling is not surprising, given the numerous decisions the court has made in contested elections over the years. The ruling also is reasonable.

The court declared that Miller is dead wrong in claiming state law requires the names of write-in candidates be spelled correctly.

"Our prior decisions clearly hold that a voter's intention is paramount," the four justices said. "In light of our strong and consistently applied policy of construing statutes in order to effectuate voter intent, we hold that abbreviations, misspellings or other minor variations in the form of the name of a candidate will be disregarded in determining the validity of the ballot, so long as the intention of the voter can be ascertained."

The court rejected Miller's argument that anything less than his point of view, supporting correct spelling, would threaten the integrity of the election process.

"But it is Miller's interpretation of the statute that would erode the integrity of the election system, because it would result in disenfranchisement of some voters and ultimately rejection of election results that constitute the will of the people," the judges said. "We have consistently construed election statutes in favor of voter enfranchisement."

The court also found its interpretation of state law is consistent with federal and state rules allowing misspellings on the federal write-in absentee ballot for military voters and civilians overseas.

"Miller's proposed construction of the statute would require us to impose a different, and more rigorous, voting standard on domestic Alaskans than on those who are serving in the military or living abroad," the court said.

Other states use the same approach as Alaska in counting ballots and "we see no basis for Miller to argue that the application of the standard in this election violates equal protection under either the state or federal constitution."

The portion of state law Miller said requires perfect spelling really applies to pseudonyms, the court said.

"The 'nickname' field allows a candidate to ensure that his or her pseudonym 'appears on the write-in declaration of candidacy' so that the write-in votes listing that pseudonym will count. Thus, the word 'appears' relates to a pseudonym's possible presence on the ballot, not the particular form of the vote and demonstrates that the statute is inclusive — it is designed to include, rather than exclude, votes."

Quotes of significance to Senate Bill 31 from the 2010 United States Senate Race Court Findings

"AS 15.15.360(a)(11) may not be well written, and it is clearly subject to different interpretations...AS 15.15.360, in general, is terse and somewhat unclear in comparison to the other state statutues. The statute, as Miller reveals, does lack the express language that most states have adopted which permits minor misspellings and errors." - Miller v. Campbell, pg. 15 Superior Court Judge William Carey

"While the issue may be moot, the public interest exception applies...this scenario is certainly susceptible to repetition any time a major write in effort for election to a public office in Alaska occurs." - Miller v. Campbell, pg. 8 Superior Court Judge William Carey

"We start with the bedrock principle that "the right of the citizens to cast their ballot and thus participate in the selection of those who control their government is one of the fundamental prerogatives of citizenship." - Alaska Supreme Court Miller v. Treadwell pg. 3

"In light of our strong and consistently applied policy of construing statutes in order to effectuate voter intent, we hold that abbreviations, misspellings or other minor variations in the form of the name of a candidate will be disregarded in determining the validity of the ballot, so long as the intention of the voter can be ascertained." - Alaska Supreme Court Miller v. Treadwell pg. 6

"Our interpretation of AS 15.15.360...is also consistent with the federally mandated standard for counting write in votes for those voters living or serving in uniform overseas. The Uniformed and Overseas citizens Absentee Voting Act provides that in counting the ballot of a uniformed voter or other voter who is overseas "any abbreviation, misspelling, or other minor variation in the form of the name of a candidate or political party shall be disregarded in determining the validity of the ballot if the intention of the voter can be ascertained." - Alaska Supreme Court Miller v. Treadwell pg. 7

"The Alaska Supreme Court did not make a finding clearly contrary to the face of the statute and its findings were entirely consistent with the State's past practices of making voter intent a priority. This is not to say that Miller's technical arguments are frivolous, for it is easy to understand his view as to the proper interpretation of AS 15.15.360 (a)(11). But it is just as easy to accept the interpretation given by the Alaska Supreme Court. What we have before us is a poorly drafted state statute. Wisdom would suggest that the Alaska Legislature act to clarify it to avoid similar disputes in the future." – Federal District Court Judge Ralph Beistline pg. 7

Divining Votes: Which Intent, Whose Discretion?
By Matt Johnson (Scribe) on April 8th, 2011

Senate Bill 31 is being offered by its sponsors as a remedy for Alaska's "flawed" write-in statute. It seems the Legislature is understandably rather anxious to put the 2010 election in its rear view mirror. The bill took less than a month to clear two Senate committees, the Senate Floor, and be read across the House Floor before State Affairs Committee Chairman Bob Lynn put a hold on it, pending the Lt. Governor's 2010 Election Review report.

Now that the report is on the table, the torrid pace is back. SB 31 passed out of the House State Affairs Committee yesterday and is on the docket in the House Judiciary Committee for today pending referral by the Speaker's office.

At the risk of sounding pedantic, I would humbly suggest further deliberation might be in order before we rush to judgment on misguided change that fails to address the sponsor's intent, or improve Alaska's election laws.

The sponsor has stated two objectives in proffering the statutory changes: "to clarify state statute and ensure that in future election(s) as many Alaskans as possible are enfranchised," and "to tighten statutory language and strengthen the public perception of Alaska's democratic process."

Clarifying the situation might be more difficult than one might expect at first glance. Adding voter intent language is well and good, if it is invested with concrete legal content. However, SB 31 offers an amorphous standard that does no such thing. Proponents of the bill would have you believe that inserting "voter intent" language simpliciter, and punting to the director's discretion makes all the controversy of 2010 just go away. But if voter intent only means whatever the latest DOE director wants it to mean, we have only further muddied the waters.

Take, for example, what happened during the write-in count last fall. The non-statutory voter intent "law" deployed by the Director wound up looking a whole lot more like arbitrary and capricious, than the "reasonable, common sense" standard it was purported to be. Despite the Dept. of Law's testimony that a "common sense phonetic standard" was used, the reality on the ground was quite different. In fact, none of us who were actually there knew for sure what exactly the standard was, and it didn't help that DOE was not forthcoming with information.

In addition to the phonetic standard, I was told by DOE personnel working the floor that they thought the standard was two letters misspelled, and three would disqualify a ballot. I also heard it was two syllables. "Even [the Murkowski team] seemed unsure of the exact standard Ms. Fenumiai was applying," said New York Times reporter Bill Yardley in a Nov. 10, 2010 article. He went on to quote Murkowski spokesman John Tracy as saying, "it appears to me that there's about a three letter standard." Anyone now suggesting that there was a defined standard is engaged in some very creative revisionist history.

Whatever the "standard" actually was, it is difficult in the extreme to figure out by any definition of "phonetic," or its cognates, how the Director arrived at the decision to count the following ballots for Lisa Murkowski: "Muskisk," "Moukoky," "Murcosaga," "Mulkalkie," etc. Then there were a number of rather vulgar mutations and permutations not fit for polite company that the director mysteriously divined to be intended for Murkowski.

This was a similar scenario to Bush v. Gore in 2000, with the exception that, by analogy, in Florida the hanging chads were not counted, and in Alaska they were. And while the courts ruled that there was a consistent standard applied throughout on account of one person reviewing all of the challenged ballots, it was manifestly a specious argument. The courts did not shut down the case against DOE for lack of evidence, but for want of courage. Discovery would have revealed, essentially, no standard at all. If voter intent is not clearly defined, we can expect more litigation in the future. And it just might be that a judge will summon the moral fortitude to grant discovery next time. If so, this will not end well.

What could happen in the future if we continue to embrace the "standard" deployed in 2010, and make them statutory? Suppose we used any, or a combination, of the aforementioned rules to define our "voter intent" standard. Then suppose Tim Smith runs as the Democratic candidate for US House, and Tim Smythe runs for the same as a write-in candidate. Suppose also that SB 31 is now statutory. If there were enough write-in votes to cast the election in doubt, under her/his broad discretionary powers, the Director of DOE could unilaterally decide who won the election. Because under the aforementioned standards both of the candidates could qualify to receive all of the write-in votes cast for any variation of Tim Smith/Smythe.

I'm reminded of a famous quote attributed to Joseph Stalin: "Those who cast the votes decide nothing; those who count the votes decide everything." No one person should be granted the power to exercise that kind of discretion, especially an unelected bureaucrat. Under such a regime, enfranchisement would be the franchise of the director.

Granted, that's a worst case scenario, but such a law should do nothing to inspire public confidence in the system. So on all counts laid out by the sponsor, the bill fails. It doesn't tighten up the statute or provide clarity; it doesn't ultimately enfranchise, and it doesn't inspire public confidence. The only thing it really does is affirm the director's decisions and provide a rubber stamp for the courts. It appears to be more about justifying the past than securing the future. Not a good way to go about public policy.

While I am not sanguine about the prospects of this or future DOE directors divining voter intent, I do see more controversy in store for Alaska's future if SB 31 is allowed to masquerade as a solution to our problems.

HOUSE CS FOR CS FOR SENATE BILL NO. 31(STA)

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA

TWENTY-SEVENTH LEGISLATURE - FIRST SESSION

BY THE HOUSE STATE AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Offered: Referred:

Sponsor(s): SENATORS THOMAS, FRENCH, MENARD, AND WIELECHOWSKI

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to the counting of write-in votes."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 15.15.360 is amended by adding a new subsection to read:

(d) Write-in votes shall be counted according to the following rules:

(1) writing in the name of a candidate whose name is printed on the ballot does not invalidate a write-in vote unless the director determines, on the basis of other evidence, that the ballot was so marked for the purpose of identifying the ballot;

(2) in order to vote for a write-in candidate, the voter must write in the candidate's name in the space provided and fill in the oval opposite the candidate's name in accordance with (a)(1) of this section;

(3) a vote for a write-in candidate, other than a write-in vote for governor and lieutenant governor, shall be counted if the oval is filled in for that candidate and if the name of the candidate, as it appears on the write-in declaration of candidacy, or the last name of the candidate is written in the space provided;

(4) if the write-in vote is for governor and lieutenant governor, the vote shall be counted if the oval is filled in and the names of the candidates for governor and lieutenant governor, as they appear on the write-in declaration of candidacy, or the last names of the candidates for governor and lieutenant governor, or the name of the candidate for governor, as it appears on the write-in declaration of candidacy, or the last name of the candidate for governor is written in the space provided;

(5) in counting votes for a write-in candidate, the director shall disregard any abbreviation, misspelling, or other minor variation in the form of the name of a candidate if the intention of the voter can be ascertained.

* Sec. 2. AS 15.15 is amended by adding a new section to read:

Sec. 15.15.365. Counting of write-in votes in general election. (a) Write-in votes on a general election ballot shall be counted by candidate only if the aggregate of all votes cast for all write-in candidates for the particular office is

(1) the highest number of votes received by any candidate for the office; or

(2) the second highest number of votes received by any candidate and the difference between the total number of votes received by the candidate having the highest number of votes and the aggregate of all votes cast for all write-in candidates for the office is less than the percentage necessary for a recount at the state's cost under AS 15.20.450.

(b) Write-in votes that do not meet the requirements of this section may not be individually counted under this section.

(c) If the director determines that the requirements of (a) of this section have been met, the director shall establish the date for counting those write-in votes, and the director, or a designee of the director, shall count all write-in ballots under AS 15.15.360(d).

(d) This section does not apply to the counting of federal write-in absentee ballots submitted under 42 U.S.C. 1973ff.

(e) Write-in ballots shall be counted by the director, or a designee of the director, in a public place at the location where write-in ballots are sent for counting following an election.

* Sec. 3. AS 15.15.360(a)(9), 15.15.360(a)(10), 15.15.360(a)(11), and 15.15.360(a)(12) are repealed.

MEMORANDUM April 7, 2011

SUBJECT: Conceptual amendment to CSSB 31(STA) adopted into HCS CSSB 31(STA) (Work Order No. 27-LS0350\X)

TO: Representative Bob Lynn
Chair of the House State Affairs Committee
Attn: Nancy Manly

FROM: Alpheus Bullard
Legislative Counsel

This memorandum accompanies the bill described above. I have one comment.

The House State Affairs Committee adopted a conceptual amendment to the bill's sec. 15.15.365(c).

That subsection provides:

> (c) If the director determines that the requirements of (a) of this section have been met, the director shall establish the place and date for counting those write-in votes, and the director, or a designee of the director, shall count all write-in ballots under AS 15.15.360(d).

As conceptually amended, it would provide:

> (c) If the director determines that the requirements of (a) of this section have been met, the director shall establish the ~~place and~~ date for counting those write-in votes which shall occur at the public place where the ballots are physically shipped following the elections, and the director, or a designee of the director, shall count all write-in ballots under AS 15.15.360(d).

I understand this conceptual amendment to require that write-in ballots be counted in a public place. Other intended effects of the conceptual amendment are less clear to me. It seems that write-in ballots are necessarily going to be counted at a location where the ballots are. Under this CS, can the ballots be sent to the division and then transferred to a public place that will better accommodate the counting of the ballots?

After listening to the minutes of the committee hearing, I've drafted the conceptual amendment as an additional subsection that reads:

> (e) Write-in ballots shall be counted by the director, or a designee of the director, in a public place at the location where write-in ballots are sent for counting following an election.

Please let me know if my change is faithful to the intentions of the committee.

2010 General Election Review
Executive Summary
Office of Lieutenant Governor Mead Treadwell

In December 2010, after Governor Sean Parnell and Lieutenant Governor Mead Treadwell signed final paperwork to certify the 2010 United States Senate election, the Lt. Governor announced he would conduct a review of the state's election procedures and statutes. The historic write-in campaign by Senator Lisa Murkowski revealed sections of election law and procedures that were yet untested, and many Alaskans became more aware of election procedures.

The following 2010 Election Review report by the Office of the Lieutenant Governor, the Division of Elections and the Department of Law, includes an analysis of election law and procedures as well as feedback from stakeholders, political parties, and most importantly, Alaska's voters. The report responds to observations and concerns made by Alaskans, and offers a recommendation for change or retraction of current procedures, Alaska State Statute and or regulation for each issue.

A key change recommended as a result of this review is intended to make it easier for Alaskans serving in the military to vote. Those recommendations include changing the date of the primary to make sure ballots for a general election can be in the mail in time for service members overseas, allowing other electronic forms of transmission – besides faxes – of ballots back to Alaska, and working with the Redistricting Board and the Department of Defense to facilitate reopening of polling places on Alaska's military bases.

Other key recommendations include changes to state law to clarify procedures for counting write-in ballots and making the declaration of candidacy for a write-in candidate voluntary. Perhaps the single most important finding in the review is that no change in procedure or state law recommended would have changed the outcome of the 2010 General Election.

Our heartfelt thanks goes out to those who worked so tirelessly on the 2010 General Election, including former Lieutenant Governor Craig Campbell, division personnel, attorneys from the Department of Law, candidates, and especially the volunteers who so selflessly gave their time and energy to bring the election to a conclusion. And thanks are due to Alaskans for taking their time to submit comments, to stakeholders for meeting with the Lieutenant Governor, and to the Division of Elections, with special thanks to Director Gail Fenumiai, and Department of Law for their assistance in this review.

The following is a summary of the recommendations detailed in the full report:

Recommended amendments to Alaska State Statute:

- Amend Alaska State Statute to allow a U.S. citizen, 18 years or older, who has never been a resident of another state, to register to vote in Alaska so long as the child's parent is eligible to register and vote in Alaska.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to add a new subsection clarifying the rules for counting write-in votes, and allowing the director of elections to disregard misspellings or other minor variations in the form of a candidate's name if the intention of the voter can be ascertained. This change would have Alaska law conform to recent Supreme Court rulings on voter intent.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to add a new section setting out the process for counting write-in votes. This information is currently set out in regulation.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to extend the time a voter may apply to an election supervisor for an absentee ballot to the 22nd day before the election rather than the 15th day.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to extend the time for early voting to 22 days before an election, rather than 15 days.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to allow an absent uniformed services voter or an overseas voter to apply to vote by electronic transmission any time during the calendar year, and to return the ballot in a manner established by the director in regulation.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to allow the director to establish in regulation the method of electronic transmission for delivery of an absentee ballot by electronic transmission. This would allow receipt of ballots by electronic means other than fax.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to reference the federally-mandated exception for absent uniformed services voters and overseas voters being sent their ballots no later than 45 days before election day.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to clarify that those voters who are traveling or working outside of the United States at the time of the election would receive special absentee ballots.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to move up the date of the primary election to the second Tuesday in August of every even-numbered year, rather than the fourth Tuesday in August of every even-numbered year.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to change the deadline for candidate withdrawal from the primary election to "before June 22 of the election year" rather than "at least 48 days before the date of the primary election."

- Amend Alaska State Statute to remove the prohibition that votes for a write-in candidate not be counted unless that candidate has filed a letter of intent with the director.

- Amend Alaska State Statute to change the deadline for filing a letter of intent to run as a write-in candidate to 21 days before the General Election, so the division can more effectively provide assistance to voters.

- Amend Alaska State Statute on filling candidate vacancies by party petition to extend the deadline to before September 3 of the election year, rather than 48 days or more before the general election.

Recommended changes in election procedure:

- Provide multiple notices to the political parties to ensure the parties are aware of their ability to nominate election workers. After the nomination deadline, the division will, if necessary, request assistance from the political parties in locating workers to keep the election board balanced.

- As more Alaskans are taking advantage of early and absentee voting, the division will examine how and whether it can report all results by precinct in future modifications of ballot counting and reporting software.

- Improve training and written instructions to election workers about the need to mark the type of identification presented by the voter on the polling place register.

- Add instructions to the voted ballot envelopes to remind workers to sign across the seal and improve election worker training relating to ballot security.

- To improve election management, the division will replace the voter registration and election management database system with a more technologically advanced system.

- The division will also implement additional security measures of using tamper-proof seals on archive boxes and numbering envelopes sent out prior to transporting ballots to a counting center.

- To improve how unvoted ballots are handled and accounted for, the division will make changes to the ballot statement to specifically include the number of ballots received, used and destroyed. The division will also report the return of the ballot stubs from unvoted ballots that would prevent any use of ballots for fraudulent activity.

- To address concerns that more write-in votes were counted than initially reported on the election results. In the future, the division will ensure that blank ballots that get challenged but that are not counted are not included in the overall results.

- The division will work to research systems to provide "real-time" or electronic updates identifying which voters have voted.

- The division will also post information to the website that indicates the date when absentee ballots are being mailed, filing deadlines, withdrawal deadlines, state review board dates.

- To ensure ineligible felons do not vote, the division will complete the data match between the Department of Corrections and the state voter registration file immediately prior to each election.

- In the case of an election which may be contested the division will re-brief election officials on the need to maintain objectivity and non-partisanship.

- To make it easier for military members to vote, we recommend changing the date of the primary to make sure ballots for a general election can be in the mail in time for service members overseas, allowing other electronic forms of transmissions of ballots back to Alaska (the law currently limits electronic transmission to faxes). The division suggests the under the new redistricting plan, the precinct boundaries be changed so that only installation boundaries are included in the precinct. When precincts are wholly contained within the installation, the division can once again work with the military to establish polling places on the bases. This report recommends this change to the Redistricting Board.

Recommendations to other parties:

- Suggest that the Redistricting Board redraw precinct boundaries specific to military installation in order to move the polling places back to the bases.

- The report discusses a proposal Alaska is considering to further exchange information on Alaska state voters with several data sources in other states in a bonded, confidential manner, in order to identify the names of voters who may be registered in more than one state.

Recommendations for third party review:

- Review of division's audit procedures and hand count verification of election results
- Audit to ensure non-U.S. citizens are not voting
- Audit to ensure that felons are not voting.
- Explore system or methods that can provide for real-time voter history.

2010 General Election Review
Office of Lieutenant Governor Mead Treadwell

The 2010 General Election in Alaska was historic. Only on two other occasions has a significant statewide write-in campaign been conducted. The election revealed sections of election law and procedures that were yet untested, and many Alaskans became more aware of election procedures. Alaska's write-in process was widely publicized, and the state was pleased to see that process upheld by the state and federal courts.

After Governor Sean Parnell and I signed the final paperwork to certify the 2010 General Election, I announced we would conduct an election review to examine lessons learned in the way the election was conducted. A review could also help fully explain the election process to Alaskans. This review, by the Office of the Lieutenant Governor, the Division of Elections and the Department of Law, includes an analysis of election laws and procedures as well as feedback from stakeholders, political parties, and most importantly, Alaska's voters. The resulting report responds to observations and concerns made by Alaskans, and offers a recommendation for change or retraction of current procedures, Alaska State Statute, and/or regulation for each issue.

A key recommendation as a result of this review is intended to make it easier for Alaskans serving in the military to vote. Those recommendations include changing the date of the primary to ensure ballots for a general election can be in the mail in time for service members overseas; allowing other electronic forms of transmissions of ballots back to Alaska (the law currently limits electronic transmission to faxes); and working with the Redistricting Board and the Department of Defense to facilitate reopening of polling places on Alaska's military bases.

Other key recommendations include changes to state law to clarify procedures for counting write-in ballots and making the declaration of candidacy for a write-in candidate voluntary. Perhaps the single most important finding in the review is that no change in procedure or state law recommended would have changed the outcome of the 2010 General Election.

To maintain objectivity in the examination of certain questions aimed at the Division of Elections, the report recommends third party review on specific issues.

Our heartfelt thanks goes out to those who worked so tirelessly on the 2010 General Election, including former Lieutenant Governor Craig Campbell, division personnel, attorneys from the Department of Law, candidates, and especially the volunteers who so selflessly gave their time and energy to bring the election to a conclusion. And thanks are due to Alaskans for taking their time to submit comments, to stakeholders for meeting with the Lieutenant Governor, and to the Division of Elections, with special thanks to Director Gail Fenumiai, and Department of Law for their assistance in this review.

I. Overview of Processes

I. (A) Polling Place Procedures and Election Worker Training

1. Election Worker Recruitment

Election worker recruitment is one of the more time consuming tasks in conducting a successful election. Recruitment begins around March of an election year and continues, in some cases, right up to election day. As part of the recruitment process, the division notifies the political parties that they are eligible to nominate election workers as outlined in AS 15.10.120. By law, political party nominations are due by April 15th of the election year.

Depending on the size of the precinct, each polling place has approximately three to six election workers. In an effort to maintain consistency within the polling places, the division requests workers to work both the primary and general elections and to work the entire time the polls are open, 13 hours. Whenever possible, the division attempts to find workers who are registered voters of the precinct. If the division is unable to locate voters within the precinct who are willing to serve, the division will recruit any qualified voter.

The first worker recruited for each precinct is the chairperson. The chairperson is then requested to assist the division in locating the remaining workers for the precinct. Public comments were received suggesting that allowing the chairperson to recruit other board members is conducive to partisanship or fraud. Others suggest that there should always be a representative from each political party on the election board. The division has not found any evidence of fraud on the part of election workers. Having the chairperson assist with the recruitment of other election board workers helps to create a positive experience for the workers which in turn allows for a positive voting experience for the public. It also allows a wider pool of potential workers to be contacted. The division has also found that when workers enjoy those whom they are working with, they are more likely to continue to be election workers from one election to another, which creates a more experienced election worker pool.

When recruiting the election board workers, the division and the chairperson attempt to ensure the election board is politically balanced and that there is political party representation on the election board. Although the division sends political parties a notice of the deadline for them to nominate election board members, comments were received that the division does not provide sufficient notice. For future elections, the division will provide multiple notices to the political parties to ensure the parties are aware of their ability to nominate workers. After the nomination deadline, the division will, if necessary, request assistance from political parties in locating workers to keep the election board balanced.

The chairperson is paid $10 per hour for their time at the polls and the other election workers are paid $9.50 per hour. Workers are compensated for their time spent in training if the trainee works in the election. The division has received comments from workers that it would be easier to find election workers if the pay was increased.

The last increase for election workers of $2/hour was in 2004.

Any increase to election worker pay would require a budget increase to the division in an election year. There is no provision for an increase in FY12 budget as any change for the 2012 Primary or General Elections would be appropriated in the 2013 fiscal year beginning July 1, 2012.

The division has approximately 2500 precinct election workers (those that work at polling places on election day). They work 15 hours per election.

$9.50x15=$142.50

If they were to get a raise to $15/hour:

$15x15 = $225

For a difference of $82.50 per election worker per election.

$82.50x2500x2 elections = $412,500 budget increment

An increase to $12/hour would result in a budget increment of $187,500.

This report makes no recommendation on salary increases; however, recommendations will be made in time for the Governor's 2013 fiscal year budget proposal.

2. Election Worker Training

The division's four regional offices are responsible for training precinct election board workers in their respective regions. In-person training is conducted prior to each primary election for the election board workers across the state. It is the division's goal to train workers as close to the election as possible. However, with the large number of rural precincts, some regions have to begin their worker training in early June and continue until early August.

Concerns and comments were received about the division not using standardized training materials throughout the state. Although there are differences between urban and rural, hand-count and optical scan count precincts, the division does in fact use a standardized set of training materials and handbooks to train all precinct election workers depending on the type of precinct they work in (optical scan or hand-count). There is a standardized set of instructions and handbooks for all optical scan precincts and there is a standardized set of instructions and handbooks for all hand-count precincts. In addition, there is a standardized set of instructions and materials developed for the touch screen equipment that is provided to all precincts.

In-person training sessions are approximately four to six hours in length and are broken into two modules: election procedures and equipment procedures. The election procedures module covers areas such as opening the polls, providing voter assistance, disability awareness, language assistance, processing voters, issuing ballots, questioned voting, special needs voting, closing the polls, completing the ballot statement and returning election materials.

For precincts that hand-count their ballots, this module also includes instructions on how to count ballots and report election results. The equipment module covers functions necessary to set up the equipment (optical scan and touch screen) and prepare it for voting. The training also covers the process for how to maintain security of the equipment, functionality and operation of the equipment, and the process for transmitting results. The equipment procedures module gives workers hands-on experience and practice setting-up, voting, printing election results and disassembling the equipment.

The division conducts training for workers in rural areas of the state in several "hub" cities. Election workers from selected rural precincts travel to a larger, more "central" community to receive training as a group. Since Alaska has a very large number of precincts that are not on a road system, utilizing hub training enables the division to train rural workers closer to election day and reduces the amount of travel time needed by division staff. Urban-based training is generally conducted closer to election day and is conducted with workers from multiple election boards present.

Although in-person training is conducted before the primary election, the division offices in Anchorage, Fairbanks, Juneau, Mat-Su and Nome review election procedures with precinct chairpersons when they pick up their materials from the regional offices. A written review is sent to all other precincts.

The division faces many challenges with information retention between the time of the training and the election, especially in rural areas of the state where training is usually conducted more than a month before the primary. In addition, workers quit and are replaced after the training takes place. The division's standardized set of instructions and handbooks is critical to the workers' ability to perform their duties correctly. In 2010 the division created a training video to send with election supplies that covers the same topics as the in-person training sessions.

Although the division provides a comprehensive training program for workers and uses a standardized set of instructions and training materials across the state, there will inevitably be times when election board workers simply forget to perform an outlined process or procedure. When the division becomes aware of those situations, its managers will take steps to address the issue.

3. Polling Place Procedures

On election day, election board workers have a standardized set of instructions to follow when opening the polls, processing voters, and closing the polls. When the division receives comments, concerns or complaints about problems in a polling place on election day, the division makes contact with the workers to address or correct those issues.

a) Voter Identification

Under AS 15.15.225, election workers are required to request identification from voters. However, workers can waive the identification requirement if the voter is personally known, unless the words "Must Show ID" appear in the signature box on the precinct register. Workers are also instructed to check the box on the register indicating the type of identification presented. If a voter does not have identification and does not meet the waiver requirements, the voter must vote a questioned ballot.

After the 2010 General Election, there were concerns that election workers allowed voters to vote without requiring identification because boxes were not checked to indicate the type of identification shown.

The division contacted 24 precincts where the "Identification Presented" box was not checked either for 100% of the voters or for some portion of the voters, to determine if the workers allowed voters to vote without requiring identification. Each precinct confirmed that they did require voters to show identification unless the voter was personally known. If the voter didn't have ID, they had the voter vote a questioned ballot. When asked why they did not check the "Identification Presented" box, the workers responded with comments such as:

i. We simply forgot.
ii. We were unaware this was necessary.
iii. We were too busy and must have overlooked the box.
iv. We were asked to highlight signatures and this caused extra time and work, and we must have just gotten too busy with the extra requirement.
v. We don't have to mark the box for municipal elections so we didn't think we needed to for state elections.

In contacting the precincts the division found no indication of misconduct on the part of the workers and concludes that blank "Identification Presented" boxes were simply an oversight. The division is committed to improved training and written instructions about the need to mark on the register the type of identification presented.

b) Ballot Security

When the polls close, election workers seal the voted ballots in special tyvek envelopes. After the tyvek envelope is sealed, an opened envelope becomes evident because the seal is broken. As an added security measure, after sealing the envelope(s), workers are instructed to sign across the seal before returning the ballots to the Division of Elections.

After the 2010 General Election, the division received voted ballot envelopes that were sealed but that did not have election worker signatures across the seal. After working a 13+ hour day, workers are ready to go home and sometimes overlook signing across the seal.

In no case had the initial seal on the envelopes been broken, but the division recognizes the absence of signatures caused the perception of compromised ballot security during the tabulation of the write-in votes.

Public comments were received related to the improvement of ballot security. Although ballots are sealed in tyvek envelopes, improvements are needed to ensure that workers sign across the seal. The division takes ballot security seriously, and will add instructions to the voted ballot envelopes to remind workers to sign across the seal. The division will also make improvements to election worker training relating to ballot security.

c) Unvoted Ballots

When the polls close, election workers in precincts outside of Anchorage, Fairbanks, Juneau, Mat-Su and Nome are instructed to destroy their unvoted ballots. Precincts in Anchorage, Fairbanks, Juneau, Mat-Su and Nome bring their unvoted ballots back to the division's regional offices to be destroyed.

Public comments were received relating to the handling of unvoted ballots. One suggestion was that election workers should be required to sign documentation indicating the ballots were destroyed. The division instructs the election workers to complete a ballot statement indicating how many ballots were used after the polls close. This statement, along with the signatures in the precinct registers, allows the division to account for all ballots and to ensure that the election results do not include extra ballots. In an effort to improve how unvoted ballots are handled and accounted for, the division will make changes to the ballot statement to specifically include the number of ballots received, used and destroyed. The division will also investigate whether it is possible logistically for the return of ballot stubs from unvoted ballots to further prevent any use of ballots for fraudulent activity.

I. (B) Impacts on Process Relating to Distribution of Write-In List

There have been two major write-in campaigns for a statewide election in the past two decades. In 1998, Robin Taylor ran as a write-in candidate for governor. In 2010, Lisa Murkowski ran as a write-in candidate for United States Senate. The difference between the two elections was that in 1998 Alaska Statutes did not require write-in candidates to file any form of declaration with the Division of Elections. After the 1998 election, the statutes were changed to require write-in candidates to file a letter of intent with the division at least five days prior to the election.

The division consulted with the Department of Law to determine what assistance by an election worker was allowable to those voting for a write-in candidate. The division and Department of Law concluded that a list of declared write-in candidates should be distributed to election workers in order to ensure that workers provide consistent, standardized assistance to voters on write-in questions. The division also believed that providing a list would help minimize disruption in the polling place that might result from conversations between poll workers and voters regarding write-in candidates. Election workers were instructed not to post the list, but to have it available for reference upon request of the voter.

Since providing a list of write-in candidates to the election workers was a new procedure, the division submitted the change in practice to the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) for preclearance as required by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. DOJ precleared the change prior to the distribution of the list.

1. Impacts on Public Perception

The implementation of a write-in list triggered a lawsuit filed against the division, and the Alaska Supreme Court ruled in favor of the division's use of the list. As a protest to the Supreme Court's order allowing the write-in list, a radio talk-show host went on air and encouraged listeners to file paperwork with the division to become declared write-in candidates so that poll workers would have a difficult time finding Lisa Murkowski's name on the list.

Prior to the radio broadcast, there were only a few declared write-in candidates for the U.S. Senate race. The broadcast resulted in 168 write-in candidates for U.S. Senate.

Several public comments were received both prior to and after the election indicating that the division should not have distributed a write-in list. Some members of the public also made comments to the division that they believed the division provided the list as a way to help one candidate over another. The division implemented the list as a way to ensure that effective voter assistance could be provided, and this decision was affirmed by the Alaska Supreme Court.

The requirement for a write-in candidate to file a letter of intent restricts a time-honored tradition voters have in most states. The right to cast a write-in vote exists as a "release valve" in the event a voter is not happy with the choices available on the ballot. The Division of Election's job is to empower voters. Therefore, the recommendation is to change Alaska State Statute to make it voluntary for write-in candidates to file a letter of intent. At the same time, we recommend making the voluntary write-in letter of intent dealing 21 days prior to the general election day.

I. (C) Processes and Procedures for Counting Write-In Votes

1. Internal Preparation and Procedures

a) Establish date/time for counting of write-in votes

6 AAC 25.085 establishes the criteria used to determine when the counting of individual write-in votes must be performed. This regulation further outlines that the director will establish the place and date for counting write-in votes.

For 2010, the director initially established that if the number of write-in votes cast in the election was sufficient to trigger counting, the counting would take place in Juneau beginning the 16th day following the election. The date was selected based on the fact that the last count of absentee ballots is performed on the 15th day following the election, and the division might not know if the threshold requirement for conducting the count of individual write-in votes would be met until all ballots were counted. It was initially reported to candidates and the public that the date would be the 16th day following the election.

After results were posted on election night, it was clear that the division would be required to separate and count the individual write-in votes. Lieutenant Governor Campbell indicated it would be in the best interest of the state and public if the write-in votes were individually counted sooner than initially planned. It was determined that the division would begin counting the write-in votes on November 10th, and candidates were notified. The Department of Law advised that the lieutenant governor's decision was legal and appropriate, and the court backed this up.

b) Establish location and secure workers

AS 15.15.370 requires all ballots to be sent to the director. The division also relied on 6 AAC 25.200, which requires all recounts to be conducted in Juneau, because a recount is a similar procedure to counting write-in votes. Since all ballots are sent to Juneau following an election, the separation and counting of write-in votes was conducted in Juneau.

The division secured a counting facility that could accommodate 15 teams of counters consisting of two people using two 3' x 5' tables, press, public viewing and observers. In addition, a vendor was secured to transport the tables and chairs necessary for the workers.

The location established allowed for a secure counting area and ballot storage area with limited access. There was also a designated area set up for press and a designated area for the public to observe the counting process without being in the immediate counting area.

c) Recruit and train workers

It was determined that 15 teams of two workers would be used to perform the separation of the write-in ballots. In addition, alternate workers were identified in the event that an appointed worker was unavailable during counting times.

The division required all workers to attend a pre-counting training session. The training covered the processes and procedures that would be used when separating ballots.

Each day of the counting, the workers had to sign in and out and were given badges to gain access to the immediate counting area. The workers' political party affiliation was taken into consideration when pairing the teams so that there would not be a team consisting of two workers of the same party affiliation. Each team was assigned a table number, and the division maintained a list of table assignments.

d) Ballot security

Counted ballots are sealed in tyvek envelopes by the precinct election board or counting boards before being transported to Juneau for storage and archiving. The outside of the ballot envelopes indicate the district/precinct of the ballots. Election workers are instructed to sign across the seal on each ballot envelope.

When ballots arrived in Juneau, division staff recorded the ballots received, and indicated the number of ballot envelopes for each district/precinct. After the ballots are recorded, the sealed envelopes are placed in archive boxes by district and secured in an alarmed ballot room.

The division contacted several security contractors and ultimately, secured the services of the only company that had transportation available and could meet the division's request. The security contractor was hired to transport the sealed ballot envelopes contained within archive boxes to the counting center. Each time the ballots were transported, the security contractor and the division recorded each ballot envelope on a transport log. The log was completed and signed when the ballot envelopes left the alarmed ballot room, when they arrived at the counting center, when they left the counting center, and again when they were received back in the ballot room.

While in the counting center, the ballots were stored in an open, cordoned-off area that allowed access only by division personnel and the security contractor. Before taking ballots from this area to a counting table, they were checked-out and recorded on a table assignment list, and they were checked back in upon their return.

Comments were received from the public regarding the transportation of ballots to/from the counting center in archive boxes. Comments were also received about division personnel and the security contractor having sole access to the ballots. Since the ballots in the archive boxes are sealed inside ballot envelopes, they are secure during transportation. And to further ensure security, the division already numbers the envelopes. The division will implement additional security measures of using tamper-proof seals on archive boxes sent out prior to transporting ballots to a counting center.

e) Recording write-in vote results

In order to record the write-in results for the large number of declared write-in candidates, the division created an election database using the GEMS ballot tabulation system software. The write-in database included the names of each write-in candidate. The division believed there would be a large number of challenged ballots, so it also decided to create a category in the database to record the number of "challenged counted" and "challenged – not counted" ballots. The "challenged – not counted" category was created because the division felt there would be ballots that could not be counted for a write-in candidate but that would be challenged. In addition, the database included a category to record the names of write-ins for candidates who did not file a letter of intent. The division also included in the database write-in votes for names appearing on the ballot, because it is not uncommon for a voter to write in the name of a candidate appearing on the ballot.

Many ballots were discovered during the write-in count process in which the voter failed to mark the write-in oval, but wrote in the name of candidate Lisa Murkowski. When sorting and counting the individual write-in votes, the division followed Alaska State Statute, which indicates that if the oval was not marked, the write-in vote cannot be counted. These are considered blank ballots and were not included in the initial write-in vote totals.

Prior to separating and counting the individual write-in votes, the election results did not include write-in ballots in which the oval was unmarked though a name was written in. These are considered blank votes for that race. After challenges by the Murkowski campaign, these ballots were recorded with the "challenged – not counted" ballots, because there was no category specifically for recording write-in ballots with unmarked ovals. This category, however, included other ballots where the write-in oval was marked but were recorded as "challenged – not counted" for other reasons.

Since the write-in results for the US Senate Race included these blank ballots which were challenged by the Murkowski campaign, the results appeared to have more write-in votes than originally reported. However, the additional ballots were never valid votes, but were later recorded with other uncounted ballots when the Murkowski campaign challenged them.

In the future, the division will ensure that blank ballots that get challenged but that are not counted are not included in the overall results.

f) Access to counting area

The division established a sign-in/sign-out process to control access into the immediate counting area. In order to gain access to the counting area, each counting worker and observer had to sign-in and each was given a badge.

The division allowed one observer from each campaign to be present at each table in the counting area. In addition, each campaign was allowed to have a lead observer present in the counting area.

In addition to the workers and observers, the division required press members to sign in and wear a press badge. Press members had their own area with full viewing access of the counting. As requested, the division allowed a limited number of press members in the immediate counting area for short periods of time to take pictures or film footage. When press members were in the immediate counting area, they were accompanied by division personnel.

Division personnel and Department of Law personnel also wore badges.

Although the public was not allowed in the immediate counting area, the division did establish an area for the public that allowed full viewing access.

Comments were received that the division politicized the write-in count process by roping off areas after challenges to ballots began. The division provided equal access to the counting area for both the Murkowski and Miller campaigns. Access was established on the very first day and remained consistent throughout the counting process.

Access to the cordoned-off area where the ballots were being held, which was visible to all parties, was limited to division personnel, Department of Law personnel and the security contractor. At no time did observers for either candidate have access to this area.

2. Counting Individual Write-In Votes – U.S. Senate Race

When separating ballots to count the individual write-in votes, the ballots were first sorted. After the initial sort, the director, with the assistance of the Department of Law, made a determination on voter intent. Once voter intent was determined, the ballots were counted and the individual write-in results recorded.

Below is an outline of the process:

a) Initial Ballot Sort

There were five boxes used to sort ballots. The boxes were used to initially sort the ballots as follows:

i. All ballots where the oval is marked next to a candidate's name that is printed on the ballot (those other than the "Write-In" category) were placed in box #1.

ii. All ballots where the U.S. Senate Race is left blank (no oval marked) or more than one oval is marked were placed in box #2.

iii. All ballots where the oval is marked for the "Write-In" category and the name is written as "Lisa Murkowski" or "Murkowski" and spelled correctly that were not challenged were placed in box #3.

iv. All ballots where the oval is marked for the "Write-In" category and the name written in is "Lisa," "Lisa M" or other variations that demonstrated the voter is casting a ballot for Lisa Murkowski were placed in box #4. This box was also used for workers to place any ballot voted for Lisa Murkowski that an observer challenged so that the director could make a determination on voter intent.

v. All ballots where the oval is marked for "Write-In" category and the name written in is for a candidate other than Lisa Murkowski or variation of Lisa Murkowski were placed in box #5.

During the first day of sorting, some teams sorted the ballots into the five boxes so that the candidate names were facing the sorting team, and some sorted so that the candidate names were facing the observers. The division received comments from the observers that they would like all sorting teams to sort the ballots so that the candidate names printed on the ballot faced the observers. The division implemented this change on the second day of sorting. Although comments were received that ballots were sorted upside down, this only happened on the first day and was corrected by the division at the request of observers and had no effect on the result of the election.

b) Director Determination

i. Each ballot in box #2 (blank and overvoted ballots) was reviewed to verify the ballot is truly blank or overvoted.

ii. Each ballot in box #4 was reviewed to determine voter intent. When reviewing these ballots, they were sorted into three categories as follows:

1) Determination made to count as vote for write-in candidate Lisa Murkowski and determination is not challenged. (These ballots were placed in box #3 for counting.)

2) Determination made to count as vote for write-in candidate Lisa Murkowski and determination is challenged. These ballots were segregated and placed into an envelope labeled "Challenged – Counted for Murkowski." The total number of votes from these ballots was recorded on the results sheet as votes for "Murkowski – Counted Challenged."

3) Determination made to not count the vote for write-in candidate Lisa Murkowski and determination is challenged. These ballots were segregated and placed into an envelope labeled "Challenged – Not Counted for Murkowski." The total number of votes from these ballots were added to the results sheet as "Murkowski – Not Counted Challenged."

c) Recording Results

i. The ballots from box #3 (votes for Murkowski) were hand counted and the total number of votes was recorded on the results sheet for "Lisa Murkowski."
ii. The number of ballots in the "Challenged – Counted for Murkowski" envelope was hand-counted and recorded on the results sheet line "Lisa Murkowski – Counted Challenged." After counting, these ballots were returned to the envelope.
iii. The number of ballots in the "Challenged – Not Counted for Murkowski" envelope was hand-counted and recorded on the results sheet line for "Murkowski – Not Counted Challenged. After counting, these ballots were returned to the envelope.
iv. For the ballots in box #5 (write-in votes for candidates other than Murkowski), the workers sorted the by name. Once the ballots were sorted, the workers counted and recorded the individual results for candidates appearing on the write-in candidate list. If the name written in did not appear on the certified write-in candidate list, workers recorded the votes on the line for "Other Write-In."
v. After the workers recorded the write-in votes on their results sheet, division personnel compared the total number of individual write-in votes to the write-in category on the initial statement of votes cast. This was done to make sure counting workers did not accidentally place write-in votes in box #1.
vi. Once the total number of write-in votes was verified, the workers sealed the ballots in the original voted ballot envelope(s) and the results sheet used to record the individual write-in votes was given to division personnel to enter into the GEMS database.

3. Timeline

The division began the individual counting of write-in votes on Wednesday, November 10th. Initially, the division thought that it would take three to four days to conduct the count. However, due to the large volume of challenged ballots, the division did not complete the counting of write-in votes until November 17th. This fact alone confirmed Lieutenant Governor Campbell's decision to begin the count earlier.

Each day, the counting began at 9am and went to approximately 4-5pm. On Sunday, November 14th, the division did not begin the counting until noon.

On November 19th, the division counted the write-in votes from special advance and overseas ballots. The initial count of these ballots took place in the regional offices on the 15th day following the election, and the ballots were shipped to Juneau. The division notified the campaigns and press that the write-in separation from these ballots would take place in the Division of Elections director's office on November 19th.

4. Cost

The total cost to individually count the write-in votes was $60,440.

I. (D) Successes

Alaska faces logistical challenges to ensure that all 438 precinct polling places across the state are open and staffed, and receive their ballots, supplies and equipment. Accomplishing this is a success in its own. There were other notable successes relating to the 2010 General Election:

1. Litigation

During the 2010 General Election, there were several lawsuits filed against the division in both state and federal courts.

The main issue in the litigation was related to the division's decision to provide a list of write-in candidates to the poll workers and the division's process to count write-in votes, including determining voter intent.

The state and federal courts ruling in the division's favor was the most notable success of the 2010 General Election.

2. Implementation of the MOVE Act

Under the new requirements of the MOVE Act, the division was required to mail ballots to military and overseas voters at least 45 days prior to the general election and late candidate withdrawal deadline. Due to the short time frame between the primary and general elections, the division initially applied for a waiver to this requirement. The division was notified the waiver was denied and the division was required to develop a process that would allow ballots to be mailed 45 days before the general election.

The statutory candidate withdrawal deadline of 48 days prior to the general election made it impossible to have official ballots printed in time to meet the MOVE Act 45-day ballot mailing requirement. The division developed a process to produce an in-house paper ballot which was mailed to over 8,000 UOCAVA voters by the deadline.

To count the ballots using the division's optical scanners, the absentee ballot review boards had to produce a facsimile of the ballot using an official ballot printed on ballot stock. Although this caused extra work for the review boards, the division was able to meet the statutory deadline for reviewing and counting ballots.

3. Election Worker Training Video

In an effort to supplement in-person training, the division created an election worker training video that covered the same components as the in-person training sessions. The video provided workers with an opportunity to be trained even if they were unable to attend the in-person training. The division received positive feedback from election workers who found the video valuable.

4. Federal Observers in Bethel

The division was notified approximately one week before the general election that the Department of Justice would be sending federal observers to Bethel. In order to prepare for the observers, the division worked with Lori Strickler, Bethel City Clerk, to set up a training session for the poll workers the weekend before the election to go over election procedures and to inform the workers about the observers. The division's Yup'ik Language Assistance Coordinator was on-site in Bethel for election day.

Although it was intimidating for poll workers to have federal observers watching them, the division and poll workers were prepared and successfully conducted the election in Bethel. There is, however, no after action report available from the Department of Justice.

5. Counting Write-In Votes

In addition to the normal post-election processes, in 2010 the division had to prepare for and count the individual write-in votes for United States Senate. The counting was high-profile, with both national news media and campaign observers present.

The division created a process to separate and count write-in votes from 258,746 ballots cast in the 2010 General Election. Throughout the process, the division was able to maintain security and organization of a very large volume of ballots and election materials.

The division updated the press, campaigns and the public each day with ballot counts and results.

I. (E) Issues for Improvement

1. Implementation of MOVE Act Requirements

The division was successfully able to meet the 45-day deadline to mail absentee ballots to military and overseas voters by preparing a paper copy of the ballot. Although this allowed the division to meet the requirement, it impacted the amount of time to count absentee ballots and resulted in a large number of facsimile ballots. Statutory changes should be pursued that will allow for the official ballot, rather than a facsimile, to be sent by the 45-day deadline.

Currently, absentee ballots must be mailed or faxed to voters. The division received numerous comments from military and overseas voters that they do not have ready access to fax machines and requested their ballots be sent via email. Statutory changes should be pursued to allow blank ballots to be transmitted via email.

It is recommended that legislation be introduced to change the date of the primary election; change the candidate withdrawal deadlines for the primary and general elections and change the party replacement deadlines for the primary and general elections.

2. Voter Registration Database

The division's voter registration and election management database was developed in 1985 and is a mainframe-based system. Because the technology is antiquated, there are a limited number of programmers available that have experience in this programming language. In addition, it is costly to maintain at an annual fee of over $100,000 per year. The division needs to replace this system with a more technologically advanced, PC-based system.

3. Election Worker Pay

Each election, the division struggles to recruit poll workers. These workers are required to work a 13+ hour day with a great deal of responsibility. A pay increase could result in more people willing to serve as poll workers and result in more participation from political parties.

This report makes no appropriation recommendations.

4. Hand Counting Ballots

There are 133 precincts in Alaska that hand count their ballots after the polls close and call the regional offices with their election results. Once received, the regional offices enter the results into the regional tabulation server which is then uploaded to the host server in Juneau. If the election board calls in the wrong number of voters, or wrong results, the regional offices enter incorrect information which then has to be corrected by the State Ballot Counting Review Board. Although improvements have been made to training methods, the division will need to continue to improve materials to address hand counting of ballots.

5. Voter History

Prior to opening and counting absentee and questioned ballots, the division conducts a duplicate analysis to verify that the voter did not vote more than once. This duplicate analysis cannot be performed until all voter history is completed from the precinct registers used in the polling places. Until the duplicate analysis is complete, absentee ballots cannot be opened and counted. This causes a delay in opening and counting the absentee ballots.

To enhance the voter history process, the division will research the feasibility of implementing the use of electronic poll books. Electronic poll books could potentially expedite the counting of absentee and questioned ballots by more quickly recording voter history and conducting duplicate voter analysis.

An online real-time voter history system would have several advantages:

a) It would expedite the counting of absentee and questioned ballots
b) It would identify individuals attempting to vote more than once in any given election, avoiding potential fraud
c) It could allow observers, candidates and parties to focus their get-out-the-vote efforts more effectively, and perhaps increase turnout altogether.

I. (F) Statistics and Analysis

There are 438 precincts in Alaska. In order to conduct an election, the Division of Elections ensures each precinct has a polling location, workers to run the polling place and that each location has the ballots, supplies and equipment needed for the election.

There are 305 precinct polling places that use an optical scan machine to count ballots. There are 133 precinct polling places, located in rural areas of the state, that hand-count their ballots when the polls close. During the primary and general elections, there is also a touch screen voting unit in each precinct polling place that is intended for use by voters who have visual impairments, disabilities or have difficulty reading.

1. How many people voted

260,976 voters voted in the 2010 General Election, of which, 258,746 ballots were counted and 2,230 ballots were rejected.

Following is a breakdown of the ballots cast:

192,940 cast ballots on Election Day and counted at the polls
11,698 counted questioned ballots
1,297 rejected questioned ballots
40,843 counted absentee ballots
933 rejected absentee ballots
13,265 counted early ballots

There were 494,876 registered voters qualified to vote in the election. Overall percentage turnout based on the counted ballots was 52.29%. The percentage turnout in the 2010 election is slightly higher than in previous gubernatorial election years.

2. How many people cast write-in votes

Out of the 258,746 cast ballots, there were 102,234 votes cast for write-in for the U.S. Senate race.

Although there were write-in votes for each race on the ballot, only the write-in votes cast in the U.S. Senate race met the required threshold to count the individual write-in votes.

3. Cost and length of time to count write-in votes

It cost the division $60,440 to conduct the counting of the write-in votes for the U.S. Senate race.

The counting of the write-in votes started on November 10th and concluded on November 17th with a small number of ballots being counted on November 19th.

4. Reporting absentee and early vote results by precinct

Comments were received indicating that results from absentee and early voting should be reported by precinct. Unlike precinct polling place ballots, absentee and early ballots are issued at the house district level, not at the precinct level. Alaska State Statute 15.20.201 requires the district absentee ballot counting board to review and count absentee ballots. The division's existing voter registration and election management database is programmed and designed to track absentee and early ballots by house district.

Having both systems designed to manage absentee and early ballots by house district allows for the public and candidates to get a list of all absentee and early voters and to see election results by house district. This also allows the division to verify that the number of ballots accepted for counting matches the number of actual ballots reported in the election results which is critical to the ballot accountability process.

As more Alaskans are taking advantage of early and absentee voting, the recommendation is for the division to examine how and whether it can report all results by precinct in future modifications of ballot counting and reporting software.

5. Providing information on absentee voters

Comments were received that it is difficult to get information from the division about voters who requested absentee ballots and that the division mailed ballots to voters earlier than the announced date.

The division's absentee office produces an updated absentee voter report following each mailing. If an organization has purchased the initial absentee list, their name is kept and they are automatically sent subsequent lists. The division's absentee office consistently provides lists to candidates and parties.

The division believes that mailing absentee ballots to voters as soon as they are available is critical to the voter's ability to receive a ballot in time to vote. Once ballots are sent, the updated absentee voter report provided to the candidate and parties includes the date the ballot was mailed. In an effort to ensure this information is more readily available, the division will post information to the website that indicates the date when ballots are being mailed, or mesh this system with a planned online real-time voter history system.

2010 Election Review
II. Answering Alaskans' Questions

II. (A) Voter Intent

Question: Should voter intent be included as part of the rules for counting write-in votes?

This report recommends yes.

There is legislation pending in the 2011 legislative session that considers this question. Senate Bill 31 has passed the State Senate and is awaiting hearings in the State House. This legislation codifies the decision of the Alaska Supreme Court that voter intent must be considered when counting ballots.

There were public comments received that voter intent should not be included in determining whether or not a ballot should be counted. The Alaska Supreme Court has historically and repeatedly encouraged the division to implement and honor voter intent in counting ballots. This was again the case with their order in December 2010.

II. (B) Letter of Intent for Write-In Candidacy

Question: Should there be continued requirements for individuals to file their intent to be a write-in candidate and if so, what is realistic time requirement for filing such intention?

Today, Alaska State Statute requires a write-in candidate to file a letter of intent to run for public office within five days of a general election. The requirement is relatively new in Alaska law and had never been tested before the 2010 General Election, when the list of write-in candidates itself and its use in voting locations was challenged in State courts.

As a result of this review, it is recommended that the requirement for filing a write-in letter of intent be voluntary, not mandatory. This would maintain the voters' freedom to use the write-in process to vote for whomever they choose. However, if a candidate desires to file a write-in letter of intent, the division could more effectively provide assistance to voters if the requirement is changed so that the letter of intent must be received by the division no later than 21 days before the general election. If appropriate thresholds are met to require the individual counting of write-in votes, nothing should preclude a candidate who has not filed a write-in letter of intent to have his or her votes counted.

With the understanding that the circumstance for a write-in candidate to run and not file a letter of intent is rare, yet may be necessary to ensure each party has a candidate in the election, the division will continue to encourage write-in candidates to file a letter of intent for election for the following reasons:

1. Filing a letter of intent verifies that the individual running for office meets the constitutional and state requirements for the office.

2. The letter of intent provides the division with the framework for how the candidate's name should be written.

3. Without knowing in advance, the names of write-in candidates, voters who wish to vote for a write-in candidate could be disenfranchised if they needed assistance in voting for a candidate.

4. The candidate filing requirement is helpful for the division's preparation of the write-in candidate list for use in the polling places on Election Day. This list helps with voter assistance, which is required by both Alaska Statute and by federal law.

5. The write-in candidate list was precleared by the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) last year. To discontinue using the list would require preclearance.

6. Registration also allows the state to enforce financial disclosure laws and electioneering laws against all candidates equally.

II. (C) Felons Voting

Question: What additional precautions, if any, are necessary to prevent felons from voting?

The division has a process in place to remove voters that have been convicted of a felony involving moral turpitude for the voter rolls.

The division receives a list from the Department of Corrections and processes the names on the list. Prior to removing a voter, the division must verify the conviction is for a felony involving moral turpitude. This process is conducted, at minimum, on a bi-weekly basis.

The division seeks the assistance of the Department of Law to determine if a crime meets the legal definition of "moral turpitude" if the crime listed is not found in AS 15.80.010(9).

There were allegations made in court documents that the division allowed felons to vote. This was a direct result of a data match performed using the Sex Offender Registration Central Registry and the statewide voter registration list by a third party. Names that appeared to be a match, based on criteria unknown, identified that there were registered voters whose names were on the Sex Offender Registration Central Registry and that some of these individuals voted in the 2010 general election. The division did not receive any names of potential felon voters from a third party.

An individual who has been convicted of a crime that requires registration with the Sex Offender Registration Central Registry may remain on the registry for an extended period of time, up to life. Being named on the list doesn't preclude those individuals from registering to vote, as long as they have been unconditionally discharged from their conviction.

When an individual has been unconditionally discharged from incarceration, parole and probation, they are eligible to register to vote.

As of March 31, 2011, there are 6,107 voters inactive due to felony conviction and 1,271 voters inactive who have been unconditionally discharged but have not re-registered to vote.

To ensure that felons who are ineligible to vote, do not vote, the division will ensure that a data match between the Department of Corrections and the state voter registration file is conducted immediately prior to each election.

II. (D) MOVE Act Compliance

1. Election Dispute

Question: Does the interval between Alaska's primary and general election allow compliance with the MOVE Act in case of an election dispute, when primary results can be delayed by law, and general election ballots must be mailed 45 days before an election?

Federal law (MOVE Act) requires that ballots for the 2012 primary and general election must be mailed to Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act (UOCAVA) voters no later than 45 days prior to a federal election.

The difficulty with meeting this mailing deadline for the primary election revolves around the candidate withdrawal deadline. Currently, a candidate may withdraw up to 48 days prior to the election. This allows the division only three days to print and mail ballots for the primary election.

The division was able to meet the 45-day ballots mailing time for UOCAVA voters during the 2010 General Election. However, it was extremely difficult and could have been derailed by factors outside the division's control.

It is recommended that legislation change the date of the primary election; change the candidate withdrawal deadlines for the primary and general elections; change the party replacement deadlines for the primary and general elections.

These changes will allow the state to more reliably meet the 45-day ballots mailing requirement for UOCAVA voters.

2. Electronic Voting

Question: With the passage of the MOVE Act, should Alaska eliminate the 60-day special advance ballot and expand electronic voting to allow the division to transmit blank ballots to voters?

The division should eliminate the 60-day special advance ballot for UOCAVA voters but continue to send to those voters residing in remote areas of the state and those traveling and working outside the United States.

The MOVE Act requires the division to send ballots electronically to voters, if requested by the voter.

Currently, the regulatory definition of electronically transmitted ballots is by facsimile machine. However, this is an antiquated method of electronic voting. In a review of the legislative committee history for HB42, which implemented electronic transmission of ballots, it is clear that the intention of the statute's use of the term "electronic transmission" was meant to allow the division to use whatever means is modern and available. The bill was intended to make use of modern technology to encourage people to vote.

The use of fax machines is no longer considered modern technology. There are effective and secure ways to electronically transmit a ballot to voters. Many states implemented these types of procedures during the 2010 general election.

The division is continuously being asked by voters (both UOCAVA and non-UOCAVA) if they can receive their ballot by email.

The division is researching secure electronic ballot transmission methods. The recommendation is to amend state law to allow for this opportunity.

II. (F) Requirement to Show ID and Citizenship

Question: Should voters be required by law to show their ID, and what proof of citizenship should be necessary to register?

State law currently requires voters to present ID prior to voting. If the voter is personally known to an election worker, ID does not need to be shown.

Some Alaskans have urged a proof of citizenship requirement to register to vote. Today, Alaska requires a prospective voter to sign an affidavit attesting to his or her citizenship in the United States and in the State of Alaska.

If information is received that a voter is not qualified because they are not a U.S. citizen, the division requests verification of U.S. citizenship through the voter and/or the Immigration and Naturalization Service. If it is found that the voter is not a U.S. citizen, the division will inactivate the voter registration record.

Proof of citizenship is a sensitive area. In October 2010, Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals (Gonzales v. Arizona, 624 F.3d 1162, 9th cir. 2010) ruled that the Arizona Division of Elections could not require documents proving citizenship for new voter registrations. The court ruled that this violates federal law. The National Voter Registration Act (NVRA) allows voters to register without documentation but stipulates that lying about citizenship is perjury. The case is not resolved by the courts, but could have implications in Alaska. The division and the Department of Law will continue to monitor proceedings carefully.

When a voter registers to vote before a registrar, they must show identification. If no identification is provided, the registrar notes on the registration form that no ID was presented. When the division processes this form, the voter's identity is verified through the Division of Motor Vehicles (DMV) database and/or through a direct application between DMV and the Social Security Administration (SSA).

When a voter registers to vote by mail, their identity is verified through the DMV database and/or the SSA database.

If the identity of a voter who registered by mail or through a registrar without presenting ID cannot be verified through DMV or SSA, there is a notation made next to the voter's name on the precinct register that the voter must show identification. A voter who is personally known by an election worker cannot have the identification requirement waived if this notation is next to the voter's name on the precinct register.

II. (G) Election Contest – Certification

Question: Should the ground rules for defining an election contest be revised, since we've learned in 2010 that an election can be challenged before certification takes place?

Under Alaska State Statute, any defeated candidate or ten qualified voters may request a recount. The recount application must be received within five days following the completion of the state review board. The deadline for a recount involving a gubernatorial race is three days.

Currently, the statute regarding the timeline for bringing an election contest action says: "The action may be brought in the superior court within 10 days after the completion of the state review" (AS 15.20.550). Technically, an election contest action may be brought before certification now, so long as it is brought after state review. AS 15.15.440 sets out the process for state ballot review, and then AS 15.15.450 sets out the process for certification of the election after ballot review.

Election contest actions are entirely delineated in statute, so a change could be made, but the question remains whether it makes sense to make a change. The division needs to have the state review of an election complete so there is an official election result for the plaintiff to challenge in an election contest action.

Joe Miller challenged a state election in federal court. The federal court delayed state certification and neither the State of Alaska nor the state courts had control to lift the stay. The federal court did not "toll" or delay Mr. Miller's right to seek a recount, and he missed the opportunity to do so.

The situation that arose with the 2010 U.S. Senate litigation could have cost the state representation in the U.S. Senate. Changing the recount, recount appeal and election contest timeline can be detrimental to ensuring that the state has representation at the state and federal level.

Question: Why weren't all ballots counted by hand?

There were public comments received regarding the request by Joe Miller to have a hand-count of ballots for the U.S. Senate race. The process that took place regarding the write-in votes was solely for the purpose of determining how many votes were received by each write-in candidate from the total number of write-in votes cast. If Mr. Miller had requested a recount of the U.S. Senate election, it would have been granted; however the division never received such a request and therefore never conducted a recount.

As a matter of course, when a recount is requested, it is conducted by using the optical scan ballot tabulation equipment. The equipment is programmed to reject any ballot that is overvoted (more than one oval filled in) or undervoted (either entirely blank for the race being recounted or a mark that is too light for the tabulator to read). When a ballot is rejected it is placed in a box to be reviewed by the director. The director makes a decision whether or not to count the ballot and either party involved may challenge the decision. The challenged ballot is then sealed in an envelope to be preserved if it needs to be reviewed by the courts.

Each ballot is reviewed by observers and all ballots are subject to challenge.

During a recount, one precinct from each house district is randomly drawn for a hand-count verification.

To avoid confusion in the future, the division will post on their website the date the state review board has completed their review, which will indicate to candidates and voters that a recount request must be made within five days of that date.

There were also public comments received regarding the hand count verification process. This is a process in which one randomly drawn precinct that accounts for at least five percent of the total votes cast for the district is hand counted. If there is a discrepancy of greater than one percent, the entire district is recounted by hand. In the four years this requirement has been in statute, there has never been a need to recount the ballots for an entire district. Following the hand count verification from the 2010 General Election, copies of the paperwork were provided to observers from the Miller campaign.

II. (H) Voter Assistance

Question: What voter assistance is allowable?

Both state and federal law require that a voter be provided assistance at any time throughout the registration process and voting process. There are no limitations as to what level of assistance may be provided if requested by the voter.

Language assistance is specifically required by federal law.

The division provided, at voters' request, a list of qualified write-in candidates. Initially, an absentee voting site erroneously posted the list. Once the division learned about it, the list was immediately removed. Seventeen voters voted during the period the list was posted. These ballots were kept segregated, counted, and returned to their envelope in case of any future challenge. There were no challenges made to these ballots

The Alaska Democratic Party and the Alaska Republican Party filed a lawsuit against the division to prohibit the use of the write-in list. The Alaska Supreme Court upheld the use of the list ruling that it was consistent with Alaska's voter assistance statutes and did not violate state election regulations.

Public comments were received which stated that numerous ballots appeared to have the name of a write-in candidate written by the same person. Nothing in state law prohibits an election worker from assisting a voter with the writing of a candidate's name. This is an allowable form of voter assistance.

A number of write-in ballots were challenged due to similar handwriting. No evidence was presented to indicate this was the result of anything other than voter assistance or common penmanship among voters. This issue is also part of the complaint in current, active litigation in Perry et al. v. LG, SOA, 4FA-11-973 CI. Due to the past and current litigation, this report makes no recommendation on this issue.

Question: Is voter assistance documented?

The division does not instruct poll workers to document when a voter receives assistance, with the exception of language assistance. The division instructs poll workers, when requested, to provide any necessary voter assistance. The only type of assistance that is documented is the number of language assistance requests and the type of language. Poll workers are instructed to maintain a language assistance log. Voter names are not maintained on the log. The language assistance log is a method used by the division to determine where language assistance, especially Alaska Native language assistance, is needed to ensure there are bilingual poll workers in those areas.

II. (I) Public Information to Update Voter Lists

Question: What information on voters may be used to update voter lists?

Changes to a voter's residence address must be provided in writing by the voter.

Mailing address changes (not residence addresses) can be made based on information received from the USPS or based on information provided by the voter to the Permanent Fund Dividend program.

A voter's record may be inactivated when information is received from another state indicating that the voter is now registered in their state.

A voter's record may also be inactivated as a result of information received from the Division of Vital Statistics and the Department of Corrections.

The division has been following the "Upgrading Democracy Project," by PEW Center on the States. We have been invited, through this project, to compare voter registration lists with a wider array of data sources to broaden the base of information used to update and verify voter rolls. To participate, the State would need to share data Alaskans provide to the Division of Motor Vehicles. We have also been asked to share data from Permanent Fund Dividend records because voters have every reason to keep address records with the PFD division current. The division currently has access to PFD information but does not have complete access to DMV information that would further help verify our registration records, or further reach out to eligible citizens who are not registered to vote. The Division is considering the possibility of joining the "Upgrading Democracy Project," but it will not do so unless the privacy of Alaskans' personal data can be assured.

II. (J) Information on Who Has Voted

Question: Can we offer "real-time" updates on which voters have voted?

At this time the division does not offer a "real-time" or electronic update identifying which voters have voted. Nor does the division offer an hourly "carbon copy" of voters signing in to vote, as some other states do.

Poll watchers typically track this information on paper lists which match the list of voters for a specific precinct. They check off the names of voters as they vote and provide that information to campaigns and/or political parties. However, poll watchers are not allowed to see the registration rolls and can only glean voter information by listening.

The division will consult with a third party to research a "real-time" voter history system and a cost/benefit analysis of such a system.

II. (K) Party Participation and Access

Question: How do we ensure that political parties have full participation in and access to the election process?

The election process is open to all political parties, candidates, and the public. They have access to voter lists, absentee lists, and a presence at the review of absentee and questioned ballots, as well as the counting of these ballots.

The political parties are asked for names of individuals to serve as workers at polling places and as members of the state review board.

There are a large number of non-partisan and undeclared voters in the state. The division ensures that a board is not composed of only one party or another, but strives to ensure there is a combination. There are some precincts that may not have a worker that is registered as Republican or Democrat, but there are never boards that are entirely composed of only one party. There were occasions in 2010 when a board was composed of entirely non-affiliated workers.

Public comments were made stating that the division does not provide parties adequate notice regarding election worker and board appointments. The division will improve communication with the parties regarding election worker recruitment deadlines by providing multiple notices to them.

2010 Election Review
III. Department of Justice Review

Alaska, and all political subunits (boroughs, cities, school districts), are subject to the provisions of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. This section requires the state to obtain preclearance from the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) for any change affecting the voting process before the change is implemented.

Routine preclearance submissions requested by the division include changes to polling locations, precinct boundaries, regulation changes, legislative changes and changes to forms used by the division such as the voter registration application, absentee ballot application, voting instructions and posters.

DOJ has 60 days after receiving a preclearance submission to make any objection to the voting change.

III. (A) Examples of Changes Needing Preclearance

Changes affecting voting include, but are not limited to, the following examples:

1. Any change in qualifications or eligibility for voting.

2. Any change concerning registration, balloting and the counting of votes, and any change concerning publicity for or assistance in registration or voting.

3. Any change with respect to the use of a language other than English in any aspect of the electoral process.

4. Any change in the boundaries of voting precincts or in the location of polling places.

5. Any change in the constituency of an official or the boundaries of a voting unit (e.g., through redistricting, annexation, deannexation, incorporation, reapportionment, changing to at-large elections from district elections, or changing to district elections from at-large elections).

6. Any change in the method of determining the outcome of an election (e.g., by requiring a majority vote for election or the use of a designated post or place system).

7. Any change affecting the eligibility of persons to become or remain candidates, to obtain a position on the ballot in primary or general elections, or to become or remain holders of elective offices.

8. Any change in the eligibility and qualification procedures for independent candidates.

9. Any change in the term of an elective office or an elected official or in the offices that are elective (e.g., by shortening the term of an office, changing from election to appointment or staggering the terms of offices).

10. Any change effecting the necessity of or methods for offering issues and propositions for approval by referendum.

11. Any change affecting the right or ability of persons to participate in political campaigns which is affected by a jurisdiction subject to the requirement of Section 5.

III. (B) Pending Changes Needing DOJ Review

1. As a result of the creation of a new political group, the Alaska Constitution Party, and the removal of the political group, the Moderate Republican Party, the division is in the process of updating the procedures relating to the voter registration application, absentee ballot application, primary ballot choice poster and the voter identification card to reflect the political group changes. Once these forms are updated, they will have to be submitted to DOJ for preclearance.

2. Any change to Alaska Statutes or regulations relating to counting write-in votes or the rules of counting write-in votes, including voter intent will, need to be precleared by DOJ after passage and prior to implementation.

3. Any change to Alaska Statutes, regulations or forms relating to candidacy declaration requirements, including write-in candidates, will have to be precleared by DOJ after passage and prior to implementation.

4. Any change to Alaska Statutes relating to the date of the primary election will have to be precleared by DOJ after passage and prior to implementation.

5. Any changes to Alaska Statute and/or regulation for compliance with the MOVE Act will have to be precleared by DOJ after passage and prior to implementation.

6. Any changes to Alaska Statute and/or regulation relating to requirements for voter identification or for proof of citizenship to register will have to be precleared by DOJ after passage and prior to implementation.

7. Redistricting changes, including changes to precinct boundaries, must be precleared by DOJ after adoption and prior to implementation.

III. (C) Meeting with DOJ Personnel

Lieutenant Governor Treadwell and the Director of the Division of Elections met with staff from the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. on February 10, 2011 to discuss various Voters' Rights Act issues applicable to Alaska.

1. Preclearance

The Alaska delegation expressed appreciation for DOJ's cooperation in quickly preclearing the write-in list process for the 2010 General Election.

2. The MOVE Act

Alaska had initially thought it would not be able to meet the 45-day deadline for ballot distribution set out in the MOVE Act. The state had applied for a waiver from this requirement of the Act, and that waiver was denied. Division staff then worked with DOJ to find a way to comply with the MOVE Act, and DOJ's guidance was greatly appreciated in finding a solution to allow Alaska to meet the ballot distribution deadline.

3. Bail Out

The term "bail out" refers to the process by which covered jurisdictions may seek exemption from Section 5 coverage. In order to bail out, a covered jurisdiction needs to obtain a declaratory judgment from the District Court for the District of Columbia.

The bail out standard requires that a covered jurisdiction demonstrate nondiscriminatory behavior during the ten years prior to filing, and while the action is pending that it has taken affirmative steps to improve minority voting opportunities.

Discussion took place regarding the bail out process. DOJ clarified that the state may not apply for a bail out from the Voting Rights Act for ten years after the date that federal election observers are no longer in the state. The state received confirmation that it is not entitled to receive copies of the federal observer reports, as these reports are not subject to the Freedom of Information Act. On October 1, 2009, the Bethel Census Area was certified for federal observers, and to date observers have been present for state elections only in Bethel.

4. Pending State Legislation

DOJ was informed that there is legislation pending relating to elections and that the state, as always, would be submitting the legislation for preclearance prior to implementation. Clarification was received that if DOJ does not grant preclearance to a change in statute, the existing statute would remain in force.

5. Minority Language Assistance

DOJ is interested in seeing the state expand language assistance into more areas of the state and work towards strengthening the Inupiaq language assistance program.

2010 Election Review
IV. Issues for Third Party Review

Status of election security study recommendations

In 2007, then Lieutenant Governor Sean Parnell and the Division of Elections requested the UAA to conduct a study of Alaska's election security. Phase I of the study included a review of security studies conducted by other states and provided for a preliminary assessment of Alaska's election system. Phase II of the study provided for a detailed evaluation of Alaska's election system to provide recommendations that would strengthen both the technology and election procedures to mitigate any known security risks.

In evaluating Alaska's election system, the University reported that Alaska's election system is among the most secure in the country and is in good shape. In Phase II, the University provided several recommendations to further improve the security of Alaska's election system. The recommended changes were broken into two categories: changes recommended prior to the 2008 elections and changes recommended after the 2008 election.

Below is the status of each recommendation included in Phase II of the report:

IV. (A) Pre-election Recommendations

1. Verify the accuracy of voting technology before and after the election, by comparing code in voting machines with correct, registered code

   The division implemented the use of a hash code validation for all GEMS computers. This validation ensures that all GEMS computers are using the correct, registered code associated with the current software version. In addition, the GEMS computers are not connected to a network or internet and access to these computers is restricted to authorized personnel only.

2. Install new software that allows election officials to create a more secure password authentication system for touch-screen machines

   The division purchased and implemented the use of Key Card Tool which allowed the division to create their own authentication password and encryption keys for the touch screen units.

3. Change passwords on all voting technology throughout the system

   The division implemented procedures to change passwords on all hardware and software, including the BIOS, Windows and GEMS election database login passwords. The documented passwords for all systems are stored in a key safe in the director's office.

4. Use tamper-evident seals on shipping cases and envelopes

Prior to 2008, the memory cards used in the touch screen units were installed in the units prior to shipping. In 2008, the division implemented a policy that memory cards would be shipped separately from the unit in tamper evident envelopes. The division determined that since the units were not shipped with the memory cards installed, the division deemed that tamper-evident seals on shipping cases were not necessary.

In addition to tamper-evident seals on memory card envelopes, tamper-evident seals were placed on all voting equipment. One seal was placed on the optical scan unit that covered either the front or back seam and pre-drilled hole. One seal was placed on the touch screen unit that covered the seam and pre-drilled hole on the back of the machine. Division staff recorded the seal number used on each piece of voting equipment.

5. Add election security material to poll workers' training manuals.

Additional instructions were provided to election workers on equipment security that included a check list and procedures for seal inspection and what to do if the seal was broken. In addition, the division implemented the use of a security log for each piece of equipment. The log listed the tamper-evident seal number, instructions for inspection and a sign-off area for the election workers to sign and return to verify the seal number matched the number provided and that the seal was unbroken.

6. Increase security procedures in absentee polling locations

The division does not use voting equipment in absentee polling locations. The touch screen voting units used in the regional offices early voting stations were handled with the same security measures as the equipment used in the polling places. Absentee voting officials were provided with instructions on maintaining the security of their ballots and voting materials.

7. Purchase state-owned voting machines for use in North Slope Borough, rather than borrowing borough-owned machines

The division purchased optical scan units for the precincts in the North Slope Borough and initiated use of the units in the 2008 elections.

IV. (B) Post-election Recommendations

1. Upgrade voting machines and other technology to improved platform: Assure 1.2

   Assure 1.2 was federally certified by the United States Election Assistance Commission in August 2009. The division chose not to upgrade to Assure 1.2 for the 2010 General Election because the system provider, Premier Election Systems, was in the process of being acquired by Election Systems & Software (ES&S) which triggered an anti-trust violation investigation. This acquisition led to another vendor, Dominion Voting, obtaining the rights to the Assure 1.2 platform. Working with Dominion Voting, the division has begun the process to upgrade their ballot tabulation system to the Assure 1.2 platform. The upgrade will be completed in 2011.

2. Establish long-term security goals and a method for measuring progress

   The long-term security goals established by the division relate to the recommendations provided in the study. It is the policy of the division that the recommendations and improvements made for the 2008 election cycle will be maintained for all future elections unless other security issues are identified and addressed.

3. Improve testing processes to ensure that all voting technology is functioning properly and recording votes accurately

   The division adopted the University's increased scope of recommended logic and accuracy testing for the 2008 and 2010 election cycles. Memory cards used in the touch screen units were tested using a combination of an automatic and manual testing function. Memory cards used in the optical scan units were also tested following recommended test procedures. The State Ballot Review Board and the Regional Accu-Vote Boards and/or Accu-Vote Coordinators tested the memory cards. In addition to the memory card testing, a functionality test was conducted on all voting equipment used in the election to ensure the equipment was functioning properly prior to use during the election. The improved functionality, logic and accuracy testing performed by the division will be maintained for future elections.

4. Develop and implement a standard plan for tracking and changing passwords

   The division has implemented a standard to change all applicable passwords prior to the start of a statewide election cycle. Documentation of the passwords is maintained in a safe in the director's office.

5. Improve system for tracking the number and location of voting machines, through barcodes or other inventory control measures

   The division implemented a consistent inventory management system statewide. All offices are tracking voting equipment in a uniform manner.

6. Strengthen storage facilities for voting machines and other system components with dead-bolt locks, alarms, ceiling grids, self-locking doors, and other features to prevent forced entry

   A separate locked key safe in the director's office is used to store keys and password codes. The other division offices where equipment and keys are stored maintain physical security features such as alarms and dead-bolts.

7. Buy more secure shipping containers for optical-scanners

   The division increased the number of secure shipping containers for optical scan units during the 2008 election cycle, compared to previous elections. If additional containers are needed, the division will ensure an adequate supply is on hand for in the future.

8. Recruit and train more poll workers

   The division consistently strives to train all poll workers prior to each election cycle. The division had tremendous success during the 2008 and 2010 elections by having an adequate number of poll workers at each precinct. New security procedures were added as a component to the division's training for the 2008 and 2010 elections.

9. Consider partnerships with other institutions to conduct ongoing evaluation and implementation of improvements in election security technology

   The division believes that the implementation of the recommendations from Phase II of the UAA Study significantly increased the public's confidence in the integrity and accuracy of the election process and voting technology. The UAA Study is discussed fully in section IV of this report.

   As part of the election certification process, the division performs a hand-count verification of 5% of the ballots cast at the polls in each of the state's 40 house districts. The hand-count of the 2008 and 2010 election results verified that the state's ballot tabulation system accurately counted and reported election results.

10. Third Party Review

    In addition to the election security study, the division partnered with UAA Institute of Social and Economic Research to assist with outreach and improvements to the division's Yup'ik language assistance program. The division has benefited from these partnerships and will continue to pursue further partnerships.

    One specific area needing further research and partnership is a review of the division's post-election processes, including a review of the division's audit procedures and hand-count verification of election results. Public comments were received relating to audit standards. In addition, comments continue to be received relating to the accuracy and security of the division's ballot tabulation system.

Although the UAA election security study concluded that Alaska's election system is among the most secure in the country and has a number of safeguards, the study did not include a thorough review of post-election processes used by the division and used in other jurisdictions across the country.

Alaska is known for close elections and recounts. A thorough review of the post-election processes, including any recommended changes, will enhance the public's trust in Alaska's election system.

Other areas to be included for third party review are:

a) New review of ballot security issues
b) Audit to ensure that non-U.S. citizens are not voting
c) Audit to ensure that felons are not voting
d) Explore systems or methods that can provide for real-time voter history

2010 Election Review
V. Miscellaneous Public Comments

During the 2010 General Election review, Lieutenant Governor Treadwell solicited comments and input from the public, political parties and candidates. Information relating to the types of comments received were included throughout the election review in appropriate areas.

There were additional comments received that do not relate to a specific subject addressed in the report. A summary and response to those comments follows:

V. (A) Create a better environment for the military to vote

In 2000, the Department of Defense (DOD) issued a directive that polling places could not be established on military bases. At that time, the Division of Elections had established polling places on both Eielson Air Force Base and Fort Wainwright. Working through the late Senator Ted Steven's office, the division was able to maintain polling places on the military installations for the 2000 election cycle but was informed they would have to be moved for the 2001 municipal elections. The polling places for both installations were moved to off-base locations in 2001.

In 2003, the division was notified that DOD issued new election guidance indicating that if an installation facility had been designated as a polling place as of January 1, 1996 through December 31, 2000, the installation commanders could not deny the use of that facility as a polling place.

For the 2004 elections, the division investigated moving the polling places back onto both installations. Because the precinct boundaries for both installations include non-military voters, the division decided not to move the polling place back to the installations because non-military voters would have difficulty accessing the polling places.

The division suggests that under the new redistricting plan, the precinct boundaries be changed so that only installation boundaries are included in the precinct. When a precinct is wholly contained within the installations, the division can once again work with the military to establish polling places on the bases. This report recommends this change to the Redistricting Board.

V. (B) Provide notice of any change in practice or procedure

If the division decides to change a practice or process, ample notification of that change will be given.

The division follows the Administrative Procedures Act to adopt new regulations. Statutory changes can only be achieved through the legislative process. All changes that affect voting are sent to the U.S. Department of Justice for preclearance.

There are some internal policies that require emergency action and preclude prior public notice.

In order to improve public notification, the division will add a notice section to its website and post notices of public interest, such as filing deadline dates, withdrawal deadlines, and state review board dates. The election year events are captured on the public election calendar which is available on the division's website: http://www.elections.alaska.gov/doc/forms/H11.pdf.

V. (C) Open primary

The division does not have the authority to change the primary election structure. Only the legislature has that authority. The current primary election structure is a result of many years of litigation. Title 15 Of Alaska State Statute affirms that political parties have the right of freedom of association and can determine which candidates will appear on their ballots and which registered voters will have access to their party's ballot. These determinations are documented and codified in the political party by-laws. Party members who meet candidate qualifications are allowed to appear on the party primary ballot.

The history of Alaska's primary election has been influenced by litigation over primary elections, some of which reached the United States Supreme Court. On June 26, 2000, in California Democratic Party v. Jones, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that California's Blanket Primary violated political parties' First Amendment right of freedom of association. The court said political parties have the right to offer voting to self-identified members and not to the general electorate. At the time, Alaska's primary election was similar to California's primary election and thus the Jones case ruling also invalidated parts of Alaska's primary election law.

To comply with the Jones case ruling, the State of Alaska adopted emergency regulations that allowed the 2000 Primary Election to be conducted as a Party-Rule Ballot Primary.

During 2001 legislative session the Alaska State Legislature passed legislation that specified a primary election ballot was required for each political party in SCS CSHB 193(FIN).

Shortly after the 2002 General Election, the Green Party and Republican Moderate Party filed suit, challenging the requirement of separate party primary ballots. In 2005, the Alaska Supreme Court, in Green Party et. al. v. State of Alaska et. al. prevented the state from enforcing the provision in election law requiring separate party primary ballots. This ruling affirmed the earlier superior court ruling which allowed parties to decide if they wanted to appear on a Combined Party ballot. Parties were required to provide information to the state if they wanted to appear on the Combined Party ballot and indicate which voters would have access to their ballot.

In response to the Green Party case ruling, the Republican Party chose to include only Republican candidates on its primary ballot and provide ballot access to only those voters registered as republican, nonpartisan or undeclared.

As an initial response to the Green Party case ruling, the Alaska Libertarian Party, Alaskan Independence Party, Republican Moderate Party, and the Green Party of Alaska agreed to be on a combined ballot that would be available to all registered voters. (Both the Green Party and the Republican Moderate Party lost recognized political party status as a result of the 2005 ruling allowing the Combined Party Primary ballot.)

Currently, the Alaska Democratic Party appears on a ballot with the Alaskan Independence Party, and the Alaska Libertarian Party. Any registered voter may have access to this ballot.

V. (D) Ballot counting machines can be hacked

As previously mentioned in Section IV of the report, UAA conducted a study of Alaska's election system and found that the state's election system is among the most secure in the nation. Unlike other studies conducted, the UAA study examined not only voting technologies but also policies and procedures that add to the security of the system. UAA found that there are multiple steps, procedures and security features that make the system safe and provided recommendations to further improve the security of Alaska's election system.

To date, the division has implemented all but one of UAA's recommendations and will have the recommendations fully implemented in 2011. The final recommendation for implementation is for the division to upgrade the ballot tabulation system to the Assure 1.2 platform, which will address many of the security risks identified with the state's ballot tabulation system software (GEMS). The security recommendations provided by UAA and adopted by the division, along with the Assure 1.2 upgrade, will continue to ensure that Alaska's election system is secure. In addition, performing the hand-count verification of election results will continue to ensure the system is accurate.

V. (E) Faxed ballots are transcribed – precautions to prevent fraud

Under both state and federal law, the division must provide for electronic voting. Blank ballots are transmitted to voters via fax machine. Once voted, the ballot can be returned by mail or fax.

An electronically transmitted ballot, whether mailed or faxed, cannot be counted by the division's optical scan counting equipment because it is on plain paper, not on official ballot stock.

6AAC 25.065 allows the bi-partisan absentee ballot review board members to produce a facsimile ballot that exactly indicated the candidates chosen by the voter using ballot stock that can then be read by the optical scan tabulator.

When producing facsimile ballots, one person marks the ballot while another person, of a different political party, verifies the ballot was marked correctly. This ensures that the facsimile ballot is marked for the same candidates as the original ballot. Any observer present during the review is allowed to review the ballot.

If a facsimile was not produced for faxed ballots, the ballots would have to be hand-counted. The division believes this would impact the amount of time it takes to count and report election results. The division will monitor new methods to allow machine counting of ballots received by electronic means.

V. (F) Special Advance Ballots

State law requires the division to send a special advance ballot to any registered voter who notifies the division they are living, working or traveling outside the United States at the time of the election, or in a remote area of the state where distance, terrain, or other natural conditions deny the voter reasonable access to a polling place at the time of the election.

This ballot must be sent starting 60 days prior to each state primary, general or special election.

Because the candidate withdrawal deadline has not yet occurred (48 days prior to an election), the ballot is printed with only race headings and a blank line for the voter to write the name of the candidate they wish to vote for. Each voter is sent a list of certified candidates and instructions on how to vote their ballot.

For a general election, the special advance ballots are sent prior to the election being certified. Therefore, a candidate list is sent containing the names of all candidates that appeared on the primary election ballot. The voter is given information regarding the candidate list, that the election has not yet been certified, therefore not all candidates appearing on the list will have advanced to the general election ballot. They are given the option of voting by political party as well as by candidate name.

As prescribed in state election law, Lisa Murkowski remained an official candidate and her name remained on the special advance candidate list until the election was certified.

All voters receiving a special advance ballot are also sent the official ballot once it is available. Voters are instructed to vote and return both ballots. The division will count the official ballot if received timely. If the official ballot is not received in time by the division, but the special advance ballot is, the division will count the special advance ballot.

To comply with the MOVE Act, the recommendation is for a change in state statute to allow the division to mail special advance ballots 45 days prior to each election to all UOCAVA voters and voters working or traveling outside the U.S. and those in remote Alaska.

V. (G) Use of stickers on ballots

Since the division implemented the current ballot tabulation system, the use of stickers has been prohibited by state law.

The division has recently spoken with representatives from the division's ballot tabulation equipment provider. There is presently no voting equipment manufactured or certified that accommodates the use of stickers. Vendors do not recommend their use because of potential damage to equipment and the potential for miscalculations of votes for not only the write-in candidates but other candidates as well.

STATE OF ALASKA
DEPARTMENT OF LAW

TEL. NO.: (907) 465-3600

FILE NO.: JU2010201740

SUBJECT: Sections 4, 36 and 37, CSSB 46(FIN) Contingency, Non-severability, and Legislative Intent Language

Introduction

As you requested, we have reviewed the contingency language in section 36, CSSB 46(FIN),[1] the non-severability provisions in section 37, and the legislative intent in section 4.[2] As set forth more fully below, our advice to you is as follows:

(1) The Alaska Constitution establishes an appropriations process in which (a) the Governor is required to submit a budget for the legislature's consideration; (b) the legislature has the power to pass appropriation bills; (c) the Governor has line item veto authority of appropriations; and (d) the legislature has authority to override the Governor's veto.

(2) Section 36 of CSSB46(FIN) links together all of the appropriation items contained in section 4 of the bill and requires enactment of all or none, without reduction.

(3) This condition is unconstitutional and unenforceable because it deprives the Governor of his constitutionally authority to review and reduce or strike individual appropriation items that do not serve the State's best interests.

(4) Section 37 provides that if the condition in section 36 is invalid, all of the appropriation items that have been linked together in section 4 of the bill become invalid as well.

[1] Work Draft 27-GS1740\T, ("CSSB 46(FIN)").

[2] Legislative intent language in section 4 expresses that "the package of appropriations and projects listed [in section 4] are all necessary to achieve a statewide balance in addressing the state's diverse energy needs."

(5) Because enforcement of this provision by a reviewing court would usurp the Governor's constitutionally assigned power to line item individual appropriation items, it is void and severable from the legislation.

Analysis

If enacted, the contingency language in section 36 of CSSB 46(FIN), the non-severability provisions in section 37, and the legislative intent in section 4 each would violate the Alaska Constitution in two ways: (1) by improperly impairing the Governor's line item veto power (art. II, section 15), and (2) by violating the confinement clause (art. II, section 13).

Governor's Constitutional Veto Power

Alaska's constitutional convention delegates intended to "create a strong executive branch with 'a strong control on the purse strings' of the state." Thomas v. Rosen, 569 P.2d 793, 795 (Alaska 1977). The Constitution gives the Governor this strong control in part by granting the Governor the power "by veto, [to] strike or reduce items in appropriation bills," commonly known as line item veto authority.[3]

The Alaska Constitution establishes an appropriations process in which (a) the Governor is required to submit a budget for the legislature's consideration (art. IX, section 12); (b) the legislature has the power to pass appropriation bills (art. II, secs. 1 and 13); (c) the Governor has line item veto authority of appropriations (art. II, sec 15); and (d) the legislature has authority to override the Governor's veto (art. II, sec. 16). Simpson v. Murkowski, 129 P.3d 435, 446 (Alaska 2006). Sections 36 and 37 of CSSB 46(FIN) would violate this process by negating the Governor's constitutional power to strike or reduce the individual energy project appropriation items in section 4.

Section 36 violates the Governor's constitutional powers by linking the appropriation for each energy project item to the passage and enactment of every other appropriation made in section 4, without reduction. This would usurp the Governor's line item veto power, thus upsetting the checks and balances between the executive and legislative branches. If the legislature could link one appropriation to another (or to 50 other appropriations), the legislature would eliminate the Governor's power to strike or reduce individual line items. The Governor would have only two choices — to accept or to veto every appropriation as a group. Allowing the linking of appropriations with such a contingency would too easily permit the legislature to circumvent the Governor's constitutional veto authority. See Karcher v. Kean, 479 A.2d 403, 412 (New Jersey 1984).[4]

Section 37 exacerbates this constitutional violation by doubling the unconstitutional linkage of appropriations for energy projects. If a court finds the contingency in section 36 to be invalid, the legislature attempts to achieve the same result through different means—by making that contingency provision non-severable from the energy project appropriations. Thus, even if section 36 does not survive court challenge,, the legislature would still circumvent the Governor's line item veto power if a court upholds section 37. The bill effects an "all or nothing" approach to energy project appropriations either through application of either the contingency provision of section 36 or, if that does not work, through the non-severability provision of section 37.

A non-severability clause that would enable a legislature to overstep its constitutional authority would itself be unconstitutional and severable from legislation. See Legislative Research Comm'n v. Brown, 664 S.W.2d 907, 919 (Ky. 1984) (applying statutory severability clause to void and sever a non-severability clause used as part of a legislative attempt to usurp the Governor's constitutional authority). Upholding section 37 of CSSB 46(FIN) would promote the legislature's desire to unconstitutionally logroll the appropriations for multiple energy projects. These improper purposes underlying section 37 should lead a court to invalidate and, under AS 01.10.030, sever the non-severability clause from CSSB 46(FIN).

These contingency and non-severability provisions create inherent harm to Alaska's appropriation process. Even if the Governor were to choose not to line item veto any appropriation made in section 4, each appropriation would still be subject to legal challenge. Section 37's non-severability clause would invalidate every appropriation in section 4 if the legislature's attempt to usurp the Governor's constitutional veto powers with the section 36 contingencies is held to be unlawful. Any litigant opposed to even a single energy project contained in section 4 could effectively invalidate every section 4 appropriation by successfully challenging section 36.

[4] This would lead to uncontrolled "logrolling," — "the practice of adding together in a single bill provisions supported by various legislators in order to create a legislative majority" — and would significantly limit the Governor's strong control on the purse strings. Richard Briffault, The Item Veto in State Courts, 66 Temp. L.Rev. 1171, 1177 (1993), quoted in Alaska Legislative Council v. Knowles, 21 P.3d 267, 373 n.33 (Alaska 2001).

This litigation risk would place a cloud over each appropriation that could impair the development of important energy projects. Sections 36 and 37 will potentially jeopardize the funding for energy projects until a court rules on the validity and severability of both sections. Until that time, no project proponent could rely on the availability of funds for an energy project from the section 4 appropriation. This uncertainty would make it difficult for project proponents to obtain necessary contracts to develop energy projects, and they may be exposed to contract damages if a project must be stopped because an expected appropriation is invalidated. It would also be difficult or impossible for a project proponent to finance additional project costs if funding from an appropriation is uncertain. Any lender or bond financing will require that all project funding be secured before additional financing will be made available on reasonable financial terms.

These legal risks would arise solely in the context of the legislature's attempt to usurp the Governor's constitutional power to exercise line item vetoes. A court should invalidate and sever sections 36 and 37 to avoid the harm done to the constitutional appropriation process. Severing those provisions would still leave the legislature with ultimate control over funding for the energy projects. If the Governor were to line item veto any of the appropriation items in section 4, the legislature has constitutional power to override that veto. Alaska Const. art. II, § 16. This legislative power makes the legislature's attempt in sections 36 and 37 to negate the Governor's constitutional veto power even more suspect.

In sum, the invasion of executive power functions make the contingency language in section 36 and the non-severability clause in section 37 unconstitutional under Article II, section 15, invalid, and severable from the legislation under AS 01.10.030.

Confinement Clause

The confinement clause (art. II, sec. 13) of the Alaska Constitution provides that "[b]ills for appropriations shall be confined to appropriations." In State Legislature v. Hammond, Judge (now Chief Justice) Carpeneti adopted a five-factor test to determine whether language added to an appropriations bill violates the confinement clause:

> (1) The qualifying language must not administer the program of expenditures;

(2) It must not enact law or amend existing law;

(3) It must be the minimum necessary to explain the Legislature's intent regarding how the money appropriated is to be spent;

(4) The language must be germane, that is, appropriate, to an appropriations bill; and,

(5) It must not extend beyond the life of the appropriation.[5]

The Alaska Supreme Court adopted Judge Carpeneti's test on a "nonexclusive" basis in Alaska Legislative Council v. Knowles, 21 P.3d 367, 377 (Alaska 2001).[6]

The contingency, non-severability, and legislative intent language in secs. 4, 36 and 37 violate the Hammond test in several ways. The legislature in these sections of the bill links multiple appropriations the legislature believes are necessary to implement a state energy policy based upon AS 44.99.115. But, AS 44.99.115 does not mandate that energy policy must be implemented by linking energy projects or appropriations. The relevant statutory energy policy language underlying the lintent expressed in section 4 is:

> "Therefore, it is the policy of the state to . . . (2) encourage economic development by . . . (C) working to identify and assist with development of the most cost-effective, long-term sources of energy for each community."

AS 44.99.115(2)(C). This portion of the state energy policy encourages state agencies to work with individual communities to identify and develop cost effective sources of energy. Nothing in AS 44.99.115(2)(C), nor the remainder of that AS 44.99.115, makes state assistance to individual communities for the types of energy projects listed in section 4 dependent upon state assistance being provided "to achieve a statewide balance in addressing the state's diverse energy needs." Quoting section 4, CSSB 46(FIN). To the contrary, placing at risk the funding for any (and every) of the important energy projects listed in section 4 undercuts the statutory state energy policy by impairing the assistance which otherwise would be provided to develop "the most cost-effective, long-term sources of energy for each community." AS 44.99.115(2)(C). The legislature's attempt to link "the package" of appropriations and energy projects for a statewide balance does not implement AS 44.99.115. Rather, the linkage exhibits improper logrolling as legislators attempt to ensure funding for the listed projects.

To the extent that the linkage of projects is intended to be connected to a state energy policy or program, the linkage would both create and control a new state energy policy or program, violating the confinement clause under the Hammond test. Alaska Legislative Council v. Knowles, 21 P.3d 367, 377 (Alaska 2001). The legislative attempts to control how monies are spent on energy projects violates several parts of the Hammond test, as well as violating the separation of powers doctrine, which grants the power to administer the energy policy and program to the executive branch. The attempt to control expenditures violates part one of the Hammond test related to legislative attempts to administer programs of expenditure. The attempt to change and control the scope of the state energy policy also demonstrates a legislative attempt to modify the existing law related to energy policy, violating part two of the Hammond test.

The contingency, non-severability and intent language also violates the Hammond requirement that legislative appropriation language be limited to the "minimum necessary" to explain the appropriation. The Alaska Supreme Court has explained that this "minimum necessary" factor limits the legislature's ability to include substantive law in an appropriation bill by cloaking it as a "description." Alaska Legislative Council v. Knowles, 21 P.3d at 377-78. The attempt by the legislature to control the scope of the energy policy program by linking many appropriations and projects cloaks into the appropriation bill those substantive law results that the legislature desires to implement. This violates the "minimum necessary" component of the Hammond test.

The contingency, non-severability, and intent language also violate the germaneness test. Under the germaneness test, the Alaska Supreme Court observed in Alaska Legislative Council v. Knowles, 21 P.3d at 379, courts generally will uphold conditions expressed as purposes for the appropriation. Thus, courts will generally uphold appropriation language identifying the facilities, employee positions, buildings or types of buildings on which the money could be spent. And courts will uphold contingencies on appropriations that relate to the receipt or nonreceipt of specific funds, or relate to the occurrence or nonoccurrence of something that would make the expenditure desirable. However, contingencies that relate to things other than the need for or use of the money or the need for the activity, may be found insufficiently "connected" to the appropriation.' Id.

The contingency, non-severability, and intent language in secs. 4, 36, and 37 of CSSB 46(FIN) likewise violate the germaneness test. Each appropriation for each energy project in section 4 stands on its own. Each appropriation will fund a separate and distinct energy project that promotes The attempt in sections 36 and 37 of CSSB 46(FIN) to link the appropriation for each energy project in section 4 to the multiple appropriations for multiple other energy projects goes beyond what is germane to an appropriation bill.

In sum, the contingency and intent language, if enacted, would specifically violate multiple parts of the Hammond test, and would be unconstitutional under the Article II, section 13, of the Alaska Constitution.

Conclusion

Because the contingency language in section 36, the non-severability clause in section 37, and the legislative intent language in section 4 of CSSB 46(FIN), usurps the Governor's line item veto power (art. II, section 15) and violates the containment clause (art. II, section 13), a reviewing court will likely find these provisions unenforceable.

The Constitutionality of Sections 48(a) and 49 of CSSB 46 (FIN) (S) Version of Bill

I. Relevant Provisions of the Bill

A. Section 48(a) [1]

"*Sec. 48. CONTINGENCIES. (a) Each of the appropriations made in sec. 4 of this Act is contingent on passage by the Twenty-Seventh Alaska State Legislature and enactment into law of every appropriation, without reduction of any appropriation, made in sec. 4 of this Act."

B. Section 49 [2]

"*Sec. 49. NONSEVERABLILITY. Notwithstanding AS 01.10.030, in the event that a court of competent jurisdiction finds the contingency in sec. 48(a) of this Act is invalid, then the contingency in sec. 48(a) of this Act is not severable from the appropriations made in sec. 4 of this Act if

[2] p 145 ln 29 – p 146 ln 6

(1) the governor has vetoed, whether by striking or reducing, any appropriation in sec. 4 of this Act; and

(2) the legislature, by action or inaction, has failed to override all vetoes of, including reductions to, appropriations made in sec. 4 of this Act in the time and manner allowed under art. II, sec. 16, Constitution of the State of Alaska."

C. Section 4 [3]

Contains 105 appropriations from around the state, ranging from $20,000[4] to $65,700,000[5], covering 12 pages of the bill.

II. Relevant Constitutional Provisions

A. Article II, Section 15

"15. Veto ~ The Governor may veto bills passed by the legislature. He may, by veto, strike or reduce items in appropriation bills. He shall return any vetoed bill, with a statement of his objections, to the house of origin."

B. Article II, Section 16 provides in relevant part:

"16. Action Upon Veto ~ Upon receipt of a veto message during a regular session of the legislature, the legislature shall meet immediately in joint session and reconsider passage of the vetoed bill or item. Bills to raise revenue and appropriation bills or items, although vetoed, become law by affirmative vote of three-fourths of the membership of the legislature...."

III. Constitutional Arguments

A. Article II, Section 15

This provision provides that the governor has the right to "veto, strike or reduce items in appropriation bills." Because, as discussed in the other memoranda, sections 48(a) and 49 would deny him this right, they are unconstitutional. Each appropriation in section 4 is a separate item, being independent from all others. Merely relating to "energy" does not make them so interdependent that they would be considered separate items, any more than separate roads would be, though they were interconnected. Even if it could be argued that some projects depend upon others or are related to them, by tying so many items together under section 36, the legislation is fatally overbroad.

I also note that section 48(a) says, "each of the appropriations made in sec. 4 of this Act is contingent on...enactment into law of every appropriation, without reduction of any appropriation, made in sec. 4 of this Act."[6] Similarly, section 49 refers to "the appropriations made in sec. 4 of this Act"[7], "any appropriation in sec. 4 of this Act"[8], and "all vetoes of, including reductions to, appropriations made in sec. 4 of this Act."[9] This language shows that the legislators, themselves, considered each appropriation a separate line item.

The primary purpose of the sentences in Article II Section 15 permitting the line item veto or reduction is to give the governor the flexibility to veto or reduce individual appropriations and, secondarily, to prevent logrolling by the legislature. Operating together, sections 48(a) and 49 frustrate these purposes.

At the same time, Article II Sections 14[10], 15, and 16 set forth the procedure to pass bills (including appropriations), veto legislation and line item veto or reduce appropriation items[11], and override vetoes[12]. Taken together, they operate to limit the legislature's authority vis à vis the governor to the procedure specified.

Though advocates of section 48(a) and 49 argue that the legislature may specify that certain provisions of law are non-severable, that argument cannot prevail when the result would be unconstitutional. For example, if an appropriation item provided that it could only be spent on an unconstitutional purpose (for example to aid in discrimination or the promotion of a particular religion), and if it were made the subject of a non-severability clause that would cause the entire budget bill or a large part of it to fall, undoubtedly courts would refuse to enforce the non-severability clause, because enforcing it would lead to an unconstitutional result.

In State v. A.L.I.V.E. Voluntary, 606 P.2d 769 (Alaska 1980), the Alaska Supreme Court held that the legislature could not annul regulations by concurrent regulation, because that would circumvent the constitutional legislative process, including the governor's right to veto the annulling legislation.

[10] Article II, Section 14 sets forth the procedure by which the legislature enacts bills into law.
[11] Article II, Section 15, supra.
[12] Article II, Section 16, supra.

In Legislative Research Commission v. Brown, 664 S.W. 2d 907, 925, 927-28 (Ky. 1984), the Kentucky Supreme Court applied similar reasoning to hold unconstitutional a statute requiring "the budget to be introduced as a resolution, rather than a bill." 664 S.W. 2d at 925 (emphasis in original). The language of that case is, in my opinion, both instructive and persuasive. Kentucky Constitution Section 88, like Article II, Section 15, giving the governor line item veto power, refers to appropriation "bills" not resolutions. Both constitutional provisions provide the method by which bills must be sent to the governor "for either approval or disapproval (veto). See 644 S.W. 2d at 928, Alaska Constitution Article II, Section 15. They both also specifically allow line item veto by the governor.

No case has been cited containing sections like sections 48(a) and 49. The closest analogy is Brown. However, because the effect of the two sections is the same as the resolution in Brown -- to deprive the governor of the ability to "veto, strike or reduce items in appropriation bills" -- I believe Brown would be followed by Alaskan courts.

This conclusion is supported by the Alaska Supreme Court's decision in A.L.I.V.E. There, as stated above, the court struck down a statute authorizing the annulment of regulations by resolution, because it deprived the governor of the right to veto legislation that would annul regulations. Applying the same reasoning to the two sections at issue here, I believe Alaska courts would be likely to follow Brown, and declare the two sections unconstitutional and allow line item vetoes to stand.

B. Article II, Section 16

This section sets forth the procedure to override a gubernatorial veto. The legislature must meet in joint session with each legislator getting an equal vote, having received the governor's veto message "with a statement of his objections"[13], to reconsider passage "of the vetoed bill or item". "Appropriation bills or items"[14] will still become law, despite the veto, if "three fourths of the membership of the legislature" vote to override the veto.

The entire process, in Article II, Section 16 is unconstitutionally thwarted by sections 48(a) and 49. Because sections 48(a) and 49 eliminate the entire line item veto process, the procedure in Article II, Section 16 is unconstitutionally denied.

Both the governor and the legislature are denied the right to have the legislature consider the governor's veto message on an item-by-item basis.

By passing sections 48(a) and 49 as part of one capital appropriation bill, requiring only 11 senate votes (as opposed to 21 house votes), all legislators votes are not considered equally as they must be under Article II, Section 16, which states that "the legislature shall meet… in joint session…. [A]ppropriation bills or items, although vetoed, become law by affirmative vote of three-fourths of the membership of the legislature…."

Not only does this violation have the effect of (1) giving senators more power than they are allowed and representatives less power than they are entitled to, but it also (2) denies the minority on the issue (those who vote to sustain the vetoes) the weight to which they are entitled under Article II, Section 16. Constitutionally three fourths of the members (45 legislators) must vote to override. Only 16 members (1/4 plus one) need vote to sustain vetoes. However, in passing sections 48(a) and 49 as part of a budget bill, only 32 votes (21 plus 11) are required. Conversely, under Article II, Section 16, only 16 members need vote to sustain vetoes, while under Article II, Section 14[15], 29 are required to block passage of the appropriation bill. These are additional constitutional rights of legislators, both individually and collectively, that are protected under the constitution.

[13] See Article II, Section 15
[14] Emphasis added

Though no case has been found directly on point, for these reasons I conclude that sections 48(a) and 49 also violate Article II, Section 16 of the Alaska Constitution.

I believe it is important to consider Article II, Section 16 for another reason as well. All the reported cases that have been cited involve the balance of power between the executive and legislative branches. Article II Section 16 involves the balance of power within the legislature – both (1) between the houses (legislating together with each member getting an equal vote as opposed to legislating separately, with each senator having twice the voting power of each representative), and (2) between the majority and minority on the issue of veto-override (only 32 votes are needed to pass the bill, while 45 votes are need to override the vetoes under the constitution).

Finally, these arguments on Article II, Section 16 give each legislator a direct and individual interest in any resulting litigation. First, these issues give legislators individually and collectively legal standing to enforce their constitutional rights and the right to intervene, individually or collectively, in any litigation as a matter of right.[16]

MEMORANDUM May 3, 2011

SUBJECT: Outline of Contingency and Nonseverability Discussion

TO: Representative Max Gruenberg

FROM: Doug Gardner
Director

You asked for a sui generis discussion of the contingency and nonseverability clauses after receiving my last memorandum. I agreed to put ideas down on paper that are a departure from the opinions previously issued based on current case law. Below are the ideas that are a product of our conversations, and other ways of looking at these two issues. I am also attaching a case I believe you may wish to read in detail, as I believe it addresses the discussion you are focusing on. This case was cited in my last memo to you.

I. OVERVIEW -- CROSS-CONTINGENCIES

A. The purpose of the line item veto is reduction of the total budget; not allowing the governor to decide the object of expenditure. Constitutional Convention, and Knowles.

B. Contingencies, including cross-contingencies, if triggered, also reduce expenditures.

C. The danger of cross-contingencies is that they may reduce the governor's incentive to exercise the line item veto, thereby having the effect of allowing expenditures to be too high (i.e., line item veto won't be used to reduce the budget). A counter argument is that the governor can still "strike or reduce," but the consequences are significant.

D. To balance the governor's "strike or reduce" function with the legislature's allocation function is to allow cross-contingencies, but only if there is a very close nexus between them.

E. Nexus: In descending order of likelihood that a court would uphold:

1. Physical -- dam and transmission lines;
2. Financial -- bonding, etc.;
3. Functional -- salary for director of group and other funding for group;

4. Equitable distribution (distributing related dollars -- schools, energy projects -- across the state).

F. Legal Basis

1. Ask the court to expand the definition of "item" in Knowles to include tied appropriations that meet an appropriate nexus requirement. The definition of "item" in Knowles is quite clear, but Knowles was not addressing a contingency that involved other appropriations, but confinement. This approach is problematic given the well-settled case law and definition of "item."

2. Simply uphold contingency, so long as an appropriate nexus is present. See attached case; Brault v. Holleman, 230 S.E.2d 238 (VA 1976). This would be more consistent with the Knowles analysis. The argument would be that there are limits with a nexus test on cross-contingencies in appropriations, and that given the established nexus, the asserted infringement on the governor's "strike or reduce" line item veto power would be reduced. There is no log rolling in this approach.

II. OTHER APPROACHES AVOIDING CROSS CONTINGENCIES

A. Two appropriation bills. Send out the endangered appropriations, wait for the governor's vetoes, then send out the governor's favorites. This approach is simple, but doesn't deal with really linked appropriations, and is more useful when the "linkage" is political.

B. Lump sum appropriation (X dollars for projects A, B, and C to a public corporation (AEA)). The governor cannot line out A, B, or C, but, the executive does have the power to allocate dollars to projects, but AEA may, which might have the affect of eliminating or reducing some projects.

C. Substantive Law.

1. Create an executive branch program and let the executive branch produce a list, then appropriate for "items 1 - whatever is on the list."

2. Establish a list of projects in statute, with either dollar amounts or a percentage attached to each project. See AS 29.60.700 for dollar approach and AS 23.15.835 for percentage approach. The governor may veto the entire substantive bill, but cannot delete projects.

III. SEVERABILITY

Severability gives the legislature the ability to decide that, if its contingency (of whatever type) won't work, it doesn't want to make the appropriation at all. The court will assume nonseverability -- the Knowles court explicitly did -- but the severability clause preserves the legislature's final decision. One argument is that nonseverability discourages use of the line item veto, or challenges to the contingency, but it also means that the legislature has to be willing to lose all the appropriations if the contingency fails. Perhaps this symmetry is the sign that the constitution has perfect checks and balances, where both the legislature and the executive go back to zero if there is a veto and an enforceable nonseverability clause. Not giving effect to a severability clause will diminish the legislature's power to appropriate in the first place. The legislature would be reluctant to put in contingencies or perhaps unwilling to appropriate at all, if it believed its nonseverability clause would not be honored.

MEMORANDUM April 29, 2011

SUBJECT: Line Item Veto, Nonseverability Clause, and Contingency Language in CSSB 46(FIN)

TO: Representative Max Gruenberg

FROM: Brian Kane BJK Legislative Counsel
and Doug Gardner
Director

1. Does the art. II, sec. 15, line item veto power of the governor "trump" a non-severability clause included in an appropriations bill by the legislature? Is an appropriations bill an appropriate bill in which to have a nonseverability clause?

It is unlikely that a governor's line item veto power would trump a nonseverability clause like the one in CSSB 46(FIN). Essentially, the nonseverability clause is an expression of the legislature's intent regarding certain portions of a bill. In the current scenario, the nonseverability clause directly relates to the legislature's not wanting to expend the funds in sec. 4 of the bill if the contingency is held invalid by a court. The legislature is stating to a court that, had it known the contingency would not be upheld, it would not have appropriated those funds in sec. 4 of the bill at all -- or at the very least would have appropriated them differently. The argument that the line item veto would trump the nonseverability clause in this instance would come awfully close to giving the governor the power to actually expend money himself. If the legislature's intent was for all of sec. 4 to be deleted if the contingency was held invalid, then allowing some projects to remain in that section that were not line item vetoed is having money appropriated for projects against the will of the legislature.

While art. II, sec. 15 of the state constitution gives the governor the power by veto to "strike or reduce items in an appropriations bill," this is clearly a situation of the governor being given some part of what is generally a legislative function (controlling the expenditure of state funds). It does not seem likely that a specifically carved out power like the line item veto would trump the legislature's intent in performing its legislative duty of making -- or not making -- appropriations.

In the memo released on April 26th, the attorney general cited Legislative Research Comm'n v. Brown, 664 S.W.2d 907, 919 (Ky. 1984), arguing that this case supports the proposition that the nonseverability language in sec. 37, constitutes a similar separation of powers violation. In Brown, there were two nonseverability provisions that the court addressed. The first nonseverability provision that the court addressed, involved legislation that placed a restriction on the executive, effectively eliminating the executive's ability to pass regulations that were not approved by a legislative body called the LRC. The legislation also provided for a nonseverability clause that provided if the LRC could not review regulations with the authority to "veto proposed regulations," that the executive could not issue any further regulations. Id. at 919. The court found that the nonseverability clause so interfered with and reallocated the constitutional powers of the executive to the legislative branch, that it refused to enforce the nonseverability clause. This is the portion of Brown that the attorney general cited to in his memorandum.

Reading further in Brown, there was a second nonseverability clause that the court addressed. This second nonseverability clause involved legislation that provided that the LRC had the power to modify any application by the executive branch or overrule the executive branch's decision to apply for a federal block grant. Id. at 928. As previously discussed, the Brown court found that the LRC's usurping of the executive branch's power was a separation of powers violation. So the question for the court was whether to enforce a separate nonseverability clause, that provided, "if any section of K[entucky] R[evised] S[tatute] 45.351 to KRS 45.358 is declared unconstitutional, then no block grant money received from the United States government shall be spent. . . ." Id. (emphasis in original) The Supreme Court of Kentucky held since the "adoption of the state budget" is within the purview of the legislature, the nonseverability clause related to the budget would be upheld. Accordingly, the Brown decision does not necessarily stand for the proposition that all nonseverability clauses are unenforceable; clearly in the context of appropriations, the Brown case stands for the proposition that a nonseverability clause in the context of an appropriation is enforceable. Brown is perhaps more supportive of the legislature's prerogative to appropriate in the manner it chooses, and include a nonseverability clause in an appropriations bill if it is not permitted to appropriate in the manner it chooses.

The best guidance on how a court might approach a nonseverability clause comes from the U.S. Supreme Court's reasoning in Alaska Airlines v. Brock, 480 U.S. 678, 680 (1987), where the Court held:

> Unless it is evident that the Legislature would not have enacted those provisions which are within its power, independently of that which is not, the invalid part may be dropped if what is left is fully operative as law. . . . The final test . . . is the traditional one: the unconstitutional provision must be severed unless the statute created in its absence is legislation that Congress would not have enacted.

Id. at 684-85.

In summary, based on the reasoning in Alaska Airlines v. Brock, and the Brown court's upholding the nonseverability clause in the context of block grant appropriations, the presence of a nonseverability clause would likely be seen by a reviewing court as strong, if not irrefutable, evidence of the legislature's intent that the legislature did not intend to enact the legislation if it could not do so in the manner that it originally chose.

As for a potential confinement clause issue (i.e. substantive law in an appropriations bill) relating to the non-severability clause, in Knowles v. Legislative Council, 21 P.3d 367 (Alaska 2001), the state Supreme Court established a five-part test for substantive contingencies related to appropriations:

> [T]he qualifying language must be the minimum necessary to explain the Legislature's intent regarding how the money appropriated is to be spent. It must not administer the program of expenditures. It must not enact law or amend existing law. It must not extend beyond the life of the appropriation. Finally, the language must be germane, that is appropriate, to an appropriations bill.

Id. at 377. In taking these one by one, it first appears that one could argue that the minimum language necessary to explain the legislature's intent has been used. Putting the nonseverability clause in the bill is necessary to unequivocally state what the legislature intends in relation to the expenditure of money in sec. 4 of the bill. The nonseverability clause does not administer a program, nor does it amend existing law or extend beyond the life of the appropriation. Finally, the nonseverability clause is germane, as it directly speaks to the legislative intent regarding whether or not certain funds in the bill should be expended.

2. Please discuss the separation of powers issue as it relates to the arguments the attorney general made in his April 26th memo.

I have discussed above one of the two main cases the attorney general referenced in his memo, so I will not address the Brown case again here. In Karcher v. Kean, 479 A.2d 403, 412 (New Jersey 1984), the New Jersey Legislature passed an appropriations bill, that provided for road construction projects totaling $12 million. Of the total $12 million, $7 million was state matching funds for federally aided interstate highway projects, and $5 million was for non-federally funded highway projects. Karcher, 479 A.2d at 411. The governor of New Jersey vetoed a line item appropriation for a highway project, but did not veto the legislature's estimated expenditure of $3 million for that project, or the $7 million total for state matching funds for federal highway projects. In addition, the governor used his line item veto to eliminate a highway reconstruction project, and the legislature's estimate for the cost of that project, but did not reduce the lump sum of $5 million for non-federally funded projects, or the total of $12 million total appropriation for the projects identified by the legislature.

In summary, the governor vetoed parts of the legislature's appropriations eliminating projects, but not the total appropriation amounts. Id. The Karcher court concluded that the governor appropriately exercised his veto authority, based on the fact that the New Jersey Constitution allows the governor to use line item veto authority to veto "whole or in part any such item or items while approving other portions of the bill." Id. at 489 citing art. V, sec. 1, para. 15 of the New Jersey Constitution.

Such a practice in Alaska would be unauthorized by art. II, sec. 15 of the Alaska Constitution, and contrary to the reasoning in Legislative Council v. Knowles, 21 P.3d 367, 374 (Alaska 2001), where veto may be applied to an "item," which is defined as "a sum of money dedicated to a particular purpose." Id. In addition, vetoing parts of an appropriation (i.e. specific projects), without reducing the total appropriation, would have the effect of increasing appropriations for non-vetoed projects by reducing total projects, but allowing surviving items, or projects, to receive additional funding, in violation of art. II, sec. 15, which limits the governor's veto power to "strike or reduce" an item. Based on the contrary provisions in the Alaska and New Jersey Constitutions, and the definition of what constitutes an "item" in Knowles, citation to Karcher does not support the proposition that the contingency language in sec. 36 creates a separation of powers violation.

There are also a few cases outside of the state that may have some bearing on the issue at hand. Please note, however, that the law in this area varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction so that cases from other states may or may not be convincing to Alaska's Supreme Court.

In Commonwealth of Virginia v. Dodson, 11 S.E.2d 120, 130 (Va. 1940), cited in Knowles, in footnotes 19 and 38, the court held that an item veto was invalid because the appropriation was integrally tied to other unvetoed budget provisions, even though it would have been subject to the item veto if it had not been tied to the other provisions. In In Re Advisory Opinion to the Governor, 239 So.2d 1 (Fla. 1970), the court was asked its opinion of a contingency that made numerous appropriations for education contingent on the passage of a substantive bill that was related to some but not all of those appropriations. The substantive law bill passed and the court did not find that contingency was unconstitutional, stating that "[a]ppropriations may constitutionally be made contingent upon matters or events reasonably related to the subject of the appropriation, but may not be made to depend upon entirely unrelated events." Id. 239 So. 2d at 22. In Rush v. Ray, 362 N.W.2d 479 (Iowa 1985), the governor was empowered to transfer funds under certain circumstances, but the legislature passed an appropriation with the condition attached that the governor's power to transfer did not apply to that appropriation. The governor maintained that the condition was an unconstitutional restriction on his power. The court disagreed:

> [The provision allowing the transfer] is a limited and qualified delegation of a legislative power. An impingement on that authority, restricting its exercise against qualifications to appropriations, cannot be construed as a violation of an executive power. It did not invade or prevent the governor's exercise of his constitutional veto power. As we have > discussed, the matters vetoed were qualifications rather than items. . . . Thus the executive power was not invaded.

Rush v. Ray, 362 N.W. 2d 479, 483.

Perhaps the most interesting case in this area is Brault v. Holleman, 230 S.E.2d 238 (Va. 1976). The legislature had passed appropriations for the integrated transportation system, but had done so by assigning separate dollar amounts for administration, buses, adjacent parking lots, and capital costs of the actual rail system. The governor vetoed the costs of the actual rail system, but left the others. Members of the legislature sued, alleging that the appropriations were linked in purpose and therefore could not be vetoed separately. The court recognized that the appropriations were logically linked and that "the various appropriations for the Metro system are 'tied up' one with the other." Brault v. Holleman, 230 S.E.2d at 243. However, the court held that the linkage between appropriations must be stated in the appropriations bill itself, and not be established by extrinsic evidence. Because the "singularity of purpose . . . does not appear from the terms of the appropriation bill," the court upheld the item veto. Id. 230 S.E.2d at 244. It appears from the discussion, however, that the court might have upheld a contingency linking all the appropriations had one been written into the bill.

3. Review Sutherland's Statutes and Statutory Construction, as it relates to the nonseverability clause in CSSB 46(FIN).

The attached article from Norman J. Singer, Sutherland's Statutes and Statutory Construction, §44A:15 (7th ed. 2009 ed.), provides two passages that take the position that the current trend for courts interpreting nonseverability or inseverability clauses, is to find the clauses enforceable. Two passages from Sutherland's underscore this trend:

> In spite of the courts' tendency to analyze inseverability clauses in the same way as severability clauses, there are some indications that inseverability clauses may carry more dispositive weight than severability clauses and may be applicable without exploring legislative intent or history. In Zobel v. Williams, the Supreme Court, after holding a portion of an Alaska statute unconstitutional, considered whether the provision could be severed from the remainder of the statute. Rather than look to legislative history or the statute's structure to discern legislative intent, the Supreme Court noted that it "need not speculate as to the intent of the Alaska Legislature; the legislation expressly provides that invalidation of any portion of the statute renders the whole invalid." Although the Court ultimately remanded the inseverability determination of the statute to the Alaska courts, the Court's language is more deferential to the inseverability clause than its attitude towards severability clauses in Alaska Airlines and Jackson.

Inseverability clauses, on the other hand, are anything but boilerplate. They are infrequently included in legislation, which should alleviate any assumptions by courts that they are inadequately considered before being passed. In addition, when inseverability clauses are proposed, they are strategically designed to ensure that the legislation does not exist without its most fundamental provisions. Consequently, the inclusion of an inseverability clause is usually accompanied by extensive debate. For example, in the Senate floor debate referred to in the previous paragraph, Senator Helms opposed Senators Mitchell and Hatch and introduced an inseverability clause because he anticipated a constitutional challenge to a provision providing benefits for religious day care. Helms wanted to ensure that day-care benefits would not exist unless religious day-care programs could share in the benefit. If the religious day-care provision were held unconstitutional, Helms preferred that Congress revisit the entire child-care issue rather than have the tax code include a child-care benefit that failed to include religious child care. The inseverability clause was submitted, not as boilerplate language, but in a deliberate attempt to preserve a provision Helms felt was integral to the bill.

A similar debate surrounded the proposed inclusion of an inseverability clause in the proposed Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985. Among the many controversial elements in the bill, which sought to achieve a balanced budget, was a provision that gave budget supervisory powers to a merged entity of the Congressional Budget Office ("CBO") and the Office of Management and Budget ("OMB"). In light of the partisan dynamic between the President and Congress at the time, the joint participation of congressional and executive agencies was a central feature of the bill. Anticipating a potential constitutional challenge to CBO participation on separation of powers grounds, the House passed a version of the bill that included an inseverability clause. As Congressman Panetta pointed out at the time:

> If you allow severability and the CBO role is found to be unconstitutional, then it leaves it up to the OMB, and it, in essence turns our power entirely over to the President and his agency. That is the issue at stake in terms of why we built inseverability in . . . .

For Congressman Panetta, maintaining a congressional role in the deficit reduction process was a key feature of the legislation. The Act, without the CBO, would include an inadequate check on the executive powers, and the Panetta camp refused to support it. Those opposed to the inseverability clause, however, did not see CBO involvement as a crucial factor and were willing to have the remainder of the Act stand as law even if the CBO's role were held unconstitutional: "[W]e do not want the whole > process that we have labored on so hard now to collapse because one provision is held to be unconstitutional."

Based on the above passages of Sutherland's, and on the cases cited in sections 2 and 3 of this memorandum, there is a strong argument that the nonseverability clause in sec. 37 of CSSB 46(FIN) (27-GS1740\T) would be found enforceable by the Alaska Supreme Court, based on a clear expression of legislative intent and a well documented legislative history that the legislature did not have a desire to fund any of the "energy projects" if the legislature couldn't fund all of the projects. In our discussion, you queried whether the Alaska Supreme Court, in the narrow context of an appropriations bill, might decline to enforce a nonseverability clause based on the principle that such a clause would nullify the governor's line item veto authority to "strike or reduce" as provided in art. II, sec. 15 of the state constitution. If the court chose to so limit the enforceability of a nonseverability clause in an appropriations bill, the court would be creating new law, that would be a break from the nonseverability case law and commentary that I have been able to locate so far in my search.

The considerations a court would have in taking such a significant step of finding a nonseverability clause unenforceable in an appropriations bill would be: (1) disregarding clear legislative intent of nonseverability; (2) essentially forcing the legislature to appropriate in ways that the legislature did not choose; (3) giving the item veto power in art. II, sec. 15 priority over the legislature's appropriation power in art. II, sec. 13; and (4) finding that the nonseverability clause actually violates the governor's veto power (the counter argument to the governor's is that while a contingency triggering a nonseverability clause makes a veto decision harder, the governor may still exercise the veto albeit with significant consequences).

As a final note, it is clear that if the governor does exercise his veto power, the legislature does have a remedy in art. II, sec. 16, because by a three-fourths vote of both bodies in joint session, the legislature can override a veto. If the court chose not to enforce a nonseverability clause in an appropriations bill, reasoning that the legislature's remedy was limited to article II, sec. 16, the court would in essence be concluding that while a majority of the house and senate chose to include a nonseverability clause in a bill, that it would take a three-fourths vote of both bodies to carry out their original intent of providing for nonseverability. In conclusion, all that I can say is that based on current case law in Alaska, and other jurisdictions, and the Sutherland commentary, it appears that the court would enforce a nonseverability clause in an appropriations bill; but that if the court chose to do so, based on a separation of power analysis, it could always carve out an exception to enforcement of a nonseverability clause in the very narrow area of an appropriations bill. The likelihood of this outcome is not possible to predict.

However, the particular decision goes and whatever the rule that is formulated, the method to be pursued is not the unerring pursuit of a fixed legal principle to an inevitable conclusion. Rather, it is the method of intelligently balancing and discriminating between reasons for and against. When lawyers have a precedent to follow it is proper that they follow the precedent. When they have no precedent, they decide questions as other people decide them. Their logic is properly the logic of comparative values and not the mere mechanical logic of deduction from major and minor premises.

IV. INSEVERABILITY CLAUSES IN STATUTES[1]

§ 44A:15 Inseverability in statutes

When holding a statutory provision unconstitutional, a court must determine whether to sever the defective provision or to invalidate the entire statute. In order to guide courts, lawmakers often include a severability clause in legislation. The clause instructs a court that has held portions of a statute invalid to sever the invalid statutory provisions from the rest of the statute and to allow the statute's valid sections to remain operative. Less frequently, a statute will include an inseverability clause that invalidates an entire statute (or section of a statute) should a provision be held invalid. In part because severability clauses have become boilerplate, these clauses have had little effect on courts making severability determinations.

Despite the explicit statutory language in severability and inseverability clauses, courts all but ignore the clauses and apply their own tests and presumptions to determine severability. These tests generally begin with a presumption that all statutes are either severable or inseverable, usually followed by an examination of the particular statute's structure and legislative history in order to determine whether the remainder of the statute would be consistent with the legislative intent. Courts will also consider whether the statute can reasonably function as an autonomous whole without the invalid provision.

This approach provides scant guidance to courts faced with a severability question, often leaving them to speculate about what the legislature intended to accomplish in passing the statute and whether that purpose is frustrated by the provisions invalidated. This is remarkable in light of the clear instructions provided by inseverability (and severability) clauses that would appear to resolve this very issue.

This Comment argues that inseverability clauses are fundamentally different from severability clauses and should be shown greater deference than their sister severability clauses. Part I discusses the courts' approach to severability and inseverability clauses. Part II examines the assumptions behind the courts' treatment of severability clauses and criticizes the application of those principles to inseverability clauses. Part III argues that, with some exceptions, courts should defer to the plain language of inseverability clauses. It also attempts to place the proposed rule within the current debate over statutory interpretation.

I. Deciding Whether to Sever Invalid Statutory Provisions

A. Severability Clauses: A Mere Presumption

The Supreme Court established the general standard for determining whether an invalid provision is severable from the rest of a statute in Champlin Refining Co v. Corporation Commission of Oklahoma. Faced with a state oil drilling statute containing potentially unconstitutional price controls, the Court had to consider whether the overall statutory scheme could survive a challenge to the pricing provisions. The Champlin Court refused to defer to the statute's severability clause and required instead that a court look at the structure of a statute to determine severability. The Court held that "[u]nless it is evident that the legislature would not have enacted those provisions which are within its power, independently of that which is not, the invalid part may be dropped if what is left is fully operative as a law." In effect, this established a presumption of severability that could be rebutted if a court determined that the legislature did not intend for the statute to exist without the invalid provision. This required courts to speculate as to what the legislative intent behind the statute was at the time of its passage and what it would be after the provision was held invalid. Although a statute's severability clause would seem to provide evidence of legislative intent, the Court in United States v. Jackson stated that "the ultimate determination of severability will rarely turn on the presence or absence of such a clause." Thus, by including a severability clause, a legislature does little more than spill ink since the clause has a minimal bearing on the severability determination.

Similarly, in INS v. Chadha, the Court, after holding that the legislative veto provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act was unconstitutional, considered whether the provision was severable from the rest of the statute. Although the Act contained a severability clause, the Court again was unwilling simply to rely on the statute's own provision to determine severability. The Court chose instead to examine the legislative history of the Act, and severed the unconstitutional provision only after concluding that the congressional intent in the legislative record supported such a holding.

The Court, in Alaska Airlines, Inc v. Brock, further explained that, far from being dispositive, a severability clause creates no more than a mere presumption of severability. The presumption can be overcome if legislative history and the statute's structure indicate that the statute would not have been passed without the invalid provision.

Similarly, several state courts often begin with a presumption of severability that can be overcome by legislative intent. Many of these courts have second-guessed plain statutory language and have held statutory provisions inseverable despite the presence of s[illegible]ability clauses. One court aptly described the caselaw's indif[illegible]ce to the plain language of severability clauses as "a narrow exception to the general rule that, when a clause is unambiguous, construction is unnecessary." The plain meaning of a severability clause unambiguously instructs a court to uphold the remainder of a statute. However, in the realm of severability, plain meaning does not prescribe the result, and the clause is all but ignored while the court makes an independent determination of legislative intent by construing legislative history and statutory structure.

Acknowledging the ineffectiveness of severability clauses, some states have actually codified rules of construction for interpreting severability questions that arise under their codes. These statutes reflect the caselaw's indifference to severability clauses. Pennsylvania's statute, for example, provides for a presumption that all of the state's statutes are severable, regardless of whether they include a severability clause or not. This presumption can be overcome, however, if a court finds that the legislature would not have passed th[illegible]atute absent the invalid clause or that the remainder of the [illegible]e cannot function properly without the invalid provision.

B. Inseverability Clauses: A Mirror Image?

Research uncovered no reported opinions in which a federal court has interpreted an inseverability clause in a federal statute, perhaps because there are so few of these clauses. When faced with an inseverability clause in a state statute, however, federal courts have applied the same analysis they apply to severability clauses—examining legislative intent, legislative history, and the statute's ability to function without the invalid portion before accepting the plain meaning of the inseverability clause. In Biszco v. RIHT Financial Corp, for example, the First Circuit held that the analysis applied to the severability clause in Chadha was equally applicable to an inseverability clause in a Rhode Island statute. Thus, inseverability clauses establish no more than a presumption of inseverability that courts may overcome after an examination of legislative intent.

State courts have also imported the rule for interpreting severability clauses to inseverability clauses. In Stiens v. Fire and Police Pension Association, for example, the Supreme Court of Colorado first held that a portion of the Colorado Policemen's and Firemen's Pension Reform Law was an unconstitutional retroactive law because it mandated pension fund contributions to cover liabilities accrued before the statute's passage. Although the law contained an inseverability clause, the court was reluctant to follow it: "The special unseverability clause . . . is not conclusive as to legislative intent. It gives rise only to a presumption that, if the unconstitutional parts of an Act were eliminated, the legislature would not have been satisfied with what remained." After analyzing the legislative history of the statute, the court concluded that the General Assembly's intent to regulate the state's pension liabilities predominated and that this intent would be frustrated by holding the entire act invalid. The court held that, despite the presence of an inseverability clause, the unconstitutional provision was severable from the rest of the statute.

In spite of the courts' tendency to analyze inseverability clauses in the same way as severability clauses, there are some indications that inseverability clauses may carry more dispositive weight than severability clauses and may be applicable without exploring legislative intent or history. In Zobel v. Williams, the Supreme Court, after holding a portion of an Alaska statute unconstitutional, considered whether the provision could be severed from the remainder of the statute. Rather than look to legislative history or the statute's structure to discern legislative intent, the Supreme Court noted that it "need not speculate as to the intent of the Alaska Legislature; the legislation expressly provides that invalidation of any portion of the statute renders the whole invalid." Although the Court ultimately remanded the inseverability determination of the statute to the Alaska courts, the Court's language is more deferential to the inseverability clause than its attitude towards severability clauses in Alaska Airlines and Jackson.

In addition, some states that have codified their severability law have included statutory language implying that, whereas severability clauses raise only a presumption, inseverability clauses may be dispositive of the severability question. The Indiana Code, for example, provides:

> (a) If any provision of this code as now or later amended or its application to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the invalidity does not affect other provisions that can be given effect without the invalid provision or application. (b) Except in the case of a statute containing a non-severability provision, each part and application of every statute is severable. If any provision or application of a statute is held invalid, the invalidity does not affect the remainder of the statute unless: (1) the remainder is so essentially and inseparably connected with, and dependent upon, the invalid provision or application that it cannot be presumed that the remainder would have been enacted without the invalid provision or application; or, (2) the remainder is incomplete and incapable of being executed in accordance with the legislative intent without the invalid provision or application. Thus, all Indiana statutes are severable unless they contain inseverability clauses or severability would be inconsistent with legislative intent or the severed statute would lack autonomy. The Code does not include a limitation, such as the one in subsection (b)(1), that would require an examination of legislative intent for "non-severability" clauses. This is significant because it implies that, when a statute supplies an inseverability clause, the clause is inseverable and no further examination of legislative intent or purpose is required.

II. Inseverability Clauses: A Recipe for Compromise

The previous Part outlined the courts' practice of analyzing inseverability clauses in the same manner as severability clauses. This Part will outline the differences between severability and inseverability clauses and propose that courts stop analyzing the two clauses in the same way.

A. Boilerplate or Deliberate?

The reason most commonly given for the courts' practice of second-guessing severability clauses is that the clauses are boilerplate provisions inserted into statutes by legislatures without thought or deliberation. Because of the often complex, multi-issue bills passed by legislatures, severability clauses are inserted to address a remote contingency: a court holding a small part of the overall statutory scheme invalid might dismantle far-reaching and elaborate omnibus legislation. Although severability clauses are included in statutes quite frequently, legislative drafters are nonetheless aware that courts do not show these clauses much deference. Legislators themselves acknowledge the perfunctory nature of severability clauses and their inclusion in legislation is generally uncontested. One congresswoman, for example, presumed that no floor debate was necessary to discuss the inclusion of a severability clause because such clauses were so commonplace:

This is a standard "boilerplate" severability clause; similar language has been included in a wide variety of laws including: The Emergency Unemployment Compensation Amendments of 1993, the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Civil Rights Restoration Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Education for Economic Security Act, and the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act.

Indeed, as Congressman Frank stated when he introduced a severability clause into a different bill: "This is fairly routine . . . this is I think agreed upon by all the parties, to explicitly put in the kind of severability clause that sometimes is made explicit . . . . This is just boilerplate severability." Congressman Frank acknowledged that severability clauses are not always included in legislation "explicitly" because there is an implicit assumption of severability to start with. As one congressman pointed out when he submitted a bill without a severability clause:

No severability or nonseverability provisions were included in the bill, but it is the intention of the conferees that any judicial determination regarding the constitutionality of the bill be applied severably to the legislation. This is consistent with the current rule of thumb regarding constitutional challenges to any law that is silent on the issue of severability. Thus, the severability clause itself is understood by legislators as an innocuous provision that is not likely to be heeded by courts. As one court pointed out, "[t]he Act in question contains a 'saving clause' which it seems customary nowadays to insert in all legislation with the apparent hope that it may work some not quite understood magic."

Furthermore, while the severability clause is rarely dispositive, it may prove useful to courts in the easy case and, even if it is ignored by courts entirely, it is hard to imagine how such a clause could be harmful. In a 1989 Senate debate over a proposed severability clause in a child-care bill, Senator Hatch, acknowledging that the clause presented a potential benefit with minimal risks, commented that "good draftsmanship, good legislative draftsmanship, smart legislative draftsmanship . . . mandates putting a severability clause in the legislation." This demonstrates that severability clauses are included with little discussion or deliberation. In the same debate, Senator Mitchell pointed out that the clause was so standard that "a severability provision exists in over 63 Federal laws."

Inseverability clauses, on the other hand, are anything but boilerplate. They are infrequently included in legislation, which should alleviate any assumptions by courts that they are inadequately considered before being passed. In addition, when inseverability clauses are proposed, they are strategically designed to ensure that the legislation does not exist without its most fundamental provisions. Consequently, the inclusion of an inseverability clause is usually accompanied by extensive debate. For example, in the Senate floor debate referred to in the previous paragraph, Senator Helms opposed Senators Mitchell and Hatch and introduced an inseverability clause because he anticipated a constitutional challenge to a provision providing benefits for religious day care. Helms wanted to ensure that day-care benefits would not exist unless religious day-care programs could share in the benefit. If the religious day-care provision were held unconstitutional, Helms preferred that Congress revisit the entire child-care issue rather than have the tax code include a child-care benefit that failed to include religious child care. The inseverability clause was submitted, not as boilerplate language, but in a deliberate attempt to preserve a provision Helms felt was integral to the bill.

A similar debate surrounded the proposed inclusion of an inseverability clause in the proposed Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985. Among the many controversial elements in the bill, which sought to achieve a balanced budget, was a provision that gave budget supervisory powers to a merged entity of the Congressional Budget Office ("CBO") and the Office of Management and Budget ("OMB"). In light of the partisan dynamic between the President and Congress at the time, the joint participation of congressional and executive agencies was a central feature of the bill. Anticipating a potential constitutional challenge to CBO participation on separation of powers grounds, the House passed a version of the bill that included an inseverability clause. As Congressman Panetta pointed out at the time:

If you allow severability and the CBO role is found to be unconstitutional, then it leaves it up to the OMB, and it, in essence turns our power entirely over to the President and his agency. That is the issue at stake in terms of why we built inseverability in . . . . For Congressman Panetta, maintaining a congressional role in the deficit reduction process was a key feature of the legislation. The Act, without the CBO, would include an inadequate check on the executive powers, and the Panetta camp refused to support it. Those opposed to the inseverability clause, however, did not see CBO involvement as a crucial factor and were willing to have the remainder of the Act stand as law even if the CBO's role were held unconstitutional: "[W]e do not want the whole process that we have labored on so hard now to collapse because one provision is held to be unconstitutional."

B. Limiting Court Powers

By failing to distinguish between severability and inseverability clauses, the courts ignore the differences in the messages that the two clauses communicate. The clauses are not mirror images of each other; they say different things.

A severability clause does not prohibit courts from invalidating the remainder of the statute because judicial review authorizes courts to declare statutes unconstitutional. Since a severability clause cannot permissibly limit the scope of the courts' powers of judicial review, all the clause can do is instruct courts that when they hold a provision invalid they are not required to invalidate the whole statute. Through a severability clause, the legislature tells courts that it does not consider the various statutory provisions inextricably linked. Ultimately, the court must determine how far the unconstitutional provision extends and whether the remainder constitutes a fully functioning statute.

When applying inseverability clauses, on the other hand, the courts' exercise of the power is restricted insofar as the court is instructed to invalidate the whole statute if it determines it must invalidate some part. Thus, the clause communicates the legislative command that the statute's existence as a law is contingent on its existence as a whole. The court must carry out this legislative command, regardless of its opinion of the relationship between the invalid provision and the remainder of the statute.

Read in this light, the two clauses convey very different messages: one suggests to courts what they should but are not required to do; the other tells the courts what they must do. By applying the same analysis to both, courts fail to acknowledge the fundamental differences in the messages communicated by severability and inseverability clauses.

C. Preserving the Deal

Aside from being deliberately drafted into legislation, inseverability clauses serve a key function of preserving legislative compromise. Much commentary points out that legislation is the articulation of a legislative deal. But a compromise is of no value unless there is a mechanism to ensure the compromise's durability, that is, a way of preventing one party to the compromise from benefiting from the deal without upholding its share of the bargain.

An inseverability clause is a useful enforcement mechanism for legislative compromise because it binds the benefits and concessions that constitute the deal into an interdependent whole. In the debate mentioned above, for example, Senator Helms was unwilling to support the child-care bill unless it provided support for religious day care. If Helms's opponents had agreed to the religious day-care provision, there was a strong possibility that the provision would not have withstood a constitutional challenge. If the provision had been struck down and held severable, the compromise would have been unenforceable. Helms's opponents would have had their child-care benefit, and the religious day-care provision would have been a thing of the past. By making his support for the bill contingent on such an inseverability clause, Helms was entrenching the legislative deal and ensuring that there would be the compromise version of the bill or no version. The inseverability clause thus binds all the elements of the deal together.

Severability clauses, on the other hand, are not tools of legislative compromise. Legislators include them to ensure that the bulk of the legislation passed will remain intact even if some unanticipated contingency arises. As Senator Hatch pointed out:

> Who knows what a future Supreme Court will do? But, in the unlikely event that something in this legislation is unconstitutional, we surely want a severability clause in there so that all of the legislation is not wiped out in a single swoop of the Supreme Court's pen. Because severability and severability clauses are the default rule and the norm, respectively, the inclusion of an inseverability clause is an affirmative act by a legislature to preserve the coexistence of separate provisions. In settlement agreements and other kinds of contracts, for example, the parties determine that certain provisions are so central to the deal that without them there is no contract. The inclusion of inseverability clauses in these contracts is intended to preserve such compromises.

In a similar vein, a legislature may pass a bill that, as a result of a legislative deal, contains a balance of corresponding provisions. If the statute includes an inseverability clause, the legislature is saying that the statute is an organic whole of interdependent parts, no one of which should exist without any other. For example, several statutes codifying settlements of Indian claims in return for some form of reparation contain inseverability clauses for this reason and could not have been passed without them. If court action invalidated the statutory bar on prosecution of their claims, the tribes would have a double benefit: they could receive statutory compensation for their lands and still prosecute claims to recover those same lands. The inseverability clause prevents this outcome.

In Kennedy v. Pennsylvania, a state legislature had used an inseverability clause aggressively to gain government-wide support for its actions. The Pennsylvania legislature approved an across-the-board pay increase to state government employees, including legislators and judges. Because the state constitution prohibited legislators from voting themselves a pay increase during their current term, the increase for legislators was effective beginning with the next election. However, in order to gain votes to support the appropriation, the final bill also increased legislators' unvouchered expense accounts for the period prior to the election in the amount of the pay increase. Anticipating a court challenge to the expense account increase, the legislators included an inseverability clause. The clause provided that, were a court to invalidate any provision of the statute, none of the salary increases would be effective, including those for judges. Although the inseverability clause may have been an attempt to pressure judges into holding the expense account increase valid, the Pennsylvania court held the inseverability clause constitutional and valid, even though it affected the judiciary. While the scruples of the Pennsylvania legislature were questionable, their use of the inseverability clause proved an effective tool for preserving their deal.

Similarly, inseverability clauses are often included in budgetary legislation to ensure that the funding scheme developed is viable. If a court determines that an entitlement's eligibility requirement is invalid, then the funding apparatus supplied by the remainder of the entitlement would become inadequate. For example, in Brookins v. O'Bannon, the Third Circuit considered an inseverability clause that was included in the 1982 Pennsylvania Welfare Reform Act. The Act divided the class of needy persons eligible under the prior law into "chronically needy" and "transitionally needy" persons and continued to provide full benefits to the "chronically needy." The "transitionally needy," however, were limited under the new act to three months of benefits per year. With the savings generated by reducing benefits to the new "transitionally needy" class, the Act provided for a 5 percent increase in the benefits provided to eligible recipients. The Act included an inseverability clause that eliminated the 5 percent increase should the distinction between "chronically needy" and "transitionally needy" be held invalid. As one legislator pointed out: "We do not want to raid [the] State Treasury. We want to provide an increase in cash assistance allowance to the truly needy as long as those funds are there."

The clause provided an important tool for the legislature to regulate welfare spending by ensuring that the increase in benefits was contingent upon narrowing the scope of eligible welfare recipients. The Third Circuit ultimately did apply the inseverability clause, but only after examining the legislative history of the provision. One can only speculate as to what the court would have done to Pennsylvania's welfare budget had the legislative record lacked any discussion of the Act's inseverability clause.

Thus, by applying the same analysis to inseverability clauses as they apply to severability clauses, courts are denying legislators an effective tool for entrenching a compromise. If courts are only moderately deferential to inseverability clauses, and if the clauses establish no more than a presumption of inseverability, then courts will only apply the clause if there is a clear record in the legislative history. Consequently, legislators will be reluctant to rely on the clause as a tool of compromise for fear that courts will undertake independent determinations of legislative intent despite the statutory mandate of inseverability. This problem will be exacerbated for state legislators because legislative history for state legislation is often difficult to locate and thinly reported. Occasionally, legislation can be made palatable or effective only by tempering it with various limiting factors or requirements, and the inseverability clause is intended to ensure that these elements remain in the statute. By treating the inseverability clause as if it were only a minor indication of legislative intent, courts are usurping the legislature's role in determining what should remain as an enforceable statute.

III. A New Rule for Inseverability Clauses

The previous Part established that inseverability clauses serve a wholly different function from severability clauses. Therefore, the rule that courts apply to inseverability clauses should be distinct from that applied to severability clauses. The correct approach to inseverability clauses is to apply their plain meaning. Rather than embarking on an independent exploration of legislative intent, as the courts do for severability clauses, courts should unequivocally invalidate the remainder of a statute if the unambiguous language of the statute so directs.

A. A Public Choice Approach

The proposed rule can be understood through a theory of statutory interpretation that derives from a contracts approach. Public choice theory tends to view legislation as the product of various interest groups vying for their self-interests. Legislation therefore is a contract of sorts negotiated between the various parties, that is, between the different legislators and the interest groups with whom they sympathize. According to this theory, legislation is often a compromise between conflicting groups where one group agrees to support another group's proposed legislation in return for some modifications in the underlying bill or for support on another issue. Consequently, the legislation may lack a cohesive focus because different portions of the bill are included to placate different groups.

An inseverability clause provides legislators with a tool for enforcing these compromises because one group may be willing to support a piece of legislation only if it can be assured that particular limitations or provisions will be included in the final bill. Senator Helms, for example, could agree to support a child-care entitlement on the condition that religious day-care centers were eligible for the benefit. His insistence on an inseverability clause testifies to the clause's important role in entrenching a compromise.

Similarly, after the Chadha decision there were initiatives in Congress to include inseverability clauses in statutes with legislative veto provisions. The inseverability clause would enforce durable legislative deals whereby various federal actions mandated by statute could not be undertaken unless Congress had the power to veto the action. If the Court, as it did in Chadha, held such an attempt at legislative veto unconstitutional, then the inseverability clause would cause the entire statute to fall rather than leave the statute to function free from any legislative check on its application.

It is, however, imaginable that in many instances a sparse record will provide an inadequate background as to the negotiation and compromise behind an inseverability clause. Alternatively, because of the conflicting interests that influence the legislation, the legislative history often provides conflicting evidence of legislative intent or purpose. As such, a rule that failed to defer to the plain meaning of the inseverability clause would, in effect, undermine the clause's function as a legislative tool for enforcing compromise. Courts would be free to speculate as to legislative intent and purpose in the absence of an informative legislative history.

Applying the plain meaning of inseverability clauses without second-guessing legislative intent helps facilitate durable legislative compromises. If courts are able to examine legislative intent and to speculate whether the legislature would have passed the legislation without the invalid provisions, there is a great likelihood that legislative deals will be undermined or short-lived. If courts will sever provisions that were passed as interdependent elements, legislators will be less willing to enter into compromises: they will fear that the issues they concede will outlive the issues they support. That is, the costs of the deal might outlive its benefits. Severability clauses, on the other hand, do not enforce the legislative compromise; they protect the passage of complex omnibus clauses. A strict plain meaning rule of severability clauses, therefore, would not help to preserve a legislative deal. If anything, the severability clause attempts to undo legislative deals by instructing courts to uphold the balance of a statute even when portions of the legislative deal have been struck down.

Nevertheless, courts' deference to the plain meaning of inseverability clauses should not be unlimited. If giving effect to an inseverability clause would result in overstepping the bounds of legislative or judicial authority, then the clause should not be followed. For example, in Legislative Research Commission v. Brown, an inseverability clause provided that if a Kentucky legislative veto provision were held invalid, then the state's executive department would not be permitted to issue regulations unless the state's general assembly was in session. The clause was intended to force the courts to uphold the veto in order to avoid crippling the executive branch's powers. The Kentucky Supreme Court wisely refused to apply the inseverability clause and held that the clause "unconstitutionally limit[ed] and interfer[ed] with the governor's mandated duties." Thus, legislatures are free to construct a legislative compromise through inseverability clauses provided they do not attempt to force courts to fashion unconstitutional holdings.

B. An Inseverability Canon

In order to prevent courts from undermining the legislative compromises that are sealed by inseverability clauses, this Comment calls for a new interpretive canon for inseverability clauses.

1. A clear statement rule.

The proposed rule would function like a clear statement rule.

Clear statement rules are generally defined by polarities. On the one hand, there is a presumption that cannot be overcome unless the legislature has provided a clear statement otherwise. On the other hand, a clear statement rule must also define what statutory language would be sufficient to constitute a "clear statement" to overcome the court's presumption. For example, in Atascadero State Hospital v. Scanalon, the Court articulated a clear statement rule for congressional abrogation of states' Eleventh Amendment immunity from suit in federal courts. The Court held that, when the statutory language is ambiguous as to abrogation, it will not attempt to divine whether Congress intended to abrogate. The presumption of immunity created a "requirement . . . that Congress unequivocally express its intention to abrogate . . . by making its intention unmistakably clear in the language of the statute."

The codified statutory construction rules in the Indiana Code, for example, illustrate how such a presumption would work. The rule presumes severability regardless of whether a severability clause is included in the statute. However, once the legislature has included an inseverability clause, a clear statement of legislative intent has been provided and the courts must therefore defer to the unambiguous language in the clear statement. Such a rule would prevent courts from second-guessing inseverability clauses. The proposed rule recognizes that the inclusion of an inseverability clause is a deliberate act of the legislature to enforce a legislative compromise and to ensure that the provision and the remainder of the statute operate in tandem.

There is one modification, however, from the clear statement model. Absent a clear statement in an inseverability clause, the default rule is not severability but rather a presumption of severability. The classic clear statement rule contains a default rule that can only be overcome by a clear statement. The default in the proposed rule for inseverability clauses, however, does not limit findings of inseverability to the presence of inseverability clauses. Whether or not the statute contains a severability clause, the presumption of severability can be overcome by legislative history or statutory structure indicating that the legislative intent was for inseverability. An inseverability clause, by contrast, provides a clear statement that unmistakably requires courts to invalidate the statute's remainder.

2. A statutory device.

As with substantive canons, courts often choose to interpret and apply particular statutory devices in a consistent manner. Courts will often apply time limitations and deadlines, for example, according to the statute's strict plain meaning. In United States v. Locke, the statutory deadline for a mining rights application was "prior to December 31," even though similar deadlines generally extended to the end of the year with language such as "on or before December 31." The Supreme Court read the statute literally and held that an application filed on December 31 was too late. This can be read as a rule of strict construction for dates and deadlines included in statutes. As Justice Marshall wrote, "[f]iling deadlines, like statutes of limitations, necessarily operate harshly and arbitrarily with respect to individuals who fall just on the other side of them, but if the concept of a filing deadline is to have any content, the deadline must be enforced."

Thus, while the severability clause canon examines legislative intent in spite of the clause's language, the canon for reading inseverability clauses should read the clauses strictly according to their plain meaning—in short, the inseverability clauses should be dispositive. To paraphrase Justice Marshall, if the inseverability clause is to have any content, its plain meaning must be applied.

This raises the potential, however, of an absurd result where an inseverability clause is activated by a very minor holding of invalidity. In Rebaldo v. Cuomo, for example, an amendment to New York's Public Health Law prohibited New York's public hospitals from charging any of the insurance carriers less than a specified rate. The law contained an inseverability clause that invalidated the entire statute if any payor was charged below the specified rate. The clause was intended to restrain the major payors like Medicare, Medicaid, and Blue Cross from obtaining cheaper rates. However, the court noted that "a literal construction of the language would lead to the absurd result that 'a single uninsured patient . . . would invalidate the statute' " if that person paid a hospital bill below the specified rate. Although the Rebaldo court decided the case on other grounds, the inexpertly drafted inseverability clause might have led to an absurd result.

However, as the Court in Locke noted, it is often necessary to let some seemingly harsh results stand in order to preserve the power of inseverability clauses generally. Although courts are often reluctant to enforce what appear to be absurd results, by generating a rule that strictly applies the plain meaning of inseverability clauses, courts will force legislatures to draft the clauses with greater precision. As Justice Scalia wrote, "we have an obligation to conduct our exegesis in a fashion which fosters [the] democratic process." By applying the plain meaning, courts are not only forcing legislatures to craft inseverability clauses with greater care, they are also providing legislatures with effective tools for passing legislation by creating durable compromises.

Conclusion

Applying the severability clause analysis to inseverability clauses fails to address the distinct nature of inseverability clauses. This Comment demonstrates that the dynamic in inseverability clauses is different from that of severability clauses and calls on courts to apply the strict plain meaning of inseverability clauses. The presence of an inseverability clause evidences a legislative compromise and a deliberate attempt by the statute's drafters to inseverably link statutory provisions. An exploration by courts of the legislative intent behind an inseverability clause will necessarily undermine the clause's ability to enforce legislative compromise. By deferring to the plain meaning of inseverability clauses, courts will encourage the legislative process by preserving an effective tool for enforcing legislative deals.

§ 44A:16 Severability

When a court holds a provision of a statute unconstitutional, a question remains regarding the validity of the remainder of the statute. The court may find that the unconstitutional provision may be severed from the statute and leave the remainder of the statute in effect. Alternatively, the court may hold that the unconstitutional provision cannot be severed and invalidate the entire statute.

In this Article, attorney John Nagle argues that the jurisprudence surrounding the issue of severability is confusing and inconsistent. After explaining the concept of severability and its ramifications for statutes, Mr. Nagle traces the development of the current judicial test for determining when a statute should be found severable. The effect of severability clauses—statutory provisions directing courts to leave the remainder of the statute in effect in the event a provision is found unconstitutional—is also discussed; Mr. Nagle finds that such clauses do not necessarily cause a court to reach a particular result. Mr. Nagle then examines the question of legislative intent in the context of severability. He concludes that courts have departed from established methods of determining legislative intent, opting instead to attempt to answer the hypothetical question whether the legislature would have chosen to enact the remaining parts of the statute without the unconstitutional provision.

Because the current jurisprudence of severability is unsettled, Mr. Nagle asserts that courts should follow several general principles regarding severability. First, courts should apply a plain meaning rule to severability clauses, so that a statute containing such a clause will automatically be considered severable. Second, when a statute does not contain a severability clause, the courts should look to the history, purpose, and structure of the statute to ascertain legislative intent. Finally, to assist in this inquiry Mr. Nagle advocates the creation of a legislatively-enacted clear statement rule requiring that courts consider a statute severable when a statute is silent on the issue of severability.

I. INTRODUCTION

Severability is usually an afterthought, a sifting through the statutory rubble to salvage whatever survives a ruling that part of a law is unconstitutional. The question that severability poses is easily stated: If part of a statute is unconstitutional, does the rest of the statute remain in effect? The question is also ubiquitous. It can arise any time part of a statute or a particular application of a statute is held unconstitutional. Moreover, the answer can have profound consequences. Concluding that statutory provisions are severable presents the danger of leaving in effect statutory provisions that the legislature would have never enacted alone. Alternatively, a holding of nonseverability can mean, for example, that an entire appropriations statute or sweeping reform legislation falls because of a single unconstitutional provision.

Yet severability is often overlooked. The severability test currently used by the Supreme Court was first stated in 1932, and the seminal article on severability was written in 1937. Fifty-one years after the test was first enunciated, Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha revived interest in severability when the Court held that an unconstitutional legislative veto over executive branch deportation decisions was severable from the deportation power delegated to the executive branch. That decision provoked a number of critical discussions of the test for determining severability and its application to the nearly two hundred other statutes that contained legislative vetoes. Four years later, the Court had an opportunity to answer its critics in Alaska Airlines v. Brock, in which the severability of the legislative veto in the Airline Deregulation Act of 1978 was the only issue before the Court. A unanimous Court responded by keeping the same basic test and holding another legislative veto severable.

Criticism of the Court's approach persists. The problem, as one court recently put it, is that "[t]he test for severability has been stated often but rarely explained." Thus, while severability is noncontroversial in many cases because almost any test—including the Alaska Airlines test—would produce the same result, hard cases illuminate the doctrinal inadequacy of Alaska Airlines. Would unconstitutional restrictions on public funding of art. be severable from the funding itself? Is the unconstitutional legislative veto sev-

SUBJECT: Line Item Veto

TO: Senator Hollis French
Chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee

FROM: Doug Gardner
Director
and Pamela Finley
Revisor of Statutes

You have asked for a discussion of cases from other jurisdictions on the item veto, including those cited by the attorney general, as well as the meaning of "item" and "strike or reduce" as used in art. II, sec. 15, Constitution of the State of Alaska.

I. The Meaning of "Item".

The second sentence of art. II, sec. 15 of the state constitution reads as follows:

> He [the Governor] may, by veto, strike or reduce items in appropriation bills.

In Alaska Legislative Council v. Knowles, 21 P.3d 367 (Alaska 2001) (hereinafter "Knowles"), the court defined "item" as "a sum of money dedicated to a particular purpose":

> Based on the language of our constitution, the historical purposes of the item veto, and the pertinent public policy considerations, we now define "item" as "a sum of money dedicated to a particular purpose."

Knowles, 21 P.3d at 371. The court noted that the "word 'item' conveys a notion of unity between two essential elements of an appropriation: the amount and the purpose." Knowles, 21 P.3d at 372. Although the court did not explicitly discuss the issue, footnote 28 in Knowles suggests that an item could have several purposes:

> Consider, for example, the [undesirable] effect of striking from an appropriation's descriptive language a negative, a limiting date for expending the money, or one of several purposes. (emphasis added)

However, it appears from the court's discussion that an "item" can only have one amount. The court stated that "an item reduction must have a quantitative effect, implying that reduction must affect the appropriation's amount." Knowles at 372. In addition, two of the cases the court cited with approval indicate that an item may only have one amount: Inter Faculty Org. v. Carlson, 478 N.W.2d 192, 195 (Minn. 1991) (defining "item of appropriation" as "a separate and identifiable sum of money appropriated from the general fund dedicated to a specific purpose") and Commonwealth v. Dodson, 11 S.E.2d 120, 127 (Va. 1940) (defining "item" as "an indivisible sum of money dedicated to a stated purpose"). Cited in Knowles, 21 P.3d at 371, footnote 19. This is also the definition that governors in Alaska have used in exercising the item veto by vetoing allocations that have dollar amounts attached to them and reducing the appropriation by the amount of the allocation.[1]

Based on the definition in Knowles, an item could be any one of the following:

--- "Four million for roads in Anchorage"
--- "Four million for roads X, Y, and Z in Anchorage"
--- "One million for road X in Anchorage"
--- "One million for road Y in Anchorage"
--- "Two million for road Z in Anchorage"

The last three items give the legislature more control over the specific projects, but can be vetoed individually as items. The first two are more general, but the governor's item veto would be limited to striking the entire line, or reducing the four million.

II. The Meaning of "Strike or Reduce."

Knowles makes it clear that "reduce" refers to reducing the amount of the appropriation, not changing the purpose:

> Reduction implies diminution. This suggests that an item reduction must have quantitative effect, implying that reduction must affect the appropriation's amount.

Knowles, 21 P.3d at 372. The court went on to explain that "strike" is just a greater version of reduce:

> Reducing an item appears to be a lesser form of striking an item. This implies that these two forms are qualitatively similar and have equivalent > effects, i.e., they diminish the amount appropriated. Reducing an item lessens its amount; striking it lessens its amount to nothing.

[1] See also In Re Advisory Opinion to the Governor, 239 So.2d 1, 6 and 22 - 23 (Fla. 1970) (Governor's constitutional power to veto "any specific appropriation" applied to lines consisting of purpose and amount, even though grouped together.)

Knowles, 21 P.3d at 372 - 373. The court in Knowles was quite clear that the power to "strike or reduce" was not the power to edit the purpose or descriptive language of an appropriation:

> The item veto permits the governor only to tighten or close the state's purse strings, not to loosen them or to divert funds for a use the legislature did not approve. . . .
> . . . [I]t [the item veto] was intended only to limit the legislature's appropriation power, not to grant the executive a quasi-legislative appropriation power permitting appropriations the legislature never enacted. . . .
> Altering the purpose of the appropriation by striking descriptive words interferes with that unity [between the amount and purpose of the appropriation] because the result is no longer the item the legislature enacted.

Knowles, 21 P.3d at 372.

> These purposes [of the item veto] seem most directed at the amount of an appropriation. Permitting a governor to strike descriptive language would not limit expenditures or help balance a budget.

Knowles, 21 P.3d at 373.

In short, "strike or reduce" means to eliminate the entire item or reduce the dollar amount of the item. Other deletions are not allowed.

III. Case Law from Other Jurisdictions.

A. The Attorney General's Opinion.

Alaska Attorney General John Burns, in a memorandum to Chief of Staff of the Office of Governor Sean Parnell, cited Karcher v. Kean, 479 A.2d 403, 412 (New Jersey 1984), and Legislative Research Comm'n v. Brown, 664 S.W.2d 907, 919, (Ky. 1984) respectively, for the proposition that the contingency language in section 36 of CSSB 46(FIN), and the nonseverability clause in section 37 of CSSB 46(FIN), violate the separation of powers in art. II, sec. 13 (legislature has the power of appropriation), and art. II, sec. 15 (governor has line item veto authority). Neither case is fully supportive of the attorney general's position that either the contingency language of sec. 36, or the nonseverability clause in sec. 37, are separation of powers violations. Both cases require discussion.

In Karcher v. Kean, 479 A.2d 403, 412 (New Jersey 1984), the New Jersey Legislature passed an appropriation bill, that provided for road construction projects totaling $12 million. Of the total $12 million, $7 million was state matching funds for federally aided interstate highway projects, and $5 million was for non-federally funded highway projects. Karcher, 479 A.2d at 411. The governor of New Jersey vetoed a line item appropriation for a highway project, but did not veto the legislature's estimated expenditure of $3 million for that project, or the $7 million total for state matching funds for federal highway projects. In addition, the governor used his line item veto to eliminate a highway reconstruction project, and the legislature's estimate for the cost of that project, but did not reduce the lump sum of $5 million for non-federally funded projects, or the total of $12 million total appropriation for the projects identified by the legislature.

In summary, the governor vetoed parts of the legislature's appropriations eliminating projects, but not the total appropriation amounts. Id. The Karcher court concluded that the governor appropriately exercised his veto authority, based on the fact that the New Jersey Constitution allows the governor to use line item veto authority to veto "whole or in part any such item or items while approving other portions of the bill." Id at 489 citing art. V, sec. 1 para. 15 of the New Jersey Constitution.

Such a practice in Alaska would be unauthorized by art. II sec. 15 of the Alaska Constitution, and contrary to the reasoning in Legislative Council v. Knowles, 21 P.3d 367, 374 (Alaska 2001), where veto may be applied to an "item," which is defined as "a sum of money dedicated to a particular purpose." Id. In addition, vetoing parts of an appropriation (i.e. specific projects), without reducing the total appropriation, would have the effect of increasing appropriations for non-vetoed projects by reducing total projects, but allowing surviving items, or projects, to receive additional funding, in violation of art. II sec. 15, which limits the governor's veto power to "strike or reduce" an item. Based on the contrary provisions in the Alaska and New Jersey Constitutions, and the definition of what constitutes an "item" in Knowles, citation to Karcher does not support the proposition that the contingency language in sec. 36 creates a separation of powers violation.

The attorney general also cites Legislative Research Comm'n v. Brown, 664 S.W.2d 907, 919, (Ky. 1984), arguing that this case supports the proposition that the nonseverability language in sec. 37, constitutes a similar separation of powers violation. In Brown, there were two nonseverability provisions that the court addressed. The first nonseverability provision that the court addressed, involved legislation that placed a restriction on the executive, effectively eliminating the executive's ability to pass regulations that were not approved by a legislative body called the LRC. The legislation also provided for a nonseverability clause that provided if the LRC could not review regulations with the authority to "veto proposed regulations," that the executive could not issue any further regulations. Id. at 919. The court found that the nonseverability clause so interfered and reallocated the constitutional powers of the executive to the legislative branch, that it refused to enforce the nonseverability clause. This is the portion of Brown, that the attorney general cited to in his memorandum.

Reading further in Brown, there was a second nonseverability clause that the court addressed. This second nonseverability clause involved legislation that provided that the LRC had the power to modify any application by the executive branch or overrule the executive branch's decision to apply for a federal block grant. Id. at 928. As previously discussed, the Brown court found that the LRC's usurping of the executive branch's power was a separation of powers violation. So the question for the court, was whether to enforce a separate nonseverability clause, that provided, "if any section of K[entucky] R[evised] S[tatute] 45.351 to KRS 45.358 is declared unconstitutional, then no block grant money received from the United States government shall be spent. . . ." Id. The Supreme Court of Kentucky held that since the "adoption of the state budget" is within the purview of the legislature, that the nonseverability clause related to the budget would be upheld. Accordingly, the Brown decision does not necessarily stand for the proposition that all nonseverability clauses are unenforceable; clearly in the context of appropriations, the Brown case stands for the proposition that a nonseverability clause in the context of an appropriation, is enforceable. Brown is perhaps more supportive of the legislature's prerogative to appropriate in the manner it chooses, and include a nonseverability clause in an appropriation bill if it is not permitted to appropriate in the manner it chooses.

The best guidance on how a court might approach a nonseverability clause comes from the U.S. Supreme Court's reasoning in Alaska Airlines v. Brock, 480 U.S. 678, 680 (1987), where the Court held:

> Unless it is evident that the Legislature would not have enacted those provisions which are within its power, independently of that which is not, the invalid part may be dropped if what is left is fully operative as law. . . . The final test . . . is the traditional one: the unconstitutional provision must be severed unless the statute created in its absence is legislation that Congress would not have enacted.

Id. at 684-85.

In summary, based on the reasoning in Alaska Airlines v. Brock, and the Brown court's upholding the nonseverability clause in the context of block grant appropriations, the presence of a nonseverability clause would likely be seen by a reviewing court as strong, if not irrefutable evidence of the legislature's intent, that the legislature did not intend to enact the legislation if it could not do so in the manner that it originally chose.

B. Cases from Other Jurisdictions.

Because Knowles establishes both the test for violations of the Confinement Clause and the definition of "item", we have concentrated our research in the limited time available on cases where a veto of one appropriation affected another or affected the governor's power. Please note, however, that the law in this area varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction so that cases from other states may or may not be convincing to Alaska's Supreme Court.

In Commonwealth of Virginia v. Dodson, 11 S.E.2d 120, 130 (Va. 1940), cited in Knowles, in footnotes 19 and 38, the court held that an item veto was invalid because the appropriation was integrally tied to other unvetoed budget provisions, even though it would have been subject to the item veto if it had not been tied to the other provisions. In In Re Advisory Opinion to the Governor, 239 So.2d 1 (Fla. 1970), the court was asked its opinion of a contingency that made numerous appropriations for education contingent on the passage of a substantive bill that was related to some but not all of those appropriations. The substantive law bill passed and the court did not find that contingency was unconstitutional, stating that "[a]ppropriations may constitutionally be made contingent upon matters or events reasonably related to the subject of the appropriation, but may not be made to depend upon entirely unrelated events." Id. 239 So. 2d at 22. In Rush v. Ray, 362 N.W.2d 479 (Iowa 1985), the governor was empowered to transfer funds under certain circumstances, but the legislature passed an appropriation with the condition attached that the governor's power to transfer did not apply to that appropriation. The governor maintained that the condition was an unconstitutional restriction on his power. The court disagreed:

> [The provision allowing the transfer] is a limited and qualified delegation of a legislative power. An impingement on that authority, restricting its exercise against qualifications to appropriations, cannot be construed as a violation of an executive power. It did not invade or prevent the governor's exercise of his constitutional veto power. As we have discussed, the matters vetoed were qualifications rather than items. . . . Thus the executive power was not invaded.

Perhaps the most interesting case in this area is Brault v. Holleman, 230 S.E.2d 238 (Va. 1976). The legislature had passed appropriations for the integrated transportation system, but had done so by assigning separate dollar amounts for administration, buses, adjacent parking lots, and capital costs of the actual rail system. The governor vetoed the costs of the actual rail system, but left the others. Members of the legislature sued, alleging that the appropriations were linked in purpose and therefore could not be vetoed separately. The court recognized that the appropriations were logically linked and that "the various appropriations for the Metro system are 'tied up' one with the other." Brault v. Holleman, 230 S.E.2d at 243. However, the court held that the linkage between appropriations must be stated in the appropriation bill itself, and not be established by extrinsic evidence. Because the "singularity of purpose . . . does not appear from the terms of the appropriation bill," the court upheld the item veto. Id. 230 S.E.2d at 244. It appears from the discussion, however, that the court might have upheld a contingency linking all the appropriations had one been written into the bill.

SUBJECT: Contingency Language in CSSB 46(FIN)
(Work Order No. 27-GS1740\X)

TO: Representative Mike Chenault
Attn: Tom Wright

FROM: Doug Gardner
Director

You have asked for: (1) a brief analysis of the function of secs. 39 and 40 of CSSB 46(FIN), and (2) the constitutionality of the contingency language found in sec. 39[1] of the draft CSSB 46(FIN).

1. The Function of Secs. 39 and 40 of CSSB 46 (FIN); What These Sections Do.

Section 39 of the draft CSSB 46(FIN) (27-GS1740\X) provides two contingencies. The first, in subsection (a), makes each of the appropriations in sec. 7 of the Act contingent on enactment of every appropriation in sec. 7, without reduction. In other words, if the governor were to veto all or a portion of any line item in sec. 7, the contingency would not be met, and none of the appropriations in the section would take effect.

The contingency in sec. 39(b) makes the appropriations in sec. 4 dependent on the FY 2012 year-to-date average price of Alaska North Slope crude oil exceeding $150 a barrel on October 1, 2011. If the price does not exceed that measure, the appropriations in sec. 4 would not take effect.

Section 40 of the draft CS relates to severability of the contingency provisions in sec. 39. Sec. 40(a) provides that if the contingency in sec. 39(a) is held invalid, the contingency is not severable from the appropriations made in sec. 7 of the Act. The function of this provision is to indicate the legislature's intent that if sec. 39(a) is invalidated, the appropriations made in sec. 7 not stand. In other words, if the contingency fails on

[1] In full, sec. 39 reads:

> Sec. 39. CONTINGENCY. (a) Each of the appropriations made in sec. 7 of this Act is contingent on passage by the Twenty-Seventh Alaska State Legislature in the First Regular Session and enactment into law of every appropriation made in sec. 7 of this Act.
> (b) The appropriations made in sec. 4 of this Act are contingent on the fiscal year 2012 year-to-date average price of Alaska North Slope crude oil exceeding $150 a barrel on October 1, 2011.

constitutional grounds, it is the intent of the legislature that the appropriation fail as well. The severability provision in sec. 40(b) has the same effect on secs. 39(b) and sec. 4.

2. The Constitutionality of Governor's Veto Power Relating to Secs. 39 and 40.

a. Sec. 39(a) Contingency Language and Confinement Clause.

The contingency language found in sec. 39(a) of the capital budget bill does not prohibit the governor from vetoing items in sec. 7 of the bill. Instead, it provides that a veto by the governor of an item in sec. 7 of the bill will have the secondary result of deleting all projects found in sec. 7 from the bill. The governor is still free to exercise his veto regarding sec. 7.

Whether a court would uphold the validity of the contingency language found in sec. 39(a) is a question I cannot answer, as this is a scenario that has not arisen in the past. The contingency found in sec. 39(a) could be held unconstitutional because of a separation of powers issue related to the governor's veto powers, but I am not completely convinced that a court would rule the contingency language invalid. In fact, the veto power of the governor can be characterized as a legislative power (appropriating the state's money) that was conferred upon the governor in the state constitution. Likewise, the legislature, in art. III, secs. 25 and 26 of the state constitution, was bestowed an executive power in having the power to confirm certain appointees by the governor. Regarding the ability to confirm appointees, the Alaska Supreme Court held in Bradner v. Hammond, 553 P.2d 1 (Alaska 1976), that the legislature's power to confirm should be limited to the specific instances listed in the constitution and not broadly construed because the legislature was exercising what was essentially an executive power. Bradner, 553 P.2d at 7 - 8. One could look at the Bradner case in light of the governor's line item veto power and argue that the line item veto power -- a legislative function in that it relates to appropriations -- should not be broadly construed, but viewed in more limited terms. Thus, the contingency of sec. 39(a) could be viewed as the legislature taking full advantage of its power of appropriation in choosing a statewide approach to funding energy projects, and that the governor still retains his strictly construed power to veto all of sec. 7 of the bill.

Of course, a court may hold that the contingency language found in sec. 39(a) of the bill does violate the governor's power of line item veto, but I do not believe that it is an open-and-shut case. There are certainly arguments to be made on both sides. In essence, a court's decision may come down to whether or not the projects in sec. 7 are sufficiently tied to each other that the contingency is reasonable.

As for a potential confinement clause issue (i.e. substantive law in an appropriations bill) relating to the intent language found in sec. 7 of the bill and the contingency in sec. 39(a), in Knowles v. Legislative Council, 21 P.3d 367 (Alaska 2001), the state Supreme Court established a five-part test for substantive contingencies related to appropriations:

> [T]he qualifying language must be the minimum necessary to explain the Legislature's intent regarding how the money appropriated is to be spent. It must not administer the program of expenditures. It must not enact law > or amend existing law. It must not extend beyond the life of the appropriation. Finally, the language must be germane, that is appropriate, to an appropriations bill.

Id. at 377. In taking these one by one, it first appears that one could argue that the minimum language necessary to explain the legislature's intent has been used. Based on the statutory energy policy found in AS 44.99.115, the legislature intends that its interpretation of the policy be followed in funding projects in all areas of the state. The intent language does not administer a program, as each project may still be carried out in accordance with existing law. For example, the Alaska Energy Authority is not being given any further guidelines on how to use the potential $5,000,000 for "bulk fuel upgrades." I would certainly say that this intent language does not amend existing law or extend beyond the life of the appropriation. Finally, the intent language is likely germane, as it is tying all of the projects in sec. 7 of the bill to a state energy policy that it is attempting to follow.

b. Contingency Language in Sec. 39(b).

As for the contingency language found in sec. 39(b) of the bill, I feel strongly that this is a valid contingency. As recently as 2006, the legislature has passed a capital budget bill containing contingency language that tied certain appropriations to the price of petroleum. Found at sec. 64(c), ch. 82, SLA 2006, the contingency stated:

> The appropriation made by sec. 20(j) of this Act is contingent on an increase in petroleum tax revenue, as estimated by the Department of Revenue, due to the state for the months of April, May, and June 2006 in an amount equal to or greater than the appropriation made by sec. 20(j) of this Act.

While this contingency did not name an exact price, it is quite similar to the contingency found in sec. 39(b). The legislature has simply set aside a certain list of projects that it does not believe should be funded unless the state generates a certain amount of revenue in the first three months of fiscal year 2012. If the price of Alaska North Slope crude oil reaches a certain level, then the legislature believes that money may be spent on the projects listed in sec. 4. This appears to me to be a fiscal policy decision -- that money should only be spent on certain projects if the state receives sufficient funds based on the price of oil.

c. Nonseverability Clause in Sec. 40.[2]

Like the contingency language in sec. 39, the nonseverability clause in sec. 40 of the bill is not an "item" subject to the governor's line item veto power in art. II, sec. 15. See

[2] You requested an analysis of the non-severability clause in sec. 40 of a version of the bill that was produced for another client. Since you had a copy of it by permission of the other client as I understand it, and faxed us the two pages with sec. 39 and sec. 40 from the other client's version on 4-21-11, we will provide an opinion for you regarding sec. 40 of the bill on that basis.

generally, Alaska Legislative Council v. Knowles, 21 P.3d 367 (Alaska 2001). So the governor, in my view, may not veto the nonseverability language itself in sec. 40 of CSSB 46(FIN). The question then becomes, if the governor ignores the contingency language in sec. 39(a), which is the section of the bill that is your focus, and vetoes any of the selected energy projects or "items" in sec. 39(a), or if the court declares that contingency language invalid, will a court give effect to the legislature's "all or nothing" intent by upholding the non-severability clause in sec. 40 of the bill.

The general rule is that provisions of a bill are presumed to be severable in the event that a portion of the bill is found to be unconstitutional. The legislature has provided by statute that all bills are to be construed as if they contained a severability clause. AS 01.10.030. The Alaska Supreme Court has found that this statute expresses legislative intent in favor of severability. See generally, Williams v. Zobel, 619 P.2d 422 (Alaska 1980). The inclusion of a specific severability clause in a bill creates an even stronger, but not conclusive, presumption of severability. Conversely, the inclusion of a nonseverability clause demonstrates the legislature's intent that if the nonseverable section of the bill identified by the legislature is found unconstitutional or otherwise invalid, the legislature's intent was for the remainder not to stand. The ultimate factor in determining whether an invalid provision of a bill is severable is the intent of the legislature. If it is clear that the legislature intended a bill or a portion of a bill to take effect as passed by the legislature or not at all, then that bill or provision would be found to be nonseverable. See, Lynden Trans., Inc v. State, 532 P.2d 700 (Alaska 1975).

It is always hard to predict how a court would interpret the non-severability clause in sec. 40. However, there is a good argument a court would view the nonseverability language in sec. 40 as a strong message of intent from the legislature that, if the legislature was constitutionally unable to use the contingency language in sec. 39(a) to fund "all or none" of the identified energy projects, the legislature did not want any of the appropriations to be effective.

SUBJECT: Contingency Language in Capital Budget

TO: Representative Les Gara

FROM: Doug Gardner
Director

You have asked for a brief analysis of the constitutionality of the contingency language found in sec. 39[1] of the draft CSSB 46(FIN), especially focusing on the concept that substantive law may not be in an appropriations bill.

1. The Governor's Veto Power Relating to Sec. 39(a). The contingency language found in sec. 39(a) of the capital budget bill does not prohibit the governor from vetoing items in sec. 7 of the bill. Instead, it provides that a veto by the governor of an item in sec. 7 of the bill will have the secondary result of deleting all projects found in sec. 7 from the bill. The governor is still free to exercise his veto regarding sec. 7.

Whether a court would uphold the validity of the contingency language found in sec. 39(a) is a question I cannot answer, as this is a scenario that has not arisen in the past. The contingency found in sec. 39(a) could be held unconstitutional because of a separation of powers issue related to the governor's veto powers, but I am not completely convinced that a court would rule the contingency language invalid. In fact, the veto power of the governor can be characterized as a legislative power (appropriating the state's money) that was conferred upon the governor in the state constitution. Likewise, the legislature, in art. III, secs. 25 and 26 of the state constitution, was bestowed an executive power in having the power to confirm certain appointees by the governor. Regarding the ability to confirm appointees, the Alaska Supreme Court held in Bradner v. Hammond, 553 P.2d 1 (Alaska 1976), that the legislature's power to confirm should be

[1] In full, sec. 39 reads:

> Sec. 39. CONTINGENCY. (a) Each of the appropriations made in sec. 7 of this Act is contingent on passage by the Twenty-Seventh Alaska State Legislature in the First Regular Session and enactment into law of every appropriation made in sec. 7 of this Act.

limited to the specific instances listed in the constitution and not broadly construed because the legislature was exercising what was essentially an executive power. Bradner, 553 P.2d at 7 - 8. One could look at the Bradner case in light of the governor's line item veto power and argue that the line item veto power -- a legislative function in that it relates to appropriations -- should not be broadly construed, but viewed in more limited terms. Thus, the contingency of sec. 39(a) could be viewed as the legislature taking full advantage of its power of appropriation in choosing a statewide approach to funding energy projects, and that the governor still retains his strictly construed power to veto all of sec. 7 of the bill.

Of course, a court may hold that the contingency language found sec. 39(a) of the bill does violate the governor's power of line item veto, but I do not believe that it is an open-and-shut case. There are certainly arguments to be made on both sides. In essence, a court's decision may come down to whether or not the projects in sec. 7 are sufficiently tied to each other that the contingency is reasonable.

2. The Confinement Clause Relating to Sec. 39(a). As for a potential confinement clause issue (i.e. substantive law in an appropriations bill) relating to the intent language found in sec. 7 of the bill and the contingency in sec. 39(a), in Knowles v. Legislative Council, 21 P.3d 367 (Alaska 2001), the state Supreme Court established a five-part test for substantive contingencies related to appropriations:

> [T]he qualifying language must be the minimum necessary to explain the Legislature's intent regarding how the money appropriated is to be spent. It must not administer the program of expenditures. It must not enact law or amend existing law. It must not extend beyond the life of the appropriation. Finally, the language must be germane, that is appropriate, to an appropriations bill.

Id. at 377. In taking these one by one, it first appears that one could argue that the minimum language necessary to explain the legislature's intent has been used. Based on the statutory energy policy found in AS 44.99.115, the legislature intends that its interpretation of the policy be followed in funding projects in all areas of the state. The intent language does not administer a program, as each project may still be carried out in accordance with existing law. For example, the Alaska Energy Authority is not being given any further guidelines on how to use the potential $5,000,000 for "bulk fuel upgrades." I would certainly say that this intent language does not amend existing law or extend beyond the life of the appropriation. Finally, the intent language is likely germane, as it is tying all of the projects in sec. 7 of the bill to a state energy policy that it is attempting to follow.

3. Section 39(b). As for the contingency language found in sec. 39(b) of the bill, I feel strongly that this is a valid contingency. As recently as 2006, the legislature has passed a capital budget bill containing contingency language that tied certain appropriations to the price of petroleum. Found at sec. 64(c), ch. 82, SLA 2006, the contingency stated:

> The appropriation made by sec. 20(j) of this Act is contingent on an increase in petroleum tax revenue, as estimated by the Department of Revenue, due to the state for the months of April, May, and June 2006 in an amount equal to or greater than the appropriation made by sec. 20(j) of this Act.

While this contingency did not name an exact price, it is quite similar to the contingency found in sec. 39(b). The legislature has simply set aside a certain list of projects that it does not believe should be funded unless the state generates a certain amount of revenue in the first three months of fiscal year 2012. If the price of Alaska North Slope crude oil reaches a certain level, then the legislature believes that money may be spent on the projects listed in sec. 4. This appears to me to be a fiscal policy decision -- that money should only be spent on certain projects if the state receives sufficient funds based on the price of oil.

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

Subject: Transcript and Links from Senator Paskvan's Speech this morning on the Senate Floor

Good Afternoon Everyone!

Following is a transcript of Senator Paskvan's speech this morning on the constitutionality of the contingency language included right now in the proposed Capital Budget-

Here are the links to the Alaska Supreme Court Opinions that Senator Paskvan references during his speech:

Thank you, Mr. President. In the last several days, there's been discussion about the building and I think probably about the state of Alaska as to the constitutionality of the Senate's efforts to advance an energy package. As someone who has worked in the legal system myself for about 30 years and have a tremendous respect for Alaska's constitution, I would hope to be able to offer a few comments about that.

Kind of as an introduction to that- We have three separate branches of government. The Legislative Branch- its function is to adopt policy and appropriate money to advance its policies. The Executive function is to implement that legislative policy and enforce those policies. The Judicial Branch, in this context, may be called upon to determine the constitutional boundaries between the Executive Branch and the Legislative Branch. This is where the independence of the judiciary is absolutely critical when it comes to its constitutional obligation of clarifying the application of the Alaska constitution.

As part of that, the Senate is advancing an energy policy and this plan is a statewide energy policy that brings, I believe, all Alaskans forward. The thought is that the public's highest priority right now is the cost of energy in Alaska and how, across this entire state, the Legislature can address the high of cost of energy. The Senate is advancing in its statewide energy plan, as an item, the generation and distribution of energy all across this state.

Then the question arises and has been discussed, how do we protect all Alaskans? We do not want to leave any region out. We want to protect Alaskans by saying we are all in this together. We want to work towards a solution of the problem of the high cost of energy with the recognition that all Alaskans across the state should be part of that solution. To advance this worthy goal of keeping Alaskans together, there is language which manifests the intent, at least on the Senate side, of keeping all Alaskans together.

Are there constitutional issues which are raised? Unquestionably the answer to that is: yes, there are constitutional issues which are raised. And I say in that regard that Alaska is a very young state. There are not cases. In other words, there's a not case law in Alaska that applies to every circumstance that may apply when there may be tensions between the Executive Branch and the Legislative Branch.

We do not know exactly who shall prevail in a circumstance such as this. But I emphatically state, the question is not about who is right or who is wrong, who should win or who should be the loser, the question is, What is the constitutional answer to these questions? That is what I believe is the goal of what we need to address. What is constitutional answer? Again, the three branches of government are set up exactly for these types of circumstances.

There are standards that can be found in some of our case law that addresses some of the points that the court system may be called upon to analyze when they look at the circumstance of the language that is currently in an appropriation bill. Mr. President, if I could read from select portions of this? (Senate President Stevens: "Without objection, Please Proceed.")

Again, Mr. President, there's a 2001 case that's advanced by, or an opinion of, the Alaska Supreme Court. It sets apart a standard which the courts would look to in determining whether the language within this appropriation bill should prevail or not prevail in the end. And it indicates quote, "The qualifying language must be the minimum necessary to explain the Legislature's intent regarding how the money appropriated is to be spent." I do not think we violate that test Mr. President. Next, it says "It must not administer the program of expenditures." Mr. President, the language in this appropriations bill does not administer any of the monies in this program. Next is says, "It must not enact law or amend existing law." This language does neither of those. In other words, it complies with at third component of the test. And, it must not enact or amend existing law. This language does not do that whatsoever. Finally in this five part test, "It must not extend beyond the life of the appropriation and the language must be germane. " That is appropriate to an appropriations bill. I submit that it does satisfy all of this test that is set forth in the 2001 opinion.

So looking to that test, the question is, is what standard will the Alaska Supreme Court apply when looking at the tension between the Executive and the Legislative Branch. In addressing these particular types of cases, the Alaska Supreme Court says, and I again I quote, "We assume that an act of the Legislature is constitutional. The burden of showing unconstitutionality is on the party challenging the enactment. Doubtful cases should be resolved in favor of constitutionality."

The Supreme Court several years after that 2001 opinion issued another opinion and it included in there a very interesting sentence that I would like to read to the body today. In addressing again the tensions between the Executive Branch and the Legislative Branch, the Supreme Court in 2004 looked at the language used by the drafters of the Constitution, looked to the minutes of the discussions as to what was being discussed at that time. This is what in 2004 the Alaska Supreme Court said: "The minutes indicate that the delegates never intended the governor's article 2 appropriations veto power to apply to anything other than monetary appropriations." End quote.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I think that there is a solid foundation for the Senate to advance this language as part of a statewide energy plan. It is part of a cohesive package to not only bring all Alaskans together, but to keep all Alaskans together. The question is, is the extent of the constitutionality of the governor's veto power? It is not well established. In other words, the governor does have risk of constitutional significance and I believe that it's likely that the veto power will be strictly construed in these circumstances. Second, the Senate as a separate branch of government is legitimately asserting its policy and appropriations power. But it also has risk. Again, because we do not have case law to say precisely what the parameters of the Legislative power of policy making and appropriations is in the precise circumstance. So both the Executive Branch and the Legislative Branch do have some risk in this circumstance. But again we are under the standard that in doubtful cases, the Supreme Court will look at that and say 'even under doubtful cases the presumption shall be constitutionality as to the Legislative activity.'

I think the public should understand that there is no risk to Alaska's constitution itself. There is no changing of the constitution that is sought here whatsoever. I do stand in awe to think of the drafters of the Constitution, now more than 50 years ago, that set up the three branches of government at that time to address exactly the circumstances such as this. I think we have a wonderful system that we work within. As a legislator, one of the 60 that are elected from around this state, I believe it is my constitutional job to advance the policy making and appropriation power that this separate branch of government has and I thank the body for listening.

As you know, this has been a contentious time for all of us. I wanted to let you know that myself and Senator Meyer met with the House Majority Caucus earlier today. I just wanted to clear the air. That's an unusual thing for two Senators to go into a room full of angry representatives, but we came out alive. So, that was an interesting experience. We told them where we are and what our concerns are.
As you know, the big problem is the contingency language. That's extremely important to the Senate and,as you know, of less importance to the House. What I think the principle that we have to stand behind and are standing behind, is protecting Legislative priorities, both the House and the Senate, of trying to not leave the Legislature in a weaker position than it was when we arrived and to recognize the importance of the Legislature in the process of Alaskan government and its appropriating power.
One of the major issues that lends to where we are is the governor's oil tax bill, House Bill 110 and the governor's comments. As you know, the governor at one point implied there might be repercussions for those who opposed his oil tax bill. As you know, the Senate has had serious concerns about it and continues to have serious concerns about it. Not really certain that that's the best way for the state to go. We want to have more information. We want to look into it more. We want to get more facts and figures on it before we are ready to agree to a $2 billion reduction in state funding from oil taxes. So that was sort of an issue that poisoned things to start with and hasn't really let up much since.
I did want to let you know that this has been a negotiating process with the House and we have made numerous concessions along the way. In any negotiation, what you expect to do is you make a proposal and if the other side doesn't like it, they make a counter proposal. That has not occurred at all in this process. Every time we have made a concession, the House has said no and with no further suggestions on their part. So, we've continued to make concessions in order to protect that issue of that contingency language. I want to go through those concessions with you so that you understand how we've gotten to where we are. Senator Stedman or Senator Hoffman, leap in here if you have any further issues on any of the concessions I'll mention very briefly, but they may want to expand on a little bit.
The first concession had to do with major school maintenance. We reduced the major school maintenance by $200 million. We wanted to do all of the list that was out there, all of the schools that needed major maintenance and repairs around the state. At the request of the House, we reduced that by $200 million. The second thing we did was reduce debt. We did agree to that. That was a matter of days passing between each and every one of these. The third one was the $150 oil trigger. We took that off and that had to do with $100 million of the governor's capital projects. When we took that off, it freed up that $100 million. The fourth thing that we offered, and again no response, no counteroffer, was to water down the language of the energy proposals. That includes AEA, the Alaska Energy Authority and an agreement to vet all of those energy projects through the AEA and we agreed to go from a 100-percent match down to a 50-percent match. The fifth thing that we did, that just occurred recently here, is an offer to take several projects out of the list and put them in an appropriations bill on their own, so they wouldn't be on that list. The whole thing could be vetoed by the governor. That's the area of weatherization, rebate and alternative energy. We made that proposal- All three come off and be put into one appropriations bill on their own. About $100 million, I believe.
To sort of conclude my comments, I am meeting this evening with the governor at 5:30. I've been calling today wanting to meet with him and talk about the issue and he's agreed to meet with me at 5:30. At that time, my intention is to ask the governor to come meet with the Senate Majority caucus sometime tomorrow at his convenience. I think it is important for the caucus to hear from the governor, that we've read his press release, from the governor his intentions as to the potential vetoes and he has said in his press release that there will not be repercussions and no one will be held, nobody's budget will be slashed because they happen to be opposed to the oil tax bill. I think folks need to hear that from the governor himself. So, I'm going to ask him, and it's not firm, I'm not sure he's going to accept, I think he should- to come down and meet with the caucus just to confirm to folks that that is in fact his position. Simple request on my part and I don't see any reason the governor would not be willing to do that. So, that's where we are.

Subject: Transcript of Senator French Speech this morning on the Senate Floor 4-26-2011

Good Afternoon Everyone!

Here is a transcript of the speech Senator French made this morning on the Senate Floor about contingency language:

To listen instead: http://aksenate.org/french/042611_french.wav.

Thank you Mr. President. A lot of us are here in a Special Session making contingency plans. Some folks in the Senate would like to be off to Norway. Others would like to be bear hunting. We have family obligations. They've all been put on hold because we are here trying to sort out a difficult matter of important public policy. This is the ninth day of the special session.

At the heart of it, really what's keeping us here is some contingency language inside the Capital Budget that's causing many people concern. I haven't seen a lot of public debate about it. There's been different remarks made in different press conferences and so forth. But I thought I would go ahead and start one here and see what responses it might provoke and of what thoughts other people may have. At the heart of this matter in my belief is the law and the politics of contingencies. Now the law in this area is about the relevant power between two co-equal branches of government and how we share power between the governor's branch and the legislative branch. It's subtle. I'll discuss that a little more at length in a few minutes.

The politics, on the other hands, are not so subtle. The politics started with the governor's proposed oil tax bill and his threat to veto capital projects if the reduction in oil taxes did not pass. Now let's put aside the inverted logic of this assertion of his power. Once that idea was set loose, what happened? Our Finance Co-

Chair from Sitka began to think about how to react to it. First, he had to ask himself which projects in the Capital Budget are the most important. Two-- and having decided they were energy projects in conjunction with legislation we'd passed last year and in conjunction with our own caucasus' emphasis on certain subjects, fixing the energy problem being the number one problem. Two, how can fund those energy projects around the state fairly if the governor is going to be swinging his veto axe?

The answer is in section seven of the Capital Budget. There are energy projects in that section. $400 million worth of energy projects. Basic infrastructure like power line upgrades. There's $100 million worth of power line upgrades in that Capital Budget. Stuff that AEA has been asking for years. Meat and potato type projects. This is not fancy, it's just what you do to build a strong state. $100 million dollars worth of power line upgrades. There's energy projects for Soldotna, for Kotzebue, for Snettisham, for Lime Village, for Metlakatla, for Homer and for Fairbanks. In Fairbanks, there's $3 million for wood stove conversions there. They've got a serious air problem. This helps fund a fix to that. There's money for the Susitna Hydro Project in there-for folks who are listening at home. There's home weatherization funding. There's energy rebate funding. This is an excellent package designed to move the state forward.

You know there's been some talk that these projects have not been vetted. Let me give you just one example of a project that has been. The Whitman Lake project in Ketchikan has a final project from FERC. I think that is about as vetted as you can get. So the co-chair from Sitka thinks, how do I protect these necessary projects? How do I protect them? And he thought up an excellent response to the problem. You weld all those projects into one, into one statewide energy package that does something for every single region in this state. E Pluribus Unum, Mr. President. Out of many, one. Out of many, one. That's what he did. The nation's motto. It's interesting, isn't it?

And he used contingency language in the Capital Budget that said if one is vetoed, they're all vetoed. It's the first time in the state's history this has been done exactly this way. First time ever in fifty years. The senator from Sitka, I think he thought up a better mousetrap. An interesting twist on an old device. I say a better mousetrap because it's a new and improved twist on something that we've tried to do on occasion in the past. We've tried in the past to use contingencies to constrain executive power.

The most well known instance comes from 1997. That year the Legislature, indeed the Senate Finance Committee, wrote a Capital Budget that had several very interesting contingencies. Then Senator Sean Parnell was a member of that Finance Committee. He voted for the bill. Indeed two years later when he was Co-Chair of the Senate Finance Committee, he said "I would never waive the Legislature's rights to include conditional language in an appropriations bill." He was sitting in the exact same seat that the Senator from Sitka is sitting in today when he said that. Remarkable, isn't it? But I do digress a bit.

The 1997 appropriations wound up in court. They wound up in a case and the case is great reading if you are a lawyer. It's 17 pages long and I have a copy of it here. I've read it three times. It's very subtle. It is subtle. It revolves around two constitutional provisions. They're both in Article 2, Section 13 and Section 15. And I brought my constitution with me today. Section 13 is simple: Every bill should be confined to one subject. We know that's called the Confinement Clause unless it is an appropriations bill or one codifying, revising, or rearranging existing laws. So we have an appropriations bill before us. That's section 13. Section 15 discusses vetoes. It says the governor may veto bills passed by the Legislature. He may, by veto, strike or reduce items in appropriation bills. Strike or reduce items. That's what he does in appropriation bills.

In this case, in the '97 case, there was a bunch of language in there and he tried to veto the language and it turned out that language is not an item. Language is not an item. You cannot veto language in an appropriations bill. It took Justice Eastaugh four pages to define what an item is. It's a subtle decision and it takes a while to get through it. But you can't veto language in the appropriations bill. That's as clear as clear can be.

So what we do now is-- The Department of Law has looked at this I'm sure. I'm sure they've looked at this case. I'm sure they've looked at it carefully. I'm sure they've told the governor he can't veto this language. I'm sure the Department of Law is concerned very deeply about what we're doing here. I'm thinking they know we are on to something.

Now, it's interesting that in these contests with the governor, the kind of contest we are engaged in now, we start out with the presumption of constitutionality. The things we do here on this Floor, the bills we pass are all presumed to be constitutional. It's presumed that we think hard, that we work hard and the acts we do are right and true to the constitution. The courts, when they review what we do in this body, will try to uphold our acts. The governor knows this as well.

Don't get me wrong, there are subtleties in the case from '97. It's titled Leg. Council versus Knowles. Both sides, as they read this case, will seize on little languages and sentences and try to support their own case. And though the budget passed in '97, this '97 case, the case was not decided for four years. It tells you that these things can drag out. And we shouldn't have to go there. We, this now, knowing this, knowing that these can be tangled issues shouldn't go there.

I've always been told that if you invent a better mousetrap, the world will beat a path to your door. The governor should be beating a path up to his old offices in the Senate Finance Committee. He should be talking to the co-chairs about which energy projects he supports and which he doesn't. Because it all comes back to those energy projects. It all comes back to building a statewide solution to the crisis the state is facing with respect to energy. He should be talking to them. We should be talking to the other body and the governor as well. I should parenthetically sort of ask, I'm curious about why some legislators are opposing this approach. Legislators should be looking to strengthen our body and not give up power to the governor. The only ones who should be opposing this are ones who might someday want to be governor. I can't imagine who that would be.

The way out of this, in my view, is through logic and through reason. I think that we, this body, the other body and the governor are all up to the task. Thank you, Mr. President.

Subject: Senator French & Senator Stedman Speeches on the Senate Floor This Morning

Good Afternoon Everyone!

Here is the audio clip of Senator French's speech on the Senate Floor this morning regarding the contingency language included in the proposed Capital Budget. A transcript of this speech will be available shortly. http://aksenate.org/french/042611_french.wav.

Here's a link to the brief of the Alaska Supreme Court case referenced in Senator French's speech – Knowles vs. Legislative Council in 1999.

Also, here is an audio clip of the speech Senator Stedman made shortly following Senator French's speech. In it, he clarifies several of the disputed facts surrounding the Senate Finance Committee's Capital Budget. Once again, a transcript of this speech will be sent later this afternoon. http://aksenate.org/stedman/042611_stedman.wav

Subject: Transcript of Attorney General Burns Press Conference on 4/26/2011:

Good Evening Everyone!

Here is a transcript of the press conference held by Attorney General John Burns this afternoon:

If you would rather watch or listen: http://gavelalaska.org/media/?media_id=PRAV110426A

First of all, I would like to welcome all of you. I apologize that we are a little bit late, but I wanted to do is also provide you a copy of the memorandum that has been issued by my office so that you have a full copy of it. I am confident it will answer any of the questions you have relative to this.

The principles of our democratic form of government are grounded in the constitution and it is the constitution that governs resolution of the issue on which the capital budget seems to have floundered.- the injection of contingency and non-severability language that is unabashedly aimed at constraining the constitutional power of the Executive Branch. My responsibility as Attorney General, and in fact the responsibility of all public officials whether they be elected or appointed, is to uphold the constitution. Politics must always yield to the constitutional principles that govern the administration of our state.

The irony of what the Senate Finance Committee is proposing by injecting contingency and non-severability language into the appropriation bill is that far from protecting the energy projects that are listed in Section 4 of the Capital Appropriations Bill, the contingency and non-severability language actually jeopardizes those projects and exposes them to potential litigation from third parties.

Even if the governor were to choose not to line item veto any appropriation, the reality is that each appropriation would still be of dubious of legal validity if the non-severability provision were upheld. Any litigant opposed to any single energy project could invalidate every appropriation by successfully challenging the Legislature's unconstitutional attempts through section 36 to usurp the governor's constitutional veto power. The contingency language in Section 36 of Senate Bill 46 and the non-severability provisions of Section 37 each violate the Alaska Constitution by improperly impairing the governor's line item veto as found in Article 3, Section 15. Each of these provisions is invalid and unenforceable.

Section 36, which in layman's terms is considered a poison pill provision, would make each energy project appropriation contingent upon passage and enactment of every other appropriation without reduction in the amount of the appropriation. Section 37, on the other hand, provides that if the contingency language in Section 36 is invalid, then in essence all of the projects must fail. It is an all or nothing package.

The simple reality is that the contingency and non-severability language violates the constitution because it violates the governor's line item veto power by prohibiting the governor from striking or reducing any individual appropriation made in section 4 of the Capital Appropriations bill.

Alaska's Constitutional Convention Delegates intended to create a strong executive branch with a strong control on the purse strings of the state. That's a quote. Article 3, Section 15 of the Alaska Constitution gives the governor strong control by granting the governor the power by veto to strike or reduce items in appropriation bills, a power that is commonly known as the line item veto.

The Alaska Constitution also clearly establishes the parameters by which the Appropriations process must be followed. First, the governor is required to submit a budget to the Legislature for consideration. The Legislature, in turn, has the power to pass appropriation bills. The governor, once that has been done, the governor has line item veto authority of appropriations. Finally, the legislature has the authority to override a governor's veto.

Section 36 and Section 37 would violate this process by negating the governor's constitutional power to strike or reduce any individual energy project appropriation. Section 36 violates the governor's constitutional power by linking, I call it the linkage provision, by linking the appropriations of each energy project item to the passage or enactment of every other appropriation made in Section 4. This usurps the governor's line item veto power, thus upsetting the checks and balances on which our constitution is premised.

Think about it logically- If the Legislature could link one appropriation to another or 50, 60 or 70 different appropriations, the Legislature could effectively eliminate the governor's power to reduce individual line items. The governor would have two choices: either veto them all or accept each and every appropriation. Allowing the linkage of appropriations with such a contingency would too easily permit the Legislature to circumvent the governor's constitutional veto authority.

Section 37, in turn, exacerbates this constitutional violation by doubling the unconstitutional linkage to appropriations for energy projects. If it a contingency in Section 36 is held invalid, the legislature attempts to achieve the same unconstitutional result by making the contingency not severable from the energy project appropriation. If section 37 were found valid, the Legislature would effectively be usurping the governor's line item veto power by painting the all or nothing approach. A non-severability clause which would enable the Legislature to overstep its constitutional authority is itself unconstitutional and severable from the legislation. Upholding the validity of Section 37 would do nothing more than promote the Legislature's desire to usurp the governor's veto power and unconstitutionally logroll the appropriations from multiple energy projects.

From a practical perspective, equally significant in what is being overlooked by the political posturing that is taking place, is the risk that public interest litigation could place a cloud over each appropriation, which in turn would impair the development of important energy projects. Sections 36 and 37 make the funding intended for energy projects uncertain until a court rules on the validity of both sections. Until that time, no project proponent could rely upon on actually receiving the money that is appropriated in Section 4. It would be both difficult and imprudent for project proponents to contract, to develop those energy projects when state funding is uncertain. Contract damages could arise if a project had to be stopped because an expected appropriation was held invalid. It was also be difficult or impossible for a project to obtain financing. Any lender or bond financing would require that all project funding be secured before additional financing would be made available on reasonable financial terms.

In sum, the invasion of the Executive Power functions makes the contingency language in Section 36 and the non-severability clause in Section 37 unconstitutional and invalid under the Alaska Constitution.

I have taken the liberty of providing a copy of the memo to those of you who are here and it will also be set forward under the link. It'll be in the link to our website at the Department of Law.

I'm happy to answer a few questions. I'm confident any questions you will have be answered in the memorandum. But, Becky?

Question: Where do you go from here? The governor yesterday said that if you get the bill with this language, you would have to test the bounds of it which suggests court action of some sort. Where do you take this? Do you let this play out in a court at some point?

Attorney General Burns: It is appropriate that it plays out in the Legislature until such time as the Legislature has finalized the Capital bill, it rightfully belongs with the Legislature to deal with the issues.

Question: Attorney General, let me see if I have your argument in summary that any language in that bill that would serve to limit the governor's line item veto power would be unconstitutional. It doesn't matter the exact sentencing, anything that does that?

Attorney General Burns: Yes.

Question: A senator from Anchorage this morning raised a 10-year-old court opinion. Are you aware of the opinion he raised on the Senate Floor and do you worry at all that your legal advice will conflict with that court decision from 2001.

Attorney General Burns: I believe you are referring to the Knowles, that case. I think the opinion of the Department of Law is very much consistent with the Knowles opinion. And again, I appreciate the press conference on availability and I will again, as I said, it's before you, the memorandum. It's also available by link. This is the Senate's language. At this juncture, it resides with the Senate. It's within the Senate's power to make those modifications before it's forwarded to the House. My intent in holding this press conference is just to unequivocally state the opinion of the Department of Law as it relates to that issue. Because again, I want to emphasize that you have to look at the practical implications of this. The practical implications are that in reality, many of these projects will, notwithstanding the fact that they may have appropriations ,until these issues are resolved, either judicially, which I would hope would never get to that point, or legislatively through the Senate fixing the language, no project could rightfully go forward without being under a cloud.

Question: If you are talking about both legal questions and practical concerns and considerations- when you mention third party litigants and the prospect of third party litigants, do you have someone that you, that the state worries might go after a legal challenge? Who might sue over something like this?

Attorney General Burns: Anybody who feels that the process has been corrupted, that's there been a usurpation of the constitutional powers. Anyone. There are a myriad of potentials. It could be someone opposed to a project, somebody who just feels that, as I clearly do, that the constitution needs to be upheld. It's anyone who's a potential public interest litigant.

Question: Do you feel that the language in Section 37, the non-severability language, could be struck by line-item veto or does that not meet the definition of an item?

Attorney General Burns: It does not meet the definition of an item.

Question: So, it's more that you would potentially raise a court challenge to the language, not that you would recommend vetoing it?

Attorney General Burns: It's the effect of it. You know, the Legislature has the power to legislate, to state the obvious. So, the governor does not have the power to line item language. That's vested with the Legislature. It's the consequence of that language as it relates to the usurpation of the Executive branch's ability to act appropriately within its constitutional rights.

Question: What do you say to some of those of leaders in the Senate who say 'Our role is the appropriator and we just want to make clear that this money and these projects go forward.' As one Senator said yesterday, if the governor wants to veto, he just vetoes a larger chunk. You talked about the governor's authorities, but what about legislature's authorities. They think that they are on solid ground.

Attorney General Burns: The Legislature, it's their prerogative to lay whatever intent language they feel appropriate. But that intent language cannot infringe on the constitutional power that rests in the Executive Branch on the line item veto. Because, remember, in the end the Legislature retains the power to override a veto. That's the checks and balances. You don't allow one branch to usurp the rights of another just because they feel it may be convenient.

Question: Attorney General- You're saying in effect the governor has to veto that language if the Senate's Section 36 and 37 are in the bill. That your advice to him would be to veto those things to uphold the constitutional...

Attorney General Burns: At this juncture I've given no advice as to how to approach it and it would be speculative depending what the ultimate result of the language is. So I am going to reserve comment on that. But certainly he has multiple options. Thank you.

STATE of Alaska and Department of Revenue, Appellants,

v.

A.L.I.V.E. VOLUNTARY, Appellee.

No. 3670.

Supreme Court of Alaska.

Feb. 19, 1980.

Unincorporated association, which was political action committee for unions, brought suit based on allegation that Department of Revenue's denial of permit allowing association to operate lotteries was wrongful for certain reasons including fact that such denial was based on continuing enforcement of a regulation despite its nullification by legislature. The Superior Court, Third Judicial District, Peter J. Kalamarides, J., granted association partial summary judgment, and State and Department of Revenue appealed. The Supreme Court, Matthews, J., held that statute providing that legislature, by concurrent resolution adopted by vote of both houses, could annul a regulation of an agency or department violated state constitutional provisions defining the mechanics of legislation.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Boochever, C. J., dissented and filed opinion in which Connor, J., joined.

1. Statutes ⇐107(1)

Constitutional requirements that every bill be confined to one subject and that there be a descriptive title are intended to prevent inclusion of incongruous and unrelated matters in same bill and to guard against inadvertence, stealth and fraud in legislation. Const. art. 2, § 13.

2. Statutes ⇐15, 19

Purpose of state constitutional provision requiring three readings of a bill on three separate days, requiring that vote of each legislator on final passage of a bill be recorded and requiring that no bill pass without an affirmative vote of the majority of the membership of each house is to ensure deliberation prior to passage, to ensure that requisite majority of each house affirmatively votes to enact a bill into law and to provide a public record of the vote cast by each legislator. Const. art. 2, § 14.

3. Statutes ⇐26

Purpose of state constitutional provisions to effect that no bill shall become law unless governor has opportunity to veto it is to preserve integrity of executive branch of government, and thus maintain equilibrium of governmental powers, and to act as a check on hasty and ill-considered legislation. Const. art. 2, §§ 15, 17.

4. Statutes ⇐255

Purpose of state constitutional provision that laws are not to become effective, unless a two-thirds vote of membership of each house provides otherwise, until 90 days after they are enacted is to provide fair opportunity to those people affected by the legislation to learn of it. Const. art. 2, § 18.

5. Statutes ⇐22

Statute providing that legislature, by concurrent resolution adopted by vote of both houses, could annul a regulation of an agency or department violated state constitutional provisions defining the mechanics of legislation. Const. art. 2, §§ 1 et seq., 5, 13–18; art. 3, § 23; art. 10, § 12; AS 44.62.320(a).

6. Statutes ⇐22

When legislature wishes to act in an advisory capacity it may act by resolution, but if it wishes to take action having a binding effect on those outside the legislature, it may do so only by following the enactment procedure set forth in State Constitution. Const. art. 2, § 1 et seq.

7. Statutes ⇐22

Legislature has no implied general power to veto agency regulations by informal legislative actions. Const. art. 3, § 23; art. 10, § 12.

8. Administrative Law and Procedure ⇐385

Power granted by state constitutional provisions to effect that, unless they are disapproved by legislature within 60 days, changes in the law by executive order shall become effective at a date thereafter to be designated by governor and that recommendations made by a state local boundary commission become effective 45 days after presentation to the legislature unless vetoed is not rule-making power, but, rather, power to change statutes, and, thus, expression of such power in Constitution does not carry any implication that general administrative rule making is meant to be forbidden. Const. art. 3, § 23; art. 10, § 12.

9. Constitutional Law ⇐60

Though legislature can delegate power to make laws conditionally, the condition must be lawful and may not contain a grant of power to any branch of government to function in a manner prohibited by Constitution; fact that legislature can delegate legislative powers to others, who are not bound by constitutional provisions defining the mechanics of legislation, does not mean that legislature can delegate the same power to itself and, in the process, escape from such constitutional constraints under which it must operate. Const. art. 2, § 1 et seq.

10. Constitutional Law ⇐58

Though power to void agency regulations can be exercised by either legislature or agency, if legislature exercises such power it must do so while acting as a legislature; it may not grant itself the power to act as an agency. Const. art. 2, §§ 1 et seq., 5; art. 3, § 26.

OPINION

MATTHEWS, Justice.

AS 44.62.320(a) provides:

> The legislature, by a concurrent resolution adopted by a vote of both houses, may annul a regulation of an agency or department.

This statute encompasses a variant of what has come to be called the legislative veto.[1] The question in this case is whether this device violates article II of the Alaska Constitution. We hold that it does.

I

Chapter 15 of Title 5 of the Alaska Statutes authorizes games of chance and skill to be operated by permit holders. Only certain kinds of games, ("bingo, raffles and lotteries, ice classics, dog mushers' contests, fish derbies and contests of skill") are allowed,[2] only nonprofit organizations may be issued a permit,[3] and all revenues must be devoted to "the awarding of prizes to contestants or participants and to educational, civic, public, charitable, patriotic or religious uses."[4] The Commissioner of Revenue has been delegated the authority to adopt rules and regulations "necessary to

From 1960 until 1976 one of the Commissioner's regulations prohibited lottery operators from giving prizes exceeding $15,000 in personal property or $30,000 in real property annually.[6] In November of 1976 the regulation was amended by increasing the annual personal property limit to $30,000 and the annual real property limit to $50,000 and by stating that personal property included cash and negotiable instruments.[7]

A.L.I.V.E. Voluntary is an unincorporated association which acts as the political action committee for the Teamster's Union Local No. 959, and affiliated unions. For three years it has operated fund raising lotteries under a permit issued by the Department of Revenue. It applied for a permit for 1977 and reported that during 1976 it had distributed $80,000 in cash prizes. The Department denied A.L.I.V.E. a permit for 1977 on the ground that its prize distribution in 1976 had exceeded the allowable limit.

A.L.I.V.E. then brought suit against the Department alleging that the denial of the permit was wrongful, claiming that under the first version of the regulation which was in effect for most of 1976 cash prizes were not included within the personal property limitation of $15,000. While the case was pending before the superior court, the legislature, acting under AS 44.62.320(a), annulled, by concurrent resolution, 15 AAC 05.410(4).[8]

As a result of the legislative annulment A.L.I.V.E. added another count to its complaint under which it claimed that the denial of its permit was wrongful because it was based on continuing enforcement of the regulation despite its nullification by the legislature. In response, the state claimed that the legislature could not constitutionally annul an administrative regulation by concurrent resolution and therefore the regulation had not been annulled. Both parties moved for summary judgment on this issue. The court granted partial summary judgment in favor of A.L.I.V.E., holding that the legislative annulment power was constitutional and that the regulation in question was void ab initio.[9]

5. AS 05.15.060(11).

6. The regulation was designated 15 AAC 05.410(4). It provided:

> In holding, operating, and conducting raffles or lotteries, no permittee shall raffle prizes of personal property in excess of the sum or value of $15,000.00 in any one calendar year and real property in excess of the sum or value of $30,000.00 in any one calendar year.

7. As amended the regulation reads:

> (4) In holding, operating and conducting raffles or lotteries, a permittee may not raffle prizes of personal property, including cash or a negotiable instrument, the aggregate total of which is in excess of the sum or value of $30,000 in any one calendar year and real property in excess of the sum or value of $50,000 in any one calendar year.

8. Legislative Resolve No. 79, in full, states:

> Annulling a regulation of the Department of Revenue pertaining to the value of prizes awarded in raffles and lotteries.
> BE IT RESOLVED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:
> WHEREAS under AS 44.62.320 the legislature by concurrent resolution adopted by a vote of both houses may annul a regulation of an agency or department; and
> WHEREAS 15 AAC 05.410(4), adopted by the Department of Revenue, restricts the value of prizes which may be awarded in a single year by a qualified organization in a raffle or lottery to $30,000 in personal property and $50,000 in real property; and
> WHEREAS the prevention of high-stakes gambling sought by this regulation could be achieved more effectively through less restrictive means; specifically, the value of prizes awarded in individual raffles or lotteries could be limited or the prize limit could be related to the amount required to participate in the raffle or lottery; and
> WHEREAS this regulation would frustrate the intent of AS 05.15.150, which specifies permissible uses for net proceeds of raffles and lotteries, by preventing qualified organizations from garnering net proceeds in sufficient amounts for uses specifically mentioned in AS 05.15.150, such as erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or lessening the burden on government;
> BE IT RESOLVED by the Alaska State Legislature that administrative regulation 15 AAC 05.410(4) is annulled.

9. That is, since 1960. Legislative Resolve No. 79 purported to annul not merely the 1976 amendments to the regulation, but the regulation in its entirety. See note 8, supra.

II

The Alaska Constitution defines with specificity the mechanics of legislation.[10] Each provision has a purpose "designed to engender a responsible legislative process worthy of the public trust." Plumley v. Hale, 594 P.2d 497, 500 (Alaska 1979).

[1] Article II, section 13 requires that every bill be confined to one subject and that there be a descriptive title. These requirements are designed "to prevent the inclusion of incongruous and unrelated matters in the same bill in order to get support for it which the several subjects might not separately command, and to guard against inadvertence, stealth and fraud in legislation." Suber v. Alaska State Bond Committee, 414 P.2d 546, 557 (Alaska 1966). The same section also requires a specific form of enactment clause to avoid confusion as to when the legislature is speaking with the force and effect of law, as distinguished from the mere expression of its views and desires.[11]

[2] Article II, section 14 requires three readings of a bill, on three separate days in order "to ensure that the legislature knows what it is passing," North Slope Borough v. Sohio Petroleum Corp., 585 P.2d 534, 543 n. 11 (Alaska 1978), and to ensure an opportunity for the expression of public opinion and due deliberation.[12] Section 14 also requires that the vote of each legislator on final passage of a bill be recorded and that no bill may pass without an affirmative vote of a majority of the membership of each house. These provisions are meant "to ensure deliberation prior to passage, to ensure that the requisite majority of each house affirmatively votes to enact a bill into law, and to provide a public record of the vote cast by each legislator." Plumley v. Hale, 594 P.2d 497, 500 (Alaska 1979).

[3, 4] In addition to these formal safeguards there is the condition that no bill shall become law unless the governor has the opportunity to veto it.[13] This power is granted " 'to preserve the integrity of . . [the executive] branch of government . . and thus maintain an equilibrium of governmental powers . . . [and] to act as a check upon corrupt or hasty and ill-considered legislation.' " Thomas v. Rosen, 569 P.2d 793, 795 n. 5 (Alaska 1977) (citation omitted). Finally, there is the clause that laws do not become effective, unless a two-thirds vote of the membership of each house provides otherwise, until ninety days after they are enacted. Art. II, § 18. This is designed to provide a fair opportunity to those people affected by legislation to learn of the laws they must live by.[14]

[5, 6] The question presented by this case is whether the legislature can exercise its legislative power without following these enactment provisions. In our view the answer must be in the negative, for otherwise they would serve no purpose. In Plumley v. Hale, 594 P.2d 497, 502 (Alaska 1979) we held that the requirements of Art. II § 14 are mandatory, not permissive.[15]

10. Art. II, § 13 provides:

Form of Bills. Every bill shall be confined to one subject unless it is an appropriation bill or one codifying, revising, or rearranging existing laws. Bills for appropriations shall be confined to appropriations. The subject of each bill shall be expressed in the title. The enacting clause shall be: "Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Alaska." Art. II, § 14 provides:

Passage of Bills. The legislature shall establish the procedure for enactment of bills into law. No bill may become law unless it has passed three readings in each house on three separate days, except that any bill may be advanced from second to third reading on the same day by concurrence of three-fourths of the house considering it. No bill may become law without an affirmative vote of a majority of the membership of each house. The yeas and nays on final passage shall be entered in the journal.

12. See 3 Proceedings of the Alaska Constitutional Convention 1751–54 (January 11, 1956).

13. Art. II, §§ 15, 16 and 17.

14. See 4 Proceedings of the Alaska Constitutional Convention 3110 (January 25, 1956).

15. We also referred to the Art. II, §§ 14 and 15 safeguards in North Slope Borough v. Sohio

The minutes of the proceedings of our constitutional convention indicate that the delegates were fully aware that only by following the enactment procedures could the legislature make law. Thus, Delegate Sundborg stated:

> Now, a majority vote in each house of the legislature is not equivalent to passing a law, because it does not require the signature of the governor, and it does not require conformance with the provisions of this constitution and the provisions of such laws as will be passed under it with respect to the procedure in enacting a law. So, when we say in the second sentence, "The state may by law," we are saying that that law must be passed by the legislature in the manner that is required by the constitution and the statutes, and either signed by the governor or passed over his veto or become law without his signature in the manner provided in the constitution, which we felt was the real intention of the body rather than merely requiring that the legislature by a majority in each house and without adhering to any of those other restrictions and without any reference to the governor could contract debt on behalf of the state.

5 Proceedings of the Alaska Constitutional Convention at 3405 (January 28, 1956). Of course, when the legislature wishes to act in an advisory capacity it may act by resolution. However, when it means to take action having a binding effect on those outside the legislature it may do so only by following the enactment procedures. Other state courts have so held with virtual unanimity.[16]

Thus in People ex rel. Burritt v. Commissioners of State Contracts, 120 Ill. 322, 11 N.E. 180 (1887) a joint resolution directed state officials to make a contract for the publication and distribution of certain municipal laws and provided an appropriation for that purpose. The Illinois Supreme Court held that the joint resolution was invalid because the enactment procedures prescribed by the Illinois Constitution had not been followed. Speaking of them, the court stated:

> That these various provisions, giving the form and mode by which, through the concurrent action of the legislative and executive departments, valid and binding laws are enacted, are, in the highest sense, mandatory, cannot be doubted.

11 N.E. at 185. The court went on to note that

In Mullan v. State, 114 Cal. 578, 46 P. 670 (1896) the California legislature had passed a resolution requiring compensation of a private individual. In rejecting the argument that the resolution had the effect of law, the court stated:

16. Watrous v. Golden Chamber of Commerce, 121 Colo. 521, 218 P.2d 498 (1950) is perhaps an exception. At issue there was a statute allowing certain tax proceeds to be pledged as security for bonds to pay for construction of state turnpikes under the condition "that any such pledge shall first be approved by joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives." Id. 218 P.2d at 502. The court upheld the statute, finding that such a resolution was not legislative in character, but "relat[ed] solely to the transaction of the business of the two houses." Id. 218 P.2d at 510. One proponent of the legislative veto has remarked that the reasoning of this case is "so unsatisfactory as to destroy its value as a precedent." have the force of law, and bind others than the members of the house or houses adopting it.

Moran v. La Guardia, 270 N.Y. 450, 1 N.E.2d 961 (1936) involved statutory provisions reducing public employees' salaries during an economic emergency "until the legislature shall find their further operation unnecessary." The legislature first attempted to repeal this law by passing a bill, but it was vetoed by the Governor. The same result was then sought by the passage of a joint resolution. In an alternative holding the court held that the legislature could not constitutionally terminate the operation of the statute by resolution: [17]

> A concurrent resolution of the Legislature is not effective to modify or repeal a statutory enactment . . . To repeal or modify a statute requires a legislative act of equal dignity and import. Nothing less than another statute will suffice. A concurrent resolution of the two Houses is not a statute . . . A concurrent resolution, unlike a statute, is binding only on the members and officers of the legislative body. It resembles a statute neither in its mode of passage nor in its consequences. The form of a bill is lacking, and readings are not required. It does not have to lie on the desks of members of the Legislature for three legislative days . . . But more important, its adoption is complete without the concurrent action of the Governor, or, lacking this, passage by a two-thirds vote of each House of the Legislature over his veto. Thus a joint resolution may be adopted by a mere majority of the Legislature without action by the Governor or notice to the public, whereas the enactment of a statute requires action by three distinct bodies and at least three days' notice to the public. As has been well said: "In the exercise of this vast power [of the Legislature] according to the fundamental idea and constitution of parliament the concurrence of the three distinct bodies of which it is composed, each acting by itself and independent of the others, is necessary. No two of them acting together, much less alone, can make a law." [Citations omitted].[18]

[7, 8] The express provision in the Alaska Constitution of two specific legislative veto mechanisms supports our view that no implied general power to veto agency regulations by informal legislative action exists. On the subject of the organization of the executive department the governor may propose changes in the law by executive order. Unless they are disapproved by the legislature within sixty days by "resolution concurred in by a majority of the members in joint session . . . .", such changes shall "become effective at a date thereafter

17. The other alternative holding was that the statute had not authorized termination by resolution.

Attorney General*, 85 Ohio St. 251, 97 N.E. 967, 973 (1912) ("[A] joint resolution is not an act of legislation and . . . it cannot be effective for any purpose for which an exercise of legislative power is necessary . . . ."); Scudder v. Smith, 331 Pa. 165, 200 A. 601, 604 (1938) ("The subject matter of this joint resolution is legislative in its nature. It is not a mere formal expression of legislative opinion [and is therefore invalid]"); State ex rel. Todd v. Yelle, 7 Wash.2d 443, 110 P.2d 162, 165 (1941) ("It is . . . clear that a house resolution is not a law. City of Medford*, 132 Or. 405, 285 P. 1111, 1114 (1930) ("The power of the Legislature to effectively legislate by resolution is confined within very narrow limits. It may provide for expenses incident to its sessions, such as employing clerks and stenographers and procuring supplies, and other matters incident to the carrying on of its own business, but it cannot go outside and legislate generally on matters involving property or other rights. to be designated by the governor." [19] On the subject of municipal boundary changes, the state local boundary commission may make recommendations. They become effective forty-five days after presentation to the legislature unless vetoed by a "resolution concurred in by a majority of the members of each house." [20]

There are several noteworthy aspects of these expressed powers. First, they are accompanied by specific time deadlines. Second, the deadlines are different, sixty days in one case and forty-five days in the other. One may question, if there is an implied legislative veto power in the constitution, whether it is accompanied by a time limit, and if so, what the limit is. Third, the expressed legislative vetoes annul proposed executive action, they do not change existing law. They therefore do not have the same potential for the disruption of public expectations and ongoing executive programs that the blanket veto in question has. Fourth, the legislative vote required for the exercise of each of the expressed vetoes is different. Re-organization orders may be blocked by a resolution of disapproval concurred in by a majority of the members of the legislature in joint session,[21] while boundary change vetoes require disapproval by a resolution concurred in by a majority of the members of each house.[22] Since the Senate has twenty members and the House has forty,[23] these differences can be quite important. The votes of thirty legislators are required to forestall a veto taken in joint session, while ten senators can prevent a veto if the vote is to be by a majority of the members of each house. Here, as with the differing time deadlines mentioned above, one may inquire as to which voting method the constitution would impose as part of an implied general legislative veto power. The answer, of course, is that the constitution contains no clue. In our view, the specificity with which the constitution deals with the legislative veto powers it does grant leads logically to the conclusion that no other veto power is implied.

III

We are aware of only three cases which have decided the question whether a legislative veto is constitutional.[24] They are Atkins v. United States, 556 F.2d 1028, 214 Ct.Cl. 186 (1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1009, 98 S.Ct. 718, 54 L.Ed.2d 751 (1978); Opinion of the Justices, 96 N.H. 517, 83 A.2d 738 (1950); and Reith v. South Carolina State Housing Authority, (Ct.C.P., 11th Jud.Dist., Aug. 28, 1975), rev'd on other grounds, 267 S.C. 1, 225 S.E.2d 847, 848 (1976).[25]

19. Art. III, § 23.

20. Art. X § 12. We do not agree with the dissent's characterization of the power granted in these two provisions as rule-making power, which we see as the power to interpret and implement statutes. Rather, the power contained in these provisions is the power to change statutes; therefore, the expression of these extraordinary powers in the constitution cannot be regarded as carrying an implication that general administrative rule making was meant to be forbidden.

21. Art. III, § 23.

22. Art. X, § 12.

23. Art. II, § 1.

24. The dissent suggests that our comment in Boehl v. Sabre Jet Room, Inc., 349 P.2d 585 (Alaska 1960), supports an affirmative answer to this question. We stated that "[the legislature] has the power by resolution to annul any agency or department rule or regulation." However, the constitutionality of annulment was not argued in that case, and our statement obviously was not a judgment on this issue.

25. The Amici would add Sibbach v. Wilson, 312 U.S. 1, 61 S.Ct. 422, 85 L.Ed. 479 (1940) to this list; however, the type of veto discussed there apparently entailed formal law enactment and, therefore, the case has no relevance to the question before us. See Atkins v. United States, 556 F.2d at 1060 and n. 21. In Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 140 n. 176, 96 S.Ct. 612, 692 n. 176, 46 L.Ed.2d 659, 757 n. 176 (1976), the United States Supreme Court found it unnecessary to pass on the validity of a legislative veto, but Justice White in a concurring opinion indicated he thought it was constitutional. 424 U.S. at 284–85, 96 S.Ct. at 757–58, 46 L.Ed.2d at 838–39. Subsequently, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia avoided the same issue, Clark v. Valeo, 182 U.S.App.D.C. 21, 559 F.2d 642 (D.C.Cir.) (en banc) aff'd mem. sub nom. Clark v. Kimmitt, 431 U.S. 950, 97 S.Ct. 2667, 53 L.Ed.2d 267 (1977), but Circuit Judge MacKinnon reached the merits in a vigorous

The New Hampshire case, Opinion of the Justices, 96 N.H. 517, 83 A.2d 738 (1950), involved the question whether a reorganization statute violated the state constitution. The statute provided that the reorganization plan proposed by the governor would become law if the two legislative houses did not disapprove it by concurrent resolution. The court concluded that the statute violated the enactment provisions of the New Hampshire Constitution:

> The procedure which [the reorganization statute] provides is in distinct contrast to that contemplated by the Constitution. Consent is to be manifested by silence or adjournment, and disapproval by "concurrent resolution" . . . [T]he contemplated procedure violates the constitutional provisions requiring separate action by each house of the Legislature . . . [T]he act would dispense with the "passage" of any measure, as that word is commonly used, and with the requirement of presentation to the Governor. In a sense the act provides for a reversal of the democratic processes required by the Constitution, for under it the Governor would propose the legislative action, rather than approve or disapprove of action taken. 83 A.2d at 741.

In Reith v. South Carolina State Housing Authority, (Ct.C.P., 11th Jud.Dist., Aug. 28, 1975), rev'd on other grounds, 267 S.C. 1, 225 S.E.2d 847, 848 (1976), the South Carolina Court of Common Pleas considered, inter alia, the validity of a statutory provision stating that regulations promulgated by the Housing Authority shall be "null and void unless approved by a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly at its session following such promulgation." The court held that this provision violated the constitutional enactment requirements because "the General Assembly may not perform a legislative function by means of a concurrent resolution." [26] The court also concluded that the provision impermissibly infringed on the executive's power to administer and enforce the laws.[27] On appeal, neither ruling was challenged, but the state supreme court reversed on the grounds that the legislative veto provision was not severable and, therefore, the whole act was unconstitutional.[28] The appellate court accepted the lower court's ruling on the veto provision as the law of the case and did not pass on the issue.[29]

Atkins v. United States, 556 F.2d 1028, 214 Ct.Cl. 186 (1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1009, 98 S.Ct. 718, 54 L.Ed.2d 751 (1978) involved a statute empowering the President to make recommendations for judicial salary increases and transmit them to Congress; the recommendations would become effective after thirty days unless disapproved by either House. It was claimed that this mechanism was unconstitutional because it contravened article I, section 1 of the United States Constitution, which vests the legislative power of the United States in a bi-cameral Congress, article I, section 7, which grants veto power to the President, and the principle of separation of powers. The Court of Claims, en banc, in a four-to-three decision, upheld the statute.

Atkins is not strong authority in this case, for the following reasons. First, the majority took pains to confine its opinion to the narrow issue before it, emphasizing that Congress' special role in the establishment of judicial salaries shaped its reasoning and conclusion. Id. at 1058–60, 1063, 1065, 1068. Moreover, the United States Constitution does not contain detailed directions for legislative action similar to those set forth in the Alaska Constitution, discussed supra, pp. 772, 773. Thus the Court of Claims was able to say, speaking of article I, section 1 of the United States Constitution: [30]

30. U.S.Const. art. I, § 1 provides:

"[T]he clause does not itself, as a textural matter, mechanically direct the manner in which Congress must exercise the legislative power." Id. at 1062. Such a statement could not be made with reference to Article II of the Alaska Constitution. Further, the court stressed that no change in the law was accomplished by the one-House veto, because the President's recommendations never had the effect of law. Id. at 1063. The court implied that for one House to have the authority to make such a change would be unconstitutional: "Nor could one House do anything more than preserve existing law . . ." Id. at 1064. In contrast, the annulment provisions of AS 44.-62.320(a) permit the legislature to void administrative regulations which are in effect. Such regulations are laws in every meaningful sense,[31] and annulling any one of them effects a change in the law.

IV

We turn now to a discussion of the major arguments of Appellee and the Amici.

The first is that since AS 44.62.320(a) was passed by the first state legislature, several members of which had served in the Alaska Constitutional Convention, and was approved by Governor Egan, who had been chairman of the Convention, a stronger than usual presumption of constitutionality should be applied.[32] We need not pause to debate that point. Whatever the strength of the presumption might be, it will be overcome if the statute cannot be squared with a reasonable reading of the constitution. That, in our opinion, is the situation here.

[9] The Amici argue that since the legislature may delegate law-making power to an administrative agency, it follows that it may reserve to itself a part of the delegable power, and that a deligation can be made subject to a condition that the legislature may later change the terms of the delegation by informal action. The answer to this argument, in our opinion, is that while the legislature can delegate the power to make laws conditionally, the condition must be lawful and may not contain a grant of power to any branch of government to function in a manner prohibited by the constitution. The legislature is bound to act in accordance with the constraints provided in article II of the constitution. The fact that it can delegate legislative power to others who are not bound by article II does not mean that it can delegate the same power to itself and, in the process, escape from the constraints under which it must operate.[33]

[10] To illustrate this point we may assume that the legislature has the power to establish an independent agency which would have the power to disapprove of agency regulations. Since the agency would be a part of the executive department the article II constraints on legislative action would not govern its functions. Could the legislature instead convey to its own members the power to act as such an agency free from these constraints? The answer, we think, is clearly no for that would amount to dual officeholding, prohibited by article II, section 5,[34] and would

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

> An administrative agency may be vested with the power to promulgate legislative interpretive rules which have the force and effect of law. Such powers must be limited by a standard, and, when exercised, the ensuing regulations, if within the standards, have the same efficacy as an original statute enacted by the legislature. [Footnote omitted].

32. The same argument was unsuccessfully made in Bradner v. Hammond, 553 P.2d 1, 4 nn. 4 & 5 (Alaska 1976).

infringe on the executive appointment power set out in article III, section 26.[35] While the power to void agency regulations could be exercised by either the legislature, or by an agency, when the legislature exercises such power it must do so while acting as a legislature. It may not grant itself the power to act as an agency.

It might be supposed that if the legislature could condition the validity of a regulation upon the subsequent disapproval by both of its houses by concurrent resolution, it could condition the same upon disapproval by a committee,[36] or a single legislator. Using the theory, propounded by the Amici, that a veto is merely a condition there is no principled distinction between these cases. It is therefore worth observing that most authorities have rejected the validity of laws conferring either affirmative or negatory legislative powers on individual legislators or legislative committees.

In State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Finance Committee, 168 Mont. 470, 543 P.2d 1317 (1975), at issue was a statute empowering an interim legislative committee to approve budget amendments. The statute was held invalid. The court pointed out that the power to approve budget amendments could be exercised by the entire legislature in making an appropriation, or by an executive agency acting on a proper delegation from the legislature, but the legislature could not delegate the power to so act to one of its subdivisions. Id. 543 P.2d at 1321.[37] The same reasoning was employed in People v. Tremaine, 252 N.Y. 27, 168 N.E. 817 (1929), where the Court of Appeals struck down a statute granting certain legislative committee chairmen the power to disapprove of the allocation of lump sum appropriations to an executive agency. The court acknowledged that the legislature might itself legislate the allocation, or it could delegate the responsibility to an executive agency. It could not, however, delegate the responsibility to one, or more than one, of its members: "The Legislature might make the segregation itself, but it may not confer administrative powers upon its members without giving them, unconstitutionally, civil appointments to administrative offices. It might by general law confer the power of segregation or approval of segregation upon any one but its own members . . . but the Constitution . . . makes its own members ineligible to such an appointment." Id. 168 N.E. at 822. See also, Stockman v. Leddy, 55 Colo. 24, 129 P. 220, 223 (1912); Bramlette v. Stringer, 186 S.C. 134, 195 S.E. 257, 264 (1938). Contra, Opinion of the Justices, 110 N.H. 359, 266 A.2d 823 (1970).

The Appellee also argues that legislative oversight of administrative regulations is desirable and that such oversight cannot take place effectively if it must follow the path of legislation prescribed by article II. There are two answers to this argument. First, and most important, the question of 35. Art. III, § 26 provides:

Boards and Commissions. When a board or commission is at the head of a principal department or a regulatory or quasi-judicial agency, its members shall be appointed by the governor, subject to confirmation by a majority of the members of the legislature in joint session, and may be removed as provided by law. They shall be citizens of the United States. The board or commission may appoint a principal executive officer when authorized by law, but the appointment shall be subject to the approval of the governor.

See, e. g., Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 118–43, 96 S.Ct. 612, 681–693, 46 L.Ed.2d 659, 744–58 holding that Federal Elections Commission members were necessarily "Officers of the United States" because, among other reasons, of their administrative rule-making power, and therefore could not be appointed by Congress; People v. Tremaine, 252 N.Y. 27, 168 N.E. 817 (1929) discussed infra, p. 778.

36. In fact, under AS 24.20.445(a), the Administrative Regulation Review Committee, a permanent joint committee of the legislature, is granted the power to suspend the operation of any regulation adopted after adjournment of the legislature until thirty days after the legislature reconvenes.

37. The people of Alaska recently rejected a constitutional amendment which, like the law struck down in Montana, was designed to vest the power to approve budget revisions in an interim legislative committee. See Alaska Const. art. II, § 11 (proposed amend. 1978 Supp.).

whether the legislature might perform a task more efficiently if it did not have to follow article II is essentially irrelevant. Since article II applies, the question of whether efficiency takes primacy over other goals must be taken to have been answered by our constitutional framers. Second, at least according to a recent case study, the legislative veto has been unimpressive in practice. See Bruff & Gellhorn, Congressional Control of Administrative Regulation: A Study of Legislative Vetoes, 90 Harv.L.Rev. 1369 (1977). That study concludes, essentially, that the legislative veto encourages secretive, poorly informed, and politically unaccountable legislative action. Id. at 1409–20. It is consequences such as these that the enactment provisions of our constitution are designed to guard against. See discussion, supra, pp. 772, 773.

Appellee also makes an argument based on the doctrine of separation of powers. Rule-making is essentially a legislative rather than executive function and so, the argument goes, broad latitude must be afforded the legislature to act as it sees fit in this, the core area of its duties. This argument is essentially inconsistent with the requirements prescribed in article II of the constitution which must be observed in the process of legislation. The legislature is not free to ignore these requirements. See, discussion supra, pp. 772, 773.

Appellee finds it significant that the Alaska Constitution contains no provision like that in section 7, clause 3 of article I of the United States Constitution [38] which authorizes the executive to veto legislative resolutions, and argues that executive involvement in the enactment of resolutions was not deemed necessary by the framers of the state constitution. This point, however, does not advance Appellee's case. Under the United States Constitution joint resolutions are one means by which laws are enacted; [39] they are therefore naturally included among those legislative acts subject to Presidential veto. However, under the state constitution resolutions are not an alternative law enactment process, and therefore there is no need to make them subject to an executive veto.

The Amici contend that since AS 44.62.320(a) was itself passed in accordance with all constitutional mandates and since the governor had the opportunity to veto the statute, constitutional requirements have been satisfied with respect to subsequent acts of the legislature taken pursuant to the statute. In other words, by virtue of one enactment approved by the governor, the legislature can free itself, in certain instances, of the constitutional constraints that would otherwise govern its actions. Such an enactment would impermissibly preserve legislative power possessed at one instant in time for future periods when the legislature might otherwise be incapable of acting because of the executive veto.[40] It would also do away with the formal safeguards of article II which are meant to accompany law-making. The requirements of the constitution may not be eliminated in this fashion.

38. This clause provides:

> Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill. rent resolution is constitutional. In my opinion, the majority reasoning is fallacious in equating regulations with laws passed by the legislature. The litany of constitutional requirements outlined in the majority opinion is indeed mandated for the passage of a bill into law. The constitution, however, makes none of those requirements applicable to regulations. In fact, the constitution is silent as to the practice of delegating authority by the legislature to the executive or administrative agencies for promulgation of regulations.[1] Regulations may be promulgated without having each regulation confined to one subject, a descriptive title, a specific form of enactment clause, three readings on three separate days, the vote of each member adopting the regulation recorded, a majority vote of each house of the legislature, a public record of the vote cast, being subject to veto by the governor, a 90-day waiting period before becoming effective.[2] Nevertheless, the majority does not question the authority of the legislature to delegate the power to promulgate regulations without these safeguards. It seems to me that if the legislature, in authorizing regulations, cannot condition that authority with a reasonable provision for oversight because the annulment of a regulation is equated with repeal of a statute, then the regulation itself must be considered invalid as not having been passed with the requirements necessary for enacting a bill into law.

This issue was considered by this court shortly after statehood in Boehl v. Sabre Jet Room, Inc., 349 P.2d 585, 588 (Alaska 1960), where we stated:

> The legislative power of the state "is vested in a legislature." It is argued that because of this constitutional provision the power may not be delegated.
> But such a strict theory of separation of powers ignores realities and the practical necessities of government. The United States Supreme Court has said that delegation by Congress has long been recognized as necessary in order that the exertion of legislative power does not become a futility, and that necessity fixes a point beyond which it is unreasonable and impracticable to compel the legislature to prescribe detailed rules. [Footnotes omitted.]

One of the bases specified in Boehl for upholding this power of the legislature to delegate regulatory authority was the identical right to annul regulations which the majority now finds to be unconstitutional. In Boehl we stated:

> It also is not essential, in order to sustain the grant of authority, that the legislature circumscribe administrative discretion by express standards of action in order that the opportunity for capricious exercise of power will not exist. There is slight danger of that. The exercise of the board's powers is hedged about by substantial safeguards. Before the board may act it must conduct a public hearing and afford any interested person the opportunity to be heard, and it must then "consider all relevant matter presented to it." There is ample opportunity for judicial review; for "any interested person may obtain a judicial declaration as to the validity of any regulation * * *". Finally, there is legislative supervision. The legislature, which meets annually, may revise the statute and thus restrict the bounds of administrative action; it has the power by resolution to annul any agency or department rule or regulation; and the Legislative Council, an interim legislative committee charged with the duty of making recommendations to the legislature, must annually review all agency regulations to determine if the legislative intent is being correctly followed.

349 P.2d at 590 (emphasis added) (footnotes omitted).

1. The constitution does authorize "[r]egulatory, quasi-judicial and temporary agencies" to be established by law. Art. III, § 22. There are no constitutional requirements for promulgation of regulations.

2. AS 44.62.180 does specify that, with certain exceptions, regulations become effective on the 30th day after filing by the lieutenant governor.

In my opinion, the majority misstates the question presented as being whether the legislature can exercise its legislative power without the usual constitutional safeguards. The real question is whether, having exercised its legislative power, subject to all those safeguards, it may condition the delegation of regulatory power to an executive agency upon a provision for legislative oversight. I agree with our statement in Boehl that the legislature has that power.

II

The advent of the industrial revolution vastly increased and complicated the tasks of legislatures. Due to limits of time and specialized expertise, legislatures have found it impossible to prescribe laws adequately covering the tremendously varied and intricate forms of social relationships arising out of the proliferation of business, manufacturing, trade, transportation, communication and commercial enterprises.[3] Of necessity, legislative authority had to be delegated to administrative agencies. Nevertheless, both in England and in the United States, efforts were initiated to maintain some controls over broad delegations of authority.[4]

England has long utilized the laying system, whereby an administrative order or regulation must be laid before Parliament for a specified period of time before becoming effective.

> Parliamentary control over administrative rules and regulations . . . is asserted principally through provisions in enabling statutes that rules made under them shall be laid before Parliament. This is customarily combined with a provision in the statute, either that the rule shall not be operative until it is approved by resolution, either of both Houses or of the House of Commons alone . . ., or that, if within forty days a resolution is passed by either House for annulling the rule, the rule is to be void . . . .[5]

In the United States, the issue of whether a legislature can reserve to itself the power to disapprove administrative regulations has been brewing for more than forty years.[6] The early stages of the dispute involved the Reorganization Acts of the 1930's and 1940's which provided that executive reorganization plans became effective sixty days after transmission to Congress, unless within that period Congress disapproved by resolution.[7] Federal acts incorporating similar provisions have proliferated in recent years.[8] Yet no federal court has squarely evaluated the validity of provisions reserving to Congress the power to disapprove administrative regulations.[9]

I agree with the majority that there is scant case authority on the specific issue in

In Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 96 S.Ct. 612, 46 L.Ed.2d 659 (1976), the majority of the United States Supreme Court did not reach the issue of whether regulations promulgated by the Federal Election Commission would become effective within thirty days of filing if either House of Congress did not disapprove them. In his concurrence, Justice White did approve the oversight provision, stating:

> I am also of the view that the otherwise valid regulatory power of a properly created independent agency is not rendered constitutionally infirm, as violative of the President's veto power, by a statutory provision subjecting agency regulations to disapproval by either House of Congress. For a bill to become law it must pass both Houses and be signed by the President or be passed over his veto. Also, "Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary" is likewise subject to the veto power. Under § 438(c) the FEC's regulations are subject to disapproval; but for a regulation to become effective, neither House need approve it, pass it, or take any action at all with respect to it. The regulation becomes effective by nonaction. This no more invades the President's powers than does a regulation not required to be laid before Congress. Congressional influence over the substantive content of agency regulation may be enhanced, but I would not view the power of either House to disapprove as equivalent to legislation or to an order, resolution or vote requiring the concurrence of both Houses.

Dist., Aug. 28, 1975), rev'd on other grounds, 267 S.C. 1, 225 S.E.2d 847, 848 (1976), but appropriately concedes that the Supreme Court of South Carolina did not reach the issue with which we are concerned.

Also cited is the New Hampshire case, Opinion of the Justices, 96 N.H. 517, 83 A.2d 738 (1950), an advisory opinion on whether a reorganization statute violated the state constitution. The statute provided that the reorganization plan proposed by the governor would become law if the two legislative houses did not disapprove it by concurrent resolution. The court concluded that the statute violated the state constitution. Id. 83 A.2d at 741. Three of the five justices felt the procedure violated the principle of bicameralism because each house "has undertaken in advance to surrender to the other its constitutional authority to veto or refuse assent to action taken or approved by the other." Id. 83 A.2d at 741–42.

It is also significant that twenty years later the New Hampshire Supreme Court examined a statute requiring certain salary increases to be approved by a legislative committee prior to submission to the governor for final approval. Opinion of the Justices, 110 N.H. 359, 266 A.2d 823 (1970). The court, without analysis of its earlier opinion, found no violation of separation of powers, reasoning that since the legislature could delegate its power to fix salaries, it could impose conditions upon the exercise of such delegated authority. Id. 266 A.2d at 826. In conclusion, it seems to me that what case authority exists is more supportive than not of the concept of legislative annulment.

The legislature's participation in the promulgation of regulations is within the core area of legislative power, formulation of policy. Accordingly, the legislature's power to select the means of participation should be generously construed.[10]

The delegation of rule-making authority to executive agencies does not alter the basic legislative nature of the function. Conditioning that delegation on the right of the legislature to review and annul regulations does not infringe on the power of the executive, where, as here, the annulling action is taken at the first session of the legislature following promulgation of the regulation.[11]

I believe that a statute can validly condition the delegated power to enact regulations by requiring that the regulations be subject to annulment by resolution, just as it could limit the effective date of the new regulations or the length of time during which they would be in force. I find no material difference between AS 44.62.320 and other statutes, upheld by the United States Supreme Court, that condition the exercise of rule-making authority by approval of private citizens.[12] If private citizens can exercise such power, then certainly the legislature should be able to exercise the same power.

As the majority correctly notes, there are two provisions in our constitution which deal specifically with the legislative veto. These are article III, section 23, concerning executive reorganization, which provides that the legislature may veto a reorganization plan by a resolution "in joint session," [13] and article X, section 12, concerning local boundaries, which provides that the legislature may veto by resolution local boundary changes proposed by an executive branch commission.[14]

The majority concludes that these two express provisions creating a legislative veto by resolution exclude the possibility of an implied legislative veto. They state:

> In our view, the specificity with which the constitution deals with the legislative

10. We have held that when the legislature exercises power with reference to an essentially executive function those powers should be construed narrowly. Bradner v. Hammond, 553 P.2d 1, 7 (Alaska 1976). Conversely, when, as here, a basically legislative function is involved, the powers of the legislature should be construed broadly.

11. A long-term scrutiny of executive action taken pursuant to regulations leading to delayed annulment might involve legislative infringement on the executive power to enforce laws. We are not confronted with such a question and need not pass on it because the regulation here in question was annulled at the first legislative session following its promulgation. We are similarly not confronted with an annulment by a single legislator, a committee of the legislature, or by one house.

12. United States v. Rock Royal Co-Operative, Inc., 307 U.S. 533, 574–78, 59 S.Ct. 993, 1013–15, 83 L.Ed. 1446, 1470–72 (1939) (upholding federal statute delegating to Secretary of Agriculture authority to issue marketing orders for specified commodities, if approval of producers was secured); Currin v. Wallace, 306 U.S. 1, 15–18, 59 S.Ct. 379, 387–388, 83 L.Ed. 441, 451–52 (1939) (upholding statute authorizing Secretary of Agriculture to regulate marketing of tobacco if two-thirds of growers in a market requested, by referendum, such action).

13. The full text of article III, section 23, provides:

> The governor may make changes in the organization of the executive branch or in the assignment of functions among its units which he considers necessary for efficient administration. Where these changes require the force of law, they shall be set forth in executive orders. The legislature shall have sixty days of a regular session, or a full session if of shorter duration, to disapprove these executive orders. Unless disapproved by resolution concurred in by a majority of the members in joint session, these orders become effective at a date thereafter to be designated by the governor.

14. Article X, section 12, provides:

> A local boundary commission or board shall be established by law in the executive branch of the state government. The commission or board may consider any proposed local government boundary change. It may present proposed changes to the legislature during the first ten days of any regular session. The change shall become effective forty-five days after presentation or at the end of the session, whichever is earlier, unless disapproved by a resolution concurred in by a majority of the members of each house. The commission or board, subject to law, may establish procedures whereby boundaries may be adjusted by local action.

veto powers it does grant leads logically to the conclusion that no other veto power is implied.

Adopting the majority's logic, however, it might be said with equal force that the delegation of any rule-making powers to the executive by the legislature would also be unconstitutional. It might be argued that where the constitutional drafters intended to create rule-making power in the executive branch they created it expressly, with specificity, as they did in these two provisions, and that other rule-making powers created by statute cannot be implied.

In my view, the expression of some powers in these provisions does not lead to the conclusion that the constitution forbids either an expansion of rule-making powers in the executive or a denial of the legislative veto. The Alaska Constitution is silent on the question of administrative regulations. It does not say what powers may be delegated, how rules may be promulgated, or whether the legislature may retain a veto power by resolution. Presumably, these were questions that the constitutional drafters thought could best be resolved by the legislature.

There is an aspect of these two provisions, however, that is worthy of some notice. It seems significant that in the only two instances where the constitution does make a specific grant of rule-making power directly to the executive, it does so with a power reserved in the legislature to veto the rule by resolution. There seems to be little logic to a position that maintains that the constitutional drafters would have sanctioned the use of the resolution here, yet demanded the higher enactment standard when the legislature delegated power on its own.

Finally, the majority argues that where a veto power by resolution exists, it must also specify time limits, the method of voting and so forth. This argument is unconvincing. Having allocated a specific rule-making power to the executive branch, it was appropriate for the constitutional drafters to define in the constitution a specific legislative check to that power. This would seem to be a virtual necessity, because any statute that the legislature might pass to circumscribe these executive powers otherwise would in all likelihood be unconstitutional. But where the legislature delegates rule-making power by statute, the constitutional drafters might well presume that the legislature could also design an appropriate system of checks and balances by statute law, as they have done here in AS 44.62.320(a).

VI

It is also of significance that the Administrative Procedure Act, chapter 143, SLA 1959, containing an annulment provision, was passed shortly after the drafting of the constitution at the first session of the Alaska State Legislature. Many of the delegates to the Constitutional Convention were among the members of the legislature.[15] In fact, two of the more active delegates, Hellenthal and Taylor, introduced House Bill 13 which was enacted as chapter 143, SLA 1959.[16] The bill was passed by a House vote of 37 to 1,[17] and by a unanimous Senate vote.[18]

At that time, the governor of Alaska was William A. Egan, who had presided as President over the Constitutional Convention. In signing House Bill 13 into law, Governor Egan delivered the following message to the legislature:

> I am signing into law HOUSE BILL NO. 13, the administrative procedures bill. I wish to call attention to the Attorney General's statement that Section 1, Article VI of Chapter 1 thereof may be unconstitutional in its seeking to impose new duties on local governing bodies.

15. Thirteen delegates and Convention Secretary (now Judge) Thomas B. Stewart were legislators in the first session of the Alaska State Legislature.

16. 1959 House Journal 52.

17. 1959 House Journal 427.

18. 1959 Senate Journal 708.

> Because of the bill's separability clause, however, I do not consider this flaw of such seriousness that the bill should not be signed and utilized.[19]

Although the governor saw fit to point out a possible constitutional problem with article VI because it required local governing bodies to hold public hearings, no question was raised about the legislature's power to annul regulations by joint resolution.[20]

What was said by the United States Supreme Court about legislation passed by Congress shortly after the enactment of the United States Constitution is apropos here:

> What, then, are the elements that enter into our decision of this case? We have first a construction of the Constitution made by a Congress which was to provide by legislation for the organization of the government in accord with the Constitution which had just then been adopted, and in which there were, as Representatives and Senators, a considerable number of those who had been members of the convention that framed the Constitution and presented it for ratification. It was the Congress that launched the government. It was the Congress that rounded out the Constitution itself by the proposing of the first ten amendments, which had in effect been promised to the people as a consideration for the ratification. It was the Congress in which Mr. Madison, one of the first in the framing of the Constitution, led also in the organization of the government under it. It was a Congress whose constitutional decisions have always been regarded as they should be regarded as of the greatest weight in the interpretation of that fundamental instrument. . . . This court has repeatedly laid down the principle that a contemporaneous legislative exposition of the Constitution, when the founders of our government and framers of our Constitution were actively participating in public affairs acquiesced in for a long term of years, fixes the construction to be given its provisions.

Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 174–75, 47 S.Ct. 21, 45, 71 L.Ed. 160, 189–90 (1926) (citation omitted).

Finally, I note that the policy of authorizing legislative annulment of regulations is becoming increasingly widespread in Alaska, in other states, and in the federal government.[21] Such a practice, affording a

Some regulations annulled by resolution are the following: regulations relating to nursing home administrators, annulled by Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 94 in 1976; motor vehicle inspection regulations, annulled by Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 62 (HCS CSSCR), in 1976; the prize limit regulation, annulled by Legislative Resolve No. 79 (House Concurrent Resolution No. 60) in 1977; school loan regulations, annulled by Legislative Resolve No. 87 (Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 32) in 1977; and certain regulations adopted by the Department of Community and Regional Affairs, annulled by Legislative Resolve No. 95 (Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 12) in 1977.

For a review of laws from other states relating to annulment of regulations, see Jackson, Legislative Review of Administrative Rules and Regulations 1 (July 1977) (papers prepared for Southern Legislative Conference). A chart at the end of Professor Jackson's paper indicates that the following states allow regulations to be annulled by means of resolution: Alaska, Connecticut, Idaho, Michigan, Montana, Oklahoma, Tennessee, and Vermont. A New York report gives slightly different figures, stating that fourteen of the twenty-two states with legislative review mechanisms have procedures which can "cause an agency rule to be promulgated, approved, amended, modified, or annulled." Task Force on Critical Problems, Senate Research Service, New York State Legislature, Administrative Rules . . . What is the Legislature's Role?, 7 (June 1976). Appellant states that eight states allow nonstatutory legislative annulment—six by concurrent resolution, two by one-House vetoes.

The states which do not allow annulment of the regulation generally provide that a legislative committee may review regulations to determine if they are consistent with legislative intent, hold hearings on questionable regulations, notify the agencies of its doubts, and practical means of supervision of the broad delegation of legislative powers required by the complexities of modern society, should not be hastily voided.

I conclude that the legislature's annulment of the cash prize regulation, pursuant to AS 44.62.320(a), does not violate the principle of separation of powers, does not provide a means by which the legislature can enact laws without passage of a bill, and does not unconstitutionally encroach on the power of the executive.

Francis S. L. WILLIAMSON, Commissioner, Department of Health and Social Services, and State of Alaska, Appellee.

No. 4155.

Supreme Court of Alaska.

Feb. 21, 1980.

Nonprofit corporation owning or operating residential child care facilities brought suit challenging ruling of Department of Administration that Department of Health and Social Services was not required to reimburse corporation for amounts by which actual cost increases in providing child care had exceeded predicted increases. The State of Alaska Superior Court, Third Judicial District, J. Justin Ripley, J., affirmed the ruling below, and corporation appealed. The Supreme Court, Connor, J., held that: (1) under statute providing that Department of Health and Social Services pay private, nonprofit corporation for child care services for children who have become wards of the state for expenses related directly to "full cost" of services and that "full cost" shall be determined by per person, per day cost in preceding fiscal year plus a proportionate share of anticipated living and staff salary increment increases for upcoming fiscal year, corporation was not entitled to reimbursement for amounts by which actual cost increases exceeded predicted increases, and (2) statute did not deprive corporation of due process or deny it equal protection.

Supreme Court of Virginia.
v.
Joseph H. HOLLEMAN, Jr., et al.

Record No. 761016.
Nov. 24, 1976.

In an original proceeding on petition for mandamus, petitioners challenged validity of governor's veto of General Assembly's appropriation of a biennial total of $10,000,000 to Northern Virginia Transportation Commission for 'State aid for capital costs of Metro Rail' which was part of mass transit system under development. The Supreme Court, Carrico, J., held that unvetoed $3,500,000 per year provision to 'be continued' for 'aid to mass transit' for northern Virginia was not a 'condition of' the vetoed appropriation; and that such veto of $5,000,000 per year appropriation was an indivisible sun of money dedicated to a stated purpose, and, thus, such appropriation was an 'item' rather than a part of an item within meaning of state constitutional provision empowering governor to veto any particular item or items of an appropriation bill.

Writ denied.

At its 1976 session, the General Assembly appropriated to the Northern Virginia Transportation Commission, in addition to other specified amounts, a biennial total of $10,000,000 for 'State aid for capital costs of Metro Rail.' [FN1] On April 12, 1976, the Governor vetoed the Metro Rail appropriation. This original petition for a writ of mandamus challenges the validity of the veto and presents the question whether the Metro Rail appropriation is an 'item' within the meaning of Article V, Section 6[FN2] of the Virginia Constitution as subject to the Governor's power of veto.

FN1. As will be explained Infra, Metro Rail is part of a mass transit system now under development in the Washington, D.C., area, including several northern Virginia localities.

FN2. Article V, Section 6 reads, in pertinent part, as follows:

'The Governor shall have the power to veto any particular item or items of an appropriation bill, but the veto shall not affect the item or items to which he does not object.'

The petitioners for mandamus are Adelard L. Brault, member of the State Senate from Fairfax County, James M. Thomson, member of the House of Delegates from the City of Alexandria, and the County Board of Arlington County. The respondents are Joseph H. Holleman, Jr., Clerk of the House of Delegates and Keeper of the Rolls of the State, John E. Harwood, Commissioner of the Virginia Department of Highways and Transportation, Charles B. Walker, Comptroller of Virginia, and Robert C. Watts, Jr., Treasurer of Virginia. The respondents are the state officials responsible for ministerially implementing release of the Metro Rail funds if the Governor's veto is held invalid.

The designee of the disputed appropriation, the Northern Virginia Transportation Commission, is the governing body of the Northern Virginia Transportation District,[FN3] composed of the counties of Arlington and Fairfax and the cities of Alexandria, Fairfax, and Falls Church. The Commission coordinates the interests of these localities in the activities of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority, which was created by a *443 compact [FN4] between Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia to develop a mass transit system for a 'zone' which includes the northern Virginia communities, the Maryland counties of Montgomery and Prince Georges, and the District of Columbia. The Authority is currently developing the Metro system, consisting of both rail and bus service, with the goal of coordinating all methods of mass transportation in the zone.

FN3. Creation of the District was authorized by the Transportation District Act of 1964, Acts 1964, ch. 631, Code ss 15.1-1342 to - 1372.

FN4. See Acts 1966, ch. 2, Amending Acts 1958, ch. 627.

Under development by the Authority, and partially in use, is a combination subway and surface rapid rail system, known as Metro Rail, to serve the Zone. The Authority has also acquired the private bus companies formerly serving the zone and now operates the facilities as Metro Bus. Gradually, bus lines are being modified to serve areas remote from the rail system and to route passengers to Metro trains. In addition, the Authority is constructing parking lots at rail stations to accommodate passengers who drive their automobiles to the terminals before boarding trains.

The capital cost of development of the Metro system is funded by federal appropriations, proceeds of the sale of revenue bonds, and contributions from the local political subdivisions included within the zone. Pursuant to an agreement executed in 1970, the Virginia subdivisions are obligated to contribute a total of $149,900,000 toward the capital cost of Metro Rail, but escalating costs may require 'substantially greater contributions than originally were anticipated.'

Although not a party to the 1970 agreement, the Commonwealth has contributed to the development of the Metro system, and the participating northern Virginia localities have received credit for part of the state aid on their obligations to contribute to the capital costs of Metro Rail. The most recent state effort appears in Acts 241 1976, ch. 779, s 126, Item 826, where a biennial total of $18,000,000 was appropriated for 'State aid to regional transportation commissions or local governments from special revenues, in aid of the administration and capital costs of bus transportation, except as otherwise stated.' Item 826a contains various amounts appropriated to the Northern Virginia Transportation Commission, including the $10,000,000 biennial total for 'State aid for capital costs of Metro Rail,' which was *444 vetoed by the Governor. The entire appropriation to the Commission and the Governor's veto read as follows:

'. . .

'a. Northern Virginia Transportation Commission

State aid for administration _ _ $125,000 the first year, $125,000 the second year.

'This appropriation is conditioned upon provision from local sources of three dollars for each State dollar out of the appropriation.

'State aid for capital costs A05R$A $1,300,000 the first year, $1,300,000 the second year.

(State aid for capital costs of Metro Rail A10R$A $5,000,000 the first year, $5,000,000 the second year.

'Funds for Metro Rail shall be paid by the Northern Virginia Transportation Commission to the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority and be a credit to the Counties of Arlington and Fairfax and the Cities of Alexandria, Fall(s) Church and Fairfax in the same proportion as they are obligated to pay their share of the capital costs of Metro Rail.)

'It is provided that, in addition to the appropriation designated in this item for Metro Rail capital costs, payments of $3,500,000 each year heretofore made for aid to mass transit for Northern Virginia Transportation Commission from other items in this act shall be continued.'

The appropriation included in Item 826a for 'administration' is self-explanatory. The parties agree that the appropriation of $1,300,000 per year for 'State aid for capital costs' will serve as 'Metro bus capital;' that the $3,500,000 per year required to 'be *445 continued' for 'aid to mass transit' is intended for 'Metro rail capital for parking facilities;' and that the vetoed appropriation of $5,000,000 per year for 'State aid for capital costs of Metro Rail' would have applied to the costs of 'hard rail,' meaning 'the capital costs of constructing the rail system.' And, according to its terms, the $5,000,000 per year appropriation was designed to afford credit to the northern Virginia localities on their obligations for the capital costs of Metro Rail.

As has been indicated, note 2 Supra, Article V. Section 6 of the Virginia Constitution empowers the Governor 'to veto any particular item or items of an appropriation bill.' The petitioners contend, however, that the disputed Metro Rail appropriation is not an 'item' subject to the power of veto under Article V. Section 6. The compact to which Virginia is a party, the petitioners argue, contemplates a 'unified regional transit system,' consisting of bus service, rail service, and related parking facilities. The General Assembly 'thought it well,' the petitioners say, to include in Item 826a funds for each element of the system, thereby 'tying up' the purpose to be promoted by the appropriation for Metro Rail with the purposes to be promoted by the appropriations for Metro Bus and for parking facilities.

Therefore, the petitioners maintain, the various appropriations for the unified transit system constitute a 'single 'item' as that term is used in Article V. Section 6 of the Virginia Constitution.' Accordingly, the petitioners assert, the Governor 'could not veto the $5,000,000 annual appropriation for Metro rail capital costs without also vetoing the $3,500,000 per year appropriation for Metro rail capital (parking lots), the $1,300,000 per year appropriation for Metro bus capital and the $125,000 per year appropriation for . . . administrative costs.'

Furthermore, the petitoners state, the Governor's power of veto does not permit him to reduce the amount of an appropriation or to disapprove an item subject to a condition without also vetoing the condition. Clearly, the petitioners aver, the 242 $5,000,000 per year allotment for Metro Rail capital and the $3,500,000 per year allocation for parking lots are the 'same 'item,'' and the veto of the $5,000,000 per year component had the effect of reducing the amount of this item; also the provision relating to the $3,500,000 appropriation is a condition of the $5,000,000 appropriation, yet the condition was not vetoed.

*446 Thus, the petitioners deduce, because the Governor cannot veto part of an item, reduce the amount of an appropriation, or veto a conditional item without also disapproving the condition, the action of the Governor in this case is invalid. From this, the petitioners conclude, it follows that they are entitled to a writ of mandamus directing disbursement of the disputed appropriation.

In Commonwealth v. Dodson, 176 Va. 281, 11 S.E.2d 120 (1940), we construed the veto provision contained in the Constitution of 1902 (Section 76), which provision is duplicated in the present Constitution (note 2 Supra). Dodson concerned seven vetoes involving the 1940 appropriation bill. This court overturned six of the vetoes and upheld the seventh.

Veto No. 2 in Dodson is of interest here. That veto concerned a provision creating and funding the office of Legislative Director in the Division of the Budget. According to the terms of the appropriation bill, the Legislative Director was to cooperate with the Executive Director of the Budget and the State Comptroller in the preparation of the budget and the supervision of expenditures from appropriations made by the General Assembly.

We noted that the 'creation of a n[illegible]ffice, its holder to serve at a stated salary, w[illegible]t more, would be an 'item' which the Governor at his election might veto, but if it be tied up with other budget provisions, then under the terms of the Constitution it can not be eliminated.' 176 Va. at 303, 11 S.E.2d at 130. Because the appropriation for the Legislative Director was so closely 'tied up' with appropriations for the Executive Director and the State Comptroller, we held that the provision for the new office did not constitute an 'item' subject to the veto power of the Governor.

The parties to the present controversy agree that Veto No. 2 in Dodson bears some similarity to the veto involved in this case. Beyond this, however, they depart in their views on the effect of the Dodson decision upon this matter. The petitioners believe that, like the appropriation for the Legislative Director in Dodson, the $5,000,000 per year appropriation for Metro Rail is so 'tied up' with the other appropriations in Item 826a that together they constitute a single item, veto-proof except as a whole. On the other hand, the respondents are of opinion that, unlike the appropriation in Dodson, the $5,000,000 per year *447 appropriation for Metro Rail is a separate, independent item, subject by itself to the power of veto.

[1] Dodson enunciated the principles applicable to resolution of a veto dispute. In the constitutional sense, an item of an appropriation bill is an indivisible sum of money dedicated to a stated purpose; the term refers to something which may be eliminated from the bill without affecting the enactment's other purposes or provisions.

[2] While the Governor is empowered to veto any particular item or items of an appropriation bill, he must, for his veto to be valid, strike down the whole of an item; he cannot disapprove part of an item and approve the remainder. And this rule prevents the Governor from reducing the amount of an appropriation which by itself constitutes an item.

[3] Where a condition is attached to an appropriation, the condition must be observed. The Governor cannot veto the appropriation without also disapproving the condition; correspondingly, he cannot veto condition; correspondingly, he cannot veto appropriation.

With these principles in mind, we return to the petitioners' contentions of invalidity concerning the veto in this case, Viz., that the veto affected only part of an item, that the veto had the effect of reducing an appropriation, and that the veto struck down 243 a conditional appropriation without also disapproving the condition. We will consider these contentions in inverse order.

[4] First, we reject the notion, advanced by the petitioners, that the unvetoed $3,500,000 per year provision to 'be continued' for 'aid to mass transit' for northern Virginia is a condition of the disapproved appropriation of $5,000,000 per year for 'State aid for capital costs of Metro Rail.' The full $3,500,000 provision reads as follows:

'It is provided that, in addition to the appropriation designated in this item for Metro Rail capital costs, payments of $3,500,000 each year heretofore made for aid to mass transit for Northern Virginia Transportation Commission from other items in this act shall be continued.'

As we understand the petitioners' contention, they claim that the reference in the quoted provision to 'other items' is to the other appropriations contained in Item 826a; that continuance of the $3,500,000 per year allocation is a condition, *448 therefore, of the vetoed $5,000,000 per year appropriation; and that because the condition was not disapproved, the veto is ineffective. But even a casual reading of the quoted provision will disclose that the reference to 'other items' is not to other amounts of expenditure but to the sources in the appropriation bill from which the $3,500,000 allocation shall be paid. The only condition attached to the vetoed $ 00,000 per year appropriation is that it be pai the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority as a credit for the participating northern Virginia localities on their obligations to contribute to the capital costs of Metro Rail. And this condition also was vetoed.

Second, the petitioners' next contention, that the veto had the effect of reducing an appropriation, assumes an important premise: the correctness of their primary contention that all the 1976 appropriations for the Metro system, or at least the combination of the $5,000,000 and $3,500,000 provisions, constitute a single item, subject to veto only as a whole. If the $5,000,000 per year appropriation is an item itself subject to veto, its elimination would not have the allegedly improper effect of reducing an appropriation. Whether the disputed appropriation is such an item is the serious question in the case and the subject of our third and final inquiry.

To determine whether several appropriations relating to the same subject constitute a single item, the petitioners assert that we must 'compare the purpose of an appropriation amount that was vetoed with the purpose of an appropriation amount which was not vetoed,' and if 'the two things are 'tied up' with each other, the veto must fail.' Therefore, the petitioners say, the real issue in this case is whether there is 'a relationship between bus and rail mass transit in the (northern Virginia) area and between parking facilities at Metro rail stations and Metro rail lines.' These relationships are so 'considerable,' the petitioners state, that elimination of the appropriation for Metro Rail capital would affect seriously the appropriations for bus capital and parking facilities.

We would not question that, in a sense, the purposes to be served by the various appropriations for the Metro system are 'tied up' one with the other. After all, the appropriations relate to the same general subject, and they are grouped within the same numbered item. Indeed, it would be difficult to conceive a situation where it could not be said that several appropriations 449 relating to the same subject were not, at least incidentally, 'tied up' together.

Neither would we doubt that, from a practical standpoint, the various segments of the Metro system bear close relationships. Certain of the exhibits filed in this case factually demonstrate the integrated relationship of rail and bus service and parking facilities in the development of the system.

[5][6] These considerations, however, are not necessarily conclusive. The 'tying up' of purposes must be more than incidental; the relationship between purposes must appear intrinsically, rather than extrinsically. The real question, therefore, is whether, *244 from the terms of the appropriation bill itself, several appropriations relating to the same subject are so legally 'tied up,' are made so legally interdependent, that one cannot be eliminated from the enactment without, in the words of Dodson, 'affecting its other purposes or provisions.' If it is clear from the appropriation bill that, with the disapproved provision eliminated, the approved appropriations cannot effectively serve their intended purposes, the attempted elimination is invalid.

[7] The petitioners concede that we should not be concerned 'whether either bus or rail mass transportation in the (northern Virginia) area will grind to a halt without the $5,000,000 per year appropriation which the Governor attempted to veto.' We welcome this candid concession; it typifies the sort of extrinsic practical consideration we believe must be excluded in determining whether several appropriations relating to the same subject are legally interdependent. But, at the same time, we would point out that the petitioners' argument concerning the invalidity of the Governor's veto reduces itself to the same sort of proposition: that the single purpose of the General Assembly in adopting Item 826a was to provide a unitary appropriation for an integrated system of mass transportation in northern Virginia, complete with bus service, rail service, and parking facilities. This singularity of purpose, however, does not appear from the terms of the appropriation bill.

The purpose of the $125,000 per year appropriation for 'State aid for administration' is obvious. Nothing in Item 826a, however, suggests that this appropriation is dependent upon the vetoed $5,000,000 per year appropriation or upon any other appropriation contained in the item. Neither could it be suggested that the appropriation for administrative costs cannot *450 effectively serve its intended purpose after elimination of the $5,000,000 per year provision.

The $1,300,000 per year appropriation, although labeled 'State aid for capital costs,' otherwise is silent as to its purpose. The parties to this controversy represent that this appropriation is intended for 'Metro bus capital.' The provision concerning continuance of the $3,500,000 per year allocation 'for aid to mass transit' likewise is uninformative of its intended purpose. The parties represent that this amount is for 'Metro rail capital for parking facilities.'

With respect to these two matters, we find ourselves in this position: either we are unable to ascribe meaningful purposes to the $1,300,000 and $3,500,000 amounts or we must accept the representations of the parties, in which latter event separate purposes are revealed. Both courses, however, foreclose the conclusion that either of the two provisions is dependent upon the vetoed $5,000,000 per year appropriation or any other appropriation in Item 826a, or that the two provisions cannot serve their intended purposes, expressed or unexpressed, after elimination of the $5,000,000 appropriation.[FN5]

> FN5. In oral argument, but not on brief, the petitioners asserted that the words 'in addition to' in the $3,500,000 per year provision, quoted previously, establish the relationship necessary to 'tie up' this provision with the $5,000,000 per year appropriation. While the words do show some relationship, they are insufficient to establish the legal interdependence necessary to constitute the two provisions a single 'item.'

In sharp contrast, the purpose of the $5,000,000 per year appropriation clearly is revealed by the terms of the appropriation bill. The disputed appropriation is labeled 'State aid for capital costs of Metro Rail,' and its primary and real purpose, as expressed by its terms, is to serve as credit for the participating northern Virginia localities against their contractual undertaking to contribute to 'the capital costs of Metro Rail.' This is a purpose separate and distinct from the purposes of any of the other provisions of Item 826a.

The $5,000,000 per year appropriation is an indivisible sum of money dedicated to a stated purpose. It falls, therefore, within the Dodson definition of an 'item' in the constitutional sense. And, because its stated purpose is so separate and distinct from anything else in Item 826a, it may be eliminated245 from the appropriation bill without affecting the enactment's other purposes or provisions. The disputed appropriation, therefore, *451 satisfies the Dodson test of separability. Accordingly, we hold that the Metro Rail appropriation is an 'item' within the meaning of Article V, Section 6 of our Constitution, and thus subject to the Governor's power of veto.

For the reasons assigned, the writ of mandamus requested by the petitioners will be denied.

Writ denied.

ALASKA LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL, Appellant/Cross-Appellee,

v.

Governor Tony KNOWLES, in his official capacity as Governor for the State of Alaska, and Mark Boyer, in his official capacity as Commissioner of Administration for the State of Alaska, Appellees/Cross-Appellants.

April 20, 2001.

Legislative Council sued Governor and Commissioner of Administration, seeking declaration that Governor's five item vetoes of appropriations bills were invalid. Governor filed counterclaim asserting that vetoed language was unconstitutional. The Superior Court, First Judicial District, Juneau, Thomas M. Jahnke, J., ruled that vetoes were invalid. Parties appealed. The Supreme Court, Eastaugh, J., held that: (1) three appropriations for Alaska Seafood Marketing Institute (ASMI) were not subject to valid exercise of item veto power; (2) those appropriations violated confinement clause; (3) community residential centers appropriation was not subject to item veto; and (4) therapeutic treatment program appropriation was not subject to item veto.

Vacated in part and reversed in part.

EASTAUGH, Justice.

I. INTRODUCTION

Governor Tony Knowles, invoking the governor's constitutionally granted power to veto "items" in appropriation bills, struck descriptive language from five appropriations the Alaska legislature enacted in 1997. Were the vetoes constitutionally invalid, as the superior court declared, either because the vetoed passages were not "items" or because the governor did not adequately explain his vetoes? FN1 And if the vetoes were invalid, were the struck passages nonetheless invalid, as the superior court held, because they violated the constitution's requirement that appropriation bills be confined to appropriations? FN2 Applying our independent judgment to these constitutional issues, we conclude that three of the five passages violated the confinement clause and that the four vetoes which have been challenged on the grounds that the struck passages were not "items" are invalid on that basis.

FN1. See Alaska Const. art. II, § 15 ("The governor may veto bills passed by the legislature. He may, by veto, strike or reduce items in appropriation bills. He shall return any vetoed bill, with a statement of his objections, to the house of origin.").

FN2. See Alaska Const. art. II, § 13 ("Bills for appropriations shall be confined to appropriations.").

II. FACTS AND PROCEEDINGS

Among the appropriation bills the Alaska legislature enacted in 1997 were chapters 98 and 100.[FN3] In July 1997 Governor Tony Knowles signed these two appropriation bills into law, but only after invoking the governor's item veto power and striking out specific parts of them.[FN4] Five of these vetoes, relating to three subjects, are challenged here. Appendix A contains the relevant appropriations and shows the vetoed words in strikeout form.

FN3. See chs. 98, 100, SLA 1997.

FN4. See Alaska Const. art. II, § 15.

In October 1997 the Alaska Legislative Council sued Governor Knowles and Commissioner of Administration Mark Boyer (collectively "the governor") seeking a declaration that the vetoes were invalid. Counterclaiming, the governor asserted that the vetoed language violated the Alaska Constitution's confinement clause.[FN5] Both parties moved for summary judgment.

FN5. See Alaska Const. art. II, § 13. The parties later agreed to treat the governor's counterclaims as defenses, to avoid the question of legislative immunity.

In a well-reasoned opinion, the superior court held that: (1) four of the vetoes were invalid exercises of the item veto power because the vetoed language was not an "item" (the court not reaching the "item" issue as to the fifth appropriation); (2) one veto was invalid because the governor did not sufficiently explain his objections; (3) despite the invalidity of the five vetoes, all five vetoed passages were nonetheless invalid because 370 they violated the constitution's "confinement clause" requirement that appropriation bills be confined to appropriations; and (4) the invalid passages were severable from the remainder of their bills.[FN6]

FN6. As to other vetoes not at issue in these appeals, the superior court held that the council's challenges were moot, because the appropriated money had already been spent.

Both sides appeal.[FN7]

FN7. We commend all counsel for the quality of their briefs and oral arguments.

III. DISCUSSION

A. Standard of Review

[1] These appeals raise constitutional issues of law which we decide by applying our independent judgment.[FN8] In doing so we will adopt " 'a reasonable and practical interpretation in accordance with common sense' based upon 'the plain meaning and purpose of the provision and the intent of the framers.' "[FN9] Moreover, because these are questions of law, we will consider precedent, reason, and policy.[FN10]

FN8. See Cook v. Botelho, 921 P.2d 1126, 1128 (Alaska 1996).

FN9. Id. at 1128-29 (quoting Arco Alaska, Inc. v. State, 824 P.2d 708, 710 (Alaska 1992)).

FN10. See Langdon v. Champion, 752 P.2d 999, 1001 (Alaska 1988).

B. Mootness

[2] The governor argues that the issues relating to the validity of his vetoes are moot because the fiscal year at issue is now over. But we agree with the council that we should consider these issues under the public interest exception to the mootness doctrine.[FN11] Appropriations are enacted every year and are often spent before any dispute can reach this court.[FN12] Further, the public interest is directly affected by disputes about the constitutional provisions implicated here.[FN13] We therefore reach the merits of these appeals.

FN11. See Kodiak Seafood Processors Ass'n v. State, 900 P.2d 1191, 1196 (Alaska 1995). The public interest exception requires us to consider: (1) the possibility of recurrence or repetition of the issue; (2) the danger that mootness would repeatedly circumvent review of the issue; and (3) the importance of the issue to the public interest. See id. at 1196.

FN12. See Thomas v. Rosen, 569 P.2d 793, 795 (Alaska 1977) ("[A] challenge to an item veto may not come within sufficient time to fully litigate the matter....").

FN13. Cf. Fordice v. Bryan, 651 So.2d 998, 1001 (Miss.1995) ("[P]ublic policy and the magnitude of the importance of these issues require[ ] this Court to review the Governor's actions with respect to the ... appropriations bills as such actions may continue to be repeated and forever escape review....").

There is a second mootness issue. In Part III.C.3, we hold that the vetoed language in the three Alaska Seafood Marketing Institute (ASMI) appropriations violated the confinement clause. This holding technically moots any question about the validity of those vetoes. And our conclusions in Parts III.C.1 and III.E.1-that four of the struck passages were not "items"-also moot the dispute about the adequacy of the governor's statements of objections for those passages. But again, the public interest exception to the mootness doctrine prompts us to consider these issues.

C. The Alaska Seafood Marketing Institute Appropriations

The legislature enacted three appropriations for ASMI.[FN14] Each contained identical language which made the appropriation "[c]ontingent on [ASMI] having no employees who are located outside Alaska whose positions are classified at more than Range 21 on the state salary schedule under AS 39.27.011...." [FN15] The governor struck this language from the three ASMI appropriations.

FN14. See ch. 98, § 6, SLA 1997; ch. 100, §§ 47, 70, SLA 1997. Section 70 of chapter 100 amends section 6 of chapter 98.

FN15. Ch. 98, § 6, SLA 1997; ch. 100, §§ 47, 70, SLA 1997. The state salary schedule specifies twenty-six ranges, labeled five to thirty. See AS 39.27.011(a). In 1997 a Range 21 Step A employee was to be paid $4,155 monthly, subject to cost-of-living adjustments. See AS 39.27.011(a), (e), (f) (1996).

Although it held that the governor adequately explained his objections, the superior 371 court held that the attempt to veto "the contingency language" in the ASMI appropriations was "illegal and of no effect," reasoning that "the item veto power encompasses only the power to reduce or strike sums of money." It nonetheless struck the disputed language because its inclusion violated the confinement clause.

The council argues that these vetoes are invalid, because the vetoed language was not an "item" within the meaning of the Alaska Constitution, and also because the governor failed to adequately state his objections to the vetoed language, contrary to the constitution. The governor responds that the vetoes were valid and that, in any event, the vetoed language is invalid because its inclusion in appropriation bills violated the confinement clause.

1. Is the vetoed language an "item"?

Article II, section 15 of the Alaska Constitution gives the governor power to exercise two different types of vetoes. Its first sentence confers the general power to veto a bill.[FN16] Its second sentence confers the power, "by veto, [to] strike or reduce items in appropriation bills."[FN17] At issue here is this power to "strike or reduce items" by exercising the item veto while approving other parts of the same bill.

FN16. Alaska Const. art. II, § 15 ("The governor may veto bills passed by the legislature. He may, by veto, strike or reduce items in appropriation bills. He shall return any vetoed bill, with a statement of his objections, to the house of origin.").

FN17. Id.

The question is whether the item veto power permits the governor to strike from an appropriation bill descriptive language that does not specify the amount appropriated. The superior court held that it does not. It held that "the item veto power encompasses only the power to reduce or strike sums of money."[FN18] We agree.

FN18. The Uniform Rules of the Alaska State Legislature state that "[a]n item in an appropriation bill includes a line item, an allocation, and an appropriation." Uniform Rules Alaska State Legislature R. 42(c) (1998). But this definition does not address what constitutes an "item" in the context of the item veto power.

Our analysis focuses on the meaning of "item." We have never addressed what "item" means in context of the item veto power. Our constitution does not define the term.

[3] Based on the language of our constitution, the historical purposes of the item veto, and the pertinent public policy considerations, we now define "item" as "a sum of money dedicated to a particular purpose." FN19

FN19. Cf. Bengzon v. Secretary of Justice, 299 U.S. 410, 414-15, 57 S.Ct. 252, 81 L.Ed. 312 (1937) ("An item of an appropriation bill obviously means an item which in itself is a specific appropriation of money, not some general provision of law which happens to be put into an appropriation bill."); Inter Faculty Org. v. Carlson, 478 N.W.2d 192, 195 (Minn.1991) (defining "item of appropriation" within context of specific statute as "a separate and identifiable sum of money appropriated from the general fund dedicated to a specific purpose"); Commonwealth v. Dodson, 176 Va. 281, 11 S.E.2d 120, 127 (1940) (defining an "item in an appropriation bill" as "an indivisible sum of money dedicated to a stated purpose").

Our analysis begins with the Alaska Constitution. It gives the legislature the power to legislate FN20 and appropriate.FN21 It gives the governor the power to influence the state's budget by requiring him or her to submit a proposed budget and general appropriation bill to the legislature FN22 and by striking or reducing items appropriated by the legislature.FN23 The governor's item veto power is thus one of limitation. The governor can delete and take away, but the constitution does not give the governor power to add to or divert for other purposes the appropriations enacted by the legislature.

FN20. See Alaska Const. art. II, § 1.

FN21. See Alaska Const. art. II, § 13. Cf. State v. Fairbanks N. Star Borough, 736 P.2d 1140, 1142-43 (Alaska 1987) (implicitly recognizing that appropriation power resides in legislature and cannot be delegated to executive).

FN22. See Alaska Const. art. IX, § 12.

FN23. See Alaska Const. art. II, § 15.

This approach is consistent with our earlier discussion of the governor's budgetary power. In Thomas v. Rosen we noted that 372 Alaska's constitutional convention delegates intended to "create a strong executive branch with 'a strong control on the purse strings' of the state." FN24 But this control gives the governor no appropriation power. The item veto permits the governor only to tighten or close the state's purse strings, not to loosen them or to divert funds for a use the legislature did not approve. The governor's power to control the purse strings is fully realized by recognizing the governor's constitutionally defined-and limited-role in the appropriations process.

FN24. Thomas v. Rosen, 569 P.2d 793, 795 (Alaska 1977) (quoting 3 Proceedings of the Alaska Constitutional Convention (PACC) 1740 (Jan. 11, 1956)).

The council argues that the governor's item veto power is negative.FN25 We agree. True, striking out language might be characterized as an act of positive creation to some extent; in the broadest sense a new bill results. But such characterizations are semantic. Our constitution does not give the governor the power to rewrite appropriation bills except by striking or reducing items, and if the constitutional delegates had intended to give the governor the power to add or divert, they easily could have done so.[FN26]

FN25. See, e.g., Caldwell v. Meskill, 164 Conn. 299, 320 A.2d 788, 791-92 (1973).

FN26. During discussion of the item veto, one delegate cautioned that while the governor should be allowed to veto an item in an appropriation bill, he should not be "entitled to the right to amend." 3 PACC 1758 (Jan. 11, 1956). The minutes do not imply that any delegate intended the item veto to give the governor power to affirmatively amend appropriations.

The council also argues that the item veto power is an executive exercise of legislative power, and therefore should be strictly construed. Professor Briffault reasons that such arguments fail to recognize the difference between the item veto and the traditional veto.[FN27] However the item veto power is characterized, we conclude that it was intended only to limit the legislature's appropriation power, not to grant the executive a quasi-legislative appropriation power permitting appropriations the legislature never enacted.[FN28]

FN28. Consider, for example, the effect of striking from an appropriation's descriptive language a negative, a limiting date for expending the money, or one of several purposes.

The definition we adopt here also seems most consistent with the words of our constitution. First, the power expressly applies to "items in appropriation bills." [FN29] The word "item" conveys a notion of unity between two essential elements of an appropriation: the amount and the purpose.[FN30] Altering the purpose of the appropriation by striking descriptive words interferes with that unity because the result is no longer the item the legislature enacted. In comparison, striking the amount is the equivalent of a complete veto of a particular appropriation. And reducing the amount is a result the constitution expressly permits.[FN31]

FN29. Alaska Const. art. II, § 15.

FN30. Cf. AS 24.08.030 ("Bills for appropriation ... shall include the amount involved and the purpose....").

FN31. See Alaska Const. art. II, § 15.

Second, the governor may either "strike" or "reduce" an item. Reduction implies diminution. This suggests that an item reduction must have a quantitative effect, implying that reduction must affect the appropriation's amount. It seems unlikely that the constitutional drafters intended the word "item" to have two widely divergent meanings, one incorporating the essential element of amount and the other not, depending on whether a governor chooses to reduce or strike.[FN32] We therefore think that "item" was intended to include the element of amount.

FN32. See Cenarrusa v. Andrus, 99 Idaho 404, 582 P.2d 1082, 1090 (1978) ("Obviously the word item can not be given different meanings within the same sentence.").

[4] Third, the phrase "strike or reduce" also implies a greater/lesser relationship between these two forms of exercising the item veto power. Reducing an item appears to be a lesser form of striking an item. This implies that these two forms are qualitatively *373 similar and have equivalent effects, i.e., they diminish the amount appropriated. Reducing an item lessens its amount; striking it lessens its amount to nothing. This implies that an "item" must include a sum of money. Likewise, a passage that does not include a "sum of money dedicated to a particular purpose" is not an "item" which the governor can strike or reduce. Therefore, a veto that does not delete or reduce the amount of money appropriated is not a valid exercise of the power article II, section 15 grants.

The historical purposes of the item, or partial, veto also support our analysis. It originated as a reform measure to prevent legislators from "logrolling" when they enact appropriation bills which necessarily address many subjects and need not be confined to a single subject, and to give governors some ability to limit state expenditures.[FN33] These purposes seem most directed at the amount of an appropriation. Permitting a governor to strike descriptive language would not limit expenditures or help balance a budget. And, although striking language that is only descriptive might reduce logrolling, doing so would only alter purpose, not amount. For reasons discussed below, this could result in an appropriation at odds with what the legislature passed.

FN33. See Bengzon, 299 U.S. at 415, 57 S.Ct. 252; Cenarrusa, 582 P.2d at 1091; see also Briffault, supra note 27, at 1177-80; Roger H. Wells, The Item Veto and State Budget Reform, 18 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 782, 786 (1924). Professor Briffault describes "logrolling" as "the practice of adding together in a single bill provisions supported by various legislators in order to create a legislative majority." Briffault, supra note 27, at 1177.

Finally, public policy disfavors a reading of "item" that would permit the executive branch to substantively alter the legislature's appropriation bills, effectively resulting in appropriations passed without the protections our constitution contemplates.[FN34]

FN34. See article II, section 14 of the Alaska Constitution, providing in part:

> No bill may become law unless it has passed three readings in each house on separate days, except that any bill may be advanced from second to third reading on the same day by concurrence of three-fourths of the house considering it. No bill may become law without an affirmative vote of a majority of the membership of each house.

Other states with the item veto have announced a range of judicial definitions.[FN35] Professor Richard Briffault considers these definitions to reflect three general approaches, which he describes as (1) favoring the legislature, (2) balancing legislative and executive prerogatives, or (3) favoring the executive.[FN36] The governor urges us to adopt an approach favoring the executive; the council asks us to adopt an approach favoring the legislature. The superior court adopted an approach generally favoring the legislature. As Professor Briffault recognizes, however, item veto decisions "resist easy classification," and his three-approach categorization risks "enormous oversimplification."[FN37] This case does not require us to adopt any of these approaches.

FN35. See Briffault, supra note 27, at 1184-85.

FN36. See id. at 1184-98.

FN37. Id. at 1184.

Many courts have defined "item" in a way that makes the amount of an appropriation an essential part of the item.[FN38] They reason that the item veto power is a "negative" power, limiting the governor's authority to create new legislation through the creative use of item vetoes. As one court held:

FN38. See, e.g., Dodson, 11 S.E.2d at 127 (defining an "item in an appropriation bill" as "an indivisible sum of money dedicated to a stated purpose").

> The power of partial veto is the power to disapprove. This is a negative power, or a power to delete or destroy a part or item, and is not a positive power, or a power to alter, enlarge or increase the effect of the remaining parts or items.... Thus, a partial veto must be so exercised that it eliminates or destroys the whole of an item or part and does not distort the legislative intent, and in effect create legislation inconsistent with that enacted by the Legislature, by the careful striking of words, phrases, clauses or sentences.[FN39]

FN39. State ex rel. Sego v. Kirkpatrick, 86 N.M. 359, 524 P.2d 975, 981 (1974) (citations omitted); see also Rush v. Ray, 362 N.W.2d 479, 482 (Iowa 1985) ("[T]he governor's power is a negative one that does not allow him to legislate by striking qualifications in a manner which distorts legislative intent."); Welden v. Ray, 229 N.W.2d 706, 713 (Iowa 1975) (" 'It is obvious that the item veto power does not contemplate striking out conditions and restrictions alone as items, for that would be affirmative legislation, whereas the governor's veto power is a strictly negative power, not a creative power.' ") (quoting Note, Item Veto Amendment to the Iowa Constitution, 18 Drake L.Rev. 245, 249-50 (1969)).

374 A few states define "item" as something less than a coupling of a sum and a purpose. An example is found in State ex rel. Wisconsin Senate v. Thompson.[FN40] The Wisconsin Supreme Court there held that "the governor may, in the exercise of his partial veto authority over appropriation bills, veto individual words, letters and digits ... as long as what remains after veto is a complete, entire, and workable law."[FN41] No other state seems to have followed Wisconsin's lead, although the Washington Supreme Court held in Washington State Legislature v. Lowry that "[t]he Governor's line item veto should extend to nondollar provisos in appropriations bills."[FN42]

FN41. Id. at 388 (citations omitted).

FN42. 131 Wash.2d 309, 931 P.2d 885, 896 (1997).

A few courts prefer to focus on the circumstances of the particular appropriation provision at issue. As in Colorado General Assembly v. Lamm, [FN43] these courts determine that whether there is an "item" subject to the item veto power is "best accomplished on a case-by-case basis." [FN44]

FN43. 704 P.2d 1371 (Colo.1985).

FN44. Id. at 1381 (citations omitted).

Each general approach has benefits and drawbacks. An approach more favorable to the executive would certainly advance the item veto's historic purposes. But our definition of "item"-"a sum of money dedicated to a particular purpose"-does not prevent the governor from using the item veto for those purposes. We are therefore not persuaded by Professor Briffault's suggestion that this result may erode the item veto's anti-logrolling function.[FN45]

FN45. See Briffault, supra note 27, at 1185.

Courts upholding gubernatorial item vetoes have sometimes done so by invoking confinement clause policies in defining an "item." [FN46] Doing so seems problematic. First, it allows the governor to exercise the item veto not because the struck passage is an item of appropriation, but because it is not, [FN47] i.e., because the struck language violates the requirement that appropriation bills "be confined to appropriations." [FN48] Second, allowing the governor to veto language because the governor thinks it violates the confinement clause would confer on the chief executive an amendatory power Alaska's constitution does not grant. We are therefore unpersuaded by cases relying on this rationale. Lowry, on which the governor bases much of his argument, is among these cases.[FN49] An assertion that a bill violates the confinement clause should be resolved by debate squarely focusing on that issue, rather than by allowing the confinement clause to be used to enhance a gubernatorial power having different historical origins.

FN46. See Welsh v. Branstad, 470 N.W.2d 644, 649-50 (Iowa 1991) (inquiring as to whether provision was related to neighboring appropriation); Henry v. Edwards, 346 So.2d 153, 158 (La.1977) (inquiring as to whether provision was general legislation more appropriately dealt with elsewhere).

FN47. See Lowry, 931 P.2d at 896.

FN48. Alaska Const. art. II, § 13. See infra Part III.C.3.

FN49. See Lowry, 931 P.2d at 896.

[5] Applying the "item" definition here, we conclude that the language struck from the ASMI appropriations is not an "item." It does not appropriate a sum of money dedicated to a stated purpose. By striking this language, the governor was not vetoing by striking or reducing, but rather editing the ASMI appropriations. Upholding these vetoes would give the governor the power to spend appropriated monies without observing limitations enacted by the legislature. This would permit a de facto re-appropriation. Granting that power here would not advance the anti-logrolling and budget-balancing purposes*375 underlying the item veto, because these vetoes did not reduce the amount of the ASMI appropriations.

Our conclusion in Part III.C.3-that these passages cannot constitutionally be part of appropriation bills-does not alter our analysis of the "item" issue. Even if these passages did not violate the confinement clause, they would not be "items" subject to the item veto.

We therefore hold that the governor did not validly exercise the item veto power when he struck this language from the three ASMI appropriations.

2. Did the governor deliver a constitutionally adequate statement of objections to the vetoed ASMI language in chapter 100?

The governor must return "any vetoed bill, with a statement of his objections, to the house of origin." FN50 We have never decided what the governor must do to satisfy the "statement of objections" requirement.

FN50. Alaska Const. art. II, § 15.

The three ASMI appropriations became parts of chapters 98 FN51 and 100. FN52 The veto message concerning what became chapter 98 stated: "In taking final action on the FY98 operating budget, I followed a long-standing gubernatorial tradition of vetoing intent language because it is not appropriate in an appropriations bill." FN53 That message also stated:

FN51. Ch. 98, § 6, SLA 1997. Chapter 98 also contains the Community Residential Center provisions. See ch. 98, § 39, SLA 1997.

FN52. Ch. 100, §§ 47, 70, SLA 1997. Chapter 100 also contains the Valdez Treatment Center provisions. See ch. 100, § 74(a), SLA 1997.

FN53. 1997 House Journal 1993.

I also vetoed language which purported to make the appropriation for ASMI conditional on having no upper level employees located outside the state because it violates the constitutional limits placed on appropriation bills. To prevent any unnecessary impediment to marketing efforts Outside during the current salmon crisis, fish processors, fishers, and the ASMI board urged me to veto this as a prudent exception to the general rule of having state jobs located in Alaska.[FN54]

FN54. 1997 House Journal 1994.

The governor's veto message concerning what became the chapter 100 ASMI appropriations contained the same general "intent" objection first quoted above, but did not include a separate explanation of the sort set out in the quotation indented above.[FN55]

FN55. See 1997 Senate Journal 2114.

[6] The council argues that although the governor adequately stated his objections to the language he struck from the ASMI appropriation in chapter 98, his objection to the identical language in the two ASMI appropriations in chapter 100 was inadequate, invalidating those vetoes. The superior court held that the legislature had adequate notice of the reasons for the governor's chapter 100 ASMI vetoes because it received both the governor's chapter 100 objection and the more complete chapter 98 objections at "literally the same minute."

The council objects to this "adequate notice" theory. It argues that the governor should be required to give the legislature specific notice of the objections to each bill to avoid constant questions about the sufficiency of notice. The council also argues that a governor might provide unclear objections for purposes of delay and making untimely any attempt to override the veto.[FN56] The governor asserts that the legislature's argument elevates form over substance, because the vetoes in this case were submitted at "the same minute."

FN56. The legislature must meet "immediately" and reconsider passage of a vetoed bill or item if it receives a veto message during a regular session of the legislature. See Alaska Const. art. II, § 16. Bills vetoed after adjournment of the first regular session of the legislature shall be reconsidered no later than the fifth day of the next regular or special session of that legislature, and bills vetoed after adjournment of the second regular session shall be reconsidered no later than the fifth day of a special session of that legislature, if one is called. See id.

The requirement that the governor explain the reasons for a veto serves at least two 376 principal functions. It allows the legislature to determine what it must do to avoid incurring another veto.[FN57] And it forces the governor to reveal his or her reasoning, "so that both the Legislature and the people might know whether or not he was motivated by conscientious convictions in recording his disapproval."[FN58]

FN57. See Arnett v. Meredith, 275 Ky. 223, 121 S.W.2d 36, 40 (1938).

FN58. Id.

We need not decide whether receipt of the explanation for the chapter 98 veto gave "adequate notice" of the governor's objections to chapter 100, because we hold that the governor's "intent" objection for chapter 100 was itself sufficient.

We accept for discussion's sake the council's argument that the governor's chapter 100 "intent" objection would have been clearer if it had disclosed whether the governor would also consider language which validly conditioned an appropriation to be invalid intent language.

But in our view such a detailed disclosure is not necessary. And attempting to distinguish between an objection which asserts a facially valid ground for veto, and an identical objection which arguably mischaracterizes the struck appropriation language, would create complex and case-by-case interpretive disputes. Subjecting the substantive adequacy of each objection to judicial scrutiny would be unavoidably time-consuming. Judicial involvement would be unlikely to generate bright-line distinctions that would provide guidance useful in avoiding future disputes and litigation. And ultimately such disputes are inherently political because they implicate the appropriations and budgetary powers of the legislature and the executive, and the political relationship between those branches of government. The judiciary has no special competence to settle these types of inherently political disputes. We also think the purposes underlying the statement-of-objections requirement do not demand case-by-case judicial review. The legislature, through knowledge accumulated in dealing with the governor, is capable of interpreting the sufficiency of an objection, and is thus able to decide whether to enact an amended appropriation or to seek a veto override. It is no less able than the judiciary to compare the governor's words and the struck language to decide for itself whether the governor was motivated by "conscientious convictions." And the ultimate arbiter of that question is the electorate.

[7] The best way to resolve such disputes is to apply the "minimum of coherence" standard when reviewing gubernatorial objections. The Colorado Supreme Court adopted this approach in Romer v. Colorado General Assembly, FN59 and we adopt it here for Alaska. Under this approach, courts look to see whether the objection makes comprehensible reference to the provision being vetoed, and do not attempt to evaluate the reasoning underlying the objection.FN60 In the words of the Colorado Supreme Court, "[t]o disallow a veto for the complete absence of reasons is to establish an objective standard-one with which meddlesome courts cannot tamper." FN61

FN60. See id. at 1084-85.

FN61. Id. at 1085 (quoting Jones v. Rockefeller, 172 W.Va. 30, 303 S.E.2d 668, 683 (1983) (Neely, J., dissenting)).

The governor's chapter 100 "intent" objection meets the minimum-of-coherence standard. The language struck from chapter 100 can be fairly characterized as "intent" language, and the objection clearly refers to the vetoed passages. We therefore conclude that the objection is constitutionally adequate.

3. Does the vetoed language in the ASMI appropriations violate the constitution's confinement clause?

We next consider the governor's argument that the legislature violated the confinement clause by including the vetoed language in the three ASMI appropriations. Our constitution provides that "[b]ills for appropriations shall be confined to appropriations." FN62 *377 We have never delineated the boundaries of this requirement.

FN62. Alaska Const. art. II, § 13; see also AS 24.08.030 ("Bills for appropriation shall be confined to appropriations and shall include the amount involved and the purpose, method, manner, and other related conditions of payment.").

The confinement clause prevents the legislature from enacting substantive policy outside the public eye. The process for enacting substantive bills gives meaningful opportunity for public notice and comment. Article II, section 14 of the Alaska Constitution requires three readings of a substantive bill, on three separate days, " 'to ensure that the legislature knows what it is passing' and to ensure an opportunity for the expression of public opinion and due deliberation." FN63 This opportunity may be stifled if substantive provisions are attached to appropriation bills in the form of conditions. Unlike other legislation, appropriations are not subject to the single-subject requirement of article II, section 13-a requirement meant to avoid logrolling.FN64 Allowing substantive enactments in an appropriation bill may also be problematic because appropriation bills are frequently a product of a free conference committee and, as such, must be voted on in their entirety and cannot be amended on the floor.FN65 Consequently, as the superior court noted, the confinement clause prevents a legislator seeking to advance unpopular legislation from burying it in a popular appropriation measure. Strict enforcement of constitutional limits helps ensure that the public will be fully informed of proposed legislation.

FN64. See Suber v. Alaska State Bond Comm., 414 P.2d 546, 557 (Alaska 1966) (noting that this requirement is designed "to prevent the inclusion of incongruous and unrelated matters in the same bill in order to get support for it which the several subjects might not separately command, and to guard against inadvertence, stealth and fraud in legislation"). More specifically, the South Dakota Supreme Court has observed that South Dakota's equivalent clause is intended to allow members of the legislature to be free to vote on an appropriation bill " 'knowing that appropriations and nothing else were involved.' " South Dakota Educ. Ass'n v. Barnett, 582 N.W.2d 386, 391 (S.D.1998) (quoting Sellers v. Frohmiller, 42 Ariz. 239, 24 P.2d 666, 669 (1933)).

FN65. See Uniform Rules Alaska State Legislature 42(b)-(d) (1998).

[8] The superior court here applied a confinement clause test first articulated in 1983 by the superior court, Judge Walter L. Carpeneti presiding, in Alaska State Legislature v. Hammond.FN66 The superior court there addressed, among other issues, claims that eleven appropriations violated the confinement clause. The superior court wrote that to satisfy the confinement clause, FN66. No. 1JU-80-1163 CI (Alaska Super., May 25, 1983).

> the qualifying language must be the minimum necessary to explain the Legislature's intent regarding how the money appropriated is to be spent. It must not administer the program of expenditures. It must not enact law or amend existing law. It must not extend beyond the life of the appropriation. Finally, the language must be germane, that is appropriate, to an appropriations bill.[FN67]

FN67. Id. at 44-45.

We find the authority the superior court cited in Hammond persuasive, FN68 and we approve the five-part Hammond formulation as a non-exclusive test for deciding whether an appropriation violates the confinement clause. We further elaborate on this test before applying it.

FN68. See Henry v. Edwards, 346 So.2d 153, 158 (La.1977); State ex rel. Meyer v. State Bd. of Equalization & Assessment, 185 Neb. 490, 176 N.W.2d 920, 926 (1970); Biles v. Commonwealth Dep't of Pub. Welfare, 44 Pa.Cmw1th. 274, 403 A.2d 1341, 1343 (1979); Flanders v. Morris, 88 Wash.2d 183, 558 P.2d 769, 772 (1977).

The council suggests that the "minimum necessary" language is best understood simply as a requirement that "appropriation language explain how, when, or on what the money is to be spent. Therefore, this part of the test is better expressed as simply requiring the language to explain the legislature's purpose regarding the appropriation." We agree generally with the first of these propositions, but we believe that this factor is better stated in terms of what it permits rather than what it requires. This factor 378 limits the legislature's ability to include in an appropriation bill legislation cloaked as a "description."

[9] The council suggests that the Hammond formulation quoted above is deficient because an appropriation should be able to change existing law on the subject of appropriations. The council argues that the confinement clause is not violated when the legislature amends a prior appropriation in an appropriation act. We believe that this is an accurate statement of law. But the Hammond formulation would not seem to preclude this practice in any event, because the new appropriation bill would amend only a prior appropriation, not an "existing law."

The council proposes additional illumination of the prohibition on enacting or amending substantive law. The council characterizes case law from other states as generally dictating that an appropriation for a statutory program may not include provisions changing the requirements of that program, even temporarily for the purposes of that appropriation.[FN69] The council cites three Florida cases in support. Chiles v. Milligan considered appropriation language that would have taken money to be awarded under the statutory education funding formula and adjusted it according to the ratio of classroom salaries to total salaries.[FN70] The court struck this language as an enactment of new law.[FN71] In a subsequent but similarly named case, Chiles v. Milligan, the court struck down appropriation language that would have allowed education funds to be used for purposes other than those specified by statute.[FN72] But in Department of Education v. School Board of Collier County, the court upheld an appropriation provision that increased funds for all schools except those with a millage value per student of more than twenty percent of the statewide average; the court reasoned that the appropriated money was in addition to the standard education funding and therefore did not amend existing law.[FN73]

We agree with the council's assertion that the differences between such cases reflect the tension between a desire to prevent legislatures from using appropriation bills to make programmatic changes (even for a year) and the realization that legislatures do not have to fund or fully fund any program (except, possibly, constitutionally mandated programs), and in fact may choose to fund programs that are subject to conditions or contingencies.

With regard to the germaneness requirement, the council's brief usefully discusses cases from other jurisdictions concerning what their confinement clauses permit and prohibit. The council lists the following conditions and contingencies that state courts have upheld as sufficiently "related" or "germane" to the money appropriated: FN74 (1) limits on amounts that could be spent at an individual facility; FN75 (2) limits on the number of employees for which the money could be spent; FN76 (3) a prohibition against using the 379 money for new construction; FN77 (4) a requirement related to federal funds; FN78 (5) a provision making an appropriation for driver education contingent on the enactment of a tax on drivers' licenses; FN79 and (6) a requirement that funds for contracted work be spent only if a state laboratory could not perform the work.FN80

FN74. We paraphrase the council's description of these decisions, without necessarily endorsing either its description of the holding or the result in each cited case.

FN75. In support of this proposition the council cites Welden v. Ray, 229 N.W.2d 706 (Iowa 1975).

On the other hand, the council notes that courts have struck down these provisions because they were not sufficiently connected with the expenditures: (1) a requirement that the money not be spent for trade delegations unless there was nonpartisan executive council representation; [FN81] (2) a requirement that the inmate population at a specified facility be reduced; [FN82] (3) a provision conditioning a department of health appropriation on the department relinquishing federal money to a private family planning council; [FN83] (4) a requirement for giving notice of prisoners' escapes and transfers; [FN84] and (5) a prohibition against electioneering by district attorneys in a certain parish.[FN85]

The council characterizes the differences between these cases as follows:

> In general it appears that courts will uphold conditions that could (albeit with some effort) be written as purposes, e.g., which facilities, which employee positions, which buildings or types of buildings, the money could be spent on. This would be true even if the conditions were written in the negative, e.g., "money from this appropriation may not be used to fund employee contracts;" "money from this appropriation may not be used to fund new construction." See Welden v. Ray, 229 N.W.2d 706, 710 (Iowa 1975). It also appears that contingencies will be upheld if they relate to the receipt or nonreceipt of specific funds, e.g., federal funds, matching funds, the tax intended to fund the expenditure, or relate to the occurrence or nonoccurrence of something that would make the expenditure desirable.... However, contingencies that relate to things other than the need for or use of the money or the need for the activity, seem more vulnerable to being found insufficiently "connected" to the appropriation.

We agree with the council's characterizations of the limits on the legislature's appropriation power. We do so not to predict the outcome of future disputes or to minimize the importance of the Hammond factors when analyzing a confinement clause dispute, but because the legislative council, speaking for the legislature, has usefully given examples of appropriation provisions which it regards as unconstitutional.

[10][11] In approaching confinement clause disputes, we assume that an act of the legislature is constitutional.[FN86] The burden of showing unconstitutionality is on the party challenging the enactment; doubtful cases should be resolved in favor of constitutionality.[FN87]

FN86. See Baxley v. State, 958 P.2d 422, 428 (Alaska 1998).

[12] With this background, we now apply the five Hammond factors to the vetoed language in the ASMI provisions.

a. Intent

The vetoed language required ASMI to move upper level employees to locations in 380 Alaska in order for ASMI to carry forward monies from appropriations in prior years. These three ASMI appropriations did not themselves appropriate monies for upper level staffing. Rather, they addressed the "marketing [of] Alaska seafood products." FN88 The vetoed language therefore expressed the legislature's intent about how other ASMI appropriations were to be spent, not its intent about how these appropriations were to be used.FN89

FN88. See ch. 98, § 6, SLA 1997; ch. 100, § 70, SLA 1997.

FN89. See infra Part III.C.3.c.

b. Administering the program

The vetoed language did not specify how these three appropriations were to be used, and instead addressed staffing funded under separate appropriations. This language effectively administered ASMI's program because it limited the executive's exercise of discretion in staffing and locating executive-branch offices whose operations were funded by separate appropriations.

Because this language did not specify how these three appropriations were to be spent, we do not need to decide here whether, as the council argues, the appropriation power gives the legislature authority to decide where executive-branch personnel will be located. Likewise, we need not decide whether, as the governor asserts, the appointment of executive officers is an executive function,FN90 and whether the geographic location of particular levels of state officials is the type of "close supervision" of state government that is essentially executive in character.FN91

FN90. See Bradner v. Hammond, 553 P.2d 1, 6 (Alaska 1976).

FN91. Cf. Anderson v. Lamm, 195 Colo. 437, 579 P.2d 620, 623-24 (1978) (finding that "the making of specific staffing and resource allocation decisions" are "powers of close supervision that are essentially executive in character").

c. Germaneness

The council argues that the vetoed language is germane to marketing seafood. The governor argues that it is not, because employee location does not relate to ASMI's statutory duties. We conclude that the vetoed language is not sufficiently germane because these three appropriations do not fund staffing at any location affected by the struck language. These appropriations were for purchasing contractual services, expenditures unrelated to encouraging "local hire." The superior court correctly observed that separate appropriations funded state employee positions. The vetoed language therefore is not germane to these three appropriations. Given the absence of any direct relationship, it is insufficient that the language arguably has some general relationship-because it generally concerns ASMI and the performance of ASMI's duties-to the ASMI appropriations in chapters 98 and 100.

d. New substantive law

The superior court found the vetoed language objectionable because it addressed an issue of substantive law, local hire, that the legislature has repeatedly addressed with substantive legislation. We agree that this language has the effect of creating a "mini-local hire law." According to the legislature's drafting manual, "an appropriation bill may not contain substantive provisions." FN92 Permitting it to enact substantive policy in one appropriation bill by imposing conditions on another appropriation bill would reduce the public scrutiny and debate which accompany policy making, and could encourage logrolling and free-riders to achieve results not politically attainable in non-appropriation bills.

FN92. Manual of Legislative Drafting, 35 (1999). That manual states:

> These limitations have two basic effects on drafting. One effect is that when a requestor wants to establish a new agency or program, there usually must be two bills drafted. One bill sets up the agency or program, the other bill appropriates money for the agency or program. The effective date of the appropriation bill would be tied to the effective date of the related substantive bill.
> A second effect of the limitations of art. II, sec. 13, of the state constitution, is that a drafter must avoid including "riders" on appropriation bills. Money should be appropriated for a specific purpose or program, but further limitations on the program itself must be in a separate bill unless they can be drafted as a lawful condition on the appropriation.

381 The council argues that the legislature could have accomplished the same result with line-item appropriations and that the legislature followed the equivalent of that process. But we think that the process followed here was not equivalent. Line-item appropriations would have been subject to item vetoes, and would have required the legislature to give individualized consideration to each ASMI budget item. The legislature did not follow that course. The vetoed language here substantively affected the use of other appropriations, and cannot be considered merely a condition attached to the chapter 98 and 100 appropriations. In reaching beyond these appropriations, the struck language created new substantive law.

e. Life of the appropriations

These appropriations did not state whether the out-of-state staffing limitation expired with the fiscal year. And the vetoed language does not direct how these appropriations were to be spent. It was instead intended to limit other appropriations. It is therefore unclear whether the life of the staffing limitation actually extended beyond the duration of the ASMI appropriations in chapters 98 and 100.

f. ASMI conclusion

Regardless of whether the vetoed language was to extend beyond the life of these three ASMI appropriations, it violates the other four Hammond factors. We therefore conclude that including the vetoed language in the chapter 98 and 100 ASMI appropriations violated the confinement clause. The superior court correctly reached the same conclusion.

D. Community Residential Center Appropriation

The legislature appropriated funds to the Department of Corrections for "new community residential centers" (CRCs).[FN93] This appropriation included the following passage: "This appropriation is for new CRC beds, not owned or controlled by municipalities, to provide space in institutions for violent felons. All beds will meet department standards for Community Residential Centers. Contracts will be competitively bid." The governor vetoed all three sentences in this passage.

FN93. See ch. 98, § 39, SLA 1997. The legislature separately appropriated funds for existing CRCs. This appeal concerns only the veto of language from the appropriation for new CRCs.

1. Was the struck CRC language an "item"?

[13] Having decided that the veto of this passage was invalid because the governor's veto explanation was inadequate, the superior court did not decide whether the struck passage was an "item." The council only tangentially suggests that it was not an item. The governor does not appear to address the issue on appeal.

Our discussion of the item veto in Part III.C.1, in context of the ASMI appropriations, clearly indicates that the language struck from the CRC appropriation was not an "item."

2. Was the governor's statement of objections adequate?

The governor's veto message for chapter 98 stated: "In taking final action on the FY98 operating budget, I followed a long-standing gubernatorial tradition of vetoing intent language because it is not appropriate in an appropriations bill." [FN94] Does this objection adequately explain this veto?

FN94. 1997 House Journal 1993.

The superior court held that it did not. The court reasoned that the governor's general "intent" objection could not be said to cover the vetoed CRC language because the vetoed passage "clearly was not intent language," and no other explanation arguably applied.

For reasons discussed above in Part III.C.2, this is the type of interpretation that courts should avoid when considering the constitutional sufficiency of a statement of objections. The reviewing court should simply determine whether the objection makes comprehensible reference to the provision being vetoed, and should not attempt to evaluate*382 the reasoning underlying the objection.[FN95]

FN95. See supra Part III.C.2; Romer, 840 P.2d at 1084-85.

The governor's "intent" objection meets this minimum-of-coherence standard. The struck language can permissibly be characterized as merely expressing the legislature's intent. The governor's explanation for vetoing the CRC language is therefore constitutionally adequate.

3. Did the language struck from the CRC appropriation violate the confinement clause?

[14] Applying the Hammond factors and the presumption of constitutionality discussed in Part III.C.3, we next determine whether including the struck passage violated the confinement clause.

Some of the factors seem to be in relative balance. The qualifying language in the first sentence is the "minimum necessary to explain the Legislature's intent" about how the money is to be spent. The second sentence also describes how the money is to be spent, but can be read to specify standards; the third specifies procedures and does not describe what the money is for. These two sentences can be read to administer the program or to impose substantive requirements better addressed in a substantive bill. Likewise, the first sentence is clearly germane and appropriate to an appropriation bill, the second may be, and the third is not. None of the vetoed language seems to extend beyond the life of the appropriation. Therefore, the first, second, and fifth Hammond factors are in balance and the fourth favors finding no violation.

Further, the struck language does not clearly offend the third Hammond factor (no enactment of new law or amendment of existing law). The governor argues that because the words "not owned or controlled by municipalities" FN96 prevented the department from using this appropriation to contract with municipalities to provide CRC space, they substantively changed existing law, which allowed the commissioner to contract with municipalities.FN97 The council responds that AS 33.30.031(a) allows for use of public or private facilities,FN98 and that a decision to fund one type of facility over the other does not enact new law. We agree with the council. Alaska Statute 33.30.031 authorizes the commissioner to contract with municipalities. But it does not require the commissioner to put municipalities on footing equal with private enterprise as potential providers of new CRC bed space. The appropriation therefore does not preclude the commissioner from fulfilling the department's statutory mandate. Instead, it specifies the type of CRC space the money covers.FN99

FN96. Ch. 98, § 39, SLA 1997.

FN97. Counsel for the governor asserted at oral argument that the condition here violated AS 33.30.031(a), which gives the commissioner broad power to contract with public agencies. But this statute does not specify municipalities. The governor's argument simply restates why this condition allegedly violates AS 33.30.031(a).

FN98. AS 33.30.031(a) provides, in pertinent part:

> The commissioner shall determine the availability of state correctional facilities suitable for the detention and confinement of persons held under authority of state law or under agreement entered into under (e) of this section. If the commissioner determines that suitable state correctional facilities are not available, the commissioner may enter into an agreement with a public or private agency to provide necessary facilities.

FN99. Cf. Welden, 229 N.W.2d at 710 (holding that conditions and restrictions on how money is to be spent are proper in appropriation bills).

We conclude that the CRC appropriation does not violate the confinement clause.

4. Does the vetoed language in the CRC appropriation violate the principle of separation of powers?

[15] The Alaska Constitution provides that "[t]he executive power of the State is vested in the governor." FN100 The governor argues that the vetoed language violates this 383 provision and thus the principle of governmental separation of powers because it eliminates the department's discretion to contract with public agencies to provide CRC space. The council argues that the policy decision to fund privately owned CRCs rather than publicly owned CRCs was a legitimate exercise of legislative power. We agree with the council. We held above that this language does not preclude the department from fulfilling its statutory mandate. Instead, this language embodies a permissible policy decision on how to spend the CRC money. It therefore does not violate the separation-of-powers principle.

FN100. Alaska Const. art. III, § 1. We addressed this provision in Bradner, 553 P.2d at 3-8, and the topic of separation of powers generally in Public Defender Agency v. Superior Court, 534 P.2d 947, 950-51 (Alaska 1975).

E. Valdez Therapeutic Treatment Program Appropriation

The governor vetoed language in a bill appropriating funds to the Department of Corrections for a therapeutic treatment community program in Valdez. FN101 The vetoed language refers to the efficiency of the program, apparently without legal effect. FN102

FN101. See ch. 100, § 74(a), SLA 1997.

1. Is the vetoed language an "item"?

[16] Applying the standard discussed in Part III.C.1, we first consider whether the vetoed language is an "item." The council argues that it is not, because it directed the appropriation's use. Alternatively, we think this language may be read simply to describe the program. Either way, the vetoed language is not an "item" because it does not appropriate any sum of money to a particular purpose. The veto was therefore invalid.

2. Was the governor's statement of objections adequate?

The council argues that the governor's veto explanation is inadequate. FN103 This appropriation was part of what became chapter 100. The question is whether the governor's general "intent" objection adequately explained his veto, the same question discussed in Part III.D.2 in context of the CRC appropriation. Applying the minimum-of-coherence standard described there, we conclude that it did. The vetoed passage can be characterized as intent language and the governor's objection coherently refers to the vetoed provision.

FN103. We choose to reach this issue although it is technically mooted by our ruling that the vetoed language was not an "item."

3. Does the vetoed language in the treatment program appropriation violate the confinement clause?

[17] This bill appropriated $400,000 for an inmate program in Valdez "where cost per inmate day (exclusive of treatment costs) will not exceed the statewide average cost per inmate day for correctional institutions." FN104 The governor struck the quoted language. Did including the vetoed language violate the confinement clause? The correct answer is not obvious, primarily because it is not clear what effect, if any, this language has. It is unclear whether it conditions the way the Valdez facility was to be run or simply describes the program. The former reading would violate the confinement clause; the latter would not.

Despite this ambiguity, we conclude that this language does not violate the confinement clause. Because one permissible reading of the language is constitutional, and because we think it preferable to choose the reading that avoids unconstitutionality,[FN105] we conclude that this language is descriptive and non-binding. We therefore hold that its inclusion did not violate the confinement clause.

FN105. See Bonjour v. Bonjour, 592 P.2d 1233, 1237 (Alaska 1979) (stating that validly enacted statutes enjoy presumption of constitutional validity); Hoffman v. State, 404 P.2d 644, 646 (Alaska 1965) (stating that if statute may be reasonably construed to avoid unconstitutionality, court must do so); cf. Parker v. State, 667 P.2d 1272, 1274 (Alaska App.1983) (noting that ambiguous statutes should be interpreted to avoid conflict with constitution).

4. Does the vetoed language in the treatment program appropriation violate the principle of separation of powers?

[18] The governor contends that the vetoed treatment program language impermissibly*384 interferes with the administration's discretion in managing the program and therefore violates article III, section 1 of the Alaska Constitution and the separation-of-powers principle. The council counters that there is "little point" to this language, but that it is a legitimate attempt to minimize costs.

We concluded above that this language did not violate the confinement clause because it could be read as a description of the program. The same reasoning applies here. Because this language can permissibly be read not to direct the executive branch to take any action, it does not interfere with executive discretion. We therefore conclude that this language does not violate the principle of separation of powers.

F. Other Issues

[19] The council contends that if an appropriation is unconstitutional because it violates the confinement clause, the violative language is not severable. Accepting that contention would inevitably require us to invalidate an entire appropriation item if we found it contained language violating the confinement clause. If we were to routinely invalidate an entire appropriation whenever a part violates the confinement clause, we would chill potentially meritorious lawsuits seeking to litigate confinement clause issues. We decline to create such a disincentive. We conclude that after the offending language is removed from the ASMI appropriations, the remaining language is independent and complete. We therefore presume that the legislature would have enacted the valid parts without the invalid parts.[FN106]

FN106. See Sonneman v. Hickel, 836 P.2d 936, 941 (Alaska 1992); see also AS 01.10.030 (creating weak presumption in favor of severability).

The parties also dispute whether the vetoed ASMI language violated the principle of separation of powers. Given our conclusion that this language must be struck because it violated the confinement clause, it is unnecessary for us to reach the separation-of-powers issue as to the ASMI appropriations.

IV. CONCLUSION

As to the three ASMI appropriations, the language the governor struck was not subject to a valid exercise of the item veto power. Nonetheless, the disputed language must be struck from these appropriations because its inclusion violated the confinement clause. We therefore agree with the result the superior court reached with respect to these appropriations.

As to the new community residential centers (CRC) appropriation, we hold that including the disputed language did not violate the confinement clause. We also conclude that the governor's statement of objections was constitutionally sufficient. Ordinarily these two conclusions would require a remand to the superior court to resolve the issue which the court left undecided as to this appropriation, namely, whether the disputed language was an item subject to an item veto. But because we have indicated based on the briefing in this case relating to the other appropriations that the disputed language was not an item subject to line-item veto, and because this issue is moot, it is sufficient merely to VACATE the judgment of the superior court insofar as it relates to the CRC appropriation.

As to the Valdez therapeutic treatment program appropriation, we hold that the disputed language was not subject to the item veto and that including the disputed language did not violate the confinement clause. We therefore REVERSE the result reached by the superior court with respect to this appropriation.

CARPENETI, Justice, dissenting in part.

BRYNER, Justice, with whom CARPENETI, Justice, joins, dissenting in part.

I join in all parts of the opinion except its conclusion that the confinement clause allowed*385 the legislature to include language in the Valdez Therapeutic Treatment Program appropriation that was merely descriptive. I would hold that the disputed language violates the confinement clause, even though it is merely descriptive. Because this language is wholly superfluous, it violates Hammond 's necessity factor; as a superfluous and ineffectual appendage, its presence necessarily prevented the appropriation measure from being confined to an appropriation. Nor should this descriptive appendage be excused on the ground that it is "apparently without legal effect." [FN1] Its presence is almost as damaging as if it were binding. The governor and other executive branch officials have no way of knowing whether gratuitous language like this is mandatory or descriptive. They must choose between guessing that the language means nothing, at the risk of being wrong, or challenging the language in court to find out what it means. Either way, the language creates a problem by constraining executive branch action. By holding that the legislature is free to include superfluous descriptions in appropriation measures without violating the confinement clause, the court's opinion allows it to do so routinely in the hope that the executive branch will mistake the language as directory and follow it.

FN1. Op. at 383.

CARPENETI, Justice, dissenting in part.

I agree with all parts of the court's opinion except two dealing with the confinement clause. Under the same test that the court applies to conclude that the ASMI appropriations violated the confinement clause, I believe that the struck language in the appropriations for both the Valdez Therapeutic Treatment Program and Community Residential Center also violated the confinement clause. I join Justice Bryner's dissent concerning the former. As he persuasively shows, even merely descriptive language can cause mischief in the balance of powers between the legislature and the executive.

In my view, the struck language concerning the CRC appropriation is at least equally objectionable: In limiting the expenditures to facilities "not owned or controlled by municipalities," the legislature prevented the department from using this appropriation to contract with municipalities to provide CRC space. This language substantively changed the existing law that allowed the commissioner to contract with municipalities.[FN1] The struck language therefore inappropriately interfered with the discretion previously granted to the executive branch by substantive law.

FN1. AS 33.30.031 provides in relevant part:

> (a) The commissioner shall determine the availability of state correctional facilities.... If the commissioner determines that suitable state correctional facilities are not available, the commissioner may enter into an agreement with a public or private agency to provide necessary facilities....
> (e) The commissioner may enter into an agreement with ... a municipality of this state ... to provide a correctional facility....

The court says there is no confinement clause violation because, while AS 33.30.031 authorizes the commissioner to contract with municipalities, "it does not require the commissioner to put municipalities on footing equal with private enterprise as potential providers of new CRC bed space." (Op. at 382, emphasis in original.) With respect, I do not believe that is the issue. The issue is whether the language amends existing law, and I believe it does: For purposes of this appropriation only, it repeals AS 33.30.031(e), which otherwise gives the commissioner the power to contract with municipalities. The language purports to take away from the commissioner a power she clearly enjoys under AS 33.30.031(e). Thus, it violates the confinement clause. I would affirm the superior court's holding to that effect.

APPENDIX A

The appropriations at issue are as follows with the vetoed language struck out:

A. ASMI Appropriations

~~contingent on the Alaska Seafood Marketing Institute having no employees who are located outside Alaska whose positions are classified at more than Range 21 on the state salary schedule under AS 39.27.011.~~ an amount equal to the unexpended and unobligated balance on June 30, 1997, of the fiscal year 1997 general fund receipts from the salmon marketing tax (AS 43.76.110) and from the seafood marketing assessment (AS 16.51.120) is appropriated from the general fund to the Alaska Seafood Marketing Institute for marketing Alaska seafood products during fiscal year 1998.

3. Chapter 100, Section 47, SLA 1997

~~contingent on the Alaska Seafood Marketing Institute having no employees who are located outside Alaska whose positions are classified at more than Range 21 on the state salary schedule under AS 39.27.011, and~~ subject to the conditions set out in (b)-(d) of this section, the appropriation made by section 31, ch. 117, SLA 1996, page 58, lines 8-11, lapses into the general fund on June 30, 2000.

B. CRC Appropriation
Chapter 98, Section 39, SLA 1997

As one of the appropriations for the Department of Corrections, $310,000 was appropriated for "new community residential centers." The vetoed language at issue in this appeal immediately followed this appropriation:

~~this appropriation is for new CRC beds, not owned or controlled by municipalities, to provide space in institutions for violent felons. All beds will meet department standards for Community Residential Centers. Contracts will be competitively bid.~~

C. Valdez Therapeutic Treatment Program Appropriation

Supreme Court of New Jersey.
In the Matter of Alan J. KARCHER, individually and as Speaker of the General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, and Carmen A. Orechio, individually and as President of the Senate of the State of New Jersey, Appellants and Cross-Respondents,
v.
Thomas H. KEAN, Governor of the State of New Jersey, Respondent and Cross-Appellant.

Argued March 20, 1984.
Decided Aug. 6, 1984.

SYNOPSIS

Appeal was taken from a decision of the Superior Court, Appellate Division, 190 N.J.Super. 197, 462 A.2d 1273, which ruled that Governor had properly exercised his line-item veto power with respect to several of the controverted provisions in appropriations act and which overruled government's veto of several appropriations. The Supreme Court, Handler, J., held that: (1) provisions relating to state aid to municipalities were appropriations and therefore subject Governor's line-item veto power; thus, Governor properly employed his line-item veto power when he reduced amount of state aid to the municipalities from utilities franchise and gross receipt taxes; (2) Governor properly employed his line-item veto power in deleting provisions purporting to authorize abolition of vacant positions supported by appropriated funds and provision dealing with particular consequences attendant upon insufficiency of funds appropriated for "any program" since such provisions could be regarded as limitations, restrictions or conditions on expenditure of appropriated monies; and (3) Governor's line-item veto power does not depend for its exercise on a determination that the subject matter violates constitutional provisions or is otherwise unlawful; rather, it depends primarily on whether the subject matter constitutes an appropriation or an item of appropriation or is in any way related to appropriations or the expenditure of appropriated funds.

Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

HANDLER, J.

This appeal requires our consideration of the nature and extent of the Governor's constitutional power to veto line-items 487 in the state budget that are encompassed in the annual appropriations act. The instant controversy was triggered by the Governor's exercise of this constitutional veto power with respect to matters included in the Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1983.

I

On June 30, 1982, the last day of fiscal year 1982, Governor Thomas H. Kean signed Senate Bill 1600 into law, L. 1982, c. 49 (generally, Appropriations Act, Act, or Senate Bill 1600). Although the Governor indicated in his message to the Senate that he had "seriously considered vetoing the entire budget," he had "resolved that this course would not be prudent and that the resulting fiscal crisis would severely damage the State." Accordingly, Governor Kean exercised his line-item veto power, pursuant to N.J. Const. (1947) art. V, § I, para. 15, appending to the bill a statement in which he deleted and reduced certain items of appropriation, and also deleted several general provisions that he determined to be in violation of constitutional principles.[FN1]

FN1. The Governor certified the availability of revenues sufficient to support the appropriations made in L. 1982, c. 49, as required by N.J. Const. (1947) art. VIII, § II, para. 2.

The Legislature did not exercise its constitutional power, pursuant to N.J. Const. (1947), art. V, § I, para. 15, to override any part of the Governor's line-item veto of the Appropriations Act. However, on August 13, 1982, Alan J. Karcher, Speaker of the General Assembly, and Carmen A. Orechio, President of the Senate, filed with the Appellate Division a Notice of Appeal from the final action of the Governor approving the Appropriations Act as modified by the line-item veto, contending generally that the Governor had exceeded the constitutional authority vested in him.

488 The Appellate Division ruled that the Governor had properly exercised the line-item veto power with respect to several of the controverted provisions. 190 N.J. Super. 197, 462 *A.*2d 1273 (1983). It upheld the Governor's veto of part of the appropriation for municipal state aid and the veto of several general provisions in the Appropriations Act that arguably were unconstitutional and were not items of appropriation or sufficiently related to any specific appropriation. The court, however, overruled the Governor's veto of several appropriations for specific highway projects encompassed in a larger appropriation for highway capital projects. Appellants then filed with this Court a notice of appeal as of right, in response to which the Governor filed a cross-appeal as of right. (We have generally referred to the legislative parties as appellants.). See R. 2:2-1(a)(1).

II

Our Constitution mandates that withdrawals of monies from the state treasury can be accomplished only by legislative appropriation, and, further, that there shall be "one general appropriation law covering one and the same fiscal year." Its exact terms in this respect are:

> No money shall be drawn from the State treasury but for appropriations made by law. All moneys for the support of the State government and for all other State purposes as far as can be ascertained or reasonably foreseen, shall *406 be provided for in one general appropriation law covering one and the same fiscal year. * * * [N.J. Const. (1947) art. VIII, § II, para. 2.]

The constitutional requirement of a unitary general appropriations law covering but a single fiscal year is the center beam of the state's fiscal structure. It expresses the basic understanding that fiscal soundness and integrity are the foundations for proper governmental operations. The constitutional plan for the expenditure of public revenues for governmental purposes centralizes and simplifies state financial affairs, serving to improve the operations of government, define fiscal commitments, and clarify official responsibility. City of Camden v. Byrne, 82 N.J. 133, 146, 411 *A.*2d 462 (1980) (citing Report of the Commission on Revision of the New Jersey Constitution 26-27 (1942)); 489 G. Skillman & S. Goldmann, "The Single Budget, Single State Fund and Single Fiscal Year" (Monograph 1951), II Proceedings of the New Jersey Constitutional Convention of 1947 1668, 1669, 1680-83 [hereinafter cited as G. Skillman & S. Goldmann, "Single Budget"]; New Jersey League of Women Voters, New Jersey: Spotlight on Government 94-98 (3d ed. 1978)).

[1] The power and authority to appropriate funds are vested in the legislative branch of government. City of East Orange v. Palmer, 52 N.J. 329, 337, 245 *A.*2d 327 (1968); Fitzgerald v. Palmer, 47 N.J. 106, 108, 219 *A.*2d 512 (1966); Gallena v. Scott, 11 N.J. 231, 238-39, 94 *A.*2d 312 (1953); Amantia v. Cantwell, 89 N.J. Super. 7, 12-13, 213 *A.*2d 251 (App.Div.1965). Although this power to appropriate and expend state monies is reserved exclusively to the Legislature, the Governor nonetheless plays a vital constitutional role in the budget process. The ultimate legislative authority over appropriations is subject to checks and balances from the executive. The Governor is statutorily authorized to "examine and consider all requests for appropriations" and to "formulate * * * budget recommendations to be forwarded to the Legislature for its consideration and ultimate approval." N.J.S.A. 52:27B-20. Further, and of critical relevance in this case, the Governor is constitutionally empowered to object to any item or items included in an appropriation bill through the exercise of a selective veto. N.J. Const. (1947) art. V, § I, para. 15. The enabling constitutional clause states:

> If any bill presented to the Governor shall contain one or more items of appropriation of money, he may object in whole or in part to any such item or items while approving the other portions of the bill * * * and each item or part so objected to shall not take effect.

The Governor's statutory authority to propose the State budget, and his constitutional power to exercise a selective veto over legislative appropriations, constitute significant responsibilities for the State's fiscal affairs, and are essential to an efficient, modern system of government. See City of Camden v. Byrne, supra, 82 N.J. at 150, 411 *A.*2d 462; G. Skillman & S. Goldmann, 490 "Single Budget," supra, at 1683-84; S. Goldmann & B. Bland, "The Governor's Veto Power" (Monograph 1951), II Proceedings of the New Jersey Constitutional Convention of 1947 1418, 1428; A. Wildavsky, Budgeting: A Comparative Theory of Budgetary Processes 175 (1975).

Reflecting the ultimate authority of the Legislature over the appropriations function, the Constitution provides that the Governor's veto may be overridden by a two-thirds vote of both the Senate and the General Assembly. The same constitutional provision that authorizes the executive line-item veto of appropriations continues:

> If upon reconsideration * * * one or more of such items or parts thereof [is] approved by two-thirds of all the members of each house, the same shall become a part of the law, notwithstanding the objections of the Governor. [N.J. Const. (1947) art. V, § I, para. 15.]

With the ultimate constitutional responsibility for appropriations vested in the Legislature, and with executive responsibilities 407 so clearly involved in the budget process, the judiciary has accepted its own absence of authority to compel either the Legislature to make a specific appropriation or the Governor to recommend or approve one. See City of Camden v. Byrne, supra, 82 N.J. at 149, 411 *A.*2d 462 (even if amendment to appropriations act were held unconstitutional, no relief would be available through courts in absence of legislative appropriation); Doe v. Mathews, 420 F.Supp. 865, 870-72 (D.N.J. 1976); Mountain, "The Role of Judicial Activism: Neither Sword Nor Purse?," 10 Seton Hall L. Rev. 6, 11 (1979).

The claims made in this appeal focus not so much on the existence of the constitutional budgetary and appropriations authority that is both centered in and shared by the legislative and executive branches, but on the form and manner in which that authority has been exercised. The Governor takes the position that in several aspects the appropriations power of the Legislature has not been exercised correctly or lawfully in the Appropriations Act. The Legislature contends that the Governor has not properly exercised the line-item veto power. Resolution*491 of this controversy requires further examination of the basic features of an appropriations law.

[2] An appropriation is an authorization, statutorily enacted by the Legislature, for the withdrawal of monies from the State treasury for governmental purposes. City of Camden v. Byrne, supra, 82 N.J. at 149, 411 *A.*2d 462; Brown v. Honiss, 74 N.J.L. 501, 521, 68 A. 150 (E. & A. 1906); Borough of Glassboro v. Byrne, 141 N.J. Super. 19, 24, 357 *A.*2d 65 (App.Div.), certif. den., 71 N.J. 518, 366 *A.*2d 674 (1976). There are, however, no specific constitutional standards or rules for determining the content or format of an appropriations act. Therefore, some inherent flexibility and discretion attend the fiscal-formulation process.

[3] Items of appropriation have, historically and traditionally, been expressed in two different ways: as "budgeted revenue" and "appropriated revenue." An allocation of funds from "budgeted revenue" is a reservation or designation of a specific amount of money for a particular purpose. By contrast, "appropriated revenue" is reflected in the budget not as a specific numerical figure but by means of general language committing funds in an unspecified amount for a particular purpose.[FN2] See Hopkins v. Ford, 534 *S.W.*2d 792, 795 (Ky.1976). Appropriated revenue generally includes monies collected by the State and directly utilized by a state agency or paid to a local government in the form of state aid for a specific purpose enumerated by statute. In addition to the specification of monies appropriated for governmental uses, either expressed numerically as "budgeted items" or generally as "appropriated revenues," appropriations enactments have customarily included provisions that establish conditions, restrictions, or limitations on the expenditure,*492 use, or application of appropriated funds. Welden v. Ray, 229 *N.W.*2d 706, 710 (Iowa 1975) (all legislative appropriations are qualified to some degree: "[i]nherent in the power to appropriate is the power to specify how the money shall be spent"); In re Opinion of the Justices, 294 Mass. 616, 2 *N.E.*2d 789, 791 (1936) (absent restrictive words in state constitution, legislative body can attach conditions to expenditure of money appropriated by it); see, J. Burkhead, Government Budgeting 313, 324 (1963).

FN2. "Appropriated revenues" have been defined as:

> Those revenues not previously anticipated or budgeted, which upon receipt increase appropriation balances as authorized in the Appropriations Act, and from which agencies may incur obligations or make expenditures for specific purposes. [Budget Message of Governor Kean, March 15, 1982, Glossary, p. 21b.]

An appreciation of these characteristics of appropriations legislation is important to an understanding of the issues implicated by the Governor's exercise of his line-item veto power in this case. In his veto statement, appended to the Appropriations Act 408 and filed with the Legislature, the Governor expressed his general reasons for reducing and deleting specific items of appropriations set forth both as budgeted revenue and appropriated revenue.

> My veto recommendations are predicated on two issues. First, a budget totalling $6.2 billion must have an adequate surplus. Second, I feel it is inappropriate for the Legislature to increase the spending levels I initially recommended, and to fund new programs, in a budget that doesn't provide adequately for essential State services.

The Governor also deleted or vetoed general provisions in the Appropriations Act relating to the terms and conditions for the expenditure or application of appropriated funds. The veto message stated:

> In addition to various specific dollar appropriations in the budget, the Legislature has inserted certain language and provisions into Senate Bill No. 1600 to direct the manner in which the Chief Executive is to execute some of his responsibilities. Some of these legislatively imposed provisos and conditions are integrally and permissibly tied to specific items of appropriation. Other provisions, however, place broad restrictions on the way in which the Executive Branch administers particular areas of the State government on a day-to-day basis and, in some cases, authorize a Legislative Subcommittee to share responsibility with the Executive in matters traditionally and inherently assigned to the Executive Branch.

The challenges raised by the parties relate to the constitutional authority of the Governor's veto in four areas: (1) funds appropriated from the franchise and gross receipts taxes of493 public utilities as state aid to municipalities; (2) funds appropriated or designated for particular highway projects included in the capital construction appropriations to the Department of Transportation; (3) general provisions relating to salaries, compensation, and the status of various state employee positions; and (4) a general provision restricting the funds appropriated for capital construction by the Department of Corrections. Each of these challenges touches upon a different facet of the Governor's line-item veto power.

Two of the challenges raised by appellants concern the propriety of the Governor's veto of the appropriation of monies for specific governmental purposes. One such fiscal grant provides for the appropriation of public utilities' franchise and gross receipts tax revenues for municipal state aid. The other concerns specific appropriations for designated highway projects. As a matter of analysis, these claims concern both appropriated and budgeted revenues.

[4] Appellants challenge the Governor's line-item veto of an appropriation of the proceeds from the franchise and gross receipts taxes of public utilities as state aid to particular municipalities. These taxes are authorized by N.J.S.A. 54:30A-16 et seq. and 54:30A-49 et seq. N.J.S.A. 54:30A-24, -24.1, -60, -61, and -61.1 provide for the distribution and the apportionment of these revenues as state aid for eligible municipalities. As approved by the Legislature in the Appropriations Act, the appropriation of state aid provided:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of C.54:30A-24.1 and C.54:30A-61.1, public utilities franchise and gross receipts tax payments to those municipalities apportioned pursuant to those sections in an amount in 1982 greater than that received in 1981, shall be limited to an amount equal to that which each such municipality received in 1981 plus an amount equal to 92.221235 percent of the difference between the amount each received in 1981 and the amount each is apportioned in 1982 pursuant to those sections; provided, however, that the 494 amount not distributed shall be anticipated as revenue for general State purposes.*409 [Senate Bill 1600 at 143, lines 56-65.]

The Appropriations Act as passed also contained the following limitation on the payment of the state aid appropriated by the above language:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of C.54:30A-24.1 and C.54:30A-61.1, the payments to municipalities from the public utilities franchise and gross receipts taxes in June, 1983 shall be limited in the aggregate to $140 million in the manner outlined above and any amount collected in excess of this sum shall be anticipated as revenue for general State purposes. [Id. at lines 65A-65F.]

The appropriation at issue basically provides that no more than 92.221235% of the difference between the amount paid in aid in 1981 and the amount to be apportioned in 1982, if the statutory formulas were applied, shall be paid to the local governments. The balance-7.778765%-is not to be paid but instead anticipated by the State as revenue for general state purposes. The Governor used his line-item veto to reduce this percentage (of the difference between the amount paid in 1981 and the amount to be apportioned in 1982) to 67.811935, so as to bring the distribution of gross receipts tax revenue "into conformance with [his] original budget recommendations," according to his message to the Senate. The effect of the Governor's line-item veto in this respect was to reduce the amount of state aid by $27,000,000. The Governor also reduced the aggregate limit on the June 1983 aid payment from $140,000,000 to $125,000,000. Thus, by changing the percentage and lowering the aggregate limit on the aid payment, the Governor effectively reduced the amount of state aid to the covered municipalities by $32,000,000.[FN3] The money obtained from these reductions is retained in the General Fund.

> FN3. As passed by the Legislature, it was estimated that the retention of the 7.778765% difference would yield $8,603,594 for the General Fund. Senate Bill 1600, at 4. In the revenue certification included in his line-item veto statement, the Governor certified that the State could anticipate retaining $35,603,594 in 1982 from retention of the local share of public utility taxes. The $27,000,000 difference between $8,603,594 and $35,603,594 is the result of the Governor's line-item veto.

> However, it should be noted that the reduction of the aggregate state aid limits from $140,000,000 to $125,000,000 does not necessarily result in an increase in General Fund revenues by $15,000,000. The aggregate amount collected depends on the total utilities bill. Revenue estimates made in the spring, at the time the budget is first proposed, do not always prevail at the time a budget becomes law on July 1. In Senate Bill 1600, the Legislature estimated that the revenue that would be obtained by retaining for the state a portion of the 1983 local share would be $39,400,000. To retain that amount, and gain an additional $5 million that the Governor thought should go toward creating a budget surplus, he reduced the $140 million limit to $125 million. Accordingly, his revenue certification anticipates that the State will retain $44,400,000 in 1983 from the local share. This certification reflects his judgment at the time of signing the budget that, because of the state of the economy, anticipated receipts would decline by $10 million from the amount previously anticipated to make the June 1983 payment.

495 Appellants claim that the state aid provisions contained in the Appropriations Act constitute only conditions or qualifications upon an appropriation. They contend that the statutes providing for the tax on utilities, N.J.S.A. 54:30A-24, -24.1, -60, -61, -61.1, constitute the operative appropriations and that the language in the Appropriations Act provides merely a distribution formula for the franchise and gross receipts tax revenues and does not itself constitute an appropriation. The provisions in the Appropriations Act, therefore, are not themselves amenable to the Governor's line-item veto.

We disagree. The Appellate Division ruled, as do we, that the Governor properly employed his line-item veto power when he reduced the amount of state aid to the municipalities from the utilities franchise and gross receipt taxes. 190 N.J. Super. at 221, 462 *A.*2d 1273.

The two controverted provisions constitute appropriations. They provide the statutory authorization to make expenditures *410 of state funds for state aid to municipalities. Such an authorization clearly constitutes an appropriation of revenues. E.g., Borough of Glassboro v. Byrne, supra, 141 N.J. Super. at 23, 357 *A.*2d 65; see Jessen Assocs., Inc. v. Bullock, 531 *S.W.*2d 593, 599 (Tex.1976) ("If the language is intended to set aside funds for a specified purpose, it is an 'item of appropriation' and is therefore496 subject to veto by the Governor."); see also Hopkins v. Ford, supra, 534 *S.W.*2d at 795 (appropriation is "not so limited as to require fixing dollar amounts in order to validate allocation of surplus revenue").

It is also obvious that the operative statutes imposing the public utilities franchise and gross receipts taxes and providing for their distribution are not themselves appropriations. In City of Camden v. Byrne, supra, 82 N.J. at 146, 411 *A.*2d 462, we concluded that separate statutes imposing the sales and use tax, the bus franchise replacement tax, and the transfer-inheritance tax, and providing generally for their distribution > do not constitute legislative appropriations in and of themselves. Additionally, these separate enactments have not been aggregated or included within a single appropriation law encompassing one fiscal year. They cannot serve, therefore, as valid authority for the withdrawal of monies from the State treasury under the State Constitution. [82 N.J. at 146, 411 *A.*2d 462.]

Accordingly, the underlying taxing statutes were not considered "self-executing as current appropriations," id. at 147, 411 *A.*2d 462, and "[could not] have the legal effect of appropriation laws," id. at 150, 411 *A.*2d 462.

Like the three tax statutes considered in City of Camden v. Byrne, the public utilities franchise and gross-receipts tax statutes now before us also provide a formula for the distribution and apportionment of those revenues as state aid to eligible municipalities. N.J.S.A. 54:30A-24, -24.1, -60, -61, -61.1. It is precisely because these statutory apportionment provisions "do not constitute legislative appropriations in and of themselves," City of Camden v. Byrne, supra, 82 N.J. at 146, 411 *A.*2d 462, that the Appropriations Act included the specific appropriations implementing the existing law. Id. at 150, 411 *A.*2d 462.

Appellants, however, further complain that the Governor's action impermissibly resulted in the transfer of monies from municipalities to the state. It is doubtful that such an asserted effect, even if demonstrable, would serve to invalidate the line-item veto. Moreover, the premise of appellants' argument is dubious. It is difficult to conclude that these revenues are *497 municipal revenues as such. See City of Camden v. Byrne, supra, 82 N.J. at 155-56, 411 *A.*2d 462. At any rate, they most certainly qualify as state revenues. In 1980 the Legislature provided that the franchise tax be imposed, assessed, and collected by the state, with the revenues from that tax thereafter paid into the state's General Fund. L. 1980, c. 10; L. 1980, c. 11. Further, that same year the Legislature specifically committed these revenues for state aid in the Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1981. L. 1980, c. 56. See 1981 Appropriations Handbook 439. Plainly, the public utilities franchise and gross receipts taxes are state taxes, and the resultant revenues are state revenues.

Appellants also assert that a governor may not invoke his veto power to strike conditions or restrictions on the use of an appropriation without vetoing the accompanying appropriation as well. This assertion, however, is inapplicable here since the challenged provisions constituted direct appropriations and were not conditions or restrictions governing appropriated funds. See discussion infra commencing at 413.

In sum, because the provisions relating to state aid to municipalities are appropriations, they are subject to the Governor's line-item veto power. The Governor exercised this power with respect to these appropriations in the most traditional and long-sanctioned sense. His effectuation of 411 a reduction of the state-aid appropriation to eligible municipalities represents precisely the sort of measure that the line-item veto power was intended to permit. See Blanch v. Cordero, 180 *F.*2d 856 (1st Cir.), cert. den. 340 U.S. 819, 71 S.Ct. 49, 95 L.Ed. 601 (1950); Fitzsimmons v. Leon, 141 *F.*2d 886 (1st Cir.1944) (Organic Act of Puerto Rico empowers governor to scale down as well as to disapprove items in appropriation bills since governor may object to an item, part, or portion thereof). Each type of appropriation was properly subject to the line-item veto power, and that power was lawfully exercised.

[5] The second challenge to matters concerning appropriated funds is directed to the Governor's veto of a portion of a capital-construction appropriation to the Department of Transportation. As passed by the Legislature, the Appropriations Act contained such an appropriation in the amount of $12,000,000. Of this amount, $7,000,000 was designated to provide State matching funds for federally-aided interstate highway projects; the remaining $5,000,000 was to fund non-federal highway projects. Senate Bill 1600 at 148-49. The Appropriations Act further provided for the expenditure, out of the total appropriation of $12,000,000, for three particular projects. One related to Route 541, viz:

> Funds hereinabove shall be available as matching funds for federal monies derived from the redesignation of I-895 and such funds shall be used to purchase the right-of-way of Route 541. [Id. at 149A, lines 78-81.]

The Governor used his line-item veto to eliminate in its entirety this appropriation to supply matching funds for Route 541. Although the Legislature estimated this expenditure to be $3,000,000, the Governor did not reduce either the lump-sum appropriation of $7,000,000 or the total appropriation of $12,000,000 by any corresponding amount.

A second authorized expenditure dealt with Laurelton Circle, viz:

> Of the amount hereinabove appropriated, $1,000,000 in funds shall be made available for the reconstruction of Laurelton Circle, Ocean County. [Id. at lines 70-72.]

The Governor deleted this language in its entirety. He left intact, however, the lump-sum appropriation of $5,000,000 for non-federal highway projects, as well as the total appropriation of $12,000,000 for capital construction, unreduced by the deletion of $ 1,000,000.

Finally, the Act contained a specific appropriation for a bridge across Overpeck Canal, viz:

> Of the amount hereinabove appropriated, $700,000 shall be made available for construction of a vehicular bridge across Overpeck Canal in the vicinity of *499 Cedar Lane and Sheffield Avenue, Englewood, with access road to Route 4. [Id. at lines 73-77.]

The Governor utilized his line-item veto power to reduce the $700,000 recommended appropriation to $70,000, a difference of $630,000. However, he did not reduce by this amount either the sub-total appropriation of $5,000,000 or the total appropriation of $12,000,000.

Appellants argue that the "executive's item veto power may be used only to nullify the whole or part of an item of appropriation of money by eliminating or reducing it and then returning the amount eliminated or reduced to the State General Fund as surplus revenue." The Appellate Division agreed, holding that striking these items of appropriation without lowering the overall appropriations subverted the legislative intent and was an improper "affirmative" use of the line-item veto. It concluded that the three portions "of the appropriations vetoed by the Governor were conditions upon which the [larger] appropriations were made, and thus could not be deleted or otherwise changed without a corresponding change in the amount of the general412 appropriation." 190 N.J.Super. at 229, 462 *A.*2d 1273 (citations omitted).

We disagree with this determination. The Governor's action fully conformed to the provisions of the constitutional line-item veto clause. N.J. Const. (1947) art. V, § I, para. 15. In its traditional sense, a "line-item" is defined as "[a]ny single line account for which an appropriation is provided in an Appropriations Act." Budget Message of Governor Kean, March 15, 1982, Glossary 22b; accord Brown v. Firestone, 382 *So.*2d 654, 668 (Fla.1980) (an appropriation is the "smallest identifiable fund to which a qualification or restriction is or can be directly and logically related").

Courts in other jurisdictions that have specifically considered this issue in the context of similar constitutional provisions for a gubernatorial line-item veto power have upheld the executive's right to reduce or eliminate specific appropriations without reducing by a like amount the total appropriation in which *500 the specific item is included. E.g., Reardon v. Riley, 10 *Cal.*2d 531, 76 *P.*2d 101 (1938); Green v. Rawls, 122 *So.*2d 10 (Fla.1960); State ex rel. Brotherton v. Blankenship, 158 W.Va. 390, 214 *S.E.*2d 467, 481-83 (1975). In Reardon v. Riley, the court expressly ruled that the governor's refusal to make a corresponding reduction in a total appropriation equal to the reduction of a lesser-included appropriation does not constitute an unlawful "affirmative" use of the constitutional veto power. By upholding this exercise of the line-item veto power, the court reasoned that it not only gave full effect to the intent of the legislature, but also preserved the governor's power to reduce or eliminate items of appropriation, as well as to approve them. Thus, although the legislature intended to authorize the total appropriation "regardless of the subsequent fate of the specific and included items of further appropriation," the governor could properly reduce that total by an amount less than the sum of the vetoed included items. Reardon v. Riley, supra, 10 *Cal.*2d at 536, 76 *P.*2d at 103. Such action on the part of the governor, in the court's opinion, did not > improperly increase an appropriation without legislative action, nor did it constitute an unauthorized veto of conditional or provisional language used in connection with the specific and included items of appropriation. It was an 'elimination' of the specific and included items and a reduction of the general and inclusive item of appropriation. Such a conclusion appears to effectuate the intent of the Legislature without depriving the Governor of the full effect of the veto power granted him. [Id. 76 *P.*2d at 104.]

See also Beckman, "The Item Veto Power of the Executive," 31 Temp.L.Q. 27, 32 (1957) (noting conflict of authority whether power to veto separate items or parts of items of appropriation bill confers authority to change amount of a single item).

The result espoused by the Appellate Division in the instant case-disallowing the deletion of an included appropriation without a corresponding reduction of the total appropriation-would too easily permit the Legislature to circumvent the Governor's line-item veto power and upset the system of checks and balances that must operate in the budget-making arena. For example, in 501 People ex rel. State Bd. of Agriculture v. Brady, 277 Ill. 124, 115 N.E. 204 (1917), the legislature adopted a lump-sum appropriation followed by subdivisions calling for the expenditure of the lump-sum in specified amounts for enumerated purposes. The legislature argued that the governor could not item-veto one of the subdivisions without vetoing the total, asserting that the subdivisions constituted qualifications upon the overall appropriation. The court held that to find the whole bill constituted but one item would effect a legislative evasion of the governor's authority to veto distinct items.

We conclude that the Governor properly exercised his line-item veto power to eliminate two appropriations and reduce a third appropriation for particular highway projects consisting of parts of the total *413 appropriation designated for capital construction by the Department of Transportation. This action fully conforms to his constitutional authority to reduce or eliminate items of appropriation. At the same time, the Governor lawfully exercised his constitutional authority not to reduce the larger capital construction appropriations of $7,000,000 and $5,000,000, respectively, or the total appropriation of $12,000,000. His determination not to disturb the larger appropriation was within his constitutional prerogative to approve portions of appropriations bills.

Appellants' other major challenges to the Governor's veto relate to the application of the line-item veto power to certain general provisions in the Appropriations Act. These provisions, relating to various aspects of governmental operations, were vetoed by the Governor as violative of constitutional standards. Appellants assert that these general provisions are not appropriations per se and, further, comprise general restrictions that are constitutional and therefore not subject to the line-item veto. Another provision, relating to the purposes of a capital construction project in the Department of Corrections, was 502 similarly challenged before the Appellate Division, which, although no longer at issue, we determine to address.

A

Appellants originally challenged the Governor's deletion of nine paragraphs in the Appropriations Act, asserting that his action was outside the line-item veto authority. According to the Attorney General, the Legislature had inserted several provisions in the Appropriations Act intending to condition and direct the manner in which the Governor is to execute state programs funded by items of appropriations contained in the budget. Some of these legislatively-imposed conditions were integrally and permissibly tied to specific items of appropriation in the Act. Other provisions, however, were not ostensibly tied to any particular appropriation. As argued by the Attorney General, they purportedly placed specific restrictions on the way in which the executive branch administers particular areas of the state government on a day-to-day basis, in matters in which the executive traditionally and properly exercises broad discretion. The Governor's position is that the nine paragraphs injected into the Appropriations Act were constitutionally offensive because they violated the doctrine of separation of powers, the prohibition against the delegation of the whole of the Legislature's power to just a few of its members, the requirement that a bill be devoted to a single object, and the principle that a permanent law may not be amended by reference only to its title.

The Governor exercised his line-item veto power by deleting these provisions. On appeal before the Appellate Division, appellants challenged only three of the vetoes. Before this Court they challenge only two of the vetoes. [FN4] With the exception*503 of these, they do not contest the Governor's veto of the other provisions. The Appellate Division ruled that the nine provisions as a whole "would have infringed unconstitutionally upon the Governor's day-to-day administration of government," and that they violated the doctrines of bicameralism and separation of powers. 190 N.J.Super. at 210, 462 *A.*2d 1273. On these grounds, the court upheld the governor's veto.

FN4. The provision challenged in the Appellate Division but no longer contested in the appeal was numbered 35 on page 173 of Senate Bill 1600. It provided

> The Director of the Division of Budget and Accounting is hereby authorized to review the total complement of positions now maintained among the various Executive Departments and abolish 2,500 vacant budgeted positions exclusive of those positions that are vital to the safety and health of the residents in our State institutions, the State Police, or other critically important functions of the government. [Senate Bill 1600 at 173, ¶ 35.]

The entire text of the nine provisions originally challenged are set forth verbatim in the Appellate Division opinion. 190 N.J. Super. at 208 n. 4, 462 *A.*2d 1273.

414 [6] The statutory paragraphs that appellants continue to assert still survive the Governor's line-item veto are numbered 36 and 47. Paragraph 36 provides:

> As of July 1, 1982, all full-time salaried vacant authorized, special services and temporary positions supported by the funds hereinabove appropriated, exclusive of those positions in the Legislature, the Office of the Chief Executive and the Judiciary, are abolished. [Senate Bill 1600 at 173, ¶ 36.]

Paragraph 47 states:

> If, as a result of an insufficiency of appropriations in any program account, it is required or determined that there will be a reduction in the number of State offices, positions or employees in that program account, the head of the department which administers the program shall effect that reduction in personnel from among all offices, positions or employment at salaries which exceed $15,000.00 in the unclassified service of the civil service before effecting any reduction in personnel from the classified service. [Id. at 175, ¶ 47.]

As noted, the Attorney General argued successfully before the Appellate Division that the Legislature's attempt, through paragraph 36, to control the elimination of particular positions in the executive branch usurps and interferes with the Governor's constitutional responsibility for administering the executive branch of government. This intrusion upon constitutional executive prerogatives was found to violate the doctrine of separation of powers.

*504 The Attorney General also persuaded the Appellate Division that paragraph 47 violates both the doctrine of separation of powers and the single-object clause of the Constitution. By generally mandating that all unclassified positions be eliminated before there can be any reductions in the classified service, the provision arguably offends the doctrine of separation of powers, insofar as its application would severely hamper the Governor's discretion in the efficient administration of government. In addition, according to the Attorney General, the single-object clause is violated. The establishment of authority to regulate the manner of layoffs of state employees for reasons of economy, it is argued, involves a subject matter other than, and not merely incidental to, the allocation of revenue or the regulation of the State's spending program.

[7] We affirm the judgment of the Appellate Division with respect to its sustaining the Governor's line-item veto of paragraphs 36 and 47. We do not, however, predicate our conclusion on the reasoning of the Appellate Division in reaching this result. It may be that these particular provisions offend relevant constitutional doctrine, as argued by the Attorney General and determined by the Appellate Division. See, e.g., Enourato v. New Jersey Bldg. Auth., 90 N.J. 396, 448 A.2d 449 (1982); General Assembly of New Jersey v. Byrne, 90 N.J. 376, 448 A.2d 438 (1982). Nevertheless, we need not determine whether a constitutional deficiency of this kind is necessary to invoke or validate the Governor's constitutional power to veto general conditions as items in an appropriations act. The primary standard for determining if the line-item veto authority is properly exercised turns on whether the subject matter is included in the appropriations act and whether the subject is intended to be covered by the constitutional line-item veto power in terms of its relationship to the appropriations made and expenditures authorized by the act.

In this case, both paragraphs 36 and 47 were included within the Appropriations Act. However, these provisions, separately *505 considered, are not themselves an appropriation of funds, that is, an authorization that state funds be spent for a particular purpose. They do not per se constitute an appropriation or an item of appropriation, at least in the most restrictive and narrow sense of these terms. See, e.g., Brown v. Firestone, supra, 382 So.2d at 668; Jessen Assocs., Inc. v. Bullock, supra, 531 S.W.2d at 599. Rather, these provisions may, 415 more broadly, be regarded as limitations, restrictions, or conditions on the expenditure of appropriated monies. It is of course entirely possible that a proviso or condition may be utterly extraneous to the appropriations contained in an appropriations act. See, e.g., Bengzon v. Secretary of Justice, 299 U.S. 410, 414-15, 57 S.Ct 252, 254, 81 L.Ed. 312, (1937) ("An item of an appropriation bill obviously means an item which in itself is a specific appropriation of money, not some general provision of law which happens to be put into an appropriation bill."). See also Givens, "The Validity of a Separate Veto of Nongermane Riders to Legislation," 39 Temp.L.Q. 60, 63 (1965) ("[A] piece of substantive legislation attached to an appropriation act might be deemed an unrelated rider if it had nothing to do with the appropriations authorized."). Nevertheless, it is inaccurate to conclude that because they constitute "general conditions," the provisions still challenged in this appeal are unrelated to any appropriation.

Paragraph 36 purports to authorize the abolition of vacant positions supported by appropriated funds. The obvious, albeit indirect, consequence of this condition, if effectuated, is the avoidance of expenditures of appropriated funds for the particular positions, and the resultant transfer of a proportionate amount of the appropriated monies into the General Fund for state purposes.[FN5] Paragraph 47 deals with the particular consequences*506 attendant upon an insufficiency of funds appropriated for "any program." In effect, it is a limitation or condition subsequent triggered or effectuated by the expenditure of appropriated monies that results in the insufficiency of funds to carry on programs for which appropriations were made.

FN5. Similarly, paragraph 35, the veto of which is no longer contested, authorizes the Director of the Division of Budget and Accounting to abolish certain vacant budgeted positions. As such it is a general condition, comparable to paragraph 36, that affects the subject matter of appropriations. Its indirect effect would be to bar the expenditure of appropriated funds for particular purposes with a concomitant increase in the General Fund.

[8] As a condition or limitation on the expenditure of appropriated funds, each of these provisions is generally tied or sufficiently related to the appropriations made by the Appropriations Act. As such, they properly have been included in the Act. See State ex rel. Turner v. Iowa State Highway Comm'n, 186 N.W.2d 141, 148-50, 153 (Iowa 1971) (for purposes of exercise of line-item veto a general condition may be sufficiently related to an appropriation when its effectuation entails the use of other appropriated funds); cf. Green v. Rawls, supra, 122 So.2d at 16 (provision constitutes "item" regardless of its inclusion within larger, more general item if it relates to any detail or particular of matters treated in appropriation bill and if it specifies amount and purpose for expenditure).

Further, if there be any doubt as to whether such provisions are intended to be related to appropriations as general conditions on the expenditure of appropriated funds, that doubt must be resolved in favor of a legislative purpose to effect such a connection or relationship. We must assume that the Legislature intended to act constitutionally. See, e.g., Right to Choose v. Byrne, 91 N.J. 287, 311, 450 A.2d 925 (1982); New Jersey Ass'n on Correction v. Lan, 80 N.J. 199, 218, 403 A.2d 437 (1979). If the Legislature included provisions that were totally alien to the central subject of the appropriations law and completely divorced from either the appropriations of funds for state purposes or the manner in which appropriated monies are to be spent, such action would most certainly be in constitutional jeopardy. See N.J. Const. 507 (1947) art. IV, § 7, para. 4; New Jersey Association on Correction v. Lan, supra, 80 N.J. at 215, 403 A.2d 437. Thus, the fact that the Legislature has included such provisos in the Appropriations Act itself can, in the absence of totally preclusive language dictating a contrary conclusion, be determinative of an implied intention to 416 relate such conditions to the appropriations contained in the Act. It is fair to presume that the Legislature, by including such conditions, intended to act constitutionally in exercising its fiscal power over appropriations and that such conditions were intended to relate to and govern the expenditure of appropriated funds.

[9] It follows, in terms of the constitutional scheme, governmental policy, and plain logic, that such general conditions, limitations, or restrictions found in an appropriations act can be the discrete subject of the gubernatorial line-item veto. The validity and propriety of the procedure followed by the Governor in this case is illuminated when viewed against the backdrop of the appropriations process. The constitutional framework, as noted, mandates that state government be financed through a single, balanced appropriations act covering the entire fiscal year. See discussion, supra, at 405. The constitutional plan has carefully orchestrated the roles of the popular branches of government, meticulously structuring their interactions in the fashioning of the State budget. This process invokes the authority and cooperation of both the Legislature and the Executive.

[10] The constitutional line-item veto power serves the governmental need to have a balanced budget in place at the start of the fiscal year. Supra at 406. It reflects a realistic appreciation of the fiscal and operational exigencies that attend the striking of the state's budget. See Opinion of the Justices, 384 Mass. 828, 428 N.E.2d 117, 120 (1981) ("[I]f through the appropriation process, the Legislature were able to compel the Governor either to accept general legislation or to risk forfeiture of appropriations for a department of government, the *508 careful balance of powers struck in [the state constitution] would be destroyed, and the fundamental principle of separation of powers * * * would be substantially undermined."). For that fundamental reason, in the budget-making function the Governor is not remitted to the use of only the absolute or conditional veto. The Governor is empowered to make selective reductions or eliminations of appropriations and discrete elements or parts of included appropriations that he deems excessive, unwise, improper, unlawful, or unconstitutional. This authority reasonably is to be implied in order to avoid a stalemate with the Legislature that would arise if the Governor were otherwise required either to veto the entire statutory appropriation or to suffer the nullification of his own constitutional responsibility.

In our opinion, the selective veto power may be exercised with respect to any subject matter that is included in the appropriations act and is broadly related to the State's fiscal affairs as reflected in the act. State ex rel. Turner v. Iowa State Highway Comm'n, supra, 186 N.W.2d 141; Opinion of the Justices, 384 Mass. 820 at ---, 425 N.E.2d 750 at 754 (1981) (to maintain constitutional balance and preserve separation of powers, gubernatorial partial veto power must extend to any separable provisions contained in general appropriation bill); State ex rel. Sego v. Kirkpatrick, 86 N.M. 359, 365, 524 P.2d 975, 981 (1974) (partial veto power extended or enlarged to cover bills of general legislation, which contain incidental items of appropriation, as well as general appropriation bills, and to cover "items or parts" thereof in addition to "items of appropriation"); State ex rel. Brown v. Ferguson, 32 Ohio St.2d 245, 251, 291 N.E.2d 434, 438 (1972) (those provisions in appropriation bill that are separate and distinct from other provisions in same bill, insofar as subject, purpose, or amount of appropriation is concerned, constitute "items" subject to gubernatorial veto); State ex rel. Sundby v. Adamany, 71 Wis.2d 118, 134, 237 N.W.2d 910, 918 (1976) (item veto of governor valid in that portions vetoed, although not actually items of appropriation, *509 were separable provisions, not constituting provisos or conditions to an item of appropriation, and remaining portions constituted a complete and workable law). This executive power would encompass general and broad conditions417 affixed to the expenditure or use of appropriated funds.

Furthermore, the exercise of this power on general conditions in this case is not contrary to the language line-item veto clause itself. Fairly read, that clause empowers the Governor to object not only to an item of appropriation "in whole" but also to "part" of an appropriation. N.J. Const. (1947) art. V, § I, para. 15. The constitutional choice of language was obviously premised on the expectation that only items of appropriation of money, or conditions on their expenditure, would be included in a general appropriations act. The Governor is thus authorized by the constitutional clause to object "in whole or in part" to any item of appropriation; consequently, any item or "part thereof" that has been subject to the Governor's objection shall be ineffective. Construing this language sensibly, to accord with the constitutional scheme, we are satisfied that a general condition on appropriated funds may itself be regarded as a "part" of an appropriation. Consequently, such conditions are within the ambit of the Governor's line-item veto power and may be eliminated without necessarily and simultaneously eliminating or reducing any specific item of appropriated funds.

We are aware of authority that supports the reasoning of the Appellate Division that such a condition when not related to a specific item of appropriation can be vetoed if the condition is otherwise unconstitutional. E.g., Henry v. Edwards, 346 So.2d 153, 162 (La.1977) (court upheld governor's deletion of language in general appropriations act calling for legislative review of monies spent and of prisoner transfers on grounds such language violated single object and special legislation principles). However, we need not in this case determine whether the constitutional line-item veto clause necessarily requires this expansive interpretation in order to fulfill its essential purpose and vindicate its underlying intent.

*510 [11] We are satisfied that the Governor had the constitutional authority pursuant to his line-item veto power to delete these general provisions because they are sufficiently related to the appropriations that they purport to condition. Hence, the veto of these provisos is committed to the broad discretion of the Governor without regard to whether they were otherwise unlawful or unconstitutional.

Another general condition was included with the appropriation of $13,325,000 to the Department of Corrections to fund its correctional capital construction program. Following that appropriation, the Appropriations Act provided:

> The Department of Corrections is prohibited from placing a new correctional facility in a county with a population exceeding 85,000 but less than 100,000 in which another State correctional facility is located. [Senate Bill 1600 at 145, lines 9-13.]

The Governor eliminated this language in its entirety. The deleted paragraph would have prohibited the construction of a new correctional facility only in Hunterdon County, since that is the only county in the State that meets the criteria of the provision. The appellants no longer challenge this result. Nevertheless, the matter was fully briefed and argued before the Appellate Division, which rendered a decision. Because the issue raised by this challenge is important, capable of recurrence, and was disposed of by the court below on grounds that necessitate our consideration, we have decided to deal with the meritorious issue. See, e.g., State v. Union Co. Park Comm'n, 48 N.J. 246, 248-49, 225 A2d 122 (1966).

[12] It is asserted that this purported limitation on the executive's discretion to establish the siting of necessary state correctional facilities is not tied to any particular item of appropriation. As with other provisions containing general conditions or limitations, the Governor concluded that such language offended several constitutional principles, namely, separation of 418 powers, the prohibition against special legislation, *511 the single-object clause, and the prohibition against amending a law by reference only to its title. These reasons impelled his veto of the provision.

The Appellate Division determined that this paragraph was not tied to any particular appropriation under the budget and that it would more properly be the subject of a conventional bill. 190 N.J. Super. at 224, 462 A.2d 1273. Accordingly, the court concluded that inclusion of the language was unconstitutional and, for that reason, it sustained the Governor's veto. Id. at 231, 462 A.2d 1273.

We do not agree that this provision is unrelated to the particular appropriation for the construction of correctional facilities. See State ex rel. Turner v. Iowa State Highway Comm'n, supra, 186 N.W.2d 141. We consider the proviso to be a part of the capital construction appropriation for the Department of Corrections. The provision serves to define or specify the purpose of the appropriation and is, in reality, a condition on the expenditure of the appropriated sums. By virtue of this condition, the Legislature, in effect, appropriated $13,325,000 to the Department of Corrections for the construction of a correctional facility anywhere in the state except in Hunterdon County. The provision, thus understood, relates to the purpose of the particular appropriation. The Governor's veto of this exception constitutes the veto of "part" of an item of appropriation, which he is empowered to assert under the line-item veto clause of the Constitution. Supra at 417.

Consequently, we affirm this result, although for purposes of this opinion we do not rely on the reasoning of the Appellate Division. As already determined, the line-item veto power does not depend for its exercise on a determination that the subject matter violates constitutional provisions or is otherwise unlawful. Rather, as we have ruled, it depends primarily on whether the subject matter constitutes an appropriation or an item of appropriation or is in any way related to appropriations or the expenditure of appropriated sums. Supra at 416-417.

For the reasons set forth in this opinion, we affirm in part and reverse in part the judgment of the Appellate Division. So ordered.

For affirmance in part; reversal in part-Chief Justice WILENTZ and Justices CLIFFORD, SCHREIBER, HANDLER, POLLOCK and GARIBALDI join in this opinion.
Opposed -None.

Supreme Court of Kentucky.

The LEGISLATIVE RESEARCH COMMISSION, By and Through Joseph W. PRATHER, Senator, and Bobby H. Richardson, Representative, Kentucky General Assembly, Individually and as Co-Chairmen of the Legislative Research Commission, Appellants,

v.

John Y. BROWN, Jr., Governor, Commonwealth of Kentucky, and Steven L. Beshear, Attorney General, Commonwealth of Kentucky, Appellees.

Jan. 19, 1984.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing March 1, 1984.

Appeal was taken from a judgment of the Franklin Circuit Court, Squire N. Williams, J., declaring unconstitutional statutes conferring powers on Legislative Research Commission. The Supreme Court, Stephens, C.J., held that: (1) General Assembly may not constitutionally delegate its legislative power to the Legislative Research Commission, and while in adjournment, General Assembly may not legislate through the Commission as its agent; (2) statute declaring that LRC is an "independent" agency of state government was unconstitutional; (3) statutes setting out plan and rules for providing review of proposed regulation by General Assembly or Legislative Research Committee were unconstitutional as in violation of separation of powers, and as a legislative encroachment into power of executive branch; and (4) General Assembly, in enacting laws pertaining to budget and budgetary process, could properly authorize LRC to exercise certain reporting and oversight powers.

Affirmed in part, reversed in part with directions.

STEPHENS, Chief Justice.

On this appeal, we address the constitutionality of several acts of the Kentucky General Assembly passed by that body's 1982 regular session. This case has been trumpeted abroad as a test of the relative constitutional powers of the Governor of the Commonwealth as opposed to those of the General Assembly and has further been described as a power struggle between these two particular branches of our state government.

It is more accurately a case which deals with legislative enactments that confer certain powers on the Legislative Research Commission,[FN1] most of which are designed to be exercised by that body when the General Assembly is adjourned. The basic legal issues involved deal with the delegation of powers by the General Assembly to the LRC and the application of the historical doctrine of the separation of powers to the particular statutes in question. An answer to the questions posed by this litigation necessarily requires consideration of the nature and limitations of the LRC.

FN1. For brevity, we will hereinafter describe the Legislative Research Commission as "LRC".

I. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The LRC, acting by and through appellants Prather, President Pro Tem of the Senate, and Richardson, Speaker of the House of Representatives, Co-Chairmen of the LRC, filed this action in Franklin Circuit Court. The complaint sought a declaration of rights as to the validity of several statutes, following a challenge thereto by the Governor. The appellees, by counterclaim, impleaded certain additional statutes[FN2] in order to insure that all issues were litigated. Following an evidentiary hearing, the trial court rendered a written opinion and a judgment.

FN2. The statutes, grouped by subject matter, will be discussed in detail at a later point in this opinion.

Based on agreements and stipulations of the parties, not all of the statutes in question were submitted to the trial court for judgment, and we will not, perforce, decide those issues. The general subject matters of the controverted statutes are as follows: *910 the power of the LRC to act in the stead of the General Assembly while it is adjourned; the power of the Speaker of the House and the President Pro Tem of the Senate to make appointments to and to serve as members of certain boards and commissions; the power of the LRC to determine or to approve budget reductions when the General Assembly is adjourned; the power of the LRC to approve the action of the executive in applying for so-called Federal "Block Grants;" the power of the LRC to grant or withhold legal effect from any executive order promulgated by the Governor which reorganizes the administrative structure of the executive branch of government; and the power of the LRC to delay the legal effect of administrative regulations adopted by the Governor.

II. JUDGMENT OF THE TRIAL COURT

The trial court ruled that each and every questioned statute was constitutionally defective; in effect, ruling in favor of the appellees.

In summary, the court declared that the powers of the LRC were limited to "oversight" and that a statutory attempt to authorize the LRC to conduct the business of the General Assembly was a violation of Kentucky's separation of powers doctrine. The right of the appellants to make certain appointments to boards and commissions was declared invalid for the reason that the power of appointment was an executive function. The right of the LRC to veto executive decisions concerning the administration of the budget was held to be executive in nature and not the subject of proper delegation by the General Assembly. The legislative power of the LRC to approve an executive request for a Federal Block Grant was held to be void because such action constitutes "lawmaking after adjournment of the full General Assembly." The power of the LRC to, in effect, veto a Governor's reorganization plan was similarly held invalid as being the unconstitutional exercise of lawmaking authority following the adjournment of the General Assembly. Finally, the power given to the LRC to delay the effect of executive administrative regulations was declared to be a violation of the separation of powers doctrine.

Subsequent to the entry of the above judgment and following an appropriate motion, this Court, for obvious reasons, transferred this case from the trial court. CR 76.18.

III. CONTENTIONS OF THE PARTIES

In essence, the appellants, representing the LRC, argue that the LRC is a "legitimate arm" of the General Assembly, and that it may carry out any and all necessary functions of the General Assembly, following the adjournment of the General Assembly. In furtherance of this argument Appellants claim that even though some of the authority given to the LRC under the questioned statutes may be technically executive in nature, such incursion by the legislative branch into the powers of the executive is constitutionally permissible under a so-called "liberal" construction of the Kentucky constitutional provisions creating the separation of powers doctrine.

Predictably, appellees urge that the powers given to the LRC by the statutes constitute far more than mere "oversight" and actually constitute the power to legislate. Moreover, appellees argue that this Court has consistently ruled that the doctrine of the separation of powers in this Commonwealth must be strictly construed and that all such incursions by one branch of government into the sphere of influence of another branch are constitutionally prohibited.

IV. A HISTORY OF THE LRC

Because the statutes in question grant the LRC much power, authority and responsibility, it will be helpful to discuss the nature of this organization, and to identify its role in the constitutional scheme of the organization of state government.

The parent of the present LRC, The Legislative Council, was given birth by the 1936 session of the General Assembly.[FN3] It was *911 composed of fifteen members: five Senators appointed by the Lieutenant Governor, five Representatives appointed by the Speaker of the House, and five state officials appointed by the Governor. It was empowered solely to engage in fact-finding. In 1944, the Legislative Council's membership was enlarged to sixteen members, none of whom were appointed by the Governor.[FN4] The eight Senators and eight Representatives serving were appointed by the Lieutenant Governor and the Speaker of the House, respectively. The Council's powers were expanded to include organizational functions prior to each regular session of the General Assembly. In 1948, the Council was renamed the Legislative Research Commission, and its membership was reduced to seven: the Governor as Chairman, the President Pro Tem of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, and the majority and minority floor leaders of the Senate and the House.[FN5] Its powers were essentially unchanged. Subsequently, the Lieutenant Governor replaced the Governor as Chairman.[FN6] In 1974, the Lieutenant Governor was removed as a member and under the present statute all members of the LRC are members of the legislative branch of government.[FN7]

FN3. §§ 4618–138 through 4618–142, Carroll's Kentucky Code (1936).

FN4. 1944 Kentucky Acts, Chapter 149.

FN5. 1948 Kentucky Acts, Chapter 15.

FN6. 1956 Acts, First Extraordinary Session, Ch. 7, Art. XII, § 1.

FN7. 1974 Kentucky Acts, Chapter 353.

It is patently clear that the LRC as it currently exists, and as it has existed since 1974, is as appellants concede, an "arm" of the General Assembly. It is beyond cavil that the primary role, if not the exclusive role, of the LRC has been historically that of a research, fact-finding, secretariat and general support agency for the General Assembly. Since the LRC's membership consists of a small percentage of the total membership of the two houses of the General Assembly, no one could argue that it has any powers not given to it by its parent, the General Assembly, and no one could argue that it can legislate. The legislative power lies solely within the province of the General Assembly and its entire, publicly elected membership. Our constitution makes that clear. Ky. Const. Sec. 29 states, "[T]he legislative power shall be vested in a House of Representatives and a Senate, which, together shall be styled the 'General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky'." Whatever else the LRC may constitutionally do, it may not legislate.[FN8]

FN8. For an extensive discussion of the governmental scheme set up by the framers of the Constitution see Brown v. Barkley, Ky., 628 S.W.2d 616 (1982).

V. THE SEPARATION OF POWERS DOCTRINE

President George Washington, in his farewell address, described the problem which is addressed by the separation of powers doctrine when he said:

> The spirit of encroachment [of one branch of government into the functions of another] tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. XIII, Writings of George Washington, 277, 306 (Ford ed., N.Y., 1892).

Montesquieu, the father of the doctrine of separation of powers, articulated the concept by writing:

> Here then is the fundamental constitution of the government we are treating of. The legislative body being composed of two parts, they check one another by the mutual privilege of rejecting. They are both restrained by the executive power, as the executive is by the legislative. 1 Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws, Book XI, Chapter VI, 159 (1823).

The extent to which a country can successfully resolve the conflict among the three branches of government is, to a very great extent, the measure of that nation's capacity to self-govern.

The framers of Kentucky's four constitutions obviously were cognizant of the need for the separation of powers. Unlike the federal constitution, the framers of Kentucky's constitution included an express 912 separation of powers provision. They were undoubtedly familiar with the potential damage to the interests of the citizenry if the powers of government were usurped by one or more branches of that government. Our present constitution contains explicit provisions which, on the one hand, mandate separation among the three branches of government, and on the other hand, specifically prohibit incursion of one branch of government into the powers and functions of the others. Thus, our constitution has a double-barreled, positive-negative approach:

> Section 27 The powers of the government of the Commonwealth of Kentucky shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confined to a separate body of magistracy, to wit: Those which are legislative, to one; those which are executive, to another; and those which are judicial, to another.
> Section 28 No person or collection of persons, being of one of those departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted.

Subsequent provisions of the Constitution proceed logically and consistently with the policy established in Sections 27 and 28 that grant powers to the three branches of government. Section 29 vests the legislative power in the General Assembly, Section 69 vests the executive power in the Governor and finally, Section 109, as amended by the people in 1975, establishes the judicial power in the Court of Justice.[FN9]

> FN9. A reading of these sections of the constitution shows that certain normal functions of one branch were specifically granted to another branch, e.g. the veto power of the Governor over Acts of the General Assembly, Ky. Const. Sec. 88 and 89, the power of the General Assembly to remove its own member, Ky. Const. Sec. 39.

A motivating factor that led to the drafting and eventual adoption of our present constitution was a strong desire on the part of the people to curb the power of the General Assembly. Convention delegate John D. Carroll from Henry County exemplified that spirit when he stated,

"It is a well known fact that one of the prime causes for the calling of this convention was the abuses practiced by the legislative department of this state...." 1 Debates of Constitutional Convention of 1890, p. 1482.

According to delegate J.F. Askew, there was a great necessity to "reform the legislative department...." Id. at 3821. A noted Kentucky constitutional historian, Dr. Robert Ireland, clearly established in his testimony before the trial court that the desire to curb the power of the General Assembly was the primary motivation for calling the 1891 Constitutional Convention.

Even a cursory reading of Kentucky history reveals the factual basis for the conclusions of delegates Carroll and Askew and the opinion of Dr. Ireland. The then General Assembly was dominated by a few, powerful special interests who wielded that power for their own benefit. This situation obviously does not exist today; however, constitutions are operative until and unless changed by the people.

A case which was contemporaneously decided with the adoption of our present constitution, Pratt v. Breckinridge, 23 Ky.Law Rep. 1858, 112 Ky. 1, 65 S.W. 136 (1901) stated:

> From this it seems clear that the makers of the constitution intended the legislature to discuss and enact laws, and to do nothing else. 65 S.W. at 140. (Emphasis added.)

Moreover, it has been our view, in interpreting Sections 27 and 28, that the separation of powers doctrine is fundamental to Kentucky's tripartite system of government and must be "strictly construed." Arnett v. Meredith, Ky., 275 Ky. 223, 121 S.W.2d 36, 38 (1938). In Sibert v. Garrett, 197 Ky. 17, 246 S.W. 455 (1922), we expounded at some 913 length on the history and the purposes of Sections 27 and 28:

> "Perhaps no state forming a part of the national government of the United States has a Constitution whose language more emphatically separates and perpetuates what might be termed the American tripod form of government than does our Constitution, which history tells us came from the pen of the great declaimer of American independence, Thomas Jefferson.... 246 S.W. at 457.
> ... We conceive it to be the duty of the courts to adopt the construction most conducive ... [to prevent] ... the destruction of the edifice as contemplated." 246 S.W. at 458. (Emphasis added.)

Appellants urge this court to adopt a so-called liberal construction of the separation of powers doctrine and argue that the General Assembly is the "dominant" branch of government. In support of this argument, they claim that in Brown v. Barkley, Ky., 628 S.W.2d 616 (1982), we denigrated the power of the Governor and gave the General Assembly a dominant role in the tripod, by allegedly giving to the General Assembly all "residual" powers. We do not agree and we do not so interpret Barkley.

In Barkley, following a lengthy discussion of the inherent or implied powers of the Governor, we said:

> The extent that the Governor has any implied or inherent powers in addition to those the Constitution expressly gives him, it seems clear that such unexpressed executive power is subservient to the overriding authority of the legislature.... 628 S.W.2d at 621.

Practically speaking, except for those conferred upon him specifically by the Constitution, his powers like those of the executive officers created by Const. Sec. 91, are only what the General Assembly chooses to give him. 628 S.W.2d at 623.

These words, plus the following, are seized upon by appellants in their argument as proof that somehow, this Court has sawed off one of the legs of the tripod, viz., that of the executive, and that we have made that branch of government less than equal to the other two branches. Appellants remind us that we also said in Barkley:

It is axiomatic that under our Constitution the General Assembly has all powers not denied to it or vested elsewhere by the Constitution. (Emphasis added.)

and:

Whereas the judicial branch must be and is largely independent of intrusion by the legislative branch, the executive branch exists principally to do its [the legislature's] bidding. 628 S.W.2d at 623.

The inference appellants draw from this language is that the General Assembly possesses all powers and authority to act which are not specifically denied it by the Constitution and has the authority to act in exercising those powers. It is argued that all powers, residual in nature, belong to the legislative branch. We do not agree.

[1] To place this interpretation on that language would be tantamount to saying that we were repealing Sections 27 and 28 of the Kentucky Constitution. We would in effect be eliminating the separation of powers doctrine. We would reach a result which would fly in the face of history and the legal precedents of this Commonwealth. Our review of that doctrine's history and our description of its language most assuredly confirm this. Nothing in Barkley can be construed to deny the existence of the doctrine of separation of powers and the equality of the three coparceners in government. Implicit in Barkley is that the General Assembly as the legislative branch, has all powers which are solely and exclusively legislative in nature. To argue that any other power is given to the General Assembly simply won't wash. The power referred to in Barkley is legislative power and legislative power only. In summation, our view is best expressed in Sibert v. Garrett, 197 Ky. 17, 246 S.W. 455 (1922), which we reaffirm. There we stated:

But a deeper probing into and investigation of the subject will reveal the truth 914 that the rule so generally stated means, not that the Legislature has "all powers" not withheld by the Constitution, but that it "may pass any acts that are not expressly or by necessary implication inhibited by their own Constitutions or by the Federal Constitution." In other words, the Legislature may perform all legislative acts not expressly or by necessary implication withheld from it, but it may not perform or undertake to perform executive or judicial acts, except in such instances as may be expressly or by necessary implication directed or permitted by the constitution of the particular state. To adopt the latitudinous construction that the Legislature may do anything not expressly or impliedly prohibited by the Constitution would, to our minds, at once destroy the separation of the powers of government into the three great departments. 246 S.W. at 457 (Emphasis added.)

Nearly every one of our sister state courts have similarly resisted any weakening of the doctrine of the separation of powers. See, e.g., In re Opinion of the Justices, N.C.App., 295 S.E.2d 589 (1982), and State ex rel. McLeod v. McInnis, 278 S.C. 307, 295 S.E.2d 633 (1982). In like manner, the United States Supreme Court, in striking down a federal statute, has spoken to the issue. The Court ruled that an attempt by Congress to vest veto authority in itself over executive action violated the separation of powers doctrine of the United States Constitution. Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, Et al., 462 U.S. 919, 103 S.Ct. 2764, 77 L.Ed.2d 317 (1983). There the court said:

"The hydraulic pressure inherent within each of the separate Branches to exceed the outer limits of its power, even to accomplish desirable objectives, must be resisted." 103 S.Ct. at 2784.

We should not abandon the philosophical principles that were incorporated by the framers of our present constitution. The purpose of the separation of powers doctrine is uncontroverted. The precedents established by this court have been uniform in retaining the goals set out by the framers. The separation of powers doctrine is set in the concrete of history and legal precedent. We will not overrule those cases and we will not, by the fiat of judicial legislation, change the clear and imperative meaning of our constitution. Such action is within the sole province of the voters of this Commonwealth.

[2] We conclude that any statute subject to the scrutiny of Sections 27–28 of the Kentucky Constitution should be judged by a strict construction of those time-tested provisions.

VI. POST–ADJOURNMENT POWERS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AND THE LRC

Two major legal questions dominate this area: (1) can the General Assembly delegate its authority to legislate to the LRC and (2) can the General Assembly legislate through its agent, the LRC, while the General Assembly is in adjournment? The answers to these legal questions are inextricably intertwined and relate to the nature and role of the LRC.

We premise this discussion on our previous conclusion that the LRC is part and parcel of the General Assembly and is under its control. It must also be remembered that the LRC is a service agency of the General Assembly. Its functions are limited. Its nature, role and authority do not change our form of government from a tripod into a quadrapod.

(1) Can the General Assembly Delegate its Authority to Legislate to the LRC?

Ky. Const. Sec. 29 reads:

"The legislative power shall be vested in a House of Representatives and a Senate, which, together, shall be styled the 'General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky.' "

Ky. Const. Sec. 60 provides: "No law ... shall be enacted to take effect upon the approval of any other authority than the 915 general assembly." While this is not a precise, written constitutional prohibition preventing the General Assembly from delegating its legislative powers to another entity, we have spoken many times on the subject. In Bloemer v. Turner, Ky., 281 Ky. 832, 137 S.W.2d 387, 390 (1940), we declared that the Kentucky Constitution "... made sure that the legislature may not in any degree abdicate its power." Further firming up its position, the Court in Bloemer said: It is an accepted principle that "the legislative department has no right to deputize to others the power to perform its governing functions. " 137 S.W.2d at 391. (Emphasis added.) Recognizing there are practical limitations to the hard and fast rule announced, particularly when it involves the implementation of legislative will, we stated:

But, obviously the legislature cannot deal with subordinate rules or cover the details of administration and execution in its regulatory enactments. Perforce, these must be left to those upon whom the duty of carrying out the legislative will devolves. However, the legislature must lay down policies and establish standards. Ibid.

[3] Under Bloemer, the General Assembly cannot delegate its power to make a law. It can, however, establish standards for administration and delegate authority to implement a law. As in so many instances, the principle is easy to state. Its application is difficult.[FN10]

FN10. The basic rule prohibiting delegation was forcefully reiterated in Dawson v. Hamilton, Ky., 314 S.W.2d 532 (1958).

[4] The practical modification or exception developed in Bloemer was further explained and expanded in Commonwealth v. Associated Industries of Kentucky, Ky., 370 S.W.2d 584 (1963). The rule of that case is that Ky. Const. Sec. 29 does not absolutely prohibit the General Assembly's delegation of legislative power.

A more recent statement of the applicable principles is found in Holsclaw v. Stephens, Ky., 507 S.W.2d 462 (1974). In that case we stated:

> ... when we say that the legislature may not delegate its powers, we mean that it may not delegate the exercise of its discretion as to what the law shall be, but not that it may not confer discretion in the administration of the law itself... Generally speaking a delegation of discretion is not unlawful if sufficient standards controlling the exercise of that discretion are found in the act ... such as procedural safeguards and the right of the delegating authority to withdraw the delegation. 507 S.W.2d at 471. (Emphasis added.)

[5] It is clear from the aforementioned cases that delegation, of legislative power, to be lawful, must not include the exercise of discretion as to what the law shall be. In addition, such delegation must have standards controlling the exercise of administrative discretion. Finally, the delegating authority must have the right to withdraw the delegation.

[6] Therefore, we conclude that the General Assembly, which constitutionally holds legislative power, cannot delegate that power to the LRC.

(2) While in Adjournment Can the General Assembly Legislate Through its Agent, the LRC?

We begin by reiterating that under Ky. Const. Sec. 29 the General Assembly is the sole legislative branch of government and that its powers, procedures and limitations are set forth in Sections 29 through 68 of that Constitution.

[7] The Kentucky General Assembly is not one of continuous session and a necessary corollary thereto is that it cannot legislate after it has adjourned sine die. A legislative body ceases to exist at the moment of its adjournment. Anderson v. Dunn, 19 U.S. (6 Wheaton) 204, 5 L.Ed. 242 (1821).

As we have concluded above, the General Assembly may not delegate its authority to *916 legislate. It follows, therefore, that given the inability to delegate said authority, the General Assembly may not bestow upon its agent, the LRC, nor can the LRC seize for itself, the power to legislate. [FN11]

FN11. See, State ex rel. McLeod v. McInnis, 278 S.C. 307, 295 S.E.2d 633 (1982); In re Opinion of the Justices, 305 N.C. 767, 295 S.E.2d 589 (1982); General Assembly v. Byrne, 90 N.J. 376, 448 A.2d 438 (1982); State ex rel. Judge v. Legislative Finance Committee, 168 Mont. 470, 543 P.2d 1317 (1975); Jewett v. Williams, 84 Idaho 93, 369 P.2d 590 (1962); State ex rel. Jones v. Atterbury, 300 S.W.2d 806 (Mo.1957); State ex rel. Robinson v. Fluent, 30 Wash.2d 194, 191 P.2d 241 (1948), cert. denied sub nom. Washington Pension Union v. Washington, 335 U.S. 844, 69 S.Ct. 66, 93 L.Ed. 394 (1948); State ex rel. Hamblen v. Yelle, 29 Wash.2d 68, 185 P.2d 723 (1947); In re Opinion of the Justices, 248 Ala. 590, 29 So.2d 10 (1947).

With the preceding background we move on to analyze the challenged statutes. In each instance, one or more legal questions have been raised. We shall apply the law stated above, to each statute and determine its validity. Since certain additional legal issues have been raised, we shall discuss those where appropriate.

VII. POWERS OF THE LRC

KRS 7.090 (1982) created, or more properly re-created, the LRC. In addition, the statute established the LRC's membership, meetings, compensation, direction, personnel and management. Section (1) provides that the LRC is, "... an independent agency of state government ... which is exempt from control by the executive branch and from reorganization by the governor." (Emphasis added.)

KRS 7.100 (1982) sets out all the duties and authority of the LRC. Basically, the statute provides that the agency has those duties that involve fact-finding, investigation, information gathering, record-keeping, publishing, research and education. It is a service organization of the General Assembly. However, Section (8) of KRS 7.100 authorizes the LRC to:

> Conduct, while the general assembly is not in session, any and all business of the legislative department of government, except for the passage of legislation, which could be conducted by the legislative department of government or the general assembly if the general assembly was in session. (Emphasis added.)

The trial court struck down KRS 7.090(1) which made the LRC an "independent" agency of state government. It declared that under Ky. Const. Secs. 27–28, there are three branches of government and that the net effect of the words "independent agency of state government" was to create a fourth branch of government. Moreover, the trial court ruled that the provisions of KRS 7.100(8), that broadened the authority of the LRC, when the General Assembly was in adjournment to include "... any and all business of the legislative department of government, except for the passage of legislation ..." were constitutionally invalid. The trial judge declared that the LRC could not, because of the separation of powers doctrine, exercise any supervision over the executive branch and that for the same reason, the LRC could not exercise any authority over the judiciary. The trial court obviously felt that both violations were possible under the broad grant of powers in the questioned statutes. The trial court also declared that the provisions brought new life to the General Assembly following its adjournment and thus were violative of Ky. Const. Sec. 42.

We agree with the trial court and affirm those portions of its judgment holding KRS 7.090(1) and KRS 7.100(8) unconstitutional.

As we have said, it is clear that the LRC is totally an agent of the General Assembly and may aid and assist that branch of government. As we also have said, the LRC cannot do anything the General Assembly cannot do.

[8] KRS 7.090(1) declares that the LRC is an "independent" agency of state government. This does not comport with our previous analysis of the nature of the LRC, nor 917 does it comport with our constitution which recognizes only three branches of government.

There is, simply put, no fourth branch of government. The LRC was created by, is controlled by, and is a service type agency of the General Assembly. It is independent of the Governor; it is not subject to reorganization by the Governor, it is subject to the control of its creator, the General Assembly. It is an "oversight" and service organization for and on behalf of the General Assembly. As such, it is a part, albeit an important part, of the General Assembly, the legislative branch of government. It is part of the General Assembly by reason of its statutory birth and its statutory nourishing. We therefore, conclude that KRS 7.090(1), which declares the LRC to be an independent agency of state government is constitutionally invalid.

[9] KRS 7.100(8) attempts to grant all authority constitutional and otherwise, express and inherent, save only the power to pass legislation to the General Assembly's agent, the LRC. Such a grant of power includes, but is not limited to the power to confirm executive appointments, the power to reject or modify administrative regulations, and the power to generally exercise supervision over the executive and judicial branches of government. The testimony of a witness for the appellants at trial conceded the potential of such act by saying:

> [I] would say that the Legislature has all functions that are not specifically granted to the Governor or that are not specifically granted to the Judicial Branch. All other powers are inherent in the Legislature whether you term them legislative functions or whatever, they're still in the Legislature.

Moreover, the same witness stated that while the General Assembly can "delegate" by statute certain powers to the Governor, it can "rightfully put any strings that it wants to on that delegation of power" and that the LRC can, in effect, act for the General Assembly in "putting the strings on." The witness also described it another way when he said that the LRC could be used to "limit" the power given to the Governor, and that the LRC has "review" authority. He concluded that the LRC could "[d]o anything short of performing legislative acts ..."

Such a grant of power clearly is impermissible under Ky. Const. Secs. 27–28. It also violates Ky. Const. Sec. 42, in that such a provision brings new life to the General Assembly (through the LRC) following adjournment.

VIII. LRC REVIEW OF ADMINISTRATIVE REGULATIONS

The General Assembly has in its recent history exercised "oversight" and review of administrative regulations promulgated by the various executive agencies, boards and commissions. KRS 13.080–13.125. This "oversight" and review has been achieved through a subcommittee of the LRC known as the Administrative Regulation Review Subcommittee. KRS 13.087. The effect of this LRC subcommittee's actions was recommendatory in nature. KRS 13.087.

However, the 1982 General Assembly made several major changes in the nature of this subcommittee's actions which are the subject of this law suit. KRS 13.085(1)(d) and (e) (effective 7–15–82) provide that no regulation made by any administrative body shall become effective until it has been forwarded to the LRC and until it has been reviewed and accepted by the LRC, or it has been placed before and not disapproved by the General Assembly. KRS 13.087(4) requires that the LRC shall submit all regulations to one of its subcommittees to determine "... if the regulation conforms to the statutory authority under which it was promulgated and if it carries out the legislative intent of the statutory authority under which it was promulgated." (Emphasis added.) The subcommittees' findings are reported to the LRC which then either finds that the regulation conforms918 to the legislative intent of the statutory authority and accepts the regulation, or attaches a notation of its objection to the regulation and returns it to the promulgating administrative body. KRS 13.087(5) provides that the administrative body may then revise the regulation so as to make it comply with the LRC's determination of the legislative intent or that body may return it unchanged to the LRC. KRS 13.087(6) provides that if the General Assembly is in session when an administrative body returns a regulation, that is objected to by the LRC, then the regulation shall be put before the General Assembly. KRS 13.087(7) requires a monthly reporting to the LRC of all subcommittee actions regarding administrative regulations. KRS 13.087(8) requires that all regulations not accepted by the LRC or one of its subcommittees shall be placed before the General Assembly. KRS 13.087(9) provides that the General Assembly may, during its regular sessions, and by joint resolution, or bill, require regulations submitted to the LRC to be laid before the General Assembly and may void any regulation already in effect. KRS 13.088(1) provides a procedure for the Governor to issue an executive order, in the event of an emergency, to permit applicable regulations to become effective immediately, provided that the emergency regulations are submitted to the LRC for review. KRS 13.088(2) provides that an emergency regulation shall expire when final review action is taken as provided by KRS 13.080 and 13.085. KRS 13.088(3) provides that when the LRC or a subcommittee thereof has an objection to a regulation, such regulation cannot be filed as an emergency regulation. KRS 13.092(1) provides that when the General Assembly is not in session, no administrative regulation, excepting an emergency regulation, shall become effective until accepted by the LRC. KRS 13.092(2) provides that until an administrative regulation is accepted by the LRC, it shall be of no force or effect. KRS 13.092(3) states that if any of the provisions of KRS 13.092 are held to be unconstitutional, no administrative body shall have authority to promulgate any regulations, notwithstanding any other provision of the law.

It is clear that if the LRC subcommittee or the LRC itself disapproved of a proposed regulation, the regulation's implementation would be delayed until the next session of the General Assembly. Therefore, KRS 13.085 and KRS 13.087 provide a device whereby the LRC or a subcommittee thereof could block, for a period of nearly twenty-one months, the administrative policy of the executive branch of government. KRS 13.085 and KRS 13.087 have the effect of creating a legislative veto of the administrative policy of the executive branch of government. One of appellants' witnesses testified to this effect when he said:

Q. 43. Well, in practical effect it is a legislative veto?

A. It's a legislative veto; right.

Q. 44. It's a legislative veto...

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 45. ... of proposed regulations by departments of government?

A. Yes, sir.

Under pre-existing law, LRC objections to prepared regulations were precatory. The objections did not have the force of law. The changes in KRS 13.085, 13.087 and 13.092 which require LRC approval or LRC subcommittee approval of regulations have the effect of preventing the executive from dealing with emergencies. The power to suspend a regulation's effective date for up to twenty-one months is the power to effectively prevent a regulation from having the force of law. In addition, the legislature has statutorily attempted to deliver this power into the hands of seven members of the General Assembly or into the control of a subcommittee thereof.[FN12]

FN12. In essence, as we have said, a "quadrapod", instead of a tripod.

The trial court held that such constituted a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. The judgment stated that delegation of legislative powers to the LRC when the *919 General Assembly was in adjournment was improper and declared that neither the General Assembly nor its designee could legislate when the General Assembly was not in session.

[10][11] The adoption of administrative regulations necessary to implement and carry out the purpose of legislative enactments is executive in nature and is ordinarily within the constitutional purview of the executive branch of government. Ky. Const. Secs. 27–28, 42, 88 and 89. Brown v. Barkley, Ky., 628 S.W.2d 616 (1982). We conclude that KRS 13.085(1)(d) and (e); KRS 13.087(4), (5), (6), (7), (8), (9); KRS 13.088(2)(3); and KRS 13.092(1) and (2) which set out the plan and the rules for providing legislative or LRC review of proposed regulations as those statutes are presently written are violative of Ky. Const. Secs. 27–28 and are a legislative encroachment into the power of the executive branch.[FN13]

FN13. Under Chadha, supra, we conclude that the legislative veto of the action of the executive is also a violation of the separation of powers.

It will also be recalled that the review of the regulations was for the stated legislative purpose of determining if they comported with statutory authority and if they carried out the legislative intent. It requires no citation of authority to state unequivocally that such a determination is a judicial matter and is within the purview of the judiciary, the Court of Justice.[FN14] For this reason, we also conclude that the statutory scheme discussed above violates the separation of powers doctrine. See, Butler v. United Cerebral Palsy of Northern Kentucky, Inc., Ky., 352 S.W.2d 203 (1961).

FN14. This is not to say that any person, or organization including the LRC, does not have the unrestricted right to form an opinion as to whether a proposed action is legal or not. What we do say is that the determination of such as far as it causes the veto of executive action, is invalid.

[12] One further question remains. Appellants argue that KRS 13.092(3), a non-severability clause, is applicable. The statute, in essence, provides that if the LRC or its subcommittee cannot constitutionally veto proposed regulations, then the executive department cannot issue any more regulations.

The trial court declared KRS 13.092(3) to be void as being in contravention of the Governor's constitutional duty to faithfully execute the laws of the Commonwealth under Sections 69 and 81 of the Kentucky Constitution.

Under Kentucky's Constitution, the executive powers and responsibilities of the Commonwealth lie within the province of the Governor. Ky. Const. Sec. 69. Under Section 81 the Governor has the positive duty to go forward and "take care that the laws be faithfully executed". Ky. Const. Sec. 81. In Brown v. Barkley, Ky., 628 S.W.2d 616 (1982), we reaffirmed this executive duty when we said:

> We do not doubt that if the General Assembly should pass a law that requires implementation, and appropriate funds for that purpose but omit specifying the manner in which it is to be carried out, the chief executive would be required to carry it out and have the right to choose the means by which to do it. 628 S.W.2d at 623. (Emphasis added.)

This right, this duty, exists because of the specific constitutional duties conferred on the Governor.

The non-severability clause that appears in KRS 13.092(3) has the effect of throwing the baby out with the bath water. The adoption and use of administrative regulations are important tools in the operation of modern government, at all levels. The purpose is to enable the Governor to successfully carry out the constitutionally mandated executive and administrative duties bestowed upon that office: General Assembly v. Byrne, 90 N.J. 376, 448 A.2d 438 (1982); Burton v. Mayer, 274 Ky. 245, 118 S.W.2d 161 (1938). There is no constitutional authority,920 however, whereby the governor can add, directly or indirectly, to the content of a statute by means of an administrative regulation and, a fortiori, no administrative regulation can be adopted unless it is necessary and is related to the content of the legislative act and to its effective administration.

The statute in question not only impliedly reorganizes the executive duties of the Governor, but also attempts to usurp these powers. Having failed at the first part, it further attempts to restrict the ability of the Governor to carry out his sworn duties. The General Assembly, by enacting the clause, has restricted the power of the Governor to carry out his duties. In Kenton Water Company v. City of Covington, 156 Ky. 569, 161 S.W. 988 (1913), we said:

> [W]here the Constitution has by express provision denied the Legislature the right to require a particular thing to be done, or to legislate upon a particular subject or in a particular way, then the Legislature cannot by indirection require it to be done by attaching it as a condition to the exercise of some power which it has granted and which is essential to the public welfare that it be exercised. To do this would be to permit the constitutional provision to be indirectly violated and render it a nullity.... 161 S.W. at 992.

The restriction placed on the executive by KRS 13.092(3) effectively and unconstitutionally limits and interferes with the governor's mandated duties. It should also be noted that the General Assembly, through its enactment of KRS 446.090 clearly established the necessity of being able to sever a constitutionally infirm section of any statute from the sound portion thereof.

We, therefore, conclude that Section 3 of KRS 13.092 is void and we affirm the trial court.

IX. DOES THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY HAVE THE POWER TO PRESCRIBE THE METHODS AND APPOINTING AUTHORITY FOR INFERIOR STATE OFFICES?

The next group of controverted statutes deals with the subject of appointments to various boards and commissions. For purposes of clarity and brevity, we divide these 1982 statutes into five categories.

[13] The first category empowers the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President Pro Tem of the Senate to appoint one or more members of particular boards.[FN15] In the second category the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President Pro Tem of the Senate are made ex officio members of certain existing boards and commissions.[FN16] The third category is that which confers on the LRC or a joint interim legislative committee the power to advise and consent to the Governor's appointments to boards or commissions.[FN17] Category four directs the Governor to make appointments solely from a list submitted to him by the LRC.[FN18] The fifth and final category permits the LRC or its chairmen to make appointments to certain boards and commissions.[FN19]

FN15. KRS 230.220(1), Kentucky State Racing Commission; KRS 31.015(1)(b)–(c), Public Advocacy Commission; KRS 230.620, Kentucky Harness Commission; KRS 42.500, State Investment Commission; KRS 247.090(1)(f), State Fair Board; KRS 117.015(2), State Board of Elections; KRS 163.505, Commission on Deaf and Hearing Impaired; KRS 174.105(2), Motor Carrier Board; and KRS 164.010, Council on Higher Education; KRS 103.2101(1)(a)–(b), Industrial Revenue Bond Oversight Committee.

FN16. KRS 154.675(1), Enterprise Zone Authority.

FN17. KRS 278.050(1), Enterprise Zone Authority; and KRS 248.510(1)(b).

FN18. KRS 151.560(1)(a), Flood Control Advisory Commission, and KRS 18A.050(2), State Personnel Board.

FN19. KRS 153.380(3), Kentucky Oral History Commission; KRS 441.615(1)(g), Kentucky Local Correctional Facilities Construction Authority; KRS 151.560(1)(b), Flood Control Advisory Commission.

The trial court struck down the provisions in the first and fifth categories, ruling that 921 the power to appoint members of boards and agencies within the executive department of government is an essentially executive power which cannot be exercised by any member of the legislative department, including the Speaker of the House of Representatives and President Pro Tempore of the Senate. It declared that the second grouping of statutes permitting members of the legislature to sit as members of boards or agencies within the executive department was violative of Ky. Const. Sec. 28. Moreover, the trial court ruled that the statutes in the third category in which the General Assembly purported to grant the LRC the power to advise and consent to the Governor's appointments were improper delegations of power by the General Assembly. The trial court also declared the provisions in the fourth grouping requiring that the Governor make appointments to boards from lists of persons nominated by the LRC, to be an improper legislative designation of the appointee.

After limiting the eligibility requirements for re-election to certain statewide offices and after declaring that office holders' duties shall be provided by law, Ky. Const. Sec. 93:

> Inferior State officers, not specifically provided for in this Constitution, may be appointed or elected, in such manner as may be prescribed by law, for a term not exceeding four years, and until their successors are appointed or elected and qualified. (Emphasis added.)

From a reading of this section, it is evident that the General Assembly may, by law, create these various inferior "state officers." It also appears, at first blush, that the General Assembly may provide the manner of appointment or election of these offices. In 1898, close in time to the adoption of the present Constitution, we decided Commission of Sinking Fund v. George, 104 Ky. 260, 47 S.W. 779 (1898), the first of many cases addressing the question of which branch of government has the constitutional authority to make appointments. The court reviewed an act of the General Assembly which created a Board of Penitentiary Commissioners to regulate the penal institutions of the Commonwealth. The act provided that three members of that commission were to be elected by the General Assembly. It was argued that this "election" of the commissioners was an executive function and not a legislative one and that, therefore, the election provision of the act violated the separation of powers doctrine. In rejecting this contention, we declared that there was no express or implied provision in the Kentucky Constitution which conferred the power to appoint such a commission upon the Governor. In upholding the General Assembly's right to "elect" the commissioners, this Court relied heavily on the specific wording in Section 93:

> Under Section 93 of the Constitution, the Legislature could not only provide for inferior state officers, but could designate how they should be appointed or elected. 47 S.W. at 781. (Emphasis added.)

The Court specifically rejected the contention that the appointive authority being placed in the General Assembly violated the doctrine of separation of powers:

> The truth is that the power of appointing or electing to office does not necessarily and ordinarily belong to either the legislative, the executive or judicial departments ... It is an executive function when the law has committed it to the executive ... 47 S.W. at 781.

The import of the decision in this case seems to be that the General Assembly has, under the wording of Ky. Const. Sec. 93, very broad powers in establishing boards and commissions and in determining how the membership thereof is chosen, even to the extent of selecting the membership itself.

However, it was not long before this Court, when confronted with the same principle of law, veered sharply away from the holding in George. In Pratt v. Breckinridge, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1858, 112 Ky. 1, 92265 S.W. 136 (1901), we determined an 1899 election contest for the office of Attorney General. An act of the General Assembly created a three-person state election commission which held the power to resolve election disputes and also had the power to appoint the members of every local election commission in the state. The members of the State Election Commission were to be appointed by the General Assembly.

At the general election of 1899, Breckinridge polled fewer votes than his opponent, Pratt. Breckinridge filed an election contest with the State Election Commission, which declared him the winner, thus overturning the popular vote. Breckinridge filed suit for specific performance of the decision of the Election Commission. On appeal, this Court, in a decision that received much adverse notoriety from both contemporary and subsequent historians, declared that the appointment, by the General Assembly, of members of the Election Commission was violative of the separation of powers doctrine.

Pratt, as appellant, relied on Commission of Sinking Fund v. George, 104 Ky. 260, 47 S.W. 779 (1898), and argued that Ky. Const. Sec. 93 meant that the Governor did not have the executive power of appointment and that the General Assembly was constitutionally authorized to exercise the power of appointment. The Court rejected this argument, overruled George and held that Section 93 does nothing more than permit the General Assembly to determine whether boards and commissions are to be popularly elected, or appointed. We said:

> The creation of an office is accomplished by the exercise of legislative power. It is done by the enactment of a law. The filling of it, when not exercised by the people, or in some manner directed or permitted by the constitution, is executive, and must be performed by an executive officer. 65 S.W. at 137. (Emphasis added.)

Several years later, in a less volatile atmosphere in the Commonwealth than had existed in Pratt,[FN20] this Court made a veer back towards the holding in George. In Sewell v. Bennett, 187 Ky. 626, 220 S.W. 517 (1920), the General Assembly, in enacting the Workmen's Compensation Act, created a compensation board and provided that the Governor appoint the Board but omitted the requirement of legislative approval of such appointments. A separate, pre-existing statute provided that all persons to be appointed by the Governor were subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. We applied the separate statute and held that when the General Assembly created a legislative board it could make the appointments itself, it could delegate such power to the Governor or it could delegate it to "any other person or body". The Court, indeed, seemed to retreat from Pratt and revitalize George.

FN20. For those who desire to learn more of the political atmosphere surrounding Pratt, See, Chapter 18, Kentucky Decades of Discord, 1865–1906, Hambleton Tapp-James C. Klotter, The Kentucky Historical Society.

However, two years later, we decided the landmark case of Sibert v. Garrett, 197 Ky. 17, 246 S.W. 455 (1922). As we have previously said,[FN21] in Sibert, this court ruled on the validity of an act which re-created a State Highway Commission of four members and provided that the members should be elected by the General Assembly. In holding that the appointment powers were executive in nature, we explained:

FN21. See discussion of Sibert in Section IV of this opinion, infra.

The appointment of officers is intrinsically an administrative or executive act, but this does not imply that no appointment can be made by any department of government other than the executive, for all the authorities agree that the courts and the legislature may appoint those public officers which are necessary to the exercise of their own function. 246 S.W. at 458.
The Court specifically declined to follow George, saying it was "short lived". 923246 S.W. at 458. It further chose to follow Pratt, even though acknowledging that it was a decision with political overtones and ramifications.

Addressing itself to the language in Ky. Const. Sec. 93, the Court said:

So where the Constitution provides that all officers whose appointment is not otherwise provided for in the Constitution shall be chosen in such manner as may be prescribed by law, it is held that, while this provision authorizes the Legislature to provide by law for the appointment or election of such officers, it does not authorize the Legislature itself to make such appointment or election. 246 S.W. at 459. (Emphasis added).

The Court used the separation of powers doctrine to bolster its view when it said:

The logical result of the contention, [that the General Assembly, under Section 93, could make appointments] if adopted and followed, would empower the Legislature to appoint or elect the private secretary to the Governor; the Commissioner, sergeant at arms, tipstaff, and bailiff of the Court of Appeals ....

... [S]uch power on the part of the Legislature, if a full exercise of it should be persisted in, would enable it to gradually absorb to itself the patronage and control of the greater part of the functioning agencies of the state and county governments, and thus endowed it would be little short of a legislative oligarchy. 246 S.W. at 460.

It is our view that Sibert has been unchanged and is therefore dispositive of the central issue present in these contested statutes.

Appellants urge that Craig v. O'Rear, 199 Ky. 553, 251 S.W. 828 (1923), decided two years after Sibert, constituted another veer by the court and is controlling. We do not agree. In that case, the Court ruled that the General Assembly could appoint "temporary" agents to perform a particular task, to serve without term and without pay and whose functions cease when the purpose of such appointment was accomplished.

One other case merits discussion. In Rouse v. Johnson, 234 Ky. 473, 28 S.W.2d 745 (1930), a state highway commission was re-created by an act of the General Assembly. The power of appointment to that commission was removed from the Governor and lodged with an "appointing board" which consisted of the Governor, the Lieutenant Governor and the Attorney General. This act was held valid, as being consistent with Ky. Const. Sec. 93 and with Ky. Const. Secs. 27–28.

It was claimed that the conferring of appointive power on the Lieutenant Governor was violative of Ky. Const. Secs. 27 and 28, because that office was said to be primarily a legislative one. That being true, it was argued, the delegation of appointive power (executive in nature), violated the separation of powers. We concluded that even though the Lieutenant Governor presides over the Senate and can vote in case of a tie, under our Constitution, the Lieutenant Governor is a member of the executive branch of government. This being true, the contention fell and it was declared that the power of appointment was indeed properly lodged in the commission, a part of the executive branch of government. We will now apply these principles to the contested statutes.

The provisions in category number one, in which the Speaker and the President Pro Tem are authorized to make appointments, fly in the face of the principle which declares such appointments cannot be made by the General Assembly itself. Such statutes constitute an incursion by the General Assembly, or in this case, its designees, into the separation of powers doctrine. The fifth category of statutes, in which the LRC is empowered to make appointments, is invalid for the same reason. The statutes designated as category number four, which direct the Governor to make appointments from lists submitted to him by the LRC, are similarly invalid. The General Assembly 924 has attempted to do indirectly what it cannot do directly.

The provisions in category number three, which authorize the LRC or an interim legislative committee to advise and consent on certain appointments is invalid.

The statutes contained in category number two, in which the Speaker and the President Pro Tem are made members of certain boards, are also invalid because such constitutes a legislative appointment which infringes on the right of the Governor to make such appointments.

In those statutes where the General Assembly established boards, commissions, etc., and further provided that a member(s) of the General Assembly could actually make the appointment(s) thereto, we declare such appointive powers to be invalid. Therefore, any person(s) so appointed may not properly serve. However, since the General Assembly has properly created the boards and commissions in these situations, the governor should fill such vacancies.

In those statutes involving boards, commissions, etc., where the General Assembly has provided for its members to serve ex officio, we declare that such action, while creating a proper category or classification of membership on the board or commission, also constitutes a legislative appointment thereto. Therefore, such ex officio "appointment" is invalid. This being true, it follows that there is no position on the board or commission to be filled.

X. MAY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, IN ENACTING LAWS PERTAINING TO THE BUDGET AND THE BUDGETARY PROCESS, AUTHORIZE THE LRC TO EXERCISE CERTAIN REPORTING AND OVERSIGHT POWERS?

The next subject deals with controversial statutes relating to the budgetary enactment process and with reporting an oversight following the passage of the budget.

KRS 48.040 provides that the governor, the chief justice and the LRC shall provide their budget requests on forms prescribed by the LRC. KRS 48.130 requires each branch of government, when submitting a budget request to the General Assembly, to develop and submit a plan for a reduction of that budget in the event the Commonwealth suffers a revenue shortfall in the amount of 2 1/2 % to 5% of the basic revenue estimates upon which the overall budget was premised.[FN22] The statute specifically provides that the plan of reduction shall be acted upon by the General Assembly. KRS 48.130(3). If and when actual revenue shortfall develops, the reduction plan as approved by the General Assembly shall be implemented by the head of each of the submitting branches of government. KRS 48.130(4).[FN23] The trial court declared this statute unconstitutional because it "may" permit the LRC to veto executive decisions administering the budget and because a budget, after enactment, is purely within the purview of the executive.

FN22. The statute sets up various criteria that shall "strive to protect the highest possible level of service" and further suggests that services "not essential to constitutional functions shall be subject to reduction."

FN23. The Governor, the Chief Justice of the Commonwealth and the LRC.

KRS 48.400 provides that the Finance and Administration Cabinet shall continuously monitor the "financial situation" of the Commonwealth. It is directed to give monthly reports to the Governor, the Chief Justice, and the Legislative Research Commission. If the Cabinet determines there is a change in the estimated revenue of the Commonwealth that would require action to be taken under the contingency plans enacted by the General Assembly, then notification of such fact is to be given to "all branches of government". KRS 48.400(2). The trial court declared this statute unconstitutional for the same reasons it declared KRS 48.130 unconstitutional.

925 KRS 48.500 requires each branch of government to interpret provisions of the appropriation act in conformity with the budget memorandum adopted by the General Assembly. Such interpretation however, shall be reviewed by the Interim Joint Legislative Committee on Appropriations and Revenue. That Committee may disagree with the governmental branch's interpretation(s) and in that event, such interpretation shall not be implemented until it is reviewed and determined to be in compliance with that of the Interim Committee or until such branch of government informs the committee of its intention not to comply and proffers an explanation for its noncompliance. KRS 48.500(2), (3), (4). The trial court also held this statute unconstitutional, giving the same reasons as for the two previous statutes.

KRS 48.600 provides for the situation when revenue shortfalls exceed 5% of the estimates.[FN24] In such a circumstance, the Governor, the Chief Justice, and the LRC "... shall make such allotment reductions for the budget units of their respective branches of government as are deemed necesary..." KRS 48.600(1). The revisions made shall be reported to the Standing and Interim Appropriations and Revenue Committee. The trial court declared this statute unconstitutional, giving the same reasons as above.

FN24. See KRS 48.130.

KRS 48.310 requires that the budget be introduced as a resolution, rather than as a bill. It further provides that the budget should be subordinate to the Kentucky Revised Statutes and prohibits the budget from containing any language which exempts it "from the operation of a statute." The trial court also declared this act unconstitutional because the statute purported to "denigrate" the budget bill to the "level" of a joint resolution. The court reasoned that Ky. Const. Sec. 88 requires the budget to be enacted by a bill that the Governor may veto on a line-by-line basis.

The budget, which provides the revenue for the Commonwealth and which determines how that revenue shall be spent, is fundamentally a legislative matter. Ky. Const. Sec. 230 empowers the General Assembly to make appropriations; Ky. Const. Sec. 49–50 empowers the General Assembly to contract debts; and Ky. Const. Sec. 53 empowers the General Assembly to provide for investigations into the accounts of the Treasurer and Auditor of Public Accounts.[FN25] Certainly, we acknowledge that the Governor, as executive, may recommend to the General Assembly such measures as he "deems expedient" including a budget. Ky. Const. Sec. 79. However, it is equally clear that such budget is not binding on the General Assembly. Constitutionally speaking, the Governor does not have to submit such a document. Moreover, the Governor may utilize a line-by-line veto of the appropriation act passed by the General Assembly.[FN26] The General Assembly may, however, override this veto, and enact its desired appropriations. In a word, the final action on the enactment or adoption of the budget is a legislative matter. It is, of course, the duty of the Governor as the Chief Executive to carry out and to implement the budget which is passed by the General Assembly. Ky. Const. Sec. 81.

FN25. See also, Section 58 (General Assembly to pay certain claims); Section 171 (General Assembly to provide for annual taxes); Section 172A (General Assembly to provide for assessment of the value of agricultural lands); Section 181 (General Assembly to provide for payment of license fees and exise tax).

FN26. "... The Governor shall have the power to disapprove any part or parts of appropriation bills embracing distinct items, and the part or parts disapproved shall not become a law unless recommended and passed, as in case of a bill." Ky. Const. Sec. 88.

It was stated by the trial court and argued by the appellees, that the acts in question constitute an interference by the General Assembly in the purely executive function of administrating the budget. We do not agree.

926 The trial court declared KRS 48.040 to be invalid. The statute provides that the General Assembly, in exercising its constitutional prerogatives with respect to the preparation and adoption of the budget of this Commonwealth, directs its agent, the LRC, to prepare certain standardized forms upon which all branches of government shall make their budget requests. This statute provides for a mechanism to provide information to the General Assembly. It does not prevent any or all branches of government from providing additional information, in any form they may desire. This requirement comports with the duty of the General Assembly to approve and adopt a budget.

[14] KRS 48.130 simply provides that the submitting branch of government shall provide a plan for reducing expenditures in the event of a revenue shortfall of between 2 1/2 % and 5%. The General Assembly may adopt or modify the plan. If and when such a shortfall occurs, the executive branch is directed to notify the three branches of government of that unhappy fact and the legislatively enacted reduction plan is to be implemented. No control is delegated to the LRC. Each branch of government is simply directed to carry out the reduction plan which was enacted by the General Assembly. As we see it, each branch of government is to do what the General Assembly has directed. Such is not a part of the administration of the budget. It is carrying out a legislative mandate. There are no constitutional infirmities here.

[15] KRS 48.600 provides for the situation when a revenue shortfall is in excess (sic) of 5% of the anticipated amount. While no specific plan is required to be submitted in advance, the General Assembly has declared that in the event of such shortfall each branch of government shall be the best judge of how to cope with its problems. The General Assembly, under the statute, recognizes that each branch is best equipped to make its own decisions during a revenue emergency and requires that the branch report its actions to the appropriate legislative committee. We find that this act comports with the separation of powers doctrine and is not an incursion into the executive duty to administer the budget of the executive branch of government.

[16] KRS 48.400 directs the Executive branch to monitor the Commonwealth's financial position and to give monthly reports to each branch. When a revenue shortfall is found, the resulting notification, presumably, will cause the three branches to take the action directed and authorized by KRS 48.130 and KRS 48.600. We are at a loss to find a constitutional violation here. The executive branch is directed to be a fact-finder, and to notify the affected branch of government when a shortage occurs. This statute simply provides a means whereby a branch of government is made cognizant of a shortfall and thereby may take the requisite statutory action to remedy the situation. There is no violation of an executive function here, in fact, it places the responsibility on the executive branch, to participate in the overall statutory scheme dealing with revenue shortfalls.

[17] The trial court determined that KRS 48.500 was void because it permitted a veto of executive action in administering the budget by a legislative committee. A careful reading of the statute shows that this is not true.[FN27] Under the terms of the act, each branch of government is required 927 to interpret relative provisions of the appropriations act in conformity with the budget memorandum of the General Assembly. Such interpretation is to be reviewed by the Interim Joint Committee on Appropriations and Revenue. If the committee disagrees with the branch's interpretation, that branch may not implement its plan unless and until: (1) its interpretation is amended to conform to that of the committee, or (2) the branch notifies the committee of its intention not to agree with the committee and explains its view for noncompliance. When the branch complies with either of the conditions, it may proceed with its own interpretation. The decision is ultimately left up to the affected branch. While the committee may disagree or object to a contested interpretation, the bottom line is that it may not veto the decision of the affected branch. Thus, there is no legislative veto and there is no out of session action by the General Assembly or its designee, the LRC, that can effectively prevent the affected branch of government from acting on its own budget with respect to matters of interpretation.

> FN27. 48.500 Interpretation and legislative review of joint budget resolution. "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, when the general assembly is not in session, all questions that arise as to the meaning of items in a joint budget resolution shall be decided by the finance and administration cabinet, by the chief justice and by the legislative research commission for their respective branches of government. (2) A decision made under subsection (1) of this section shall conform to the appropriate budget memorandum provided for by KRS 48.300. (3) The secretary of the finance and administration cabinet, the chief justice, and the legislative research commission shall transmit decisions made under subsection (1) of this section to the interim joint committee on appropriations and revenue of the legislative research commission and shall include, in detail, the reasons for such decision. (4) If the > interim joint committee on appropriations and revenue disapproves a decision made under this section, the decision shall not be implemented unless it is: (a) Revised to comply with the objections of the committee; or (b) The committee is informed, in writing, in detail, within thirty (30) days of the committee's disapproval, that a determination has been made not to comply with the objections of the committee."

Our constitution prohibits the exercise of the functions of one branch of government by another branch, but it also envisions some cooperation between the branches. This statute does not permit a usurpation by the legislative branch of an executive function and the degree of intrusion is so limited as to render it entirely reasonable and without any substantial impact.

[18] KRS 48.310 gives us some pause.[FN28] As stated, this statute requires the budget to be introduced as a joint resolution, rather than as a bill. The statute provides that the joint budget resolution shall be "subordinate" to the Kentucky Revised Statutes and that the resolution shall not contain any language which exempts it from the operation of a statute. When the budget is enacted as a bill, the provisions thereof could repeal existing statutes. But if the budget document is introduced in the form of a resolution, it can not have the effect of repealing any existing statutes. This is one of the purposes of KRS 48.310.

> FN28. 48.310 Restrictions on joint budget resolutions. (1) A joint budget resolution shall be considered as subordinate to the Kentucky Revised Statutes and temporary in nature. No provision of a joint budget resolution shall be effective beyond the second fiscal year from the date of its enactment. A joint budget resolution enacted at a special session of the general assembly shall not be effective past July 1, of the year in which the next regular session takes place. (2) No joint budget resolution shall contain language which exempts the budget resolution or any appropriation or the use thereof from the operation of a statute. Any language in a joint budget resolution in violation of this section shall be null and void.

Ky. Const. Sec. 88 in describing the Governor's line-by-line veto power in appropriation matters refers to the budget document as a "bill". Appellees and the trial court seize on this language and argue that a resolution "denigrates" the budget document to the "level" of a joint resolution.

We agree. Ky. Const. Sec. 88, provides the method by which bills shall be sent to the Governor, for either approval or disapproval (veto). It also provides how the General Assembly may override the veto. Of particular note is the provision that allows a line-by-line veto of "appropriation bills". The relevant part is as follows:

> "The Governor shall have the power to disapprove any part or parts of appropriation bills embracing distinct items, and the part or parts disapproved shall not become a law unless reconsidered and passed, as in case of a bill." (Emphasis added.)

928 While the Governor's veto power applies to all bills, it is only in the case of "appropriation bills" that a line-by-line veto may be exercised. The appropriation bill is the main ingredient of the budget document, and is specially singled out in Sec. 88, which deals with bills, and bills only. Appropriations, therefore, must be in the form of a bill. In addition, Ky. Const. Sec. 47, requires that all revenue matters must be introduced in the House of Representatives and such documents are referred to as "bills".

We can only conclude that KRS 48.310, which authorizes the budget to be introduced as a joint resolution, flies directly in the face of the provisions of Ky. Const. Secs. 88, 47, and is therefore, unconstitutional to that extent, we affirm the trial court, but we reverse as to other statutes previously discussed.

XI. MAY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY DELEGATE TO THE LRC CERTAIN AUTHORITY AND RESPONSIBILITY WITH RESPECT TO THE COMMONWEALTH'S APPLICATION FOR FEDERAL BLOCK GRANTS?

Another area of disputed statutes deals with certain duties, responsibilities and authority that the General Assembly gave to the LRC with respect to the Commonwealth's application for Federal Block Grants.

"Block grants" are allocations of sums of money from the United States Government to the various states. Although they are required to be used in nine functional areas, as a practical matter the use of these funds is largely left to the discretion of the recipient state. When the federal tax dollars are delivered to the states they become state controlled money to be spent in accordance with the state budget document. Some block grants consist of 100% federal money, while some require matching state dollars or matching state "in-kind" services. Most block grants require the expenditure of state funds for personnel, administration costs and use of state facilities.

KRS 45.351(1) provides that the various state agencies applying for block grants shall not make "continuing" application requests. Each application shall be a new one. KRS 45.3511(2) provides that no state agency shall submit a block grant application unless it is "... approved by the legislative research commission as provided under KRS 45.351 to 45.359 or by the Kentucky general assembly." (Emphasis added.) KRS 45.355 provides a system whereby the applicant state agency shall, prior to applying to the federal government for grants, submit relevant information about the grant application to the LRC. Following a review, the LRC may direct modification of the grant or may prioritize the grant application with all other state block grant applications. The LRC has the power to modify any application or to overrule the applicant agency's decision to seek the federal funds.

KRS 45.356 provides that once the LRC has determined that any grant application should be modified or not sought, it shall notify the applying agency of its decision. Once such notification is received the agency has the right to withdraw or to revise and to resubmit the grant application. The statute in Sections (2) and (3) says that the decision of the LRC as to the content of the grant application or as to whether it shall be submitted is final. KRS 48.160 reiterates that the LRC shall have approval authority over block grant applications.

The trial court declared KRS 45.3511(2), KRS 45.355, KRS 45.356(2)–(3) and the described part of KRS 48.160 to be unconstitutional. The court reasoned that the power granted to the LRC under the above statutes constituted "lawmaking" power after the General Assembly is adjourned and that it was a violation of the separation of powers; viz, that the statutes delegated to a "group of legislators" the executive power to implement and execute the state budget. We agree.

The trial court also addressed the validity of KRS 45.359(1) and (2), a purported non*929 -severability statute, which declares that if any section of KRS 45.351 to KRS 45.358 is declared unconstitutional, then no block grant money received from the United States government shall be spent or allocated unless approved by the General Assembly in regular or special sessions. The court determined that section (1) of KRS 45.359 was unconstitutional because it is an "unconstitutional condition upon the power of the Executive offices to administer the budget", and that both sections (1) and (2) of KRS 45.359 "contravene the Constitution of Kentucky and thus are void and unenforceable." We disagree.

The premise upon which the trial court decided the validity of KRS 45.3511(2), the designated portion of KRS 45.355, KRS 45.356(2) and (3) and the described part of KRS 48.160 is that the budget and the budgetary process of the Commonwealth are purely an executive function and that these statutes permit a clear incursion by the LRC into this function, thus violating the separation of powers doctrine. The court also declared that the actions permitted by these statutes constituted "legislating" by the LRC when the General Assembly was out of session.

As we have said, in the preceding section of this opinion, the budget document, its preparation and particularly its adoption, is within the authority of the Kentucky General Assembly. This authority, this responsibility, lies solely within the province of the General Assembly. The preparation and adoption of a budget is a legislative matter and the General Assembly may not delegate this law making power to the LRC, and again, the General Assembly while in adjournment may not legislate through its agent, the LRC.

It is obvious that the power and authority granted to the LRC under these statutes are purely legislative in nature. The key to this conclusion lies in KRS 45.3511(2), which states:

"No state administering agency shall submit any block grant applications to a federal administrative agency unless approved by the legislative research commission..."

This statute allows the LRC absolute control, without criteria, standards or guidelines, over the process of seeking block grants. Literally tens of millions of dollars are involved in the federal block grant program. Once the money is received, it, in effect, becomes state money. The expenditure of money so received is an appropriation which is a function of the General Assembly.

As we have said, many of the federal grants require that matching state funds be committed as a condition of this grant. Such grants, in most cases, require the expenditure of money, allocation and use of state personnel, and the use of state facilities. Such is also the sole province of the General Assembly and cannot be delegated to the LRC. We therefore declare that the sections in question are unconstitutional and affirm the trial court.

[19] We are not unaware that the General Assembly meets and legislates for limited periods of time. We are also not unaware that block grants form a substantial percentage of the Kentucky budget document. Millions of federal tax dollars come into our state, and presumably serve our people. We believe that the General Assembly may constitutionally preserve and keep secure its legislative power, in this area, and allow the LRC (or other delegatee) to monitor applications for block grants so long as the authority delegated is not legislative. The General Assembly may allow the LRC to act—as its agent—in matters where it has established adequate standards, guidelines, criteria, findings of fact, tests and other safeguards which will assure that the delegatee is acting within the framework of a legislative plan, and does not exercise such discretion as would constitute law making by such agency.

One further point remains. As we have said, the General Assembly in 930KRS 45.359(1) and (2) enacted a non-severability statute which was declared unconstitutional by the trial court because it imposed an invalid condition on the power of the Governor to administer the budget. Since we have established in Section X of this opinion that the responsibility for the preparation and adoption of the state budget is within the purview of the General Assembly, the premise of the trial court's opinion falls and we find no constitutional infirmity here. We accordingly reverse the trial court.

XII. WHEN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY GRANTS THE GOVERNOR THE POWER TO REORGANIZE CERTAIN GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES, CAN IT GRANT THE LRC THE AUTHORITY TO VETO SUCH PLANS AS ARE PROMULGATED BY THE GOVERNOR?

Prior to the 1982 session of the General Assembly, the Governor was, with certain exceptions, empowered by statute to reorganize the executive department. KRS 12.025. The LRC was permitted to comment upon those interim reorganizational actions, but the comments were only advisory, did not bind the Governor and did not have the force of law. Such executive actions, however, were subject to the approval of the General Assembly at its next session.

In 1982, by the terms of KRS 12.028(2), the reorganizational procedure was changed. Under the terms of that statute, any temporary reorganization plan must "be approved by the LRC" before it becomes effective. The intended purpose of the 1982 modification is best described by its sponsor who stated that if the Governor desires to temporarily reorganize he can:

> ... propose a reorganization plan by way of Executive Order to the LRC. The LRC then can put that reorganization into effect by approval of that temporary reorganization plan.

Noting the difference between the new and old acts, the sponsor commented on the Governor's power under the new act to single handedly reorganize saying, "... he [the Governor] will not be able to unilaterally do that." If the LRC does not agree with the Governor's plan, the sponsor noted that the LRC "... has the prerogative of not approving the plan."

[20] The trial court, in declaring KRS 12.028(2) unconstitutional, reasoned that in exercising the veto so granted, the LRC would be making legislative decisions which should be made "... by the entire General Assembly." We agree.

Even though the Governor has the supreme executive power of the Commonwealth (Ky. Const. Sec. 69), he cannot transfer the functions of an existing, legislatively-created executive agency or department to another without legislative authority. Brown v. Barkley, Ky., 628 S.W.2d 616 (1983). We did say, in that much cited case, that the executive may have the power to transfer those functions if "... it is necessary in order for him to carry out a law or laws that the legislature has created without prescribing in sufficient detail how they are to be executed." 628 S.W.2d at 622.

However, once the General Assembly has made a determination that the power to reorganize state government in the interim periods between legislative sessions does exist, and determines that that power is in the hands of the Governor, such interim action is purely an executive function. As this Court has said: "... the transfer ... [of executive functions] ... is essentially an executive action, like the reassignment of troops or battle missions from one military command to another..." 628 S.W.2d at 622. Any authority given to the LRC to veto or substantially affect this statutorily instituted executive function is a violation of the separation of powers doctrine.

In the 1960 reorganization statute, the General Assembly, by reserving eventual approval of any reorganization to itself, recognized that ultimately reorganization is legislative in nature. In the 1982 version, the Governor is authorized to "... propose 931 to the general assembly, for its approval, changes in the state government..." KRS 12.028(1). As we understand it, such authority is the normal way to present any legislative suggestion to the General Assembly. Implicit in this provision is that final approval of any plan is legislative in nature.

Section (2) of the 1982 statute, KRS 12.028, authorizes an emerging type of reorganization plan to be prepared by the Governor, but such is made subject to the approval of the LRC. Since the Governor has no inherent power to reorganize and since the 1982 session again recognized that reorganization is legislative in nature, we believe that the General Assembly may not delegate such legislative power to the LRC. Having declared that there may be a need for interim reorganization and having declared that the Governor is the proper agency to undertake such action in the interim period and finally having declared that approval of such action is legislative in nature, the General Assembly cannot delegate such legislative authority to the LRC.

In accordance with the above, the judgment of the Franklin Circuit Court is affirmed in part, and reversed in part with directions that it be modified in accordance with this opinion.

All concur.

SPONSOR STATEMENT
CS SENATE BILL NO. 78

Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 78 comprises of two sections. The first seeks to treat members of limited liability companies ("LLC") in the same manner as shareholders of corporations for liability purposes under Alaska liquor laws. It seeks to reflect the fact that LLC's are more similar to and used in the business world as alternatives to corporations and are less commonly used as alternatives to sole proprietorships or general partnerships, which pass on general liability to their owners. As it is currently written, AS 04.21.035 provides that a member of a limited liability company ("LLC") or a partner of a limited liability partnership that holds a license under Title 4, governing alcoholic beverages, is not relieved of the liability imposed upon a liquor license holder solely because the license is held by a LLC or a limited liability partnership.

However, businesses have recognized the greater flexibility in internal governance matters afforded by the LLC structure and have increasingly turned to LLC's as a preferred form of entity for doing business. Businesses consciously choose LLC's to have greater management and efficiency without sacrificing the limited liability protection from business creditors afforded to owners of corporations. Therefore CSSB 78 seeks to provide equal treatment to LLCs in the liquor liability context as they are treated in the business world generally.

The committee substitute adds two sections which simply provide a limitation of liability for a taxi or limousine driver who gets in an accident while driving another person's vehicle from a licensed premise. These sections were originally passed in 2004 by a vote of 39-0 in the House and 20-0 in the Senate but had a sunset date of 2007, a fact that was overlooked. This language would correct that oversight and the CS language mirrors the original legislation with some additional language added in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Everyone is a potential victim of a drunk driver. Therefore everyone will benefit from this program – not only the potential drunk driver, but also every person who may be a victim of that drunk driver. Another basic principal of the program is to remove all physical and psychological barriers to its use. The ride home is completely free to the intoxicated person and confidential.

There are 63 participating establishments in the Anchorage Bowl. Since 2005 when the program began, over 821 individual rides have taken place and over 2379 vouchers have been sold.

SENATOR LESIL MCGUIRE

Summary of Changes and Sectional Analysis Between SB 78\M and CS for SB 78\I

This document is an identification of the changes between W.O. 27-LS0282\M and W.O. 27-LS0282\I. It also provides a sectional analysis of Version I.

The CS for SB 22 adds new language in the title of SB 78. It adds "; and relating to accidents involving the vehicle of a person under the influence of alcoholic beverages."

Section 1 in the CS is unchanged. Currently, Title 4 treats limited liability companies (LLCs) differently than how LLCs are treated elsewhere in Alaska law regarding non-liability of shareholders. Section 1 deletes reference to LLCs and foreign LLCs from AS 04.21.035, thereby allowing members of LLCs to rely on AS 10.50.265 for purposes of liability when the LLC holds a liquor license under Title 4 and allows LLCs to be treated consistently in Alaska law.

The CS adds Section 2, which adds a new section to AS 09.65 that relates to damages resulting from driving the vehicle of a person under the influence of an alcoholic beverage. Section 09.65.315 (a) gives five conditions under which a person is not liable beyond the limits of any applicable insurance policy purchased by or on behalf of the owner of the vehicle for damages resulting from a motor vehicle accident.

Section 09.65.315(b) states that the taxicab company, drivers and the person who makes arrangements for transportation are not liable for damages resulting from a motor vehicle accident if they meet described under Section 09.65.315(a).

Section 09.65.315(c) outlines that this statute would not preclude liability for civil damages in cases of gross negligence, reckless or intentional misconduct. It also does not limit the ability of a person to recover damages under any applicable uninsured or underinsured motor vehicle insurance coverage or under any applicable liability insurance coverage purchased by or on behalf of the person being transported.

Section 09.65.315(d) defines what is considered consent to another person to drive the owner's motor vehicle.

Section 09.65.315(e) points to where the definitions of "controlled substance", "inhalant" and "licensed premises" can be found in Alaska Statutes.

The CS adds Section 3, which dictates that Section 2 applies to a civil action that accrues on or after the effective date of this Act.

Analysis

SB 78 provides members of limited liability companies ("LLC") the same protections as shareholders of corporations for liability purposes under Alaska liquor laws.

Currently AS 04.21.035 provides that a member of a limited liability company ("LLC") or a partner of a limited liability partnership that holds a license under Title 4 is not relieved of the liability imposed upon a liquor license holder solely because the license is held by a LLC or a limited liability partnership.

Passage of this legislation will not have a fiscal impact on the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board.

MEMORANDUM March 22, 2011

SUBJECT: Proposed amendments to AS 04.21.035
(Work Order No. 27-LS0282\M)

TO: Senator Lesil McGuire
Attn: Esther Tempel

FROM: Doug Gardner
Director

Currently, AS 04.21.035 is an exception to the protections against individual liability offered to partners of properly registered and maintained LLPs and to members of properly registered and maintained LLCs. In other words, partners of LLPs and LLCs--notwithstanding the fact that they have complied with AS 10.50 (LLCs) or AS 32.06 (LLPs)--are not relieved of the obligation or the liability otherwise imposed upon a liquor license holder under Title 4.

LLCs and LLPs are two approaches that have been used throughout the U.S. in recent years to combine the federal tax benefits of partnerships with the non-liability of the shareholders of corporations.[1] Both LLCs and LLPs are being used to capture the traditional non-liability of shareholders of corporations. Currently, Title 4 treats LLCs differently than how LLCs are treated elsewhere in Alaska law. SB 78 deletes reference to LLCs from AS 04.21.035, thereby allowing members of LLCs to rely on AS 10.50.265 for purposes of liability when the LLC holds a liquor license under Title 4, and allows LLCs to be treated consistently in Alaska law. By removing LLCs from AS 04.21.035 and leaving LLPs in the statute, a person who wants to manage liability under AS 04.21 would be able to form as an LLC rather than as an LLP as long as all the LLC requirements in AS 10.50 are met.

[1] LLCs can elect for federal tax purposes the pass-through taxation of partnerships, where the partner is taxed on partnership income, but the partnership itself is not. In general (there are exceptions), a corporation is taxed on corporate income, and the shareholders are taxed on their dividends.

Additional Information

CORPORATIONS	GENERAL PARTNERSHIPS
Owned by shareholders; Requires directors and officers; Requires Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws. Sub-S Corporations can be used only in limited circumstances and are not available for certain shareholders. All non-Sub-S Corporations are C-Corporations. Limited liability for owners—no personal liability for shareholders generally for acts of corporation. Officers and Directors maintain fiduciary obligations to run corporations in accordance with applicable laws. Prior to the creation of Limited Liability Companies, which are now authorized by statute in all 50 States*, Sub-S Corporations were used as the corporation of choice for investors. In approximately 1994, Alaska followed the majority of other States in allowing Limited Liability Companies in Alaska.	Owned by partners. No limited liability for owners—all partners are individually liable for acts of partnership. Profits are divided among the partners. LIMITED PARTNERSHIPS At least one general partner which is liable for debts of the Limited Partnership, limited partners are not liable for debts of the Limited Partnership. General Partners in a General Partnership or a Limited Partnership are responsible for the debts of the entity. Prior to the creation of Limited Liability Companies, Limited Partnerships were used as an alternative to Sub-S Corporations for investors, where the Sub-S Corporation was not available to the investment entity. In approximately 2000, Alaska followed the majority of other States in allowing Limited Liability Partnerships in Alaska. A Limited Liability Partnership must start out as a general partnership and be subsequently converted to a Limited Liability Partnership.

LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES	LIMITED LIABILITY PARTNERSHIPS
Owned by members. Commonly used as alternative to Limited Partnerships and Sub-S Corporations because easier to use—greater flexibility in governance and structuring return on investment to owners. Limited Liability Companies are often managed by the members (owners) without need for officers and/or directors. Managers maintain fiduciary obligations to the LLC. Limited liability for owners—no personal liability for members generally for acts of limited liability company.	Owned by partners Used as alternative to general partnership by vote to amend general partnership agreement to become limited liability partnership and then filing statement of qualification with State Limited liability for owners for partnership obligations incurred after conversion to limited liability partnership

SENATE BILL 78

PURPOSE OF SENATE BILL 78

Senate Bill 78 deletes the "pass through liability" to members of Limited Liability Companies with respect to liquor license issues imposed by AS 04.21.035, while retaining the current "pass through liability" for limited liability and foreign limited liability partnerships. This modification will make Alaska Law substantively more consistent with other States, including Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho and Utah with respect to pass through liability for members of Limited Liability Companies.

BACKGROUND OF LLCs.

Starting with the pioneering state of Wyoming in 1977, and ending with the action of the Hawaii legislature in 1996, every state has, during those twenty years, passed laws creating a new type of legal entity called a "limited liability company" (or LLC). These entities, which resemble (and are usually taxed as) partnerships, offer the advantages of limited liability, like corporations. While it has long been possible for partnerships to offer limited liability to their LIMITED partners, a limited partnership always had to have at least one GENERAL partner, who was fully liable for the debts of the business.

In addition, all 50 states and D.C. have now adopted a similar type of entity, the limited liability partnership (LLP) or registered limited liability partnership (RLLP). The LLP (or an RLLP) is simply a garden variety partnership that registers with the state and pays a specified fee, in order to become an LLP or RLLP and to have limited liability conferred upon the partnership, which is generally quite similar to an LLC, except that it may be operated like a regular partnership, for the most part.

However, LLPs are mostly used for professional firms, and in some states (New York and California and, until recently, Nevada) only professional firms may set up LLPs. For professionals, the LLP offers only somewhat limited protection from liability, in that a professional who is a partner in an LLP remains personally liable for his or her own malpractice or gross negligence, or such misdeeds committed by employees of the LLP who operate under that partner's direction. (The same is generally true of professional corporations or professional LLCs.) But in most states, other, non-professional businesses may also operate as LLPs, and generally obtain more liability protection than professional LLPs.

February 14, 2011

VIA EXPRESS COURIER

The Honorable Dennis Egan
Chair
Senate Labor & Commerce Committee
State Capitol, Room 150
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Re: Letter of Support for SB 78

Dear Senator Egan:

Alyeska Resort supports passage of Senate Bill 78, which would treat members of limited liability companies in the same manner as shareholders of corporations for liability purposes under Alaska liquor laws by eliminating the pass through exposure that members of limited liability companies now have under AS 04.21.035.

Summary of AS 04.21.035

Alaska Statute 04.21.035 provides that a member of a limited liability company ("LLC") or a partner of a limited liability partnership that holds a license under Title 4, which governs alcoholic beverages, is not relieved of the liability imposed upon a liquor license holder solely because the license is held by an LLC or a limited liability partnership.

Why AS 04.21.035 Is Unworkable

AS 04.21AS 04.21.035 does not recognize the realities of doing business today in the LLC format, unfairly penalizes those who choose to do business as an LLC rather than a corporation in the alcohol business, and causes unnecessary expense. AS 04.21.035 frustrates business development because it does not reflect the fact that LLC's are more similar to and used in the business world as alternatives to corporations, which do not pass general liability to their owners, than similar to and used as alternatives to sole proprietorships or general partnerships, which do pass general liability to their owners. Owners of businesses elect to use the simplified entity form of an LLC over a corporation while retaining the limited liability protection for the LLC's members. The owners of these businesses, however, cannot realize the benefits of using an LLC instead of a corporation without subjecting themselves to liability under AS 04.21.035.

LLC members typically have limited liability protection from LLC creditors, just like shareholders of corporations do from corporation creditors. Under AS 10.50.265 in the Alaska Revised Limited Liability Company Act, a member of an LLC "is not liable, solely by reason of being a member…for a liability of the company to a third party, whether the liability arises in contract, tort or another form, or for the acts or omissions of another member, manager, agent or employee of the company to a third party." AS 04.21.035 takes away that limited liability protection with respect to the holding of a liquor license and in liquor related businesses. To avoid that result under the current statutes, the owner of a liquor business holding a liquor license seeking limited liability protection must do business through a corporate entity.

Businesses consciously choose LLC's to have greater management and efficiency without sacrificing the limited liability protection from business creditors afforded to owners of corporations. LLC's are routinely used in Alaska (as well as the rest of the United States) as limited liability protection entities in place of corporations. There is no reason to treat LLC's differently in the liquor liability context than they are treated in the business world generally.

Why AS 04.21.035 Should Be Changed

At the time that AS 04.21.035 was enacted in 1999, the LLC statute in Alaska was relatively new (enacted in 1994) and LLC's were not as well understood and as commonly used by the general business community as they are now. Apparently, in 1999, someone thought in the licensed liquor business LLC's should be treated more like sole proprietorships or general partnerships with unlimited liability for their owners. However, now that LLC's are better understood and more commonly used in place of corporations as limited liability vehicles for doing business, the time has come to place LLC's on equal footing with corporations in the liquor business context. When we met with the Executive Director and staff of the Alaska Alcoholic Beverage Control Board ("ABC") and explained the reasons for changing the statute, the ABC Executive Director and staff understood the reason for the requested change and voiced no opposition to the amendment.

Additionally, we are aware of other corporations that hold liquor licenses and would prefer to hold the liquor licenses as LLC's but will not do so until AS 04.21.035 is amended.

Please feel free to contact me if you have any questions.

Very truly yours,

J. Randall Call

off the road

About the program - "Off the Road" is a unique program because we can provide a safe mode of transportation for the patron and their vehicle. There are other programs in Alaska but they will not compare to the "Off the Road". This service can be requested by the patron or by the determination of the on premise liquor licensed establishment to limit liabilities and to protect the general public.

Although we try to encourage those who choose to drink alcohol to do so responsibly, we recognize that some people are going to choose to drink to the point of intoxication. Even those who make provisions for alternative rides may have those plans thwarted -- a designated driver may lapse into drinking, a bus may be missed, and so forth. The programs administrators assume that it is the nature of safety nets to catch more than the minimum. With the philosophy that it is better to accept some limited amount of abuse (such as using the service when other sage ways home may exist) rather than risk excluding any legitimate use, servers are instructed never to turn down an Off the Road request. Our thinking is that the risk of denying a legitimate ride far outweighs the risk of allowing a certain amount of abuse.

Everyone, regardless of socio-economic level, is a potential victim of a drunk driver. Therefore everyone in our community will benefit from this program – not only the potential drunk driver, but also every person who may be a victim of that drunk driver. Another basic principal of the program is to remove all physical and psychological barriers to its use. The ride home is completely free and confidential. Since the program started in 2005, there have not been any accidents proving that it is safer to have a sober professional licensed chauffeur transport the patron's vehicle home by not taking the risk of having the patron drive their vehicle.

The information required on the Off the Road voucher is minimal but necessary for responsible operation of the program. The person initiating the call for the ride must complete basic information on the voucher such as the date and time, establishment name, location of the rides origination, the authorizing person's name and signature, the full name of the rider and the exact destination. The safe ride driver will ask the patron if they are covered with insurance or if they have insurance; the drivers will complete the driver's information part of the voucher. The remaining voucher information will be completed by the personnel at the participating establishments. Vouchers must be completely filled out.

In 2008 in Anchorage there were 2,777 DUI arrests out of this amount 453 resulted in accidents. In 2008 there were 16 total fatalities of which 8 resulted in an alcohol related fatality.

In 2008, Alaska experienced 62 fatalities of which 17 resulted in alcohol related fatal crashes.

In 2009, in Anchorage there were 2,604 DUI arrests of which 324 resulted in accidents. In 2009 there were 17 fatal accidents of which 7 were alcohol related. According to the Anchorage Police Department this number is down from 2008 by 4% and our plan is to continue to assist our police department in taking this percentage down every year. Not everyone will participate in the program, but we hope that with every ride taken a life could be saved.

In 2009, Alaska experienced 64 fatalities of which 20 resulted in alcohol related crashes.
In collaboration with the Anchorage Police Department and the Alaska Highway Safety Office ultimately would help reduce the amount of alcohol related fatalities by finding new and strategic measures to fight against impaired driving in general. We would like to see alcohol related DUI's reduced 1% by the end of 2010 and as of this writing, we can say that alcohol related accidents reduced by 4%. According to the Anchorage Police Department alcohol is no longer the main reason for DUI arrests. DUI arrests have increased because the amount of drug use (prescription and illegal) is on the rise in youth as well as adults. Even enough cough syrup while operating a vehicle can be classified as a DUI. We strongly believe through the power of education, we can help our citizens make the right choice. Conducting program awareness classes in the military bases will help partner our efforts in reducing drunken driving.

The overall result would be a reduction of drunk drivers which will benefit the community at large.

According to the Alaska Highway Safety Office in the State of Alaska in 2008, 17 out of 62 fatalities were alcohol related for a rate of 31%. Our motto "one ride taken can result in one life saved".

Currently there are 63 participating establishments. Since 2005 when the program began, over 821 individual rides have taken place and over 2379 vouchers have been sold.

Although the safe ride is free to the patron, program participants purchase ten vouchers at time at $10 each to support the program. Not all establishments use the vouchers for the complete safe ride; some establishment s use the vouchers when a patron is in need of a ride home without a vehicle; the only down side is that the voucher is used but not counted as an "off the road" ride.

In order to be able to maintain a ridership level that is not abused or under-utilized vouchers are assigned as they are purchased to each individual establishment. Vouchers are recorded on a spreadsheet as they are used and returned to us by the safe ride company. The patrons' information is confidential and kept for informational purpose only.

RE: Request for Hearing - SB82 – Foster Care Licensing/State Custody "An Act relating to the procedures and jurisdiction of the Department of Health and Social Services for the care of children who are in state custody; relating to court jurisdiction and findings pertaining to children who are in state custody; and modifying the licensing requirements for foster care."

Representative Gatto,

You currently have in your possession SB82 – Foster Care Licensing/State Custody. SB82 mirrors HB33, a bill that was originally introduced by Representative Les Gara. I was asked to introduce legislation that mirrored HB33 in an effort to get this important bill moving and hopefully passed.

SB82 modifies various provisions in Title 47, making small but very significant changes that prioritize the needs of youth in foster care. This legislation addresses permanent planning for children in custody under "Another Planned Permanent Living Arrangement (APPLA);" modifies licensing procedures; outlines court requirements for release or termination of custody by the courts; outlines "compelling reason" standards for youth with APPLA permanency goals; and provides a provision to support placement of siblings into the same foster home.

This legislation is supported by the department and carries a zero fiscal note. I would greatly appreciate your consideration in scheduling this important bill for hearing as soon as possible. Please contact Celeste Hodge at 465-4906 if you have any questions.

Thank you.

SPONSOR STATEMENT

SENATE BILL 82-"Foster Care Licensing/State Custody"

SB 82 modifies various provisions in Title 47, which prioritizes the needs of children in state custody. This legislation seeks to:

1.Achieve Permanency for Older Children in Foster Care)
Permanency for children in OCS custody is best achieved through reunification with the child's parent, or failing that option, through adoption or guardianship. If these three options are not available, another form of permanency is through APPLA ("Another Planned Permanent Living Arrangement"). This bill seeks to make sure the APPLA option is not chosen unnecessarily by providing guidelines for both OCS and the court as to when APPLA should be used.

2. Presumption to Keep Siblings Together
Although OCS attempts to keep siblings together when they enter foster care, this bill creates a statutory presumption that siblings be placed in the same home when possible and when such a placement is in the siblings' best interests. When the children cannot be in the same home, this bill requires an OCS supervisor to document in the file the efforts made and the reason for the separation.

3. Early Release of Custody
When OCS files a motion to release a child from state custody before the custody order expires, this bill requires OCS and the court to take extra steps to ensure that the child and guardian ad litem have ample notice of the motion and that the release is in the child's best interests.

4. Foster Home Licensing Variance Process
If a potential foster home cannot meet the building codes required to be a licensed foster home, this bill will allow a variance to be granted if the home is consistent with construction of other homes in the community and is otherwise a safe environment for the child.

5. Streamlining Application Process for foster parents
This bill requires that paperwork required for foster parent licensing be streamlined as much as possible.

6. Housekeeping
The bill includes changes to the statute providing for retention of jurisdiction by a court to make it consistent with last year's legislation to extend departmental custody or supervision to age 21.

TO: Representative Les Gara
Attn: Amanda Metivier

FROM: Jean M. Mischel
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional summary of the above-described bill.

As a preliminary matter, note that a sectional summary of a bill should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill and the bill itself is the best statement of its contents. If you would like an interpretation of the bill as it may apply to a particular set of circumstances, please advise.

Section 1. Provides a short title for the bill.

Section 2. Amends the court findings required for establishing another planned permanent living arrangement for a child in state custody.

Section 3. Adds a presumption in favor of placement of a child in state custody with a sibling.

Section 4. Makes changes to the court jurisdiction provisions pertaining to the age of a child in state custody up to the person's 21st birthday, consistent with HB 126, passed by the 26th Legislature.

Section 5. Amends the evidentiary standard for placement of a child in state custody by the Department of Health and Social Services ("department") to take into account a foster care license waiver, variance, or exemption.

Section 6. Requires the department to continue a search for an adoptive parent or guardian except as provided in this section. Requires the department to enroll a child in state custody in a reading program in certain circumstances. Modifies the requirements and adopts a "compelling reason" standard for the department to recommend another planned permanent living arrangement for a child in state custody. Provides a "reasonable efforts" standard for placing children with siblings. Defines terms.

Section 7. Provides for a foster care license variance in certain circumstances and requires the department to simplify licensing paperwork.

Analysis

CSSSSB 82 has zero fiscal impact on the Department of Health and Social Services. This bill addresses permanent planning for children in custody under "Another Planned, Permanent Living Arrangement "(APPLA); modifies licensing procedures; outlines court requirements for release or termination of custody by the courts; outlines "compelling reason" standards for youth with APPLA permanency goals; provides a provision to support placement of siblings into the same foster home; and adds a new provision requiring the streamlining of the foster parent application process and the approval of building code variance requests under specified circumstances. No additional costs are anticipated.

Following is information on state legislation around Another Permanent Planned Living Arrangement as a permanency goal for children in foster care. Also, below is information on states that allow for the reinstatement of parental rights (a strategy states may use to reduce the use of APPLA as a permanency option).

- Reinstatement of Parental Rights

Several states have also passed legislation that allows for the reinstatement of parental rights following termination of parental rights. The laws were developed in response to children who were aging out of the foster care system and re-establishing ties with parents and family members.

The Honorable Les Gara
Alaska House of Representatives
716 W. 4th Ave. Suite 310
Anchorage AK. 99501-2133

Dear Representative Gara,

In light of the postponement of our scheduled meeting regarding the status of 2010 foster care reform efforts I wanted to update you on the issues. I look forward to meeting with you in the near future, and to working with you to further improve the lives of Alaska's children and youth in foster care.

In advance of a meeting, I want to touch on some of the points you raised and inform you of some of the progress that has been achieved since your letter of October 12.

Regarding the implementation of the provisions of HB 126, a small number of youth in the past have been released from foster care when continued care would have been to their benefit. Changes in our IL procedures, effective October 1, 2010 have made Regional Independent Living Specialists (RILS) responsible for developing transition plans for all youth age 17 and older. In light of HB 126, transition plans will be revised to include a thorough review of continued support and future requirements if the youth chooses to re-enter custody at a later date.

Recent federal changes to the Fostering Connections Act, allows states to pursue federal reimbursements for foster care for youth to age 21. However, the federal requirements indicate that should states choose to accept reimbursement for youth to age 21, the states must also open this option to youth to age 21 for the adoption and guardianship subsidy programs as well. HB 126 is currently funded with general fund and anticipated federal reimbursement amounts. OCS will implement HB 126 extended foster care using only general funds until it can be determined whether or not existing general fund will adequately support the program or extended adoption and guardianship subsidies will be pursued.

It has been, and continues to be the policy of OCS to utilize transportation funds to allow foster youth who move between placements to stay in their original school for the remainder of the school term. The additional $80,000 for FY 11 will assist us in implementing this policy further.

Since we received your letter an RFP, Mentoring for Independent Living was posted on November 4, 2010. Although the service area is statewide, the proposal evaluation committee will favor those proposing to serve two or more population centers. The deadline for proposals has been extended to December 10, 2010.

In the Fall, 2010 40 youth received funding to attend the University of Alaska, AVTEC and other colleges out of state. Through coordination with the University of Alaska, nine supplemental tuition waivers were issued to youth attending the University of Alaska. This was in addition to the 10 Presidential Tuition Waivers, for a grand total of 19 tuition waivers.

Additional waivers will be issued for the Spring, 2011 semester. Regional Independent Living Specialists contacted all youth who received a waiver and are providing case management services. The RILS are utilizing the additional funds to provide occupational and post secondary training opportunities to youth both in and out of custody. We currently have youth utilizing these funds at UAF Community & Technical College and in UAF's Nurse Aide Program. Meetings have taken place with the Department of Labor and Workforce Development to create coordination of services to utilize funds for Career Exploration and to provide for Apprenticeship and On-the-Job training opportunities for foster care youth.

I understand your concern with the case load of the four RILS and share your belief that two additional staff will positively impact the outcomes of youth coming out of care. Posting of these jobs is anticipated to take place in the near future.

Regarding the housing assistance funds, to date a total seven youth have utilized these funds for a total of 28 months of housing assistance. We are continuing to make efforts to promote this assistance and are contacting all youth out of care, in each region of the state.

With respect to the formal FosterWear cards, they have been printed and sent out to all licensed providers. Cards for unlicensed providers have been sent to the field offices as well. We regularly print FosterWear information in the Alaska Center For Resource Families (ACRF) newsletter and Izabel Bower's is currently working on a "print mailer" that will be sent out after the holidays.

I am also looking forward to working with you on the new initiatives you outlined in your letter. Dee Pearson and Mike Sobosinski of UAA have discuss peer mentorship in general and will be meeting again to discuss this service delivery more in depth. Dee is exploring a pilot project for peer mentorships for youth attending the University Fall, 2011.

Dear Senator Davis,

Thank you for introducing SB 82, a bill focused on improving Alaska's foster care program and protecting children to the best of our ability. Covenant House Alaska (CHA) serves Alaska's homeless and at-risk youth through our Crisis Center, Transitional Living Programs, Healthcare and Educational/Employment Support. CHA appreciates your commitment to keeping Alaska's youth as safe and healthy as possible.

SB 82 enacts the following changes to protect foster care youth:

> (1) SB 82 requires the department to seek permanency for all youth and, if positive permanency plans are unsuccessful, imposes substantive and procedural protections around planning for youth to be placed in another planned permanent living arrangement;
> (2) SB 82 simplifies the application process to become a foster home and allows the department to waive strict compliance with building code requirements for foster and relative placements if the placement is in the child's best interest and is otherwise preferable and safe; and
> (3) SB 82 requires the department to make all reasonable efforts to place siblings together.

All of the changes listed above evince strong policy underpinnings. Specific to CHA's population of homeless and runaway youth, the provisions regarding waiving strict building code compliance for relatives' homes and placing siblings together are particularly noteworthy. Research indicates that foster care youth who are placed with siblings in the home of a relative or family friend, usually in a familiar community, tend to run away less frequently.

These statutory changes may be viewed as measures targeted to prevent youth homelessness. And, just as important, if a youth comes to Covenant House from the foster care system who qualifies for extended court supervision, it appears that this legislation would allow CHA to work with the department to continue to provide services for the youth.

Thank you for your efforts at protecting Alaska's vulnerable children. Please do not hesitate to contact me if I can answer any questions or provide further feedback on SB 82.

Re: Support for HB 33

Dear Representative Gara,

On behalf of the Alaska Mental Health Board and the Advisory Board on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse, I would like to express our thanks and appreciation for the commitment that you and your co-sponsors have made to improving the lives of Alaskan children in foster care. HB 33 continues that process of system improvement, and we support the small but very significant changes that better prioritize the needs of foster children.

Being removed from your home, even when that home is not a safe or healthy environment, is traumatic. Being removed from your home and then separated from your brothers and sisters compounds the initial harm caused by abuse or neglect exponentially. While we know this from research and study, the Boards recognized fully the devastating effect this separation has on foster children when we heard from youth involved in the 2011 Youth Policy Summit. No child should have to beg, plead and fight for years to see a brother or sister, and yet we heard how this is the case for far too many youth who grow up in foster care.

HB 33 also prioritizes family connections as an important source of strength, support and resiliency for children and youth who experience abuse or neglect by making family placements easier in rural Alaska. Too often children in rural Alaska are placed with foster parents in urban communities rather than with relatives in villages, with the justification that the rural homes fail to meet foster care licensing standards. How can an aunt in a village where no one has running water ever hope to care for a niece or nephew who is in need, if there is no reasonableness standard in determining a safe physical environment for placement? HB 33 provides that element of reason to family placement decisions.

We are grateful for your continued advocacy for Alaska's children and are glad to be able to support HB 33.

Sincerely,

Dear Representative Gara:
The National Association of Social Workers (NASW) – Alaska Chapter, a membership organization that represents over 500 social workers across the State of Alaska, supports The Alaska Foster Family Protection Act.

The mission of NASW is to enhance the effective functioning and well-being of individuals, families, and communities through its work and through its advocacy. The Alaska Foster Family Projection act upholds this mission by ensuring that Alaska's most vulnerable children can more easily transition into safe and permanent homes. The increase in the number of rural foster care placements is especially crucial so youth in rural Alaska can continue to live in their home communities. Research demonstrates that youth from rural communities, and specifically Alaska Native youth, have more promising futures when they are able to maintain connection with their communities and tribes.

Thank you for your consistent attention to child welfare issues in Alaska. We look forward to working with you on behalf of children and families in our state.

RE: HB 33: Stability and Opportunity for Foster Youth

Dear Representative Gara,

The members of the Alaska Behavioral Health Association would like to inform you of their support for this legislation. It's intent is consistent with the goals and values of the members that provide services in our state and also provides opportunities to expand a system that is currently incapable of meeting the needs of youth.

Our providers have experienced tremendous difficulties in placing children and youth back in their home communities when a foster home is required due to the home situation of the biological parents. Frequently, homes may be available but they don't meet the more ridged codes and standards that govern construction in metropolitan areas. While no one would ever want a child placed in an unsafe environment, we are aware that minor code violations can be prohibitively expensive to repair and a foster home can be lost.

We hear reports from providers that it often takes up to six months or more from the time a family begins the application process and they are finally able to accept a child in their home. We appreciate the careful attention to ensure that a child is placed in a safe environment; however, redundancy and over-attention can become a barrier rather than a safe guard.

Thank you for your commitment to foster children and working to make their lives better.

RE: SB 82: Stability and Opportunity for Foster Youth

Dear Senator Davis,

Alaska Association of Homes for Children (AAHC) thanks you for introducing legislation to improve the service delivery of foster care. Several agencies within our association provide foster care and many of the youth we serve benefit from this critical service.

Unfortunately, we all have witnessed children on long waiting lists for a viable foster care placement for various reasons. The intent of SB 82 provides concrete solutions to streamline the process for foster parents, develop resources for children, and reinforce the goals related to permanency planning.

Placing children in rural areas poses additional challenges related to numerous licensing issues. It can be extremely difficult finding foster homes that meet state licensing requirements. Licensing variances for homes failing to meet specific codes when indicated would provide opportunities for families to open up their homes to provide care for foster children.

Foster care provides for a very cost effective way of helping children. Allowing more families to commit to the many Alaskan children waiting for a quality home creates a win win opportunity for all. AAHC truly appreciates your continued efforts to assist with the foster care system in Alaska.

The provisions within your bill would provide a wise investment in the health and wellbeing of Alaska's children.

Thank you,

Brad Ohs

RE: HB 33: Stability and Opportunity for Foster Youth

Dear Representative Gara:

This letter is to inform you of the strong support the Administration and Board of Directors have for the above-mentioned bill. It's intent is consistent with the goals and values of the Treatment Foster Care Program operated by Alaska Children's Services and provides opportunities to expand a system that is currently incapable of meeting the needs of youth.

We are particularly appreciative of the section regarding permanency placement. As you have stated the ultimate goal in foster care is to place a child in a good, stable, permanent home through adoption, guardianship, or reunification. Frequently, however, in our haste to find a child a bed or a roof over their head, we lose sight of this goal. By adding additional oversight to the permanency planning process, this goal can be reached.

Alaska Children's Services has experienced tremendous difficulties in placing children and youth back in their home communities when a foster home is required due to the home situation of the biological parents. Frequently, homes may be available but don't meet the more rigid codes and standards that govern construction in metropolitan areas. While no one would ever want to place a child in an unsafe environment, we are aware that minor code violations can be prohibitively expensive to repair and a foster home can be lost.

Alaska Children's Services has three full-time professional staff who comprise the treatment foster care licensing department. They report that it frequently takes up to six months or more from the time a family begins the application process and they are finally able to accept a child in their home. We appreciate the careful attention to ensure that a child is placed in a safe environment; however, redundancy and over-attention can become a barrier rather than a safeguard.

Overall, thank you very much for your continued commitment to one of our most vulnerable populations, our foster children, and please advise if there is more we can do to support this legislation.

Representative Les Gara
Alaska State Legislature

Dear Representative Gara:

I am writing in support of HB33, the legislation you have proposed relating to foster care in Alaska. Denali Family Services (DFS) is a community mental health agency that provides therapeutic foster care to many children in the custody of the State / Office of Children's Services. DFS is also a child placement agency and in that role, processes foster home applications and licenses foster home in cooperation with OCS (i.e., the license is still a State foster care license). As an agency licensing foster homes, we support using the variance for homes in rural communities as long as the home is a safe environment and there are adequate ways to exit the home in case of a fire.

Denali Family Services serves many adolescents who are moving from care to independence and I am especially pleased to see the language changes that will make extending foster care to age 21 easily accessible for youth who want to take advantage of that opportunity. For youth who do not have a support system in place, those additional three years can make a huge difference in their maturity and readiness to survive on their own.

With regard to the application process for foster parents, DFS has significantly reduced our paperwork requirements in the last two years. In addition, effective this fiscal year, DFS will be utilizing a new foster parent training curricula (Presley Ridge). This curricula offers foster care providers in-depth, specialized training and OCS has agreed that DFS' foster parents who complete the Presley Ridge training will not have to take the OCS CORE training. This change will provide foster parents with more specialized training while maintaining the total hours at a number (per year) that is manageable.

On behalf of Denali Family Services, I am writing in support of HB33. Should you need additional information, please feel free to contact me at 907-222-2322.

If a legislator or legislative employee asks the committee to keep any part of the disclosure confidential and a quorum of the committee determines by vote of a majority of committee members that making the entire disclosure public would cause an unjustifiable invasion of personal privacy, the committee may elect to publish only the fact that a person has participated in the program and the amount of benefit that the unnamed person received. The committee shall maintain the disclosure of the name of the person as confidential and may only use the disclosure in a proceeding under AS 24.60.170. the bearer to admission to the event, to entertainment, to food or beverages, or to other gifts or services in connection with [INVOLVED IN] the charity event;

(C) a gift that is unconnected with the recipient's legislative status and is from a member of the legislator's or legislative employee's immediate family;

(c) Notwithstanding (a)(1) of this section, it is not a violation of this section for a person who is a legislator or legislative employee to accept

(1) hospitality, other than hospitality described in (4) of this subsection,

(B) at a social event or meal;

(2) discounts that are available

(A) generally to the public or to a large class of persons to which the person belongs; or

(B) when on official state business, but only if receipt of the discount benefits the state;

(3) food or foodstuffs indigenous to the state that are shared generally as a cultural or social norm;

(4) travel and hospitality primarily for the purpose of obtaining information on matters of legislative concern;

(5) gifts from the immediate family of the person; in this paragraph, "immediate family" means

(A) the spouse of the person;

(B) the person's domestic partner;

(C) a child, including a stepchild and an adoptive child, of the person or of the person's domestic partner;

(D) a parent, sibling, grandparent, aunt, or uncle of the person;

(d) A legislator or legislative employee who accepts a gift under (c)(4) of this section that has a value of $250 or more or a ticket to a charity event or gift in connection with a charity event under (c)(10) of this section that has a value of $250 or more shall disclose to the committee, within 60 [30] days after receipt of the gift, the name and occupation of the donor and the approximate value of the gift. The committee shall maintain disclosures relating to gifts under (c)(6) of this section as confidential records and may only use, or permit a committee employee or contractor to use, a disclosure under (c)(6) of this section in the investigation of a possible violation of this section or in a proceeding under AS 24.60.170. If the disclosure under (c)(6) of this section becomes part of the record of a proceeding under AS 24.60.170, the confidentiality provisions of that section apply to the disclosure.

 Sec. 9. AS 24.60.080(h) is amended to read:

approved by the committee if the services are used for legislative purposes. The committee shall approve training under a program of the University of Alaska and training under 29 U.S.C. 2801 - 2945 (Workforce Investment Act of 1998).

* Sec. 10. AS 24.60.105 is amended by adding a new subsection to read:

(d) A person may submit a written request to refrain from making a disclosure that is required by this chapter if making the disclosure would violate state or federal law, including the United States Constitution and the Constitution of the State of Alaska, or a rule, adopted formally by a trade or profession, that state or federal law requires the person to follow. The committee shall approve or deny the request, or require further justification from the person making the request. At the request of the committee or a person authorized to act on behalf of the committee, a person who seeks to refrain from making a disclosure under this subsection shall provide the committee with justification in writing, and the committee may review the written justification to determine whether it is sufficient.

* Sec. 11. AS 24.60.112 is repealed and reenacted to read:

Sec. 24.60.112. Applicability to legislative interns and volunteers. A legislative intern or legislative volunteer shall be considered to be a legislative employee for purposes of compliance with AS 24.60.030 - 24.60.039, 24.60.060, 24.60.080, 24.60.085, 24.60.158 - 24.60.170, 24.60.176, and 24.60.178. If a person believes that a legislative intern or legislative volunteer has violated the provisions of one of those sections, the person may file a complaint under AS 24.60.170. The provisions of AS 24.60.170 apply to the proceeding.

* Sec. 12. AS 24.60.130(h) is amended to read:

(h) A member is disqualified from participating as a member in any proceeding before the committee involving a complaint against the member or an employee whose work is supervised by the member or an advisory opinion requested by the member. If a regular legislative member of the committee is disqualified under this subsection from participating in a proceeding involving a complaint, the member's alternate shall be designated under AS 24.60.131 [(n) OF THIS SECTION].

* Sec. 13. AS 24.60.130(o) is amended to read:

(o) Notwithstanding (h) [AND (n)] of this section and AS 24.60.131, if a complaint before the committee alleges a violation of this chapter by a group of legislators that includes a legislative member of the committee and that member's alternate, the member and alternate member are disqualified from serving on the committee with regard to the complaint. If the two disqualified members of the committee are members of the majority organizational caucus, the presiding officer of the house in which the two disqualified members serve shall appoint from that house an alternate to serve with regard to the complaint. If one of the two disqualified legislative members of the committee is not a member of the majority organizational caucus, the leader of the minority organizational caucus with the greatest number of members shall appoint from that house an alternate to serve with regard to the complaint. If a complaint alleges a violation of this chapter that includes all legislative members of the majority organizational caucus of one house, the presiding officer of that house shall appoint from the other house an alternate to serve with regard to the complaint. If the complaint alleges a violation of this chapter that includes all legislative members of a minority organizational caucus of one house, the leader of that minority organizational caucus shall appoint from the other house an alternate to serve with regard to the complaint.

* Sec. 14. AS 24.60 is amended by adding a new section to read:

Sec. 24.60.131. Alternate members. (a) When appointing members of the legislature to serve on the committee under AS 24.60.130(b), the speaker of the house of representatives or the president of the senate, as appropriate, shall appoint an alternate member for each regular member. The alternate member shall have the same qualifications for appointment to the committee as the regular member for whom the alternate stands as alternate. The alternate member's appointment is subject to confirmation as required for appointment of the regular member.

(b) When selecting public members to serve on the committee under AS 24.60.130(b), the Chief Justice of the Alaska Supreme Court shall select one alternate public member. The alternate public member's selection is subject to ratification as required for selection of the regular public members.

(c) Subject to (d) of this section, if a regular member of the committee or a subcommittee is unable to participate in a proceeding other than a proceeding under

AS 24.60.170, the chair of the committee or subcommittee that holds the proceeding shall designate the regular member's alternate to participate in place of the regular member at the proceeding, and the alternate shall participate for the duration of that proceeding unless the alternate is unable to participate.

(d) If a regular member of the committee or a subcommittee or an alternate member appointed under (a) or (b) of this section participates at the commencement of a proceeding under AS 24.60.170, the member shall participate for the duration of the proceeding unless the member is disqualified under AS 24.60.130(h) or is unable to continue participating. If the participating member is disqualified under AS 24.60.130(h) or becomes unable to participate, the chair of the committee or subcommittee that holds the proceeding shall designate the member's alternate to participate in place of the member for the duration of the proceeding unless the alternate is disqualified or is unable to participate.

(e) If both a regular legislative member and that member's alternate appointed under (a) of this section are not available to participate at the commencement of a proceeding under AS 24.60.170 because they are disqualified under AS 24.60.130(h), the presiding officer of the house in which the two members serve shall appoint from that house an alternate and designate that alternate to participate in the proceeding; however, if the two members who are not available to participate are not members of the majority organizational caucus, the leader of the minority organizational caucus with the greatest number of members shall appoint from that house an alternate and designate that alternate to participate in the proceeding.

(f) A designation under (c) - (e) of this section shall be treated as confidential to the same extent that the identity of the subject of a complaint is required to be kept confidential.

* Sec. 15. AS 24.60.155 is repealed and reenacted to read:

Sec. 24.60.155. Legislative ethics course. (a) A person who is a legislator, legislative employee, public member of the committee, legislative intern, or legislative volunteer shall complete a legislative ethics course administered by the committee under AS 24.60.150(a)(4) within 10 days of the first day of the first regular session of each legislature or, if the person first takes office or begins service after the 10th day of that session, within 30 days after the person takes office or begins service. The committee may grant a person additional time to complete the course required by this section.

(b) A legislative intern or legislative volunteer who serves fewer than 30 days in one legislature is not subject to the requirements under (a) of this section.

 Sec. 16. AS 24.60.260(a) is amended to read:

(a) A person required to make a disclosure under this chapter may not knowingly make a false or deliberately misleading or incomplete disclosure to the committee or to the Alaska Public Offices Commission. A person who files a disclosure after a deadline set by this chapter or by a regulation adopted [BY THE COMMITTEE OR] by the Alaska Public Offices Commission has violated this chapter and may be subject to imposition of a fine as provided in (c) of this section or AS 24.60.240.

 Sec. 17. AS 24.60.990(a)(11) is amended to read:

(11) "legislative employee" means a person, other than a legislator, who is compensated by the legislative branch in return for regular or substantial personal services, regardless of the person's pay level or technical status as a full-time or part-time employee, independent contractor, or consultant; it includes public members and staff of the committee; it does not include individuals who perform functions that are incidental to legislative functions, [INCLUDING SECURITY, MESSENGER, MAINTENANCE, AND PRINT SHOP EMPLOYEES,] and other employees designated by the committee;

 Sec. 18. AS 24.60.130(n) is repealed.

SENATOR JOHN COGHILL

HCS CSSB 89(STA)
Version O

This bill is a product of discussions by the Select Committee of Legislative Ethics over the past couple of years. There are some clarifications of existing statutes and amendments to current law to accommodate issues arisen dealing with confidentiality and meeting quorums.

The bill creates three exceptions to the bright line for legislators and legislative staff to follow for assisting constituents with problems they encounter with state agencies. Once an issue has been appealed to an administrative hearing officer, the legislator or legislative staffer may no longer make contacts with the agency, unless that person is a licensed professional to represent a person in such a proceeding and is being compensated for that representation. There are also provisions for inadvertent ex parte contact.

SB 89 clarifies that a gift of a ticket from a lobbyist to a charity event sanctioned by Legislative Council cannot exceed $249.99. It also further describes a contribution to a charity event as a ticket to a charity event or a gift in connection with the charity event.

It also extends the reporting deadline for reporting gifts of travel and from charitable events from 30 to 60 days and expands legislative ethics training to legislative volunteers or educational trainees who are on the job for more than 30 days.

The bill adds public members of the ethics committee to the statute prohibiting members from knowingly making unauthorized disclosure of confidential information. This bill clarifies that disclosures prohibited by state and federal confidentiality laws are not required by the Select Committee on Legislative Ethics

Lastly, the bill adds a statute creating an alternate public member and would allow any alternate member of the ethics committee who participates in the beginning of a proceeding to participate in the entire proceeding. The Chief Justice of the Alaska Supreme Court would appoint the alternate for the public members.

HCS CSSB 89(STA) Legislative Ethics Bill Summary of Version O

Sec. 1. Replaces "lawful gratuity" with "gift" to make section of law consistent with the usage of "gift".

Sec. 2. Provides exceptions to the bright line for legislators or staff being actively involved in constituent problems with the State. Once the issue is assigned to an administrative hearing the involvement of the legislative office ceases. Exceptions are included for lawyers, witnesses, and a provision for inadvertent exparte contact.

Sec. 3. Adds a definition for "administrative hearing" to ethics statutes.

Sec. 4. Eliminates requirement of committee to compile lists of financial disclosure statements. They must only maintain public records and forward them to chief clerk and senate secretary.

Sec. 5. Adds public members to statute prohibiting disclosure of confidential information.

Sec. 6. Clarifies that a ticket to a charity event from a lobbyist, or gifts received because of the ticket from a lobbyist cannot exceed $250.

Sec. 7. Further describes "a contribution to a charity event" by clarifying it could be a ticket to a charity event or a gift in connection with a charity event.

Sec. 8. Extend the reporting period for gifts of travel for the purpose of obtaining information on legislative matters and disclosure of gifts from charitable events from 30 days to 60 days.

Sec. 9. Grammatik correction replacing the word "trainee" with the word "intern".

Sec. 10. Allows for exceptions from disclosure under the legislative ethics law if it would be in violation of the state or federal constitution or state or federal law. The State Affairs Committee added language that includes exceptions for disclosures for a rule, adopted formally by a trade or profession, that state or federal law requires the person to follow. A written request with justification must be submitted to the committee.

Sec. 11. Requires a legislative intern to be compliant with the legislative ethics statutes.

Sec. 13. Adds cite for new section on Alternate Members to statute describing the committee, its structure and its duties.

✓ Trial Legal req.

SUBJECT: Title change may be needed; amendments to HCS CSSB 89(STA) (Work Order Nos. 27-LS0452\O.1 & O.2)

TO: Senator John Coghill
Attn: Rynnieva Moss

FROM: Dan Wayne
Legislative Counsel

Enclosed are the two draft amendments, O.1 and O.2, that you requested for the bill referenced above.

The Constitution of Alaska, article II, section 13 requires that the subject of each bill shall be expressed in the title. There may be an issue as to whether proposed amendment O.1 will require a title change to the bill that it is amending. If a title change is required to this house bill in the Senate, a joint resolution would be required to suspend Uniform Rules 24(c), 35, 41(b) and 42(e), which prohibit changes to a bill's title in the second house. Although amendment O.1 explicitly concerns the ostensible authority of the Select Committee on Legislative Ethics to establish disclosure deadlines by adopting regulations, it would probably fit within the title under "amending disclosure deadlines under the Legislative Ethics Act," on page 1, line 12, because it relates indirectly to disclosure deadlines in the Legislative Ethics Act.[1] On the other hand, it could be argued that the amendment does not fit within the title because it does not actually amend an existing deadline. If you want to exercise the most caution, the amendment could be revised to include a title change. If the title is changed, the committee may ask for a concurrent resolution at the time a committee substitute is prepared.

Senate Bill 94 Sponsor Statement

Senate Bill 94 would add a second verse to The Alaska's Flag Song. The late Carol Beery Davis wrote a beautiful second verse, which gives recognition to Alaska Natives and to Benny Benson, who designed the Alaskan flag.

Similar bills have been introduced in the past. Last year The Alaska's Flag Song was performed with both verses as the Senate gaveled in on the first day of session. Also last year, the Senator from District G introduced SB 43. It passed the Senate, but stalled in the House.

This year is the year to join me in supporting a long overdue addition of the second verse to the Alaska Flag Song. By passing this bill you will be recognizing history, our progress as a state and our first people.

BACKGROUND MATERIAL

Why a second verse for 'Alaska Flag Song'?

Editor's Note: A copy of the following letter to Betty Kjare, secretary of Pioneers of Alaska Auxiliary No. 8 in Fairbanks, was submitted for publication.

Dear Betty:

I have received your letter dated March 27, in which you objected to the adoption of the second verse of the "Alaska Flag Song."

I would like to explain to you why I introduced HB 117 and why I hope you will change your decision to oppose the bill.

No one loves the flag song any more than I do. For many years, I have sung it for groups, meetings, conventions, commencements and even for Gov. Bill Egan's memorial service here in Juneau. I offer the second verse out of deep respect for the first verse and for its recognition of Alaska's history. I believe the second verse complements the first verse and gives recognition not to one ethnic group, but to all Alaskans and their ability to work together in a unified and harmonious way.

The addition of a second verse has been discussed for many years by various groups. At one time, funds were inserted into the House's version of the budget to hold a contest for selecting a second verse. Carol Beery Davis was asked to write another verse to the flag song to recognize the contribution of Native Alaskans, who were here long before you or I, or even the Pioneers. She did so, and offered it as a gift to the State of Alaska. I was asked to support its adoption and to introduce a bill to make it officially recognized by the state. I did so, and it has passed the House.

In order to understand the special significance of this verse, you must know about Carol Beery Davis, a former poet laureate of Alaska. She is a 60-year resident of Juneau. Her husband, Trevor, was born here 84 years ago, and is the only living member of the original selection committee for the design of Alaska's flag, which selected Benny Benson's North Star and Big Dipper (to whom the second verse refers in lines 1 and 2). Carol has written dozens of books about Alaska, including "The Alaska Flag Song" book which is credited with helping to make the song so well-known. I have enclosed a copy of this book. She knew personally both Elinor Dusenbury and Marie Drake, the two women who decided to write the song and offer it to the state, just as Carol has done.

oneer, is still contributing to her loved state by offering this beautiful verse, a tribute to unity of all Alaskans:

"A Native lad chose the Dipper's stars
For Alaska's flag that there be no bars
Among our cultures..."

She is recognizing history and our progress as a state:

"Be it known
through years, the Natives' past has grown.
To share life's treasures, hand in hand,
To keep Alaska our Great Land."

She is focusing our attention on the natural beauty of our land and reminds us of the treasures of its beauty:

"We love the northern, midnight sky,
The mountains, lakes, and streams nearby.
The great North Star with its steady light
Will guide all cultures, clear and bright,
With nature's flag to Alaskans dear,
The simple flag of a last frontier."

It is hard for me to understand why anyone who has read these words could object to them. It is impossible for me to understand how anyone who knows who Carol Beery Davis is and the contributions she has made to art, music and literature in Alaska could object to her offering this beautiful gift.

Why did this legislator propose HB 117? Out of respect for a beautiful Alaskan lady who has offered a beautiful verse to a beautiful song about a great state.

Sincerely,
Rep. Fran Ulmer

SB 98: Biometrics
SPONSOR STATEMENT

"Civilization is the progress toward a society of privacy." – Ayn Rand

Article 1, Section 22 of Alaska's State Constitution explicitly states that "the right of the people to privacy is recognized and shall not be infringed." This constitutional right underscores Alaskans' abiding desire for privacy. Much like genetic information, biometric information holds great promise for fields such as medicine, law enforcement and security. This bill is meant to ensure that Alaskan's constitutional right to privacy is protected by adopting common sense measures of accountability.

In 2004, the Alaska Legislature unanimously passed legislation outlawing the collection, analysis or storage of a law-abiding citizen's genetic information without their express written consent. This legislation was drafted in response to rapidly evolving technology that has the potential to discriminate against citizens based on personal genetic information that would otherwise be private. SB 98 applies the same privacy protections to biometric information, as it is just as permanent and irreplaceable as genetic information.

The term "biometric information" refers to any information about an individual based on their unique behavioral or physiological characteristics. The most commonly known form of biometric information is a person's fingerprints, but also includes hand geometry recognition, voice recognition, iris and retinal scans, and vein recognition.

Data merchants today can exploit Alaskans' private biometric information for financial gain. Certain genetic disorders and medical conditions can be strongly correlated from biometric information. Because it so easy for data to be sold or stolen in today's digital world, Alaska needs to be sure to have strong legal measures in place to protect Alaskans.

Senate Bill 98 will protect Alaskans' biometric information. This legislation is all protecting sensitive information. The bill has strong bipartisan support, passed the Senate unanimously, and will ensure the privacy of all Alaskans is protected.

MEMORANDUM January 17, 2012

SUBJECT: CSSB 98(JUD) relating to biometric information
(Work Order No. 27-LS0661\R)

TO: Senator Bill Wielechowski
Attn: Samuel Gottstein

FROM: Terry Bannister
Legislative Counsel

You have requested a sectional summary of the above-described bill. As a preliminary matter, note that a sectional summary of a bill should not be considered an authoritative interpretation of the bill and the bill itself is the best statement of its contents.

Section 1. Adds a new chapter, AS 18.14, relating to biometric information.

Sec. 18.14.010(a) prohibits a person from collecting another person's biometric information unless the person first notifies the individual about the collection and receives the individual's full consent. The notification must indicate the specific purpose for which the information will be used and how long it will be kept. The consent may be written, electronic, or in another form that can be documented.

Sec. 18.14.010(b) allows an individual to revoke or amend consent at any time, unless the information was needed for a specific authorized law enforcement, security, or fraud prevention purpose.

Sec. 18.14.020(a) prohibits a collector and the collector's contractor from disclosing, transferring, or distributing an individual's biometric information, except to a contractor or to a person to authenticate the individual's identity.

Sec. 18.14.020(b) limits the disclosures, transfers, and distributions under (a) to the original purpose for which the information was collected.

Sec. 18.14.030 prohibits a person from selling biometric information. But does allow a contractor to sell the contractor's business and transfer the biometric information to the buyer.

Sec. 18.14.040 allows an individual to provide alternate identification to a person administering an occupational examination that requires identifying biometric information, if the alternate identification is acceptable to the person.

Sec. 18.14.050(a) requires a collector to remove an individual's biometric information from databases and storage systems and destroy the information within 120 days when the information is no longer needed or an individual requests the destruction in writing. This requirement is subject to other laws and court orders prohibiting the removal and destruction.

Sec. 18.14.050(b) directs the collector to notify the collector's contractor within 30 days that the collector must remove and destroy the information under this section.

Sec. 18.14.060 prohibits a collector from using biometric information for marketing or general surveillance purposes. But does allow a collector to use the information for a specific authorized security or fraud prevention purpose in addition to the specific purpose for which the information was collected.

Sec. 18.14.070 directs a collector and a contractor to store biometric information in a secure manner.

Sec. 18.14.080(a) allows an individual (except as provided in (b)) to bring a civil action for damages and a penalty against a person who knowingly violates this chapter. Increases the penalty if the violation resulted in profit or monetary gain.

Sec. 18.14.080(b) prohibits an action for damages and penalties against the state, state agencies, or officers or employees of the state or state agencies, for violations of or other claims under this chapter.

Sec. 18.14.085 lists certain exemptions from the chapter. Also removes from the chapter's coverage the retention of voices recorded for quality assurance purposes.

Sec. 18.14.090 defines terms for the chapter.

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

Biometrics Fact Sheet

- "Biometric Information" refers to any information about an individual based on their unique behavioral or physiological characteristics. The most commonly known form of biometric information is a person's fingerprints, but also includes hand geometry recognition, voice recognition, iris and retinal scans, and vein recognition.

- Many Alaskans are nervous about their biometric information being sold or stolen. Since biometric information is irreplaceable, this sharing of biometric data can cause Alaskans irreparable harm.

- Certain genetic disorders and medical conditions have been strongly correlated with biometric information, and customers could experience price discrimination based on facial recognition technology.

- Senate Bill 98 will ensure that biometric data is not disseminated to third parties without an individual's consent, and will only be used for the purposes for which it was collected. SB-98 does not ban the collection of biometric data; it simply requires consent for collection and prohibits the sale or unauthorized distribution of the data.

The Honorable Steve Thompson, Vice-Chair

Dear Representative Thompson:

I am writing to request a hearing for the House CS for CS for SB 98(HSS), "An Act relating to biometric information."

House CS for CS for SB 98(HSS) will protect Alaskan citizens from having their biometric information, such as fingerprints and iris images, from being collected and disseminated to third parties without their consent.

While the medical and law enforcement benefits of such biometric information is not in question, law-abiding citizens of the state should not be treated as criminals when being hired or taking a licensing exam.

Privacy is of vital importance to the people of Alaska, and House CS for CS for SB 98(HSS) is intended to ensure that the people are able to protect their most private forms of identification, while still allowing for reasonable, and lawful, use of biometrics throughout the state.

Included with this letter you will find:

1. Sponsor Statement and Fact Sheet
2. Current Version of the Bill (LSO661\L) as well as the previous version R as it passed the Senate
3. Zero Fiscal Note
4. Sectional Summary for version R, an explanation of changes and an adopted conceptual amendment
5. Articles detailing privacy concerns surrounding biometrics
6. Letters of Support
7. List of Alaskan Supporters
8. List of expected testimony

STATE OF ALASKA BILL NO. SB 98

Analysis

This bill provides a framework for all entities, including state agencies that collect, analyze, or distribute biometric information. The state uses biometric information in a number of instances, such as occupational licensing, back ground checks, etc... This bill provides specific rules as to the retention and destruction of biometric information and includes express exceptions for law enforcement, information collected by the DMV, and for uses that are authorized by state and federal law. Finally, although this bill includes a private right of action if this statute is violated, it also includes an immunity provision for state agencies. With this immunity provision, the fiscal impact of this legislation is zero.

Thank you for the opportunity to submit a written statement of support for the Health and Social Services Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 98.

The American Civil Liberties Union of Alaska represents thousands of members and activists throughout the State of Alaska who seek to preserve and expand individual freedoms and civil liberties guaranteed under the United States and Alaska Constitutions.

From a constitutional rights and privacy perspective, the ACLU of Alaska endorses protections for individuals' personal biometric information, and supports this Bill's goal of avoiding violations of privacy before they occur.

Need for Biometrics Legislation

Recent advances in genomics, bioinformatics and data mining are encouraging a worldwide proliferation of "gene banks" – large collections of biological samples that usually include genetic information derived from those samples, as well as linked medical, family history or lifestyle information. The use of these biological repositories for genetics research could lead to advances in public health, such as the identification of genetic factors in diseases, or the development of diagnostic tests. On the other hand, they also create an avenue for privacy infringements, stigmatization and discrimination, and improper commercial exchange of personal data.

The ACLU supports legislation to prevent privacy infringement and genetic discrimination. SB 98 can advance these goals.

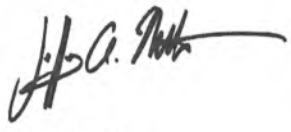
Protections Against Coerced Consent

Given the ability to condition the provision of necessary services on the disclosure of personal information, we also note that CS for SB 98 (HSS) is intended to protect against coerced "consent."

Given the sensitivity of biometric information, and the plethora of medical information obtainable from it, we endorse legislation that would protect Alaskans from improperly being compelled to waive their rights to protect their personal, private information.

Thank you again for the opportunity to share our support of this bill. Please feel free to contact the undersigned should you have any questions or seek additional information.

Sincerely,



Jeffrey Mittman

RE: Federal Privacy Protections for Biometric Information
LRS Report 12.192

You asked for information about federal biometric privacy protections. Specifically, you wished to know whether Senate Bill 98 includes any duplication of federal privacy standards. You were particularly interested in laws regulating collecting biometric information without authorization, secondary uses of the information, disclosing the information to a third party, and disposal of information after intended use.

In brief, Senate Bill 98 would provide broader privacy protections for biometric data than currently exist on a federal level in the United States, and does not duplicate federal protections.[1] There are currently no comprehensive federal privacy laws that specifically address biometric data. While federal laws do offer some protections for personal data, these laws are sectoral—that is, they are applicable only to data collected by a specific industry, for example, or only to data collected by the federal government. In addition, much federal legislation does not explicitly address biometric data in defining what personal data are covered; it would likely need to be determined on a case-by-case basis whether these laws apply to biometric data.

The US is one of very few developed nations without broad-based data privacy legislation. As a report on data privacy produced for the European Commission cautions, "the US approach is incoherent, sectorally-based, and ... legislative protections are largely reactive, driven by outrage at particular, narrow practices."[2] In the US, the most comprehensive privacy legislation has generally been passed at the state level, and this seems to be the case with biometric data privacy as well. While most state legislation addressing biometric data privacy is still fairly narrow in scope, we identified three states that have passed more comprehensive measures—Illinois, Indiana, and Texas.

Data privacy issues are not contained by political or national boundaries. Biometric data are used increasingly in passports and border clearance programs—for example, Canada's NEXUS border clearance program, which United States citizens may also participate in, uses iris image scans. In the private sector, electronic data are routinely transferred between countries—for example, the US company Facebook stores digital photos of users from scores of different countries. Since technology development may outpace regulation, many countries have forward-thinking data privacy protections to encompass emerging technologies. In Canada and the European Union (EU), the right to privacy encompasses personal information, and biometric data privacy is typically interpreted in the context of general data privacy. That is, the same laws that apply to data such as names and identification numbers are extended to such data as iris images and DNA.[3]

[1] We used bill version CSSB 98 (JUD) for this report. As you know, "biometrics" refers to the various ways humans can be identified through unique aspects of their bodies. CSSB 98 defines "biometric data" as including fingerprints, handprints, voices, facial mapping, retinal images, vein scans, hand geometry, and finger geometry. Given that other biometric identifiers exist—for example, body odor and walking characteristics—and given that other biometric systems may be developed in the future, a broader definition might prove more useful in the long term.

Compared to other forms of identification, biometric data are generally more difficult to steal or falsify, and biometric systems are widely believed to be more reliable and secure than other identification systems. However, there are many privacy concerns specific to biometric data collection. For instance, some biometric information, such as fingerprints and facial images, can be collected without a person's knowledge or consent, which raises concerns about covert surveillance. Additionally, there is no way short of surgery to reassign biometric data—a person can be given a new social security number but not a new fingerprint—so protections against the mishandling of biometric data are especially important.

[3] The right of privacy was added to the Alaska Constitution by a 1972 amendment in response to fears of electronic surveillance, and may be understood to include the right to privacy of personal information (Gordon Harrison, Alaska's Constitution: A Citizen's Guide, 4th ed., Legislative Affairs Agency, 2002). Other states with similar constitutional rights to privacy are Arizona, California, Florida, Hawaii, Illinois, Louisiana, Montana, South Carolina, and Washington.

Many countries, including Canada and EU member states, have a central Privacy Commissioner or equivalent position to enforce privacy laws. Citizens of these countries who believe their personal data have been mishandled, or who believe themselves to be victims of identity theft, have the right to file complaints to this office, which is responsible for investigating such cases. In the US there is no Privacy Commissioner or equivalent.[4]

US Federal Data Privacy Laws and Applications to Biometrics

While there are no broad federal laws specifically addressing biometric data privacy, the US government's increasing use of biometric technology in the last decade, largely in the interest of national security, has raised questions about how existing federal privacy laws apply to biometric data. The National Biometric Security Project (NBSP), a non-profit consultancy under contract to the National Security Agency, has prepared several helpful reports on the application of privacy laws to biometrics, both in the US and internationally.[5] The organization's report on US privacy laws notes that since September 11, 2001, the nation's concerns for national security have generally outweighed concerns for privacy, and laws protecting privacy are far more lax in the context of national security; the report, however, still recommends that the government protect any data collected against unauthorized use or disclosure.

Much federal data privacy legislation can be traced to recommendations made in 1973 by the Department of Health Education and Welfare, which advocated for broad federal legislation to protect personal data from being mishandled in light of new technology. Of federal laws that regulate government collection of information on people, the Privacy Act of 1974 is likely the one most applicable to biometric data.

There is no data privacy legislation governing the entire private sector in the US; rather, privacy legislation governs the concerns of specific industries, such as the Gramm-Leach Bliley Act of 1999, which protects information held by financial institutions. Many private sector laws could be deemed applicable to biometric data, but few explicitly mention biometrics. It is important to note that much private sector privacy legislation is reactionary rather than forward thinking, leading to very narrow protections such as the Video Privacy Protection Act of 1988, which prohibits the disclosure of an individual's rental history without consent and requires that video stores destroy rental records within a year after an account is closed.[6] In 2011, a bill was introduced in the US Senate which would potentially fill some of the gaps in data privacy protections in the private sector; this bill specifically mentions biometric data.

We discuss below what we believe to be the most significant and far-reaching federal data privacy laws; these laws are by no means exhaustive of federal data privacy legislation.

U.S. Department of Health Education and Welfare's Fair Information Practices, 1973

In 1972, the U.S. Department of Health Education and Welfare (HEW) Secretary Elliot Richardson, established an Advisory Committee on Automated Personal Data Systems to analyze potential harmful consequences from using new computer technology to collect, store, and use personal data about citizens. As Secretary Richardson wrote in a public interest determination to establish the committee, [5] The National Biometric Security Project's "Report on United States Federal Laws Regarding Privacy and Personal Data and Applications to Biometrics," along with other related reports, can be accessed at www.nationalbiometric.org.

[6] The Video Privacy Protection Act of 1988 (18 U.S.C. §§ 2710–2711), passed after Supreme Court nominee Robert Bork's video rental records were disclosed in a newspaper, may be one of the strongest consumer privacy protections in the US, according to the Electronic Privacy Information Center (www.epic.org).

> The use of automated data systems containing information about individuals is growing in both the public and private sectors . . . At the same time, there is a growing concern that automated personal data systems present a serious potential for harmful consequences, including infringement of basic liberties. This has led to the belief that special safeguards should be developed to protect against potentially harmful consequences for privacy and due process.

The committee's report, issued in 1973, recommended the enactment of a federal Code of Fair Information Practice for all personal data systems, based on the following principles:

1. There must be no personal data record-keeping systems whose very existence is secret.
2. There must be a way for a person to find out what information about the person is in a record and how it is used.
3. There must be a way for a person to prevent information about the person that was obtained for one purpose from being used or made available for other purposes without the person's consent.
4. There must be a way for a person to correct or amend a record of identifiable information about the person.
5. Any organization creating, maintaining, using, or disseminating records of identifiable personal data must assure the reliability of the data for their intended use and must take precautions to prevent misuses of the data.[7]

Although such omnibus legislation has not been enacted in the US, these principles are reflected to varying in degrees in subsequent US privacy legislation.

Privacy Act of 1974

Many of the HEW principles are embodied in the federal Privacy Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-579, codified at 5 USCA § 552a), which provides protections for records of U.S. citizens and legal resident aliens collected by federal agencies. Under the Act, federal agencies must adopt and publish standards regarding the collection, maintenance, use, and disclosure of personally identifiable records. There are provisions in the Act regulating the collection of information—requiring, for example, that each individual be informed of the purpose for which information is collected—and restricting the disclosure of this information to other parties. There are civil and criminal penalties attached to violations of the Act. The Act does not specifically address secondary use of information collected (that is, using the information for purposes other than which it was collected) or require disposal of information after use. The Act defines "record" as follows:

> the term "record" means any item, collection, or grouping of information about an individual that is maintained by an agency, including, but not limited to, his education, financial transactions, medical history, and criminal or employment history and that contains his name, or the identifying number, symbol, or other identifying particular assigned to the individual, such as a finger or voice print or a photograph.

To be covered by the Privacy Act, a record must be contained in a system of records, that is, "a group of any records under the control of any agency from which information is retrieved by the name of the individual or by some identifying number, symbol, or other identifying particular assigned to the individual." The NBSP notes that the Privacy Act's definition of "record" and "system of records" could be interpreted in varying ways regarding biometric data, and a case-by-case analysis would likely be needed to determine whether a particular use of biometrics is considered a "record maintained in a system of records." All the same, the NBSP recommends that government agencies collecting biometric data strictly comply with the Act, both to avoid potential penalties and to "help allay public fears that the system will be compromised."

The Privacy Act does not address data collected by private entities, or state or local governments. Additionally, there are several significant exceptions to the act, such as disclosures mandated under the Freedom of Information Act.

Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996 (HIPAA)

The Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (P.L. 104-191) of 1996 (HIPAA) includes a Privacy Rule, which protects "individually identifiable health information" held by health care institutions. "Individually identifiable health information" includes biometric data, both as health information itself (for example, genetic information) and as information that identifies a specific individual (for example, finger prints).

A key concept in the HIPAA Privacy Rule is minimum necessary use and disclosure of information—that is, only the minimum necessary amount of protected health information may be used and disclosed. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) Office for Civil Rights enforces the Privacy Rule of HIPAA, including investigating complaints by individuals that their health information has been mishandled. There are both civil and criminal penalties for violation of the Privacy Rule. It should be noted, however, that some organizations holding health information about individuals do not have to follow the Privacy Rule, including life insurers.[8]

Gramm-Leach Bliley Act of 1999

The Gramm-Leach Bliley Act of 1999 (P.L. 106-102, codified at 15 U.S.C. §§ 6801–6809) offers limited protections to "nonpublic personal information" held by financial institutions. The Act requires financial institutions to securely store personal data; inform consumers of the institution's policies on information sharing; and give consumers the option to opt-out of sharing of financial information with a third party. Whether the Act covers biometric data, however, hinges on whether biometric information is considered nonpublic personal information.

Proposed Legislation: Personal Data Privacy and Security Act of 2011

In 2011, Senate Bill 1151 was introduced in the US Senate. The bill is intended to increase safeguards for "sensitive personally identifiable information" and would require, among other things, that all business entities collecting sensitive information on 10,000 or more US persons establish standards for developing and implementing safeguards to protect the security of the information collected. This bill, however, does not specify these standards. The bill uses a very broad definition of "sensitive personal identifiable information," which explicitly mentions "unique biometric data such as a finger print, voice print, a retina or iris image, or any other unique physical representation."

Biometric Privacy in Other States—Illinois, Indiana, and Texas

As noted earlier, the most comprehensive legislation we found specifically addressing biometric data privacy in the US is at the state, not the federal, level. According to the National Conference of State Legislatures (NCSL), at least 18 states have passed legislation that addresses biometrics, but many of these laws are somewhat limited in scope—for example, many states regulate the collection of biometric data in the context of driver licensing, and several states require school districts to obtain parental consent before collecting biometric data from students. Based on a recent review by NCSL, it appears that Alaska is one of only a small number of states either considering or having passed comprehensive biometric data privacy legislation. Three states—Illinois, Indiana, and Texas—have passed such broad-based legislation. Of the three, only Indiana's legislation uses a definition of "personal information" sufficiently broad to encompass new identification systems developed in the future. We include copies of these laws as Attachment A.

[8] The US Department of Health and Human Services publishes information about the HIPAA Privacy Rule at http://www.hhs.gov/ocr/privacy/hipaa/understanding/index.html.

Illinois

Illinois, like Alaska, recognizes the right to privacy in its state constitution. The Illinois Biometric Information Privacy Act (740 ILCS 14/1 et seq.), enacted in 2008, addresses biometric data collected by private entities, but not governmental entities. Under the Act, biometric data may not be collected or disclosed without the subject's informed written consent, with few exceptions. The Act obligates entities in possession of biometric data to make a public schedule and create guidelines for destroying the data after the initial purpose for collection has been satisfied, or after three years, whichever comes first. The Act notes that the ramifications of biometric technology are not fully known, yet the definition of "biometric identifier" only includes the following: a retina or iris scan, fingerprint, voiceprint, or scan of hand or face geometry.

Indiana

Indiana Code 4-1-6, Fair Information Practices; Privacy of Personal Information, addresses data collected by governmental agencies, regulating the collection, maintenance, and use of personal information. "Personal information" is here given a broad definition that encompasses biometric identifiers:

> "Personal information" mean any information that describes, locates, or indexes anything about an individual or that affords a basis for inferring personal characteristics about an individual including, but not limited to, his education, financial transactions, medical history, criminal or employment records, finger and voice prints, photographs . . .

The code restricts the collection of personal information to that which is relevant and necessary to accomplish a statutory purpose, and directs state agencies to inform individuals regarding the use and confidentiality of the information. The code includes a right of data subjects to inspect, challenge, or correct their personal information.

Texas

Texas addresses biometric privacy in both its Government Code and Business and Commerce Code, thus covering both public and private sectors. Government Code Chapter 560, enacted in 2001, prohibits government bodies from disclosing biometric data without the subject's consent, and obligates these bodies to securely store and protect biometric data. The Business and Commerce Code Chapter 503, enacted in 2007, requires informed consent for collecting and disclosing biometric data; obligates secure storage; and requires disposal no later than one year after the data are no longer needed. "Biometric identifier" is defined here as "a retina or iris scan, fingerprint, voiceprint, or record of hand or face geometry."

International Perspective—OECD Guidelines

As noted above, most other industrialized countries have wide-ranging and forward-thinking data privacy legislation. There is a great deal of overlap in data privacy protections among these countries, in large part stemming from the Organization for Economic Co-Operation and Development's (OECD) 1980 Guidelines on the Protection of Privacy and Transborder Flows of Personal Data, a set of nonbinding principles that OECD member countries were recommended to adopt. Data privacy legislation reflects these guidelines in many member countries, including in the EU and Canada. The US, while a member of OECD, has not passed comparable federal legislation.[9]

The OECD Guidelines, which the organization recommends be applied to biometric data as well, are as follows:

- Collection Limitation Principle: There should be limits to the collection of personal data and any such data should be obtained by lawful and fair means and, where appropriate, with the knowledge or consent of the data subject.

[9] There are 34 OECD Members, including most EU countries, Australia, Canada, Chile, Israel, Japan, Korea, Mexico, New Zealand, and the US.

- Data Quality Principle: Personal data should be relevant to the purposes for which they are to be used, and, to the extent necessary for those purposes, should be accurate, complete and kept up-to-date.
- Purpose Specification Principle: The purposes for which personal data are collected should be specified not later than at the time of data collection and the subsequent use limited to the fulfilment of those purposes or such others as are not incompatible with those purposes and as are specified on each occasion of change of purpose.
- Use Limitation Principle: Personal data should not be disclosed, made available or otherwise used for purposes other than those specified in accordance with [The Purpose Specification Principle] except a) with the consent of the data subject; or b) by the authority of law.
- Security Safeguards Principle: Personal data should be protected by reasonable security safeguards against such risks as loss or unauthorised access, destruction, use, modification or disclosure of data.
- Openness Principle: There should be a general policy of openness about developments, practices and policies with respect to personal data. Means should be readily available of establishing the existence and nature of personal data, and the main purposes of their use, as well as the identity and usual residence of the data controller.
- Individual Participation Principle: An individual should have the right:

  a) to obtain from a data controller, or otherwise, confirmation of whether or not the data controller has data relating to him;

  b) to have communicated to him, data relating to him within a reasonable time; at a charge, if any, that is not excessive; in a reasonable manner; and in a form that is readily intelligible to him;

  c) to be given reasons if a request made under subparagraphs(a) and (b) is denied, and to be able to challenge such denial; and

  d) to challenge data relating to him and, if the challenge is successful to have the data erased, rectified, completed or amended.
- Accountability Principle: A data controller should be accountable for complying with measures which give effect to the principles stated above.

In a 2004 report, the OECD advocated that these guidelines, as well as its 2002 Guidelines for the Security of Information Systems and Networks, be embodied in any biometric system design and project.[10]

Indeed, most, if not all, OECD member countries have determined that existing data privacy legislation generally encompasses biometric data as well. For example, the Office of the Privacy Commissioner of Canada has identified major privacy concerns specific to biometric data collection and has analyzed how these concerns are addressed by privacy principles applicable to personal information in general.[11]

We hope this is helpful. If you have questions or need additional information, please let us know.

Information maintained by the Legislative Reference Bureau

Updating the database of the Illinois Compiled Statutes (ILCS) is an ongoing process. Recent laws may not yet be included in the ILCS database, but they are found on this site as Public Acts soon after they become law. For information concerning the relationship between statutes and Public Acts, refer to the Guide.

Because the statute database is maintained primarily for legislative drafting purposes, statutory changes are sometimes included in the statute database before they take effect. If the source note at the end of a Section of the statutes includes a Public Act that has not yet taken effect, the version of the law that is currently in effect may have already been removed from the database and you should refer to that Public Act to see the changes made to the current law.

Sec. 1. Short title. This Act may be cited as the Biometric Information Privacy Act.
(Source: P.A. 95-994, eff. 10-3-08.)

(740 ILCS 14/5)

Sec. 5. Legislative findings; intent. The General Assembly finds all of the following:

(a) The use of biometrics is growing in the business and security screening sectors and appears to promise streamlined financial transactions and security screenings.

(b) Major national corporations have selected the City of Chicago and other locations in this State as pilot testing sites for new applications of biometric-facilitated financial transactions, including finger-scan technologies at grocery stores, gas stations, and school cafeterias.

(c) Biometrics are unlike other unique identifiers that are used to access finances or other sensitive information. For example, social security numbers, when compromised, can be changed. Biometrics, however, are biologically unique to the individual; therefore, once compromised, the individual has no recourse, is at heightened risk for identity theft, and is likely to withdraw from biometric-facilitated transactions.

(d) An overwhelming majority of members of the public are weary of the use of biometrics when such information is tied to finances and other personal information.

(e) Despite limited State law regulating the collection, use, safeguarding, and storage of biometrics, many members of the public are deterred from partaking in biometric identifier-facilitated transactions.

(f) The full ramifications of biometric technology are not fully known.

(g) The public welfare, security, and safety will be served by regulating the collection, use, safeguarding, handling, storage, retention, and destruction of biometric identifiers and information.

Sec. 10. Definitions. In this Act:

"Biometric identifier" means a retina or iris scan, fingerprint, voiceprint, or scan of hand or face geometry. Biometric identifiers do not include writing samples, written signatures, photographs, human biological samples used for valid scientific testing or screening, demographic data, tattoo descriptions, or physical descriptions such as height, weight, hair color, or eye color. Biometric identifiers do not include donated organs, tissues, or parts as defined in the Illinois Anatomical Gift Act or blood or serum stored on behalf of recipients or potential recipients of living or cadaveric transplants and obtained or stored by a federally designated organ procurement agency. Biometric identifiers do not include biological materials regulated under the Genetic Information Privacy Act. Biometric identifiers do not include information captured from a patient in a health care setting or information collected, used, or stored for health care treatment, payment, or operations under the federal Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996. Biometric identifiers do not include an X-ray, roentgen process, computed tomography, MRI, PET scan, mammography, or other image or film of the human anatomy used to diagnose, prognose, or treat an illness or other medical condition or to further validate scientific testing or screening.

"Biometric information" means any information, regardless of how it is captured, converted, stored, or shared, based on an individual's biometric identifier used to identify an individual. Biometric information does not include information derived from items or procedures excluded under the definition of biometric identifiers.

"Confidential and sensitive information" means personal information that can be used to uniquely identify an individual or an individual's account or property. Examples of confidential and sensitive information include, but are not limited to, a genetic marker, genetic testing information, a unique identifier number to locate an account or property, an account number, a PIN number, a pass code, a driver's license number, or a social security number.

"Private entity" means any individual, partnership, corporation, limited liability company, association, or other group, however organized. A private entity does not include a State or local government agency. A private entity does not include any court of Illinois, a clerk of the court, or a judge or justice thereof.

"Written release" means informed written consent or, in the context of employment, a release executed by an employee as a condition of employment.

(Source: P.A. 95-994, eff. 10-3-08.)

Sec. 15. Retention; collection; disclosure; destruction.

(a) A private entity in possession of biometric identifiers or biometric information must develop a written policy, made available to the public, establishing a retention schedule and guidelines for permanently destroying biometric identifiers and biometric information when the initial purpose for collecting or obtaining such identifiers or information has been satisfied or within 3 years of the individual's last interaction with the private entity, whichever occurs first. Absent a valid warrant or subpoena issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, a private entity in possession of biometric identifiers or biometric information must comply with its established retention schedule and destruction guidelines.

(b) No private entity may collect, capture, purchase, receive through trade, or otherwise obtain a person's or a customer's biometric identifier or biometric information, unless it first:

(1) informs the subject or the subject's legally authorized representative in writing that a biometric identifier or biometric information is being collected or stored;

(2) informs the subject or the subject's legally authorized representative in writing of the specific purpose and length of term for which a biometric identifier or biometric information is being collected, stored, and used; and

(3) receives a written release executed by the subject of the biometric identifier or biometric information or the subject's legally authorized representative.

(c) No private entity in possession of a biometric identifier or biometric information may sell, lease, trade, or otherwise profit from a person's or a customer's biometric identifier or biometric information.

(d) No private entity in possession of a biometric identifier or biometric information may disclose, redisclose, or otherwise disseminate a person's or a customer's biometric identifier or biometric information unless:

(1) the subject of the biometric identifier or biometric information or the subject's legally authorized representative consents to the disclosure or redisclosure;

(2) the disclosure or redisclosure completes a financial transaction requested or authorized by the subject of the biometric identifier or the biometric information or the subject's legally authorized representative;

(3) the disclosure or redisclosure is required by State or federal law or municipal ordinance; or

(4) the disclosure is required pursuant to a valid warrant or subpoena issued by a court of competent jurisdiction.

(e) A private entity in possession of a biometric identifier or biometric information shall:

(1) store, transmit, and protect from disclosure all biometric identifiers and biometric information using the reasonable standard of care within the private entity's industry; and

(2) store, transmit, and protect from disclosure all biometric identifiers and biometric information in a manner that is the same as or more protective than the manner in which the private entity stores, transmits, and protects other confidential and sensitive information.

(Source: P.A. 95-994, eff. 10-3-08.)

Sec. 20. Right of action. Any person aggrieved by a violation of this Act shall have a right of action in a State circuit court or as a supplemental claim in federal district court against an offending party. A prevailing party may recover for each violation:

(1) against a private entity that negligently violates a provision of this Act, liquidated damages of $1,000 or actual damages, whichever is greater;

(2) against a private entity that intentionally or recklessly violates a provision of this Act, liquidated damages of $5,000 or actual damages, whichever is greater;

(3) reasonable attorneys' fees and costs, including expert witness fees and other litigation expenses; and

(4) other relief, including an injunction, as the State or federal court may deem appropriate.

(Source: P.A. 95-994, eff. 10-3-08.)

Sec. 25. Construction.

(a) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to impact the admission or discovery of biometric identifiers and biometric information in any action of any kind in any court, or before any tribunal, board, agency, or person.

(b) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to conflict with the X-Ray Retention Act, the federal Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996 and the rules promulgated under either Act.

(c) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply in any manner to a financial institution or an affiliate of a financial institution that is subject to Title V of the federal Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act of 1999 and the rules promulgated thereunder.

Definitions

Sec. 1. As used in this chapter, the term:

(a) "Personal information system" means any recordkeeping process, whether automated or manual, containing personal information and the name, personal number, or other identifying particulars of a data subject.

(b) "Personal information" means any information that describes, locates, or indexes anything about an individual or that affords a basis for inferring personal characteristics about an individual including, but not limited to, his education, financial transactions, medical history, criminal or employment records, finger and voice prints, photographs, or his presence, registration, or membership in an organization or activity or admission to an institution.

(c) "Data subject" means an individual about whom personal information is indexed or may be located under his name, personal number, or other identifiable particulars, in a personal information system.

(d) "State agency" means every agency, board, commission, department, bureau, or other entity of the administrative branch of Indiana state government, except those which are the responsibility of the auditor of state, treasurer of state, secretary of state, attorney general, superintendent of public instruction, and excepting the department of state police and state educational institutions.

(e) "Confidential" means information which has been so designated by statute or by promulgated rule or regulation based on statutory authority.

IC 4-1-6-2

Personal information system

Sec. 2. Any state agency maintaining a personal information system shall:

(a) collect, maintain, and use only that personal information as is relevant and necessary to accomplish a statutory purpose of the agency;

(b) collect information to the greatest extent practicable from the data subject directly when the information may result in adverse determinations about an individual's rights, benefits and privileges under federal or state programs;

(c) collect no personal information concerning in any way the political or religious beliefs, affiliations and activities of an individual unless expressly authorized by law or by a rule promulgated by the oversight committee on public records pursuant to IC 4-22-2;

(d) assure that personal information maintained or disseminated from the system is, to the maximum extent possible, accurate, complete, timely, and relevant to the needs of the state agency;

(e) inform any individual requested to disclose personal information whether that disclosure is mandatory or voluntary, by what statutory authority it is solicited, what uses the agency will make of it, what penalties and specific consequences for the individual, which are known to the agency, are likely to result from nondisclosure, whether the information will be treated as a matter of public record or as confidential information, and what rules of confidentiality will govern the information;

(f) insofar as possible segregate information of a confidential nature from that which is a matter of public record: and, pursuant to statutory authority, establish confidentiality requirements and appropriate access controls for all categories of personal information contained in the system;

(g) maintain a list of all persons or organizations having regular access to personal information which is not a matter of public record in the information system;

(h) maintain a complete and accurate record of every access to personal information in a system which is not a matter of public record by any person or organization not having regular access authority;

(i) refrain from preparing lists of the names and addresses of individuals for commercial or charitable solicitation purposes except as expressly authorized by law or by a rule promulgated by the oversight committee on public records pursuant to IC 4-22-2;

(j) make reasonable efforts to furnish prior notice to an individual before any personal information on such individual is made available to any person under compulsory legal process;

(k) establish rules and procedures to assure compliance with this chapter and instruct each of its employees having any responsibility or function in the design, development, operation or maintenance of such system or use of any personal information contained therein of each requirement of this chapter and of each rule and procedure adopted by the agency to assure compliance with this chapter;

(l) establish appropriate administrative, technical and physical safeguards to insure the security of the information system and to protect against any anticipated threats or hazards to their security or integrity; and

(m) exchange with other agencies official personal information that it has collected in the pursuit of statutory functions when:

(i) the information is requested for purposes authorized by law including a rule promulgated pursuant to IC 4-22-2;

(ii) the data subject would reasonably be expected to benefit from the action for which information is requested;

(iii) the exchange would eliminate an unnecessary and expensive duplication in data collection and would not tangibly, adversely affect the data subject; or

(iv) the exchange of information would facilitate the submission of documentation required for various state agencies and departments to receive federal funding reimbursement for programs which are being administered by the agencies and departments.

Unless otherwise prohibited by law, any state agency that maintains a personal information system shall, upon request and proper identification of any data subject, or his authorized agent, grant such subject or agent the right to inspect and to receive at reasonable, standard charges for document search and duplication, in a form comprehensible to such individual or agent:

(a) all personal information about the data subject, unless otherwise provided by statute, whether such information is a matter of public record or maintained on a confidential basis, except in the case of medical and psychological records, where such records shall, upon written authorization of the data subject, be given to a physician or psychologist designated by the data subject;

(b) the nature and sources of the personal information, except where the confidentiality of such sources is required by statute; and

(c) the names and addresses of any recipients, other than those with regular access authority, of personal information of a confidential nature about the data subject, and the date, nature and purpose of such disclosure.

(b) if, after such investigation, such information is found to be incomplete, inaccurate, not pertinent, not timely or not necessary to be retained, it shall be promptly corrected or deleted;

(c) if the investigation does not resolve the dispute, the data subject may file a statement of not more than two hundred (200) words setting forth his position;

(d) whenever a statement of dispute is filed, the agency maintaining the data system shall supply any previous recipient with a copy of the statement and, in any subsequent dissemination or use of the information in question, clearly mark that it is disputed and supply the statement of the data subject along with the information;

(e) the agency maintaining the information system shall clearly and conspicuously disclose to the data subject his rights to make such a request;

(f) following any correction or deletion of personal information the agency shall, at the request of the data subject, furnish to past recipients notification delivered to their last known address that the item has been deleted or corrected and shall require said recipients to acknowledge receipt of such notification and furnish the data subject the names and last known addresses of all past recipients of the uncorrected or undeleted information.

Sec. 7. (a) Any state agency maintaining one (1) or more personal information systems shall file an annual report on the existence and character of each system added or eliminated since the last report with the governor on or before December 31.

(b) The agency shall include in such report at least the following information:

(1) The name or descriptive title of the personal information system and its location.

(2) The nature and purpose of the system and the statutory or administrative authority for its establishment.

(3) The categories of individuals on whom personal information is maintained including the approximate number of all individuals on whom information is maintained and the categories of personal information generally maintained in the system including identification of those which are stored in computer accessible records and those which are maintained manually.

(4) All confidentiality requirements, specifically:

(A) those personal information systems or parts thereof which are maintained on a confidential basis pursuant to a statute, contractual obligation, or rule; and

Policy of access; restricted access as condition for receipt of donated materials

Sec. 8. (a) All state agencies subject to the provisions of this chapter shall adhere to the policy that all persons are entitled to access to information regarding the affairs of government and the official acts of those who represent them as public servants, such access being required to enable the people to freely and fully discuss all matters necessary for the making of political judgments. To that end, the provisions of this chapter shall be construed to provide access to public records to the extent consistent with the due protection of individual privacy.

(b) Where such assurance is needed to obtain valuable considerations or gifts (which may include information) for the state, any agency, with the prior written approval of the oversight committee on public records, may allow restrictions upon public access to be imposed upon it as a specific condition of a contract, with a time limit not to exceed fifty (50) years or the lifetime of the individual, whichever is less. In order to promote the preservation of historical, cultural, natural, and other irreplaceable resources, the department of natural resources or the Indiana state library may extend, beyond the lifetime of the individual, restrictions upon disclosure of information received, providing that such restrictions do not exceed fifty (50) years from the date of the donation in the case of the Indiana state library.

IC 4-1-6-8.5

Consistent handling of information among and between agencies; principles and procedures

Sec. 8.5. In order to establish consistent handling of the same or similar personal information within and among agencies, each state agency collecting, maintaining, or transmitting such information shall apply the following principles and procedures:

(1) Information collected after December 31, 1978, which is classified as confidential must be clearly and uniformly designated as confidential in any form or other document in which it appears.

(2) When an agency which holds information classified as confidential disseminates that information to another agency, the receiving agency shall treat it in the same manner as the originating agency.

As added by Acts 1978, P.L.10, SEC.5. Amended by P.L.19-1983, SEC.4.

IC 4-1-6-8.6

Requests for access to confidential records; improper disclosure; actions

Sec. 8.6. (a) In cases where access to confidential records containing personal information is desired for research purposes, the agency shall grant access if:

(1) the requestor states in writing to the agency the purpose, including any intent to publish findings, the nature of the data sought, what personal information will be required, and what safeguards will be taken to protect the identity of the data subjects;

(2) the proposed safeguards are adequate to prevent the identity of an individual data subject from being known;

(3) the researcher executes an agreement on a form, approved by the oversight committee on public records, with the agency, which incorporates such safeguards for protection of individual data subjects, defines the scope of the research project, and informs the researcher that failure to abide by conditions of the approved agreement constitutes a breach of contract and could result in civil litigation by the data subject or subjects;

(4) the researcher agrees to pay all direct or indirect costs of the research; and

(5) the agency maintains a copy of the agreement or contract for a period equivalent to the life of the record.

(b) Improper disclosure of confidential information by a state employee is cause for action to dismiss the employee.
As added by Acts 1978, P.L.10, SEC.6. Amended by Acts 1979, P.L.40, SEC.5; P.L.19-1983, SEC.5.

Annual report to general assembly; specific statutory authorization for confidentiality; recommendations

Sec. 9. (a) Under the authority of the governor, a report shall be prepared, on or before December 1 annually, advising the general assembly of the personal information systems, or parts thereof, of agencies subject to this chapter, which are recommended to be maintained on a confidential basis by specific statutory authorization because their disclosure would constitute an invasion of personal privacy and there is no compelling, demonstrable and overriding public interest in disclosure. Such recommendations may include, but not be limited to, specific personal information systems or parts thereof which can be categorized as follows:

(1) Personal information maintained with respect to students and clients, patients or other individuals receiving social, medical, vocational, supervisory or custodial care or services directly or indirectly from public bodies.

(2) Personal information, excepting salary information, maintained with respect to employees, appointees or elected officials of any public body or applicants for such positions.

(3) Information required of any taxpayer in connection with the assessment or collection of any income tax.

(4) Information revealing the identity of persons who file complaints with administrative, investigative, law enforcement or penology agencies.

(b) In addition, such report may list records or categories of records, which are recommended to be exempted from public disclosure by specific statutory authorization for reasons other than that their disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, along with justification therefor.

(c) A report described in this section must be in an electronic format under IC 5-14-6.

HELP US STOP COMPULSORY FINGERPRINTING OF INNOCENT ALASKANS:

Right now in Alaska, students who refuse to submit their fingerprints "for ID purposes" to a national database are being denied educational and testing opportunities... and that's just not right.

to a national biometric database "as ID" or they will be denied the opportunity to take the SAT...and thus denied the ability to attend most colleges. Without Juneau passing a tough new privacy law, this could happen to kids here in Alaska.

For some exams, even if you present a US passport as ID, you will be denied access to the exam room if you don't first submit to a fingerprinting supposedly "for ID purposes." The Wall Street Journal even exposed that the firm giving the SAT exam has considered requiring children to submit their biometrics/fingerprints

Call Representative Gatto 465-3743 and Representative Wes Keller 465-2186, tell them to stand up for Alaskans and our right to privacy. If a US passport is good enough ID to travel the world and enter the USA, it's good enough ID to take an exam. This is America, let's take our privacy back.

Stronger Privacy Laws

The Alaskan Biometric Privacy bill SB-98 February 21, 2012

Dear Representative Gatto:

In your district and all over Alaska, Alaskans are now being denied educational opportunities and the ability to take many exams unless they first submit their fingerprints & biometrics to a database as a form of identification. Shockingly, even students who show a US passport and driver's license are being refused educational opportunities if they don't submit to a fingerprinting "as ID." As you may know, this happened to me in February 2008.

If a US passport is good enough identification to travel the world and enter the United States…it is certainly good enough identification to take a test. This is what The Alaskan Biometric Privacy Bill SB-98 is all about; standing up for Alaskans and their right to privacy.

Last April, the Senate unanimously voted to support SB-98. The bill is now before the House Health & Social Services and the Judiciary committees. Senate co-sponsors include Senators Coghill (R), Menard (R), Giessel (R), McGuire (R), Paskvan (D), Thomas (D), Ellis (D), Wagoner (R), Egan (D) and Dyson (R).

As you can imagine, the Privacy Bill is extremely popular with Alaskan voters – and only opposed by the data mining corporations and the biometrics industry lobbyists (SIA/LexisNexis|ChoicePoint/Prometric) who are currently making money off exploiting Alaskans' loss of privacy. Luckily, they don't vote.

Mandating fingerprints as ID for an exam is already illegal in Canada under their PIPEDA (Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act) privacy laws, but no such protection exists for Alaskans. We need your help to change that.

Important: The current wording in the critical "Alternative ID" section 18.14.040 of SB-98 is too loose, essentially undermining much of the bill's intended protection. It needs to be clear that

1) If an individual shows a US Passport or State ID (driver's license), they don't need to also submit to being fingerprinting for identification
2) An individual can't be discriminated against and denied educational or testing opportunities because of their refusal to provide their biometrics as identification if they provide an Alternative ID.

As you know, Article 1 Section 22 of the Alaska Constitution states "the right of the people to privacy is recognized and shall not be infringed." There are very few issues on which Alaskans from across the political spectrum agree. The urgent need to protect our privacy from constant corporate and Federal Government intrusion is one of them.

Facts about data privacy:

• 24 million customer records at Amazon.com accessed by criminals 1/16/2012
Have you ever shopped at Amazon.com? As reported in USA Today just a few weeks ago on 1/16, their "state-of-the-art" database was hacked into and criminals gained access to 24 million confidential customer records—maybe yours. What if a similarly "state-of-the-art" database that contained the fingerprints of you or your children were hacked into, and your prints were planted at a crime scene? If your fingerprints were found, would you really be able to prove you weren't there? Is this really the sort of Orwellian surveillance society Alaskans in your district want to live in?

• "There have been 535 data breaches made public in 2012 alone, affecting a total of 30.4 million records. 2011 saw some of the biggest data breaches in history, coming in a number of different forms and affecting a wide range of industries." Privacy Rights Clearinghouse notes that over 544 million confidential records have been compromised since just 2005. http://www.privacyrights.org/

• FBI, Pentagon pays ChoicePoint for access to trove of public records
National Journal Reports: By Shane Harris sharris@nationaljournal.com:
"…the FBI and the Defense Department…have been paying a Georgia-based company [ChoicePoint/LexisNexis—the same firm collecting Alaskan fingerprints for some exams] for access to its vast databases that contain billions of personal records about nearly every person in the United States. This system allows for the ability to use the private data broker to do something that they legally can't -- keep tabs on nearly every American citizen and foreigner in the United States. ChoicePoint is famous for being the largest and most sophisticated aggregator of public records on U.S. citizens and residents. The company has built an enormous electronic cache of more than 19 billion records." 11/11/2005

• Biometrics collection is Big Business, and very lucrative
The international Biometric Group estimates that annual biometric industry revenue for 2012 will be over $12.4 billion dollars, with 25% of revenues being related to fingerprinting, and 13% related to facial recognition (www.biometricgroup.com).

• US Senator Charles Schumer and Lindsey Graham proposed a compulsory fingerprinting of all Americans as a requirement to work (National work ID cards)
In an article written by them in the Washington Post, Schumer and Graham state that as a "cornerstone" of their Immigration Reform Proposal, we "would require all US citizens who want to work to obtain a biometric social security card." The compulsory fingerprinting of all law-abiding Americans is essentially a National ID card. Washington Post, 3/19/2010

• "Biometric requirement could make E-Verify worth billions"
Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) enthusiastically supports adding a biometric identifier [ie. the compulsory fingerprinting of all working Americans] to the federal E-Verify employment eligibility verification system, which is setting the stage for potentially one of the largest federal biometric collection opportunities, potentially encompassing the entire U.S. workforce of 140 million employees. "Obviously, it will be a big boost for the industry," said David Coleman of International Biometric Group. SIA, the Security Industry Association also strongly supports it, as their members would profit greatly.

ISSUE SUMMARY & FAQ:

SB-98 The Alaskan Biometric Privacy Bill

2/21/2012

Last session, the Alaskan Senate voted unanimously to pass The Alaskan Biometric Privacy Bill, SB-98. The bill is now in the House Health & Social Services and Judiciary committees.

What's this all about?

It's about standing up for Alaskan's privacy, and stopping corporations from compelling innocent Alaskans to submit to fingerprinting as ID.

The goal is to make illegal the practice of compelling people to submit their fingerprints or other biometrics as identification when they are willing to show their driver's license or a United States passport. This does not affect fingerprinting done for background checks, and law enforcement is exempt from this bill.

Why this is urgently needed:

An update to our privacy laws is urgently needed to address the rapid & accelerating erosion of personal privacy, driven in large part by the biometrics and data mining industry-fueled "identity paranoia." Compelling an individual to submit fingerprints as ID for an exam is already illegal in Canada under their PIPEDA privacy laws (Private Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act), but no such protection exists for Alaskans.

1) It is offensive and immoral to treat honest, law-abiding and privacy loving Alaskans like criminals needing to be fingerprinted. Alaskans have a deep-seated respect for their privacy, AND it's guaranteed by our Constitution. We'll show our State ID/driver's license or passport- that's enough.

2) The right to privacy is fundamental to Alaska's heritage and unique culture, and is guaranteed by Article 1, Section 22 of the Alaska Constitution: "The right of the people to privacy is recognized and shall not be infringed."

3) Updated privacy laws will help to stem the rapid erosion of personal privacy; reining in some of the worst abuses of data technology by both private industry and government:

"The FBI is embarking on a $1 billion effort to build the world's largest computer database of people's physical characteristics, a project that would give the government unprecedented abilities to identify individuals in the United States and abroad. Digital images of faces, fingerprints and palm patterns are flowing into FBI systems in a climate-controlled, secure basement in Clarksburg. West Virginia. Next month, the FBI intends to award a 10-year contract that would significantly expand the amount and kinds of biometric information it receives." By Ellen Nakashima, The Washington Post, 12/23/07

4) Despite the industry's best efforts and "state-of-the-art database security," major data breaches are practically a daily occurrence in the news. There were over 223 million data records of US residents exposed due to security breaches in the last 3 years alone (privacyrights.org).

Fingerprints are like passwords that can never be changed.
Once compromised, individuals will be at risk of identity theft for the rest of their lives.

5) The best way to keep personal data from being lost, hacked or exposed is to not collect it in the first place. After-the-fact restrictions will be largely ineffective, as we will never know what global datamining firms do with the data once collected. This legislation will protect Alaskans from identity theft.

6) As of January 1, 2008, Alaskan college students, and anyone else who takes any part of the CPA and various other Prometric-proctored exams are being forced to submit their fingerprints to a global fingerprint database maintained by a foreign-owned data-reseller called ChoicePoint, now part of Reed Elsevier Corp. This is the same company which was assessed a $15 million fine, the largest fine in the history of the Federal Trade Commission for "making false and misleading statements about privacy policies, violating privacy rights and violating Federal Laws" according to the FTC website. ChoicePoint combines personal data sourced from multiple public and private databases and sells it to "an estimated 7,000 clients" including the Dept of Homeland Security (see item #3 above). This is just one example of the existing and potential privacy abuses which updated privacy laws would stop. Some exam centers in Alaska (PearsonVue) are right now even forcing exam candidates into having their veins of their palms scanned (by infrared radiation) in addition to fingerprinting, even if a US passport is presented as ID.

This "identity paranoia" is as lucrative to the companies involved as it is absurd. Compelling an individual who is willing to show their US passport or driver's license to submit fingerprints to the database of a private foreign-owned corporation "for ID" is unnecessary and it violates our Constitutionally guaranteed right to privacy.

What is Biometrics?
Biometrics include: fingerprints, DNA, hand geometry, vein scanning, retinal or iris scans and similar technology.

If a US passport is sufficient ID to travel the world and enter the USA, it is certainly sufficient ID to take a test.
Clearly, the goal is to collect & transmit the fingerprints. Both the test center at the University of Alaska-Fairbanks and the Prometric exam centers in Spenard are collecting fingerprints and immediately transferring them over the internet to the notorious data reseller ChoicePoint/ReedElsevier, whose largest customer is the Federal Government. Unlike in Canada, there is currently no law to protect Alaskans from this.

Will this stop the police from using fingerprints on criminals?
No. This does not in any way affect laws or procedures related to law enforcement.

But isn't biometrics "the way of the future?"
Loss of our personal privacy is not the "future" Alaskans want.

Don't the US Government and the Dept of Homeland Security want our fingerprints?
You bet they do (see #3 above)! Some Federal Legislators (Chuck Schumer of NY in particular) are even pushing for a biometric social security card which would require every American to get fingerprinted in order to work -- a compelling reason on its own to quickly strengthen our State's biometric privacy laws.

Is the current Alaskan Biometric Privacy Bill SB-98 sufficient?

No – not as worded currently. The most important section of the bill by far in our opinion is the "Alternative Identification" section; however it is so loosely worded so to undermine most of the protection in this bill. The only true protection is to not compel Alaskans to submit their fingerprints and other biometrics "for ID" in the first place. IF A US PASSPORT IS SUFFICIENT IDENTIFICATION TO TRAVEL THE WORLD AND ENTER THE USA, IT IS GOOD ENOUGH IDENTIFICATION TO TAKE A TEST.

As Ronald Reagan once said, "Freedom is never more than one generation away from extinction." This is a critical moment. This is our chance to help preserve something all Alaskans hold dear.

HCS CSSB 122 (L&C) Real Estate Transfer Fees/Title Plants
Sponsor Statement

Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 122 (Labor & Commerce) seeks to improve the transfer of title to real property in Alaska. Firstly, the bill would ensure that Alaskans maintain oversight of title searches. Companies that operate mainly overseas routinely solicit business in Alaska. While promising lower back office costs, these companies are divorced from actual, on the ground, Alaskan experience, increasing the chance of imperfections in title due to inaccurate or incomplete title searches. The bill would mandate that anyone performing a title search in Alaska be licensed in Alaska and reside here.

Additionally, Alaska law currently allows a deed to real estate to contain a covenant requiring a fee to be paid to the original seller for any subsequent transfer of title. While these transfer fee covenants benefit the original seller, who can look forward to a steady income in perpetuity without performing any additional service, it is a positive harm to each successive buyer. Courts in the state of New York outlawed the practice in 1852, calling it a vestige of feudalism. Recently, Idaho, Indiana, Mississippi, and Montana have passed their own prohibitions, making 41 states that have outlawed the practice. There appears to be no justification for allowing title fee covenants in Alaska.

MEMORANDUM February 15, 2012

SUBJECT: Preparation of title reports and title examinations; amendment drafting issues (CSSB 122(CRA); Work Order No. 27-LS0789\B.1)

TO: Senator Dennis Egan
Attn: Dana Owen

FROM: Dennis C. Bailey DCB
Legislative Counsel

This memo accompanies the amendment prepared for you using language provided on the phone. Please be aware of the following issues that have come to my attention during drafting.

The proposed amendment reads:

> All preliminary title reports and title examination reports shall be prepared by a person licensed under AS 21.66.270.

1. The licensing requirement under AS 21.66.270 requires a title insurance limited producer to be licensed in the manner provided for in AS 21.27.[1] Licensing under AS 21.66.270 only applies to title insurance limited producers.[2] The question that arises

[1] AS 21.66.270 provides:

> Sec. 21.66.270. Title insurance limited producers to be licensed. A title insurance limited producer shall be licensed in the manner provided for in AS 21.27. A title insurance limited producer may not be licensed to sell insurance other than title insurance.

See AS 21.27.010 for licensing requirements; see also, AS 21.27.275 (director may issue license to nonresident who does not have a home state if the person meets the requirements of the chapter applicable to a resident applying for the same license)

[2] A title insurance limited producer is defined in AS 21.66.480(8):

> (8) "title insurance limited producer" means a person, firm, association, trust, corporation, cooperative, joint-stock company, or other legal entity authorized in writing by a title insurance company to solicit is whether you intend that only title insurance limited producers may prepare preliminary title reports and title examinations. The proposed licensing requirement apparently excludes a title insurance company from preparing a preliminary report or title examination. The ability to prepare a preliminary report or title examination seems integral to the power of a "title insurance company" to conduct a title insurance business.[3] Is that what you intend?

2. You may want to substitute "a licensed title insurance limited producer" instead of referring to AS 21.66.270.

3. The proposed language requires that the person preparing a preliminary title report or title examination report must be a resident of the state. As we briefly discussed, the residency requirement raises the question of whether a residency requirement violates the privileges and immunities clause of the U.S. Constitution.

The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several states. (Article IV, section 2, Constitution of the United States). A state violates the federal privileges and immunities clause by denying a nonresident equal treatment with respect to a fundamental right or privilege that is essential "to the promotion of interstate harmony." Supreme Court of New Hampshire v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274, 279, 84 L.Ed.2d 205, 210 (1985). The courts will require that a state justify residency-based discrimination under the privileges and immunities clause if the court finds that the activity that is the subject of the discrimination enjoys privileges and immunities clause protection. Pursuit of an occupation outside one's home state is an activity that has been protected by the privileges and immunities clause. The United States Supreme Court has determined that state discrimination against nonresidents seeking to pursue employment within the state violates the privileges and immunities clause. Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518, 52 L.Ed.2d 304 (1977).

title insurance, collect premiums, determine insurability in accordance with the underwriting rules and standards prescribed by the title insurance company that the licensee represents, and issue policies in its behalf.

[3] AS 21.66.180 provides:

> Sec. 21.66.180. General powers. A title insurance company may > (1) do business as defined in AS 21.66.480;
> (2) do any act, directly or through a title insurance limited producer, incidental to making a contract or policy of title insurance, including, but not limited to, conducting or holding an escrow, settlement, or closing of a transaction; and,
> (3) provide other services relative or incidental to the sale and transfer of real or personal property.

In my opinion, it seems likely that a court construing the proposed residency requirement would find the provision unconstitutional as a violation of the privileges and immunities clause of the U.S. Constitution.

Further, establishing a residency requirement would conflict with the insurance chapter, AS 21, including, for example, AS 21.66.480(7), which provides, in part, that a title insurance company means a foreign title insurance company issued a certificate of authority to transact a title insurance business within this state. A "'foreign insurer' means an insurer formed under the laws of a jurisdiction other than this state and includes an alien insurer." AS 21.97.900(18). An "'alien insurer' means an insurer formed under the laws of a country other than the United States of America, its states, districts, territories, and commonwealths." AS 21.97.900(3). In general, the insurance statute allows foreign insurance companies to be licensed to do business in the state. In the interest of getting you an amendment in a reasonable time, and in order to allow you to consider the residency issue in the context discussed, I have not prepared amendments to the insurance chapter to make the necessary exceptions prohibiting foreign title insurance companies from doing business in the state. Let me know if you want to proceed in that direction.

4. Incorporating the title insurance provisions of the amendment in a bill that currently addresses the topic of transfer fee covenants may violate the requirement that a bill address only a single subject. The single subject rule requires that all matters in an Act "fall under some one general idea, be so connected with or related to each other, either logically or in popular understanding, as to be parts of, or germane to, one general subject."[4] The Alaska Supreme Court has held that the purpose of this constitutional provision is to guard against legislative log-rolling, "the practice of 'deliberately inserting in one bill several dissimilar or incongruous subjects in order to secure the necessary support for passage of the measure.'" Evans v. State, 56 P.3d 1046. 1069, quoting from Gellert, infra, at 1122.

Historically, the Alaska Supreme Court has interpreted Alaska's single subject rule to permit very broad subject matter in one bill without violating the single subject requirement. For example, the Court has held that bills relating to such broad themes as "development of water resources,"[5] "taxation,"[6] "land,"[7] "intoxicating liquor,"[8] and

"criminal law"[9] are acceptable.[10] However, there was a strong dissent in one case against allowing broad subject matter in a single bill.[11] And in 2010, for the first time, the Alaska Supreme Court invalidated a piece of proposed legislation for failure to satisfy the single subject requirement.[12,13]

CSSB 122(CRA) currently addresses transfer fee covenants in a document conveying real estate. The proposed amendment addresses licensing of title insurance producers. It is difficult to articulate a common subject. Both might be in the subject of "land transactions." Given Alaska's broad interpretation of the single subject rule, including the two topics in the same bill could be found constitutional. Failure to comply with the single subject requirement -- however unlikely -- could jeopardize your bill if it were ever challenged. The issue, of course, may be avoided entirely by using separate bills for each subject.

5. I routinely advise that bill sponsors engage the division of insurance in consideration of a bill in order to make use of their expertise. It seems appropriate to do so with respect to this amendment.

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

BILL NO. CSSB 122 (L&C)

Analysis

SB 122 requires a licensed title insurance limited producer conduct a reasonable search and examination and the company makes a determination of insurability of title. This legislation also provides that a title insurance limited producer may not obtain a license unless the producer is a resident of the state and that a document that conveys real estate may not include a provision that requires a subsequent transfer fee to convey the real estate.

There is no anticipated fiscal impact to the Division as a result of this legislation.

Dear Representative Thompson:

Re: CS for Senate Bill No.122 (L&C)

Alaska USA Title Agency has followed and commented on SB122 since introduced in the Senate Labor and Commerce Committee in 2011. Alaska USA position has consistently been that legislation should not restrict competition nor limit choices for Alaska consumers.

Alaska USA supports the current proposed SB122 only if Section 2 is removed since it may violate the privileges and immunities clause of the U.S. Constitution. Alaska USA concurs with Dennis Bailey's memorandum of February 15, 2012 (copy attached) that the proposed language in SB 122, section 2 raises the question of whether a residency requirement violates the U.S. Constitution. The memorandum states two specific case law examples on page 2, item 3. Both case law examples ruled against similar restrictive residency requirements. Accordingly, we do not believe section 2 of SB122 is good public policy.

Thank you for the opportunity to provide Alaska USA Title Agency's concerns on Senate Bill 122.

Sincerely,

Crystal Peltola

MEMORANDUM March 15, 2012

SUBJECT: Residency requirement for title insurance limited producers (CSSB 122(L&C), Work Order No. 27-LS0789\I)

TO: Senator John Coghill
Attn: Rynnieva Moss

FROM: Dennis C. Bailey
Legislative Counsel

You asked whether the provision of CSSB 122(L&C), sec. 2, which requires a title insurance limited producer to be a resident before the person may obtain a license under AS 21.66.270, raises constitutional issues. The residency requirement raises the question of whether a residency requirement violates the privileges and immunities clause of the U.S. Constitution.

The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several states. (Article IV, section 2, Constitution of the United States). A state violates the federal privileges and immunities clause by denying a nonresident equal treatment with respect to a fundamental right or privilege that is essential "to the promotion of interstate harmony." Supreme Court of New Hampshire v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274, 279, 84 L.Ed.2d 205, 210 (1985). The courts will require that a state justify residency-based discrimination under the privileges and immunities clause if the court finds that the activity that is the subject of the discrimination enjoys privileges and immunities clause protection. Pursuit of an occupation outside one's home state is an activity that has been protected by the privileges and immunities clause. The United States Supreme Court has determined that state discrimination against nonresidents seeking to pursue employment within the state violates the privileges and immunities clause. Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518, 57 L.Ed.2d 397 (1978).

In my opinion, it seems likely that a court construing the proposed residency requirement would find the provision unconstitutional as a violation of the privileges and immunities clause of the U.S. Constitution.

If I may be of further assistance, please advise.

SPONSOR STATEMENT FOR CSSB 151

"An Act relating to mitigation at sentencing in a criminal case for a defendant found by the court to have been affected by a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder."

SB 151 would include Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorders (FASD) as a mitigating factor in sentencing. This would allow some flexibility in sentencing if the defendant is found by the court to be affected by FASD and this condition substantially impaired the defendant's judgment, behavior, and capacity to recognize reality or ability to cope with the ordinary demands of life.

Individuals diagnosed with a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder (FASD) are disproportionately represented within Alaska's criminal justice system. SB 151 does not require a judge to use the mitigating factor and it DOES NOT automatically adjust a presumptive sentence. The defense would have to provide clear and convincing evidence that the defendant's disability significantly affected the defendant's conduct and substantially impaired judgment, behavior, and capacity to recognize reality in order to apply the mitigating factor.

Evidence shows that directing people with mental illness and other brain disorders to supported services, both inside and outside of Corrections, significantly reduces the high financial and social costs associated with re-incarceration and recidivism. Felons and repeat offenders with FASD are more likely to stop committing crimes when they are given the same supports that benefit people with mental illness and other disabilities, which can include Therapeutic Court, housing and employment assistance, case management, counseling and rehabilitation.

A BILL

FOR AN ACT ENTITLED

"An Act relating to mitigation at sentencing in a criminal case for a defendant found by the court to have been affected by a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder."

BE IT ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF ALASKA:

 Section 1. AS 12.55.155(d) is amended to read:

(d) The following factors shall be considered by the sentencing court if proven in accordance with this section, and may allow imposition of a sentence below the presumptive range set out in AS 12.55.125:

(1) the offense was principally accomplished by another person, and the defendant manifested extreme caution or sincere concern for the safety or well-being of the victim;

(2) the defendant, although an accomplice, played only a minor role in the commission of the offense;

(3) the defendant committed the offense under some degree of duress, coercion, threat, or compulsion insufficient to constitute a complete defense, but that significantly affected the defendant's conduct;

(4) the conduct of a youthful defendant was substantially influenced by another person more mature than the defendant;

(5) the conduct of an aged defendant was substantially a product of physical or mental infirmities resulting from the defendant's age;

(6) in a conviction for assault under AS 11.41.200 - 11.41.220, the defendant acted with serious provocation from the victim;

(7) except in the case of a crime defined by AS 11.41.410 - 11.41.470, the victim provoked the crime to a significant degree;

(8) before the defendant knew that the criminal conduct had been discovered, the defendant fully compensated or made a good faith effort to fully compensate the victim of the defendant's criminal conduct for any damage or injury sustained;

(9) the conduct constituting the offense was among the least serious conduct included in the definition of the offense;

(10) the defendant was motivated to commit the offense solely by an overwhelming compulsion to provide for emergency necessities for the defendant's immediate family;

(11) after commission of the offense for which the defendant is being sentenced, the defendant assisted authorities to detect, apprehend, or prosecute other persons who committed an offense;

(12) the facts surrounding the commission of the offense and any previous offenses by the defendant establish that the harm caused by the defendant's conduct is consistently minor and inconsistent with the imposition of a substantial period of imprisonment;

(13) the defendant is convicted of an offense specified in AS 11.71 and the offense involved small quantities of a controlled substance;

(14) the defendant is convicted of an offense specified in AS 11.71 and the offense involved the distribution of a controlled substance, other than a schedule IA controlled substance, to a personal acquaintance who is 19 years of age or older for no profit;

(15) the defendant is convicted of an offense specified in AS 11.71 and the offense involved the possession of a small amount of a controlled substance for personal use in the defendant's home;

(16) in a conviction for assault or attempted assault or for homicide or attempted homicide, the defendant acted in response to domestic violence perpetrated by the victim against the defendant and the domestic violence consisted of aggravated or repeated instances of assaultive behavior;

(17) except in the case of an offense defined by AS 11.41 or AS 11.46.400, the defendant has been convicted of a class B or C felony, and, at the time of sentencing, has successfully completed a court-ordered treatment program as defined in AS 28.35.028 that was begun after the offense was committed;

(18) except in the case of an offense defined under AS 11.41 or AS 11.46.400 or a defendant who has previously been convicted of a felony, the defendant committed the offense while suffering from a mental disease or defect as defined in AS 12.47.130 that was insufficient to constitute a complete defense but that significantly affected the defendant's conduct;

(19) the defendant is convicted of an offense under AS 11.71, and the defendant sought medical assistance for another person who was experiencing a drug overdose contemporaneously with the commission of the offense;

(20) except in the case of an offense defined under AS 11.41 or AS 11.46.400, the defendant committed the offense while suffering from a condition diagnosed as a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder, the fetal alcohol spectrum disorder substantially impaired the defendant's judgment, behavior, capacity to recognize reality, or ability to cope with the ordinary demands of life, and the fetal alcohol spectrum disorder, though insufficient to constitute a complete defense, significantly affected the defendant's conduct; in this paragraph, "fetal alcohol spectrum disorder" means a condition of impaired brain function in the range of permanent birth defects caused by maternal consumption of alcohol during pregnancy.

CSSB 151 FASD AS A MITIGATING FACTOR IN SENTENCING
Explanation of Changes

SHSS
From version X to O

- Removal of Section 1 which set out a definition of mental disease or defect.
- Section (18) there has been some debate over previously convicted felons, and how this can be applied.
- Addition of section (20) which adds FASD as a mitigating factor, defines it and sets out how it can be diagnosed.

SJUD
From version O to U

- Section (18), page 3, lines 13-14 has been deleted, which makes this mitigator applicable to felons, however in section (20) crimes against a person and arson are not eligible for a mitigating factor.
- Section (20), page 3, line 20 and 21 the language exempting arson and crimes against a person was added. The intent of this bill is to provide flexibility for non-violent offenders who are affected by FASD. If an assault or arson has occurred, this mitigator would not apply.
- Section (20), page 3, line 30 has been deleted. It is not outlined for other mitigating factors how mental disease or defect is determined. This can be done as it is now; through clear and convincing evidence, the court can find someone to be suffering from a mental disease or defect.

SFIN
No changes

HHSS
CS to HB 367
The companion bill introduced by the HHSS committee adopted a CS conforming to CSSB 151.

FISCAL NOTE #5

BILL NO. CSSB 151(JUD)

Analysis

SB 151 CSSB(JUD) would add as a mitigating factor at sentencing. It would allow a new mitigator if the defendant was affected by a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder that significantly affected the defendant's behavior. If proven, the court would have discretion to reduce the term of imprisonment to below the presumptive range.

The proposed new factor would not apply to persons convicted of crimes against a person (AS 11.41), or arson in the first degree (AS 11.46.400).

The fiscal impact for the Department of Law is indeterminate because it will require expert testimony on the issue of whether the person suffers from such a disorder and if so, did it significantly affect his or her behavior.

Analysis

AS 12.55.155(d) allows a sentencing court to impose a sentence less than the presumptive range where mitigating factors have been proven. This bill amends AS 12.55.155(d) by adding section 20, which allows the court to find a factor of mitigation where the defendant committed the offense while affected by fetal alcohol spectrum disorder.

The Public Defender Agency does not anticipate a fiscal impact from this change. Accordingly, the Agency submits a zero fiscal note.

FISCAL NOTE #2

STATE OF ALASKA BILL NO. CSSB 151(HSS)

Analysis

Senate Bill 151 adds a new factor to the list of mitigating factors in AS 12.55.155(d) that the court shall consider at sentencing; if proven, the court may then impose a sentence below the presumptive range for certain crimes. Specifically, except for defendants convicted of offenses against persons , arson, and criminal mischief, and except if the defendant has any prior felony conviction, the court may consider whether the defendant committed the offense "while affected by a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder that was insufficient to constitute a complete defense . . . but that significantly affected the defendant's conduct."

The court cannot predict the number of cases in which parties will attempt to prove this factor as a mitigator at sentencing, but believes the sentencing hearings will be held and handled in the normal course without a fiscal impact. The Alaska Court System therefore submits a zero fiscal note.

SB 151 - Inclusion of FASD as a Mitigating Factor

This legislative session, Senator Kevin Meyer (Anchorage) worked with the Alaska FASD Partnership, the Department of Law, and the Courts to craft a bill that would address the large number of people affected by fetal alcohol spectrum disorders (FASD) in the state's criminal justice system. SB 151 is an "Act relating to mitigation at sentencing in a criminal case for a defendant found by the court to have been affected by a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder."

The Partnership approached Senator Meyer when a workgroup of the Partnership, FASD and the Legal System, determined the mitigating factor to be one of their top priorities. Other priorities of the workgroup include expanding screening in Corrections, training for professionals in the justice system, and improving services for individuals with FASD transitioning from Corrections and juvenile detention, such as case management, assistance with housing, employment, and treatment.

The Need for SB 151

The intent underlying Alaska's sentencing structure – that people will modify their behaviors based on the criminal justice system's response to their crimes – is not met when applied to individuals with FASD. These disabilities manifest as deficits in executive function, resulting in impaired adaptive behavior, memory difficulties, an inability to plan, and a failure to recognize the consequences of actions.

In the interest of justice, it is important to take these deficits into account during sentencing. Neither the offender nor society benefits from holding individuals with FASD to community standards that they cannot possibly attain given their impairments.

SB 151 fulfills a recommendation adopted by the Alaska Criminal Justice Assessment Commission, that "the legislature should create a statutory mitigating factor for use at criminal sentencing, recognizing when the wrongful conduct was substantially affected by an organic brain disorder."[1]

A draft resolution proposed by the American Bar Association (ABA) Commission on Youth At Risk, for consideration at this year's annual ABA meeting, reads: "... the American Bar Association urges lawyers and judges, as well as bar associations and law school clinical programs, to ... work with medical, mental health, and FASD disability experts to promote ... applying FASD as a mitigating factor in the mitigation of juvenile justice and criminal sentencing ... and consideration of alternatives to incarceration that reduce recidivism."

Overview of SB 151

SB 151 proposes to allow FASD as a mitigating factor for sentencing in certain cases where there is clear and convincing evidence that a "defendant committed [an] offense while suffering from a condition diagnosed as a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder, the fetal alcohol spectrum disorder substantially impaired the defendant's judgment, behavior, capacity to recognize reality, or ability to cope with the ordinary demands of life, and the fetal alcohol spectrum disorder, though insufficient to constitute a complete defense, significantly affected the defendant's conduct."

[1] Alaska Criminal Justice Assessment Commission (2000). Final Report. Retrieved October 12, 2010 from , at p.71.

SB 151 defines a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder in the subsection on mitigating factors as "a condition of impaired brain function in the range of permanent birth defects caused by maternal consumption of alcohol during pregnancy."

The legislation:

1) does not require a judge to use the mitigating factor;
2) does not automatically adjust a presumptive sentence; the defendant would have to prove by clear and convincing evidence 1) that he or she has a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder and 2) that the condition "significantly affected the defendant's conduct" before the judicial officer can consider the possibility of adjusting the presumptive sentence; and
3) is not a "get out of jail free" card, but an attempt to be "smarter" within the justice system to better direct people who have impaired brain function to services both within and after release from the criminal justice system.

What is a mitigating factor?

A mitigating factor, in law, is any information or evidence presented to the court regarding the defendant or the circumstances of the crime that might result in reduced charges or a lesser sentence.

The economic benefits of SB 151

A 2009 study by the Institute of Social and Economic Research (ISER) at the University of Alaska Anchorage, The Cost of Crime: Could the State Reduce Future Crime and Save Money by Expanding Education and Treatment Programs?, showed that strategically expanding intervention and prevention programs can reduce crime, keep more Alaskans out of prison, and save the state substantial costs.

The cost of incarceration in an Alaskan prison is about $136 per day. Over the course of five to ten years, an inmate is expected to cost the state close to $250,000-$500,000 (not including medical, mental health or other specialized treatment while incarcerated).

The cost of intensive case management (a recommended alternative intervention for people with FASD) is about $48 per day. If electronic monitoring ($21 per day) and probation/parole ($7 per day) are added, the total cost per day is about $76. Implementing one or all three of these interventions could save the state up to $21,900 per offender, per year.[2]

SB 151 provides justice for a vulnerable population and represents a better investment of our state's resources. With appropriate supports, people with FASD can live successfully in the community as contributing citizens, while at the same time providing jobs for Alaskan case workers, clinicians, assisted living providers, mental health and substance abuse counselors, psychologists and psychiatrists.

A move toward "Smart Justice"

Alaska's movement toward "Smart Justice" aims to promote reduced public costs, fewer crimes, and greater rehabilitative results for offenders. While some offenders are clearly dangerous and need long-term incarceration, the research behind "Smart Justice" suggests that for certain non-violent offenders, treatment programs inside the prison combined with adequate transition and case management services, will result in lower costs, less recidivism, and a safer general public.

Actual costs, depending on the case mix, may be lower.

Senator Meyer noted that "studies have repeatedly shown that repeat offenders with FASD and other impaired brain functions are more likely to stop committing crimes when they are given the same support as people with other mental illnesses, which can include therapeutic courts, housing and employment assistance, case management, counseling and rehabilitation. The potential benefits to society, through decreased crime and costs, are tremendous."

In Chief Justice Carpeneti's address to the Alaska State Legislature this year, he suggested that the justice system needs to consider the cost of its actions on the system's resources, on public safety, and on the potential of all citizens. He asked legislators to include the judiciary in tailoring prison or treatment sentences to offenders.

"In practice, it means making criminal justice decisions that reserve our most costly response to crime – prison time – for those cases where less costly alternatives will not effectively protect the public or rehabilitate the perpetrator," Chief Justice Carpeneti said. "There is a better way. We need to move from anger-based sentencing that ignores cost and effectiveness to evidence-based sentencing that focuses on results."

Bill would let judges consider fetal alcohol spectrum disorders

FETAL ALCOHOL: First, its direct role in a crime must be proved.

By AUSTIN BAIRD

(03/03/12 21:43:50)

JUNEAU -- A proposal before the Alaska Legislature would give judges flexibility when handing down criminal sentences to people who were born with effects caused by their mother drinking during pregnancy.

Judges are not allowed to consider fetal alcohol spectrum disorders -- a catch-all phrase for conditions caused by prenatal exposure to alcohol -- during criminal sentencing. SB151 would change that by adding FASD to the list of mental conditions that judges can consider as a mitigating factor.

Senate Majority Leader Kevin Meyer, R-Anchorage, worked with a statewide coalition from various professions called the Alaska FASD Partnership to craft the bill in response to the large number of people affected by the fetal alcohol disorders in the criminal justice system. Meyer said a mitigating factor is not a "get out of jail free card" and only reduces punishment if it's proved that a condition played a direct role in a crime. The bill calls for proof of documentation of prenatal alcohol use as well as a convincing clinical diagnosis.

The proposal is welcomed by advocates but not touted as a cure-all.

Public understanding of the issue is lacking, according to Teri Tibbett, the partnership's coordinator, and problems are multifaceted and complex.

"Alcohol has been around for a long time and so have women," Tibbett said. "Those two have gone together about that long but we understand the impacts better now than ever."

Modern research has determined that cell death caused by exposure to alcohol in the womb is the root of damage, according to Susan Astley, an epidemiology professor at the University of Washington. The best-known result is a series of distinct facial features -- smaller eye openings, a thin upper lip and the ridges below the nose are smooth -- but other problems are also common, she said.

Morgan Fawcett is a 19-year-old getting ready to study journalism but for now he travels around the U.S. and Canada sharing the story of his struggles with prenatal alcohol exposure with clinicians, lawmakers and others interested groups.

Fawcett recently told a group in Juneau that he made it to his early teens with an array of unexplained problems. He said he couldn't focus or remember things he was just told; that he was often at a loss during class; that his jaw would lock, sometimes tightly enough that he couldn't eat or drink, and that he suffered debilitating migraines.

He was 14 when he realized those problems and others resulted from his mother's drinking during pregnancy.

"I was angry at (my mother) in the beginning but I love her and I know she didn't do this on purpose," Fawcett said. "No mother would do this intentionally. If more people understood this, mothers wouldn't be the focus."

Alaska has been somewhat of a national leader by creating a network of diagnostic clinics and treatment programs, Astley said.

"Damage can take place throughout pregnancy, from very early to the very end," she said. "It's impossible to predict exactly what damage will take place if you drink at a certain time and you can't tell for sure when certain effects were caused."

Seven-term Rep. Beth Kerttula, D-Juneau, remembers when discussion in the Capitol started and ended with how severely mothers should be punished. Kerttula recalls a fellow legislator saying during a committee hearing a few years ago that drinking pregnant women should be taken to the wharf in downtown Juneau, latched into stockades and have tomatoes thrown at them.

Meyer said another bill would have held bartenders in Alaska criminally liable if they served alcohol to pregnant women.

"People have the right heart, even when they put up ideas like this," Meyer said. "You want an easy target and, sure, the mothers are easy targets. But if it was that simple, someone else would have fixed this already."

Judge Michael Jeffery of the Barrow District Court, which serves the North Slope, said a 1990 case that involved an 18-year-old affected by fetal alcohol syndrome brought the problem to his attention. Jeffery sympathized with a request by the young man's lawyer who wanted the condition to count as a mitigating factor but a panel of judges determined he could not add conditions at his discretion.

"Extra jail time didn't help him or anyone else and it's true for many people," Jeffery said.

Jeffery learned the problem is endemic in his community and around the state, especially so in the justice system: An estimated 27 percent of Alaska's inmate population has fetal alcohol syndrome, according to a 2006 state report.

Long before Jeffery's experience in the United States' northernmost court became the basis of SB151, he implemented a few changes of his own.

He uses plain English and large type to account for poor reading comprehension commonly associated with FASD during his court cases. Listening comprehension is another common problem, with only the last few words of sentences heard and remembered, so Jeffery repeats important points often and carefully structures sentences. Another procedure has caused tense moments, he said: He explains common effects of FASD, how it is caused and where to find treatment, often with parents and relatives in attendance.

"If someone doesn't speak the language, you give them a translator in court," Jeffery said. "What I'm doing for people with this disorder is no different. They don't understand things the same way, interpret information the same."

He said he wants to see similar changes elsewhere, and to that end the American Bar Association is working on a resolution that addresses some of the concerns about justice and FASD. Howard Davidson, who runs the ABA's Center on Children and the Law, said the resolution is modeled after a similar step taken by the Canadian Bar Association in 2010; he said the wording is still being refined but could be ready for a vote of approval in time for the group's national convention this August.

SB151 has attracted eight co-sponsors and the Senate Health and Social Services Committee will start discussion Monday.

Re: Letter of Support for CSSB 151 – Mitigation at Sentencing for a Defendant Affected by FASD

Dear Senator Meyer,

The Alaska Mental Health Board and Advisory Board on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse support the committee substitute for SB 151 (CSSB 151). This bill recognizes the special needs presented by Alaskans experiencing fetal alcohol spectrum disorders (FASD) in the justice system.

It is an objective of Alaska's comprehensive mental health program that people with mental and cognitive disabilities are treated with dignity in all aspects of life. Our judges, prosecutors, defenders, and court staff work to ensure that everyone who appears in court is treated fairly and with respect. However, Alaskans experiencing FASD often present with special needs and situations that impede the course of justice. Low cognitive functioning, inability to understand and stay within accepted social norms, limited short term memory, impulsivity, and impaired judgment can all result in a person experiencing FASD not being able to explain his or her actions, understand why they resulted in a criminal charge, or understand the criminal justice process. Usually, these impairments do not rise to the level of legal incompetence – but they often make it hard for judges and juries to make decisions that serve our notions of fairness and justice.

Based on research in other jurisdictions, an estimated 60% of inmates experience an FASD, brain injury, or similar organic cognitive impairment. The cost of incarceration is very high and usually does not result in restoration or rehabilitation. In fact, according to a 2009 ISER Study,[1] the cost of prison far exceeds the cost of services. CSSD 151 allows judges – at their discretion – to modify presumptive sentences to take into account the defendant's disabilities and to provide the sort of sentence needed to prevent recidivism and ensure a just outcome for victims, defendants, and our communities.

We thank you for your work on behalf of all Alaskans.

Sincerely,

J. Kate Burkhart
Executive Director

Re: Support for SB 151

Dear Senator Meyer:

The Disability Law Center of Alaska supports the objective of SB 151, which is to allow the courts to take into consideration during sentencing whether the defendant was diagnosed with a fetal alcohol spectrum disorder, a traumatic brain injury or an acquired brain injury. If these conditions cannot be considered as mitigating factors, then as one jurist observed, these individuals are paying for their disability with their freedom.

Thank you for your efforts in correcting this manifest injustice.

Sincerely,

Senator Kevin Meyer
Alaska State Legislature
Juneau, Alaska 99801

Dear Senator Meyer,

It is with great pleasure that the Alaska FASD Partnership supports SB 151 to include FASD as a mitigating factor in sentencing.

The intent underlying Alaska's sentencing structure – that people will modify their behaviors based on the criminal justice system's response to their crimes – is not met when applied to individuals with FASD. These disabilities manifest as deficits in executive function, resulting in impaired adaptive behavior, memory difficulties, an inability to plan, and a failure to recognize the consequences of actions. In the interest of justice, it is important to take these deficits into account during sentencing. Neither the offender nor society benefits from holding individuals with FASD to community standards that they cannot possibly attain given their impairments.

The cost of incarceration in Alaska's prison is about $136 per day. Over the course of five to ten years in an Alaskan prison, an inmate is expected to cost the state close to $250,000-$500,000 (not including medical, mental health or other specialized treatment while incarcerated).

The cost of intensive case management, including electronic monitoring and probation/parole, is about $76 per day ($48 for intensive case management, $21 for electronic monitoring, $7 for probation/parole) – for a savings of $21,900 per person, per year.[1]

According to the 2009 ISER Study, The Cost of Crime: Could the State Reduce Future Crime and Save Money by Expanding Education and Treatment Programs?" the cost of providing services is less than the cost of incarceration. With appropriate supports, clients with FASD and other brain-based disabilities can live successfully in the community as contributing citizens, and provide jobs for Alaskan case workers, clinicians, assisted living providers, mental health and substance abuse counselors, psychologists and psychiatrists. Not only does SB 151 further the cause of justice for a vulnerable population, it represents a better investment of our state's resources.

Additionally, the state's movement toward "Smart Justice" aims to promote reduced public costs, fewer crimes, and a greater rehabilitative effect on offenders. While some offenders are clearly dangerous enough and need long-term incarceration, the research behind "Smart Justice" suggests that for certain non-violent offenders, treatment programs inside the prison, combined with adequate transition and case management services, will result in lower costs, less recidivism, and a safer general public.

Thank you for the time and effort you have put into supporting this important effort.

MEMORANDUM February 27, 2012

SUBJECT: Sectional Summary of the 2012 Revisor's Bill
(Work Order No. 27-LS0888\A)

TO: Representative Carl Gatto
Chair of the House Judiciary Committee
Attn: Melanie Lesh

FROM: Kathryn L. Kurtz KK
Assistant Revisor

The following is a sectional summary of the 2012 revisor's bill. The bill is prepared under AS 01.05.036, which provides, in part, that the revisor of statutes

> . . . shall prepare for submission to the legislature legislation for the correction or removal of the deficiencies, conflicts, or obsolete provisions, or to otherwise improve the form or substance of any portion of the statute law of this state.

To assist the reader in understanding the bill, I have summarized the contents by listing sections that have similar purposes or effects.

Sections that delete, repeal, or update obsolete provisions: Sections 1 - 3, 7 - 12, and 14 amend or repeal provisions that have become obsolete.

Sections that correct errors or oversights: Sections 4 - 6 correct errors or oversights.

Sections that improve the form or substance of the law: Section 13 proposes an amendment to improve the form or substance of the statutory law of Alaska.

SECTION 1. Amends AS 18.50.165(a) to remove the phrase "on and after July 1, 1997" in two places. The subsection requires the state registrar of vital statistics to prepare a form for acknowledging paternity under AS 25.20.055. The date is long past, along with any transition period needed to adapt to the requirements specified -- the date reference has become obsolete.

SECTION 2. Amends AS 18.56.110(g) to remove the phrase "beginning after June 30, 1983". This subsection has been in place since 1981. The limitation it expresses originally applied to periods beginning after June 30, 1982; that was extended by sec. 2, ch. 35, SLA 1982, to apply to periods beginning after June 30, 1983. Given the length of time the provision has now been in place, the date reference has become obsolete.

SECTION 3. Amends AS 26.05.060 to remove references to 48 U.S.C. 473 - 479, part of a larger portion of the federal code that was omitted from the 1970 (and subsequent) editions of the United States Code because it related to Alaska as a territory. Since those sections became obsolete for federal purposes when Alaska achieved statehood, the reference to them here in the Alaska Statutes is also obsolete. The section retains language that makes the Alaska National Guard and the Alaska Naval Militia subject to all applicable federal laws.

SECTION 4. Amends AS 29.60.800 to change the name of the "municipal harbor facility grant fund" to the "harbor facility grant fund", in order to match the changes made in secs. 6 and 7, ch. 7, SLA 2011. Those sections made regional housing authorities eligible to apply for the harbor facility grants, and removed the word "municipal" in reference to those grants in AS 29.60.810 and 29.60.820.

SECTION 5. Amends AS 42.05.711(r) to remove a definition of the term "renewable energy resources" by reference to AS 42.45.045, since that section is the subject of a delayed repeal scheduled to occur in 2013. The text of the definition now found in AS 42.45.045 is added to AS 42.05.711 by the following section of this bill, so that AS 42.05.711 will not be affected by the repeal of AS 42.45.045. Also changes a reference to the effective date of the subsection to August 31, 2010, the actual effective date of the subsection.

SECTION 6. Amends AS 42.05.711 by adding a new subsection. See the analysis for the previous section.

SECTION 7. Amends AS 43.20.014(f)(1), which defines "school district" by reference to the definition in AS 14.03.126 (repealed by sec. 8, ch. 41, SLA 2006, effective June 30, 2009). This bill section removes the reference to AS 14.03.126, and inserts the text of the definition from that section as it read prior to the repeal.

SECTION 8. In AS 43.55.019(g)(1), substitutes a reference to the definition of "school district" in AS 43.20.014, as amended by sec. 7, for a reference to AS 14.03.126, which has been repealed. See Sec. 7 for further explanation.

SECTION 9. In AS 43.56.018(f)(1), substitutes a reference to the definition of "school district" in AS 43.20.014, as amended by sec. 7, for a reference to AS 14.03.126, which has been repealed. See Sec. 7 for further explanation.

SECTION 10. In AS 43.65.018(f)(1), substitutes a reference to the definition of "school district" in AS 43.20.014, as amended by sec. 7, for a reference to AS 14.03.126, which has been repealed. See Sec. 7 for further explanation.

SECTION 11. In AS 43.75.018(f)(1), substitutes a reference to the definition of "school district" in AS 43.20.014, as amended by sec. 7, for a reference to AS 14.03.126, which has been repealed. See Sec. 7 for further explanation.

SECTION 12. In AS 43.77.045(f)(1), substitutes a reference to the definition of "school district" in AS 43.20.014, as amended by sec. 7, for a reference to AS 14.03.126, which has been repealed. See Sec. 7 for further explanation.

SECTION 13. Amends AS 44.62.190, relating to notice of the proposed adoption, amendment or repeal of a regulation. The paragraph amended, AS 44.62.190(a)(6), provides for electronic notice of these changes to legislators. The amendment deletes the qualifying phrase "if the state agency has the technological capability," because, according to the Regulations Attorney at the Department of Law, all state departments now have this capability. This section also deletes the clause permitting an agency that does not have the technological capability to furnish electronic notification to legislators through an alternative method.

SECTION 14. Repeals AS 21.27.380(f), which provides for the renewal of two year trainee licenses issued to a managing general agent, reinsurance intermediary broker, reinsurance intermediary manager, or surplus lines broker. The provisions permitting issuance of those two year trainee licenses, AS 21.27.600, 21.27.680, 21.27.740, and 21.27.800, were repealed by sec. 53, ch. 96, SLA 2004, making the renewal provision in AS 21.27.380(f) superfluous.

SECTION 15. Provides for an immediate effective date.

TEXT OF REPEALED PROVISION

AS 21.27.380(f):

> (f) A two-year trainee license issued to a managing general agent, reinsurance intermediary broker, reinsurance intermediary manager, or surplus lines broker may be renewed only once.

Title 21. INSURANCE
Chapter 21.27. PRODUCERS, AGENTS, ADMINISTRATORS, BROKERS, ADJUSTERS, AND MANAGERS

Sec. 21.27.380. License renewal, lapse, and reinstatement.

(a) Except as provided in this title, the director may renew a license biennially on a date set by the director if the licensee continues to be qualified under this chapter and, on or before the close of business of the renewal date, meets all renewal requirements established by regulation and pays the renewal license fees set under AS 21.06.250 for each license to the director. A licensee is responsible for knowing the date that a license lapses and for renewing a license before expiration. The director shall notify the licensee of the license renewal 30 days before the renewal date.

(b) If a license is not renewed on or before the renewal date set by the director, the license lapses. A licensee may not act as or represent to be an insurance producer, managing general agent, reinsurance intermediary broker, reinsurance intermediary manager, surplus lines broker, or independent adjuster during the time a license has lapsed. The director may reinstate a lapsed license if the person continues to qualify for the license, pays renewal license fees, and a delayed renewal penalty. Reinstatement does not exempt a person from a penalty provided by law for transacting business while unlicensed. A license may not be renewed if it has lapsed for two years or longer.

(c) If a licensee does not wish to renew a license issued under this chapter, the licensee shall surrender the license to the director on or before the close of business of the renewal date in the manner prescribed in AS 21.27.460.

(d) Notice of lapse from the director stating the reason for the lapse shall be mailed to a licensee at the licensee's last address on record with the director. The director shall obtain a certificate of mailing from the United States Postal Service.

(e) A trainee license issued to an independent adjuster shall be for a term not to exceed 12 months and may not be renewed.

(f) A two-year trainee license issued to a managing general agent, reinsurance intermediary broker, reinsurance intermediary manager, or surplus lines broker may be renewed only once.

From: Senator Bettye Davis

RE: Request for SB 179 "Missing Vulnerable Adult Response Plan" to be heard in the State Affairs Committee

Representative Thompson,

You currently have in your possession (current bill pending House referral) SB 179 – "An Act relating to missing vulnerable adult prompt response and notification plans." I am requesting that SB 179 be heard in the Judiciary Committee as soon as possible and have included the bill packet.

SB 179 creates a new statewide alert system to help find vulnerable missing adults. The system, which is similar to the nationwide Amber Alert program, would help local law enforcement notify the public when a mentally or physically impaired Alaskan goes missing. This program is of immediate importance because of the urgency of the issue that it seeks to address. The tragic incident in December of 2011 when a 63-year-old woman in Fairbanks who suffered from Alzheimer's Disease froze to death after becoming disoriented while driving and running out of gas, provides an indication of the immediacy of the issue. With Alaska's increasing senior population and the corresponding growth in the number of Alaskans suffering from Alzheimer's Disease and related dementia, such incidents as the tragedy in Fairbanks can be expected to occur more frequently. Furthermore, the dangers posed by the elements and the potential for wandering into isolated areas that are particular to Alaska create an even greater urgency for an alert system to be implemented. Such a system, which would be operated by the Department of Military Affairs and the Department of Public Safety, is a necessary tool in the protection of Alaska's citizens.

Thanks in advance for your consideration. If you have any questions, please contact Celeste Hodge at (907)-465-4906.

SENATE BILL 179-"MISSING VULNERABLE ADULT RESPONSE PLAN"

SB179 creates a new statewide alert system to help find vulnerable missing adults. The system, which is similar to the nationwide Amber Alert program, would help local law enforcement notify the public when a mentally or physically impaired Alaskan goes missing.

According to the Alaska Commission on Aging, there were approximately 7,785 Alaskans suffering from Alzheimer's Disease and related dementia in 2010, and that number is expected to grow to more than 17,000 by 2030. Alaska has the fastest growing senior population in the nation and we can't afford to ignore this problem any longer.

Recently, in Fairbanks, a 63-year-old woman suffering from Alzheimer's Disease froze to death after she became disoriented while driving, ran out of gas, and tried walking several miles to seek help. This incident and several others like it demonstrate the need for an alert system to assist in the search for missing vulnerable adults. When a vulnerable adult goes missing, his or her best chance of survival is if someone finds them within 24 to 48 hours.

The bill calls for the Department of Military Affairs to coordinate with Department of Public Safety to create and implement prompt response and notification plans that would use a voluntary network of statewide and local newspapers as well as radio and television stations to rapidly alert the public that a vulnerable adult is missing. The bill also calls for both departments to establish standards on what triggers an alert and when a vulnerable adult is officially considered missing. This legislation would ensure the search for Alaska's most vulnerable citizens happens a lot faster.

Currently, there are 28 states that have implemented or will implement Silver Alert programs, an increase of 10 states since the National Association of States United for Aging and Disabilities (NASUAD's) last report.

BILL NO. SB179

Analysis

This bill amends AS 44.41 by adding a new section requiring the Department of Public Safety (DPS), in cooperation with the Department of Military and Veterans' Affairs (DMVA), to develop and implement missing vulnerable adult response and notification plans using statewide and local radio and television broadcasters and newspaper publishers.

It is expected that DPS will implement the notification using DMVA's modernized emergency alert system, EMnet. This system is new and it is anticipated that it includes all the capabilities necessary to implement the missing vulnerable adult notification on a statewide or regional basis. Therefore, a zero fiscal note is being submitted.

A Silver Alert is a public notification system in the United States to broadcast information about missing persons - especially seniors with Alzheimer's Disease, dementia or other mental disabilities - in order to aid in their return.

Silver Alerts use a wide array of media outlets—such as commercial radio stations, television stations, and cable TV—to broadcast information about missing persons. Silver Alerts also use variable-message signs on roadways to alert motorists to be on the lookout for missing seniors. In cases in which a missing person is believed to have gone missing on foot, Silver Alerts have used Reverse 911 or other emergency notification systems to notify nearby residents of the neighborhood surrounding the missing person's last known location.

Supporters of Silver Alert point to America's growing elderly population as a reason to support new programs to locate missing seniors. Approximately 6 in 10 dementia victims will wander at least once, health care statistics show, and the numbers are growing worldwide, fueled primarily by Alzheimer's disease.[1] If not found within 24 hours, up to half of wandering seniors with dementia suffer serious injury or death.[2]

History

In December 2005, Oklahoma state Representative Fred Perry (R-Tulsa) announced his intention to introduce an "AMBER Alert for seniors," which he dubbed "Silver Alert."[3] In March 2006, the Oklahoma House of Representatives passed H.R. 1075, a resolution calling for a Silver Alert system to find missing seniors.[4] In response to this non-binding resolution, the Oklahoma Department of Public Safety added Silver Alert notifications to the statewide alerts sent to law enforcement agencies and the media for rapid distribution.[5] In April 2009, Governor Brad Henry signed legislation permanently establishing the Silver Alert program.[6]

In Georgia, public efforts to locate missing seniors increased following the April 2004 disappearance of Mattie Moore, a 68-year-old Atlanta resident suffering from Alzheimer's disease. Eight months after Moore's disappearance, her body was found 500 yards from her home.[7] The City of Atlanta created "Mattie's Call" to coordinate and support Metro Atlanta law enforcement, emergency management and broadcasters to issue an urgent bulletin in missing persons cases involving persons with Alzheimer's disease, dementia and other mental disabilities.[8] Legislation to create a statewide Mattie's Call program was enacted in April 2006.[9]

In Florida, Mary Zelter, an 86-year-old resident of Largo, drove away from her assisted living facility on Feb. 26, 2008 and never returned. Her body was found a week later 10 miles (16 km) away in the Intracoastal Waterway near a Clearwater boat ramp. Her submerged car was nearby. This tragedy prompted Pinellas County officials to create a Silver Alert pilot program that later grew into a statewide initiative.[10]

[edit] National growth

29 states and New York City[11] have Silver Alert or similar programs targeting missing seniors. More than 195 million people live in jurisdictions served by Silver Alert or a similar program.

20 states have missing senior recovery programs that are formally called "Silver Alert":

- Arkansas[12]
- Connecticut[13]
- Florida[14]
- Illinois[15]
- Indiana[16]
- Kansas[17]
- Louisiana[18]
- Maine[19]
- Maryland[20]
- Massachusetts[21]
- Mississippi[22]
- Nevada[23]
- New Jersey[24]
- North Carolina[25]
- Oklahoma[26]
- Rhode Island[27]
- South Carolina[28]
- Tennessee[29]
- Texas[30]
- West Virginia[31]

Additionally, 9 states have programs to help locate missing seniors that are not officially called "Silver Alert" but contain criteria similar to existing Silver Alert programs:

- Alabama, Missing Senior Alert[32]
- Delaware, Gold Alert[33]
- Colorado, Missing Senior Citizen Alert[34]
- Georgia, Mattie's Call[35]
- Kentucky, Golden Alert[36]
- New Hampshire, Missing Senior Citizen Alert[37]

INTRODUCTION

In March 2009, NASUAD released a report that identified states that have a Silver Alert program, how they fund it, and how each administers the program. The report revealed that 18 states have a Silver Alert program, 14 states had pending legislation, and 18 states did not have legislation.

Several states have implemented Silver Alert programs since our last report. The following chart reflects the updated status of states across the country.

States with Silver Alert Programs		States with Pending Legislation	States Without Silver Alert Programs

 Wisconsin governor vetoed legislation for a lack of funding.

States with Silver Alert Programs

Currently, there are 28 states that have implemented or will implement Silver Alert programs, an increase of 10 states since the NASUAD's last report. The following section provides a brief summary of the legislation that establishes the programs, the agencies administering the programs, and the program requirements for initiating an alert. The links below will provide you with further information on each state's Silver Alert program.

Alabama

The Alabama Missing Senior Citizen Alert Act (HB 33) went into effect on June 1, 2009. The purpose of this law is to provide immediate response to missing or lost seniors age 60 or older who are at risk of bodily harm or death and to gain the voluntary assistance of the broadcast media to help locate missing seniors. The Department of Public Safety, who administers this program, works collaboratively with other local and state law enforcement agencies, the Alabama Association of Broadcasters and licensed broadcasters in the state.

To view the legislation, please visit the following Web site.

Arkansas

House Bill 2087, "An Act to Establish the 'Silver Alert System' for Adults Who Are Living with Dementia or Other Cognitive Impairment," was filed, but it never became law. However, in March 2009, the Arkansas State Police entered into a Memorandum of Understanding with the Arkansas Sheriffs' Association and the Arkansas Association of Chiefs of Police to host an Internet website that provides Arkansas broadcasters and news organizations a means to receive Arkansas Silver Alerts that are shared with the public. Silver Alerts are disseminated for missing persons 18 years of age or older who are living with dementia or other cognitive impairment.

Connecticut

Substitute Senate Bill 451 went into effect July 1, 2009 establishing Connecticut's Silver Alert System. The Department of Public Safety's Missing Child Information Clearinghouse administers the program and notifies the public of missing persons 65 years of age or older and anyone 18 or over who has a mental impairment.

Indiana

Governor Mitch Daniels signed Senate Bill 307 to establish the Indiana Silver Alert, effective July 1, 2009. The Indiana Clearinghouse for Information on Missing Children and Missing Endangered Adults administers the program and works collaboratively with private organizations and law enforcement agencies in alerting the public of missing persons age 18 or older with mental illness, dementia, or other mental or physical incapacity.

Kansas

The Kansas Silver Alert Plan was implemented on July 30, 2009 following a resolution that called for the establishment of this senior alert system, but did not require it by law (SHL Resolution 2506). It is administered by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, which collaborates with local law enforcement agencies and the media to alert the public of missing persons living with dementia or persons over age 65 with a medical or mental condition or one who is at risk of harming himself.

The following Web site provides the protocol and policies for the Silver Alert Plan.

Maryland

In October 2009, Maryland established its Silver Alert Program (HB 192) that is designed to alert the public about missing persons with cognitive impairments such as Alzheimer's or dementia. The Department of State Police administers the statewide program and works collaboratively with the State Highway Administration on this initiative.

Mississippi

The Mississippi Silver Alert System Act of 2010 (HB 664) went into effect July 1, 2010. The Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Public Safety will be responsible for implementing the statewide alert system. The purpose of the Silver Alert System is to provide a tiered, rapid response system to notify the public about missing endangered adults age 18 or older with dementia or other cognitive impairments. The Bureau of Investigation will work with local law enforcement agencies and the Mississippi Highway Patrol Headquarters Communication Center to alert the public about missing persons.

New Jersey

The Silver Alert System Act went into effect on December 22, 2009. The State Police administers the program and disseminates missing person information on people age 65 or older to broadcast media, the Department of Transportation, the New Jersey Highway Authority, the New Jersey Turnpike Authority, and the South Jersey Transportation Authority.

Tennessee

The Tennessee Senior Alert Act went into effect on August 4, 2009. West Virginia

HB 2504 was signed into law by Governor Joe Manchin and went into effect on July 10, 2009 establishing the West Virginia's Silver Alert Plan. The State Police administers the program by providing alerts for cognitively impaired missing persons to broadcast media, the Department of Transportation, the Division of Highways, the West Virginia Turnpike Commission, and affected authorities. HB 2504 does not specify an age requirement of a cognitively impaired missing person.

Pending Legislation

California

On December 22, 2008, Senators Alquist, Correa, and Oropeza introduced SB 38, a bill that would establish a missing senior person alert system. The bill specifies that a missing person would have to be 65 years of age or older and must have an impaired mental condition. As of August 27, 2009, there has been a second reading of the bill and it is currently being held in committee.

Hawaii

Since January 2009, Hawaii legislators have introduced six bills that would establish a Silver Alert system in their state. However, it appears that SB2226 SD2 HD1 is the only bill that has received considerable action. It was introduced January 21, 2010 and, as of March 12, 2010, it passed the second reading as amended in HD 1 and was referred to the Committee on Judiciary without opposition. The bill specifies that the public alert would be made for missing senior citizens and defines a senior citizens as one who is 65 years of age or older.

Massachusetts

H4344 (new draft of S322, H44, and H603) would establish a Silver Alert community response system to protect seniors. This Silver Alert system would be used to alert the public of missing adults with serious memory impairment such as Alzheimer's disease or other dementia. The last action recorded for this bill was on November 17, 2009 when the Joint Committee on Community Development and Small Business reported favorably on it and referred it to the House Committee on Ways and Means.

Pennsylvania

On March 5, 2009, the General Assembly of Pennsylvania referred HB 726 to Committee on Aging and Older Adult Services. HB 726, which is also referred to as the Silver Alert for Missing Senior Citizens Act, would establish a statewide alert system for notifying the public of missing persons age 65 or older who have an impaired mental condition and whose disappearance poses a credible threat to the senior citizens' health and safety. The Secretary of the Department of Aging is responsible for appointing a director to serve as the statewide coordinator of the alert system.

NASUAD will continue to monitor pending legislations.

Legislation That Did Not Pass

Nevada
According to the Nevada Silver Haired Legislative Forum, AB 4 that would establish a statewide Silver Alert system was referred to the Health and Human Services Committee and died on April 11, 2009 due to no further action being taken on the bill.

Wisconsin
Unfunded legislation to establish a Silver Alert program was vetoed by Governor Jim Doyle.

Silver Alert

Modeled after the Amber Alert, the Silver Alert is an emergency system in which law enforcement can broadcast regional or statewide alerts for missing seniors and/or other adults with Alzheimer's or other cognitive disorders.

A growing number of states are enacting laws that call for the development of the Silver Alert program and some have implemented their own notification systems.

Activation criteria varies from state to state, see list below for information on the Silver Alert program in your state.

Fairbanks woman's death sheds light on harsh reality of living with Alzheimer's disease by Dorothy Chomicz / dchomicz@newsminer.com

12.03.11 - 12:28 am

FAIRBANKS — When you are caring for a loved one with Alzheimer's, the possibility of that person wandering off is an ever-present worry. In fact, six out of 10 Alzheimer's patients will wander at some point, and many do so repeatedly, according to the Alzheimer's Association website (www.alz.org).

The situation becomes even more serious in places like Alaska, where severe weather conditions can spell death for someone who has wandered outside and is unprepared for the elements.

This danger was brought to reality this week when Bonnie L. Scott, a 63-year-old Fairbanks woman who suffered from Alzheimer's, became confused while driving an acquaintance home in Fairbanks and ended up 80 miles northeast on the Steese Highway.

Scott wandered away from her vehicle after running out of gas, and Alaska State Troopers were able to follow her footprints into the woods, where they found her body. She had died of exposure after walking by a manned Department of Transportation maintenance facility in which she could have found shelter and aid.

Most cases of wandering do not occur in vehicles and are instead instances of the individual simply walking out of the door while a caretaker is distracted or sleeping.

To minimize the risk of wandering, experts suggest making changes around the home, such as camouflaging exit doors by painting them the same color as the wall, and draping door knobs with same-color cloth.

Placing a mirror next to the door can also stop the potential wanderer — they either think there is someone else there, or they become distracted by their own reflection.

Extra door latches can be placed at the tops or bottom of doors, where they will not be noticed, and car keys should be kept hidden. Chimes or alarms can be placed on doors to alert the caregiver.

Since wandering is often caused by restlessness, fear or physical need, make sure that basics such as hunger, thirst and the need to use the toilet are all met regularly.

If it is physically possible, provide the individual with recreational opportunities such as short, supervised walks or get them to help with simple household chores. Reassure them if they feel agitated or fearful, and give them a routine to help them feel secure.

Even though caregivers are often tempted to keep a person's Alzheimer's a secret, it is important that neighbors and family members be told of potential wandering, and be provided with a good contact number. Always keep a current, clear photo of the individual on hand, and consider keeping one on file with your local police department.

Keep as much identification as possible on the person — place it in every coat, purse, pocket or wallet, and think about providing the person with an ID bracelet or necklace.

Since identification is only helpful once the person has been found, consider purchasing an electronic tracking device that can be used to locate them before tragedy occurs. According to the Alzheimer's Foundation of America website, a person with dementia "only stands a 50 percent chance of survival if they are not found within the first 24 hours."

Finally, do not leave the individual alone. Since it is virtually impossible for one person to keep an Alzheimer's sufferer in sight at all times, it is essential that the caregiver establish a support network that can help out and provide a break when needed.

Alzheimer's Resource of Alaska provides services, information and education to Alaskans dealing with Alzheimer's and has five offices statewide. They can be reached at their Fairbanks office at 452-2277, or visited at www.alzalaska.org.

Attachments: Silver Alert Updated Report_11-9-10.pdf

Celeste,

Per your request, and after review of the draft legislation, I am providing the following response from our Emergency Operations Section:

A portion of the Alaska Amber Alert Plan involves the local law enforcement agency and the Alaska State Troopers providing additional "emergency public information" to broadcast outlets to assist with the recovery effort. Most Sliver Alert plans revolve around that. Not using EAS, but notifying and providing information on the missing person, vehicle, etc, and the broadcast outlets voluntarily providing that information to their viewers/listeners. In many cases State DOTs or those who control highway signs would also post the information to the public, as well as the investigating law enforcement agency providing a BOLO alert in the state APSIN/NCIC systems.

Attached is a seven page report from the 2010 summary of States performed by the National Association of States United for Aging and Disabilities. The report is a summary of states that have plans, and the enabling legislation behind it. It doesn't speak to operational aspects.

From an EAS standpoint there is no event code that is designated for missing persons (adults), so we couldn't utilize EAS like we do for Amber alerts, which uses the special "Child Abduction Emergency" code.

We certainly could work with DPS on this plan, the same players from AST, DHS&EM, APD, and the Alaska Broadcasters Association could work out the plans that would be required by the bill/law.

So, to be clear, we have no issues on the draft legislation.

Please do not hesitate to contact me should you have any questions. Thank you.

Sincerely,

Mike O'Hare

8 February 2012

Senator Bill Wielechowski
Chairman, Senate State Affairs Committee
State Capitol Room 101
Juneau AK, 99801

Dear Senator Wielechowski:

On behalf of the Alzheimer's Association, I am pleased to extend our support for Senate Bill 179, sponsored by Senator Bettye Davis, which would address the need for a prompt response system when a vulnerable adult has gone missing. The Association supports creating a system that provides for dissemination of relevant information about missing individuals with Alzheimer's disease or a related dementia to appropriate law enforcement personnel.

An estimated six out of ten people with Alzheimer's disease will wander from their homes or caregiving facilities at some point during the disease process. Most people with dementia who wander are found within 1.5 miles of home, and 50 percent of individuals who wander risk serious injury or death if not found within the first 24 hours. Environmental dangers pose serious threats to people with Alzheimer's who are particularly vulnerable to succumb to natural elements such as weather, and who may lose their ability to remember when to eat or drink. An immediate response with emphasis on local searching is imperative once an individual with dementia is reported missing.

The Alzheimer's Association supports a comprehensive approach to constructing a notification, or "silver alert", system that addresses the needs of persons with dementia and their families. This approach includes first responder dementia training and coordinating search efforts between families, caregivers and local authorities. The system should be interoperable with existing programs, such as the MedicAlert and Safe Return program, which is a nationwide identification, support and enrollment program providing assistance to adult wanders and their families.

I appreciate the opportunity to comment on this issue and applaud Senator Davis for spearheading this effort.

With best regards,

Randi Chapman
Director, State Affairs

Subject: Support for SB 179, Missing Vulnerable Adult Prompt Response Plan

Dear Chair Lynn:

The Alaska Commission on Aging (ACoA) is pleased to offer our support for SB 179 to establish a vulnerable adult prompt response and notification plan by the Department of Public Safety in cooperation with the Department of Military and Veterans' Affairs. SB 179, authored by Senator Bettye Davis, has a $0 fiscal note. Although this legislation addresses the problems of all vulnerable missing adults, our support letter will focus on the benefits we perceive for vulnerable older Alaskans from this legislation.

Wandering is one of the most significant personal safety risks faced by individuals with Alzheimer's disease and related dementia (ADRD). According to the Alzheimer's Association (2011), nearly 60% of people with Alzheimer's disease wander at some point during the course of their disease with approximately one-half of all wanderings resulting in personal injury if the person is not found within 24 hours. For an elder living in a rural and remote community, especially in the wintertime, getting lost has life and death consequences.

As part of our efforts to learn more about the needs of people with ADRD and their caregivers, the ACoA hosted two Community Forums at the Anchorage Senior Citizens Activities Center (December 2011) and at the Juneau Senior Center (February 2012). Both forums were well-attended with the majority of participants being family and professional caregivers. Improving public response services to reduce safety risks for persons with ADRD who wander was identified as a priority concern by the Forum participants. While Anchorage's "Project Lifesaver," administered by Search and Rescue is an effective program for individuals with Alzheimer's disease, this program is available in Anchorage only with limited programs of this kind available statewide.

The ACoA supports SB 179 to authorize the Department of Public Safety to work with the Department of Military and Veterans' Affairs to develop a missing vulnerable adult response plan that will improve the safety of vulnerable Alaskans, such as individuals with Alzheimer's disease and related dementia. Thank you for your support of this legislation. Please feel free to contact Denise Daniello, ACoA's executive director, by phone (465-4879) or email (denise.daniello@alaska.gov) should you have questions or require additional information.

Sincerely,

Sharon Howerton-Clark

Enclosed is the draft blank committee substitute bill you requested. Please note that sec. 2 of the bill creates an offense, "nonsexual abuse of a minor," that overlaps with the bill's proposed new definition of "serious physical injury," and has elements very similar to those of existing crimes, including felony assault under AS 11.41.220(a). When two offenses have elements that are very similar the offenses can merge at trial or sentencing in some cases, causing prosecution or sentencing of the defendant to be limited to the lesser offense.

TO: Representative Steve Thompson
Attn: Jane Pierson

FROM: Dan Wayne
Legislative Counsel

Enclosed is the draft committee substitute for the above-numbered bill.

The Constitution of the State of Alaska, article II, section 13, requires that the subject of each bill shall be expressed in the title. If the committee substitute is adopted, the title of the bill will need to be changed. Because the title change would be to a Senate bill in the House, a concurrent resolution would be required to suspend Uniform Rules 24(c), 35, 41(b) and 42(e), which prohibit changes to a bill's title in the second house. If the committee substitute is adopted by a committee, the committee may ask this office to draft a concurrent resolution at the time a committee substitute is prepared.

"An Act relating to crimes against children."

On February 8, 2012 the Children's Justice Task Force (CJA) a federally-mandated, state-wide multidisciplinary group presented their findings to the Joint Senate Judiciary and HESS Committees with their system recommendations for improvement through criminal legislation. I became aware through this presentation, research, and other important conversations that we have shortcomings in the current criminal laws regarding the prosecution of harm to children.

Those that suffer from these short comings are Alaska's children and the numbers are staggering. In 2008, approximately 12,400 children were likely victims of at least one incident of maltreatment, which breaks down to 34 children per day. In the instance of a child death, 1 out of every 5 was related to maltreatment.

SB 210 works with the recommendations from CJA to create tougher penalties on crimes committed against a child. The bill will create increased criminal liability for assaults to children by modifying the current definition of "serious physical injury" and increases penalties when a parent intentionally withholds adequate food or liquids.

Together, the Legislature can assist our future generations by providing them with laws that protect their rights and create safer communities for their growth and development. I urge your support for this legislation.

BOARD RESOLUTION OF THE CHILDREN'S PLACE

ADOPTED ON MARCH 14, 2012

The undersigned, being the Board Chair and Executive Director of The Children's Place "The Children's Place", a 501(c)(3) private, not for profit agency providing support and coordination of services related to the evaluation, investigation, and treatment of child abuse to the communities in the Matanuska-Susitna Valley, with the approval, direction, and concurrence of the Board of Directors of The Children's Place "The Board of Directors", hereby sign the following resolution in support of SB 210, "An Act Relating to Crimes Against Children":

WHEREAS:

1. The Children's Place and the Board of Directors has become aware through presentation, research, and other important conversations brought by the Children's Justice Act Task Force that the State of Alaska has shortcomings in the current criminal laws regarding the prosecution of harm to children, and;
2. The Children's Place and the Board of Directors are aware that SB 210 works with the recommendations from the Children's Justice Act Task Force to create tougher penalties on crimes committed against children, and;
3. The Children's Place and the Board of Directors knows that in 2008, over 12,000 children were likely victims of at least one type of child maltreatment – approximately 34 children each day; that 1 out of every 5 infant deaths in Alaska Is related to maltreatment; that Alaska has one of the highest rates of maltreatment-related infant mortality in the nation; and that child abuse has life-long implications including adverse effects on adult physical and mental health, and;
4. The Children's Place and the Board of Directors believes that young children may be unable to describe what has happened to them (due to age, developmental status or knowledge base) in a way that fits Alaska's current assault or strangulation statues, and;
5. The Children's Place and the Board of Directors is aware that in some situations, current Alaska state laws do not allow perpetrators of serious child physical abuse and neglect to be held appropriately accountable, and;
6. The Children's Place and the Board of Directors believes that criminal penalties for harming children should be higher than those penalties for harming adults who are much more likely to be able to defend themselves, and;
7. The Children's Place and the Board of Directors requests the Legislature assist our future generations by providing them with laws that protect their rights and create safer communities for their growth and development.

IT IS RESOLVED THAT:

The Children's Place and the Board of Directors urge your support for this legislation.

Mom Arrested for Emotional, Physical Abuse of Adopted Children
Anya James, 50, was arrested Tuesday and is charged with ten counts of kidnapping and six counts of first-degree assault.
By Colleen Kelly

An Anchorage mom has been arrested for subjecting her six adopted children to years of emotional and physical abuse, according to Anchorage police.

Following an eight-month investigation, 50-year-old Anya James now faces criminal offenses for the gross mistreatment of her children. James was arrested Tuesday and is charged with ten counts of kidnapping and six counts of first-degree assault.

APD Detective Chris Thomas began the investigation in early October 2010 after receiving a claim of child abuse against four of James' children living in her Hillside home. That same month, several of James' children were removed from the home and hospitalized due to severe malnourishment.

The investigation further revealed that due to malnourishment, James' adopted children endured stunted growth, which prevented some of them from going through puberty during their teenage years.

According to police, the children were confined to small rooms with alarms rigged up to the doors and windows to alert James if the children tried to escape. The mother also used audio and video monitors to oversee the children's activity and conversations.

Despite three functioning bathrooms inside the home, the children were forced to use a bucket filled with kitty litter instead of a toilet placed inside the small rooms.

James is currently booked at the Anchorage Jail; her bail is set at $100,000 cash plus third-party custodian. She will not have contact with any of her adopted children or minors under 16 years old, according to police. She will be arraigned in Superior Court Wednesday afternoon at the Nesbitt Courthouse in downtown Anchorage.

Between 2000 and 2010, James fostered and adopted six children and collected more than $750,000 in adoption subsidies from the State of Alaska.

If you have information about children living under James' care before 2000, contact Anchorage Police Detective Chris Thomas at 786-2628.

Lily Doss-Puder entered her plea before state Superior Court Judge Michael Wolverton, who scheduled sentencing for May, the office said.

The case against her arose last June, when her son was admitted to the hospital for emergency surgery and doctors found three sewing needles in his stomach. Anchorage Police Detective Chris Thomas investigated and, in a review of the child's medical records, found a pattern of injuries to the boy dating to June 2009, the District Attorney's office said.

When Thomas interviewed Doss-Puder, she admitted inserting the needles into her son's stomach, intentionally cutting the webbing of his hand with a knife and intentionally hitting him on the head with a 2-pound weight, the office said.

In exchange for her pleas, Doss-Puder will be sentenced to 18 years in prison with six years suspended, and she won't be allowed to contact her son until he is 18, the District Attorney's office said.

(2) the legal decision concerning whether the defendant's conduct determined under (1) of this subsection was among the most serious included in the definition of the offense shall be made by the court under procedures set out in (f)(1) of this section.

(j) If one of the aggravating factors in (c) of this section is established as provided in (f)(1) and (2) of this section, the court may increase the term of imprisonment up to the maximum term of imprisonment. Any additional aggravating factor may then be established by clear and convincing evidence by the court sitting without a jury, including an aggravating factor that the jury has found not to have been established beyond a reasonable doubt.

 Sec. 14. AS 33.05.050 is amended to read:

Sec. 33.05.050. Report of probation officer. When directed by the court, the probation officer shall report to the court [,] with a statement of the conduct of the probationer while on probation. Except as otherwise provided by law, the [THE] court may then discharge the probationer from further supervision and may terminate the proceedings against the probationer, or may extend the probation, as shall seem advisable.

Re: CS for SB 210 (FIN): Crimes Against Children
ACLU Review of Legal Issues

Dear Representative Thompson:

Thank you for the opportunity to provide written testimony with respect to the Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 210 (Finance), which addresses crimes against children.

The American Civil Liberties Union of Alaska represents thousands of members and activists throughout Alaska who seek to preserve and expand the individual freedoms and civil liberties guaranteed by the United States and Alaska Constitutions. In that context, we bring one provision to the attention of the Committee.

Section 4: Redefining "Serious Physical Injury"

The Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 210 (Finance) redefines the term "serious physical injury" to include some special categories of injury to children.

Of concern is the inclusion in (C) (ii) of "impairment of health, by serious bruising or other injury, that reasonably requires medical evaluation or treatment by a health care professional" under the definition of "serious physical injury" with regard to children under 12, (emphasis added).

"Serious physical injury" is a common statutory term used throughout the criminal statutes. Assault in the first degree, a Class A felony, can be committed by "recklessly caus[ing] serious physical injury . . . by means of a dangerous instrument" or by intentionally causing serious physical injury. AS 11.41.200. Assault in the second degree, a Class B felony, can be accomplished by recklessly causing serious physical injury. AS 11.41.210. Murder in the second degree occurs when a person acts with the intent to cause serious physical injury and actually causes death to another person. AS 11.41.110. A person may justifiably use deadly force to avoid the imposition of serious physical injury on one's self or another. AS 11.81.335 and AS 11.81.340. A first-degree robbery occurs when a person takes an item of value from another by causing or attempting to cause serious physical injury. AS 11.41.500. A person commits an act of reckless endangerment when a person recklessly acts in a way that presents a "substantial risk" of serious physical injury to another. AS 11.41.250. Failure to report an assault leading to serious physical injury to a child is itself a crime. AS 11.56.765. A "bacteriological, biological, chemical, or radiological substance" is one capable of causing serious physical injury. AS 11.56.807.

Changing the definition of "serious physical injury" to include "serious bruising or other injury" to a child under 12 could have wide-ranging effects in the law, far outside the intent of the drafters. For instance, an ordinary fistfight between two students at a school could become a B felony if one student ended up with a black eye and visited the school nurse. The nurse could be guilty of a class A misdemeanor if she failed to report the fistfight to the police. A 14-year-old who took an 11-year-old's lunch money by punching him could end up in juvenile court facing an A felony, just as if he had pointed a gun at the other child. A careless driver who knocked a child off his bicycle could be charged with an A felony or a B felony if the child was bruised and taken to the doctor. A person could legally use deadly force against another in order to prevent a child from being seriously bruised. A device capable of bruising a child would be treated like a gun.

Recommended Alternative

We presume that these effects were not intended by the drafters. To the extent the drafters intended to address the very real problem of serious assaults on children by parents and caregivers, we would suggest that the "serious bruising" provision of CS for SB 210 (FIN) be removed, and another course be chosen.

The Legislature could propose a new offense narrowly aimed at intentional assaults on children by adults, or propose enhancing sentencing aggravators for adults who assault children. However, altering the fundamental definition of "serious physical injury" for every criminal statute (and many non-criminal statutes) could have far-reaching effects, most of them likely not intended by the Legislature.

Conclusion

We agree that crimes against children are very serious and the subject of child abuse is very important. We hope that the Judiciary Committee will reconsider the provision we identified and work with the Drafter find a different legislative means to address its concerns.

Thank you again for letting us share our concerns. Please feel free to contact the undersigned should you have any questions or seek additional information.

Sincerely,

Jeffrey Mittman

CSSB 210 (FIN)
SECTIONAL ANALYSIS

Section 1 changes the age of the victim from under 10 to under 12 years in the elements of the crime of Assault in the 3rd degree. AS 11.41.220(a) in part currently prohibits a person (18 years old or over) from recklessly causing physical injury to a child under 10 years of age that would cause a reasonable person to seek medical care, or causes physical injury on two or more occasions. The bill would raise the victim's age to under 12 years old.

Section 2 amends the crime of endangering the welfare of a child in the first degree by adding the prohibition of recklessly failing to provide adequate food or liquids to a child, causing protracted impairment to a child's health. This change will increase criminal liability for offenders that harm children by withholding food and water.

Section 4 amends the definition of "serious physical injury" in Title 11. It expands the definition of serious physical injury for victims under 12 years old. It does so by adding the following

> Physical injury to a person under 12 years of age that causes:
> Serious disfigurement;
> Impairment of health, by serious bruising or other injury that reasonably requires medical evaluation or treatment by a health care professional;
> Loss or impairment of the function of a body member or organ;
> Serious impediment of blood circulation or breathing.

This broadened definition will allow for increased criminal liability for crimes committed on children under the age of 12. This broadened definition is important for children because of their quick ability to heal from injuries that would be sustained much longer in adults. In addition it would increase possible penalties for signs of strangulation and severe causes of bruising that lead to anemia.

Sections 5 – 7 amend the law (AS 12.47.040 and 12.47.060) addressing procedures for persons found to be guilty of a crime but mentally ill, by clarifying that the decision that the person is guilty but mentally ill must be made by the jury, by proof beyond a reasonable doubt, unless the defendant waives this requirement. Under AS 12.47.050(d), a person incarcerated and found guilty but mentally ill and still receiving treatment for a mental illness, is not eligible for parole release or furlough. For this reason, Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004) (Blakely) requires the decision relating to whether a person is guilty but mentally ill to be made by the jury by proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

Section 8 amends AS 12.55.025(i), addressing sentencing procedures, to clarify that while the burden of proof in sentencing proceedings is generally by a preponderance of evidence, under AS 12.55 there are various statutes that specify a different burden of proof.

Section 9 and 10 clarify the law when a defendant enters into a plea agreement that calls for a specific term of probation or a specific term of incarceration, by providing that the court, in a probation revocation proceeding, cannot unilaterally terminate or reduce those terms, except by the amount of incarceration time imposed for the offense that is the basis of the probation violation. When a court imposes sentence for a probation revocation in these cases, the court is not obligated to impose the full amount of remaining suspended time, but rather must consider the nature of the probation violation in light of applicable sentencing law and impose an appropriate sentence, subject to the caveat that its authority to impose an appropriate sentence does not include the authority to terminate or reduce the term of probation or the suspended term.

Sections 11 and 12 amend AS 12.55.125 (sentences of imprisonment for felony convictions) to clarify that factual findings (1) that result in a mandatory term of imprisonment of 99 years for conviction of murder in the first degree; (2) result in a term that would preclude a defendant from being awarded good time under AS 33.20.010(a) – for example, a person sentenced under the "three strikes" law; or (3) would increase the presumptive sentencing range – for example, a person convicted of a class A felony who possessed a firearm – must be made by a jury by proof beyond a reasonable doubt, unless the defendant waives this requirement.

Section 13 adopts a procedure for finding aggravating factor AS 12.55.155(c)(10) – the defendant's conduct was the most serious under the definition of the offense – that is consistent with the decisions of Alaska courts. That is, that the jury must decide the factual issues, but the court must make the legal decision whether it is the most serious in relation to other conduct defined in the offense.

Section 13 also provides that if one aggravating factor has been established, either by the court or the jury as required by law, additional aggravating factors may then be determined by the court by clear and convincing evidence rather than by the jury. The reason is that the finding of one aggravating factor authorizes the court to sentence an individual up to the maximum term provided by law. An additional aggravating factor cannot increase the maximum term; thus the Blakely decision does not require that additional factors to be decided by a jury by proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

Sections 14 and 15 make conforming amendments to the changes described in Sections 9 and 10.

Sections 16 and 17 describe the indirect court rule changes and the applicability provisions.

Section 18 would adopt a task force to study the crime of human trafficking. It would require that the task force prepare a report describing the number of human trafficking cases reported to law enforcement in the state since 2007, the number of cases prosecuted under Alaska law, the number of cases investigated by local and federal law enforcement agencies, and the services available to victims of human trafficking.
