SB 494 SENATE BILL NO. 494 by the Rules Committee by request of the Governor, entitled:

January 14, 1976

The Honorable Chancy Croft
President of the Senate
Alaska State Legislature
Juneau, Alaska 99811

Dear Mr. President:

In accordance with AS 24.30.060(b) and the Uniform Rules of the Alaska State Legislature, I am transmitting a bill adopting by reference the federal "Soldier's and Sailor's Civil Relief Act" and applying its provisions to members of the Alaska National Guard and Naval Militia while they are on active duty for the State by order of the Governor.

Essentially this bill provides for the suspension of certain civil liabilities, particularly of financial obligations which might come due, of persons in the service of the State during emergency active duty periods, and provision is made for the temporary suspension of legal proceedings and transactions which may prejudice their civil rights.

Sincerely,

Jay S. Hammond
Governor

SB 495 SENATE BILL NO. 495 by the Rules Committee by request of the Governor, entitled:

"An Act relating to Alaska National Guard pay and the Alaska Employment Security Act."

CIVIL LIABILITIES

PROPOSAL WILL CORRECT THE FOLLOWING PROBLEMS:

1. Current law does not provide any relief to members of the Alaska National Guard or Naval Militia from civil liabilities when in the service of the state during emergency active duty periods.

2. Members called to active duty for emergency service find their personal income reduced substantially (1/20th of normal in some cases) when placed on state active duty pay scales. Personal and family financial obligations such as mortgage or rent payments, car payments, food and utility bills, etc., continue at the same rate as before the active duty callups.

3. Members on state active duty for over one week find themselves torn between the desire to complete their emergency duties and the necessity for meeting personal financial obligations. This is especially true as the duty periods become protracted and we use units from other locations of the state, i.e. Anchorage units in the Fairbanks Flood, etc.

4. Unit Commanders find themselves deciding between mission and manpower requirements and the real personal needs of his unit members for early release from state active duty.

5. Fortunately, past experience has involved less than total committment of troops for relatively short periods of time. We cannot always guarantee this to be the case.

PROPOSAL IS DESIGNED TO:

1. Implement the provisions of the federal Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act to members of the Alaska National Guard and Naval Militia while on state active duty.

2. The federal act is a proven worthwhile and necessary protective law for federal servicemen. Implementation will do likewise for our own Guardsmen/women.

SUBJECT: Governor's Bill for Administrative Uniformity in the Tax Laws

This bill continues the move that we started with HB 211 in last year's session to provide for Administrative Uniformity of all the State's tax laws. In this measure, the subjects of assessment and collection procedures are covered. The purpose of the bill is to eliminate the multiplicity of procedures that are followed presently by having separate and different procedures for each of the different tax types that we administer. This bill will repeal those common sections of the various tax laws and place one consistent and uniform set of rules under the Administrative Chapter of Title 43. There is no budgetary or treasury effect of this measure that can be measured directly although easier compliance by taxpayers and smoother administration should result from this uniformity.

Senator Chancy Croft

Dear Senator:

I just read Arco Pipeline Company, et al. v. 3.60 Acres, More or Less, etc.; Jackie J. Stewart, et al., Opinion No. 1177 dated August 1, 1975. It holds that when a declaration of taking is utilized, the court is not authorized to inquire into the necessity of the taking.

I have been on both sides of the condemnation procedures repeatedly, and I believe this opinion is incorrect and will produce unjust results. Specifically, I believe A.S. §09.55.280 requiring that the project be located in a manner which will be most compatible with the greatest public good and the least private injury, etc., should be made applicable to all takings including those through the exercise of a declaration of taking by the so-called "quick take" method.

Historically, the State of Alaska and all other agencies to my knowledge utilizing the quick take declaration of taking procedures have always scheduled a "A and N" hearing as soon as possible following the filing of the declaration and taking and deposit of estimated just compensation. This hearing on authority and necessity always entailed testimony by the condemning agency's engineers that it was necessary to locate the project in this particular place, and take this amount of land, etc. We all seem to have been able to function with proving this requirement in the past.

Incidentally, although the engineers have testified as to the absolute necessity of a particular take location and area in proceedings in which I have participated, on several occasions I have later found that they have changed their mind and requested an amended declaration of taking because they desired for one reason or another to relocate the particular project. I only mention this because the condemning agency has engineers who will invariably testify to justify their work product even under the past procedures where necessity had to be proven in connection with the declaration of taking. The landowner is then forced to employ an engineer to review and analyze the project location at considerable expense in order to combat this testimony. However, the option of combating it at least prevents that type of abuse which seems to sometimes flow from minds trained in engineering principles without regard to broader considerations than the construction of a particular project.

While our Supreme Court has distinguished between the powers exercised through a declaration of necessity and a regular slow take proceeding, the fact of the matter is the impact on a property owner is the same. He loses his property whether he wants to or not. Why should there be a distinction requiring the condemning agency to prove necessity on the one hand, and not have to prove it on the other hand, when the property owner who is the object of the safeguard bleeds the same color and quantity of blood regardless of which knife is used.

The Court's decision finds a conflict between the provisions of A.S. §09.55.280 and the declaration of taking provisions. I strongly disagree with the Court's reasoning but even more strongly object to the result which prevents a property owner from even enlisting the court's aid in curbing an abuse. Recent years have seen the United States Supreme Court severely restrict the right of one party to interfere with another party's property prior to the court review of the claimant's rights, particularly in the prejudgment attachment cases. Yet here, our State Supreme Court capitulates to any condemning authority the absolute right to take another person's property without any provision for review as to the necessity of the taking.

It may be that our condemnation laws are in need of wholesale revision. I fear that such revision would be strongly influenced by the State's Attorneys to the detriment of property owners. It seems to me that attorneys representing government agencies in condemnation somehow develop a paranoia and want the scales tilted far in their favor. Because of that, I would suggest that any revision be carefully reviewed. I would also suggest that steps be taken to neutralize the effect of the Arco Pipeline Company case decision.

Very truly yours,

Burton C. Biss

Determination for right of way must be made before can go to contract. The court room is not the place to decide right of way, that is for the agency (dept. of highways) to decide. Eminent domain and "quick take" is a proper authority for dept. of highways to have but nor for private corporations, like Alyeska or ARCO. State wants exemption from court room determination. Agency wants to make decision of what route to take before court room appearance. Expensive and time consuming. Department of Highways can make a better decision of right of way than a judge.

Dear Chancy:

Earlier, Bill McQuire sent along a copy of your proposed Senate Bill relating to the power of eminent domain, along with a request that we take a look at it here.

I have circulated the draft for comments, and have found no general problems with the legislation. I should point out that this Department has far less to do with eminent domain than does the Department of Highways, and therefore probably does not appreciate the complexities regarding the use of this law.

Generally speaking, the intent of the bill seems to be good, and the only change that anyone recommended in our Department is that in Section 460(b) the words "or purpose" be substituted for the words "for a project located." The thought here is that project tends to be associated with development and it may be that the eminent domain power may be exercised for a public use that may not require development. I would be interested in seeing comments of the Department of Highways on this.

Guy R. Martin

Petitioners are the owners and constructors of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline. In order to facilitate the prompt completion of this monumental and historic project, the State of Alaska in AS 38.35.130 authorized a delegation of its power of eminent domain and permitted thereby the use by petitioners of a declaration of taking to condemn real property in the state for right-of-way purposes.[1] Pursuant to this grant, on July 15th, 1974, petitioners filed an eminent domain complaint and a declaration of taking seeking to condemn a 3.6 acre right-of-way and easement -- 100 feet wide and approximately 1400 feet long -- across the 80 acre homestead of respondent Stewart in the area of Delta Junction. The sum of $700.00 was deposited in the court as estimated compensation for the taking. Respondent Stewart answered and asserted that condemnation of the respondent's property was not necessary since petitioners had public lands available to them which were suitable for the pipeline construction.

A consolidated hearing concerning this as well as other parcels in the same area was conducted on September 20 and November 1, 1974. At the hearing petitioners offered expert testimony on the subjects of route selection and design criteria and the necessity of the taking of respondent's property. The testimony revealed that in the opinion of the pipeline company the route selected was optimal in satisfying design and construction criteria and maintained

1. AS 38.35.130 of the Right-of-Way Leasing Act provides in part:

> (a) The lessee may, if the commissioner delegates the function to it, condemn, by declaration of taking, under AS 09.55.420-09.55.450, real property and acquire leases of or easements or rights-of-way on lands in the state required for right-of-way purposes for a pipeline subject to the lease on behalf of and as agent for the state in which title to or interest in the land shall vest.

the straightest line possible, one having the fewest number of angles detrimental to the proper flow of crude oil. The expert testimony further indicated that core drilling of the property had revealed that the soil was suitable for burying the pipeline. Respondent, on the other hand, offered no testimony questioning the efficacy of the route selected, but provided instead evidence that there were state and university lands north of respondent's property over which the pipeline could be constructed.

After hearing the testimony and after additional briefing the trial court denied the taking, concluding that petitioners had failed to demonstrate that they had considered routing the line over public lands and thereby avoid private injury. The court ruled that where the option of alternative routing over public land exists petitioners have the burden of submitting convincing evidence that they have at least considered the alternative routing across state land to avoid private injury, and that they must give cogent reasons for their ultimate selection.

Following the decision a petititon for review was filed in the Supreme Court and an order granting such review was entered on February 18, 1975.

Before discussing the issues raised in this review, it should be pointed out that the trial court specifically found that petitioners have been given statutory authority by the state of Alaska to take property for the construction of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline; it also apparently found that petitioners had been properly delegated this power and had otherwise complied with the applicable statutes governing the exercise of the power of condemnation by way of declaration of taking. These conclusions are supported on the record[2] and have not been contested herein by respondent. They are therefore not at issue in this Petition for Review.

The specific issue presented here for review is whether or not the trial court was correct in its determination that for purposes of the exercise of the power of condemnation by way of a declaration of taking petitioners have the burden of showing consideration of possible alternate pipeline routes and of providing sufficient proof of the necessity of the particular route selected. The resolution of this question necessarily entails an analysis of the statutes governing the use of a declaration of taking by petitioners and, correlatively, an inquiry into the question of the proper scope of judicial review in such proceedings.

for petitioners' taking in this case.[4] In Bridges v. Alaska Housing Authority, 349 P.2d 149 (Alaska 1959), the only case in which this court has engaged in a comprehensive analysis of the general import of these provisions in the context of the exercise of eminent domain in this state, it was observed that

> [a] declaration of taking enlarges the rights of the condemning authority and reduces those of the landowner. Upon the filing of the declaration and a deposit of the amount of compensation estimated to be due, title to the real property vests in the condemning agency and "such real property * * * shall be deemed to be condemned and taken for the use of the condemning agency * * *." And then, without the necessity of awaiting the report of the commissioners and assessment of damages, the court is given the power "to fix the time within which and the terms upon which

The Court further concluded that

> [i]t apparently was not intended that the declaration of taking power should merely supplement the procedural aspects of the then existing statutory provisions on eminent domain. . . . The declaration of taking is a power of eminent domain, and not only a manner of exercising a power otherwise conferred. More than procedure is involved; substantive rights are affected. 6

We take this opportunity to observe that changes in the language of the declaratic of taking provisions since Bridges have been -- at least for purposes of this review -- minor, and we consequently recognize the applicability of the Bridges analysis to the case at hand. In Bridges, however, we were not called upon to consider the effect of the declaration of taking provisions in light of other statutes which govern eminent domain proceedings in general. It is this interrelationship which is at the crux of this review.

The trial court, in holding that petitioners were obliged to demonstrate in convincing terms the necessity of selecting one route as opposed to other alternatives which might arguably minimize private injury, premised its ruling upon the conclusion that the petitioners' action was governed by the same rules which apply to any governmental exercise the court quite reasonably concluded that it was therefore

However, a consideration of the clear legislative intent that the prompt completion of the pipeline be facilitated under the Right-of-Way Leasing Act,[8] our reading and analysis of certain critical provisions governing the effect of the use of a declaration of taking, and the continued recognition and validation of the approach we adopted in Bridges lead us to the conclusion that the court erred in concluding that in a proceeding for condemnation by way of a declaration of taking the court is empowered to require the condemnor to prove the necessity of a given taking.

Our declaration of taking statutes were patterned upon the language of 40 U.S.C. §258a[9] which governs "quick take" eminent domain proceedings by the United States. Decisions interpreting this federal statute may consequently be considered persuasive for purposes of construing the analogous provisions of our own statutes.[10]

A review of such decisions reveals that it has been consistently recognized that the effect of the language of §258a is that once a declaration of taking is filed title to the property is transferred to the condemning authority subject only to the right of the property owner to challenge the validity of the taking as not being for an authorized public purpose or as having been made capriciously or in bad faith.[11] It has, for example, been held that absent bad faith, if the use is a public one the necessity of a given taking is not a question for judicial determination;[12] that once the declaration of taking is filed and the estimated compensation is deposited, neither the condemnee nor the court has the power to question the condemnor's determination of the necessity of a particular taking;[13] and that as the judicial role in examining such condemnation proceedings does not extend to determining whether the land sought is actually necessary to the project, the court's review power is limited to those cases where there has been some clear abuse of administrative discretion -- where the officials making the administrative decisions have acted in bad faith or so capriciously and arbitrarily that their action was without adequate determining principle or was unreasoned.[14]

Such an approach is in keeping with what would appear to be the general rule that the scope of review of any taking in eminent domain is extremely limited; that questions of necessity and expediency are largely beyond the reach of the court, which ought generally to limit its inquiry to the question of the existence of a proper public purpose and the absence of any abuse of the power of condemnation.[15] It is consequently recognized that it is no defense in a condemnation proceeding that some other location for the taking might reasonably have been selected or some other suitable property obtained.[16]

As against this proposition, however, Alaska is among the minority of jurisdictions which statutorily call for judicial inquiry into the question of necessity in eminent domain proceedings.[17] AS 09.55.270, for example, specifically requires for a showing that the taking "is necessary to the use" before property can be taken. The resultant conflict between this provision and the concept of judicial review developed under the language of 40 U.S.C. § 258a -- which may be presumed to have been intended to apply to our declaration of taking provisions[18] -- seems clear. Recognizing our duty to construe statutes covering the same subject matter in pari materia,[19] and to adopt where possible a reasonable construction of each which realizes leglislative intent and avoids conflict or inconsistency with the other,[20] we

We note that though we could find no explicit legislative recognition of this fact, the editors of our own Alaska Statutes 1962 have indicated in their annotations to AS 09.55.270 that this section was derived from an almost identical provision in the Montana Statutes. See 7 Rev. Codes Mont. 1947, § 93-9905 (1964). This fact would appear to offer much in the way of explanation for the trial court's reliance upon Montana precedent when it concluded that "when the condemnor fails to consider the question of the least private injury between alternate routes, its action is arbitrary and amounts to an abuse of discretion." nevertheless find the concept of judicial review embodied in our general eminent domain statutes to be inconsistent with and inappropriate to proceedings under a declaration of taking.

The conclusion seems inescapable that there exists a clear functional distinction between proceedings in condemnation under a declaration of taking and those under a complaint seeking condemnation and an order for possession. Under the former title passes immediately upon filing and deposit -- at which time, under AS 09.55.440, the property is deemed to be "condemned and taken for the use of the plaintiff."[21] Under the latter no such vesting occurs; title does not vest, nor does "condemnation" actually occur until the final award is determined and an order and judgment of condemnation is entered by the court.

As recognized in Bridges,[22] as well as later cases, the difference in the nature of these two proceedings is not merely procedural; the almost summary quality of the former bespeaks the grant of an additional substantive power of condemnation which considerably reduces the rights of the landowner to contest the taking.[23] Consequently, reading AS 09.55.420 to 09.55.450 in this light, we are lead to the conclusion that the intent of these provisions was to bring, in summary fashion, statutory finality to the questions of title and right to possession even though litigation continues with respect to the ultimate amount of compensation to be paid. If such finality is to be given any meaningful effect, we conclude that such vesting must be subject only to the rather limited right of the owner to contest the validity of the taking as not being statutorily authorized or as having been capriciously or arbitrarily exercised.[24] To permit the owner to challenge the necessity of the particular taking without an initial showing on his part that it is the result of some clear abuse of discretion is to give the concept of a declaration of taking no more effect than that of a complaint in any condemnation proceeding; such an interpretation would render the language of AS 09.55.440 noted above essentially meaningless.

We would note at this juncture that although the enabling legislation under which petitioners are empowered to use a declaration of taking does not refer to or incorporate it -- and we consequently do not find it wholly dispositive of the case at hand -- AS 09.55.460(b) provides in part that

> [t]he plaintiff may not be divested of a title acquired except where the court finds that the property was not taken for a public use.

We find that this express declaration of legislative intent as to the scope of judicial review in such proceedings lends considerable support for the conclusion we reach today.

Our decision that the question of necessity under a declaration of taking is not one for initial judicial consideration as in the case of other condemnation proceedings is also buttressed by several other factors. There is evidence, for example, that the legislature was at least well aware of the substantive differences in the two types of proceedings when it considered the use of eminent domain powers for pipeline right-of-way acquisition. Prior to the adoption of the present AS 38.35.130 an amendment was offered to the bill which would have authorized for pipeline purposes the exercise of eminent domain powers only under AS 09.55.240-09.55.410, the general eminent domain provisions.[25] Such an approach was rejected, however, and the present version allowing the use of a declaration of taking was adopted instead.

It must next be recognized that the Montana case law upon which the trial court apparently founded at least part of its decision[26] is from a statutory scheme which

House Journal and Senate Journal of Alaska, Special Session 1973, at 99. does not recognize at all the concept of a declaration of taking or any other such "quick take" proceeding.[27] Moreover, there is evidence that the courts of Montana have themselves not been entirely consistent on the subject of judicial review of administrative determinations of necessity. In State Highway Commission v. Crossen-Nissen Co., 410 P.2d 283, 285 (Mont. 1965), for example, it was held that although (in a normal eminent domain action) the plaintiff has the initial burden of making some sort of prima facie showing of necessity, it is > incumbent upon the defendant to show fraud, abuse of discretion or arbitrary action in order to defeat the action of the [plaintiff].

The court went on to hold that > even when necessity has been challenged on the ground of arbitrariness or excessiveness of the taking, there is left largely to the discretion of the condemnor the location, route, and area of the land to be taken. There rests upon the shoulders of one seeking to show that the taking has been excessive or abritrary, a heavy burden of proof in the attempt to persuade the court to substitute its judgment for that of the condemnor. . . . "[Such] proof should be made clear and convincing; otherwise no location could ever be made."

Assuming arguendo that such an evidentiary rule is wholly appropriate for proceedings under the same general eminent domain provisions in this state (a question we need not reach in this case), we find it difficult to square this analysis of burdens of proof with the ruling upon which the trial court based its decision -- that the condemnor is under a burden of demonstrating ab initio its consideration of alternative routes and of justifying the ultimate route selected. The mandate of a prima facie showing of "necessity," even in Montana, has been held to require only a showing that the particular property taken is "reasonably requisite and proper for the accomplishment of the purpose for which it is sought."[28] Notwithstanding the difficulty involved in reconciling these positions, or Montana case law, we are persuaded that no such burden of proof as was imposed by the trial court was ever intended to apply to proceedings under a declaration of taking in this state.

The final touchstone leading us to the conclusion that AS 09.55.420-09.55.450 were clearly intended to authorize a more summary and less judicially dependent exercise of the power of eminent domain is found in the original act under which the declaration of taking proceeding was authorized.

Sections 1 through 8 of chapter 90, SLA 1953, authorized the use of a declaration of taking as a special supplemental proceeding "to provide for obtaining possession of lands taken for public highway purposes by eminent domain." Prior to 1953 no such proceeding was recognized under Alaskan law. Although now no longer limited to public highway purposes, the state being authorized to use the proceeding for any purpose for which the right of eminent domain may be exercised,[29] the original 1953 Act is otherwise in almost every respect identical to the present provisions. The 1953 Act, however, contained a severability clause which specifically provided in addition that

> [a]ll laws or portions of laws inconsistent with the policy and provisions of this Act are hereby repealed to the extent of such inconsistency in their application to the declaration of taking procedure authorized by this Act.[30]

This provision, though not incorporated in the original 1962 codification of the Alaska Code of Civil Procedure,[31] not only clearly reflects a legislative recognition of the substantive difference between the use of this special power and that of eminent domain in general, but it also evidences in its express repealer language an intent that the exercise of this power should not be restricted by limitations, otherwise applicable to eminent domain, which are inconsistent with the policies of immediate vestiture of title and the limited power of the court to divest such title once acquired (as is reflected in the present AS 09.55.460 noted supra). A judicial recognition of these policies appears at least by implication in our opinion in Bridges.

29. We note that the historical development of these provisions reflects the adoption of increasingly less restrictive limitations on the use of this power. See § 1, ch. 90, SLA 1953 (use by the Territory for public highway purposes); § 1, ch. 138, SLA 1955 (use by the Territory "for any purpose for which the Territory is authorized the power of eminent domain"); §§ 1-5, ch. 146, SLA 1959 (extending the use of the declaration to the state, public utility and school districts); §§ 13.19-13.23, ch. 101, SLA 1962 (extending the power to first-class cities); § 2, ch. 122, SLA 1966 (adopting the language presently appearing in AS 09.55.420).

After consideration of the foregoing, we are of the opinion that in proceedings in eminent domain by way of a declaration of taking under AS 09.55.420-09.55.450, the court is without authority, either by virture of the express mandate of AS 09.55.460(b) or by implication from the legislative history and policy evidenced in AS 09.55.440, to review the question of the necessity of a particular taking absent a clear showing of fraud, bad faith, arbitrariness or an abuse of discretion in exercise of the power of condemnation by the condemning authority. Once an authorized public use for the taking is established by the condemnor, and statutory and procedural requirements are otherwise satisfied,[32] that the particular taking is reasonably requisite to the realization of that use shall be presumed. Notwithstanding such provisions as AS 09.55.270(2), judicial

32. It is clear, for example, that the failure of a declaration of taking to satisfy the specific requirements of AS 09.55.430 would constitute a proper defense to the condemnation. See note 3 supra. It is also manifest that a taking may properly be challenged on the ground that the condemnor's action is not in compliance with such specific restrictions on the exercise of the power as may appear in the commissioner's delegation of authority or the lease itself.

inquiry into such necessity or the condemnor's determinations with respect thereto is not appropriate unless and until the condemnee has presented clear and convincing evidence that the condemnor has acted in bad faith or so capriciously and arbitrarily as to indicate the absence of any reasonable determining principle.

In this case it is clear that the use intended is public and statutorily authorized. Petitioners have, moreover, presented unrebutted evidence to the effect that the design and construction criteria for the pipeline are most feasibly satisfied by the route across the property of respondent. The fact that some other available routing might suffice or even be more desirable in some respects is not sufficient in this case to raise a proper defense to the declaration of taking. Consequently, it cannot be said that petitioner is under any duty to initially submit evidence that it has considered such alternate routing; nor can the failure to make such showing under the circumstances justify a finding of arbitrariness or an abuse of discretion. Only specific allegations of fraud, bad faith, or some gross abuse of discretion in locating the pipeline can raise issues sufficient to permit judicial review of the necessity of the taking.[33] No such allegations haye been made herein. The determination of the location of the pipeline must

FOR HCS SB 546

The House Judiciary Committee received testimony that the addition of the proposed new language in AS 09.55.460 (b) would allow for an interpretation of that statute enabling a person to bring a collateral action for damages as a result of the taking after the normal time for a hearing on "just compensation" and "necessity compatable with the greatest public good and the least private harm."

It is the Committee's opinion, relying on the opinion of counsel at the Legislative Affairs Agency, that such a construction of AS 09.55.460 (b) would be extremely strained. It is the intent of the Judiciary Committee that the aforementioned language not be utilized in a manner which would allow an individual to bring a collateral action in a court of law other than to defend a taking as set out in AS 09.55.450 (a).
